5. Through thee will we push down our enemies. Enemies, see v. 7, and on Ps. xxvii. 2. Push down, rendered gore, Ex. xxi. 28, 31. It means to push as with a horn. Clarke: "Literally, 'We will toss them in the air with our horn,' a metaphor taken from an ox or bull tossing the dogs into the air, which attack him;" Anderson: "The allusion is to the pushing, striking or butting of oxen and other animals with their horns, and means to vanquish, or subdue," Deut. xxxiii. 17; 1 Kings xxii. 11; Dan. viii. 4. The form of the verb expresses confidence of victory; and the power by which that is done is none else than that of God, through thee or in thee, i. e., in union with thee. Through thy name will we tread them under that rise up against us. Tread under; Chaldee, bring into subjection; Arabic, taunt or defy; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway, contemn; Alexander, trample; in Pr. xxvii. 7, loatheth; most commonly tread down. The imagery is drawn from the habits of animals, when furiously trampling that which they hate, or from the habits of both men and beasts in treading on that, which they do not regard. Them that rise up against us, a participle, one word. Syriac, our enemies; Hengstenberg, our adversaries; Alexander, our assailants. This victory over enemies was in God's name, i. e., by his strength, direction and authority. The confidence here expressed is strong, drawn from the historic facts stated in vv. 1-3, and from God's promises.

6. For I will not trust in my bow, neither shall my sword save me. Syriac: Not in our bows, nor in our arms do we trust that they may set us free. In v. 3 past deliverances are wholly ascribed to God, so here reliance for future victories is solely on him. Alexander's paraphrase is just and beautiful: "What was true of my fathers is equally true of me. As they did not prevail by their own strength, neither can I hope to prevail by mine."

7. But thou hast saved us from our enemies, and hast put them to shame that hated us. But, better read, because. So the word commonly means; thus we get the best sense, and best preserve the connection. Hast saved, literally, hast caused to save. Enemies, adversaries, those that trouble us; see on v. 5; it is also in v. 10. To put to shame is to rout, discomfit, bring into felt contempt; see on Ps. vi. 10; xxii. 5; xxv. 2. The verse assigns a reason for the purpose expressed in v. 6.

8. In God we boast all the day long; i. e., continually. Hengstenberg reads, God we extol continually; Hammond and others, We have praised God; Edwards, In God we glory all day long, q. d., It is not ourselves, it is God alone, to whom all honor and glory are due for making our nation what it has been. And praise thy name forever. Chaldee: Thy name will we confess forever and ever; Syriac: We will confess to thy name forever; Arabic: We will give thanks to thy name forever; Edwards: We will celebrate thy name forever; Alexander: Thy name unto eternity will we acknowledge. Selah. See Introduction, § 15.

9. But thou hast cast off and put us to shame. Cast off, as in v. 23; Ps. xliii. 2; Lam. iii. 17, remove one to a distance. Put to shame, the same verb as in Ps. xxxv. 5; xl. 14; commonly rendered, as here, but sometimes blush, confound, and in one form to be reproached. The Jews had a peculiar sense of shame at being vanquished. They could not retreat with a grace, 2 Sam. xix. 3. The law of their warfare required success. Alexander: Thou hast rejected and disgraced us; Calvin: Thou hast abhorred us and put us to shame; Edwards: Thou hast deserted us and put us to shame. But, yet, or and yet. And goest not forth with our armies. See Joshua vii. 7, 8; 2 Sam. v. 24. Jehovah was the commander and the ally of the armies of Israel. He was the LORD of hosts. But when Israel sinned, he forsook them and was turned to fight against them. Then they always failed.

10. Thou makest us to turn back from the enemy. The reason why even a slight defeat so affected the Jews was that for long centuries they had properly regarded it as a sign of a curse resting on them, Josh. vii. 12. How heavy was the loss at this time we know not. The death of about "thirty-six men" at Ai filled the camp of Israel with sore dismay, and made even Joshua say: "Would to God we had been content, and dwelt on the other side Jordan," Josh. vii. 5, 7. The defeat at this time may have been no more disastrous. Flight was followed by plundering: And they which hate us spoil for themselves. Edwards: Those that hate us plunder us. This rendering takes no notice of for themselves, which teaches "that their enemies destroyed them at their pleasure and without any resistance, as their prey." Alexander: "Spoiled for themselves, not merely for their own advantage, but at their own will and discretion."

11. Thou hast given us like sheep appointed for meat. Calvin: Thou hast given us as sheep for food; church of England: Thou lettest us be eaten up like sheep; Hengstenberg: Thou makest us like sheep for slaughter. When our English translation was made meat was equivalent to food, flesh then being used as meat is in this century. The exceedingly dreadful nature of ancient war, especially as conducted by heathen nations, appears from all its annals. Even now every battle of the warrior is with confused noise, and garments rolled in blood. But then no mercy was commonly shown to the conquered. This clause and one in v. 22 declare the helplessness of the sufferers and the low estimate in which their lives were held. They were slaughtered like sheep. And [thou] hast scattered us among the heathen. It was a national calamity to Israel to see one of the chosen people carried into captivity by the heathen. The bondage was hard, commonly for life, and often attended by the most appalling circumstances. Calvin: "A dispersion among the heathen was to the Israelites a hundred times more grievous than death."

12. Thou sellest thy people for nought. The argument is that delivering over the Israelites to these sad calamities had been no advantage to the cause of true religion among surrounding nations. The inspired writer does not say that Israel had not so sinned as to merit severe rebukes; but that the heathen rather despised than revered Jehovah for the troubles sent on Judea. The next clause is of like import: And [thou] dost not increase thy wealth by their price. Arabic: Thou hast diminished the multitude of their number; Calvin: Thou hast not increased the price of them; Edwards: Thou art not enriched by the sale of them; Hengstenberg: Thou receivest nothing for it. So far as these vary from the sense of the English version, they are not improvements. Anderson says it is "as if they had said, Thou hast sold us to our enemies at whatever price they would give; like a person who sells things that are useless at any price, not so much for the sake of gain as to get quit of what he considers of no value and burdensome." Hammond's paraphrase is: "We are thus sadly handled, without the comfort of bringing in any honor to thee by our calamities; since thy church among us is defaced, and no other people taken instead of us, by whom thy name may be glorified." Hengstenberg properly regards Jer. xv. 13 as parallel.

13. Thou makest us a reproach to our neighbours. Reproach, well and almost invariably so rendered; here used in the concrete, as are also the nouns following: A scorn and a derision to them that are round about us. For scorn and derision, Ainsworth has scoff and scorn; Alexander, scoff and jest. Make us, literally set us, or place us.

14. Thou makest us a byword among the heathen. Makest, i. e., placest, or settest. For byword Hengstenberg has similitude; Syriac and Amesius, fable; Septuagint and Ainsworth, parable; Chaldee, Arabic, Venema, Edwards and Fry, proverb. The common version gives the sense. The sense is clear, viz., that the Israelites were both contemned and detested, "so that their very name was bandied about everywhere in proverbial allusions, as a term of reproach;" see Deut. xxviii. 37, where the same word is rendered proverb. The Israelites were also by God made a shaking of the head among the people, i. e., an object at which men derisively shook their heads. Tholuck: "The shaking of the head denotes here, as in Psalm xxii. 7, derisive joy." By the heathen and the people we are to understand surrounding and even somewhat distant nations. Roman literature contains evidences of the execration in which the Jews were held even in Italy.

15. My confusion is continually before me. Calvin: My reproach is daily before me; Venema: Daily my disgrace is before me. All the day, continually. Confusion, elsewhere reproach, shame, dishonor. Before me, in my presence, i. e., so presented before me that I cannot avoid perceiving it. And the shame of my face hath covered me. Shame, commonly so rendered; once, a shameful thing, and sometimes confusion. Covered, concealed, clothed, hid, as with a veil, or garment. When a good man's clothing is shame, his distress is extreme. Incessant insolence and scorn produce the saddest effects on men's minds and spirits. One of the ingredients of infernal misery is "everlasting contempt."

16. For the voice of him that reproacheth and blasphemeth. Him that reproacheth, a participle having the same root as the noun reproach in v. 13. It sometimes means defy, i. e., with reproaches. Alexander renders it slander. Him that blasphemeth, a participle. The verb is in our version always rendered as here, except in Num. xv. 30. See 2 Kings xix. 6, 22; Isa. xxxvii. 6, 23; Ezek. xx. 27. In both the Old and New Testaments blasphemy is reviling, reproachful speech, whether it be spoken of God or of man. All this was by reason of the enemy and avenger. The avenger corresponds to him that blasphemeth; and the enemy to him that reproacheth in the former clause. Calvin: "Avenger, a term which, among the Hebrews, denotes barbarity and cruelty, accompanied with pride." See Ps. viii. 2.

17. All this is come upon us. All, i. e., what had been said from the beginning of v. 9. Yet have we not forgotten thee. To forget God is to fall into general irreligion. This clause is the beginning of a plea alleging the general fidelity of the nation to their covenant engagements. Neither have we dealt falsely in thy covenant. Pool paraphrases these clauses: "Although we cannot excuse ourselves from many other sins for which thou hast justly punished us, yet this we must say for ourselves, that through thy grace we have kept ourselves from apostasy and idolatry, notwithstanding all the examples and provocations, rewards proposed and promised, or punishments threatened to induce us thereunto; which we hope thou wilt graciously consider, and not suffer us to be tempted above what we are able to bear." Though good men are imperfect, they are not hypocrites.

18. Our heart is not turned back, neither have our steps declined from thy way. Declined, swerved, deviated. Way, the path of duty. David's reign was remarkable for the absence of idol-worship, and for the general attachment of the people to the service of Jehovah.

19. Though thou hast sore broken us in the place of dragons. Sore broken, by most ancient versions rendered sunk, humbled, abased; Calvin, wasted; Ainsworth, Fry and Alexander, crushed; Edwards, afflicted; Jebb, shattered; Hengstenberg, bruised; in Ps. x. 10, croucheth. Perhaps we might here read: Thou makest us to lie down. The place of dragons; Syriac, a miserable place; Arabic, a place of torment; Septuagint, a place of slaughter; Vulgate, a place of affliction; Edwards, the place of serpents; Hengstenberg and Tholuck, the place of jackals. Hengstenberg: "The jackals appear often as inhabitants of waste and desert places." He refers to Isa. xiii. 22; xxxiv. 13; xliii. 20; Jer. ix. 11, in proof. But in all these places and wherever it occurs, the authors of the English translation never rendered it jackal, but always dragons, except once in the text it is whale; but in the margin even there they read dragon. Alexander: "Dragons may here be understood as meaning wild beasts or lonely animals in general." Aquila: In a desert place where great serpents are found; Hare: In desert places among wild beast and serpents; Edwards: In a wild desolate place, where were serpents, and other noxious animals. Mant refers it to the wilderness, and quotes Shaw as authority to prove the great number of serpents in the wilderness of Sin. But Calvin says: "The word which others translate dragons, I would rather render whales." Williams: "In the place of sea-monsters, perhaps crocodiles." Of course such suppose the allusion is to a shipwreck. But that is not clear. Dragons seems to be nearly equivalent to our word monsters. The condition of God's afflicted ones as here described is clearly one most unpleasant and perilous. Clarke paraphrases: "Thou hast delivered us into the hands of a fierce, cruel and murderous people." And [thou hast] covered us with the shadow of death. Covered, as in v. 15; Ps. xxxii. 1, 5. There is no better rendering. On shadow of death, see on Ps. xxiii. 4.

20. If we have forgotten the name of our God, or stretched out our hands to a strange god. Forgotten, as in vv. 17, 24. The name of God is that by which he is known. To stretch out the hands to God is to offer him worship, Ps. cxli. 2. If we have done these things,

21. Shall not God search this out? This is one of many instances of the strongest affirmations by an interrogative form of speech. Hengstenberg renders it: Would not God require it? Search, as in Ps. cxxxix. 1, 23. Because God is omniscient he must search. For he knoweth the secrets of the heart. Knoweth, see on Ps. i. 6. There is no higher proof of divinity than a knowledge of the secrets of men's hearts. Hengstenberg and some others regard vv. 20, 21, as containing the formula of an oath. But we have a better sense without regarding it as an oath.

22. Yea, for thy sake are we killed all the day long; we are counted as sheep for the slaughter. This verse shows the extreme and constant sufferings of God's people, even at a time when they had not displeased him by any recent or visible defection. It is pertinent to the scope of the Psalm. It does not deny that good may be brought out of our afflictions, nor that it is not better to suffer for well-doing than for evil-doing; nor that it is not better to suffer in God's cause than our own. But it is an appeal for mercy on the grounds of freedom from covenant-breaking with God, and of the great cruelty of persecutors, who insulted Jehovah by murdering his people. These words have a sad fulfilment, whenever God's people fall under persecution; see Rom. viii. 36. Sheep for the slaughter, see on v. 11.

23. Awake, why sleepest thou, O LORD? God is sometimes spoken of as if he had the form, the affections, or the weakness of a man; here as if he had fallen asleep. The call on him is to act like a resistless avenger awaking out of sleep, and finding his premises invaded, and his children cruelly treated. Arise, cast us not off forever. For arise some read awake, wake up. Cast off, see on v. 9. Forever points out the long continuance of the invasion and persecution.

24. Wherefore hidest thou thy face? See on Ps. x. 11; xiii. 1; q. d., Why dost thou withhold the favorable aspects of thy providence? And [why] forgettest [thou] our affliction and our oppression? Forgettest, see on vv. 17, 20; i. e., Why dost thou treat us as though thou hadst forgotten? The affliction and oppression have been described.

25. For our soul is bowed down to the dust: our belly cleaveth unto the earth, i. e., we are greatly distressed and broken. Hengstenberg: "We are as to body and soul smitten and thrown down, glued as it were to the ground, so that we cannot raise ourselves up." It is as if the psalmist had said, The curse denounced against the serpent (see Gen. iii. 14) has fallen on us; we are sunk to the earth; and, left to ourselves as we are now, we shall rise no more; we have no heart even to make an effort to help ourselves.

26. Arise for our help. Arise, in v. 5, rise up. Help, always so rendered. And redeem us for thy mercies' sake. So familiar was the idea of deliverance by redemption that even an escape from temporal calamities was sought in prayer by such petitions as this. The Hebrew word for mercies' is in the singular, and so it should read for thy mercy's sake. God's mercy is the ground and measure of all the good we receive.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The knowledge of the true religion is greatly kept alive and extended by older persons telling their juniors what God has done in former times, v. 1. Tholuck: "It was the admirable occupation of old men in Israel to immortalize the works of the Lord in the nation, that the remembrance might in a continuous chain go from century to century," Ex. x. 2; Ps. lxxviii. 3-6. "While the songs of other nations sing of the heroism of their ancestors, the songs of Israel celebrate the works of God."

2. Every important part of church history illustrates the excellence of the doctrine of the unity of the true church and of the communion of saints. No child of God rejoiceth or weepeth, liveth or dieth to himself. God's people have not to this day ceased to celebrate the passage through the Red sea, or over Jordan. Why should they? "Whatsoever things were written aforetime were written for our learning, that we through patience and comfort of the Scriptures might have hope."

3. Striking providences in the history of every Christian nation are eminently proper subjects of meditation and of recital to the rising generation, v. 2. Henry: "It is a debt which every age owes to posterity to keep an account of God's works of wonder, and to transmit the knowledge of them to the next generation."

4. We ought diligently to study God's mercies to others in times past; for though the memory of them may cast us down, if we presently experience no deliverance, yet a mind rightly guided by faith will be led to say, He, who helped others, will in his time help me; and so hope and courage will both be revived. "God's old works have new use in all ages." So Gideon reasoned: "Where be all his miracles, which our fathers told us of?" Judges vi. 13.

5. It is a mercy that in nearly all important events of the life of man, or in the history of a nation, God's hand is so clear, that nothing but impiety can cherish atheistic thoughts, or ascribe to human might or wisdom the results effected by God, v. 3. We are weak as water; and commonly God lets us see and feel our impotence before he sends relief. At least "faith knows that the strength of man is not his, but God's."

6. The reason, why one succeeds better than another, and one nation outshines another, is that God favors one more than another. Divine mercy makes the difference. God is a sovereign. This doctrine is very old, Deut. vii. 7, 8.

7. A time of trouble is no time to deny or forget the Lord. Then, if ever, we should avouch him to be our God and our King, v. 4. Dickson: "Trouble maketh faith thirsty, and teacheth the believer to make use of his right and interest." "Relations between God and his people stand constantly in adversity, as well as in prosperity."

8. It often happens that our state is so perplexed, and our affairs so entangled, that we need not merely a deliverance, but deliverances; not merely salvation, but salvations, v. 4. All this is graciously promised.

9. When God commands deliverance, it shall surely come. "Where the word of the king is, there is power." He made the world by his word. He commanded and it stood fast. Nothing costs God labor. He has all power, all causes, all means, all agents, all results under his control.

10. God helping us, we can do anything, overcome any enemies, resist any assaults, vanquish any legions; for it is God that breaks the shield, the sword and the battle, v. 5. Every genuine child of God achieves victories more worthy of celebration than that of David over the lion, the bear and the giant.

11. Means must be used but not relied on, v. 6. Not to use them is to despise God's ordinance; but to trust in them is to despise God himself. Man must sow and water; God gives the increase. Man is to bend his bow and sharpen his sword in the day of battle, and use both with his utmost skill; and then trust God as if he were unarmed.

12. Sooner or later shame will overtake the wicked, v. 7. It cannot be otherwise. Mercy may long defer the fatal hour; but it will come at last, yea, come soon to all the impenitent.

13. Very exulting language and behaviour are not unbecoming to the righteous, if they are produced solely by God's acts and directed only to his glory, v. 8. Nor should mere change of circumstances, from pleasant to painful, hinder us from making our boast in God. We should always suspect our own tempers, when they do not lead us to this duty.

14. Good men may be brought into great straits; yea, the best of men into the greatest straits, v. 9. There is imperfection enough in every man living to justify Jehovah in chastening him. All the vessels of mercy need scouring; all the children of God are the better for correction. The best churches are much marred with imperfection. He, whose they are, may wisely purge them in the furnace of affliction. Churches, nations and armies may in the main be right, yet so far wrong as to need rebuke, defeat, disaster for their own good.

15. If trouble befalls men, churches or nations, they may rest assured there is a cause for it. "How should one chase a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, except their Rock had sold them, and the LORD had shut them up," Deut. xxxii. 30.

16. The horrors of war in all ages are unspeakable, involving flight, pillage, captivity and death, vv. 10, 11. If for our many sins we must be punished, let it not be by war or by famine, where men's malignant passions will be at work, but by pestilence. Oh let us fall into the hands of the Lord.

17. When the character of her foes is remembered, the church should expect no mercy from them, v. 11. Their cry has ever been, Rase it, rase it, even to the foundations thereof, Ps. cxxxvii. 7. They have no pity.

18. Perhaps there was seldom a time when the Israelites had not cause to believe that some of their nation were in captivity. This should have taught them humility and dependence on God, with pity to the captives, v. 12. And there is seldom a time when some of the human race are not in a miserable captivity. This should greatly affect us. We should often remember the prisoner, and ask God to hear his sighing.

19. Let us often pray that we may not be tried with the taunts and derision of mankind, vv. 13, 14. That test is too severe for most men.

20. If we have great grief for a long time, even when we have in the main done right, let us not be surprised. It has been so before, vv. 15, 19.

21. When men are fairly started in a course of wickedness, and especially of persecution, it may be expected that, if left to themselves, they will stop at nothing, v. 16.

22. When by our sufferings or the reproaches heaped upon us men get the impression that we are suffering for some great sin, we may humbly, modestly and firmly defend our characters, vv. 17, 18. If we can truly deny the charge of backsliding and covenant-breaking, we may certainly do so.

23. Whatever befalls us, let us hold fast the profession of the true religion, and never swerve from the worship and service of Jehovah. A knowledge that we have done so will afford us relief and solace, when all without looks dark, v. 20.

24. Let all that do wickedly be sure that their sin will find them out, vv. 20, 21. The nature of man and the nature of sin render it probable, but the nature of God makes it certain that what is done in a corner shall be proclaimed on the house-top.

25. Be much concerned respecting the state of your heart. If that is right, all is right; if that is wrong, all is wrong. It is only man that judgeth by the appearance.

26. Persecution is the common lot of God's people, v. 22. Calvin: "Lest the severity of the cross should dismay us, let us always have present to our view this condition of the church, that as we are adopted in Christ, we are appointed to the slaughter." Dickson: "It is a mercy to us, that when God might punish us for our sins, he maketh our correction honorable, and our troubles to be for a good cause: for thy sake are we killed." Reader, are you at heart a martyr? Would you stand fire for Christ?

27. We ought at all times, and especially in distress, to resort to a throne of grace, and by earnest prayer, by strong crying and by filling our mouth with arguments beg of God to undertake our cause, vv. 23-26. But let us at such time be especially guarded against self-righteousness and vain-glory. We are poor, and miserable, and blind, and naked, and sinful.

28. Let us often and with delight dwell on the glorious theme of Redemption, v. 26. Let us not forget to mention it in our prosperity. In adversity let us remember that the worst would have come on us forever, but for redemption. "Redemption is precious."

29. Grace! grace! grace! has ever been the song of the church and ever shall be, v. 26. All we have and hope for is for his mercy's sake. This is best for us; while it is most honorable to God.

PSALM XLV.

To the chief Musician upon Shoshannim, for the sons of Korah, Maschil, A Song of loves.

1 My heart is inditing a good matter: I speak of the things which I have made touching the king: my tongue is the pen of a ready writer.

2 Thou art fairer than the children of men: grace is poured into thy lips: therefore God hath blessed thee for ever.

3 Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty, with thy glory and thy majesty.

4 And in thy majesty ride prosperously, because of truth and meekness and righteousness; and thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things.

5 Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies; whereby the people fall under thee.

6 Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever: the sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre.

7 Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness: therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows.

8 All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad.

9 Kings' daughters were among thy honourable women: upon thy right hand did stand the queen in gold of Ophir.

10 Harken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear; forget also thine own people, and thy father's house;

11 So shall the king greatly desire thy beauty: for he is thy Lord; and worship thou him.

12 And the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift; even the rich among the people shall entreat thy favour.

13 The king's daughter is all glorious within: her clothing is of wrought gold.

14 She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needle-work: the virgins her companions that follow her shall be brought unto thee.

15 With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought: they shall enter into the king's palace.

16 Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth.

17 I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations: therefore shall the people praise thee for ever and ever.

ON several phrases of the title, see on titles of Ps. iv. xxxii. xlii. Upon Shoshannim; it may be stated, 1. We have it in the singular Shushan with eduth annexed in the title of Ps. lx.; Shoshannim in the title of Ps. lix.; and Shoshannim-eduth in the title of Ps. lxxx. We find it in no other title. 2. Formerly many referred its use to the six-stringed instruments; but now it is generally agreed that Shoshannim signifies lilies, and Eduth, testimony. The compound is Lilies of testimony. 3. Upon may point to a theme, an instrument, or a tune. If it refers to a tune, or an instrument, it was to one called Lilies. Those who think it refers to a theme suppose that the daughters or virgins mentioned in the Psalm are called lilies; those flowers being fit emblems of female beauty. This view is best supported. There is no evidence that this Psalm is modelled after some other, although it bears a remarkable resemblance to the Song of Solomon. If lilies refers to females, so probably does loves, which doubtless means loved ones, as love in the Canticles means a loved one. The date and authorship are uncertain. A quite common opinion fixes it in the days of Solomon, and ascribes its authorship to the sons of Korah. But see Introduction, § 4, and on title of Ps. xlii. There is no insuperable objection to the opinion that David wrote it. He was a prophet; he wrote Ps. lxxii., which is a prediction respecting Solomon as a type of Christ. No supposition is attended with so few difficulties. Much of the imagery is drawn from the marriage of an eastern prince, and the whole is in honor of him. If Solomon is here spoken of, still the Psalm is Messianic. So think the soundest expositors. Luther: "This is a prophecy concerning the gospel and kingdom of Christ;" Hengstenberg: "Nearly all the older Christian expositors understand it of the Messiah;" Alexander: "The allegorical or Messianic sense is given by the oldest interpreters, both Jewish and Christian;" Morison: "There is not, perhaps, in the entire book of Psalms a more direct or sublime prediction of Christ and the church than the one embodied in this beautiful ode. To a mind that is spiritual, it will ever suggest thoughts of loftiest devotion;" Scott: "It is entirely a prophecy of Christ, and is quoted as such by the apostle," Heb. i. 8, 9. The Chaldee and Arabic interpret it of Christ. Except on the belief of its allegorical and Messianic sense it never could have had a place in the canon of the Old Testament. It is in the usual form addressed to the leader of the public praises of Israel. It is an Instruction, a Didactic Psalm. The relation of Jehovah to his church is often represented by that of marriage. As early as the time of Moses, unfaithfulness to Jehovah was branded with the infamy due to a faithless wife, Ex. xxxiv. 15, 16; Lev. xvii. 7; xx. 5, 6; Num. xiv. 33; Deut. xxxi. 16. And after the time of David to the close of the canon of the New Testament the inspired writers evince a familiarity with the same idea of a marriage relation. See Isa. liv. 5; lxii. 4, 5; Jer. iii. 1; Ezek. xvi.; xxiii.; often in Hosea; Matt. ix. 15; John iii. 20; Rom. vii. 4; 2 Cor. xi. 2; Eph. v. 27, 32; Rev. xix. 7; xxi. 2; xxii. 17. So that Venema speaks well when he says, "No other can possibly be thought of here than Messiah or Solomon." He and others state the two modes in which it is applied to Christ, either remotely under the figure of Solomon, or directly and immediately as a mere prophecy. Either method secures substantial accuracy. But the latter is to be preferred, with the understanding that much of the imagery is borrowed from the nuptials and palace of Solomon. Many things in this song could have had no fulfilment in any mere man. "Behold, a greater than Solomon is here." In this Psalm we have Elohim God and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; ii. 4. Clarke dates it B. C. 1008; Scott, B. C. 1020.

1. My heart is inditing a good matter. Chaldee: My heart hath cast forth a good discourse; Calvin: My heart is boiling over with a good matter; Boothroyd: My heart teemeth with excellent matter; Edwards: My heart is full of a good thing; Tholuck: My heart wellet forth a fair song. The sense is: My heart has well thought over and is now full of a good matter. Probably the primary meaning of the verb is to seethe over a fire. His heart was warmed with his subject. I speak of the things which I have made touching the king. Chaldee and Syriac: I will speak my works to the king; Calvin: I shall speak of the works which I have made concerning the king; Amesius: I will speak my poems concerning the king; Edwards: I will speak what I have made upon the king; Hammond: My composures will I deliver [or recite] to the king; Tholuck: I say: I will sing touching the king. These words are hardly an exclamation, for they are preceded and followed by a narrative clause. The aim of v. 1 is to give notice of what is about to be done, as in Isa. v. 1. Our version would give the precise sense by putting the participle in the future will speak. Many versions do so. My tongue is the pen of a ready writer. Syriac and Arabic: My tongue is the pen of a skilful writer; Doway: My tongue is the pen of a scrivener that writeth swiftly; Calvin: My tongue is as the pen of a swift writer; Edwards: My tongue is like the pen of a learned scribe. The clause doubtless claims inspiration. Holy men spake and wrote as they were moved by the Holy Ghost. Scott: "The tongue was guided by the Spirit of God, as entirely as the pen is by the hand of a ready writer, to express promptly and fully the mind of the Spirit, and nothing more;" Fry: "I conceive that the subserviency of the human faculties to the Spirit of inspiration is alluded to under the figure of a pen in the hand of a ready and expert writer." There seems to be no good reason for changing the phrase from a declaration into an invocation: Let my tongue be as the pen of a ready writer. The prophets claim, but do not invoke the guidance of the Spirit in their compositions. The whole verse tells how the writer's mind is imbued with the subject of Messiah, and how fully he is supposed to speak his praises.

2. Thou art fairer than the children of men. Chaldee: Thy beauty, O King Messiah, is above that of the sons of men; Mudge: Thou art wonderfully fair beyond the sons of men; Alexander: Beautiful, beautiful art thou above the sons of men. This clause determines that the ode cannot have its fulfilment in Solomon. He was indeed very wise; but for piety, purity, unbending integrity, holiness of heart and righteousness of life he had many superiors. In moral worth Noah, Daniel and Job certainly far outshined him, Ezek. xiv. 14, 20. But every word is true respecting Christ. He is above all, before all, over all. Diodati: "Thou art excellent and perfect in all manner of virtue, and such dost thou appear to be to thy church," Isa. xxxiii. 17; Cant. v. 10, 16. Alexander: "On any supposition but the Messianic one, this verse is unintelligible." Grace is poured into thy lips. The key to the right interpretation of this clause is given us by two evangelists. "And all bare him witness, and wondered at the gracious words which proceeded out of his mouth," Luke iv. 22; "The Word was made flesh and dwelt among us, full of grace and truth;" and "Grace and truth came by Jesus Christ," John i. 14, 17; Compare John vii. 46; Matt. vii. 28, 29; Horne: "His word instructed the ignorant, resolved the doubtful, comforted the mourners, reclaimed the wicked, silenced his adversaries, healed diseases, controlled the elements, and raised the dead." Many translations agree precisely with the English text. There is difficulty attending the supposition that 1 Kings x. 8, is parallel to this. Christ's words are still mighty. Therefore God hath blessed thee forever. There is much uniformity in rendering the clause; except that for therefore some read because. If therefore is preferred, then the sense is God has blessed our King forever because he well executed his prophetic office; if because then the sense is that Christ executed his office well, owing to the fact that God had given him a permanent blessing. Both are true and scriptural ideas. Compare Isa. lxi. 1-3; Phil. ii. 5-10.

3. Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O most mighty, with thy glory and thy majesty. The word most is put in by the translators for interpretation. It is not in the Hebrew. Mighty, in Ps. xix. 5, a strong man; in Job xvi. 14, giant; in Isa. x. 21, applied to Jehovah, mighty God; in Isa. ix. 6, it is certainly applied to Messiah. This verse cannot be applied to Solomon, but only to Christ. He wholly pursued the arts of peace, and was no warrior. For mighty Mudge, Edwards and Hengstenberg read Hero; Horsley, Warrior. It is quite according to inspired usage to speak of Christ's word as a sword, Eph. vi. 17; Heb. iv. 12; Rev. ii. 12, 16. With this he goes forth to subdue the earth to himself. To gird on the sword is to prepare for battle, 1 Sam. xxv. 13. Because Messiah was mighty and blessed for ever, his warlike undertakings would surely be successful. Glory and majesty would attend him. Both these words express high royal state and even divine grandeur, Ps. xxi. 5; xlv. 6. Christ goes forth conquering and to conquer.

4. And in thy majesty ride prosperously, because of truth and meekness and righteous- ness. Clarke: "These words cannot be spoken of Solomon: they are true only of Christ." The warlike figure of the preceding verse is here retained. Kings often went into battle in chariots, and as the enemy was routed they pressed forward triumphantly. But their conquest was with weapons of death, and amidst the slaughtered corpses and dying groans of their enemies. But the victories of Messias are those of truth,—his word, of meekness,—the meekness of Christ, and of righteousness,—the glorious rectitude of God, his glorious method of justifying sinners, and the unbending integrity of his people, whose righteousness exceeds that of the Scribes and Pharisees. Some other renderings may interest the reader; Calvin: And in thy majesty do thou prosper: ride forth upon the word of truth, and meekness, and righteousness; Edwards: Ride on prosperously in the cause of truth, righteousness, and humanity; Green: Ride on successfully in the cause of truth, righteousness and meekness; Boothroyd: And in thy majesty ride prosperously on, in the cause of truth, meekness and righteousness. The clause may mean that Christ's riding prosperously is in the cause of truth, meekness and righteousness. And thy right hand shall teach thee terrible things. Chaldee: And the Lord shall teach thee to work fearful things with thy right hand; Green: And let thy right hand direct thee to do formidable things; Horsley: For thy own right hand shall show thee wonders; Hengstenberg: And thy right hand will teach thee terribleness. The sense is that his right hand should guide him to do things terrible to his foes. Nothing fills men's hearts with greater fear than the rapid spread of the truth, humility and righteousness of the Gospel, Acts ii. 43. Compare Ps. xl. 3.

5. Thine arrows are sharp in the heart of the king's enemies; whereby the people fall under thee. No arrows pierce so deep as the arrows of truth. They produce the most pungent convictions, pricking men in the heart, making them cry aloud for mercy, Acts ii. 37; xvi. 29; 1 Cor. xiv. 24, 25. There are two ways in which the wicked fall before Christ; one is to ask and receive mercy; the other is to sink under the weight of his wrath. If men despise his grace, they shall be crushed by his power, Isa. viii. 14, 15; Luke ii. 34. He is "a king, against whom there is no rising up." All his incorrigible foes must perish, for he is God:

6. Thy throne, O God, is forever and ever. This verse and the next are quoted entire by Paul in Heb. i. 8, 9, for the purpose of establishing the divinity of Jesus Christ. We may rely with infallible certainty upon the interpretation there given. The rendering of this clause in all the ancient versions is the same as that of the English. It is a groundless conceit that the name God is applied to Messias here not in his divine nature, but in his mediatorial character only. The true and proper divinity of Christ is plainly and beyond all question here asserted. The clause refers to him who is by John called the true God and by Isaiah the mighty God. It cannot without violence be applied to Solomon. His throne, either as held by himself or his carnal offspring, was not for ever and ever, or to eternity and perpetuity. Strenuous efforts have been made to turn aside this passage from its obvious and inspired interpretation. But Hengstenberg well says that the non-Messianic expositors have not been able to bring forward anything grammatically tenable. The sceptre of thy kingdom is a right sceptre. Arabic and Hengstenberg: A sceptre of equity is the sceptre of thy kingdom; Calvin: The sceptre of thy kingdom is the sceptre of equity; Tholuck: The sceptre of thy kingdom is a sceptre of justice; Alexander: A sceptre of rectitude (is) the sceptre of thy kingdom. This clause can be applied without stint or qualification to Messias; but only in a limited sense to Solomon, who at times very far departed from rectitude. Solomon often erred; Messias never, never.

7. Thou lovest righteousness, and hatest wickedness. Here our version has lovest, hatest; in the New Testament it follows the Hebrew and Septuagint, hast loved, hast hated. This clause is applicable to Solomon in a very limited sense only; to Christ without restriction. Therefore God, thy God, hath anointed thee with the oil of gladness above thy fellows. Messiah was "that holy thing" at his birth. He was by nature, not by a process of sanctification, "holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners." He never offended his Father, but pleased him well. Therefore above all the kings of earth, his fellow princes, has his joy arisen, and it shall be perpetual and augmenting forever. Christ had the anointing of the Holy Ghost without measure. Hence some have thought perhaps correctly that the direct reference here was to the Spirit. The allusion is based on the custom of anointing honored guests at feasts. See on Ps. xxiii. 5. All this coincides with Paul's teachings in Phil. ii. 8-11. Scott happily blends both ideas: "God the Father, as 'his God,' in respect of his human nature and mediatorial offices, has given him the Holy Spirit, without measure, that, being thus anointed to be our Prophet, Priest and King, he might have the pre-eminency in the gladdening gifts and graces of the Holy Spirit, the Comforter; and from his fulness might communicate them to his fellows, his brethren in human nature." The anointing oil of the ancients was compounded after the art of the apothecary, Ex. xxx. 25, there being added to it costly aromatics:

8. All thy garments smell of myrrh, and aloes, and cassia, out of the ivory palaces, whereby they have made thee glad. Our version of these words gives the sense and agrees with the Syriac, although there is in the Hebrew no verb corresponding to smell. Here are a few of the various renderings. Chaldee: All thy vestments are perfumed with the tender myrrh, the lign-aloës and the cassia. From palaces which are built of Armenian ivory they shall gladden thee; Edwards: All thy garments gladden thee with the odors of myrrh, aloës and cassia out of the ivory cabinets; Green: All thy garments out of the ivory wardrobes, perfumed with myrrh, aloës, and cassia, delight thee with their fragrance. Myrrh, mentioned in the directions given for making the "oil of holy ointment" in Ex. xxx. 23-25. See also Est. ii. 12; Pr. vii. 17; Cant. i. 13; iii. 6; iv. 6, 14; v. 1, 5, 13. Aloës are mentioned in three other places in the Old Testament, sometimes in the masculine as in Num. xxiv. 6, [rendered lign-aloës;] Pr. vii. 17; in Cant. iv. 14, as here in the feminine. In several parts of Asia there is a shrub, or tree called aloës, seldom growing higher than eight or ten feet. The wood and the resin gathered from it are very aromatic. The Egyptians used it in embalming. Nicodemus brought a hundred pounds of myrrh and aloës to embalm the sacred body of Jesus. Cassia was an ingredient of the holy oil mentioned above. It was a part of the merchandize of Tyre, Ezek. xxvii. 19. It was a bark, somewhat like cinnamon but not of so fine a flavor, though highly esteemed.

The garments of eastern princes were very costly, Luke vii. 25. The richest were worn only on great occasions. King's raiment was often kept in wardrobes, or cabinets, as some prefer, rather than palaces. These were often costly and ornamented with ivory. Or the ivory palaces may have been the abodes of kings or of rich men about whose residences was much work made of ivory. Ahab had such a palace, 1 Kings xxii. 39; Amos iii. 15 speaks of "houses of ivory." The best sense of the phrase—From which they rejoice thee—is had by making they refer to the kings' daughters mentioned in the next verse. Indeed some versions put no pause after glad, and make kings' daughters the nominative of the last verb in v. 8, though this is unnecessary.

9. Kings' daughters were among thy honourable women. Among the early converts to Christ, "honorable women" are expressly mentioned, Acts xvii. 12. And some lovely specimens of piety have been found in palaces. "Not many noble," still some such are called. Upon thy right hand did stand the queen in gold of Ophir. Four opinions more or less obtain as to the geographical position of Ophir. 1. Some place it in southern Arabia; 2. Others think it was in south Africa; 3. Josephus places it in the peninsula of Malacca; 4. Others suppose it designates India generally. The controversy is not likely to be settled. What we can learn of it may be found in 1 Kings ix. 26-28; x. 11, 22; xxii. 48; 2 Chron. viii. 18; ix. 10. The "gold of Ophir" was celebrated as early as the days of the man of Uz, Job xxii. 24; xxviii. 16. It was of the best quality. The queen was arrayed in it, i. e., her ornaments were made of it, or it was inwoven in her attire. Scott: "By 'the queen,' the collective body of believers seems to be intended, who, clothed in the righteousness of Christ, enriched by his bounty, and adorned by the graces of his Spirit, adhered to him in singleness of affection and fidelity, and are admitted to the most endeared union and communion." Queen, wife, spouse, consort; but the wife of the king is queen. The stability of the relation between Christ and his spouse is not feebly intimated in the word rendered stand. The right hand is the place of highest honor; see 1 Kings ii. 19.

10. Hearken, O daughter, and consider, and incline thine ear. These words summon the bride to seriousness, thoughtfulness, and attention to a weighty charge: Forget also thine own people, and thy father's house. As a wife should give up all that is dearest to her, and forsake even father and mother, and cleave to her husband, so the church is called on to put a comparatively low estimate on everything that has been most dear to her, and cleave unto Christ. She must come out from the world, its follies, iniquities and idolatries.

11. So shall the King greatly desire thy beauty. Serving Christ in simplicity and godly sincerity, with purity and fidelity, is the way to please him. "The righteous Lord loveth righteousness." The whole tenor of Scripture shows the necessity of personal holiness. Wo to him that makes Christ the minister of sin, and from his grace infers that we may live in uncleanness. Christ is to be obeyed and worshipped. For he is thy Lord. Others have had dominion over us; but to Christ only may we yield implicit and supreme obedience. He is Lord of all to the glory of God the Father and to the comfort of all his saints. And worship thou him. Worship, in Ex. xx. 5 and often, bow down; and often as here, Ps. xxix. 2; xevi. 9; xcvii. 7. Even in his humiliation Jesus Christ never refused humble and adoring worship. He receives the worship of angels and saints in glory, Rev. v. 9-14.

12. And the daughter of Tyre shall be there with a gift. Chaldee: The inhabitants of the city Tyre shall come with a gift. A city is often called daughter. The Arabic erroneously has daughters of Tyre. Hengstenberg and others blend this clause with the next, so as to give this sense: The daughter of Tyre, even the rich among the people, shall implore thee with gifts. Perhaps there is no good objection to this construction. Tyre was the commercial metropolis of the world. She also had great wealth. She is fitly named as the most famous of Gentile cities, and as leading the way in bringing riches, honor and glory, and laying them at the feet of Jesus. If the two clauses are not blended we have in the second an extension of the main thought of the first: Even the rich among the people shall entreat thy favour. This rendering is clear and good.

13. The king's daughter is all glorious within. King's daughter here is the same as queen in v. 9. Within is by the best expositors referred to her position within doors, in the interior of the palace, whence she had not yet come forth. Boothroyd: All glorious is the queen in her apartment. Her clothing is of wrought gold, i. e., gold inwoven into her clothing. Her attire is suitably and richly adorned with gold. Boothroyd: Her robe is embroidered with gold.

14. She shall be brought unto the king in raiment of needlework. Fry: In a robe of embroidery is she conducted to the king; Hengstenberg: In variously wrought garments she is brought to the king; Alexander: With variegated clothes shall she be conducted [or, escorted in procession] to the king. Without overstraining any figure here found, it is with pleasure that the devout mind discovers the admirable fitness of such terms, as we have in vv. 13, 14, to express the Scriptural doctrine of the glorious righteousness with which believers in Christ are adorned. The allusion no doubt is to the custom of going forth to meet the bridegroom, as we at once read: The virgins her companions that follow her shall be brought unto thee.

15. With gladness and rejoicing shall they be brought: they shall enter into the king's palace. The eastern mode of celebrating marriage, here alluded to, was in vogue in our Saviour's day; and indeed is still observed in some places. As the friend of the bridegroom rejoiced in the bridegroom's voice and happiness; so did the virgins rejoice in the gladness and honors of the bride. All nations have agreed that a marriage should be regarded as an occasion of joy. The marriage of kings and princes is fitly attended both with joy and magnificence.

16. Instead of thy fathers shall be thy children, whom thou mayest make princes in all the earth. The Hebrew text shows that the queen is not here addressed, but the king, who is spoken of in v. 1, and directly addressed in vv. 2-9. To him is promised a seed to serve him, a seed, who should be great indeed. They should be princes, and prevail with God. God's people are kings and priests even upon earth, Rev. i. 5, 6. Calvin: "It is easy to gather that this prophecy is spoken expressly concerning Christ; for so far were the sons of Solomon from having a kingdom of such an extent, as to divide it into provinces among them, that his first successor retained only a portion of his kingdom." The sons of God on earth are not made lords over God's heritage. They have no dominion over the faith of men. But in prayer, in a pious life and in holding forth the truth of God they exert a prodigious power over men. Christ's religion has marvellously revolutionized the opinions and practices of mankind.

17. I will make thy name to be remembered in all generations. Several versions and interpreters prefer to render thus: They (meaning thy sons) in perpetual succession shall make thy name to be remembered." This indeed gives a good sense. Christ's people are his witnesses to the ends of the earth. But the safer way is to make the Father the speaker here, and then the promise is parallel to Isa. liii. 10, 11. Or, the author of the Psalm is the speaker and by the Spirit of prophecy foretells the happy use that would be made of this ode in all coming generations. Therefore shall the people praise thee for ever and ever. This settles the question of the everlasting duration of Christ's kingly office and of the glorious reward secured to him. Not only shall unborn generations yet praise him on the earth, but all glorified spirits shall forever praise him in the house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is a blessed thing to be a friend of the Lord Jesus Christ. All his people are his loves, or loved ones. His love is stronger than death. It never grows cold. It never changes. It makes persons happy, families blessed, churches joyful and nations glorious.

2. Let nothing unsettle our faith in the divine inspiration of the Scriptures. They assert it. They claim it, v. 1; and often elsewhere. Henry: "We call the prophets the penmen of Scripture, whereas they were but the pen."

3. When the heart is full and warm, the tongue will not be silent, v. 1. It is a sad thing to be possessed of a dumb devil. It is a blessed thing both to have good thoughts, and when they have duly affected us, to utter them.

4. In religion everything turns on our views of Christ, v. 2. What do we think of him? Is he in our esteem incomparable? Do we regard him as "fairer than the children of men?" Is he, or is he not the chiefest among ten thousand and altogether lovely? If thou lovest him not, if thou admirest him not, if thou wouldst not on a fair trial die for him, thou art none of his, Luke xiv. 26, 27, 33.

5. None can decide in which of his offices the Lord Jesus Christ is the most glorious, or most precious. He does all his work to the admiration of saints and angels and the entire good pleasure of his Father. Grace is poured into his lips, v. 2. His testimonies are wonderful, Ps. cxix. 129. His doctrines are pure truth. His commands are all right. The very officers sent by the priests and Pharisees to arrest him were rendered powerless by his words, and returned without him, saying, Never man spake as this man, John vii. 46. He is the great subject and the author of holy Scripture, Rev. xix. 10; 1 Pet. i. 11.

6. He, who fully and rightly believes that God is just and true, ought to regard Jesus Christ as sent of God, for God has blessed him for ever, v. 2. And yet it is mournfully certain that many reject him. No man can call him Lord except by the Holy Ghost. Oh that all would receive him. Then should they have power to become the sons of God, John i. 12.

7. There are no victories like those of truth, v. 3. No triumphs compare with those of God's word; all its conquests are benevolent and full of peace in the end.

8. Christ's kingdom being righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost, is not advanced by carnal weapons. Therefore God employs only such as are spiritual, v. 4. The cause of truth is not to be promoted by a lie. Fierceness will not teach men to be meek. The wrath of man worketh not the righteousness of God. It is a doctrine of none but the worst of men that we may do evil for the purpose of doing good.

9. There is much in Christ's kingdom that is terrible to wicked men. It is remarkable that even the threatenings and judgments of Zion's King often do not seem to strike so deep terror into their hearts, as do the displays of his love and mercy. The conversion, more than the sudden death of a notorious sinner, has often alarmed the secure.

10. And as Christ's sword, so his arrows make conquests for him and subdue his foes, v. 5. Morison: "By the two methods of judgment and mercy the Messiah deals with the children of men: his arrows either pierce the heart and humble it to receive his great salvation, or they smite the guilty opposer in the dust, and leave him the instructive monument of divine wrath."

11. On the first clause of v. 6, Dr. John M. Mason has given to the world the best discourse he ever preached. Should this remark lead the reader to procure and examine that sermon, he will be repaid. It is entitled "Messiah's Throne."

12. Whatever mistakes men have fallen into respecting Christ and his kingdom, none is wider of the truth than that he will at any time or in any way forget or fail to do justice, equity, righteousness. Justice and judgment are the habitation of his throne. His very sceptre is rectitude, v. 6. He loves righteousness so that he gave his soul to death rather than attempt to take sinners to heaven over the down-trodden government of God. He hates wickedness so that nothing that defileth, or loveth a lie shall ever enter the holy city, v. 7.

13. How kind and condescending is Christ towards humble believers. Here they are "his fellows." In Ps. xxii. 22, they are his "brethren." In John xv. 15, he calls them "friends." In other places he calls them "children," "heirs," "sheep," "lambs." O kind Redeemer, win us to thyself. Persuade and enable us to love thee more.

14. Christ's exaltation is in just proportion to his former humiliation; his joy, to his former grief; his riches, to his earthly poverty. Because none ever served or suffered as he, none reigns or rejoices as he. In all things he has the pre-eminence.

He is the first-born of every creature, v. 7. Clarke : "None was ever by the will of God constituted prophet, priest, and king, but Messias himself." His name is as ointment poured forth. His very raiment is full of sweet odors, v. 8.

15. Persons of high birth and rank may be saved, vv. 9, 12. There is much danger that such will be hardened in pride and wholly forget God. But in all ages there have been some pious persons of high social position in the church of God.

16. The Lord Jesus loves the church. She is near and dear to him, and honorable in his sight. She is at his right hand, v. 9. Nothing is so precious in his sight. He died for her.

17. Nothing is more proper than that we should renounce all for Christ, v. 10. It is easy to love the best earthly and temporal things excessively; but it is impossible to love Christ too much.

18. Jesus Christ loves entire consecration to his service; he considers it beauty, and much desires it, v. 10. The way to be rich is to become poor. The way to have much communion with the Saviour is to care for nothing so much as his love. No bridegroom ever rejoiced over his bride, or loved her as Jesus loves his spouse, in her purity and integrity.

19. If Christ is the Husband, he also is the Lord of his church, v. 11. He must be obeyed promptly, uniformly, universally, cheerfully, lovingly.

20. If the worship which we are commanded to render to Jesus Christ (v. 11) does not establish his divinity, how can any man establish the divinity of the Father or his claim to religious homage?

21. Dickson : "When the church honoreth Christ he will honor her, and make the noble and the potent in the world submit themselves to her, and seek communion with her," v. 12. Luther : "Hold thy bridegroom in honor, and thou shalt be in honor among all people, for he is so very powerful."

22. As prophets foretold the calling of the Gentiles, we ought like the early Christians to make much of that great event, v. 12. Compare Ps. lxxii. 8-11; Isa. lx. 4-17; Acts xi. 18; Rom. xv. 10-16. Since the resurrection of Christ the calling of the Gentiles has been the most important event that has occurred.

23. Christ's people are wonderfully adorned by the spotless robe of righteousness which they wear, and by the personal holiness wrought in them by the Holy Spirit, vv. 11, 13, 14. Compare Rev. iii. 18; xix. 8.

24. Every pure person shall be saved, vv. 14, 15. Every man who can enter into the holy delight of heaven shall go to that happy place. None shall be shut out of paradise to whom it would be a paradise.

25. True religion has joys both here and hereafter, v. 15. They are spiritual. They shall last and increase for ever.

26. Christ's glories are not from his progenitors, but from his progeny; not from his ancestors, but from his children, v. 16.

27. The glories of Christ's kingdom on earth shall increase more and more, v. 16. Much as the princes of this world despise it, it is a kingdom of princes. It shall yet fill the whole earth. Christ shall be remembered and praised by numbers far exceeding all that have ever yet followed him.

28. Much good may be done by composing even one of the songs of Zion. David foresaw that this Psalm would be used to the end of time, v. 17. A good paragraph or hymn written now may refresh the saints even through the Millennium. Bishop Heber's missionary hymn has done more to advance religion and make known the name of the author than the two volumes of his literary remains beside.

PSALM XLVI.

To the chief Musician for the sons of Korah, a Song upon Alamoth.

1 God is our refuge and strength, a very present help in trouble.

2 Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea;

3 Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah.

4 There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High.

5 God is in the midst of her; she shall not be moved: God shall help her, and that right early.

6 The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved: he uttered his voice, the earth melted.

7 The LORD of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.

8 Come, behold the works of the LORD, what desolations he hath made in the earth.

9 He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire.

10 Be still, and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth.

11 The LORD of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah.

ON all the title except the last two words, see on titles of Psalms iv. xxx. xlii. xlv. Upon Alamoth occurs also in 1 Chron. xv. 20, where we read that certain persons "were appointed to sound with Psalteries on Alamoth." Alam signifies secret or hidden. It is so rendered by the Septuagint, Arabic and Vulgate. The Chaldee explains it of Korah being hidden [or swallowed up]. The Arabic calls it a prophecy concerning the secrets of the Son; Horsley: Concerning mysteries. This explanation is not satisfactory to many. Alamoth is rendered virgins in Cant. i. 3, 6, 8. Some would here read virginals or virgin tunes. A majority refer it to the tune or the instrument. So Calvin, Ainsworth, Patrick, Morison and others. Tholuck: To the tune of the virgins; Hengstenberg: After the virgin manner; Alexander thinks it denotes soprano or treble voices. It probably in some way refers to the music. The date and authorship of this ode are both uncertain. The Syriac, Patrick and Dodd ascribe it to David; Rosenmuller thinks it was written on occasion of the great victory of Jehoshaphat, noticed in 2 Chron. xx. Patrick thinks it celebrates some of the great victories gained by David and mentioned in 2 Sam. viii. Dodd and Henry are of the same opinion. Gill regards it as a prophecy of the church in gospel times, and as applicable to any state of confusion and distress among the nations. Calmet puts it much later, and thinks it refers to the convulsions which shook the Persian Empire after the death of Cambyses. Venema and some others refer it to the times of the Assyrian troubles, and make Isaiah the author. Calvin, Scott, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander refer it to the times of Hezekiah when Sennacherib's great army perished in a night. The stirring events of David's time would allow us to ascribe it to him. Scott dates it B. C. 710; Clarke B. C. 519. This was Luther's favorite Psalm. His famous hymn, written on his way to the Diet at Worms, beginning is very much taken from it. In the darkest times he used to say, "Come, let us sing the 46th Psalm, and let them do their worst." He says, "We sing this Psalm to the praise of God, because God is with us, and powerfully and miraculously preserves and defends his church and his word, against all fanatical spirits, against the gates of hell, against the implacable hatred of the devil, and against all the assaults of the world, the flesh and sin." Arnd: "This is a fine consolatory Psalm, wherein God's marvellous working is praised, as he protects his little flock of believers, and preserves them through such great necessities of war and persecutions, that it might seem as if the world was going to wreck." Anderson: It contains "rather the language of faith under threatened difficulties, than of triumph over vanquished foes." In it we have three names of the Almighty, Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and Gel-yohn Most High, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; vii. 17. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

A strong fortress is our God,

1. God is our refuge and strength. This is an abrupt but exalted opening, q. d., Others may rely on armies or on created things, but to us God alone is a refuge and strength. Refuge, as in Ps. xiv. 6; commonly so rendered; sometimes shelter, trust, hope, Ps. lxi. 3; lxxiii. 28; Jer. xvii. 17; Joel iii. 16. Strength, as in Ps. viii. 2; xxviii. 7, and often; in Hab. iii. 4, power. It may mean either the depository or the source of power. All our strength is in him. All our strength is from him. He is a very present help in trouble. The first clause announced a general proposition, this gives a particular under it. It is rendered variously. Chaldee: He shall be eminently found a help in affliction; Arabic: And our helper in times of tribulation, thou hast stood by us in all time; Ainsworth: A help in distresses we shall find very great; Clarke: He is found an exceeding, or superlative help in difficulties; Hengstenberg: A help in necessities is he found most truly. For present Pool prefers sufficient; Edwards, immediate. Help, as in Ps. xxvii. 9; xxxv. 2. Trouble, as in Ps. ix. 9; plural here—troubles, adversities, tribulations, distresses, afflictions. The truth of this verse is fulfilled to the saints of all ages.

2. Therefore will not we fear, though the earth be removed, and though the mountains be carried into the midst of the sea. The pronoun we relates to such as truly receive the truth of v. 1. Alexander: "The simple idea expressed by these strong figures is, in the midst of the most violent changes and commotions." Though the earth be removed is by some rendered Though the earth be turned upside down. The fear here spoken of is the fear of dismay, or of amazement, freedom from which is not the same as insensibility, but results from the confidence of faith. The heart of Mordecai is firm in the darkest day he ever saw, Esther iv. 14. Mountains are apt figures of the most stable states, or political constitutions.

3. Though the waters thereof roar and be troubled, though the mountains shake with the swelling thereof. Selah. This is an extension of the confident declaration begun in the preceding verse. Agitated waters are scriptural emblems for popular commotions. Mountains here also represent things supposed to be the most settled and stable. Some think the reference is specially to "secular rulers" long established in authority. Mountains do also represent strong natural defences. The righteous will not yield to disastrous fear, though the nations are convulsed with terrible excitements, and all the apparent safeguards of society are gone; no, not even when there is upon the earth distress of nations, with perplexity, and wicked men's hearts fail them for fear, and for looking after those things which are coming. Morison: "The earth thrown into a state of wild confusion, the mountains hurled into the mighty deep, the sea tossed into a tempest, and the everlasting hills drifting on its foaming billows, are the vivid images by which the divine judgments on wicked and persecuting nations are described in the language of the prophets."

4. There is a river, the streams whereof shall make glad the city of God, the holy place of the tabernacles of the Most High. The ancient versions and most modern translations are not so good as the common English. Edwards thinks the stream is the holy place. Calvin, Diodati, Green and others think the imagery is drawn from the small streams, which watered Jerusalem. By stream Watts understands Scripture; Henry, God's word and ordinances; Scott, the graces and consolations of the Holy Spirit; Morison, the overflowing stream of divine mercy, which gladdens the saints. Hengstenberg interprets it of the stream of "the blessings of the kingdom of God," and cites, after Ainsworth, Gen. ii. 10; Ps. xxxvi. 8; John iv. 14; Ezek. xlvii.; Zech. xiv. 8; Rev. xxii. 1, in proof of his position. Alexander: "The mention of streams in the plural indicates variety and fulness of divine favor." At Smyrna the Scottish mission found a street watered by a river, occupying the place of the causeway, with trees overhanging it on each side, and securing refreshment to the inhabitants at all hours. In passages like this it is best to give to a word or phrase the fullest and richest meaning its usage, the context and the analogy of faith will allow. The streams of spiritual blessings flowing from God through Jesus Christ, by the Holy Ghost, make glad the city of God continually. Jerusalem was the type of the true church of all ages.

5. God is in the midst of her. Chaldee: The majesty of God is in the midst of her. God, with all his nature and perfections, is on the side of his church. Such a form of expression indicates gracious and powerful presence, Deut. xxiii. 14; Isa. xii. 6. She shall not be moved. All her history shows that the presence of God is sufficient to give stability to his church in any circumstances. God shall help her. The verb help here is of the same origin and import as the noun help in v. 1. It signifies the kind and measure of assistance required. It shall also be timely and seasonable. And that right early. Margin: When the morning appeareth; Calvin and Jebb: At the dawn of the morning; Fry: At early dawn; Green: Before the morning appears; Hengstenberg: At the break of morning. The sense is clearly: At the peep of day, i. e., as Pool has it, "speedily, after a short night of affliction, compare Ps. xxx. 5; and seasonably, when the danger is greatest, and the enemies prepare to make the assault; which is commonly done in the morning." Diodati had given the same explanation and refers to Ex. xiv. 24, 27; 2 Chron. xx. 20, as illustrating the passage. Some give the additional idea that the help comes very early before the enemy could make the assault. Alexander: "The terms of this verse become still more significant and striking, if we suppose a specific reference to the night in which Sennacherib's host was smitten, and the sight which was disclosed at break of day," Isa. xxxvii. 36; xvii. 14.

6. The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved. Church of England: The heathen make much ado. Heathen, nations, Gentiles, see on Ps. ii. 1. Raged, were troubled, were disquieted; in v. 3, in the future roar. By the kingdoms we are to understand all the surrounding hostile nations, whose kings sought the destruction of the Jews. Were moved, the preterite of the verb in v. 5, rendered shall be moved. Hengstenberg, shake; see on Ps. x. 6. Edwards renders the two clauses: The nations made an uproar; kingdoms were in a commotion. At length the right time came for God to step forth. He uttered his voice, the earth melted. The Chaldee refers all this to the giving of the law. But there is nothing to point us to Sinai. There is hardly any where a better specimen of condensed thought and rapid description than in this verse. The Hebrew is even more terse than the English. When Jehovah speaks, all nature stands aghast at the sound of his voice.

7. The LORD of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah. LORD of hosts or Jehovah of armies, as in Ps. xxiv. 10. In Rom. ix. 29; Jam. v. 4, the common version gives us the Hebrew word here used for hosts—Sabaoth. On the title God of Jacob, see on Ps. xx. 1. By his natural attribute of omnipresence God is everywhere, but when he makes bare his arm, the saints triumph. There is great propriety in referring to the God of Jacob as a refuge. He protected that patriarch in a remarkable manner. Refuge, not the same as in v. 1, but the same as in v. 11; see on Ps. ix. 9; elsewhere high tower, high fort, high place, defence.

8. Come, behold the works of the LORD, what desolations he hath made in the earth. Chaldee: Walk about, see the works of God who hath made desolations among the ungodly of the earth; Arabic: Come to see the works of God, the miracles which he has done upon the earth; Calvin: Come ye, consider the works of Jehovah, what desolations he hath made in the earth; church of England: O come hither, and behold the works of the Lord, what destruction he hath brought upon the earth. For desolations some read devastations. If the reference is to the destruction of Sennacherib's army, the desolations were indeed frightful, though none fought against his hosts but the angel of the Lord, 2 Kings xix. 35; Isa. xxxvii. 36.

9. He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; he breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; he burneth the chariot in the fire. Calvin: He maketh battles to cease even to the end of the earth; Edwards: He has destroyed the whole apparatus of war throughout the country; Mudge and Dodd: He hath destroyed the artillery of war, to the end of the earth, or the land; Hengstenberg: Who silences wars to the ends of the earth. The rendering of the common version justly represents the extent of the peace procured—the end of the earth; church of England: All the world. Chariot, the Syriac, church of England, Calvin, Ainsworth, Edwards, Jebb, Fry and Alexander follow the Hebrew plural, chariots. The primary idea in the word is round. The Chaldee, Arabic, Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Doway and Hammond have shield or shields, which indeed may well be put with the bow and the spear. It is admitted that a very different word is used when chariots of war are mentioned; see Ps. xx. 7; lxxvi. 6. The best exposition is probably given by Anderson: "There is probably here an allusion to the ancient custom of collecting the arms and armor of the vanquished into a heap, and setting it on fire. The image is employed to express complete victory," Josh. xi. 6; 2 Sam. viii. 4; Ezek. xxxix. 8–10. This was "also a Roman custom." See Æneid, book viii., line 560. "A medal struck by Vespasian, the Roman emperor, to commemorate the termination of his wars both in Italy and through all parts of the world, represents the goddess of Peace holding an olive branch with one hand, and in the other a lighted torch, with which she sets fire to a heap of armor."

10. Be still, and know that I am God. Be still, be quiet, stand off, leave off, forbear. Some make Ps. iv. 4 parallel. Strong restraint upon their passions is necessary, if men would learn anything to purpose, and especially if they would know that the Lord is God. I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth. Jehovah has ever and in all lands been doing things which evinced his eternal power and godhead. His name was of old a terror to millions that rebelled against him. Heathen, as in v. 6. Even to the Gentiles God is known by the judgments which he executes. They are here warned "that if they proceed to act like madmen, God's power is not enclosed within the narrow limits of Judea, and that it will be no difficult matter for him to stretch forth his arm afar to the Gentiles."

11. The LORD of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our refuge. Selah. In v. 7 we have the very same words both in Hebrew and English.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. In seeking comfort and protection go to God himself, v. 1. All his attributes, all his titles, all his promises show that he is wise and loving. The practice of the saints in all ages has been not to rest in any means or creature; but in God only.

2. It is specially wise to seek to God in the day of adversity—in trouble, v. 1. One great end of affliction is to cause us to return unto the Most High. The greater our distress, the more we need him. Experience is a great school for Christians. Without it they would be babes all their days. It works hope, and hope maketh not ashamed.

3. When God's people are weak, they are strong; when they are poor, they are rich; when they are brought low, they are raised high; when they are greatly afflicted, they are greatly comforted, because God is an exceedingly great help in trouble, v. 1.

4. The more the saint is tried the more will his confidence in God be seen to be well founded, vv. 1, 2, 3. Scott: "If our faith were as strong as our security is good, we need fear no combination of enemies, no revolutions in kingdoms, and no convulsions in nature; but, in the most tremendous dangers, might triumph in the fullest assurance of security and victory." Calvin: "Our faith is really and truly tested only when we are brought into very severe conflicts, and when even hell itself seems opened to swallow us up." The nature, throne and covenant of God being unchangeable, his children need not trouble themselves much with the things about which the children of darkness are eager. All nature may dissolve, but that does not affect the stability of the divine government and protection.

5. The resources of God's people are found in the perpetual stream of blessings which flow from his wisdom and mercy through Jesus Christ, v. 4. The glorious Lord is unto us a place of broad rivers and streams. Henry: "The spiritual comforts which are conveyed to the saints by soft and silent whispers, and which come without observation, are sufficient to balance the most loud and noisy threatenings of an angry and malicious world."

6. God's presence with his church secures her stability and her timely succor, v. 5. Calvin: "If we desire to be protected by the hand of God, we must be concerned above all things that he may dwell amongst us; for all hope of safety depends on his presence alone;" Dickson: "God's presence among his people will not exempt them from trouble, but from perdition in trouble; he will not exempt the bush from burning, but from being consumed."

7. The church is safe, v. 5. She cannot be overthrown. Her walls are salvation.

8. No real harm can befall any child of God walking in the path of duty. To such sooner or later enlargement and deliverance will come. God will send timely supplies, v. 5. Seasonable blessings are double blessings.

9. It is no new thing for the world to be in commotion; but God can put down violent agitations anywhere, v. 6. De Wette: "Jehovah commands quiet, and man obeys."

10. The resources of the Almighty are infinite. He is the Lord of hosts, v. 7. He commands and the stars fight his battles. He sends legions of angels where he will, and one angel destroys in one night an army of one hundred and eighty-five thousand men. All plagues and storms and earthquakes, all causes and all effects, are under his control.

11. All the truth and mercy shown to saints of old will be shown to God's people to the end of time. There is no change in the character of Jehovah. He is still the God of Jacob, v. 7. He is, forever, the refuge of his afflicted ones. Never was anything more futile than the war against the Lamb.

12. God's past mercies clearly show that no weapon formed against Zion shall prosper, and that rather than let his church perish he will fill the earth with desolations, v. 8.

13. Dickson: "Long preparations for war, arms and ammunition, which have been made with great labor and expense against his church, the Lord can soon give a short account of them, and make them useless when he pleaseth," vv. 8, 9.

14. Let all men, before engaging in acts of national hostility, well weigh the evils of war. It brings fearful desolations, v. 8. Before its instruments of destruction a land may be as the garden of Eden, but behind them a desolate wilderness, and nothing shall escape them, Isa. xiii. 6-10. Henry: "War is a tragedy which commonly destroys the stage it is acted on." Let men who delight in the cruelties of war remember that their day is coming, Isa. x. 12-19.

15. A right estimate of the evils of war may teach us the true value of the blessings of peace, v. 9. Oh that all men would study the things that make for peace. The God of heaven is the God of peace.

16. Let modesty, quietness and docility mark all our behaviour as in the sight of God. Let all hearts be still, and know that Jehovah is God, v. 10. Horne: "Let our rebellious passions hear this divine edict, tremble, and obey."

17. Let us study with care the nature, the word and the will of God. Especially let us know that he is God, v. 10. Let us "understand that he is the Fountain of power, wisdom, justice, goodness, and truth."

18. There is hope for the heathen, not in their innocence, not in their virtues, not in their ignorance; but in the mercy of God, in the covenant of redemption, and in the prophecies respecting them, v. 10.

19. Verses 7, 11 remind us of the dying words of John Wesley: "The best of all is, God is with us." Slade: "Through life and death let this be our answer to every trouble, and every enemy, and every danger, and every fear, 'The LORD of hosts is with us, the God of Jacob is our refuge;'" Dickson: "The strength of the church stands in renouncing her own and fleeing unto God's strength;" Arnd: "If only our support does not depart from us, we may say, as Joshua and Caleb did of the heathen, Fear ye not, they are as bread to us, for their support has departed from them."

PSALM XLVII.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

- 1 Oh clap your hands, all ye people; shout unto God with the voice of triumph.
- 2 For the LORD most high is terrible; he is a great King over all the earth.
- 3 He shall subdue the people under us, and the nations under our feet.
- 4 He shall choose our inheritance for us, the excellency of Jacob whom he loved. Selah.
- 5 God is gone up with a shout, the LORD with the sound of a trumpet.
- 6 Sing praises to God, sing praises: sing praises unto our King, sing praises.
- 7 For God is the King of all the earth: sing ye praises with understanding.
- 8 God reigneth over the heathen: God sitteth upon the throne of his holiness.
- 9 The princes of the people are gathered together, even the people of the God of Abraham: for the shields of the earth belong unto God: he is greatly exalted.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xlii. Scott dates this ode B. C. 1042; Clarke, B. C. 519. Calvin: "Perhaps it was composed by David." Abenezra and Kimchi refer it to the times of Messiah. Luther: "This is a prophecy concerning Christ." Gill thinks it foretells Christ's ascension to heaven and the consequent spread of the Gospel. Diodati, Patrick, Pool, Henry, Dodd, Morison and Scott make it Messianic. Some think it pairs with Ps. xlv. ; some with Ps. xlviii. See Introduction, § 12. A few, but with little support, think it was composed when the temple was dedicated. Hengstenberg and Alexander refer it to the victory of Jehoshaphat, 2 Chron. xx. Whether any historic occasion suggested its imagery we know not. We have here Elohim God, Jehovah LORD and Gel-yohn Most High, on which see on Psalms i. 2; iii. 2; vii. 17. The latter, v. 2, is rendered as an adjective.

1. Oh clap your hands all ye people. People, in the plural, peoples. Here it is used to call both Jews and Gentiles—all nations. To clap the hands is sometimes a sign of derision, as in Job xxvii. 23; Lam. ii. 15; Nah. iii. 19; Ezek. xxv. 6. Here and in other places it expresses becoming joyfulness, 2 Kings xi. 12; Ps. xcviii. 8; Isa. lv. 12. Some think that clapping the hands also expresses approbation; but great joyfulness is certainly the main thing signified, when no derision is expressed. Shout unto God with the voice of triumph. Ainsworth: Shout triumphantly unto God with voice of shrilling; church of England: O sing unto God with the voice of melody; Edwards: Shout to God with triumphant voices; Hengstenberg: Shout to God with jubilee-voice. Triumph, in the common version often rendered singing; also rejoicing, crying, once, shouting, Prov. xi. 10. It signifies any loud and earnest cry, whether of gladness or of distress is determined by the connection. The language of much of this Psalm may be borrowed from the victories of the Israelites over their enemies; but surely the eye of the prophet is fixed on something greater than any carnal conquests. The great occasion of gladness is the ascension of Messiah to heaven and the consequent spread of the Gospel and reign of righteousness over the nations.

2. For the LORD most high is terrible; he is a great King over all the earth. Calvin follows some ancient versions and has: For Jehovah is high, terrible, and a great King over all the earth; Green: For Jehovah, the Most High, is to be feared, he is the great King over all the earth; Hengstenberg: For the Lord, the Most High, is terrible, a great King over all the earth. Terrible, a participle, commonly so rendered, or dreadful, fearful, to be feared, to be had in reverence, and in Ps. cxi. 9, reverend. Calvin: "This language is applicable only to the kingdom of Christ, who is called a high and terrible King." Our Saviour is as greatly to be feared as he is worthy to be loved. The love, which does not submit and obey, is spurious. He is King over all the earth, universal Monarch and Sovereign. Therefore,

3. He shall subdue the people under us, and the nations under our feet. For subdue Calvin has set in order; Mudge, destroy. The Hebrew verb is in the future. Though many prophecies are delivered in the past tense, yet the future is always appropriate to a prediction. Subdue, in its other forms commonly rendered speak; so here it may signify to subdue by speech, that is by a preached Gospel. Pool, referring to Isa. v. 15; Mic. ii. 12, gives to subdue the sense of lead like sheep, or bring into the fold, and adds: "He seems to speak of such a subjugation of them, as was for the good of the people subdued, because this is matter of rejoicing to them, v. 1." This is true of all who bow and take the yoke of Christ.

4. He shall choose our inheritance for us, the excellency of Jacob whom he loved. Calvin: He hath chosen our inheritance for us, the glory of Jacob whom he loved; Ainsworth: He hath chosen for us our inheritance, the high excellency of Jacob, whom he loveth. The excellency here spoken of is the inheritance of the first clause. Some give the verb in the present, some in the preterite, and some, following the Hebrew, in the future. The last is best here, if we regard the verse as a prophecy. But Diodati prefers the preterite and thus paraphrases it: "He hath by his free election given us an excellent inheritance chosen out above all other, wherein consists all our glory; namely, the kingdom of heaven." Selah, see Introduction, § 15.

5. God is gone up with a shout, the LORD with the sound of a trumpet. This verse is the key to the right understanding of the whole Psalm. There is no better rendering. For shout some have triumph, jubilee. It denotes joy uttered in a hilarious voice. Calvin thinks there is here an allusion to the ancient ceremony, when the sound of trumpets was wont to be used in solemn assemblies. Yet he says: "At the same time, the sacred writer, under that shadowy ceremony, doubtless intended to lead us to consider another kind of going up more triumphant—that of Christ when he 'ascended up far above all heavens,' (Eph. iv. 10) and obtained the empire of the world, and armed with his celestial power, subdued all pride and loftiness." Diodati: "Spiritually and chiefly this verse ought to be referred to Christ's ascension into heaven." The mass of interpreters give it this direction, either as the sole, or as the mystical sense. The narrative of our Lord's ascension in the New Testament is very brief. But that it was the most august of all joyous events yet witnessed on earth we cannot doubt. In his Gospel Luke says it was celebrated with great gladness, chap. xxiv. 50-53. Clarke: "The shout may refer to the exultation of the evangelists and apostles in preaching Christ crucified, buried, risen from the dead, and ascended to heaven." Although there is no mention of a trumpet at Christ's ascension, yet the angels said he should return as he left the world, and we know that his second coming will be with the sounding of the trumpet, 1 Cor. xv. 52; 1 Thess. iv. 16. The whole scene of Christ's ascension and the consequent reception of the Gospel were joyful events. He led captivity captive and received gifts for men, even for the rebellious, Ps. lxxviii. 18.

6. Sing praises to God, sing praises; sing praises unto our King, sing praises. As in the English, so in the Hebrew we have the same verb four times repeated, sing, sing Psalms, or sing praises. Our King, who has gone up, is God. The Lord Jesus is divine, is truly the Son of God, is equal with God, is God. How praises were sung, see Luke xxiv. 50-53. How they have been sung ever since, even in prisons and at the stake, church history testifies. How closely the singing of praises is connected with a lively state of piety, revivals of religion have always shown. No duty is more urgent.

7. For God is the king of all the earth. So Jesus claimed for himself, John v. 22; Matt. xxviii. 18; Rev. i. 5; see also Rom. ix. 5 and many parallel places. He, who rules as universal monarch, is to be worshipped. Sing ye praises with understanding. Arabic: Sing to him with understanding; Septuagint and Ethiopic: Sing intelligently; Vulgate and Doway: Sing ye wisely; Jerome: Sing learnedly; Amesius: Sing a didactic Psalm; Green: Sing praise most skilfully; Clarke: Sing an instructive song; i. e., "Let sense and sound go together. Let your hearts and your heads go with your voices;" Hengstenberg: Sing a song with edification. On Maschil here rendered with understanding, see on title of Ps. xxxii. Then is God truly, rightly worshipped when we sing with the spirit and with the understanding also, 1 Cor. xiv. 15. Such praises are very proper:

8. God reigneth over the heathen. Calvin: He hath obtained the kingdom over the heathen. Heathen as in Ps. xli. 6, 10. Reigneth, the verb uniformly expresses kingly authority in exercise. He, who governs the Gentiles, sends them all the blessings they have, and calls them to a knowledge of his great salvation, is worthy to be lauded, for he does no wrong. God sitteth upon the throne of his holiness. Christ's throne is holy because its decisions are those of spotless rectitude. Sitting here expresses the readiness of the Judge of all the earth to hear causes and redress wrongs.

9. The princes of the people are gathered together, even the people of the God of Abraham. Calvin's rendering puts a new face on these words: The princes of the peoples are assembled together to the people of the God of Abraham. The princes here named are not the heads of tribes among the Israelites, but those among the Gentiles. Instead of even in the English version we may read and, as, with, or to. Alexander prefers as; Calvin, Edwards, Jebb and Hengstenberg to; Mudge and Fry prefer with. Even would give the whole sense. The most distinguished and noble of the Gentiles shall come and worship God even as the pious Jews. The reward of Messiah was very anciently expressed by a gathering of the people to him, Gen. xlix. 10. The same is taught in later times, Isa. xi. 10. The God of Abraham is he, who is as faithful to all his servants as he was to Abraham. This work shall surely be accomplished, For the shields of the earth belong unto God. We had the word shield in Ps. iii. 3; vii. 10;

xviii. 2. Here the sense is that protection in every case, protections, are from God; or, that the princes of the nations, who are their shields and guardians, do yet belong to Jehovah. In Hos. iv. 18 the word is rendered rulers. All agents, all causes, all instruments, all means are God's, and so He is greatly exalted. He, who rules the world, can have no superior. He is Lord of angels; he is Lord of all.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Neither the prophecies, nor the Gospel confine the blessings of Christ's kingdom to the Jews, or to any one tribe of men, but extend them to all peoples, v. 1. Luke ii. 28-32; Rom. xi. 11, 13.

2. Those are greatly mistaken, who think the religion of Christ furnishes no cause of joy to those, who truly embrace it, v. 1. See REMARKS on Ps. ii. 11. In fact the blessings of the Gospel awaken the strongest and most pleasing emotions of the human heart, and shall yet fill the whole earth with incredible joy. Even of old the saints had cause of exulting and rapturous delight in the Lord and his ways. This is much greater under the Gospel. It shall be yet more unspeakably increased in heaven.

3. When religious affections are lively and controlling, they will often produce effects on men's bodily actions, quite unintelligible to mere formalists, v. 1. Henry: "Such expressions of pious and devout affections as to some may seem indecent and imprudent ought not to be hastily censured or condemned, much less ridiculed, because, if they come from an upright heart, God will accept the strength of the affection, and excuse the weakness of the expressions of it."

4. Yet we should never forget that godly fear is a part of all true worship, v. 2. Jehovah is the great and dreadful God, Deut. vii. 21; x. 17; Neh. i. 5; iv. 14; ix. 32; Isa. viii. 13. See REMARKS on Ps. ii. 11.

5. The kingly office of Christ is justly celebrated in the Scriptures, vv. 2, 7. It ought to possess a prominent place in our teachings and in our thoughts. He, who does not take Christ as his king, does not truly receive him as his prophet or priest. It is no intrusion upon the rights of others that Christ should establish his worship and kingdom in every nation; for he is King of kings and Lord of lords.

6. It is certain that the Gospel shall take effect and exert controlling power over the nations of the earth. Prophecy requires this, v. 3. The covenant of redemption requires it, Isa. xlix. 4-12. The covenant of grace requires it, Isa. lx. 1-22. Christ's death requires it, Isa. liii. 11, 12; Heb. xii. 2. Christ's intercession makes it sure, Ps. ii. 8. It cannot be that the earth shall not be full of the knowledge of the Lord as the waters cover the sea.

7. It is better for God to choose our inheritance for us than it is for us to choose it for ourselves, v. 4. It is better for us to have a sorrowful lot of God's choosing than a joyful portion of our own choosing. An affliction at God's hands is better than a joy of our own creation.

8. Excellent as are the earthly good things, bestowed on the saints, they are as nothing compared with heavenly blessings. Canaan in Syria was a dungeon compared to the Canaan above. The inheritance of the tribes of Israel was a mean and sorry thing compared to the inheritance which is incorruptible, undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for all who are kept by the power of God, through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time.

9. Christ's exaltation is taught in the Old Testament as well as in the New; and is as necessary to be believed as his humiliation, v. 5. Morison: "How glorious the tidings to the church, that her victorious Lord has gone up with a shout, to take possession of the heavenly inheritance in her behalf, and to assume the sceptre of universal empire." With majesty and glory shall he come again, Eph. iv. 8-10.

10. Our disinclination to spiritual duties must be very great to make it necessary so often to summon us to their performance, vv. 6, 7. Four times in one verse we are called on to sing praises. In the Hebrew there are six words in the verse, and four of them we render, Sing praises. In the next verse the call is repeated. God sees that we need line upon line. Yet praise is a heavenly duty. It will be the employment of the redeemed for ever and ever. Sinners saved by grace should abound in this duty. Luther: "Christ's kingdom is not one of that kind that stands in the power of arms, but in the word of praise, and in the singing of thanksgivings." Clarke: "Feel your obligation to God;—express it in thanksgiving;—be thankful;—be eternally thankful to God your king."

11. Because superstition is a great foe to true religion and offensive to God, our worship should always be with understanding, v. 7. This is also the doctrine of the New Testament. So Christ taught the woman of Samaria, John iv. So Paul taught his converts, 1 Cor. xiv. 7–19. We should sing instructive Psalms, offer intelligent and intelligible prayers, and rightly divide the word of God.

12. The Divinity of the Lord Jesus Christ is interwoven with all the prophecies respecting him, vv. 7, 8. To deny that he is equal with the Father is to rob him of his glory. Dickson: "He is eternally God, and no man reasonably or with understanding can praise him as the Redeemer, and Perfecter of what is spoken of him in Scripture, except he acknowledge him to be God; therefore is Christ eight times in this Psalm called God, besides ascribing unto him works proper to God only; and twice he is called by the incommunicable name Jehovah, LORD;" and in v. 2, he is called most high, or highest. His divinity is supreme.

13. All nations are now under the providential government of Christ, and all nations shall yet be willingly subject to him as Lord of all, v. 8. Morison: "The prophets are accustomed to speak of things future as if they actually existed, and hence Jehovah is presented to our view as swaying the sceptre of his authority and love over the heathen." Ever since God had a church of redeemed sinners on earth, the future of her destiny has been brighter than her past history. It will be so forever.

14. The Judge of all the earth will do right. The King of heaven can do no wrong, because rectitude is the basis of his throne, v. 8. It is an inexpressible comfort to the upright to know that He, into whose hands as Judge and King they have committed their eternal all, cannot fail to do that, which is spotlessly pure!

15. The riches and glory of the Gentiles shall be brought to Christ, v. 9.

16. It is not idle for believers to appeal to Jehovah as the God of Abraham, because to all believers God is the same as he was to Abraham, in faithfulness, love and mercy, v. 9. We are too apt to look on Abraham rather as a Jew than as a Gentile, and to forget that the covenant was made with him while he was yet an uncircumcised Gentile, Rom. iv. 9–13. Hengstenberg: "The designation of God as the God of Abraham, points, as appears, to the promise of blessing on all peoples."

17. Calvin: "All who would be reckoned among the children of God, ought to seek to have a place in the Church, and to join themselves to it, that they may maintain fraternal unity with all the godly." They should be gathered to the people of the God of Abraham, v. 9.

18. Let us never forget that all our protection is from the Lord and from none other. The shields are all his, v. 9.

19. God is supreme. He is over all. He is greatly exalted, v. 9. Clarke: "Great as secular rulers are, God is greater, and is above all; King of kings, and Lord of lords: and the hearts of kings and governors are in his hand; and he turns them whithersoever he pleases."

PSALM XLVIII.

A Song and Psalm for the sons of Korah.

1 GREAT is the LORD, and greatly to be praised in the city of our God, in the mountain of his holiness.

2 Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King.

3 God is known in her palaces for a refuge.

4 For, lo, the kings were assembled, they passed by together.

5 They saw it, and so they marvelled; they were troubled, and hasted away.

6 Fear took hold upon them there, and pain, as of a woman in travail.

7 Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish with an east wind.

8 As we have heard, so have we seen in the city of the LORD of hosts, in the city of our God: God will establish it for ever. Selah.

9 We have thought of thy lovingkindness, O God, in the midst of thy temple.

10 According to thy name, O God, so is thy praise unto the ends of the earth: thy right hand is full of righteousness.

11 Let mount Zion rejoice, let the daughters of Judah be glad, because of thy judgments.

12 Walk about Zion, and go round about her: tell the towers thereof.

13 Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces; that ye may tell it to the generation following.

14 For this God is our God for ever and ever: he will be our guide even unto death.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms xxviii. xxx. xlii. Luther takes it for granted that David wrote this Psalm: "David is here celebrating the truth of God." Calvin is as confident that it is of later date: "It is easy to gather from the subject matter of the Psalm that it was composed after the death of David." Junius and Tremellius and Dodd are of opinion that it may be as old as the time of the sweet singer of Israel. Ainsworth, Mudge, Dathe, Pool, Clarke, Hengstenberg and several others think it was written at a later day. Clarke puts it after the captivity. Of those who give it a later date some find its historic occasion in 2 Chron. xx.; others, in the deliverance under Hezekiah, recorded in 2 Kings xviii. xix. All these views are merely conjectural. Henry speaks as wisely as any one when he says: "For aught I know, it might be penned by David, upon occasion of some eminent victory obtained in his time; yet not so calculated for that, but that it might serve any other the like occasion in after times." Scott dates it B. C. 892; Clarke, B. C. 519. In it we have Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2. On Selah see Introduction, § 15. The whole Psalm, as applied to the gospel church, has a pleasing fulfilment from generation to generation.

1. Great is the Lord, and greatly to be praised. For greatly Ainsworth has vehemently; church of England, highly; Chaldee, Vulgate, Doway, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander, exceedingly. In Ps. xxi. 1 the same word is rendered greatly; in Ps. xxxi. 11, especially; in Ps. xlvi. 1, very; in Ps. cxix. 4, diligently. Greatly is not cognate to the great in this clause. On two accounts God is greatly to be praised. The first is the boundless excellence of his nature. Great is the Lord. The other is the amazing excellence of his acts—celebrated in the body of the Psalm. Praised, as with Psalms. The verb is of the same root as that from which the book of Psalms or Praises takes its name. The Lord is greatly to be praised in the city of our God, in the mountain of his holiness, i. e., in Jerusalem, and especially in the temple worship on Mount Zion. On mountain of his holiness, see on Ps. ii. 6. From Jerusalem and Zion in Judea our minds easily pass to the church of God on earth and then in heaven, where God is greatly to be praised. See on Ps. xlvi. 4.

2. Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is mount Zion, on the sides of the north, the city of the great King. Instead of Beautiful for situation, Horsley and others read, Beautiful in extension, i. e., in the prospect which it presents to the eye; Hengstenberg: Beautiful by its elevation; Tholuck: A beautiful hill. But none of these is better than the common version. As seen from a distance Jerusalem was rather a city on a plateau than a high elevation as it seemed to the traveller who came in sight of it. For the whole earth some read all the land, i. e., of Judea. If this is right, all will admit the perfect propriety of the language. A great part of human happiness on earth has in some way resulted from the existence of a church, of which Jerusalem was a type. Zion was in the southern part of Jerusalem. The part lying north is probably noticed to complete the account of the whole; or, some think the reference is to the north side of Mount Zion, where the temple stood. Whatever is the precise idea intended we cannot doubt that the language is drawn from a sight of the city of the great King. Jerusalem was the seat of the theocracy.

3. God is known in her palaces for a refuge. Palaces, the word occurs again in v. 13, and in Ps. cxii. 7; not elsewhere in the Psalms. It might well be rendered fortresses, or castles. Green has fortifications; Mudge and Fry, towers. Refuge, see on Ps. ix. 9; elsewhere also rendered high tower, high fort, defence. God is known by his word, his oath, his covenant, and the history of his dealings with his people, individually and as a body; known in all the church, wherever his word is preached, and the Spirit of his grace poured out; known in all the high places of Zion as a refuge, a refuge to the poor and needy, the helpless and the perishing, who look to him for mercy and protection. His saints must not trust in fortresses, castles, palaces; but in God alone.

4. For, lo, the kings were assembled, they passed by together. Those who suppose this Psalm has special reference to the events recorded in 2 Chron. xx., or in 2 Kings xviii. xix., regard this and the next two verses as decisive in their favor. But from the first settlement in Canaan the nation of Israel often had kings and princes leagued against the people of Jehovah. The narrative of Ps. lxxxiii. is but a specimen of what often occurred. David himself was often conspired against. Were assembled, we are not told where, but at a point agreed upon, perhaps not far from Jerusalem. Passed by, either in their march upon Jerusalem, or in their making observations from the heights surrounding it, or they "passed away" from the city without accomplishing their designs. Fry: They passed away at once.

5. They saw it, and so they marvelled; they were troubled, and hasted away. Some regard this as an amplification of the fourth verse. If it is, it shows how the enemies were discomfited. A sight of the holy city filled them with wonder, and trouble, and they hasted away. Calvin: They saw, so they marvelled; they were frightened, they fled precipitately; Green: They no sooner looked, but were dismayed; they were routed, and fled away in confusion; Alexander: "The whole verse is descriptive of a panic leading to a disorderly retreat or flight." The verse is a fine specimen of rapid description.

6. Fear took hold upon them there, and pain, as of a woman in travail. Nothing is more unaccountable than panic. No man, no body of men can adequately guard against such terror. He who made the ears, can easily make them to tingle. He who holds the winds in his fist, can easily make them whisper alarm, or roar dismay. This is specially to be expected when men so act as to have their own consciences against them, Job xv. 21. But God can at any time so forsake men as that they shall be unmanned, and play the fool exceedingly, Lev. xxvi. 36. Men have fought bravely several battles and then played the coward. A woman in travail denotes the suddenness and the power of the fear which seized them.

7. Thou breakest the ships of Tarshish with an east wind. Anderson: "In the preceding verse the Psalmist had compared the terror which seized upon these combined powers with the pangs of a woman in travail; and here he compares it to the trembling which seized upon mariners when the fury of the east wind, which shattered in pieces the largest and strongest vessels, as the ships of Tarshish probably then were, was let loose upon them." For east wind the Chaldee has a strong east wind from the presence of the Lord; the Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate and Doway, a vehement wind; Septuagint, a violent wind; Mant says, "Such a wind is well known to the modern mariner by the name of Levanter." Some suppose that "Euroclydon," in Acts xxvii. 14, is the same wind. The east wind of Syria and the Mediterranean has been famous in all ages. It parched up everything. It was very destructive. See Gen. xli. 6; Ex. xiv. 21; Job xxvii. 21; Isa. xxvii. 8; Jer. xviii. 17; Ezek. xix. 12; xxvii. 26; Jonah iv. 8. Tarshish, sometimes, designated a given place. This was probably a city near the site of the present Cadiz in the south of Spain. A ship of Tarshish was a ship that traded at Tarshish, or Tartessus. Afterwards any ship, intended for a long sea voyage, seems to have borne the name of this city, because like a ship of Tarshish it was large and strong. Thus Solomon fitted out ships on the Red Sea, which were called ships of Tarshish, probably, not because they sailed around Africa to Spain, nor because they sailed to a place called Tarshish in India, but because they were great ships, and sailed to far distant lands. Some assert that Tarshish signifies Ocean, or Ocean-sea. If so, a ship of Tarshish is merely a ship of the sea.

8. As we have heard, so have we seen in the city of the LORD of hosts, in the city of our God. History and experience are two great teachers. They well agree in giving the same lessons. What they had heard of God's doings at other times and places, they now witnessed before their eyes. The city here spoken of was Jerusalem, the type of the church of the living God. The LORD of hosts is he who commands the stars and they obey him, to whom the angels of heaven yield a swift obedience, and who decides every battle between conflicting hosts. God will establish it for ever. Some put the verb in the preterite, and some in the present tense; but we get the best sense by following the original, will establish. God will establish it against all foes, all perils, all machinations. Alexander: "As Jerusalem is here regarded not as a mere town, but as the seat of the theocracy, the earthly residence of God, the promise is still valid, in its strongest sense, with respect to the church, of which the ancient Zion was the constituted type and local centre."

9. We have thought of thy lovingkindness, O God, in the midst of thy temple. Arabic: O God, we have known thy mercy in the midst of thy people; Septuagint: We expected thy mercy in the midst of thy people; Vulgate and Doway: We have received thy mercy, O God, in the midst of thy temple; Ainsworth: We have quietly waited thy mercy, O God, in midst of thy palace. Hammond observes that this verb carries with it the "signification of quiet, rest, silence, patient expecting, thinking, considering, and must be determined to any of these senses by the context." He prefers here the sense of expecting, or patient waiting. The rendering temple by people is evidently an error in transcription, where one letter would make the difference. The thoughts and hopes of pious men in all ages have been wondrously stirred up in the worship of God.

10. According to thy name, O God, so is thy praise unto the ends of the earth. God's name is that by which he is known. And so we have here the assertion that where men have the true knowledge of Jehovah, there he is correspondingly praised. This is the most obvious sense. Calvin: "The Psalmist intended to show that wherever the fame of the name of God may be spread, men will know that he is worthy of the highest praise." With him agree Pool, Morison and Clarke. Thy right hand is full of righteousness. See Job xxxvii. 23. The God of heaven does no wrong, and he plentifully rewardeth the proud doer.

11. Let mount Zion rejoice, let the daughters of Judah be glad, because of thy judgments. Green renders the verbs of this verse in the preterite; Edwards, Fry and Hengstenberg prefer the present; Calvin, Venema and Alexander follow the Hebrew closely and give the future; but the ancient versions, the church of England, Piscator, Fabritius, Amesius, Ainsworth, Boothroyd and Jebb agree with the English text. The term daughters of Judah may designate either the female portion of the Jewish people, who often figured in the exultations as also in the lamentations of the nation, Ex. xv. 20; 2 Chron. xxxv. 25; or, it may designate the cities or smaller towns which were dependent on Jerusalem; see Josh. xv. 45, 47. The latter view is preferred by Calvin, Diodati, Ainsworth and many others. The joy and gladness was to be because of thy judgments. Thy judgments, glorious decisions, and in this case the display of God's power and wrath against the wicked and in defence of his people. Several ancient versions and some modern translations close the verse with O Lord, but the Hebrew text does not allow it.

12. Walk about Zion, and go round about her; tell the towers thereof. The word rendered towers has not before occurred in the Psalms. It is almost uniformly rendered as here in the English version. In 1 Chron. xxvii. 25 it is rendered castles. In Gen. xi. 4, 5 in the singular, it designates the tower of Babel. It is the name for a strong fortification built by the skill and labor of man, and so not natural. The survey of Zion here called for was for the purpose of ascertaining the strength of that fortified hill.

13. Mark ye well her bulwarks, consider her palaces. Bulwarks, literally bulwark, are the rampart, the outer wall of a fortified town. Commonly there was a trench (sometimes filled with water) connected with it to render the wall more inaccessible. The word occurs again in Ps. cxxii. 7; and so does the word palaces, uniformly so rendered, except in Prov. xviii. 19, where it is castle. Perhaps castles might be a fit rendering here. It denotes strong and costly edifices. The renderings of verse 12 and of the first part of this verse are quite various, but in the end amount very much to the same thing. For consider, Tholuck has roam through. The common version gives the sense as well as any other, though the last verb does no doubt signify to separate, count, then to consider or admire. But there was no such prodigious strength of fortification at Jerusalem as to challenge peculiar admiration. We are compelled to seek a higher sense than we get from the literal Mount Zion. This we have in the church of God. Whatever the fortifications of Jerusalem were, they have all long since perished; but "the things signified by them shall remain for ever." If there is a historic reference in this Psalm then there may be a fitness in pointing to Jerusalem yet unhurt by the vaunting foe, now wholly discomfited; but the spiritual import of the passage is chiefly to be regarded, that ye may tell it to the generations following. No material structures at Jerusalem were ever worthy of so lasting recital as is here required; even if that city was once truly magnificent.

14. For this God is our God for ever and ever. The words are plain. The covenant relation of God to his people is for a standing joy to the righteous. His nature does not change. His relation to believers is ever the same. Therefore: He will be our guide even unto death, literally, He will lead us [or direct] us. Even unto death, i. e., as long as we live; and not as some have it, over death or at death, though he will surely do these things also.

There seems to be no good reason for supposing with Hare and some others that the words unto death belong to the title of Psalm xlix. Nor is there any evidence as some think that the first verse of this Psalm belongs to Psalm xlvii.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Great thoughts of God are very becoming, because they are just and true, v. 1. They are very important, 1, to give us right views of our sinfulness and weakness, and 2, to elevate our conceptions in all our attempts to worship him.

2. It is not possible for us to praise God too much or in strains too exalted, for he is to be praised exceedingly, v. 1. God's nature demands no less. "None on earth render him due honor, except the citizens of the heavenly Jerusalem, who worship him in the mountain of his holiness, as their God and Saviour." And even their songs are poor compared with those which are sung in the temple not made with hands.

3. God's presence makes any place notable and desirable, v. 2. It makes a stone in the wilderness a Bethel. It makes Jerusalem the most famous city in the world. The birth of Jesus made Bethlehem, and his residence made Nazareth famous to all coming time. But all these were otherwise poor places, and the latter of them was even infamous.

4. What the holy city was to all Judea, the church of God is or shall be to the whole world—a joy and a rejoicing, v. 2. Dickson: "The church is the joy of the whole earth by holding out to all the light of saving doctrine, and showing the authority, power, wisdom, and grace of Christ."

5. Such joy is truly blessed, but all else is short-lived and unsatisfying. Calvin: "If the joy which men experience and cherish is without God, the issue of their joy at length will be destruction, and their laughter will be turned into the gnashing of teeth."

6. Christ's kingly authority is never to be forgotten or slighted. He is a "Great King," v. 2. Blessed are all they, who bow to his sceptre. But woe to him that rebels.

7. If God demands a service, he makes more than an adequate return; if he is our King, he is also a refuge, v. 3. "The great founder of the church is also her protector and defender." Palaces, towers, redoubts and bulwarks were not the defence of Israel, but God himself.

8. Neither the multitude nor the greatness of the church's foes need alarm her friends. Men can do nothing but play the fool and the coward, if God be against them, vv. 4, 5, 6. "As the east wind shatters the ships of Tarshish, so the divine power strikes terror and astonishment" into the hearts of sinners. All the imaginations that fill the minds of the foes of God and of truth will vanish like the mist of morning. The record of a people against whom God is fighting is very brief. Montgomery beautifully versifies a part of this ode:

"At the sight of her splendor the kings of the earth
Grew pale with amazement and dread;
Fear seized them like pangs of a premature birth;
They came, they beheld her, and fled.
Thou brakest the ships from the sea-circled clime,
When the storm of thy jealousy lowers:
As our fathers have told of thy deeds in their time,
So, Lord, have we witnessed in ours."

Dickson: "Such, as come to bring trouble to God's church, come to catch trouble to themselves."

9. In his nature and in his works and ways God is always equal to the best reports we have heard of him, v. 8. He always acts like himself. He never denies himself. Morison: "Nor shall the Lord of hosts leave himself without witness in any age of the church. The history of the past shall be but the model of the future; and every successive generation of the saints shall prove the faithfulness and unchangeable conduct of him, who has promised to establish and build up Zion forever."

10. As worship is itself a delight to the pious, so the memory of seasons spent in the house of God is precious to the saints. They love to call them to mind, v. 9. Abraham probably never forgot Moriah; nor Jacob, Bethel.

11. If God were truly known and loved by all, then would all unceasingly praise him, v. 10. To all who know and love him the glorious Lord will be a sure defence. Of course he must be praised, and extolled, and become very high. If this Psalm has reference to the events noticed in 2 Chron. xx. then verse 29 of that chapter probably casts light on the kind of praise here spoken of.

12. We need never fear that God will act out of character. As there is a delightful harmony in the divine nature, so is there a glorious consistency in the divine conduct, v. 10. Henry: "In the great things that God has done, and is doing, for his church, it is good to take notice of the fulfilling of the Scriptures."

13. We cannot in any song or service dismiss the idea of God's infinite justice. His right hand is full of righteousness, v. 10. Compare Job xxxvii. 23. The divine clemency is worthy to be eternally celebrated, yet no more so than the awful rectitude of the divine character, which is the sure foundation of settled comfort in the church.

14. The Lord is known by the judgments which he executes. His enemies hate and tremble at his glorious deeds; but his people rejoice and adore, when Jehovah comes forth to enforce the decisions which he has made, Rev. xviii. 20. Dickson: "It becometh all men to be glad to see God glorify himself in deciding controversies equitably."

15. The church of God is impregnable, indestructible, vv. 8, 11, 12. Slade: "The church of Israel was preserved in the midst of her enemies, and why? 'God was well known in her palaces for a sure refuge.' The church of Christ has also been preserved in the midst of her enemies; and for the same reason." So shall it be till time shall be no longer, and all Israel shall be saved.

16. A reason why people when young and vigorous should study God's word and the history of his dealings with his church is, that they may have something instructive and profitable to talk about to the next generation, v. 13. All should publish the glory of God.

17. It is both fitting and obligatory to plead the covenant relation between God and us. It has always been done by pious men. What would become of poor afflicted believers, if they could not use such language as that in Isa. xxv. 9?

18. How precious is the doctrine of the unchangeableness of God. Because he is ever the same, we may infer safety and protection from mercies shown to like persons in ancient times, and may assure all that shall come after us that as God has been kind to us so will he be to them, if they will trust and obey him.

19. If we had nothing but prosperity and tokens of God's pleasure here, we should not care for a better world than this; and if we had no mercies here, we should hope for none hereafter. Tholuck: "Faith in a blissful eternity awakes most vividly when the mercy of God powerfully shines upon our temporal existence."

20. We feel the want of no blessing more than that of sufficient guidance; and we should appreciate such a favor very highly and have adoring gratitude for it. It is made sure to the meek. Dickson: "God will guide them whose God he is, when they seek his counsel out of desire to follow it, and he will not lay down the conducting and governing of those who have committed themselves unto him, but will guide them constantly all the days of their life."

21. Luther: "We sing this Psalm, because God is pleased to preserve his church and gospel against the roaring and hatred of kings and princes; who cease not from attacking them by violence and craft with all their might: and yet, they shall perish and be confounded, and covered with shame, while the gospel shall remain as it was before, unhurt and unhindered."

PSALM XLIX.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

- 1 Hear this, all ye people; give ear, all ye inhabitants of the world:
- 2 Both low and high, rich and poor, together.
- 3 My mouth shall speak of wisdom; and the meditation of my heart shall be of understanding.
- 4 I will incline mine ear to a parable: I will open my dark saying upon the harp.
- 5 Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil, when the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about?
- 6 They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches;
- 7 None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him:
- 8 (For the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth for ever:)
- 9 That he should still live for ever, and not see corruption.
- 10 For he seeth that wise men die, likewise the fool and the brutish person perish, and leave their wealth to others.
- 11 Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue for ever, and their dwelling places to all generations; they call their lands after their own names.
- 12 Nevertheless man being in honour abideth not: he is like the beasts that perish.
- 13 This their way is their folly: yet their posterity approve their sayings. Selah.
- 14 Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling.
- 15 But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave: for he shall receive me. Selah.
- 16 Be not thou afraid when one is made rich, when the glory of his house is increased;
- 17 For when he dieth he shall carry nothing away: his glory shall not descend after him.
- 18 Though while he lived he blessed his soul: and men will praise thee, when thou doest well to thyself:
- 19 He shall go to the generation of his fathers; they shall never see light.
- 20 Man that is in honour, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xlii. The style of the original is confessedly obscure. The date cannot be fixed. Scott supposes it may have been written B. C. 1034. Alexander: "The inscription to the sons of Korah is consistent with any date from the time of David to that of Ezra." The authorship is uncertain. It is not wild to ascribe it to David; some have thought Solomon wrote it. On the authorship of the sons of Korah, see on title of Ps. xlii. On Selah see Introduction, § 15. The only name of God in this Psalm is Elohim; see on Ps. iii. 2. The design of this ode is variously conceived. Henry: "This Psalm is a sermon. In most of the Psalms we have the penman praying or praising. Here we have him preaching. . . The scope and design of this discourse is to convince the men of this world of their sin and folly in setting their hearts upon the things of this world, and so to persuade them to seek the things of a better world; as also to comfort the people of God, in reference to their own troubles, and the grief that arises from the prosperity of the wicked." Dodd: "It seems to be a meditation on the vanity of riches, and the usual haughtiness of those who possess them." Luther:

"This is a Psalm that instructs us unto faith, and teaches us to trust in God against that great god of this world, who is called Mammon." The Psalms, which most nearly resemble this in scope and design, are xxxvii. xxxix. lxxiii.

1. Hear this, all ye people; give ear, all ye inhabitants of the world. People, in the plural, peoples, all nations. The latter clause of the verse is parallel—inhabitants of the world. World, in Ps. lxxxix. 47, time; in Job xi. 17; in Ps. xxxix. 5, age; then by a transition well known in Greek and English the world where such duration is spent. The claim is for the marked attention of all mankind.

2. Both low and high, rich and poor, together, literally both sons of Adam, and sons of men, meaning mankind by whatever name called. See Introduction, § 16. The Chaldee has it, sons of old Adam; and sons of Jacob, equivalent to Jews and Gentiles. God's word nowhere denies that men's relations to each other are different; but their relations to God are all so far the same that they are all his servants, alike bound to hear and obey his word, alike accountable to him, liable at any moment to be summoned to his bar and to be judged in righteousness by him. Let all flesh give ear to the word of the Lord.

3. My mouth shall speak of wisdom. This is a reason why all should give the earnest heed and close attention claimed in vv. 1 and 2. Wisdom, plural wisdoms, denoting richness of wisdom. What is about to be uttered is of great weight. The language is not boastful, but arousing; it is modest, for it is simply true. And the meditation of my heart shall be of understanding, literally understandings; Ainsworth, prudencies; Edwards, matters of understanding.

4. I will incline mine ear to a parable: I will open my dark saying upon the harp. Parable, in a bad sense, byword, taunting speech, Ps. xliv. 14; Isa. xiv. 4; in a good sense, parable, proverb, a sententious saying, a weighty doctrine, constructed with ingenuity. For dark saying, many read enigma, riddle; Edwards, weighty doctrine; Horsley, mysterious doctrine; Fry, song; others, problem, proposition. To incline the ear, some think, is to sit in the posture of one about to play on the harp; it more naturally signifies the giving of earnest heed, Ps. lxxviii. 1. To open is to begin. Merrick unites these two senses: "I will myself give attention to the instructive parables of revelation, and I will propound them in this ode to others." Pool also: "I will hearken what God by his Spirit speaks to me, and that and nothing else will I now speak to you, and therefore it is well worth your hearing."

5. Wherefore should I fear in the days of evil, when the iniquity of my heels shall compass me about? This is very obscure. These words cannot mean that unpardoned sin is not good cause of fear. These solutions are offered. 1. The Chaldee for when has unless when. This arbitrarily supplies a most important word. 2. For iniquity Dimock has affliction; Houbigant, trouble; so that they understand not sin but natural evil. 3. For iniquity the Syriac and Arabic have enemies; Hengstenberg, treaders-down; Alexander, oppressors. 4. Others read the iniquity of those who lie in wait for me, or who are at my heels, or who supplant me, or who plot against me. So Dimock, Dodd, Glassius and Horsley. Horne: "Why should I give way to fear and despondency, in the time of calamity, when the wickedness of my wealthy and powerful adversaries compasses me about, to supplant and overthrow me. This is the best solution."

6. They that trust in their wealth, and boast themselves in the multitude of their riches. This is a description of a class of wicked men, found in the world in all ages. A good man may be rich, but he does not trust in gold. He is confident in God, not in the multitude of his possessions. But all wicked men, living in a state of carnal security, and having riches, do trust in them, love them, and virtually say to them, Ye are our gods. The folly of such vain trust is gross and manifest. Riches, even vast riches may leave us in a day as they did Job. They profit not in the day of wrath. They multiply our cares and sorrows, especially when public calamity stalks abroad, or when death approaches. Neither can they aid our friends to the extent some vainly suppose. Men may own millions, but

7. None of them can by any means redeem his brother, nor give to God a ransom for him. Like his poor neighbor the rich is powerless, when he would prolong life, his own or his brother's, by means of earthly possessions. It is even more vain to offer gold as a ransom, atonement or expiation for the guilty soul, our own or a brother's. Surely no man should make much of that, which can in no way help in saving the soul, nor in prolonging life on earth. Death laughs at bags of gold. The justice of God holding fast the sinner scorns the richest bribe.

8. (For the redemption of their soul is precious, and it ceaseth forever.) Precious, also rendered costly, excellent, 1 Kings v. 17; vii. 9-11; once, precious because rare, 1 Sam. iii. 1. We were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold; but with the precious blood of Christ, as of a lamb without blemish and without spot. It cost God nothing to make the world. He spake and it was done. But to redeem it required the incarnation, sufferings and death of Jesus Christ. Scott: "The ancient fathers referred the verse to Christ, in this sense, 'No man can redeem his brother, he alone excepted, who is also God.'" And it ceaseth forever. Clarke: "This is very obscure." A good sense is given by Henry: "Life, when it is going, cannot be arrested, and when it is gone, it cannot be recalled." A higher sense is given by Hammond: "The redemption of the soul shall be precious, shall be high-prized, it shall cost very dear; but, being once wrought, it shall never need to be repeated," Heb. ix. 25, 26; x. 12. Or the phrase may signify that the ransom, which men vainly suppose can be effected by riches, never did avail and never can. Pool: "The soul's redemption is never to be accomplished by any mere man." It has no existence eternally. Either of these is better than that of Hengstenberg: And precious is the ransom of their souls, and he must put it off forever. The next verse should be read in connection with v. 7.

9. That he should still live forever, and not see corruption. The immortality of man on earth, or the blessed immortality of man beyond this life are alike beyond the price any mere man can pay. Man's life and his eternal life are solely and wholly at the disposal of God. We must feel this. Bossuet quotes a Jewish interpreter as understanding these verses "of the King Messiah, who, having died for the redemption of his brethren, afterwards liveth forever."

10. For he seeth that wise men die, likewise the fool and the brutish person perish, and leave their wealth to others. He seeth, i. e., any man may see, every man should see it. Mudge: It is evident; Slade: It is seen; it is indisputably so. Wise men die. Alas! alas! how the strong rods are broken. Even if a wise ruler or counsellor is found, how short is his life, how soon he passes away! Nor does death spare the fool, the poor wicked sinner, nor the brutish person, the man who has no spiritual discernment, though neither of these classes is prepared to undergo the awful examination of God. One of England's greatest monarchs dying said: "A world of wealth for an inch of time." But the offer was not accepted. The rich leave their wealth to others, whether to wise or foolish heirs they know not, but the heirs will find the fortune as vain and unsatisfying, as those who accumulated it.

11. Their inward thought is, that their houses shall continue forever. This is confessedly a verse very difficult of translation. None better than the above has been given. For that some read how. But this is not good. These rich wicked men could not act more atheistically if they had never heard that there was a God. They also think that their dwelling places shall continue to all generations, literally to generation and generation. One of the hardest things is to make a wealthy sinner consent to be a pilgrim and a stranger upon earth. Septuagint: And their sepulchres are their houses forever; Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, Edwards, Fry and others also read sepulchres. Calvin calls this interpretation ingenious, and a satirising of those who think to perpetuate their memory after death by rearing mausoleums. Still he prefers the sense given in the common version. Houses may mean families, or descendants, but here it seems to mean habitations. They call their lands after their own names. This does not declare that men leave their names on their tombs as some think; but that they give their own names to their landed estates, a custom still common in some places.

12. Nevertheless man being in honor abideth not. All those dreams of permanency described in the preceding verse vanish in actual life. However great or honorable man may become, he has no continuance. Nothing is fixed. Abideth, literally lodgeth, tarrieth as for a night, in the future shall abide. Hengstenberg: But man remains not in honor. Earthly existence is fleeting. Several versions, ancient and modern, for shall not abide, read shall not understand. The change of a single letter in the Hebrew would cause the mistake, for such it doubtless is. The Hebrew text, the Chaldee and the mass of authority sustain the common version. He is like the beasts that perish. If the present is the whole life of man, as the prevailing sentiments and conduct of the wicked would indicate, then how is man better than a brute? Calvin: "It is true that there is a great difference, as far as the soul is concerned, between man and the brute creation; but the Psalmist speaks of things as they appear in this world, and in this respect he was warranted to say of the ungodly that they die as the beasts. His subject does not lead him to speak of the world to come."

13. This their way is their folly. Folly, elsewhere rendered hope, confidence. Their very hope is folly. That in which they trust is foolishness. For folly the Septuagint has scandal, signifying offence or stumbling-block. Yet their posterity approve their sayings. For posterity some read imitators; and the word does sometimes signify a follower. But to say that an imitator approves that which he follows is a truism. On the other hand to say that posterity approve the principles of progenitors, especially when they have been wrong, is to declare that like begets like; and there is hardly a more solemn truth. Ainsworth: And their posterity like well of their mouth; Fry: Yet those that come after them delight in their maxims.

14. Like sheep they are laid in the grave; death shall feed on them; and the upright shall have dominion over them in the morning; and their beauty shall consume in the grave from their dwelling. This verse is variously rendered. Chaldee: They adjudge the just to death like sheep; and slay them; and wear out the just and those who revere the law, and smite the upright. Therefore their bodies shall grow old in hell, because they stretched forth their hand and destroyed the house of the habitation of his majesty; John Rogers' Translation: They lye in the hell like shepe, death shall dnawe upon them, and the ryghtuous shall have dominacyon of them in the mornynge by tymes: their strength shall consume, and hell shall be their dwellynge; Edwards: They are laid in the region of the dead like sheep; death feedeth on them; and the righteous will have dominion over them in the morning; their form will moulder away; the grave is their habitation. The foregoing are samples of the variety of renderings. The general import of the verse is given by all; but the precise signification of some words and the precise sense of some clauses are not agreed upon. Like sheep they are laid in the grave. Kennicott: Like cattle do they advance to the grave; Alexander: Like a flock to the grave they drive [or are driven.] Like sheep, without thought, heedlessly, not knowing where they are going. Death shall feed on them. Calvin: Death shall feed them; Venema: Death shall act as their shepherd;

Tholuck: Death is their shepherd [or driver,] i. e., Death gathers them into his fold, and guides them as he will. His control over them shall be perfect. Have dominion, rule, as those who are vastly superior, and so triumph over. In the morning, very soon, very early, or early, Ps. ci. 8. The triumph of the wicked is short. Or morning signifies the time of judgment and decision, as courts tried causes in the morning. So Dathe. Or it signifies the time of the resurrection, which follows death. So many. This interpretation is to be preferred. The last clause is clear except the phrase from their dwelling, which is probably better read by uniting it with a part of what goes before, and so reading, hell their dwelling.

15. But God will redeem my soul from the power of the grave: for he shall receive me. Selah. That is, my life shall not be prematurely cut off, whatever perils may menace it; and, when I shall die, it will be in a firm faith in a blessed resurrection, which shall forever put away the dishonor, weakness and corruption of natural death. Calvin: "The prophet did not consider that the ground of his hope for a better resurrection was to be found in himself, but in the gratuitous adoption of God who had taken him into his favor." The redemption of this verse is doubtless in contrast of that in vv. 7, 8. The doctrine of the first part of the Psalm the prophet now applies in a practical way, either to himself, or to his learner.

16. Be not thou afraid when one is made rich. Be not afraid, suffer not thy mind to be filled with apprehensions, neither for thyself, nor for the public, neither for the State, nor for the church. As one's power is commonly increased with his wealth, fears are apt to arise respecting ill-disposed rich men. But we need not fear. For, 1, God governs the world; 2, the most wicked and powerful can do nothing except it be given him of God; 3, riches often destroy the energy the wicked would otherwise have, and leave them effeminate and feeble; 4, their riches may leave them any moment; 5, they may be called out of time without notice, or preparation. If riches serve to make a show, it is a vain show. Be not afraid, When the glory of his house is increased. Glory, the splendor of wealth, the applause of the ungodly, the admiration of fools are the glory of riches. House, the same as in v. 11, meaning here their family, or household. Riches held by others should awaken neither envy nor alarm.

17. For when he dieth he shall carry nothing away. The passage is parallel to Job i. 21; 1 Tim. vi. 7. The wicked will soon die. His possessions are soon scattered. His glory shall not descend after him. His very name shall rot. His power on earth shall be as nothing, so soon as he is dead; and in the next world, that which was his glory here shall be his everlasting shame. Nothing shall be more certain than the confusion and contempt which shall fall on every wicked man, however rich,

18. Though while he lived he blessed his soul, i. e., called and counted himself a happy man, thought well of himself, put himself quite above many around him, and thought more of his own dog or horse than of his neighbour's soul or child. And men will praise thee when thou doest well to thyself. Ainsworth: They will confess thee when thou doest good to thyself, i. e., own thee as a friend; Skinner: Yea, though men praise thee when thou indulgest thyself, i. e., flatterers will praise thee when thou indulgest in unrestrained luxury; Fry: But he shall praise thee because thou hast done well for thyself. Hammond thinks it means, "Thou shalt be praised for doing that which may tend really and eternally to thy good, and not for applauding thy present felicity." The former is the more obvious construction, though either gives a good sense.

19. He shall go to the generation of his fathers, i. e., He shall pass into the invisible world, where his forefathers or exemplars in sin are gone. Calvin has it: He shall come but to the age of his fathers; meaning as they at length passed away, so shall he. Either sense is good. They shall never see light. Everlasting darkness! O who can fathom the woe here threatened. Light; Horsley: "That light, which emphatically deserves the name—that light, of which created light is but a faint image; the light of God's glory. He shall have no share in the beatific vision."

20. Man that is in honor, and understandeth not, is like the beasts that perish. This is very much like v. 12. This has made some think that there was an error in the text of v. 12; but it is very common to make two sentences much alike, yet leaving a slight difference between them. In v. 12 wicked men are compared to beasts, as to their mortality; in v. 20 to brutes, on account of their want of understanding. Compare Isa. i. 3; Jer. viii. 7.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Nothing is more just than the claim made on us to give close and earnest attention to divine things, v. 1. It is not a vain thing, it is our life. The ears and the hearts of men must be circumcised. "A prepared and sanctified ear is necessary for heavenly doctrine."

2. Before God all human distinctions and gradations are as nothing, v. 2. The difference between the greatest and the least of men is but the difference between two worms, two atoms. The highest of men is as truly bound to humble himself before God as the lowest. Rulers, sometimes in Scripture called gods, shall die like men.

3. Religious teachers should speak wisdom, much wisdom, v. 3; even the wisdom of God, 1 Cor. ii. 6, 7. God hath abounded towards us in all wisdom, and we ought to abound towards others in the same. In order to this, teachers must be students. Calvin: "Wisdom is not the growth of human genius. It must be sought from above, and it is impossible that any should speak with the propriety and knowledge necessary for the edification of the church, who has not, in the first place, been taught at the feet of the Lord."

4. There is a rich and excellent variety of matter and manner of teaching. At one time we have a parable, then a dark saying, v. 4; at one time a great doctrine, then an epic poem, then a psalm, then an exhortation. The preacher should be wise, and seek out and set in order many proverbs and excellent sentences. A good teacher must be a good student. He should be ingenious in stating and enforcing the lessons of heavenly wisdom, and endeavor by clearness, by meekness, by self-denial, by prudence and by courage, to bring home to men's hearts all the word of the Lord. He should meditate on what he teaches and try to feel it. "That which ministers speak from their own hearts is most likely to reach the hearts of their hearers."

5. The mysterious aspect of divine truth (v. 4) is chiefly owing to the sublimity of its nature and to the blindness of the human mind. To those who have spiritual discernment, the parables and proverbs, so far from being a hindrance, are a help to understand and treasure up the things of God. To a mind blinded by prejudice and sin nothing is clear, nothing is pleasing, unless it be something low and carnal.

6. Do right, and trust in God. Fear God, and then fear nothing else, v. 5. The Lord reigns over all, in wisdom, justice, mercy and power. The eulogy pronounced on John Knox was short but well-deserved: "There lies he who never feared the face of man."

7. Let no servant of God be surprised at finding himself surrounded by supplanters and oppressors, v. 5. Treachery seems to be a part of all opposition to godliness. Cruelty certainly is.

8. It is better to be a poor man and trust in God, and have him for a portion, than to be a rich man and worship mammon, v. 6. Of the former class not one fails of heaven; of the latter, not one enters heaven.

9. One way in which riches corrupt men and destroy their souls, is by engendering the spirit of vain boasting, v. 6. Than this, hardly anything more blinds the mind, or hardens the heart. Men who have wealth are always in danger of pride and self-conceit; and the consequence is that self-denial and self-loathing are far from them, without which there is no salvation.

10. If riches are capable of many good uses, as the Bible admits; so in a multitude of cases they are utterly powerless, v. 7. They cannot buy talent, or any excellence of mind or heart. They cannot give a good constitution, nor prolong life for a day. They rather increase than diminish fears. "The abundance of the rich will not suffer him to sleep." They cannot quiet an uneasy conscience. They cannot cool a fever, or drive away a chill. They cannot soothe a pain in the head, or an ache in the heart. Towards one's salvation they can contribute nothing whatever. Nor can they aid our kin or our friends more than they can ourselves. Tholuck: "A rich man may buy much with his money, goods of every kind, pleasures, honors, but he cannot buy eternal life." The tenure, by which all earthly good is held is very frail. They who trust in wealth, shall find that they had no foresight. Foolish as is this love of riches, it is very prevalent, Jer. vi. 13. Many think the account given of the rich fool in Luke xii. 19-21, and of the rich man in Luke xvi. 19-31, illustrated by this Psalm. However this may be, we should heed the words of Christ in the same Gospel, Luke vi. 24, 25.

11. Such views of the vanity of wealth may be profitably contrasted with the blessings of sanctified poverty, Luke vi. 20, 21. Morison: "There is one limit, at least, to the tyrannous usurpation of wicked powers, and that limit is the grave; a destiny from which wealth cannot redeem, and power cannot rescue." One of the best things written by John Newton was "On the advantages of a state of poverty."

12. If "redemption is precious," those who are made partakers of its benefits ought constantly to celebrate its wonders, v. 8. Its costliness was greater than that of all things else. All the prices ever paid for other good things are as nothing compared with the price of redemption. No wonder that it has already contributed more to the glory of God and the elevation of man than all things else. It is the mystery of mysteries; the theme of the highest and sweetest songs sung in heaven.

13. The only immortality, which is worth having, is that which is made blessed by redemption, v. 9. Oh that each of us may attain unto it. An immortal existence without the salvation of the Gospel would be but perpetual torment.

14. Scripture and reason unite in claiming attention to the subject of death, v. 10. Even some of the heathen have acknowledged the wisdom of reflecting on that last, great, solemn change. One of the Latin poets says: "It is death, which forces us to confess how worthless the bodies of men are." If men would duly meditate on death, surely they would not be so wild and extravagant as they are. But the mere contemplation of death will neither make it easy nor safe to die. The death of Christ alone rightly viewed and believed can make our death comfortable and truly blessed. Henry: "The children of God, though ever so poor, are in this truly happy, above the most prosperous of the children of this world, that they are well-guarded against the terrors of death, and the judgment to come."

15. All earthly things are fleeting and vain, v. 11. He who dreams of stability in any worldly matter, is a fool. Horne: "Various are the contrivances of vain men, to have their names written on earth, and to procure after their deaths, an imaginary immortality, for themselves and their families, in the memory and conversation of posterity; which is not often obtained; and, if obtained, is of no value; when, with less trouble, they might have had their names written in heaven, and have secured to themselves a blessed immortality, in the glorious kingdom of their Redeemer."

16. If all other things on earth were stable and enduring, yet man himself abides not, and so he cannot regard himself as permanent possessor of any earthly thing, v. 12.

17. It requires the grace of God to make a man wiser and better than his ungodly ancestors. A sinner lives and flourishes, and vanishes away; and his children if left to themselves follow in his track, and do as he did, v. 13. The example and dreadful end of sinners will never sufficiently warn their offspring from following in their footsteps.

18. Why does not the fearful rapidity with which men die put us all to thinking? v. 14. If the earth contains eight hundred million souls, and we allow thirty years to a generation, then every year more than twenty-six millions of souls pass into eternity. This is largely upwards of two millions for every month, more than seventy-four thousand for every day, more than three thousand for every hour, more than fifty for every minute.

19. In the midst of the death and misery, which stalk abroad over all the earth, it is delightful to know that reliance on God for salvation shall never be disappointed, v.

15. God is true and cannot deceive. Henry: "The believing hopes of the soul's redemption from the grave, and reception to glory, are the great support and joy of the children of God in a dying hour." Morison: "It is the doctrines of a resurrection and of a future judgment, which send preëminent lustre upon all the apparent inequalities of life." If believers' pains are sharp, they are not long; and if they are long, they are not sharp. It is a poor thing to have wealth, and honor, and ease follow us to the grave, and then mercy forsake us forever; but it is a blessed thing to live poor, and die poor, and then enter into eternal glory.

20. We need not fear the rising fortunes of ungodly men, v. 16. The butterfly with all its gaudiness will not live half so long as the poor caterpillar, whom it seems to despise; see on Ps. xxxvii. 35, 36.

21. If anything could settle the question of the folly of man's mind, we should suppose it would be the necessity of reminding us that when we die we can carry none of our possessions with us, v. 17.

22. All other flattery would be harmless, if we did not flatter ourselves, v. 18.

23. It would do us good often to sit down and think how universally and swiftly the nations, and conquerors, and tyrants, and persecutors of former times have passed away, v. 19. Compare Job iii. 17-19.

24. However we may interpret the language of inspiration respecting the recompense of the wicked in a future world, candor compels us to admit that its import is fearful, v. 19. Some deceive themselves with the thought that the threatening language of Scripture is figurative; but, if the figures are justly used, then the import is even more terrific than if plain language were employed.

25. Will men never learn? will they never understand? v. 20. Never, never, till God's Holy Spirit illuminates the poor benighted soul. Clarke: "The rich and honorable man, who has no spiritual understanding, is a beast in the sight of God." If the great principles of righteousness and religion were an occult science, how could they be more effectually hidden from the unregenerate than they now are? Horne: "At the call of Folly, what multitudes are always ready to assemble! But Wisdom, eternal and essential Wisdom, crieth without; she lifteth up her voice in the streets, and who is at leisure to attend her heavenly lectures?" Tholuck: "Divine wisdom only rises above the destiny of beasts."

26. Let men in these gospel times know their day, and be wise. Slade: "If the people, in the psalmist's day, were so foolish for looking to earthly things alone, what must we be, now that the blessed Jesus, by the glorious truth of his gospel, and his rising again from the grave, has plainly assured us of a resurrection and a life to come!"

27. In the end it shall infallibly be seen that he who serves God is the only wise man. "Let prosperous sinners be afraid for themselves, but let not even suffering saints be afraid of them."

28. What shall it profit a man, if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?

PSALM L.

A Psalm of Asaph.

1 The mighty God, even the LORD, hath spoken, and called the earth from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof.

2 Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined.

3 Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence: a fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him.

4 He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people.

5 Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sacrifice.

6 And the heavens shall declare his righteousness: for God is judge himself. Selah.

7 Hear, O my people, and I will speak; O Israel, and I will testify against thee: I am God, even thy God.

8 I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices or thy burnt offerings, to have been continually before me.

9 I will take no bullock out of thy house, nor he goats out of thy folds:

10 For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills.

11 I know all the fowls of the mountains: and the wild beasts of the field are mine.

12 If I were hungry, I would not tell thee: for the world is mine, and the fulness thereof.

13 Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats?

14 Offer unto God thanksgiving; and pay thy vows unto the Most High:

15 And call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me.

16 But unto the wicked God saith, What hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldst take my covenant in thy mouth?

17 Seeing thou hatest instruction, and castest my words behind thee.

18 When thou sawest a thief, then thou consentedst with him, and hast been partaker with adulterers.

19 Thou givest thy mouth to evil, and thy tongue frameth deceit.

20 Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother; thou slanderest thine own mother's son.

21 These things hast thou done, and I kept silence; thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself: but I will reprove thee, and set them in order before thine eyes.

22 Now consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver.

23 Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me: and to him that ordereth his conversation aright will I shew the salvation of God.

THE authorship of this Psalm is not uncertain. See title; Introduction, § 4, 1 Chron. vi. 39; xy. 17, 19; xxv. 1, 2; Neh. xii. 46. Scott dates it B. C. 1035; many, fifteen years later. It suited any state of the church during David's reign. Some think Asaph's style less polished and flowing than that of his monarch; but he always awakens the sympathies of God's afflicted people in his inspired utterances. The tincture of sadness pervading them well agrees with the experience of many. Concerning the scope of this Psalm, there is some diversity, arising perhaps from an attempt to discover a strict unity of design in it. It treats of the nature of true religion, what it requires of us towards God and man, how it forbids hypocrisy and formality in worship; it shows us how exalted and pure is God, and points us to his awful judgments against sinners. In it we find five names of the Almighty, El God, Eloah God, Elohim God, Jehovah LORD and Gel-yohn Most High, on which see respectively on Ps. xviii. 3; v. 4; iii. 2; i. 2; vii. 17.

1. The mighty God, even the LORD. Chaldee: The mighty One, the God Jehovah. Many others: The God of gods, Jehovah; Venema and Schmidt: God, God, Jehovah; Horsley: The omnipotent God, Jehovah; Amesius: The mighty God, God Jehovah; Hengstenberg: God, the Almighty, the Lord; Alexander: The Almighty, God, Jehovah. See the same form of speech in Josh. xxii. 22, rendered, The LORD God of gods. This awful God hath spoken, and called the earth from the rising of the sun unto the going down thereof. The summons is to all the inhabitants of the earth, those that were near and those afar off. The occasion of this call is the solemn trial of his people. As in the last day, so here God lays open the character of his dealings with his professed people, and the manner in which they had requited him. Compare Deut. xxx. 19; Isa. i. 2.

2. Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God hath shined. The call is not from Mount Sinai with its blackness and thunderings; but from Mount Zion, the most favored spot on earth, and to a pious Jew, "the perfection of beauty." No place equalled Zion. This is the more common interpretation, and is sustained by Ps. xlviii. 2; yet the Septuagint, Luther and others put "perfection of beauty," in apposition with God. The doctrine is good, but is the excellence of God's character intended to be taught by that phrase? Shined, as in Deut. xxxiii. 2, "He shined forth from mount Paran." In Ps. lxxx. 1, in the imperative it is, Shine forth; and in Ps. xciv. 1, Show thyself, margin, Shine forth. When God chooses, he can easily display intolerable brightness.

3. Our God shall come, and shall not keep silence. The God, who shall come, is in covenant with those, who fitly call him our God. Shall come; Alexander: "He is coming, as if the sound of his voice and the light of his glory had preceded his actual appearance." To keep silence is to show forbearance and to withhold deserved punishment. Tholuck: "The long-suffering of God has long been silent, he will now make it known that his long-suffering was not indifference, but mercy." A fire shall devour before him, and it shall be very tempestuous round about him. The imagery is doubtless drawn from the appearances and manifestations at mount Sinai, Ex. xix. 16, 18; Heb. xii. 18-21. If with several old Jewish interpreters we refer this Psalm to the day of Judgment, these terms used have an awful significance. But God is himself a consuming fire, whenever he deals with men otherwise than in amazing mercy, Deut. iv. 24; Isa. xxx. 33; xxxiii. 14; Heb. xii. 29.

4. He shall call to the heavens from above, and to the earth, that he may judge his people. Clarke: The first six verses of this Psalm seem to contain a description of the great judgment: to any minor consideration or fact it seems impossible, with any propriety, to restrain it." It is not necessary to give it this exclusive reference; but its terms naturally carry the mind from looking through any other scrutiny of men's characters to the investigations of the last day, when the heavens above, and the earth beneath shall be alike brought before the tribunal of God. False professors are tried in this Psalm. The same class were severely dealt with by the prophets, and afterwards by John the Baptist, Hos. vi. 5; Matt. iii. 10-12. The Saviour himself introduced such clearness and discrimination into his teachings, that the formalists and hypocrites of his time "could not abide the day of his coming." But the last great day will, more than any before it, yea, will perfectly separate the wheat from the chaff.

5. Gather my saints together unto me; those that have made a covenant with me by sac- rifice. Chaldee: Gather to me my saints, who have struck my covenant, and confirmed my law, and been diligent in prayer, which is like an oblation; Arabic: Be ye gathered to him, O ye saints of his, who place his covenant above sacrifices; Luther: Gather me mine holy ones, that regard the covenant more than offering; Amesius: Gather to me those whom I have been pursuing with kindness, and who have struck covenant with me by sacrifice; Matthew's Bible: Gather my saints together unto me, those that set more by the covenant than by any offering; Hengstenberg: "Gather to me my saints who close with my covenant on sacrifice." Hengstenberg puts the verse in quotation marks, as being the address of God. Doubtless he is the speaker. Saints, holy, godly, merciful, Deut. xxxiii. 8; 2 Sam. xxii. 26; Ps. iv. 3; Mic. vii. 2. It may be taken ironically, and then they are spoken of as what they ought to be, or what they profess to be; or it may be taken as a just epithet, and then they are gathered together for protection and blessing. Some have regarded this verse as the call to the first resurrection, when the reapers, the angels, shall gather all the wheat into the garners. If the reference is directly to the Jewish nation as God's professed people, then the allusion to a covenant is naturally drawn from Ex. xxiv. 3-8; Josh. xxiv. 14-28. A covenant was often made by slaying a victim, sprinkling its blood and burning its fat on the altar, cutting the animal into two parts, and the parties passing between them. All God's people make a covenant with him through the sacrifice of his Son.

6. And the heavens shall declare his righteousness. In some other places the heavens means the angels. Perhaps it does so here. The angels will be Christ's attendants and assessors. If angels are not here referred to, then the sense of the clause is that from the heavens, or in the most public and illustrious manner, God will declare, or make known his righteousness in all things, especially in his sentence against a hypocritical people. It will fill heaven with eternal gladness that in the annals of the universe there is not found one record or case of a decision given by God contrary to infinite rectitude. It could not be otherwise, for God is judge himself. As "the Father judgeth no man, but hath committed all judgment to the Son;" this verse clearly points to Immanuel.

7. Hear, O my people, and I will speak; O Israel, and I will testify against thee: I am God, even thy God. The rendering is better than any offered in its place. By speaking and testifying he refers to the solemn charge and admonition he would give them and to the announcement of the principles on which the final judgment will be conducted. He insists upon his name and character, as being well known to them in their history in centuries gone by. He had been their friend, and guide, and benefactor, and deliverer, and law-giver. He also gave assurance that he had not yet cast them off. Alexander: "I will testify against thee, that I am thy God, although I am not so regarded or so treated."

8. I will not reprove thee for thy sacrifices, or thy burnt-offerings, to have been continually before me. Tholuck: "It is so deeply impressed on the heart of man that his life should be a continuous worship, that he seeks to calm his conscience by outward offerings and works of obedience at least. But they can neither calm the conscience nor satisfy God." God often takes the will for the deed, but never the deed for the will. Heartly piety towards God and genuine kindness towards men always were, and from God's nature ever must be preferred to any attention to the ritual of religion. See Isa. i. 11-15; Mark xii. 28-34. The words, to have been, supplied by our translators, do not aid. Patrick gives the sense: "I have no complaint to make about the matter of sacrifices: thy burnt-offerings, I acknowledge, never fail to be brought both morning and evening to my altar; and I see how busy thou art in that employment." Alexander: "I do not charge thee with withholding the material offerings to which I am entitled, for in truth they are ever before me." Sacrifices, strictly speaking, were offerings of animals in which the life was destroyed. In burnt-offerings a bullock, a male lamb, or a kid, or, in cases of great poverty, a turtle-dove, or pigeon, was offered.

9. I will take no bullock out of thy house, nor he goats out of thy folds. Bullock, the word determines only the sex, but not the size or age of the animal. The oxen of the Jews were bulls. In modern Jewish books of devotion the word steer is uniformly used instead of bullock. In this place Calvin has calf. Three views are taken of this verse. 1. "The time is coming when I will take no bullock or he-goat from you or from any people, but I will require only spiritual sacrifices." This is very good doctrine; but there is nothing corresponding to the words the time is coming, except as indicated by the future form of the verb, will take. 2. The Jews had begun to conceive of God as requiring animals in sacrifice to meet some demand of his nature. To this gross conception the verse is regarded as a denial. 3. Some think it is as if God had said, "I will not accept these animals from you in your present wicked state of mind, as though your sacrifice was pleasing to me: I cannot do it: you are putting forms in the place of substance." The second view best corresponds with the subsequent context.

10. For every beast of the forest is mine, and the cattle upon a thousand hills. The interpretation given by the Chaldee is striking, though not supported: For mine is every beast of the wood, and I have prepared for the just in the garden of delights clean animals, and the wild ox feeding daily on a thousand mountains. Hengstenberg: "If God needed the sacrifices, he would not require to seek them of men, as his whole creation stands at his command." The scope of this verse is the same as that of vv. 11, 12.

11. I know all the fowls of the mountains. I know, I make, govern and feed. At God's bidding they would flock to him from all quarters. Even vultures obey his voice, 1 Kings xvii. 4, 6. Omniscience implies omnipotence and universal providence. And the wild beasts of the field are mine. Calvin: The wild beasts of the field are at my command; Edwards: The wild beasts of the field are at my call; Hengstenberg: And what moves upon the field is known to me. There is nothing but wild imagination in support of the Chaldee: And the cock of the wood, whose feet stand on the earth, and whose head touches heaven, sings before me.

12. If I were hungry, I would not tell thee. Patrick: "If I were hungry, I would not come to acquaint thee with it, that thou mightest provide me food." For the world is mine and the fulness thereof. God's resources are not confined to Judea. They are found all over the earth. The fulness of the world embraces everything here below.

13. Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats? Bulls, see Ps. xxii. 12, rendered strong. It is applied to men, or horses, or angels. But here the sense confines it to the strongest kind of clean animals, fit for sacrifice, and these were bulls. Goats, in v. 9 he goats. Martin: "The fire, which descended from heaven upon the sacrifices, was considered mystically as the mouth of God, which devoured the flesh of the victims; and it was on that account that God had expressly forbidden to consume them by fire obtained elsewhere, because this strange fire, not being that which descended from heaven, could not be regarded mystically as the mouth of God." Perhaps some had become so gross in their notions as to suppose that Jehovah had some physical necessity for food and drink. If so, he here reproves their folly in doubting his spirituality and independence.

14. Offer unto God thanksgiving. Chaldee: Repress vile concupiscence, and before God it shall be counted as the sacrifice of confession. This is a poor conceit. Thanksgiving, also elsewhere praise, thanks, confession, sacrifice of praise. The sense here requires thanksgiving, not thank-offering, which much resembled a sin-offering, Lev. vii. 2-13. We have the same word rendered praise in v. 23. God is not enjoining more bloody but spiritual sacrifices. And pay thy vows unto the Most High. The word rendered vows occurs in the singular and plural about sixty times. In our version it is uniformly rendered. But in a few cases it means a votive offering, Lev. vii. 16; Num. xxix. 39. The law of such offerings is given in Lev. xxii. 18–24. Clarke thinks that the call here is to pay vow-offerings; but a vow might relate to a life of holiness, to some particular act of benevolence, to anything proper to be done by a servant of God, and did not exclusively relate to sacrifices, Gen. xxviii. 20–22; xxxi. 13. Vows are made and paid by pious people under the gospel. They will be a part of worship to the end of the world. In general, vows are engagements to be the Lord's, Ps. lvi. 12; but in particular a vow is a solemn voluntary engagement to do something, which we were not bound to do until we made the promise, see Pr. xx. 25; Ecc. v. 4, 5.

15. And call upon me in the day of trouble: I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me. The rendering of this verse is very excellent in all respects. And is not a mere continuation of the discourse, but closely connects this verse and the preceding. Thanksgiving, paying vows and calling on God are to be united. To call on the Lord sometimes is put for the whole of religious worship. Its specific meaning is best expressed by prayer. Here the prominent idea is that of supplication. All this service is to be hearty, and spiritual. Then with it shall be connected success, I will deliver thee; and also new cause of gratitude: And thou shalt glorify me. Alexander: "Thou shalt have occasion to renew thy praises and thanksgivings for new benefits received."

16. But unto the wicked God saith, What hast thou to do to declare my statutes, or that thou shouldest take my covenant in thy mouth? The wicked, in general any wicked person, or particularly the kind of wicked man just described—a heartless hypocrite. This and following verses find an extended parallel in Rom. ii. 17–24. The Scriptures everywhere insist that pure motives and real sincerity are essential to the right worship of God. In vain does man expect his Maker to accept bulls, lambs and goats, instead of faith, justice, mercy and the love of God. To declare God's statutes is to publish them, teach them to others, either officially or unofficially. To take God's covenant is to converse upon sacred things, profess the true religion, and claim to be of the number of God's people.

17. Seeing thou hatest instruction. Chaldee: When thou hatest the correction of the wise; Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: Thou hast hated my discipline; Calvin: Also thou hatest correction; Edwards: Since thou hatest reproof. The charge against this teacher is that he does not himself do the known will of God. And castedst my words behind thee. This describes contempt towards the clear teachings of God's oracles. All such men made void the law by their myths and glosses.

18. When thou sawest a thief, then thou consentedst with him, and hast been partaker with adulterers. It would be monstrous indeed that so willing and greedy a violator of the 7th and 8th commandments should bear the office of teacher of the decalogue, and publish to others rules of life which in practice he himself utterly rejected. He forgot also the 9th commandment.

19. Thou givest thy mouth to evil, and thy tongue frameth deceit.

20. Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother; thou slanderest thine own mother's son. The first clause of v. 19 describes the general habit of the tongue. The second shows how evil-speaking grows on men. Verse 20 shows that lying and slander finally stop at nothing. They attack even a brother, not only the son of the same father, but also of the same mother. Compare Ps. lxix. 8. The following renderings are striking: Vulgate: Thy mouth hath abounded with wickedness, and thy tongue framed deceits. Horsley: Thy mouth hath been fruitful in mischief, and thy tongue frameth deceit. Thou sittest and speakest against thy brother, against the son of thy mother thou pourest out abuse. Sitting may denote 1, the act of a judge; 2, the place, as in public; 3, the habit of life, Ps. i. 1. The last is best here.

21. These things hast thou done, and I kept silence. Kept silence, as in v. 3. God's long-suffering is terribly perverted. Thou thoughtest that I was altogether such a one as thyself. Instead of counting the long-suffering of God salvation, men infer from it that God is weak, or that he is irresolute in punishing sin. The great mass of ungodly men, and especially false professors, do by their acts declare that in their esteem God is insignificant. Such wickedness must in due time be noticed: But I will reprove thee, and set them in order before thine eyes. Reprove, call to account, the opposite of keeping silence. Judgment may be delayed a long time, but is never indefinitely postponed. At last men's evil deeds are arrayed not only before their Judge, but before themselves. A clear sight of his sins would overwhelm any man with dismay. Calvin: "The Psalmist warns them that ere long they will be dragged into the light, and that those sins which they would have hidden from the eyes of God would be set in all their enormity before their view." That conviction, which God can easily produce, will make any soul miserable.

22. Now consider this, ye that forget God, lest I tear you in pieces, and there be none to deliver. For tear in pieces, Calvin has seize upon you; church of England, pluck you away; Alexander, rend you. The verb expresses destruction by a strong and fierce animal, Gen. xxxvii. 33; xlv. 28; Ps. vii. 2; compared with Hos. v. 14. God's wrath is terrible. Oh that men would consider. To our race it is a reproach that but here and there one is thoughtful. Consider, often so, elsewhere understand, perceive, discern, regard.

23. Whoso offereth praise glorifieth me. Praise, in v. 14 rendered thanksgiving. God is honored when he receives the praise which is his due. And no man gives God his own who does not often give him thanks. Alexander: "It is really a promise that he whose offerings are genuine expressions of thanksgiving shall have cause or occasion to praise God for his mercies." And to him that ordereth his conversation aright will I shew the salvation of God. There are both diversity and difficulty in rendering this clause. Beza and Amesius: Him who regulates his conduct I will cause to enjoy the salvation of God; Edwards: To him that is upright in his way I will show the salvation of God. With these virtually agree Calvin, Ainsworth, church of England, Jebb and others. Conversation, i. e., conduct, life, behaviour, way. The sense is the same whether we read, Will I show salvation, or He shall see salvation. In either case the meaning is, He shall experience salvation. The salvation of God is either a great salvation, so some; or it is a salvation of which God is undeniably the author. Both are true.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. A message from God claims prompt, solemn and universal attention, v. 1. Nothing can be more dangerous than to despise it. It would have been folly in Naaman to slight the saying of the little captive maid that served his wife. David would have acted foolishly had he disregarded the counsel of his friend Jonathan. But the infinitude of God's whole nature makes it madness to slight any call coming from him.

2. It unspeakably concerns all men to know what God has spoken, v. 1. His word is very pure and very weighty. A man may be ignorant of all learning, of all arts, of all philosophy; but if he does not know what God speaks to him, he is undone.

3. Zion is the perfection of beauty, v. 2. "The true visible church, where God's ordinances are set up as he hath appointed, where his word is purely preached, is the most beautiful thing under heaven." The word of the Lord goes forth from Jerusalem, Isa. ii. 3; Mic. iv. 2. The little good that is in the world is by means of the church. Saints keep alive piety on earth, John vii. 38; Ps. lxvii. 1, 2. But for the righteous, sinners would all drop into hell, Matt. xxiv. 22; Mark xiii. 20. He who does not admire the light of the moon, will hardly have his attention arrested by the glories of the sun. He who does not love the church, does not love him who bought the church.

4. Because God's vengeance against wickedness does not instantly break forth and destroy evil doers, they say he is not angry with them, v. 3. But they are sadly mistaken, Ps. vii. 11; Ecc. viii. 11. Strange that reasonable beings should give no earnest heed to the most weighty matters, except as they are forced to think of them by awful visitations.

5. The longer God delays punishment, the more terrible will it be when it comes, v. 3. God waited a hundred and twenty years with the old world; but when the deluge came, it swept all away. Its scenes of horror were more dreadful than imagination has ever conceived.

6. Any reckoning of God with man is solemn, and of all the accounts we shall give to God, the last will be the most so, v. 4. We need not perplex ourselves to know how God will raise the dead. He who called us into being can easily call us to his bar. God spake to men from Eden as a Creator; from Sinai as a Law-giver; from Zion as a Redeemer. In due time he will speak to the congregated universe as a Judge. In that day the greater the blessings and privileges abused, the heavier will be the doom, Lam. ii. 15. Oh that men would listen to the voice of mercy before the day of wrath comes. It is only true Christians who shall "have boldness in the day of judgment," 1 John iv. 17.

7. All the teachings of Scripture respecting righteous men are kind, v. 5. God calls them "my saints," "my sheep," "my friends," "my sons and daughters." He says many kind things of them and to them. He loves to have them near him. He will finally gather them all into his own house.

8. As of old the best covenants were made by sacrifice, so the great covenant, securing life to the soul of a believer, is made by the sacrifice of Christ, of which all others were at best mere types, v. 5.

9. God's justice, though now for a time to blind mortals it seems obscured, shall at last be illustrious. The heavens shall declare it, v. 6. Two things in providence often perplex us. 1. Frequently good and evil seem to come alike to all, Ecc. ix. 2. 2. The righteous are often greatly afflicted, while the wicked prosper. But give God time. Let him to time add eternity, and all will seem to be right, Luke xvi. 25.

10. It is a blessed thing that there can be no mistake in the decisions of the last day. Christ, who shall give the award, knows what is in man, knows all things, John ii. 25; xxi. 17. Infinite knowledge and infinite rectitude alike render a wrong decision impossible, v. 6.

11. It should greatly humble good men to find that as often as divine wisdom pronounces on the character of the visible church, it finds something, often much to censure, v. 7. Compare Rev. ii. 4, 14, 20; iii. 2, 15.

12. To the observance of any ritual, even one divinely prescribed, God has never attached any importance compared with that belonging to true piety, consisting of love and mercy, truth and justice, fidelity and humility, simplicity and godly sincerity, vv. 8-11. Compare 1 Sam. xv. 22; Ecc. v. 1; Mic. vi. 6, 7, 8; Isa. lvi. 1, 2; lxvi. 3; Hos. vi. 6; Matt. ix. 13; xii. 7. Why will men deceive themselves with the opposite belief? Morison: "God will not accept an outward for a spiritual homage, the mere carcass of religion for its living fires on the altar of the heart."

13. As we cannot offer to God anything that is not already his gift to us, how vain is the hope of some that they can do or suffer anything that will deserve heaven at God's hand! vv. 9-12. When we have given God all we have and are, we have simply given him his own. And when we have kept all the commandments, we have merely done our duty, and no more, 1 Chron. xxix. 14; Luke xvii. 10.

14. Those figures of speech (anthropomorphy and anthropopathy), by which we represent God as having the form or the affections of man, are not sinful, for they are used by inspired men. But they are liable to be abused, and so we should guard men against overstraining them, vv. 12, 13. Are our conceptions of God more pure than those of "the carnal Israelites who conceived that a fat sacrifice was as acceptable to God as a fat dinner was to themselves?"

15. Because God is the self-existent Jehovah, he is necessarily an independent being, vv. 10-12; Isa. lxvi. 1, 2. We depend on him for all things; he depends on us for nothing. He was as happy before as since creation showed forth his glory, and sang his praises, Job xxxv. 6-8.

16. We are always deceiving ourselves, when we forget that God's service is spiritual, vv. 14, 15. This was as true, if not so abundantly declared, under former dispensations as now.

17. In all our worship praise ought to be prominent, v. 14. Calvin: "Could we suppose men to come into the world in the full exercise of reason and judgment, their first act of spiritual sacrifice should be that of thanksgiving." If the public worship of the nineteenth century is out of proportion generally, it is probably in allowing the matter of praise too little space. In secret worship has thanksgiving its share?

18. It is not wrong to make vows, v. 14. We should not make them rashly. We should not vow to do any wicked or impossible thing. But we may vow.

19. Under all dispensations prayer has been a duty, v. 15. It is a branch of natural religion. It is often inculcated in the Bible. It is a fit exercise for all times. It is of special propriety in the day of trouble, though he, who prays only when in affliction, has reason to suspect his sincerity, Job xxvii. 10. A sense of want, though there be no special affliction resting on us, is essential to the sincerity of any supplication; and as long as we are in the flesh we have many wants. Anything is good for us, if it leads us to the throne of grace.

20. Prayer is a fit exercise for a sinful and dependent creature, and in its nature it is suited to our case. But the great blessing connected with it is that God hears and answers it, v. 15.

21. Mere profession even of the true religion, though it be decent and to the eye of man consistent, is not only vain but is offensive to God; but when a religious profession does not restrain us from overt wickedness, it is not only hateful to God, but an abomination to all right-minded men, v. 16.

22. This is preëminently so in regard to an unconverted ministry. No character is more odious to God than that of a prating, preaching hypocrite. God speaks of such as with astonishment and abhorrence, v. 16.

23. "Consistency is a jewel;" and the want of it is a blur and a blot, v. 16. A corpse in a state of dissolution is not the less offensive because it may be covered with flowers.

24. One of the surest signs of swift destruction coming on a man is hatred of reproof, of warning, of counsel, of good doctrine and of timely admonition; and when this amounts to a scornful rejection of God's word, then the case is indeed fearful, v. 17.

25. All false professors are upon close examination found to be defective in the duties required by the second table of the law, vv. 18-20. Arnd: "Such a person was Ahab, who could appear so pious, but when Elias rebukes him, he curses and persecutes the prophets to death." "Those, who trust to a righteousness of their own, are too generally wanting in those very qualities to which they attribute such extraordinary effects."

26. Sins of the tongue terribly grow on a man, and when the spirit of slander fairly gets possession of one, it balks at nothing, vv. 19, 20.

27. It is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, v. 21.

28. The real character of God is fundamental in a system of truth. Wrong ideas of him are as mischievous in their effect on man as anything can possibly be, v. 21.

29. We may be sure that our sins will find us out, v. 21. They may seem to be laid quietly away; but we know not the moment when the Lord will cause them to spring upon us and seize us as armed men.

30. Ought not more to be said in the pulpit and in religious writings against the sin of forgetting God? v. 22. It is often mentioned in the Bible. It is a very heinous offence. Henry: "Forgetfulness of God is at the bottom of all the wickedness of the wicked."

31. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, v. 22. What is the full import of tearing in pieces none can know till he enters upon a rueful eternity.

32. In joy and in sorrow, sick and well, at home and abroad, let us abound in praise, v. 23. The circumstances of Paul and Silas in jail, were very distressing, and so they prayed. Many blessings and mercies remained to them, and so they sang praises.

33. But true praise is always connected with a holy life. We must also order our conversation aright, v. 23. Without personal holiness no man shall see the Lord. He, who would be truly holy, must take God's word for his rule of living, God's Son for his Saviour, God's Spirit for his guide, comforter and sanctifier, God's people for his chosen companions, God's glory for the aim and object of his life, God's love as the great animating principle of his conduct.

34. Whatever we do in religion, let it be done as of sincerity, as of God, in the sight of God. This whole Psalm warns us against hypocrisy. If our hearts are cold or lukewarm, let us, in our approaches to the throne of grace, freely so confess. Let us be unaffected in modesty, humility, sorrow for sin, zeal and everything good.

35. This Psalm calls for close self-examination, and it furnishes excellent hints for aiding us in that important duty. It calls special attention to the practical duties of life, and invites us to investigate that subject. Reader, Are you ready for the scrutiny of God?

PSALM LI.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, when Nathan the prophet came unto him, after he had gone in to Bath-sheba.

1 Have mercy upon me, O God, according to thy lovingkindness: according unto the multitude of thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions.

2 Wash me thoroughly from mine iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin.

3 For I acknowledge my transgressions: and my sin is ever before me.

4 Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight: that thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest.

5 Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me.

6 Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward parts: and in the hidden part thou shalt make me to know wisdom.

- 7 Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean: wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow.
 8 Make me to hear joy and gladness; that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice.
 9 Hide thy face from my sins, and blot out all mine iniquities.
 10 Create in me a clean heart, O God; and renew a right spirit within me.
 11 Cast me not away from thy presence; and take not thy Holy Spirit from me.
 12 Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation; and uphold me with thy free Spirit.
 13 Then will I teach transgressors thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto thee.
 14 Deliver me from bloodguiltiness, O God, thou God of my salvation: and my tongue shall sing aloud of thy righteousness.
 15 O Lord, open thou my lips; and my mouth shall shew forth thy praise.
 16 For thou desirest not sacrifice; else would I give it: thou delightest not in burnt offering.
 17 The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise.
 18 Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion: build thou the walls of Jerusalem.
 19 Then shalt thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness, with burnt offering and whole burnt offering: then shall they offer bullocks upon thine altar.

ALL agree that this is a penitential Psalm. The title makes David the author. In this concur all the ancient versions, Luther, Calvin, Diodati, Piscator, Fabritius, Ainsworth, Venema, Amesius, Symson, Edwards, Jebb, Dathe, Patrick, Morison, Henry, Horne, Scott, Hengstenberg, Tholuck and Alexander. One is surprised to find Kennicott, Horsley, Mudge, Clarke, Fry, De Wette and Hitzig denying the Davidic authorship, and on grounds wholly insufficient. The historic occasion of this ode is found in 2 Sam. xi. xii. This Psalm and the xxxii. refer to the same painful matters. In that David tells of his misery before repentance, and of his happiness after confession. In this, he states more fully his exercises under the influence of godly sorrow. On the first part of the title, see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. After he had gone in to Bathsheba embraces the time of David's avowed marriage with her, Judges xv. 1. Bathsheba [or Bathshuah] was the daughter of Eliam, or of Ammiel, see 2 Sam. xi. 3; 1 Chron. iii. 5. Her husband Uriah, the Hittite, held the rank of captain, and was a faithful subject and soldier. His death was a great wrong. Hengstenberg: "We swim in mid-air so long as we do not perceive the reference to the discourse of Nathan." In gifts and in station, Nathan was David's inferior. But he was the right man to bring his king to repentance.

This Psalm is often and fitly called THE SINNER'S GUIDE. In some of its versions, it often helps the returning sinner. Athanasius recommends to some Christians, to whom he was writing, to repeat it when they awake at night. All evangelical churches are familiar with it. Luther: "There is no other Psalm which is oftener sung or prayed in the church." Scott and others date it B. C. 1034. In it we have these names of the Most High, Eloah God, Elohim God, and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. xviii. 31; iii. 2; ii. 4. This is the first Psalm in which we have the word Spirit, used in application to the Holy Ghost.

1. Have mercy upon me, O God. Mercy, equivalent to undeserved favor. It always implies pity to the miserable; commonly, grace to the guilty. Here both ideas are embraced, see Judges xxi. 22; Job xix. 21; Ps. xli. 4; cxix. 29; Isa. xxxiii. 2. Without mercy in God, we should all be undone. "His power would destroy us, his wisdom confound us, his justice condemn us, his majesty affright us, but by his mercy all these turn to our good." Pool paraphrases this clause: "Pity, and help, and answer me, in the desires I am now spreading before thee;" Clarke: "Without mercy I am totally, finally ruined and undone." He wanted mercy. According to thy lovingkindness. It was all to be found in God's nature. Lovingkindness, elsewhere mercy, kindness, merciful kindness. He asks for a large measure of grace: According unto the multitude of thy tender mercies, blot out my transgressions.

Multitude, abundance, plenty, greatness. Tender mercies, one word, compassions, bowels, also mercies. Alexander: "It is a term expressive of the warmest and tenderest affections." Some fitly note a gradation of increasing strength in the words mercy, lovingkindness, and tender mercies. Blot out, cancel, obliterate as one did when he turned the smooth end of his writing instrument and passed it over the tablet of wax, on which an account was charged. Transgressions, plural, sins, trespasses. Discontent, ingratitude, covetousness, hardness of heart, selfishness, pride, worldliness, unbelief, adultery and murder were all chargeable to David in the matter of Uriah. A clear sight of one sin is sure to show us others, John iv. 29.

2. Wash me thoroughly from my iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin. Wash thoroughly, literally, multiply to wash, as in Isa. lv. 7, abundantly pardon is multiply to pardon; equivalent to "Wash me again and again." Iniquity, wrong, injury, unrighteousness, sometimes perverseness or wickedness. Sin, commonly so rendered; sometimes, sin-offering. Cleanse, to make clean or to pronounce clean. Both these verbs refer rather to justification than to sanctification, though both ideas must be retained. Pardon and purification are never separated. Either by itself would not satisfy a good man. Nathan had said, "The Lord hath put away thy sin; that thou shalt not die," 2 Sam. xii. 13. This did not quiet his mind. Adultery and murder were both punishable with death. There was no magistrate higher in office than David, and so there was no man authorized to put him to death. Not even the Sanhedrim could arraign and punish kings, although the Talmudists say they could. But they never did. God himself by a direct judgment would have inflicted the penalty had he not graciously remitted the just sentence of temporal death. No doubt the pardon included the remission of the penalty of eternal death; for it would have been a small matter to have had his life spared, if his soul were damned. How then does David still pray for pardon? Some have thought he was asking not for judicial pardon, but for fatherly forgiveness. No doubt he did desire God to afford him his paternal smiles and the tokens of his love. But a mere assertion of our free pardon made by one of God's ministers however high in office and gifts, never satisfies a penitent soul. Calvin: "Although God, through the promise of forgiveness, freely invites us to peace, we are still to lay to heart our guilt, that deeper pain may penetrate our hearts. Hence it comes to pass, that with the small measure of our faith, we cannot at once take in the entire fulness of the divine grace, which has been brought unto us." Those, whom God forgives, do not readily forgive themselves; and a true hope of pardon desires assurance of that blessing. It is one thing to have a promise. It is another thing to be able to appropriate that promise.

3. For I acknowledge my transgressions. Transgressions, the same word as in v. 1. For acknowledge the Septuagint, Vulgate, Calvin, Venema, Alexander and others read know; Syriac, have known; but a declaration that we know our trespasses is an acknowledgment of them. The verb however is in the future, will know, thus declaring that he expected to retain a deep sense of his sin, as long as he should live. And my sin is ever before me. If the verb supplied here shall follow the tense of the parallel clause, it would be, my sin shall ever be before me, q. d., I have now and I expect always to have a painful sense of my miserable misconduct. I am justly condemned. Luther: "That little word for must be so understood as not to imply that his sins must be forgiven him because he had confessed them; for sin is always sin, and deserving of punishment, whether it is confessed or not; still confession of sin is of importance on this account that God will be gracious to no one, but to those who confess their sin; while to those who do not confess their sin, he will show no favor;" see on Ps. xxxii. 3-5.

4. Against thee, thee only, have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight. This clause is much urged against the Davidic authorship of this Psalm. It is said that David's sins were against Bathsheba, Uriah and those who perished with him; and that he could not truly say that he had sinned against God only. Clarke: His sins were "public, grievous, and against society at large, as well as against the peace, honor, comfort, and life of an innocent, brave and patriotic man." This is the objection. Sufficient answers can be given. 1. God alone was above David in the kingdom. To God alone was he legally responsible for his acts. 2. All sin is against God in this sense that it is his law that is broken, his authority that is despised, his government that is set at naught. Bishop Hall: "It is thy prohibition, O God, that can make a sin. I have sinned against men, but it is thy law that I have violated, in that is my offence." We never see sin aright until we see it as against God. Pharaoh and Balaam, Saul and Judas each said, I have sinned, Ex. ix. 27; Num. xxii. 34; 1 Sam. xv. 30; Matt. xxvii. 4; but the returning prodigal said: I have sinned against heaven and before thee; and David: Against thee, thee only have I sinned. 3. If David sinned not "against God only" in an absolute sense, yet comparatively his offence was against God only. That, which made his sin peculiarly and preëminently heinous, and grievous, and burdensome to his conscience, was that it offended God, brought dishonor on religion, and exhibited against the Most High the vilest ingratitude. So that it is not necessary to resort to the turn of thought given by the Chaldee: Before thee only have I sinned, though in a sense that was true also, "Thou didst it secretly," 2 Sam. xii. 12. David had so sinned, and so saw his sin that he felt it to be just in God to pass that heavy sentence in 2 Sam. xii. 10-14. Yea more: That thou mightest be justified when thou speakest, and be clear when thou judgest. God's throne would have been spotless in pronouncing the sentence of everlasting banishment from his presence. All men ought to acknowledge that their damnation would be just. All penitent men do so confess. The quotation of the Septuagint version of this verse, found in Rom. iii. 4, if rightly translated, does not give a sense materially different from that which we have gathered here. Speaking and judging are parallel terms, signifying the pronouncing of a sentence. Clear, might be rendered clean, or quit, i. e., justified or victorious in the contest with David, overcome being the word used in Rom. iii. 4.

5. Behold, I was shapen in iniquity; and in sin did my mother conceive me. That the doctrine of original and universal depravity was taught from the first is clear from Gen. v. 3; vi. 5; viii. 21; Job xiv. 4; xv. 14; xxv. 4. That David embraced it is clear from his writings, v. 5; Ps. lviii. 3. David is not excusing but condemning himself. There is no blot on the character of his father Jesse. By the Holy Ghost he twice informs us of the piety of his mother, Ps. lxxxvi. 16; cxvi. 16. To say that David is here merely publishing the sins of one or both of his parents is trifling with sacred things. Even the Council of Trent, Bellarmine and Bossuet maintain the doctrine of hereditary depravity. The doctrine is taught in the symbols of all the purest churches in the world, and by all the best commentators. Commonly all, who hold the orthodox doctrine on this subject, cite this verse in proof. It is very pertinent. David is humbling himself and repenting before God. In doing so, he renounces all merit, confesses his actual sins, and then traces them up to their fruitful source, "birth-sin," as the church of England styles it. Calvin: "David here refers to original sin with the view of aggravating his guilt, acknowledging that he had not contracted this or that sin for the first time lately, but had been born into the world with the seed of every iniquity."

6. Behold, thou desirest truth in the inward parts. Desirest, hast desired, hast required. God has always done so, and does so still. Truth, as in Ps. xv. 2. Inward parts; Chaldee, reins; Edwards, inmost parts; not the word rendered reins in Ps. vii. 9; but parts overspread as with fat. And in the hidden part thou shalt make me to know wisdom. In Hebrew the verb is in the future. It is best so rendered, as expressive of hope. Some read, Do thou teach. This also gives a good sense and is admissible. Wisdom, equivalent to true and intelligent piety, variously expressed in the Bible, as understanding, a good understanding.

7. Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean. Purge, in the future, shalt purge; but the common version is good. Chaldee: Thou wilt sprinkle me as the priest, which sprinkleth the unclean with the purifying waters, with hyssop, with the ashes of an heifer, and I shall be clean. Hyssop, a plant included in the studies of Solomon, 1 Kings iv. 33; the same word in Hebrew, Greek, Latin and English. It was used in sprinkling the blood of the passover lamb, Ex. xii. 22; it was also used in the ceremony of admitting the healed leper to the privileges of the congregation, Lev. xiv. 4, 6, 49, 51, 52; also in making the waters of purification, Num. xix. 6, 18. It is not certain to which of the above ceremonial uses David refers in this verse. He may have them all in view. But there is no objection to the supposition that he distinctly had before his mind the cleansing of the leper, i. e., the pronouncing of him clean. This is probable, not only from the fitness of the thing itself, but also from the allusion to this ceremony in the word cleanse in Lev. xiv. 2. Morrison: "The word, rendered purge me, should be translated, Do thou purge me from sin." Clarke has it: "Thou shalt make a sin-offering for me." The law had a shadow of good things to come, and men taught of God understood much of its great import even before Christ came. Wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow. Wash, as in v. 2. Whiter than snow. We have the same figure in Isa. i. 18. Some cite 1 Cor. vi. 11 as parallel.

8. Make me to hear joy and gladness; that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice. A broken bone gives great and constant pain. For a moment the mind may be diverted from it, or sleep may supervene and a man may forget his pain; but as soon as one is fully awake, or his mind released from that which had called it away, it reverts to the old pain. Where many bones are broken the condition is truly deplorable. David says he knows neither joy nor gladness, nor shall he till God shall undertake for him. Calvin and Symson think the use of the word hear points to the comfort which David sought from hearing the word of God.

9. Hide thy face from my sins. When we wish no longer to think of an object, we avert our faces. So David desires that God would no longer behold his sins. To hide the face is to refuse to see, equivalent to justify, Num. xxiii. 21. And blot out all mine iniquities. Blot out, see on v. 1. Iniquities, the plural of the same word in v. 2. He asks not merely for the remission of one sin, of a few sins, of many sins, but of all sins. One unpardoned sin is fatal to peace and salvation. The verbs of this verse are in the imperative.

10. Create in me a clean heart, O God. Create, as in Gen. i. 1. Its use shows that David was not asking to have his nature improved, but renewed; not amended, but created anew. Much of the preceding part of the Psalm contains prayer for remission of sins. This verse brings out clearly what had been implied in vv. 2, 7, viz., his desire for sanctification, a thorough renovation of nature. We cannot find words better suited to express a desire after holiness. The sense of total want, and total dependence, accompanied by a reliance on God alone for grace and purification, is well expressed. The work of renewal must be inward, in the heart; it must be thorough, amounting to a creation. It is mighty. If there is any greater exercise of power than that which brought all things out of nothing, it is that which brings a clean thing out of an unclean, or makes a saint out of a sinner. And renew a right spirit within me. Spirit, the word commonly so rendered. Right, elsewhere fixed, established, ready, perfect. Mudge has firmly stayed; Venema and Ainsworth, firm;

Trench and Skinner, steadfast. Within me, literally in the midst of me; Chaldee, in my innermost parts.

11. Cast me not away from thy presence. He admits that such banishment from God would be just. The loss of the light of God's countenance, and of comfortable communion with him is truly dreadful. The apprehension of so dreadful an evil fills the renewed soul with the deepest sadness. No prayers are more fervent than those offered by good men against such a doom. And take not thy Holy Spirit from me. No name of the third person of the Trinity is so often found in Scripture as that of the Holy Spirit, or Spirit of holiness. He is a Spirit. He is holy in his nature, and in his works. He is the author of holy Scripture and of all holiness in the heart of man. If he leaves us we are undone. All our offerings without the Holy Ghost are an offence to God. All our efforts to reach the haven of eternal rest without the heavenly Sanctifier and Comforter are unavailing. No mental and moral culture secures the growth of right principles and affections without his efficiency. For no blessing is a good man more earnest in supplication than for the indwelling of the Holy Ghost.

12. Restore unto me the joy of thy salvation. There are real joys in salvation. He who has once experienced them does not lightly esteem them, or easily forget them. Yet a good man may by sin lose much of the comforts of religion. When he does so, and is made sensible of it, he is very miserable until they are restored. And uphold me with thy free Spirit. Syriac: And thy glorious Spirit shall sustain me; Arabic: And with a powerful spirit establish me; Vulgate and Doway: And strengthen me with a perfect spirit; Venema: And thy free Spirit shall sustain me; Dimock: Let a free spirit sustain me; i. e., Let me not be enslaved, as I have been, by my sinful passions; Jebb: And with the spirit of freedom uphold me; Boothroyd: And let a free spirit sustain me; Hengstenberg: And with a joyful spirit do thou support me. In this Psalm, Spirit is used in application to David's temper and to the third person of the Trinity. If it here refers to the Holy Spirit, it is very plain, gives a good sense, and agrees with the analogy of faith. This is the view of many. Fry renders it: And let thy bountiful Spirit support me. He thinks bountiful might be "spontaneously flowing," and supposes it has its explanation in John iv. 14; vii. 38. The best commentators generally regard the Spirit of God as here spoken of. In Rom. viii. 2, 15; 2 Cor. iii. 17; Gal. iv. 6, 7, we get light as to the freedom of the Spirit. In our version free is elsewhere willing, liberal; in the plural, princes, Ps. xlvii. 9. If any choose to understand free of David's temper, the sense is not so good, still a king may well pray for a liberal and princely spirit.

13. Then will I teach transgressors thy ways; and sinners shall be converted unto thee. Then is supplied the better to preserve the connection. We must have God's Spirit, and be sustained by the joys of religion, if we would be apt, diligent and successful in leading others to repentance. Thy ways, that is, thy will, law and gospel, revealed for our salvation, thy way of holiness, thy way of saving sinners, thy way of recovering backsliders.

14. Deliver me from blood guiltiness, O God, thou God of my salvation. Deliver, generally so rendered; see on Ps. vii. 1; xxii. 20. Blood guiltiness, literally bloods; see on Ps. v. 6. The prayer is for deliverance from the guilt of innocent blood already shed, and preservation from shedding innocent blood hereafter. In his prayer he looks to God alone, even the God who had saved him hitherto, and had promised to save him hereafter. And my tongue shall sing aloud of thy righteousness. Great mercies call for great songs. Sing aloud, the word used to express the joy of angels at creation, Job xxxviii. 7; often as here, also shout, shout for joy, rejoice, cry out. Calvin: Sing aloud with joy; Hengstenberg, Joyfully extol; Alexander, Celebrate. It always expresses vehemence, and if of pleasant emotions, exultation. Thy righteousness, "not that of the law," says Diodati, "which condemneth irremissibly; but that of the gospel, which maintains the promises of grace, and according to them doth grant pardon, Rom. iii. 26." Or it refers, some think, to his readiness always to proclaim God's righteousness in all he had threatened against David and his family.

15. O Lord, open thou my lips, "which are shut with shame, and grief, and horror." Nothing so effectually closes the mouth as a just sense of our sins, Matt. xxii. 12; Rom. iii. 18. The future form of the Hebrew verb expresses hopeful expectation. And my lips shall shew forth thy praise. Luther: "If we have through faith in Christ received the righteousness and grace of God, we can do no greater work than speak and declare the truth of Christ." A soul released from guilt, and wrath, and shame, cannot but publish in some fit way the goodness of God displayed towards it. Shew forth, elsewhere tell, utter, report, declare. Compare Ps. i. 14, 23.

16. For thou desirest not sacrifice; else I would give it: thou delightest not in burnt offering. Besides the general doctrine taught in Ps. i. that sacrifices cannot put away sin from the soul, and are of no value compared with the spiritual duties of religion; it is here also stated that for such crimes as David had been guilty of no sacrifice was appointed in the law. God ordained no bleeding victims for murder, or adultery, or for any of the sins of heart that led to these. In such a case he did not desire, would not accept a burnt offering.

17. The sacrifices of God are a broken spirit: a broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise. The sacrifices of God, great sacrifices; as the trees of God are the great trees, and the river of God, the great river. Sacrifices, in the plural, q. d., A broken spirit is worth more than all other sacrifices. The phrase also includes the idea that they are such as God has appointed, and such as will please him. Broken, the same in both cases in this verse. See on Ps. xxxiv. 18. Contrite; in v. 8, another form of the word is rendered hast broken; in Ps. xxxviii. 8, sore broken. The prominent idea seems to be bruised or crushed. That, which breaks the heart, is God's word, Jer. xxiii. 29. There is no better rendering than contrite, which primarily signifies broken small as by braying. Wilt not despise, by a common figure of speech much more is implied than is said. It means that a broken and contrite heart is a delight to God. See Ps. xxxiv. 18; cii. 17; cxlvii. 3; Isa. lvii. 15; lxi. 1; lxvi. 1, 2; Luke vii. 36-50. On this blessed truth the mind of David finds repose.

18. Do good in thy good pleasure unto Zion. The church should pray for kings, 1 Tim. ii. 1, 2; but kings should pray for the church, according to David's example. "No man can truly pray for himself, unless he pray for the church also." "Prayer hath more power than armor." Gill thinks that the good pleasure of God here mentioned may refer either to the time of his good pleasure, the Gospel dispensation, or to the cause and source of God's blessings to the church, viz., his sovereign good will. Zion is the church. Build thou the walls of Jerusalem. Jerusalem is a name for the church, parallel to Zion. It is needless to defend the Davidic authorship of this Psalm from the alleged inconsistency of David praying that the walls of the holy city might be built. By his sin he had weakened the cause of religion. He asks God to repair the breaches which his own misconduct had made. Scott: "David feared lest his guilt should render him as an Achan in the congregation of Israel; and therefore he concluded his penitential prayer, with entreating God to protect and prosper Zion." He had given great occasion to the enemy to speak reproachfully; had done much damage to religion, and had brought a curse on his own house, 2 Sam. xii. 10-14. While acknowledging the justice of God's severity against himself and his family, he prays that the holy city may be protected and made strong, and especially that the church may not be weakened by his fall. God is answering his prayer to this day. That this Psalm was not written when by exile it was impossible to offer sacrifices is evident from v. 16, where David says he would make such offering, not if it were possible, but if God desired it.

19. Then shalt thou be pleased with the sacrifices of righteousness, with burnt offering and whole burnt offering. The meaning is that when God shall build up Jerusalem, and cause true religion to flourish, then all its outward expressions, divinely appointed, will be pleasing to him, because they will be the fruit of piety and not a substitute for it; they will be sincere, hearty and pure, not formal and so offensive to God. The sacrifices then will be those of righteousness, (see on Ps. v. 4) not of deceit, and hypocrisy; such as prayer, praise, penitence, doing good to the poor and afflicted, as well as burnt offering, or burnt sacrifice. Whole burnt offering is the translation of "a single Hebrew word, meaning a sacrifice entirely consumed upon the altar." Alexander: "It does not describe something wholly distinct from the burnt-offering, but the burnt-offering itself considered as a complete and unreserved oblation. See 1 Sam. vii. 9." See also Rom. xii. 1. Then shall they offer bullocks upon thine altar. Bullocks were the largest and most costly sacrifices. When religion flourishes in the hearts of God's people, they do not meanly count the cost of any service they render to him.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Nathan's fearlessness and faithfulness in reproving sin in David instructs all, who are called to the like painful duty, that they should go straight forward, and trust in God. Who knows but that the faithful reprovcr may save a soul from death, and hide a multitude of sins? Our inferior gifts and station cannot justify us in suffering sin upon our brother, though he be our monarch. And let not great men despise their humble friends, who tell them of their sins.

2. Such fidelity is made specially necessary by the amazing stupidity of conscience that we observe even in good men, when they have sadly departed from God. How could David so long remain quiet? Sin awfully blinds the mind and hardens the heart. To be at ease, to cry peace, to have no fears does not prove man innocent.

3. When a sin, though secretly committed at last becomes public, our confession of it and our sorrow for it should not be merely expressed to one or two, but before all. The king is no exception.

4. This Psalm gives us much insight into the nature of sin. It is a missing of the mark. It is transgression. It is rebellion. It is iniquity. It is evil, and only evil. It covers us with guilt and shame and filthiness. It is folly, the opposite of wisdom. It is a lie, the opposite of truth. It unmans a man. Left to itself it crushes him who indulges it. It covers the soul with a pall of the deepest sadness. It separates between God and his creature. One sin naturally leads to another. It shuts the mouth. It opens hell. It debases the best mental gifts. Like a foul disease it is hereditary, loathsome and a reproach; it banishes from the best society, even that of heaven, it makes men dull and heavy, it cannot be cured by any finite power or human means. Even a heathen once said: "If I knew that the gods would pardon me, and men would not see me, yet I would not sin, because of the vileness of sin." And God hates it. To him it is "horrible," "abominable." Nothing worse does inspiration say of sin than that it is "exceeding sinful." If we think lightly of sin, we shall not be much concerned to be rid of its guilt or defilement, nor be very watchful against its assaults, nor very thankful for supposed deliverance from its curse or its power.

5. This Psalm also gives us refreshing views of God's grace. It tells us of mercy, of mercy to a great sinner, of loving-kindness, of the multitude of God's tender mercies, of his blotting out transgressions, of his thoroughly washing a man that confessed he was very vile. These are the very mercies sinners need, worth more than all temporal good things. They are the foundation of a blissful eternity. Well is it that our God is merciful, long-suffering, slow to anger, and ready to forgive. With him mercy is original, infinite, everlasting. As we sin daily, we must daily pray, Forgive us our debts. It is natural for poor afflicted souls to cry for mercy, and it is a glorious truth that God's mercy endureth forever. When we remember to how many sinners God shows mercy, how heinous and numerous their sins are, and how rich are the undeserved blessings he bestows on them, surely we may say, his mercy is great. All this mercy is free, without money, without price, without merit on the part of men. It is wondrously rich and efficacious.

6. Without the pardon of sin all other things would not be blessings to us. It is the first thing David seeks, v. 1. He asks for it over and over again, vv. 7, 9. In Ps. ciii. it is the first mercy catalogued. Sinners need nothing more than pardon. Why are not all men crying for pardon?

7. In this Psalm as often in other Scriptures justification and sanctification are not confounded, but united, vv. 1, 2, 6-17. Whose sins are blotted out, he is also washed and made clean. Whose sins are purged with hyssop sprinkling the blood of the Lamb of God, he has a clean heart and a right spirit put within him. It is the error of some that they seek knowledge but not holiness, hope of pardon and acceptance, but not the image and spirit of Christ.

8. We do but deceive and torment ourselves when we refuse to confess to God our sins whatever they may be, v. 3. If God should pardon and accept us while we refuse to acknowledge our transgressions, we should be proud in proportion to our assurance of salvation. God's plan is to humble us, so as to make it every way safe to receive us into his favor. Scott: "While sinners conceal or palliate their sins, they are out of the way of mercy: but when they humbly and ingenuously plead guilty, and unreservedly confess their crimes, they may even plead that confession as a reason why they should be spared: for this yields the point in contest; namely, that the Lord might justly punish, and that salvation must be all of grace."

9. Real and genuine conviction of sin is not transient. "My sin is ever before me," v. 3.

10. The worst thing in every sin is that it is against God, v. 4. When just human laws are broken, the divine law is much more violated. All sin is against him, who is infinite, eternal and unchangeable in his being, wisdom, power, holiness, justice, goodness and truth.

11. The doctrine of original sin is both true and practical. It is taught in the holy Scriptures. It has its place in a genuine religious experience, v. 5. We must maintain it, however it may be derided and reviled. Luther: "In this Psalm we have it clearly expressed, that sin is a great and innate evil, and an awful depravation and corruption of nature, in all the powers both of soul and body." Calvin: "David confesses that he brought nothing but sin with him into the world, and that his nature was entirely depraved." Horne: "A creature begotten by a sinner, and formed in the womb of a sinner cannot be without that taint, which is hereditary to every son and daughter of Adam and Eve." Hengstenberg: "That Adam's fall is the fall of the human family is implied in the punishment, which affects not the individual, but the entire race." Symson: "What is the reason that a young fox newly whelped doth not slay a lamb? Is it not because it lacketh strength, and is not come to that maturity to execute its inclination, which is naturally cruel? So are infants naturally inclined to sin; and therefore so soon as they can think anything, speak or do anything, it is evil, as daily experience teacheth."

12. It is vain to attempt to impose upon God by a maintenance of decent appearances, v. 6. God's law will relax nothing on account of our sinfulness. There is no innocent way of becoming or continuing vile and hypocritical. It is wicked to be a sinner by nature or practice. We may speak of doing as well as we can, and of being sincere; but mere natural sincerity in God's service, without a change of nature, is heartless hypocrisy.

13. Prayer should have hope in it, v. 6. Petitions offered in despair are desperate folly. If we dare not hope that God will hear us, he will not hear us. If we would be saved by his mercy, we must honor him with our confidence.

14. True wisdom is from above. If we ever attain it, it must be by God making us to know it, v. 6. Symson: "This age hath heard many lessons, and God hath manifested his whole will unto them; but because they obey them not, their knowledge shall augment their pains. God must be our great Doctor and Teacher. We must be Theodoctai, taught of God. Neither nature, learning, experience, practice, nor age can teach us wisdom," Jas. i. 5, 6.

15. As under the law there was no remission without blood, so neither is there under the Gospel; only the blood sprinkled with the bunch of hyssop was that of a beast or bird, whereas we are cleansed only by the blood of Jesus, v. 7. The type admitted the worshipper to a place in the public congregation. The antitype admits the worshipper into the favor of God, and finally into heaven itself. The blood of a lamb brought ceremonial purification; much more has the blood of Jesus all-sufficient efficacy, Heb. ix. 13, 14.

16. Salvation by Christ is perfect in all respects. The vile, guilty, polluted soul, on embracing Christ, and being washed in his blood, and renewed by his Spirit, is made whiter than snow, v. 7.

17. If a truly awakened and convinced sinner ever finds joy and gladness, it must be by the cross and Spirit of Christ, as we are made acquainted with them by God himself, v. 8. Compare also vv. 7, 10, 11, 12.

18. Well may a real child of God hope and pray for joy and gladness, v. 8. Some commentators think that the sad fall, which caused David to write this Psalm, had a chastening effect on him all the latter part of his life, and caused a tincture of sadness to appear in his subsequent compositions; yet there is abundant proof that if he was sorrowful, he also rejoiced. Symson: "As a Christian is the most sorrowful man in the world, so there is none more glad than he. For the cause of his joy is greatest: in respect his misery was greatest, his delivery greatest, therefore his joy greatest: from death and hell is he freed, to life in heaven is he brought. What can make men more glad than this, if we believe?"

19. Genuine conviction of sin is not slight, v. 8. It gives pains like to broken bones. Tholuck: "The point which every sinner must reach, who would realize the forgiveness of his sins, is that he feels himself condemned by his conscience without being accused of men, and that he cannot but acknowledge the justice of the condemning sentence of God." Arnd: "What these bones broken are, no one can tell, but he who feels, in great temptations, the wrath of God, the curse of the law, the sting of death which is sin, and the power of sin which is the law. Then one experiences what the office and strength of the law is."

20. Because that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and only that which is born of the Spirit is spirit, therefore regeneration, called also a resurrection, a translation, a passing from death unto life, a new creation, and in v. 10 a creation, is the only hope of fallen man. I greatly marvel at the mercy of this great change: but I have long since ceased to marvel at its necessity. How else can the love of sin be cured? How else can the love of God be shed abroad within us?

21. He, who rests satisfied with a fitful religion, and has no stability of character, does but deceive himself. A right spirit is a fixed spirit, v. 10.

22. It is an amazing mercy not to be forsaken of God, and we should earnestly pray against a doom so dreadful, v. 11. His favor is life and his loving-kindness is better than life. Forsaken by him, nothing goes right. Horne: "Rejection from the presence and desertion by the Spirit of God is the most deplorable and irremediable effect of sin; but it is one, that in general perhaps is the least considered and regarded of all others."

23. Whoever has felt the joy of God's salvation knows by experience that it is both real and unspeakable. God alone can give it at the first, and God alone can restore it when lost, v. 12.

24. Let not humble souls be cast down with overmuch sorrow, because their joys do not always abound. Life is a checker work. Summer and winter alternate. We all have our ups and downs. After Paul's abundant revelations came the thorn in the flesh, the messenger of Satan. "After a Christian hath mourned he will rejoice. He, who never sorrowed for sin, will never rejoice for grace. He that never grieved for the affliction of Joseph, will never rejoice for the consolation of Israel."

25. Let us not be high-minded, but fear. The whole of life is a test of the strength of our principles. Some seasons are peculiarly so. David, Samson and Peter were all strong in the Lord, stronger perhaps than thou art, gentle reader; but being left to themselves, how they fell and lost their comforts. "I never saw any who presumed above others of their own strength, but they have proved the weakest soldiers, who by Thrasonical confidence in their wisdom, holiness, constancy, and other of their virtues, bragged above their neighbors, yea, contemned them, but in the end they prove cowards presuming in pride, and falling with shame."

26. True penitents honestly promise and engage to render obedience and service, as God shall help them and fit them to do so, v. 13. When Peter should be converted, he was to strengthen his brethren, Luke xxii. 32.

27. Clear and remarkable conversions, especially of great sinners, are in many ways well suited to bring about other conversions, v. 13. Compare Matt. xxi. 32; 1 Tim. i. 16.

28. As "there is no enemy like an offended conscience, no anguish like self-reproach, no war so fierce as that which a man wages with himself," so of all the burdens arising from crimes against man, none seems to be so intolerable as that from blood-guiltiness, v. 14. Juvenal says: "Seldom do tyrants die an unbloody death." Even when they are not killed by violence, conscience kills them, as in the case of Charles IX. of France, when by its horrors it drove the blood through his skin.

29. Pardoned sinners should both engage and endeavor to proclaim the sovereign mercy of God, and with the loudest praises, v. 14. Henry: "Penitents should be preachers;" Luther: "If we have, through faith in Christ, received the righteousness and grace of God, we can do no greater work than speak and declare the truth of Christ;" Symson: "There shall be a natural song, which we shall sing forever, even the song of Moses the servant of God. Let us therefore begin on earth and learn our gamut here." Let us specially sing of him, who is the Lord our righteousness, and who is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, if we confess and forsake them.

30. The dreadful state of a convicted and unpardoned sinner is well set forth by the sealed lips of David in v. 15. Suppose God should fully show a man his sins and all their aggravations, and then leave him in that state forever, would it not be of itself hell?

31. Dickson: "Howsoever proud spirits think that they can do anything they please in God's service, yet an humbled soul under exercise knoweth that it is God who giveth both to will and to do of his good pleasure; such a man knoweth that the habit of grace is a gift, and the bringing of the habit into exercise is another gift; he knoweth that when one hath gotten grace to will to praise God, he must have grace to put this will to act effectually," v. 15.

32. We should sincerely profess our willingness to do or suffer anything in our power, if it be to the glory of God, and according to his will, v. 16.

33. No man can prove that God is better pleased with innocence in an angel than he is with penitence in a sinner, v. 17.

34. In joy and in sorrow, repenting or rejoicing, in public and in private, let us pray for Zion, v. 18. She is dear to God. She is dear to his saints.

35. When true religion flourishes, and Zion is a praise among men, then God is pleased with all the appointed services of his house, v. 19. They may be plain and simple, they may be neither costly nor showy; but Jehovah smiles upon them, and blesses them.

36. Let us always give God the best of everything, v. 19.

37. The whole Psalm calls God's people to give the most earnest heed to the things of religion, lest at any time they should let them slip. "The best of men need to be warned against the worst of sins."

38. If you would know the nature of true repentance, study this Psalm. It is full of wisdom and sound doctrine.

39. Will not the impenitent reader be persuaded to follow the example of David, and cry for mercy? Let him come to God humbly and penitently, casting himself at the feet of sovereign mercy. O dying man! confess your guilt, bewail your transgressions, forsake your sins, beg for the application of the blood of Christ! God is merciful. You need no more mercy than he is fully willing to bestow. If your faults are many, he will give you double for all your sins. He will abundantly pardon. His mercy reaches to the heavens. He never cast away any that came to him through Christ Jesus.

PSALM LII.

To the chief Musician, Maschil, A Psalm of David, when Doeg the Edomite came and told Saul, and said unto him, David is come to the house of Ahimelech.

1 Why boastest thou thyself in mischief, O mighty man? the goodness of God endureth continually.

2 Thy tongue deviseth mischiefs; like a sharp razor, working deceitfully.

3 Thou lovest evil more than good; and lying rather than to speak righteousness. Selah.

4 Thou lovest all devouring words, O thou deceitful tongue.

5 God shall likewise destroy thee for ever, he shall take thee away, and pluck thee out of thy dwellingplace, and root thee out of the land of the living. Selah.

6 The righteous also shall see, and fear, and shall laugh at him:

7 Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength; but trusted in the abundance of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness.

8 But I am like a green olive tree in the house of God: I trust in the mercy of God for ever and ever.

9 I will praise thee for ever, because thou hast done it: and I will wait on thy name; for it is good before thy saints.

ON the first three clauses of the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xi. xxxii. The rest of the title refers to a piece of history fully recorded in 1 Sam. xxi. 1-9; xxii. 6-23. The common opinion is that throughout the Psalm David has Doeg in his mind. But some think that Edomite is too inconsiderable a person, and so they make Saul the prominent character in the Psalm. But in the cruel affair of slaying the priests and all the inhabitants of a town, none can tell whether Doeg or Saul was the most atrocious offender. Walford: "If we are confounded by the savage ferocity of a prince who could order the execution of eighty-five persons of most venerable station for a crime which existed alone in his disturbed imagination, we shall feel disposed to execrate the ruthless villain who could imbrue his hands in the blood of so many innocent victims; and we shall be ready to draw the conclusion, that both Saul and Doeg were prompted to this deed of atrocious cruelty, not merely by their hatred of David, but by a malevolence, almost without a parallel, against the ministers of religion; and which rendered conspicuous their contempt and hatred of God himself." So far as the baseness of their conduct is considered, the Psalm might have chief reference to either Saul or Doeg. Nor can we think of the wickedness of one of these evil men in this matter without at the same time seeing that like thoughts would suit the other. Still the common view is perhaps the best, viz., that David speaks particularly of Doeg in this Psalm. The narrative in 1 Samuel certainly so inclines the reader. Clarke: "All the versions agree in this title except the Syriac, which speaks of it as a Psalm directed against vice in general, with a prediction of the destruction of evil." There is no doubt that David wrote it. Clarke dates it B. C. 1062; Scott, B. C. 1061. The names of the Most High here found are El God and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. v. 4; iii. 2. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Why boastest thou thyself in mischief, O mighty man? Boatest, in the future, why wilt thou boast? Mischief; Syriac, malice; Ainsworth, Jebb, Fry and Alexander, evil. For mighty man, church of England has tyrant. After his horrid butchery, Doeg spoke and acted as though he had done a brave thing. No other man in Saul's camp dared to perpetrate the atrocity. Diodati thus paraphrases: "Why dost thou triumph in thy wickedness and cruelty, which thou findest to be favored and recompensed by Saul?" The question contains the language of defiance to an insolent foe. The goodness of God endureth continually. Continually, daily, all the day; Hengstenberg has forever. Persecutions do not annihilate God's kindness to his people. For a time malice may run riot; but at last God will appear for his saints. Indeed they constantly experience his mercies, even when murderers are let loose upon them.

2. Thy tongue deviseth mischiefs; like a sharp razor, working deceitfully. The tongue is said to devise, think, or contrive mischiefs, because when they are so devised the tongue utters them, the tongue being an essential instrument of boasting, slandering, reviling and other evil speaking. The razor works most keenly and effectually when it is sharpest and makes least noise. So "the words of a talebearer are as wounds, and go down into the innermost parts of the belly." And reproach is like "a sword in the bones," Ps. xviii. 8; Ps. xlii. 10. Pool: "Like a sharp razor, working deceitfully; wherewith a man pretending to shave off the hair doth suddenly and unexpectedly cut the throat. So Doeg pretended only to vindicate himself from the imputation of disloyalty, 1 Sam. xxii. 8, but really intended to expose the priests, who were friends to David, to the king's fury and cruelty."

3. Thou lovest evil more than good. No man equally loves good and evil. It is a natural impossibility, as it is for a man to serve two masters. The reason is that good and evil are directly opposed. There are no neutral moral characters. No man can love evil to a certain extent, and good to the same extent. The meaning of the clause therefore is, Thou art given over to evil, to work iniquity with greediness. Here the delight was in producing misery to others. And [thou lovest] lying more than to speak righteousness. Doeg had inflamed the irritable spirit of Saul by perverting the facts in regard to David's visit to Nob. He had lied respecting the conduct of Ahimelech.

Perversion of facts is often the most cruel method of falsehood and of subverting right.

4. Thou lovest all devouring words, O thou deceitful tongue. Evil words are well said to be devouring. They are as a madman casting firebrands, arrows, and death, Pr. xxvi. 18; Gal. v. 15. Doeg was a man who took pleasure in all words and deeds that seemed to give him advantage with a cruel prince, however much misery fell upon the innocent victims of his malice. Deceitful tongue, literally tongue of deceit, or tongue of guile. The tongue here is put for the man, as it had been a chief instrument of the mischief he had wrought.

5. God shall likewise destroy thee forever. There is remarkable agreement in the different translations in rendering this verb destroy, or utterly destroy; though the same verb in the common version is elsewhere also rendered break down, throw down, pull down, cast down, beat down, overthrow, applied to demolishing altars, houses, or towers. The destruction threatened is complete. It is also perpetual, i. e., forever. There are three ways of explaining this threat, 1. David was inspired to utter woes against Doeg unless he should repent. We have the rule in Jer. xviii. 7, 8. It was acted on in the case of Nineveh. 2. David uttered views gathered from the general course of Providence. He had seen how bloody and deceitful men came to an early and violent death, (Ps. xxxvii. 11; lv. 23;) and he inferred it could not be that Doeg would prove an exception. 3. David speaking by the Holy Ghost, predicts the dreadful ruin of this man as an event awfully certain and now inevitable, as Christ did that of "the son of perdition." Henceforth he was a doomed man. This is not the only case noticed in the Old Testament, in which God showed one of his servants that he would certainly destroy a given wicked man, 2 Chron. xxv. 16. This last mode of explaining the language is, perhaps, to be preferred. The same remarks are applicable to the remaining clauses of this verse. He shall take thee away. Chaldee, scatter thee; Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Fry, pluck thee out; Ainsworth, pull thee away; Edwards, snatch thee away. As a coal removed from the hearth and left to itself, dies out, so should it be with Doeg. And [he shall] pluck thee out of thy dwelling-place. Pluck implies violence, in Prov. ii. 22, it is root out. "The wicked is driven away in his wickedness," Prov. xiv. 32. The Hebrew of dwelling-place is tent or tabernacle, and does not determine whether it was a private abode, or that in which God was worshipped. The original has nothing corresponding to thy. The Syriac, Arabic, Vulgate, Calvin, church of England, Edwards, Jebb and Alexander supply thy. But the Chaldee, Septuagint, Fabritius, Piscator, Ainsworth, Hammond, Venema, Amesius, Fry and others read simply the tabernacle. The Chaldee is very explicit: He shall cause thee to depart from inhabiting in the place of the Shechinah. Abenezra, Patrick and Henry expound it of the place where the ark was. If this latter view is correct, then the clause is equivalent to the greater excommunication, which, according to Hammond and others, delivered up the guilty man to the hands of God, to be cut off, himself and his posterity. If this is so, it throws light on the last clause of the verse: And root thee out of the land of the living. Such is the interpretation given of this clause by all the ancient versions, and by others. His posterity should perish with him, as did that of Achan. Doeg had pretended to worship God and had no doubt reaped advantages from the worship of Jehovah (1 Sam. xxi. 7); but he and his posterity should be alike cut off from these forever, and so fall under the terrible judgments of God. Horne: "Wonderful is the force of the verbs in the original of this verse. They convey to us the four ideas of 'laying prostrate,' 'dissolving as by fire,' 'sweeping away as with a besom,' and 'totally extirpating root and branch,' as a tree eradicated from the spot on which it grew."

6. The righteous also shall see, and fear, and shall laugh at him. We have a full account of the end of Saul, but none of the end of Doeg. Yet we may rest assured that all that is here predicted came to pass; and when it did, it was observed by good men, and the sight increased their godly fear, as it always does, Isa. xxvi. 9. But while they feared God, they held this wicked man in derision. His name, like that of Cain, or Judas Iscariot, is never given to children. If ever mentioned, it is only as a synonyme for deceit, cruelty, and officious lying. What the righteous, as they saw his end, thought and said is now told us:

7. Lo, this is the man that made not God his strength; but trusted in the abundance of his riches, and strengthened himself in his wickedness. The verbs in Hebrew are in the future, signifying the perverseness and stubbornness of the sinner to the last of his life. The common version gives the sense, and is as good as any other. Doeg "trusted and feared Saul more than God, and was willing to purchase Saul's favor with God's displeasure." We know not the amount of Doeg's wealth. It probably was very considerable. He was 'the chiefest of Saul's herdsmen.' Doubtless he found his office profitable. And his slaughter of the helpless priests, women and children was probably rewarded by Saul with considerable gains. Perhaps he may have had great possessions for a man of his birth and prospects. And he trusted in uncertain riches. And the more he prospered the greater was his wickedness. The goodness of God did not lead him to repentance. Alexander: "The word translated wickedness is the singular of that translated mischiefs in v. 2 above. It seems to signify particularly an inclination to malicious mischief." For wickedness the marginal reading is substance. So also in Pr. x. 3. Perhaps it should read so here.

8. But I am like a green olivetree in the house of God. For green several versions read fruit-bearing, but this is interpretation, not translation. Flourishing is better. So the word is sometimes rendered, Ps. xcii. 14. The olive, in a healthy state, is perpetually covered with leaves, and from the time it is small to its latest healthy age it bears good fruit, and with its fatness honors God and man, Judg. ix. 9. It also lives to a great age, some say two thousand years. Henry thus paraphrases the clause: "This mighty man is plucked up by the roots; but I am like a green olive-tree, planted and rooted, fixed and flourishing; he is turned out of God's dwelling-place, but I am established in it, not detained, as Doeg, by anything but the abundant satisfaction I meet with there." So excellent is the olive-tree that in Scripture it is made an emblem of the visible church of our Lord Jesus Christ, Rom. xi. 17. I trust in the mercy of God for ever and ever, q. d., I have no confidence for my sustenance or deliverance at any part of my existence, present or future, but God alone; not that I deserve his aid, but I trust in his mercy, his goodness, his favor, his kindness, loving-kindness, his merciful kindness.

9. I will praise thee for ever, because thou hast done it; i. e., because thou hast made this difference between the righteous and the wicked, between Doeg and me. And I will wait on thy name, wait in all the ways of thy appointment, public and private, in social and in secret worship, trusting in thy power, justice, mercy, and faithfulness, and so shall I renew my strength, Isa. xl. 31. For it is good before thy saints. Either God's name is good, or it is good to wait on him. The latter is the better. Before, in the sight of, in the presence of. Saints, holy, godly, merciful ones.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. To have the best acts of our lives misrepresented, and to be belied and betrayed is no new thing. There is a Doeg in almost every large community. We ought so to think, and act accordingly. Human nature, unrestrained by divine grace, is no better in modern than in ancient times.

2. One of the most decisive evidences of reprobacy is to glory in our shame, v. 1.

Slade: "It is bad enough to imagine and to do mischief; but far worse to boast of it."

3. Doeg was a poor creature. He thought himself a mighty man, a giant, a hero. He killed, under the protection of the king's guards, eighty-five priests with their linen ephods on them, and a town full of unarmed and helpless men, women and sucklings. This was his prowess. There was not another man in all Saul's army mean enough to do the base deed even when commanded. No doubt Doeg thought he was very brave, yea, valorous. He was not the last man that gloried in a thing of naught.

4. The present seeming success of base conduct does not in the slightest degree change its character or its doom, v. 1. Calvin: "Any triumph, which may be obtained by violence, treachery, or other unjustifiable means, is short-lived." Let all men remember that.

5. In the darkest times God's benignity to his saints is unfailing, v. 1. Dickson: "So long as God's unchangeable kindness endureth, the wicked have no cause to exult over the godly, nor have the godly cause to faint or be discouraged." If we have God for our friend, it matters not who is our foe.

6. If sinners are bold and boastful, let not the righteous be timid and sneaking, but fearlessly charge home on the ungodly their atrocious crimes, and warn them of impending judgments, vv. 1-7. It is not only lawful but often obligatory, "even in very trying circumstances, supported by the elevating influence of faith, to inveigh against" the conduct of mean and unprincipled men in all positions in life, especially when they seem to be in the full tide of success. Our denunciations may strengthen ourselves, encourage our brethren, and warn men of weak virtue, who otherwise might become base informers, or miserable persecutors, or fall into some dreadful practices. Had David yielded to dismay when Doeg rose to high royal favor, he would probably not have had a handful of followers left. Indeed the bloody death of the innocent priests must have made many persons afraid to show any favor whatever to David and his cause. That was no time for playing the dastard.

7. Truthful records of human nature, left to act itself out in unrestrained freedom, will always show that the tongue has been an instrument of much evil, vv. 2-4. See on Ps. x. 7. Slade: "A false and deceitful tongue is dangerous and dreadful, cutting like a razor, devouring like a sword," James iii. 2-10. Words, as God knows them, are a sure index of the character.

8. There is a sense, in which the atrocious character of the wrongs we receive from wicked men may give us comfort, v. 2. God is righteous, and never really takes sides with wickedness against equity and truth. So when our enemies are clearly and wholly and solely in the wrong, we may rest assured God will in the end be favorable to us. There is always hope in our cause, if we are right, "and it is plain that the farther our enemies proceed in the practice of iniquity, they proportionally provoke the anger of the Lord," and make him to be their enemy. If Haman had merely felt some dislike to the Jews, he might have lived out all his days. But when he contrived their slaughter, he was a doomed man.

9. How smoothly and plausibly a deceitful man can talk. Doeg 'pretended only to vindicate himself from the charge of disloyalty, in making known to the king the transactions at Nob; but the whole affair shows that he intended evil against Ahimelech and the priests, because they were the friends of David, and the enemies of Saul's oppression.' Every generation has like hypocritical pretenders to patriotism and public spirit and zeal for government, when the fact is that revenge and love of plunder and the spirit of murder do actuate them.

10. There is a great deal of lying in the world, consisting of caricaturing, of suppressing parts of the truth, of narrating things out of their connection, and of garbling statements. Dickson: "It is no advantage to a malicious calumniator, to pretend that he told nothing but the truth, and told no more than what he saw; for it is true that David came to the house of Ahimelech," as Doeg said. Yet the conspiracy against Saul implied in what Doeg said, and in his manner of saying it, was all a wicked fabrication; and so he is justly charged with all the consequences that followed his officious informing of Saul.

11. Hypocrites are often very fond of the house of God, even when they are about to commit some great sin. Perhaps they hope to consecrate their vices. Doeg, even when detained in the house of God, had his naughty wicked heart with him, and was even then preparing to belie the ministers of God. One of the vilest characters mentioned in the Bible was after her way very pious, Pr. vii. 14, 15.

12. The smooth, adroit manner of executing a wicked device neither hides nor abates its wickedness. Murder with a sharp razor is as wicked as murder with a meat-axe or a bludgeon, v. 2. A lie very ingeniously framed and rehearsed in an oily manner is as great a sin and in the end will be seen to be as great a folly as the most bungling attempt at deception.

13. Dickson: "When a man speaketh no more of a tale of his neighbor, but what may serve to the man's hurt and prejudice, and keepeth up the relation of that part of the tale which might clear the man's innocence, or might give a right construction of his actions; albeit that part of the tale told be true, if all the rest of the tale had been told with it, yet being told alone as if it were the full history, it is evil, it is false lying. It is a murdering and devouring speech, and full of deceit, and argueth the speaker to be such a one as Doeg was."

14. Wicked men have a real love of sin, vv. 3, 4. This is the secret of all their abominations. But for this they might easily be amended by instruction and example. Henry: "It is bad to speak devouring words, but it is worse to love them, either in others or in ourselves."

15. Guile is an ingredient of every form of sin known, v. 4. It is so in hell. Satan is the father of lies. It enters into self-deception, into self-ignorance, into all cozening, all pride, all vanity, all pretences, all transgressions. There never was a thoroughly candid, upright opposer of God's truth, or Gospel.

16. The ruin of the incorrigibly wicked will be complete and utter, v. 5. His overthrow is self-procured. "As any wicked man is instrumental for bringing temporal destruction on the godly, so is he instrumental in drawing everlasting destruction upon himself from God's hand."

17. Yet wicked men are seldom made wiser by the destruction of their companions. The gambler has been known to make a card-table of the coffin of his dead brother. It is not promised that despisers shall grow wise. Nothing opens the eyes of those who will not see, Pr. xxvii. 22. Calvin: "The wicked are incapable of profiting by the judgments of God, being blind to the plainest manifestations which he has made of himself in his works."

18. But the righteous can see, grow wise, and have a salutary fear increased by beholding the end of the wicked, v. 6. Indeed to good men everything does good. God's severity inspires them with dread. Even his forgiveness begets godly fear. And so they are carried along. Every event of providence is the stroke of the sculptor's chisel. It tends to bring out the hidden beauties of the unsightly block on which it falls.

19. The exultation, which a righteous man may indulge at the defeat of the wicked, is not a malignant joy that calamity has overtaken any human being. This is forbidden, even in the Old Testament, Job xxxi. 29; Pr. xxiv. 17. David was filled with grief at the miserable end of Saul, 2 Sam. i. 17-27. Alexander: "The sense of the absurdity of sin must be strongest in the purest minds, and cannot therefore be incompatible with pity, the rather as it is ascribed to God himself, Ps. ii. 4." Calvin: "I need not say that the destruction of Doeg could only communicate comfort to David's mind, in the way of convincing him that God was the avenging judge of human cruelty, and leading him to infer that as God had punished his wrongs, so he would advance him to renewed prosperity."

20. The end of every sinner teaches us some good lesson, which we ought carefully to ponder, v. 7. It is not possible for us to have too vivid a sense of the folly of living and dying an enemy to God. The end of every unbeliever may teach us much wisdom. Scott: "The believer foresees that God will cast down, sweep away, eradicate and extirpate from the earth, and destroy forever in hell those who do not make him their strength, but idolize their wealth and prosperity, and who encourage themselves in wickedness: and no criminals will perish with greater exultation to the righteous than hardened persecutors. Their success is like the luxuriant growth of some poisonous plant, which it is a public service to destroy."

21. If Christians would grow, they must be planted in the house of the Lord, which is his garden, his vineyard. There they shall prosper. Tholuck: "It is the eternal assurance of faith, which no appearance can baffle, that he who has cast his root in God, shall flourish in the house of God—i. e., in communion with him. Those who do not see it in time shall assuredly see it in eternity. He shall flourish and prosper like the favored olive-tree, which yields much fruit without almost any culture, and its leaves fade not even in winter," Jer. xi. 16.

22. But if the child of God would make progress in the divine life, he must walk by faith, not by sight. He must trust, even when things look darkest, v. 8. Compare Isa. l. 10; 1 Pet. i. 13.

23. Some mercies call for everlasting songs, v. 9. Such are the benefits received by all the true children of God; but some of these are so marked, so seasonable, and so unexpected, that a grateful heart will naturally give them prominence. Nor is one expression of thanks for such mercy enough, even if it be sincere. Calvin: "There is no religious duty, in which it does not become us to manifest a spirit of perseverance; but we need to be especially enjoined to it in the duty of thanksgiving, disposed as we are so speedily to forget our mercies, and occasionally to imagine that the gratitude of a few days is a sufficient tribute for benefits, which deserve to be kept in everlasting remembrance."

24. Let all believers learn and practise the duty of waiting on God, not only in the forms of religion, but in the temper and habit of their own minds. It is an excellent duty, and when patiently performed, it gives an excellence to the character not easily acquired, v. 9.

25. The judgment of saints is that God's service is good, v. 9. On this point there are no dissensions among God's real children.

PSALM LIII.

To the chief Musician upon Mahalath, Maschil, A Psalm of David.

1 The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. Corrupt are they, and have done abominable iniquity: there is none that doeth good.

2 God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, that did seek God.

3 Every one of them is gone back: they are altogether become filthy; there is none that doeth good, no, not one.

4 Have the workers of iniquity no knowledge? who eat up my people as they eat bread: they have not called upon God.

5 There were they in great fear, where no fear was: for God hath scattered the bones of him that encampeth against thee: thou hast put them to shame, because God hath despised them.

6 Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! When God bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad.

THIS Psalm is so much like Ps. xiv. that Calvin, Horne, Tholuck and Hengstenberg have no separate comment on it. The differences are very slight. The probability is that David himself made them. Alexander: "The variations are such as render the expressions stronger, bolder, and in one or two cases more obscure and difficult." In Ps. xiv. Jehovah Lord frequently occurs. Here we have only Elohim God, on which see on Ps. iii. 2. On the title, see on Ps. iii. iv. xi. xxxii. Upon Mahalath is a part of the title which has not previously occurred. It is found also in Ps. lxxxviii. Abenezra and Mudge suppose it refers to the tune; Jarchi, Diodati, Hammond, Pool, Patrick and Edwards, to the instruments to be used in singing this Psalm. Ainsworth thinks Mahalath may be rendered either instrument or infirmity. The Tigurine version renders it diseases; Gill spiritualizes the word and understands it of the disease of sin and the weakness following it. Alexander also regards it as 'an enigmatical enunciation of the subject of the Psalm,' and by disease understands 'the spiritual malady with which all mankind are affected, and which is really the theme or subject of the composition.' The interpretation of Gill and Alexander is perhaps the most plausible. The Syriac gives a caption that fixes the date of the Psalm to Ahithophel's advice to Absalom to pursue and destroy David and his band. Indeed it makes that wily statesman the subject of the Psalm.

1. The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God. See on Ps. xiv. 1. For fool the Syriac has unrighteous, and Fry wretch. Corrupt are they, and have done abominable iniquity. This is just the same as in Ps. xiv. except that here we have iniquity for deeds in the former ode. There is none that doeth good; as in Ps. xiv. 1.

2. God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if there were any that did understand, that did seek God. This presents a very bold figure—God looking down to scrutinize. The result of the investigation is:

3. Every one of them is gone back. Chaldee: All have gone back; Syriac: All have wandered away; Arabic: All have erred together; Septuagint and Vulgate: All have gone aside; Fry: They are all gone astray. The corresponding clause in the former ode differs not in sense, though the verb is slightly different in signification; They are all gone aside. See on Ps. xiv. 3. The next clause is: They are altogether become filthy. In Hebrew the same in both Psalms. Altogether is better than all together; together, signifying alike, or at once, is better than either. For are become filthy the Syriac has are polluted; the Septuagint and Vulgate, are become unprofitable; Morison, have become rotten and putrid; Alexander, have putrified. The corruption is total and perfect. There is none that doeth good, no, not one, as in Ps. xiv. which see.

4. Have the workers of iniquity no knowledge? Alexander: "This has been noticed by some critics as the only case in which the language of the fourteenth Psalm is stronger than the parallel expression of the fifty-third." Who eat up my people as they eat bread; they have not called upon God.

5. There were they in great fear, where no fear was. The last four words are an addition to the words of Psalm xiv. When men cease to fear God, they become subject to many fears, some guilty, some superstitious, all tormenting. A conscience defiled with the blood of God's people must have dreadful fears and apprehensions, even when no evil is at hand. The language of the original is peculiarly Hebrew: They have feared a fear. For God hath scattered the bones of him that encampeth against thee. Some, who suppose this Psalm to have been altered after the days of David, regard this clause as having been written to suit the state of things after the destruction of Sennacherib's army. But it suits as well any defeat of beleaguering foes. Instead of him that encampeth against thee, Alexander has thy besieger. The Hebrew word is a participle in the singular, yet here it clearly denotes a body of enemies. To scatter the bones is to slay and leave the carcasses on the field, where they are torn apart. Scott: "The army of Absalom, which encamped against David, was easily routed; numbers fell in the forests; and, being left unburied, their bones were scattered." Thou hast put them to shame, because God hath despised them. The side God is against cannot prevail. Verse 6 of Ps. xiv. is wholly omitted here.

6. Oh that the salvation of Israel were come out of Zion! When God bringeth back the captivity of his people, Jacob shall rejoice, and Israel shall be glad. Here we have in the Hebrew salvations for salvation in the corresponding verse of Psalm xiv. The church of England renders the first and second clauses both in the optative: Oh that, etc. It is clear from this verse that this Psalm was not made or altered to suit the Babylonish captivity; for instead of deliverance then coming out of Zion, the Hill of Zion was itself in the hands of enemies. If the reference of the whole Psalm is to the ruined spiritual condition of man, then the deliverance is also spiritual, and this is to be through the church as the depository of the truth, and the light of the world, Isa. ii. 3; Mic. iv. 2; John vii. 38; Acts i. 8.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Human sinfulness is often asserted in Scripture. Wise men believe it.
2. All sin is folly, v. 1. But some forms of it are so egregious that we hardly know how to characterize them. All allowed sin is virtual atheism or leads to it. Is not he a fool who thinks he can elude the scrutiny of omniscience, escape from the grasp of omnipotence, or succeed in setting aside the decisions of inflexible justice?
3. The fountain of all actual sin is in the heart, v. 1. If men were not wrong there, things would be easily put right, Matt. xv. 18. Whoever says he has by nature a good heart is a traitor to himself.
4. A great point would be gained if men could be brought to confess and bewail the vileness of their natures. They are corrupt, filthy, abominable, vv. 1, 3. There is no corruption so odious as moral corruption, no filthiness like the filthiness of sin.
5. Evil men are not only guilty of sins of commission, having done abominable iniquity, but they are guilty of many sins of omission. In fact they have never done one holy act, v. 3. They may be moral, decent, amiable, they may belong to the church; but there is none that doeth good, no, not one.
6. To deny our sinfulness is to deny that God knows all things and speaks the truth; for he has investigated the matter fully and given sentence in the case, vv. 2, 3.
7. Wilful ignorance will not excuse the guilty soul. Men often act as if they had no knowledge, and even in Christian countries some men seem to know little or nothing. But it is their own fault. They might know better. They ought to know better.
8. "There is an irreconcilable enmity between the seed of the woman and the seed of the serpent," John xv. 18; 1 John iii. 13. The hatred of sinners to saints stops at nothing till God arrests it. Like wild beasts the wicked devour the flock of God, v. 4.
9. While hypocrites, to be seen of men, may retain some of the forms of religion, yet ordinarily even they do not persevere in them; and persecutors are commonly a prayerless crew, v. 4.
10. Often the wicked here make a great ado about their courage, and some of them possess much natural bravery and daring; but every unregenerate man is a coward so soon as God lets loose his conscience upon him, or delivers him over to alarming providences, v. 5. This shall be specially true of those who in the day of their power and prosperity seemed very courageous.

11. If men who are ashamed of Christ and his gospel would but reflect on God's word, they would see a discomfiture approaching of a nature so appalling, that surely they would not attach to the finger of scorn pointed at them by man such importance as to brave the derision of the Almighty, v. 5.

12. How glorious is deliverance by Christ. It is salvation, yea, it is salvations, v. 6. Luther: "This Psalm at the close gives a prophetic declaration concerning the gospel and the kingdom of Christ."

PSALM LIV.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, Maschil, A Psalm of David, when the Ziphim came and said to Saul, Doth not David hide himself with us?

- 1 Save me, O God, by thy name, and judge me by thy strength.
- 2 Hear my prayer, O God; give ear to the words of my mouth.
- 3 For strangers are risen up against me, and oppressors seek after my soul: they have not set God before them. Selah.
- 4 Behold, God is mine helper: the Lord is with them that uphold my soul.
- 5 He shall reward evil unto mine enemies: cut them off in thy truth.
- 6 I will freely sacrifice unto thee: I will praise thy name, O LORD; for it is good.
- 7 For he hath delivered me out of all trouble: and mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies.

WE have two accounts of Saul being informed by the people of Ziph as to David's retreat; one in 1 Sam. xxiii. 14-28; the other in 1 Sam. xxvi. 1-25. It is not certain in which of these we are to find the historic occasion of this Psalm, although most commentators incline to the opinion that it was the first. If this is so, then David probably wrote it at En-gedi, 1 Sam. xxiii. 29; if it refers to the last, then at Gath, 1 Sam. xxvii. 1-4. In his flight from Saul David went to the southern part of the Holy Land, and took refuge in the mountains near to Ziph. No sooner do the Ziphim (or Ziphites) learn that he is there, than messengers are started to inform Saul. The persecutor, intent on his prey, loses no time in marching an army to the mountain, where David is and attempts to cut off his retreat. Just as he thinks he is about to secure the victim of his envy, he hears that the Philistines have invaded his country, and with haste he leaves that district, and marches to the protection of his kingdom. Thus David escapes and goes to En-gedi. On the title see on title of Ps. iv. xi. xxxii. Here any believer may find fit words to express his desires in times of temptation, perplexity or persecution. The church of England seems to have regarded David in this Psalm as a type of Christ, appointing it for Good Friday. Scott dates it B. C. 1060; Clarke, B. C. 1061. The names of the Most High in it are Elohim God and Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2. On Selah see Introduction, § 15. The authorship of the Psalm is undisputedly Davidic.

1. Save me, O God, by thy name. Save, also help, deliver, preserve. See on Ps. iii. 7; xii. 1; xxii. 21. Calvin: "Surrounded as David was by hostile troops, and hemmed in on every side by apparently inevitable destruction, we cannot but admire the rare and heroical intrepidity, which he displayed in committing himself by prayer, to the Almighty." David knew that infinite wisdom and power are never in straits. True and lively faith has peculiar delight in looking to Jehovah, when all is dark, and none but he can save. By thy name, may mean by thyself; or, by all those perfections and acts whereby thou hast made thyself known. From the parallel clause next following, David would seem to have specially in his eye the ability of God to deliver. Pool thinks we might read for thy name, i. e., for thy own glory. For sometimes has the signification for the sake of. In this case none but God could save, and it would be greatly to his honor, if he should save. And judge me by thy strength. Judge, most frequently so rendered, also plead, plead the cause, minister judgment. As no other resource seems left, he casts all his reliance on the strength of God. The Hebrew verb in this clause is in the future. This expresses confidence that the prayer will be heard, not only now, but hereafter.

2. Hear my prayer, O God. The prophet now returns to the imperative form, hear; but the Chaldee has it in the future, The Lord will hear. Prayer, always so rendered. David was sure that he should not pray in vain, for he was asking for no more than God had promised. Give ear to the words of my mouth, i. e., the words of prayer that I have uttered.

3. For strangers are risen up against me. For strangers the Chaldee has the proud. Venema and Mudge admit that we may so render it. The change of a single letter would produce the variation. The Ziphites were David's countrymen, but instead of acting as Ahimelech and Abigail, they acted as aliens or barbarians. 'They had the spirit of foreigners. And oppressors seek after my soul. Alexander: "The original expression implies the possession of power and its lawless exercise. For oppressors the ancient versions read the mighty; Calvin, the terrible ones; Ainsworth, daunting tyrants; Amesius and Hengstenberg, the violent; Edwards, the oppressive. By strangers Clarke understands the Ziphites; by oppressors, Saul, his courtiers and his army. To seek after the soul is to attempt to destroy the life. The enemies of David were an ungodly company: They have not set God before them. When men do not fear God, they will not long regard men, especially one in adversity and persecuted. Not to set God before the eyes is to be generally irreligious, to live so as to please the carnal nature, to despise the authority of heaven.

4. Behold, God is mine helper, literally, is helping me. See Ps. x. 14; xxii. 11; xxx. 10. David had some true friends; but from them he expects no effectual relief. With an emphatic note of attention he says: Behold, God is my helper. The Lord is with them that uphold my soul. David's friends and comforts were the gift of God. His friends upheld, sustained, supported him with their presence, their sympathy, their counsel, and their readiness to risk all for him.

5. He shall reward evil unto mine enemies. Some prefer the evil, meaning the very evil they had intended for him, i. e., death. If so, the passage is parallel to Ps. vii. 16. The verb is in the imperative. Yet our version gives the sense. Alexander: "The imperative in this case is only a stronger form of prediction." See Introduction, § 6. Cut them off in thy truth. For truth the Arabic has justice. Although all God's threatenings are made in righteousness, yet the reference here seems to be to the veracity of God in promising to raise David to the throne, and in threatening to bring about the overthrow of all his unreasonable foes.

6. I will freely sacrifice unto thee. Freely, commonly rendered free-will-offerings, or free offerings. Perhaps the sense here is, Free-will-offerings will I sacrifice. It is also rendered willing, willingly, freely, 2 Chron. xxxv. 8; Ps. cx. 3; Hos. xiv. 4. In either way we get a good sense. Calvin: "David engages to sacrifice freely, and in another manner than the hypocrite, whose religion is the offspring of servility and constraint."

To sacrifices he would add thanksgiving: I will praise thy name, O LORD; for it is good. It is good in the eyes of God and of all his saints to praise him, Ps. lii. 9. Up to this point we probably have the very words, or the substance of the language used by David in the mountains of Ziph. The next and last verse is by some supposed to have been added after immediate danger was over. Or the past tense of verse 7 may indicate, that David was so confident of his deliverance, that he spoke of it as already accomplished.

7. For he hath delivered me out of all trouble. Trouble, distress, adversity, affliction, tribulation, anguish. Unless we regard the clause as prophetic, anguish is the better word here, as David could hardly be said to be free from affliction or adversity, while he was yet an exile. And mine eye hath seen his desire upon mine enemies. Those, who favor this rendering and supply his desire, regard themselves as supported by such passages as Ps. xci. 8; xxxvii. 34; Mal. i. 5. But Calvin, Horne, and others have it: Mine eye hath looked upon mine enemies. If this is right, it is a declaration that although his enemies were almost upon him, yet he had seen them marching away. No doubt David beheld this retreat with joy. As at the time he probably knew not the motive of his persecutors' retreat, it must have been very marvellous in his eyes; and not less so when he duly reflected upon the cause of the sudden change in Saul's movements.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. We cannot get rid of bad men by moving. David found the wicked at Ziph; Edwards, at Stockbridge. Such things will beget sadness, but we ought not to be overwhelmed with grief when God subjects us to them. We should especially try to find out what duties our new position requires, and faithfully perform them.

2. Marked trials and great deliverances claim special notice and long continued remembrance. If we are not able to commemorate them in song, we must at least treasure up the memory of them in our hearts and speak of them to our friends.

3. It is no new thing to be betrayed. David and Christ and many others so suffered. The world is no better than it was.

4. Dickson: "Mighty men will readily find more friends in an evil cause, than the godly find in a good one." The reason is that an evil cause mortifies no vile affection and requires no self-denial.

5. Whatever makes us feel our entire dependence on God is good for us. David could not have had the blessed experience of this Psalm if Saul and his myrmidons had not sought his life.

6. "The name of the Lord is a strong tower; the righteous runneth into it, and is safe," Prov. xviii. 10. Solomon may have learned this blessed truth from the many mercies shown to his father in times of great peril.

7. In the nature of God and in his regard for his own glory, we have abundant cause of joyful confidence in his holy, wise and powerful providence, v. 1.

8. We have a right to be greatly encouraged in prayer, when we know that we are asking for things agreeable to God's will, things that he has taught us to pray for, things that he has promised to grant us when we do pray for them. God had secured to David by covenant all he here seeks, v. 1. We should be very careful not to offer a selfish, malignant or covetous prayer. Calvin: "In asking the divine protection it is indispensably prerequisite we should be convinced of the goodness of our cause, as it would argue the greatest profanity in any to expect that God should patronize iniquity," James iv. 1-3.

9. Berleberg Bible: "We should learn from the example of David, that even in the greatest danger we should resort to no forbidden means, nor grow faint, but should call upon the name of God, and commit to him all our concerns as to the Supreme Judge." Compare 1 Sam. xxvi. 8-12. We should never have recourse to doubtful expedients, much less to confessedly wicked measures.

10. The certainty of future events does not render useless prayer or other means for bringing them about. David had God's word and oath that he should survive Saul and come to the kingdom. He believed God, and yet here he prays for deliverance, as if he had no such assurance. God revealed to Paul that not a man of his company should perish; yet the sailors must abide in the ship, or they could not be saved. He who has ordained the end has also appointed the means.

11. In prayer it is lawful and helpful to use words, as David here teaches us, v. 2. Compare Hosea xiv. 2. Mental prayer may be as acceptable as audible prayer; but words often help us to fix our thoughts.

12. It is sad when those of our own nation, tribe or family turn against us, v. 3. "Is it not a grief unto death, when a companion and friend is turned to an enemy?" Ecclus. xxxvii. 2. Slade: "Our nearest relations may prove more unkind than strangers; those, who ought to protect us, may become our oppressors; fellow Christians, in name, may slander and revile and injure us, more than even unbelievers do;" Dickson: "False countrymen, false brethren, false friends, false alliance are those of whom men may expect least in their need."

13. Of two opposing classes, one of whom set the Lord always before them, and the other have not God in all their thoughts, we need not doubt which God will help in the end, v. 3. The wicked may balk at nothing, they may be numerous and confident; but that will not settle the question, for 'the less hope there be of man's mercy, the more hope is there of God's help; the more unkind and cruel men be, the more may the Lord's kindness and comfort be expected.'

14. Hearty prayer is a great refreshment, v. 4. David comes forth from it strong. Yea, in the midst of it he cries, Behold, God is my helper. Arnd: "This is a fruit of prayer and of the Holy Spirit, that the heart is comforted and rejoiced after prayer."

15. We need no helper but God, and we do always need his aid and his arm, v. 4. If any professed believer thinks himself safe, or strong, or wise, or happy without God, he is in an awful condition. Calvin: "David was a fugitive among the dens of the earth, and even there in hazard of his life. How then could he speak of God as being near to him? He was pressed down to the very mouth of the grave; and how could he recognize the gracious presence of God? He was trembling in the momentary expectation of being destroyed; and how is it possible that he can triumph in the certain hope that divine help will presently be extended to him?" Behold the power of faith. It hopes against hope.

16. It is a great comfort to us to see God sustaining our sustainers, befriending our friends, giving skill to our advocates, and strength to our defenders, v. 4. God will ever take part with those who take part with his meek and sorrowful ones.

17. It shall be ill with the wicked. God will send evil unto them. And their doom will be just. It will be their reward, their proper recompense, v. 5.

18. How can sinners hope to succeed in their wicked plans, when they do not humbly pray for their own success, and when the prayers of the saints are always against them? v. 5.

19. All God's perfections are fully set against the wicked. His mercy and power are never on one side, and his truth on the other. There is a blessed harmony of the divine attributes in all his counsels and works.

20. Though we are not called after mercies received to bring incense and fatlings and fire, and make an offering on an altar of stone, yet it is our duty and privilege to present freely our spiritual sacrifices on all fit occasions, and there are many such, v. 6.

21. The history of David's escape from Saul, when it seemed as if the persecutor was sure of his victim, shows us that God can save his people as well without a miracle as with it. The retreat of Saul is a wonderful illustration of the truth of Pr. xxi. 1. Ordinary means are as effective as extraordinary, if only the Lord imparts power to them.

22. Great will be the joy of complete and final deliverance from pains, perils and tribulations, v. 7.

PSALM LV.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, Maschil, A Psalm of David.

- 1 Give ear to my prayer, O God; and hide not thyself from my supplication.
- 2 Attend unto me, and hear me: I mourn in my complaint, and make a noise;
- 3 Because of the voice of the enemy, because of the oppression of the wicked: for they cast iniquity upon me, and in wrath they hate me.
- 4 My heart is sore pained within me: and the terrors of death are fallen upon me.
- 5 Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me, and horror hath overwhelmed me.
- 6 And I said, Oh that I had wings like a dove! for then would I fly away, and be at rest.
- 7 Lo, then would I wander far off, and remain in the wilderness. Selah:
- 8 I would hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest.
- 9 Destroy, O LORD, and divide their tongues: for I have seen violence and strife in the city.
- 10 Day and night they go about it upon the walls thereof: mischief also and sorrow are in the midst of it.
- 11 Wickedness is in the midst thereof: deceit and guile depart not from her streets.
- 12 For it was not an enemy that reproached me; then I could have borne it: neither was it he that hated me that did magnify himself against me; then I would have hid myself from him:
- 13 But it was thou, a man mine equal, my guide, and mine acquaintance.
- 14 We took sweet counsel together, and walked unto the house of God in company.
- 15 Let death seize upon them, and let them go down quick into hell: for wickedness is in their dwellings, and among them.
- 16 As for me, I will call upon God; and the LORD shall save me.
- 17 Evening, morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud; and he shall hear my voice.
- 18 He hath delivered my soul in peace from the battle that was against me: for there were many with me.
- 19 God shall hear, and afflict them, even he that abideth of old. Selah. Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God.
- 20 He hath put forth his hands against such as be at peace with him: he hath broken his covenant.
- 21 The words of his mouth were smother than butter, but war was in his heart: his words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords.
- 22 Cast thy burden upon the LORD, and he shall sustain thee: he shall never suffer the righteous to be moved.
- 23 But thou, O God, shalt bring them down into the pit of destruction: bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days; but I will trust in thee.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xi. xxxii. liv. The Syriac says it was written by "David when he was lamenting the death of his son Absalom; and that it contains a prophecy concerning those who were cruel and violent against Christ." The Davidic authorship is generally admitted. The Chaldee, Syriac, Diodati, Ainsworth, Hammond, Gill, Dickson, Mudge, Edwards, Morison, Scott, Clarke and Tho-luck find its historic occasion in the rebellion of Absalom; Calvin and Moller, in the Sauline persecution. But there is no general agreement as to the particular event calling it forth. It is evident that it was written in circumstances of distress from persecution. Hengstenberg: "Against the supposition of a particular occasion, it is enough to awaken in us misgivings, that those who maintain that, cannot agree among themselves respecting it;" Alexander: "Although there seem to be allusions to the writer's own experience, in the times both of Saul and Absalom, the whole description can be applied exclusively to neither." Scott dates it B. C. 1021; Clarke, B. C. 1023. In it we have four names of the Most High, El God, Adonai Lord, Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which respectively see on Ps. v. 4; ii. 4; i. 2; iii. 2. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Give ear to my prayer, O God. Give ear, as in Ps. v. 1; xvii. 1. Prayer, as in Ps. iv. 1; liv. 2, uniformly rendered. It may point to intercession for others, or supplication for one's self. And hide not thyself from my supplication. Alexander: "To hide one's self is an expression used in the law to describe the act of wilfully withholding aid from one who needs it," Deut. xxii. 1, 4. Compare Isa. lviii. 7. Supplication, a plea for unmerited kindness.

2. Attend unto me, and hear me: I mourn in my complaint and make a noise. The Hebrew is very concise and emphatic. The first and second verbs are in the imperative; the third and fourth, in the future. This is followed by the Chaldee, Calvin, Venema and Alexander. But most of the ancient versions, Ainsworth, Amesius, Edwards, Jebb, Fry and others, use the form of our version. Horsley paraphrases thus: Attend unto me, and hear me: I am dejected in my meditation, and am in a violent tumultuous agitation, as the waves of the sea; Green: While in my complaint I weep and cry aloud, attend unto me and answer me; Hengstenberg: Attend to me and hear me, I give free course to my sorrow and will cry aloud. Chandler regards the last phrase as expressive of the greatest consternation. This Psalm is a meditation, a prayer and a complaint made to God. The prophet immediately tells us that he thus speaks,

3. Because of the voice of the enemy, because of the oppression of the wicked. The oppression here spoken of is the persecution, the sore pressing of the enemy. Calvin renders it affliction; Ainsworth, vexation. For they cast iniquity upon me. The Chaldee: For they will direct a lie against me; Syriac: For they have stretched out snares for me; Arabic: For they have turned aside after me with fury; church of England: For they are minded to do me some mischief; Edwards: For they are plotting iniquity against me; Horsley: For they slide iniquity upon me, i. e., by oblique and artful insinuations they asperse my character. Pool: "The sense is, either, 1. They make me the great object of their wicked, and injurious, and mischievous practices; or, 2. They lay many crimes to my charge falsely." Was ever one of these things done, and not the other? May not both be meant? And in wrath they hate me, i. e., their hatred is violent and unrestrained. Ainsworth: In anger they spitefully hate me.

4. My heart is sore pained within me. The Chaldee: My heart trembled within me; church of England: My heart is disquieted within me; Edwards: My heart throbbeth within me; Fry: My heart is in travail within me; Alexander: My heart writhes in the midst of me. The phrase expresses violent mental distress. So the parallel clause: And the terrors of death are fallen upon me. The terrors of death are those awful sensations which, coming on men, make them feel as if they could not live, Mark xiv. 33, 34.

5. Fearfulness and trembling are come upon me, and horror hath overwhelmed [margin covered] me. We must remember that verses 2-5 were uttered by him, who long before had fought with a lion and a bear and the champion of the Philistines, and with undaunted courage had conquered them all. He was no chicken-hearted man. But now foes without and fears within were too many for him. No man knows how he will behave in any severe trial, until it is over. We are wholly dependent on God for constancy of mind.

6. And I said, Oh that I had wings, like a dove; literally, So that I said, Who will give me a wing like a dove. "Doves have no gall, feed on pure food, are mild, harmless, beautiful, fruitful, defenceless, hated by ravenous birds, chaste to their mates, and much given to mourning if they lose them." The dove is gentle, never contends, never defends itself, is often pursued, but seldom captured, being able to save itself by its amazing speed of flight and by finding strong hiding-places in the rock. Some of the stories respecting its powers of flight are fabulous; but we know that no bird of prey possesses such speed, and the Scriptures tell us of its hiding in holes, Jer. xlviii. 28. David says he has the desire for the quiet and security which the dove has. Though he has not the power of securing tranquillity he wishes he had; For then, says he, would I fly away and be at rest.

7. Lo, then would I wander far off. Ainsworth: Lo, I would make far off my wandering flight. The dejected state of David's mind may be judged of, when we see him thus expressing his desire to be a fugitive, rather than longer contend with his foes, although God's word secured to him the kingdom. That he does not contemplate a mere temporary flight is evident from the parallel clause: And remain in the wilderness. For remain the Chaldee and Arabic have dwell; Syriac and Calvin, repose. Wilderness does not necessarily imply an arid desert, for we read of the pastures of the wilderness, and the pleasant places of the wilderness. Hengstenberg: "The wilderness in v. 7 stands opposed to human society." How many have felt as David here expresses himself, Pr. xxi. 19; Jer. ix. 2.

8. I would hasten my escape from the windy storm and tempest. Doves fly to their windows or holes as the storm rises; so would David from this tempest of human passions. Calvin renders it: I will hasten a deliverance for me, from the wind raised by the whirlwind, understanding thereby "a violent wind, such as compels the traveller to fly and seek shelter in the nearest dwelling." Tempest, also rendered whirlwind, Jer. xxiii. 19; xxv. 32; xxx. 23; Ps. lxxxiii. 15; Amos i. 14; Jon. i. 4, 12. Troubles of a distressing kind are well and often represented by storms. Such keen and pressing calamity drove the royal psalmist to the mercy-seat. He was compelled to invoke divine interposition.

9. Destroy, O Lord, and divide their tongues. Destroy, commonly swallow up. Some think the reference is to the end of Korah and his company. Some think the text originally read, Divide, O Lord, divide. There are cases of such reduplication; but it is conjecture alone that would put it here. The Psalmist supplicates God to bring upon them such confusion of counsel, and such disruption of league, as would make them powerless for evil. Some think the sense is given by reading, destroy by dividing them. Many suppose there is a reference to the confusion of tongues at Babel, Gen. xi. 7. Some, who give to the Psalm a historic occasion in Absalom's rebellion, suppose the prayer is like that in 2 Sam. xv. 31, O LORD, I pray thee, turn the counsel of Ahithophel into foolishness. On the form of the verb see Introduction, § 6. For I have seen violence and strife in the city. Some think this refers to the city of Keilah, where for a season David dwelt, 1 Sam. xxiii.; and some, to the city of Gibeah, where Saul for a while had his forces. More probably he refers to Jerusalem, which was in great confusion both in Absalom's rebellion and often in Saul's time also, he being absent seeking to destroy one of his best subjects, when he should have been at home suppressing violence, and punishing wrong-doers. Pool: "This circumstance is noted as an aggravation of their wickedness, that it was committed in that city, where the throne and seat of public justice was settled; and where God was in a special manner present and worshipped; and where they had great opportunities, both for the knowledge and practice of their several duties."

10. Day and night they go about it upon the walls thereof; mischief also and sorrow are in the midst of it. They may refer to the enemies generally; but Calvin, Mant and Anderson think violence and sorrow are personified. Mischief, in v. 3 and often, rendered iniquity; also sorrow, vanity, affliction, a few times mischief. Sorrow also rendered perverseness, wickedness, mischief, labor, sorrow, trouble, pain, travail, grievousness. Thus in one clause we have two words showing the connection between sin and misery, the very names, by which they are known, being interchangeable. If violence and strife hold the walls, and mischief and sorrow reign in the heart of the city, how corrupt and wretched the whole mass must be. As was Jerusalem, so was the land. If religion, justice, truth, and good morals were there held in disesteem, the whole land felt the consequences.

11. Wickedness is in the midst thereof. Wickedness, in the plural, wickednesses; sometimes mischief, mischievous things, calamities, perverse things; another instance of the same word being applied to moral and natural evil. Deceit and guile depart not from her streets. Deceit and guile, i. e., all craft, fraud, subtily. These vices reigned in the streets, the public places, where trade was conducted and justice administered.

12. For it was not an enemy that reproached me; then I could have borne it. There are four methods of explaining the use of the singular in this and the two next verses. 1. Some think the reference is directly to Ahithophel. 2. Others make the person an ideal character. 3. Others think there is a change from the singular to the plural, but that the eye is still to be kept on those previously spoken of. 4. Others think that in vv. 12-14 the prophet considers one case of atrocious hypocrisy and treachery, but does not intend to point out the man, so that we could name him. Either of these may be correct. The last has fewest difficulties. I could have borne it may mean I could have borne it with comparative ease. This is the more common view. But Calvin thinks the meaning is, 'I could then have met it, as one meets and parries off a blow, which is aimed at him. Against a known foe we are on our watch, but the unsuspected stroke of a friend takes us by surprise.' The usual signification of the verb is to bear, lift, or carry. Calvin's method of explaining it makes this clause more nearly parallel to the next. Neither was it he that hated me that did magnify himself against me; then I would have hid myself from him; and so avoided any ill consequence from his malice.

13. But it was thou, a man mine equal, my guide and mine acquaintance. The Chaldee: And thou Ahithophel, a man like me, the teacher who taught me, and made known to me wisdom; Calvin: But it was thou, a man of mine own order, my leader and mine acquaintance; Edwards: But it is thou, a man whom I valued as my own self, my guide and acquaintance; Green: But it is thou, the man whom I took for my guide and my friend; Horsley: But thou, a man, put upon a level with myself, my confidant, and my familiar friend. From such a one injury must have been very keenly felt. Were friendships sacred and never disgraced by treachery, some might doubt the depravity of man. But as things are, there is no room for incredulity.

14. We took sweet counsel together, and walked unto the house of God in company. Calvin: "We sweetly exchanged our most secret thoughts; we walked into the house of God in company; Edwards: We joined together sweetly in secret consultation; we walked to the house of God amidst the crowd; Green: We sweetly communicated our secrets in private, and in public we walked to the house of God. The common version gives the sense, took sweet counsel together. In company, the Hebrew signifies a crowd or multitude, such as went in procession up the hill of Zion.

15. Let death seize upon them, and let them go down quick into hell. By them we are to understand not only the equal and guide of v. 13, but all the persecutors noticed in the former part of the Psalm. On the imprecatory form see Introduction, § 6. The whole force of the Hebrew is given by Fry: Desolations are upon them. They go down alive into the abode of the dead; or by Horsley: Death shall take them away; they shall go down quick into hell. Desolations (are) upon them! They shall go down to Sheol alive. Quick, alive, living not quickly or speedily. Does not the prophet here allude to the dreadful end of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, and declare that the awful judgments, which swept them from the earth, would be just in this case also? For wickedness is in their dwellings, and among them. Wickedness, literally wickednesses, or mischiefs. Among them, in them, Alexander, in their heart.

16. As for me, I will call upon God; and the LORD shall save me. As for me, I, literally I, emphatic and contrastive; q. d., ‘As they and I differ in the courses of our lives, so shall we in our ends.’ Calvin: “He does not content himself with saying that he will pray, for many do this in a perfunctory manner, and soon become wearied with the exercise; but he resolves to display both assiduity and vehemency:”

17. Evening, and morning, and at noon, will I pray, and cry aloud; and he shall hear my voice. Pray, meditate, talk, complain. The connection determines the precise meaning. Here it clearly should be rendered pray. There is no contrariety in these significations, for prayer should be meditated, then uttered, and as we are full of sins and sorrows we should complain to God, and supplicate his blessing, and that is praying; see v. 2; Ps. lxxvii. 3, 12; cxix. 27, 148. “To pray frequently is to pray fervently.” David prayed thrice a day, and was in great earnest, he cried aloud or roared. David’s praying was no dull formality. Nor was it unavailing.

18. He hath delivered my soul in peace from the battle that was against me. Soul, in this case life. Calvin reads into peace—‘a strong expression, signifying the danger to which he had been exposed, and the almost miraculous manner in which he had been delivered from it.’ David uses the past tense, hath delivered, either as expressing his entire confidence that his prayer should result in deliverance; or the Psalm was composed after the danger was over and the deliverance effected. The latter is perhaps more probable, for speaking of the contest as over, he adds: For there were many with me. To this phrase two constructions are given. One is that many had been fighting with, i. e., against him. This view is favored by Calvin, Pool, Fry, Walford, Hengstenberg and Alexander. The deliverance was great because in the battle or war his enemies had been numerous. The other construction is that he intends to say that God, his angels and many pious Israelites were on his side. This view is admitted by Calvin to be a ‘comfortable truth’ and is strongly embraced by Mant, Horsley and others. Green renders it: For he is on my side against multitudes. The doctrine of the ministry of angels was well understood and heartily embraced by pious people in Old Testament times, 2 Kings vi. 16, 17; Ps. xxxiv. 7. Ainsworth and Gill admit either interpretation.

19. God shall hear and afflict them, even he that abideth of old. John Rogers’ translation of the whole verse is: Yee even God that endureth for ever, shall heare me, and brynge them downe. Selah. For they will not turn: and why? they feare not God. God shall hear, either, 1. The complaint and the prayer that David offers in this Psalm; or, 2. The cry uttered by the reproaches and wickedness of his persecutors. The first is the view of Calvin, Patrick, the church of England, Edwards, Green, Horne, Scott and Tholuck. But Hengstenberg and Alexander are quite in favor of the second view. Alexander: “As God has heard me in mercy, so will he hear them in wrath. As he has answered my prayer in the way described above, v. 19, so will he answer them in the way described below, v. 24.” Pool and Gill admit either view, as sufficiently correct. The first mode of interpretation has the least serious difficulties, is the most natural, and is most generally received. Afflict also rendered answer. The English version is well supported, and gives the sense. For of old the Chaldee has from the beginning; Cocceius and Chandler, from everlasting; Green, eternally; Ainsworth, from antiquity; Durell, from eternity. In Hab. i. 12, the same word is rendered from everlasting; often of old. Because they have no changes, therefore they fear not God. Changes, the word does not of itself determine the nature of the change, whether it is of character or of condition. This has given rise to two interpretations; one suggested by the Chaldee: "Wicked men, who change not their evil course, and fear not the face of God, shall perish." So Diodati understands it of changes of repentance and conversion. This view is also favored by Dathe, Gesenius and Horne. The other is that the change refers to condition; Green: They experience no change of fortune, and therefore will not fear God; Fry: Because they have no vicissitudes, therefore they fear not God; Chandler paraphrases it: "They are prosperous, and have no reverse of fortune, think of none, and fear none; and so fear not God." Patrick: "Having prospered hitherto in their villany, there is not one of them that repents; but they all pertinaciously persist in their rebellion, without any fear of the divine vengeance." So many others. This interpretation is obvious, is generally received, agrees with other Scriptures (Prov. i. 32; Jer. xlviii. 11) and with our observation of the effect of prosperity on the wicked. Other modes of explaining these words have been suggested but they are too recondite and overstrained.

20. He hath put forth his hands against such as be at peace with him: he hath broken his covenant. This is a further account of the wicked enemies of David. To describe one was to describe all. They regarded not friendships, and they were truce-breakers. Broken, literally profaned, i. e., acted as if a covenant was not binding. Oppression is also commonly accompanied by deceit.

21. The words of his mouth were smoother than butter, but war was in his heart: his words were softer than oil, yet were they drawn swords. Smooth and oily words are not kind and gentle, but deceitful and feigned. So cruel words are well likened to sharp weapons for wounding. Compare Ps. xxviii. 3; lvii. 4; lxii. 4; lxiv. 3; Pr. v. 3, 4; xii. 18. Such figures are common to many languages. War, in v. 8, battle. The first clause has been strikingly rendered: Their mouth is butter, and their heart is war.

22. Cast thy burden upon the LORD. For burden the margin and Calvin have gift; Chaldee, hope; Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, care; Ainsworth, careful burden; Edwards, lot; Jebb, allotment, portion; Hengstenberg, salvation; Tholuck, burden. Hammond: "The Hebrews generally render it burden." Diodati: "Thy burden, viz., Thy cares, travails, and businesses which trouble thee." The great weight of authority is in favor of the common version. An apostle quotes the Septuagint version as being sufficiently correct for his purpose, 1 Pet. v. 7, casting all your care upon him, the word care having the sense of solicitude. Cast thy burden on Jehovah, and he shall sustain thee. The ancient versions, church of England and Fry: He shall nourish thee; Calvin and Venema, He shall feed thee; Edwards, He will support thee; Hengstenberg, He shall take care of thee. Peter does not quote the Septuagint corresponding to this clause, but uses his own words: He careth for you. Then follows the assurance that God's care or support shall be effectual in all coming duration: He shall never suffer the righteous to be moved. Be moved, as in Ps. x. 6; xv. 5; xvi. 8; in Ps. cxxv. 1, be removed. Alexander: "It is the word so often used to signify the violent disturbance of a person in the midst of his prosperity." Some of the various renderings may show the richness of the promise. The Chaldee: He will not give over the just to perpetual want; Syriac: He will not suffer his just ones to be continually vexed; Calvin: He shall not suffer the righteous always to stagger;

Venema: He shall not permit the righteous to be bowed down for ever; Edwards: He will not suffer the righteous to be harassed forever. The negation is literally not for ever.

23. But thou, O God, shalt bring them down into the pit of destruction. Them, viz., David's maligners and persecutors. Pit, any deep excavation in the earth, as very often a well, thence a pit, thence figuratively, ruin, Pr. v. 15; xxiii. 27; Ps. lxix. 15. Destruction, as in Ps. ciii. 4; in Ps. xvi. 10; xlix. 9; Jon. ii. 6 corruption. The most common rendering is pit. The Chaldee reads, the deep Gehenna. The meaning is that in due time God will bring the life and days of these wicked men to a miserable end. He adds, Bloody and deceitful men shall not live out half their days. Bloody and deceitful men, literally men of bloods and deceit; see on Ps. v. 6. Compare Ps. xxvi. 9. It is not important to learn whether the prophet here speaks of his persecutors alone, or of all men of like character; for these words are in every age fulfilled in an appalling manner. Besides, "the life of the wicked, however long it may be protracted, is agitated by so many fears and disquietudes that it scarcely merits the name, and may be said to be death rather than life. Nay, that life is worse than death which is spent under the curse of God, and under the accusations of a conscience which torments its victim more than the most barbarous executioner." Shall not live out half their days gives the sense of the text, and is idiomatic English. The Septuagint, Vulgate and margin of the common version give it literally, shall not halve their days. But I will trust in thee, q. d., 'I leave all in God's hands. He can and will in due time put down my foes and give me full deliverance. I give him his own time to do his own wonders of severity and of mercy.' Often is the prediction of premature death seen to be fulfilled in history. To possess the empire Phocas put to death all the sons of Mauritius, the emperor, and then slew him; but this Phocas was pursued by his son-in-law, Priscus, who cut off his ears and feet and then killed him. Blood has a terrible power to bring down vengeance, 2 Sam. xxi. 1.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. When we are rightly disposed, and guided by God's Spirit, we may get an instruction from the most distressing events in our history.

2. We shall never be done weeping and praying till we are done with earth, and have passed to the enjoyment of God, v. 1. 'Disappointments and losses, the unkindness of friends and the malice of enemies, the weaknesses both of the body and of the soul' will prolong our night of weeping and of wrestling with the Angel of mercy till eternal day bursts upon us, and fills us with its glories.

3. When God seems to hide himself from believers and their supplications, they should regard it as a trial of faith and perseverance, and not as a discouragement to prayer, v. 1.

4. True faith and earnestness are not satisfied with any form or amount of prayer, until they secure an answer, v. 2.

5. If our distress be very great, so that we even make a noise, let us still pray on, v. 2.

6. It proves nothing against religious feeling that it is attended by sensible effects on the body, v. 2. David mourned or 'was bathed in tears,' 'was in the greatest consternation.' It is a mercy that sometimes we can obtain relief by outward expressions of grief.

7. In all ages and under all circumstances unrenewed men are substantially alike, show the same hostility to holiness, and resort to the same clamor and harsh measures for distressing the saints, v. 3. The controversy concerning right and wrong, truth and error, has not materially changed its character since the days of Cain and Abel.

8. It seems to be a principle of Satan's kingdom that a lie is as good as the truth, if it answers a present purpose, v. 3. God's people ought not to be surprised or dejected if they find all manner of evil spoken of them falsely for Christ's sake.

9. Wicked men prescribe no bounds to their malice. They allow it to become 'wrath,' v. 3. Malignancy knows no law.

10. Oftentimes 'our greatest comfort under persecution is conscious rectitude.' The very fact that we do not deserve ill-treatment is a pledge that a righteous God will vindicate our cause.

11. There are several reasons why truly pious men should be sore pained, v. 4. God loves them and so afflicts them. The world and the devil hate them and so trouble them. They are very jealous of themselves, and so they continually prove and humble themselves. Religion refines their sensibilities, and so they are more distressed at a vain thought than ungodly men are at a naughty deed.

12. One reason, why God lets loose upon us the terrors of death long before our departure out of this world, is probably to prepare us for death itself, v. 4. It would be almost a miracle for us to learn to despise pain, if we never felt it.

13. Painful and even terrible experiences are not peculiar to any one child of God, v. 5. Nor should we be surprised to find our natural fortitude failing us in the hour of severe trial. Calvin: "We are all good soldiers so long as things go well with us, but when brought to close combat, our weakness is soon apparent;" Dickson: "It is not a thing inconsistent with godliness to be much moved with fear in time of danger; natural affections are not taken away in conversion, but sanctified and moderated."

14. It seems to be natural for men to think that they would be happier and even more virtuous, if they were in perfect solitude, than they can be surrounded by imperfect and sinful men, vv. 6-8. But the experiments, which have been made, seem to prove the contrary. Yet it is a dreadful thing to be so situated that we cannot be retired when we choose. Henry: "Gracious souls wish to retire from the hurry and bustle of this world, that they may sweetly enjoy God and themselves; and, if there be any true peace on this side heaven, it is they that enjoy it in those retirements."

15. He is a wise man, who knows when to flee and when to stand his ground. So soon as any trouble rises, some are in David's mood, vv. 6-8. Compare Matt. x. 23; xxiv. 16; Neh. vi. 11. He, who acts from timidity, almost uniformly regrets his conduct. We should not be governed by ill-grounded apprehensions. And if a man chooses to run risks, and prefers death rather than flight, no one will blame him for his courage.

16. What shall we think of men who, to be rid of trouble and vexation, wish to leave the world? Slade: "Sometimes the burden is so heavy and the prospect so dark, that we would rather leave the world at once, and fly away, and be at rest." But any wish based in selfishness and pusillanimity ought not to be indulged. Jonah was subject to such feelings, and yet they are evidently not recorded to his credit, Jon. iv. 3, 4, 9.

17. It is easy for God to defeat all the plans and plots of the wicked. He often does it by giving them over to distracted counsels, v. 9. The greatest conspiracy ever formed against God was at Babel, and he soon made a BABEL of it. Calvin: "It is thus that to this day he weakens the enemies of the church, and splits them into factions, through the force of mutual animosities, rivalries, and disagreements in opinion."

18. The most powerful weapon ever used in this world against cruel and unreasonable men is prayer, v. 9.

19. Troubles and discords in the church are no new thing. They were known even under the Theocracy, v. 9. Scott: "With anguish of heart the believer often perceives violence and discord in the congregations where the gospel of peace is preached and professed; by which the common cause is weakened, the truth disgraced, and far more mischief done than by all the fury of persecutors."

20. If the connection between sin and misery is so close on earth, where retribution is barely begun, what must it not be in the next world, where it is finished? v. 10.

21. Very soon and certainly wickedness against God turns to fraud and wrong-doing against man! v. 11.

22. That which to virtuous minds makes treachery so abhorrent, is that it always involves ingratitude and essential meanness of character, vv. 12-14. Calvin: "We are taught by the Spirit to reverence all the natural ties which bind us together in society. Besides the common and universal one of humanity, there are others of a more sacred kind, by which we should feel ourselves attached to men in proportion as they are more nearly connected with us than others, by neighborhood, by relationship, or by professional calling, the more as we know that such connections are not the result of chance, but of providential design and arrangement."

23. False and hollow as are some professions of friendship, there are others of an opposite kind. Isabella Graham and Mrs. Christy were true to each other. The elder Edwards, dying, said, "Give my kindest love to my dear wife, and tell her that the uncommon union which has so long subsisted between us has been of such a nature as, I trust, is spiritual, and therefore will continue forever." But 'we must not wonder, if we be sadly deceived in some that have made great pretensions to those two sacred things, religion and friendship.'

24. When we see wickedness in men's houses, we may be sure it is in their hearts, v. 15. Some are so vile that 'wherever they set down their feet, they leave traces of their wickedness, and defile all places with their impurities.'

25. We must resolutely continue instant in prayer, v. 16. Horne: "Prayer is the believer's universal medicine for all the disorders of the soul within, and his invincible shield against every enemy that can attack him from without."

26. But we must pray in hope, vv. 16, 17, 19. Prayer without expectation of receiving a blessing is like salt without savor.

27. And we must pray earnestly, v. 17. When beggars ask alms, they sometimes plead that they want but little, that they have seldom, if ever asked aid, and that they do not expect to do so again for a long time to come. But all such pleas are an insult to God, when we seek his blessing.

28. There is certainly an advantage in having set times for prayer, v. 17. Like David the great prophet in Chaldea also prayed three times a day, Dan. vi. 10. When modern discovery searched out Pitcairn's island, the people, from one little Bible, had been instructed to observe a season of prayer thrice a day. If our poor frail bodies need refreshment from food three times a day, who, that knows his own weakness, will say that we need not as frequent refreshment for our poor frail spirits?

29. We need not fear the number of our foes, v. 18. There is no king saved by the multitude of an host. God's government is not managed by majorities.

30. God's people have many on their side, v. 18. Compare 2 Kings vi. 16; 1 John iv. 4. If it were necessary to save one of his people, God would send twelve legions of angels at any time to do the work.

31. The study of each of the divine attributes is in its place proper and useful. Here the Psalmist mentions God's perpetuity, v. 19. Many promises and mercies are by that divine perfection made sure to us! Because God is eternal he is unchangeable, and therefore his government is unchangeable, and therefore all he did for saints of old he will, if it be necessary, do for saints now and hereafter.

32. If God should grant us prosperity, let us be vigilant lest we fall into that state denoted in Scripture by being at ease, and by good writers by being in carnal security, v. 19. To grow worse under benefits is not uncommon, but it is a dark sign.

33. Have we spoken or acted unkindly to any? Are we true to our friendships? Have we always kept our word? Are our present morals blameless on these points? Such inquiries are not idle, v. 20.

34. Though candor may not be in vogue, yet both God and good men must ever abhor all kinds of insincerity, v. 21. Horne: "Of this complexion are the cant of hypocrites, the charity of bigots and fanatics, the benevolence of atheists, the professions of the world, the allurements of the flesh, and the temptations of Satan, when he thinks proper to appear in the character of an angel of light." Luther: "Virulent, outside-show hypocrites distress the hearts of those that fear God in a manner that is beyond description."

35. One class of deceivers, peculiarly dangerous to the young and inexperienced consists of flatterers, v. 21. They are mean, servile, selfish, malignant to a degree almost inconceivable, till you find them out.

36. So long as we have a God to go to, what more do we need? v. 22. Rivers of sorrow may roll over us, and mountains of care rest upon us, but if we cast all on God, he will sustain us. "When shall we trust Christ to govern the world which he has redeemed?"

37. A sight of the end of the wicked would at once remove all envy from the mind of a wise man, v. 23.

38. The triumph of the wicked is short, v. 23.

39. Whatever comes, let us practise the duties of piety, and especially let us exercise holy trust in God, which is at the foundation of every stable Christian character, v. 23.

PSALM LVI.

To the chief Musician upon Jonath-elem-rechokim, Michtam of David, when the Philistines took him in Gath.

1 Be merciful unto me, O God, for man would swallow me up: he fighting daily oppresseth me.

2 Mine enemies would daily swallow me up: for they be many that fight against me, O thou Most High.

3 What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee.

4 In God I will praise his word, in God I have put my trust; I will not fear what flesh can do unto me.

5 Every day they wrest my words: all their thoughts are against me for evil.

6 They gather themselves together, they hide themselves, they mark my steps, when they wait for my soul.

7 Shall they escape by iniquity? in thine anger cast down the people, O God.

8 Thou tellest my wanderings: put thou my tears into thy bottle: are they not in thy book?

9 When I cry unto thee, then shall mine enemies turn back: this I know; for God is for me.

10 In God will I praise his word: in the LORD will I praise his word.

11 In God have I put my trust: I will not be afraid what man can do unto me.

12 Thy vows are upon me, O God: I will render praises unto thee.

13 For thou hast delivered my soul from death: will not thou deliver my feet from falling, that I may walk before God in the light of the living?

ON parts of the title see on titles of Psalms iv. xvi. xxxiv. When the Philistines took him in Gath doubtless refers to the scrap of history in 1 Sam. xxi. 10-15. If so, the historic occasion of this Psalm is the same as that of Ps. xxxiv. That part of the title now calling for explanation is Upon Jonath-elem-rechokim—Upon the dove of silence (in places) afar off; Calvin: Upon the silent dove in distant places. The variations from this are unimportant, or are attempts at interpretation.

There are three principal opinions respecting the meaning of this part of the title: 1. That it refers to the instrument used in performing the Psalm. So Jebb and others. 2. That these words point to the musical notes which were to be used in singing this Psalm. So Bochart, Fry, Mudge, Edwards; 3. The more probable and better supported view is that the title is mystical, or enigmatical. So several of the ancient versions, Calvin, Ainsworth, Horsley, Tholuck, Alexander and others. Scott: "David had been harmless as a dove, in the midst of Saul's persecutions; he was silent and patient under oppression; he was now driven, like a timorous dove, to a distance from his home and from the ordinances of God; and when exposed to extreme danger from the Philistines, set on perhaps by the relations of Goliath, he bore all patiently and attempted no revenge." Hammond has an extended note to show that David was in no danger among the Philistines; but this is so contrary to the almost uniform impression made by reading the narrative that it requires no formal refutation. Beyond a doubt David wrote this Psalm. Scott dates it B. C. 1061; Clarke, B. C. 1062. In it we have two names of the Creator, Elohim God and Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2. Most High will be noticed in its place.

1. Be merciful unto me, O God; in Ps. li. 1, rendered Have mercy upon me, O God. The urgency of this case is next expressed: For man would swallow me up. The ancient versions read, hath trodden me under foot; church of England, goeth about to devour me. Others suggest hunts, persecutes, gapes after, pants after; in Job vii. 2, the same verb is, earnestly desireth. It denotes the insatiable rage, with which they assailed him. On Enosh here rendered man see Introduction, § 16. It points to his foes, Jews and Philistines. He fighting daily oppresseth me. Fighting, see on Ps. xxxv. 1. Oppresseth, crusheth. The hostility to David was deadly all round. Saul sought his life. The Philistines were full of wrath against the man, that had killed their champion.

2. Mine enemies would daily swallow me up. Daily and would swallow, the same as in v. 1. The change from the singular to the plural is quite common. For enemies the margin would allow us to read observers, meaning those who kept a sharp and unfriendly eye upon him. For they be many that fight against me. Fight, as in Ps. xxxv. 1. Except a handful of true friends, it seemed as if the world was against the son of Jesse. O thou Most High. The Hebrew is not that rendered Most High in Ps. vii. 17, nor in our version is it ever rendered Most High in any other place, although found in the Hebrew Bible more than fifty times. There are but two other places where it is applied, as an epithet, to God; Ps. xcii. 8; Mic. vi. 6. It is commonly rendered from above, on high, high places, high; once loftily, Ps. lxxiii. 8. So Anderson would render it here. Dathe, Berlin, Gesenius and Hengstenberg render it Proudly; The Arabic, Septuagint, Venema, Amesius, Piscator, Horsley, Clarke, Scott, Fry and Jebb, from on high; Mudge, with a high hand; Chandler, in high places, or stations; Edwards, at great advantage; Tholuck, insolently. The common version agrees with the Chaldee, Calvin, Ainsworth, Aquila, Horne and Alexander. The probable meaning is they 'fight against me from the high places of authority, both in Jerusalem and in Gath,' q. d., My enemies are in power.

3. What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee. Some vary the tense of both clauses, but the mass of translations virtually agree with the common version. A pious man confides in God's existence, perfections, providence and word. On these he relies surely and steadfastly. Will trust, the same verb as in Ps. iv. 5, and in the same form as in Ps. ix. 10. David was no braggart. He did not deny that fear sometimes invaded his mind. At such times his piety showed him the refuge—holy trust.

4. In God I will praise his word. In God, i. e., either 1. By, with, or through, his help and favor; in Ps. lx. 12, it is rendered through God; or, 2. Emphatically in God, and not in another, or, 3. In God I will boast (as to) his word. We need divine assistance even in praise. In God David saw much to praise, but at this time he praises his word, all the truth he has spoken, perhaps with a special reference to his word of promise and prophecy respecting David's accession to the throne. Things now looked dark, but the word of God was unchanged and unchangeable. In God I have put my trust. The verb is in the preterite, expressing a habit of his life. I will not fear what flesh can do unto me. We know what is to be the result when the omnipotent God is on one side and impotent man on the other. We have parallel texts in v. 11; Ps. xxvii. 1; cxviii. 6; Isa. xxxi. 3; Heb. xiii. 6. David's confidence was wholly in God, and not at all in man.

5. Every day they wrest my words. Wrest, pervert, torture, distort. Hammond thinks the meaning is, they made my words detestable; church of England for wrest has mistake. It is easy by the change of a word, or by tone or gesture to make men utter things which they abhor. In this evil art some have made great proficiency. Such foes have no friendly mind. All their thoughts are against me for evil. Edwards: They think of nothing else but to do me mischief; church of England: All that they imagine is to do me evil; Jebb: Against me all their imaginings are for evil. Nor were David's enemies idle:

6. They gather themselves together. Not merely one or two foes but a large number of wicked men opposed him, and they met and consulted. They hide themselves, i. e., They practise secret and uncandid arts towards me that they may find out my plans and acts, and that they may conceal their own intentions and snares. They mark my steps. Calvin: They watch my heels. The sense is either that they dog his steps to do him evil, or that they watch for his stumbling. Alexander gives a third interpretation and thinks the Hebrew word has probably the same sense as in Ps. xlix. 5, on which see. When they wait for my soul, i. e., wait to destroy my life. 'Nothing would satisfy them but his death.'

7. Shall they escape by iniquity? Some drop the interrogative form. Some for iniquity read vanity, mischief. The meaning pretty certainly is that so far as they have succeeded it has been by wicked means, or, so far as they hope for success it is wholly by unrighteous measures. In thine anger cast down the people, O God. People, in the plural peoples—all who had united to destroy David. On the imprecatory form of this clause see Introduction, § 6.

8. Thou tellest my wanderings. Tellest, countest, takest account of, payest attention to. The clause is a grateful recognition of God's kindness up to this hour, and implies confidence that it will be continued. Put thou my tears into thy bottle, i. e., Remember all my tears and sorrows. Valuable liquors the Jews put into a bottle, Josh. ix. 13; Judg. iv. 19; 1 Sam. xvi. 20; Matt. ix. 17. So David here asks that God will remember and treat as precious the tears [literally tear] he has shed. Some indeed suppose that there is a reference to the lachrymaries used by the Greeks and Romans. These were little urns, capable of being closed, and were often deposited full of tears with the bodies of lamented relatives; but we know not that this custom was in vogue among the ancient Jews. Are they not in thy book? Here as in many other cases the interrogation has the force of strong assertion. A book was for remembrance or registry. He, who numbers the hairs of our heads will not overlook our wanderings in exile, nor forget our tears.

9. When I cry unto thee, then shall mine enemies turn back. Turn back, see on Ps.

vi. 10, where the same verb is rendered return. David often beheld marked deliverances. Shame and defeat are implied in this turning back. Their retreat should begin when David should pray earnestly against them. This I know, i. e., I know that my enemies shall flee when I cry to the Lord. For God is for me, i. e., so as to be against them. Other interpretations are given to the latter part of this verse, but none is so good as this.

10. In God will I praise his word; in the LORD will I praise his word. See on v. 4. David was walking not by appearances, but by the light of the promises and doctrines of the Bible. To these we must often resort and reassure our confidence.

11. In God have I put my trust: I will not be afraid what man can do unto me. See on v. 4. As often as we are tempted, we must again and again profess and confirm our hope and confidence in Jehovah.

12. Thy vows are upon me, O God. On vows see on Ps. xxii. 25; l. 14. David here acknowledges that he was firmly bound to the service of God by solemn religious engagements. Many of these vows were probably made in the anguish of his soul in the time of great affliction. One of them no doubt was that he would make a suitable return of gratitude. I will render praises unto thee. How well David kept these vows is proven by the Book of Praises, the larger part of which he wrote. Calvin thinks his vow includes also sacrifices. No doubt that is correct, as the ancient worship was celebrated with such offerings. But even this hearty praise was better than bullocks, Ps. l. 14, 23.

13. For thou hast delivered my soul from death; 'either, thou hast often saved my life; or, thou hast on some one recent occasion done so; or, I am so sure that my life shall be spared by God, that I speak of it as already accomplished.' Perhaps the latter is the point here intended. Wilt not thou deliver my feet from falling, that I may walk before God in the light of the living? The falling is either in death or into sin. The former is certainly included. Walk points out the course of life. Alexander: "To walk before God is to live in the enjoyment of his favor and protection." The light of the living is the opposite of the darkness of the grave, or of the dead. The last clause may be taken either as a prayer, or as a declaration of strong confidence that it would be done.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Blessed is he, who is so much like a silent dove that he can appropriate to himself the encouragements of this sacred ode. At home or in distant places he may make his boast in God.

2. As long as we live, and in every variety of situation we have need of mercy, v. 1. If we need pardon, we must hope for it through mercy; if we seek protection against men and devils, it must all come through mercy.

3. The war of the wicked against the godly is deadly, vv. 1, 6. Even wild beasts seldom if ever prey upon their own kind; but a furious man is viler than they. All persecutors are alike actuated by relentless rage.

4. Contests, especially with fierce and wicked men, are very uncongenial to good men, v. 1. Yet sometimes there is no escaping from them. In that case we must cry to God to support us.

5. The hostility of the wicked against the righteous seems never to rest, v. 2. One would think that even enmity itself would sometimes grow weary. But nothing but divine grace can take it away.

6. The multitude of foes who rise up against us is often very surprising, v. 2. The wicked rely greatly on numbers. The loud yelp of one hound commonly brings the pack.

7. Good men are not wholly free from occasional fears, v. 3. Some of these are salutary and lead to precaution. But even those which have torment in them may gain temporary possession of a pious mind. Calvin: "Fear and hope may seem opposite and incompatible affections, yet it is proved by observation, that the latter never comes into full exercise unless there exists some measure of the former." It is therefore not uncommon for good men to have a painful sense of their own weakness, and need of help from God. Oftentimes 'faith grows valiant in fight. Albeit it begins like a coward, and staggers in the first conflict, it grows stout and triumphant.'

8. There is a vast difference between saints and sinners. The wicked would swallow up the righteous, v. 2. The righteous would not willingly harm a human being. The wicked are oppressors. The righteous love to lighten grievous burdens. The wicked have fears that end in despair. The righteous hath hope in the darkest hour, vv. 1, 3. Arnd: "This is the way of all enemies, who, confiding in human strength, in external force and earthly might, are full of pride and insolence; but they who commit themselves to God's grace are humble, confide in God, boast themselves not, for they know that everything depends on God's grace, in which all believers are included, are secure against the rage and swelling of the enemies, overcome at last by patience, and see their high minded adversaries overthrown."

9. There is no comfort without trust, vv. 3, 4, 11. If we lean not on God, we are as without God. A staff not used gives no support.

10. It is idle to indulge engrossing fears of puny mortals, vv. 4, 11. They are flesh, and all flesh is grass. We never act more unwisely than when we succumb to apprehensions arising from man's wisdom or power. Until our foes can cope with the Almighty, can 'confront omnipotence,' or 'check the stream of the divine benignity,' or 'oppose the artillery of the skies,' a righteous man, having a righteous cause, has no ground of alarm. Henry: "As we must not trust to an arm of flesh, when it is engaged for us, so we must not be afraid of an arm of flesh, when it is stretched out against us." Morison: "The fear of God is the great antidote against the fear of man."

11. Let God's people ever cling to his word and praise it, vv. 4, 10. Its promises and doctrines contain all we need to hold us up in the darkest hours. This was David's reliance, into whose mouth Luther puts these words: "I will glory in the word of God: for I have a command, a declaration and a promise in my favor." Arnd: "As Saul and the potentates of the world boast of their hosts of war, their thousands of men, and their munitions, I will glory in God's word and promise."

12. If we have not the deliverance, yet if we have the promise of it, let us be calm and undisturbed, v. 4.

13. He must be weak and ignorant, who thinks some strange thing has happened, when his words are grossly perverted, v. 5. It has always been so. Christ himself was subject to this grievance.

14. The human mind without grace is a nest of wickedness swarming with thoughts of evil, v. 5. Compare Gen. vi. 5; viii. 21; Ps. v. 9; Matt. xv. 19.

15. If the secrecy of the plottings of the wicked was complete, concealing them from God himself, they would have a great and decisive advantage, for they are uncandid and full of chicanery. But Jehovah sees them when they hide themselves. If the saints do not know the evil designed against them, their heavenly Father does; and so it all comes to nought, v. 6. A just man in a just cause, finding his enemies countless, united, powerful, spiteful, cruel and crafty, may still be confident. Henry: "None are raised so high, or settled so firmly, but the justice of God can bring them down, both from their dignities, and from their confidences."

16. It is all in vain to hope that sin will in a single case end well, v. 7. This would require that Jehovah should change or be dethroned.

17. Because God leads us to a place and keeps us there for a season, that is no evidence that he will not call us to yet other places, and bless and preserve us there also, v. 8. Some commentators number as many as twelve different removals made by David. Scott: "The Lord graciously notes and orders the removals of his people: while they keep in the path of duty, they cannot be driven from his gracious presence; and their tears of godly sorrow and those which are extorted by persecution, or sympathy with the sufferings of others, will be reserved to be jewels in their crown of glory." Dickson: "God hath so great compassion on his servants in trouble that he reckoneth even the steps of their wanderings and pilgrimage." Blessed be his holy name forever and ever; and let every creature say, Amen, Ps. cxlvi. 9.

18. God will not be unmindful of our tears and sorrows. O no! He puts them in his bottle, v. 8. He registers them in his book. Trials will bring tears. "But," says Arnd, "here lies a powerful consolation, that God gathers up such tears, and puts them into his bottle, just as one would pour precious wine into a flagon, so precious and dear are such tears before God, and God lays them up as a treasure in the heavens; and if we think that all such tears are lost, lo! God hath preserved them for us a treasure in the heavens, with which we shall be richly consoled in that day, Ps. cxxvi. 5." Calvin: "We may surely believe, that if God bestows such honor upon the tears of his saints, he must number every drop of their blood. Tyrants may burn their flesh and their bones, but the blood remains to cry aloud for vengeance; and intervening ages can never erase what has been written in the register of God's remembrance."

19. God is for the righteous, and they ought to know it, v. 9. Who then can be against them? What more do they need? He is infinite, eternal, unchangeable. 'Faith is not a fallible conjecture.'

20. Who can tell the power of prayer, indited by the Holy Spirit and offered in true faith? v. 9. It secures Omnipotence on its side. Morison: "How vain and fruitless then to contend with the prayers of the faithful, when all Heaven's resources are, as it were, at their command! How many judgments have they both averted and inflicted!"

21. Calvin: "When exposed to the opposition of assailants formidable for strength, or policy, or any worldly advantages, let us learn with David to set God in opposition to them, and we shall be speedily able to view the mightiest of them without dismay," v. 11.

22. Whatever the nature of our religious vows, if they be but lawful, let us fulfil them heartily and cheerfully, v. 12. Clarke: "Reader, what hast thou vowed to God? To renounce the devil and all his works, the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, and all the sinful desires of the flesh; to keep God's holy word and commandments, and to walk before him all the days of thy life. These things hast thou vowed; and these vows are upon thee. Wilt thou pay them?" Dickson: "An honest heart is no less desirous to perform the duty of praise after delivery, than he was ready to make his vow and his promise before his delivery."

23. Whatever our case may be, let us always render praises, v. 12. They are always due to God. Continual mercies call for continual thanksgivings, and 'singular deliverances call for singular expressions of gratitude and praise.'

24. A past deliverance should not be allowed to grow out of date; but should be frequently mentioned both for the strengthening of faith in ourselves and others, and for the glory of our great Deliverer, v. 13.

25. "Those that think they stand must take heed lest they fall, because the best stand no longer than God is pleased to uphold them," v. 13.

26. A desire for the continuance of life is natural, and is not necessarily nor always wicked, v. 13.

27. This Psalm teaches us that in times of freedom from bloody persecutions the saints should give thanks accordingly. It is a great mercy not to be called to resist unto blood.

PSALM LVII.

To the chief Musician, Al-taschith, Michtam of David, when he fled from Saul in the cave.

1 Be merciful unto me, O God, be merciful unto me, for my soul trusteth in thee: yea, in the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge, until these calamities be overpast.

2 I will cry unto God most high; unto God that performeth all things for me.

3 He shall send from heaven, and save me from the reproach of him that would swallow me up. Selah. God shall send forth his mercy and his truth.

4 My soul is among lions: and I lie even among them that are set on fire, even the sons of men, whose teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword.

5 Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens; let thy glory be above all the earth.

6 They have prepared a net for my steps; my soul is bowed down: they have digged a pit before me, into the midst whereof they are fallen themselves. Selah.

7 My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed: I will sing and give praise.

8 Awake up, my glory; awake, psaltery and harp: I myself will awake early.

9 I will praise thee, O Lord, among the people: I will sing unto thee among the nations.

10 For thy mercy is great unto the heavens, and thy truth unto the clouds.

11 Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens: let thy glory be above all the earth.

ON parts of the title see on titles of Psalms iv. xvi. When he fled from Saul in the cave may be understood as referring either, 1, to David's hiding himself in the cave of Adullam, 1 Sam. xxii. 1-5; 2 Sam. xxiii. 13, 14; 2, to his residence in the cave of En-gedi, 1 Sam. xxiii. 29; xxiv. 1-22; 3, generally to his life in the caves of his country. The contents of the Psalm would suit either view. Nor can we decide which is historically correct, nor would it do us any good, if we could. Patrick, Dodd, Gill, Morison, Horne, Clarke and Tholuck favor the second view; Hengstenberg and Alexander the third. The cxlii. Psalm was "A prayer of David when he was in the cave." We have not before met with Al-taschith. It subsequently occurs in the titles of Psalms lviii. lix. lxxv. It is generally agreed that it means Destroy not. The opinions respecting its signification are various. Dimock thinks it 'denotes an instrument of nine strings.' Abenezra and Edwards regard it as referring to the music to be used in singing the Psalm. Hammond, Patrick, Dodd, Clarke and Morison suppose it means Destroy him not, viz.: Saul. This very language is used by David to Abishai in 1 Sam. xxvi. 9. Morison: "The words, Al-taschith, therefore may be intended to show that this sacred ode was composed on that memorable occasion when David was restrained, by an unseen hand, from inflicting any injury upon his cruel adversary, when he might easily have effected his destruction, and when all the external circumstances were such as to have tempted the commission of the unhappy deed." But the Chaldee, Cocceius, Gill, Scott, Hengstenberg and Alexander suppose it means, Destroy me not. Cocceius: "These words David, no doubt, in his great distress, constantly repeated, and afterwards, when he composed this Psalm, committed them to the church and to believers of all ages, that they might make use of them in times of opposition and persecution." It is not an unimportant fact that this explanation suits all the Psalms where Al-taschith occurs.

Many mark resemblances between this and Ps. lvi. Some of them appear in the common version. The authorship of this is undoubtedly Davidic. Scott dates it B. C. 1060, and Clarke B. C. 1061. In it we have four names of the Creator: Elohim God, El God, Gel-yohn Most High and Adonai Lord, on which respectively see on Ps. iii. 2; v. 4; vii. 17; ii. 4. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Be merciful unto me, O God, be merciful unto me; as in Ps. li. 1; lvi. 1. The reduplication of the prayer shows the great straits to which David was now reduced, and the great vehemence of his mind in seeking deliverance. For my soul trusteth in thee. Chaldee: For in thy word my soul hath hoped; Ainsworth: For in thee my soul hopeth for safety; Venema: For in thee my soul has had a protector; Amesius: For to thee my soul hath betaken herself; Alexander: For in thee has my soul sought refuge. The verb is quite the same as in Ps. vii. 1; xi. 1; xvi. 1. When we have at God's bidding committed our case to him, we may plead his honor for our protection. Yea, in the shadow of thy wings will I make my refuge. Ainsworth renders the verb will I hope for safety; church of England, shall be my refuge; Venema, will I have a protector; Hengstenberg, I confide; Alexander, will I seek refuge; literally, will I trust; in this verse rendered trust. The figure of wings is borrowed from those of the cherubim over the mercy-seat, or of a fowl protecting her young. The latter is best. Until these calamities be overpast. Calamities, elsewhere rendered mischiefs, perverse things, mischievous things, also in the singular, iniquity, wickedness, naughtiness, see Ps. v. 9; lv. 11. The calamities of David at this time were the fruit of the wickedness of other people, and are therefore well expressed by a word that means both calamity and iniquity. Calvin renders it wickedness in this place.

2. I will cry unto God most high. Even David, God's prophet, and the sweet singer of Israel, at times had no resource but the promises and prayer. Although most high is here used as an adjective, and not put in capitals, yet it is the same word used in Deut. xxxii. 8; Ps. vii. 17; ix. 2; xviii. 13. David repeats that he will cry, Unto God that performeth all things for me. Calvin understands the clause as equivalent to 'God who carries forward to perfection the work which he has begun.' Horsley renders it, 'God, who will bring things to a conclusion for me.' Pool understands it as signifying that 'God perfects, or finishes all that he has promised.' El God, by Amesius rendered the mighty God; by Alexander, the Almighty.

3. He shall send from heaven and save me. Chaldee: Sends his angel. Jehovah sends angels, commands, energy, all that is necessary to work deliverance. He will send help from heaven and save me, i. e., rescue me from the power and craft of my foes, from the calamities now passing over me, the wickednesses now pressing me. Saul shall not have my life. From the reproach of him that would swallow me up. This clause is variously rendered. The word from is supplied by our translators. Chaldee: He shall save me, covering with eternal disgrace him that was treading me down; Arabic: And made those, who were trampling upon me, a reproach; Septuagint and Vulgate: He gave to reproach them that trod upon me; Ainsworth: He hath put to reproach him that would swallow me up; Hare: He will expose him to shame who would devour me; the margin has: He reproacheth him that would swallow me up. This is certainly better than the English text. Hammond throws the weight of his name against the common rendering. The sense may be, 1. My enemy uses opprobrious language; or, 2. God is now delivering (or shall deliver) my foe to reproach. Swallow up, see on Ps. lvi. 1, 2. God shall send forth his mercy and his truth. Mercy, often so rendered, also loving-kindness, Ps. xvii. 7; kindness, Ps. xxxi. 21; goodness, Ps. xxxiii. 5; merciful kindness, Ps. cxvii. 2. Truth, almost invariably so rendered, embracing the ideas of stability, uprightness, faithfulness. On fit occasions God displays both mercy and truth to the joy of his people, to the confusion of his enemies, to the glory of his name. Clarke: "Mercy and truth are personified;" Morison: "By a beautiful figure of speech, the divine mercy and faithfulness are here represented as messengers ever ready to be dispatched from heaven to execute redemption for the church."

4. My soul is among lions. Chaldee: My soul burns as if in the midst of flames; Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: And he hath delivered my soul from the midst of the young lions; Amesijs: I am among fierce lions; Kennicott and Clarke: My soul dwells in parched places. Of these renderings some are mere interpretations; others depend on a misapprehension of the root of the word rendered lions. The common version is best and is well sustained by authority. And I lie even among them that are set on fire. For them that are set on fire the Chaldee has coals; Ainsworth, inflamers; Amesijs and Green, incendiaries; Edwards, all on fire; Boothroyd, all burning with rage. The verb, in the future, is best rendered in the present. See Introduction, § 6. It is pretty clear that David intends to say that he is among men of a fiery, fierce spirit, filled with hatred and violence, and exercising their malice towards him in many ways. These are described as The sons of men, literally the sons of Adam; Whose teeth are spears and arrows, and their tongue a sharp sword. Horne: "The fiercest of beasts, the most devouring of elements, and the sharpest of military weapons, are here selected to represent the power and fury of David's enemies." Calvin: "David encountered no heavier trial than the false and calumnious charges which were levelled against him by his enemies."

5. Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens; let thy glory be above all the earth. This verse looks like an abrupt and illogical change of subject. But pious minds in the midst of their greatest sufferings turn with alacrity from themselves to God. Thus our Lord Jesus in his agony cried, Father, glorify thy name, John xii. 28. So here the type of Christ forgets his discomforts or cheerfully submits to them, asking that thereby the Lord may be honored. God's exaltation and glory are and ought to be supreme, above all his works, above the heavens, above all the earth. This verse is a pious ejaculation. The next verse resumes the thread of discourse.

6. They have prepared a net for my steps. Nets were for catching fishes, birds, or wild animals. Here and often the word points to the snares and artifices of wicked and crafty men, whereby they would inveigle men into sin, folly, or ruin, Ps. ix. 15; x. 9; cxl. 5; Mic. vii. 2. Indirection and deceit are essential elements in schemes of wickedness. Living in this state of things was very afflicting to David. My soul is bowed down. Bowed down, as in Ps. cxlv. 14; cxlvi. 8. They have digged a pit before me into the midst whereof they are fallen themselves. Pit, as in Ps. cxix. 85; Jer. xviii. 22. We have the same idea in Ps. ix. 15.

7. My heart is fixed, O God, my heart is fixed. Fixed, margin prepared; Ps. xxxviii. 17, ready; Ps. li. 10, right. Established gives the meaning; see on Ps. li. 10. Although David was in great distress, yet his mind was settled as to his principles. He was fixed in his determination to cleave to the Lord with purpose of heart, to stand in his lot, to adopt no unlawful means of relief, to trust God in the darkest hour, and to be thankful and joyous in God's worship. I will sing and give praise. The latter verb may be rendered Sing Psalms or sing praises; see on Ps. vii. 17; ix. 11. Heartless or even languid praise is an offence to God.

8. Awake up my glory. Our natural powers are dull and sluggish in God's praises, and so they must be aroused by self-exhortation. My glory, i. e., my tongue. By articulate speech hardly less than by reason is man distinguished above all the other inhabitants of earth. What would soon be the state of the world were all its inhabitants now struck dumb, and their muteness made perpetual? David would employ not only his tongue, but instruments of music: Awake, psaltery and harp; see on Ps.

xxxiii. 2. I myself will awake early, q. d., With all my powers, and at early dawn I will enter on this work. Hammond, Geddes, Secker, Street, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander would render it, 'I will awaken the morning,' or 'I will call up the dawn.' This is highly poetical. Anderson here cites Ovid and Milton.

9. I will praise thee, O LORD, among the people. Praise, give thanks. People, plural peoples, or nations as in Ps. vii. 8. The next clause is parallel: I will sing unto thee among the nations. Sing, or sing praises, or sing Psalms. Nations, rendered people in Ps. ii. 1. In Rom. xv. 9, Paul directly applies these words to the kingdom of Christ in its relations to the Gentiles.

10. For thy mercy is great unto the heavens, and thy truth unto the clouds. Mercy and Truth, as in v. 3. God's attributes are not limited. It is wicked to teach that they can be bounded. The heavens and the clouds are the most elevated objects that strike the sense, and so are fit to be employed to teach us the exceedingly exalted nature of God, and especially his mercy and his truth to sinners, who seek refuge under the shadow of his wings; see on Ps. xxxvi. 5.

11. Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens: let thy glory be above all the earth. In the Hebrew as in English this verse is precisely the same as v. 5. It were idolatry and degrading superstition to use towards any creature the Psalms, and hymns and spiritual songs, which we are bound to use in the service of God.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Pious men have often found some set words in prayer very suitable to themselves. David's mind, if we understand the title, often led him to cry, Destroy me not.

2. While life lasts we shall never be done crying for mercy, v. 1. Whether it be famine, pestilence or war, whether it be foes without, or fears within, whether it be at sea or on land, whether it be in sickness or health, in life or in death, our great need is mercy. Yea, we shall need it at the day of Judgment, 2 Tim. i. 18. Nothing but mercy can protect us from human malice or diabolical rage, from personal vindictiveness or legal injustice, from sin in life, from despair in death, or from hell in eternity. When man hates us, let us seek the love of God; when man reproaches us, let us seek the honor that comes from God only; when man is cruel, let us seek God's loving-kindness. A good daily prayer, a good motto for every tempted, troubled soul would be Al-Taschith.

3. The Scriptures are harmonious in declaring the relations of believers to God to be of the most precious and substantial nature. He first approaches us and proposes his covenant. By the grace of his Spirit we trust in him, make him our refuge, and thus set to our seal that he is true, and in so doing he comes to be on our side. Henceforth we may plead his gracious engagement with the utmost freedom and earnestness, v. 1. "Where faith in trouble fleeth unto God it cannot but speed." Jer. xiv. 21.

4. How condescending is God to compare himself to a fowl tender of her young, v. 1. Calvin: "There are seasons when we are permitted to enjoy the calm sunshine of prosperity; but there is not a day of our lives in which we may not suddenly be overtaken by storms of affliction, and it is necessary we should be persuaded that God will cover us with his wings."

5. There is no getting on without trust, confidence in God, v. 1. The want of it annihilates our comforts.

6. Every generation has its calamities, v. 1. Of these none are harder to be borne than those, which come to us through the wickedness of man. God himself is our only sure refuge. Compare Isa. xxvi. 20, 21.

7. If we would have our prayers answered, they must not be dull. We must cry unto God, v. 2. If anything is worth asking for, it is worth asking for in good earnest. 'Elias prayed earnestly.' Without some measure of earnestness prayer is solemn mockery.

8. Our past experience of God's mercies should encourage us to come to him with boldness. If he has performed all things for us hitherto, let us not doubt his mercy at any time hereafter, v. 2. He changes not, but fulfils his engagements.

9. Henry: "In everything that befalls us, we ought to see, and own the hand of God; whatever is done, is of his performing, in it his counsel is accomplished, and the Scripture is fulfilled," v. 2.

10. Like his attributes, God's resources are infinite. He has many on earth, of which we wot not. And he has all heaven beside. And if heaven and earth were all gone, he has himself. It is always safe to expect him to save by raising up instruments and messengers here below, or by sending them from heaven, v. 3. Dickson: "If ordinary means fail, faith assureth itself of God's working wonders for perfecting his promises."

11. It is no new thing for good men to have barbarous foes, who would, if they could, swallow them up, v. 3. Compare Pr. xxx. 14.

12. No reasonable man can doubt the awful depravity of the wicked. Could inspiration have used more decided or forcible language than it has? It says they are fierce, cruel, savage as lions; that they are violent, blind and heedless of all claims for tenderness as fire itself; that the very powers which God has given them for nourishing themselves, their teeth, are used to devour their neighbors, even their best friends; and that their tongue, man's glory, has become, not an instrument of blessing God and man, but a sharp sword to make men bleed, to fill them with pain, and to kill them, v. 4. Such tormentors are quite like their father the devil. His works they are constantly doing. Compare Mic. iii. 5; Gal. v. 15; Hab. i. 13; Ps. lii. 4. The destructive power of evil speaking alone is frightful.

13. Well may good men shut their mouths in uncomplaining silence, seeing their sufferings fall far below those of David, v. 4. If we fare as well as the man after God's own heart, we should never murmur. "The horrors of a lion's den, the burning of a fiery furnace, and the cruel onset of war are the striking images by which David here describes the peril and wretchedness of his present condition."

14. However desperate our own affairs may seem to be, even when we are beset by lies, taunts, calumnies, reproaches, cruel mockings, threats, betrayers and betrayals, rage and wrath, let us chiefly care for the glory of God, vv. 5, 11. If he is exalted, it is well for us to be humbled; if he is glorified, it matters not if we be esteemed the off-scouring of all things. "Father, glorify thy name."

15. Let not God's people in their war with wickedness resort to the devices used by their enemies. O no! The weapons of our warfare are not carnal. We may not use net for net, nor dig pit for pit, v. 6. The sins of man work not the righteousness of God. Religion has no need of unhallowed tempers for her promotion. When men serve God as if the devil was in them they bring great reproach on his blessed name.

16. Good men may be cast down, v. 6. It is not wicked to be sad. Even the Saviour of the world was greatly dejected during most of his life, and unusually so near the time of his death. It is enough to make any good man 'droop and hang the head' to find that even when he has been blameless, he is suspected and maligned. It was always so.

17. Punishment in kind is common even in this world. Men commonly fall into their own pits, v. 6. The Greek proverb is: "Evil advice often becomes most ruinous to the evil adviser;" the Roman, "There is no law more just than that which condemns a man to death by the instrument which he has invented to take away the life of others." Guillotine, who invented the instrument, which bears his name, was executed by the guillotine.

18. One of the darkest signs in some professors of religion is want of stability. Their hearts are not fixed, v. 7. Their principles are not established. They are not settled. This may be owing to ignorance of Scripture doctrine, to natural levity of mind, to evil habits long indulged, to the weakness or want of grace. In every case, instability is a bad sign. Professor of religion, art thou a reed shaken with the wind, a wave of the sea tossed to and fro?

19. It should alarm the wicked that they are contending with a people, who sing and shout on the battle-field, v. 7. Yea, they never sing louder than when most distressed and afflicted. Whether the saints conquer or are conquered, they still sing on. Blessed be God for that. Let sinners tremble at contending with men of a spirit so heavenly.

20. In the whole work of praising and serving God let us use all our powers of body and soul, our tongues, our hands, our voices, our every faculty, v. 8. And let us begin our work early; not forgetting that "the little word early is not to be understood merely of the morning season, but of great diligence, activity, desire and love in the praising of God."

21. Instrumental music in the public worship of God is lawful, v. 8. See REMARKS on Ps. xxxiii. 2.

22. We should not only praise God in secret, but also in the most public manner and before all peoples and nations, if we have opportunity, v. 9. Dickson: "We seriously mind the praise of God when, according to our place, we labor to make others also know God, as we know him."

23. We constantly need the guidance of the Holy Spirit in the study of the Scriptures, that we may get their true scope and meaning. The prophets largely spoke of the Gentiles coming in, v. 9. Yet how slow were even the primitive Christians to believe that the Gospel was for any one beyond Judea!

24. God's perfections, in particular his mercy and his truth make him the fit object of all religious worship, v. 10. To refrain from his worship, when he is duly known and loved, is impossible.

25. As verse 9 is actually quoted in the New Testament as applicable to Gospel times, and as David was in many respects a type of Christ, there is nothing forced or strained in regarding this Psalm as Typical-Messianic. If David was victorious, much more shall Christ be. If David put down all his foes, much more shall Christ subdue all things to himself.

PSALM LVIII.

To the chief Musician, Al-taschith, Michtam of David.

- 1 Do ye indeed speak righteousness, O congregation? do ye judge uprightly, O ye sons of men?
- 2 Yea, in heart ye work wickedness; ye weigh the violence of your hands in the earth.
- 3 The wicked are estranged from the womb: they go astray as soon as they be born, speaking lies.
- 4 Their poison is like the poison of a serpent: they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear;
- 5 Which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely.
- 6 Break their teeth, O God, in their mouth: break out the great teeth of the young lions, O

7 Let them melt away as waters which run continually: when he bendeth his bow to shoot his arrows, let them be as cut in pieces.

8 As a snail which melteth, let every one of them pass away: like the untimely birth of a woman, that they may not see the sun.

9 Before your pots can feel the thorns, he shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living, and in his wrath.

10 The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance: he shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked.

11 So that a man shall say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous: verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth.

ALL the phrases of the title are explained on titles of Psalms iv. xvi. lvii. The authorship of David is undoubted. This Psalm has no known historic occasion, although its contents show that it refers to a time of bitter persecution. Scott and Clarke both date it B. C. 1061. In it we find Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

1. Do ye indeed speak righteousness, O congregation? do ye judge uprightly, O ye sons of men? Chaldee: Does it indeed seem to you that ye speak justice when ye [who are or ought to be] just ones are silent in the time of strife? Judge the sons of men in uprightness; Amesius: Do ye truly speak justice, O band? do ye judge the things, which are right, ye sons of men? Edwards: Do ye really pronounce righteous sentence? and do ye judge equitably, ye sons of men? Horsley: Are ye in earnest, O faction, when ye talk of righteousness, do ye give sentence uprightly, O ye sons of men? Hengstenberg: Are ye then indeed dumb, that ye will not speak what is righteous, and judge what is upright, ye children of men? For righteousness, Waterland has truth. For congregation we may read Band, Company, Assembly, Council, literally a sheaf. Patrick supposes it designates Saul's Privy Council. In the Hebrew Bible it nowhere else means assembly. This has led many to think the word should be rendered dumb or silent. If we drop or vary the Masoretic points, this may well be the reading. The change of a letter would then also give us princes or judges. In this case the sense is given by Alexander in his paraphrase: "Can it be? is it possible? are you really silent, you whose very office is to speak for God, and against the sins of men? See Deut. i. 16, 17." Taking the clauses according to the common version, we may regard them as a bold and unqualified denial of the justice of the accusations against him. David honors these men by calling them an assembly or council; but he also calls them sons of man, either to remind them of their frailty and accountability, or, to let them know that even here their real characters are understood and they are not sons of God.

2. Yea, in heart ye work wickedness. All the time they were sitting as solemn and dignified judges, they were meditating wrong and injury. Their very station should have warned them against injustice, but they intentionally used their position to work wickedness. Ye weigh [or ponder] the violence of your hands in the earth. What they did, they did deliberately, with malice prepense. Violence, often so rendered, also wrong, cruelty, injustice, damage, violent dealing, Ps. vii. 16; xxvii. 12. It further aggravated their crimes that they did all this injustice in the land of Israel, where were excellent statutes and ordinances of justice, and where God had presented many and urgent motives to uprightness in all, especially in judges.

3. The wicked are estranged from the womb. For estranged some have alienated, aliens, froward, wicked, strangers to pity. The clause asserts native hereditary depravity. Compare Isa. lxviii. 8; Eph. ii. 3. Ainsworth: "This noteth man's natural corruption;" Pool: "The sense is, No wonder they act so unrighteously, for their very natures and principles are corrupt from their birth; they are the wicked offspring of sinful parents." They go astray so soon as they be born, speaking lies. Estrangement from God is very naturally attended by signs of wickedness towards man, and especially by want of truthfulness. What parent's heart has not ached at infallible evidence of a tendency to falsehood in his offspring? It requires the best precepts and examples, enforced by the highest authority and the most steadfast government to save children and youth from growing up to be arrant liars.

4. Their poison is like the poison of a serpent. Poison, elsewhere rendered also rage, wrath, fury, anger; see on Ps. vi. 1, where it is rendered hot displeasure. Here it means venom. The poison of serpents is a 'fiery liquor,' which is soon spread through the system. It is a fit emblem of the deadly malice of violent men. I have seen a man thrown by it in a few minutes into a raging fever, and into dreadful pain. In this verse there may be an allusion also to the old serpent, Rev. xx. 2. These violent men resembled one species of serpent in another respect: They are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear. Some have alleged that the stories respecting some kinds of serpents being unaffected by sounds are fabulous. This can hardly be so. The belief is too widely spread in countries where serpents abound. The species here spoken of is the asp. The word here rendered adder occurs six times in the Bible, and is always rendered asp except here and in Ps. xci. 13; and even then the margin gives asp. Other words are rendered adder in Gen. xlix. 17; Ps. cxl. 3; Pr. xxiii. 32. There was no remedy for the poison of the asp. Its bite was fatal in a few minutes. Some modern travellers say that this species of serpent is still found in countries east of the Mediterranean.

5. Which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely. Charmers of serpents are still common in India and Egypt. That they possess power over venomous reptiles so as to make them harmless cannot be denied, for they often exhibit themselves and their serpents. Compare Eccle. x. 11; Jer. viii. 17. But over the asp these men are said to have had no power. The reason given by some is that asps are entirely deaf; by others that though they have hearing, yet to the mur-muring noise made by charmers they close their ears; and by others that they are so venomous that the charmer has no power over them at any time. Which of these is true in natural history the author has no means of determining. The latter is most probable. The import of the passage is that David's enemies were obstinately deaf to all tender appeals, to all the demands of justice, to the dictates of nationality and of conscience. Such a transaction as that recorded in 1 Sam. xxiv. 4-20 ought forever to have terminated the Sauline persecutions. They were not provoked even by imprudence, much less by any crime.

6. Break their teeth, O God, in their mouth. On breaking the teeth, see on Ps. iii. 7. The allusion is to rendering beasts of prey powerless by breaking their teeth. This is a very old figure among sacred writers, Job iv. 10. Break out the great teeth of the young lions, O LORD. On young lions see on Ps. xvii. 12; xxxiv. 10. A friend, who has spent a quarter of a century in South Africa, informs me that the old lion becomes toothless and clumsy, and has great difficulty in securing his prey, or in eating it, as he has first to tear it to pieces with his claws. Compare Job iv. 11. The prayer of David is that his enemies, though strong and active, may be rendered powerless for mischief and cruelty against him. On the imprecatory form see Introduction, § 6.

7. Let them melt away as waters which run continually. The verbs are in the future. The modern signification of the word melt renders it not so good here as flow or pass away. The same form of the verb is in Job vii. 5 rendered become loathsome. Calvin: Let them flow away like waters, let them depart; church of England: Let them fall away like water that runneth apace; Green: Let them waste away like water which runneth continually; Chaldee (interpreting): Let them melt away in their sins like water, let them flow away from themselves; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: They shall come to nothing, like water running down. When he bendeth his bow to shoot his arrows let them be as cut in pieces. On the mode of bending the bow see on Ps. vii. 13; xi. 2; xxxvii. 14. The reader will notice that in the common version much is supplied by the translators. Rogers: "I am persuaded that some word, the name of something with which the wicked, perishing under the divine vengeance, were compared, is lost in the Hebrew." The chief difficulty is in determining what are the antecedents of he and them. The Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Doway, Jarchi, Venema, Edwards, Horsley, Green and Fry regard he as referring to God, and them to the enemies of David. On the other hand Calvin has: Let them bend their bow, and let their arrows be as broken. In the interpretation thus indicated Amesius, Patrick, Mudge and Hengstenberg concur. Ainsworth, Gill and Alexander mention both with respect, but express no preference for either. As it is very common in Hebrew to pass from the plural to the singular and for them read him, there is evidently less difficulty in admitting it to be the wicked who bends his bow; q. d., 'When the wicked bends his bow to shoot the righteous, when he devises mischief against him, shoots out bitter words, and desires to destroy his good name and even his life, let it be as if the string of his bow and his arrows were cut in pieces; let all his wicked designs, words and actions be without effect.'

8. As a snail which melteth, let every one of them pass away. The word rendered snail is found nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible, another word, probably signifying a kind of lizard, being so rendered in Lev. xi. 30, the only other place where the word snail is found in our English Bible. Instead of As a snail, the Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Horsley and Fry read Like wax. But the Chaldee fairly allows the English translation, and it has been adopted by nearly all modern interpreters. The word melteth is very expressive in application to the snail, which smears its track wherever it goes, and if it continues to move in the open air is soon wasted away. Like the untimely birth of a woman, that they may not see the sun. Compare Job iii. 16. Calvin: "If we consider the length of time to which in their vain confidence they expected their lives to extend, they may be said to pass out of this world before they have well begun to live." Alexander gives it another turn: "So far from living too long, as I feared, they seem scarcely to have lived at all."

9. Before your pots can feel the thorns, he shall take them away as with a whirlwind, both living, and in his wrath. Anderson: "This verse has been deemed one of the most difficult passages in the Psalter, and has greatly perplexed commentators." Yet the perplexity has not regarded its import, but the method of explaining its figurative language. In attempting to understand it, let us remember that the burning of thorns under a pot is a frequent figure of Scripture; see Ps. cxviii. 12; Ecc. vii. 6. The manifest object of these passages is to teach us how soon the wicked and their merriment pass away. To this day on the routes of eastern travel the chief fuel in many places is found in the thorns and briars, the furze and stick-weeds that grow in those regions. These burn with great intensity, but their blaze is soon over, for they have very little substance. So the prophet here predicts that 'the prosperous rage of his foes would soon be extinct,' and that they should be removed even sooner than a fire of thorns would make a pot to boil; yea, that they should be taken away as with a whirlwind. This is another allusion well understood in the east; see Pr. i. 27; x. 25; Hosea xiii. 3. So we have two figures here, both striking, not mixed, but closely following each other. Then if we refer living and in wrath to God, we have a good sense. The living God in his wrath shall take them away. This leaves the particle as, or so, or thus, or when, or as it were unexplained. May we not however thus render the whole? 'Before your pot can be heated with a fire of thorns, even as by a whirlwind, so the living God, even as in his wrath, shall take them away.' Grotius gives much the same: Before your pots can perceive or feel the thorns, so likewise shall the anger of God snatch you away, as it were in a whirlwind. Tholuck: "As the tempest of the desert tears away the half-burnt thorns ere the pots can feel their flame."

10. The righteous shall rejoice when he seeth the vengeance. Vengeance, i. e., righteous retribution, vindicating God's government from the charge of not seeing or caring for what is done on earth, setting David free from their malice, and putting it out of their power to do further mischief. Compare Ps. lii. 6; lxiv. 10; cvii. 42; Pr. xi. 10. He shall wash his feet in the blood of the wicked. The allusion is to the battle where the enemy leaves the ground covered with gore, so that when the victor comes he bathes or moistens his feet in blood. The victory of the righteous over the wicked shall in the end be perfect, complete, entire; see Ps. lxviii. 23; Isa. lxiii. 3; Rev. xiv. 20. It spoils the figure to put hands for feet in this place, as the Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway have done.

11. So that a man [i. e., any man, every man] shall say, Verily there is a reward for the righteous. The word rendered reward occurs more than one hundred times, and is in all other cases rendered fruit, or in the plural, fruits. Even here the margin has fruit. But it often signifies reward in the highest sense, as in Pr. i. 31; Mic. vii. 13. Reward, like fruit, may signify deserved recompense or appropriate consequence. Here it is used in the latter sense. And every man shall say, Verily he is a God that judgeth in the earth. To judge is to make laws, to rule, and to enforce decisions, as well as to preside in trials and pronounce sentence. In the earth; not merely in heaven as some profanely allege, but in this world and in this life Jehovah reigns.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. "In all ages wickedness has borne the same leading characteristics." A truthful description of human sinfulness in David's time suits our age, vv. 1-4. Men may be changed by divine grace; but man is unchanged.

2. Uprightness and justice are essential qualities in any good character, and in every government, v. 1. No smooth exterior, no profession of honor and of piety, no deeds of charity can be accepted as substitutes. In rulers want of purity is monstrous. Scott: "Injustice established by law, and decreed by judges, is more malignant than any other." Solomon knew no greater vanity and vexation than when he "saw under the sun the place of judgment, that wickedness was there." Compare Ecc. v. 8.

3. Though our conduct in the presence of our rulers should be humble and meek; yet it need not be mean and servile. Nay, we may lawfully and manfully appeal to them when they are prejudiced or violent, and ask for our rights and not a mockery of justice, vv. 1, 2. So did David. So did Christ. So did Paul. Scott: "We may very properly appeal to the consciences of such iniquitous judges, whether indeed they speak righteously, and decide uprightly?" We may say, "Is this the justice you pretend to administer? Is this the countenance which an honest man, and an honest cause may expect from you? Remember you are mortal and dying, and that you stand upon the same level, before God, with the meanest of those you trample upon, and must yourselves be called to an account and judged."

4. A grand support is a good conscience. With it David could challenge his persecutors, though they were in power, vv. 1, 2. Calvin: "Although the whole world be set against the people of God they need not fear, so long as they are supported by a sense of their integrity, to challenge kings and their counsellors, and the promiscuous mob of the people. Should the whole world refuse to hear us, we must learn, by the example of David, to rest satisfied with the testimony of a good conscience, and with appealing to the tribunal of God."

5. When men weigh and ponder and meditate their schemes of wickedness, that they may lay deep plots, and provide against all contingencies likely to result in failure, then they are on the highway to the deepest corruption, the deepest infamy, and the heaviest doom, v. 2.

6. Native depravity is taught in all the Scriptures, not as an excuse for a wicked life, but as the cause of it, v. 3. David says it involved him in his great crime, Ps. li. 5. He here says it was the cause of the wickedness perpetrated against him, v. 3. Calvin: "We all come into the world stained with sin, possessed, as Adam's posterity, of a nature essentially depraved, and incapable, in ourselves, of aiming at anything which is good; but there is a secret restraint upon most men, which prevents them from going all lengths in iniquity." Scott: "When we behold the effects of natural depravity in the atrocious crimes of others, we should be humbled by recollecting that the principles of them all are in our hearts also." Hengstenberg: "That the inborn depravity is quite general, extending to the whole family of man appears from Gen. viii. 21; Ps. li. 5; Job xiv. 4." Morison: "The death and sufferings of infants sufficiently demonstrate the existence of original sin." Slade: "While we mourn over the wickedness and the crimes of ungodly men, let us be humbly thankful that it hath pleased our merciful Lord to 'make us differ' from them. We were born with the same corrupt nature as they, inclined 'to go astray and speak lies,' and commit all manner of sin." Dickson: "Men's wicked actions prove the wickedness of their natures."

7. The enmity of the seed of the bond woman to the seed of the free woman is deadly. It is like the poison of a serpent, v. 4. If God prevent not, it kills.

8. When one is made to feel the malice of sinners, as it is sometimes let loose, he will not find the terms of Scripture too strong to express his sense of their virulence, v. 4. Poison of serpents will seem to him mild language.

9. None are so deaf as those who will not hear, vv. 4, 5. This is the ruinous art of sinners, who have the Gospel and continue in sin. They have ears but do not hear. This was the cause of the horrible murder of Stephen, Acts vii. 57, 58.

10. The doom of incorrigible sinners will be as just as it will be dreadful; because they refuse to hear, or feel, or obey the loudest, sweetest calls that even mercy sends forth, vv. 4, 5. If they know not the right, it is because they love not truth.

11. O slanderer! quit thy nefarious and atrocious business. Thy fangs are more deadly than those of the asp, vv. 4, 5. Verily thou art worse than the most evil beasts. God does not hate asps, but he hates thy practices.

12. However affluent and mighty the wicked may now be, God can at any moment make them entirely powerless, v. 6. And he will probably do it much sooner than any one expects.

13. David's faith led him confidently to pray for the defeat of the schemes of his foes, and as confidently to predict their overthrow, vv. 6-9. He did this when they were in full possession of power and of the resources of the land, with a fair prospect of continuance. Yet he prayed that all this might come to nothing, and he predicted it should come to nothing, and to nothing it came. If our cause is just, let us confide in God, even in the darkest hour.

14. It is as easy for God to scatter all our foes, as it is for him to dissipate the mists of the morning, or to maintain the law, by which heaps of water separate from each other, seeking their own level, and thus entirely losing their power, v. 7.

15. As compared with one another men may be and often are very respectable; but as compared with God they are as nothing, v. 7. If the sinner draws his bow, God can easily cut his arrows in pieces. If he heaps up wealth, God can blow upon it, and it vanishes. In his most assiduous labors he is often as a partridge that sitteth upon eggs and hatcheth them not. Luther: "The enemies of God and truth plan, plot and breathe out dreadful things; but like a mighty flame, where there is no more fuel left to feed it, their fury ends in nothing." Calvin: "Let us not cease to pray, even after the arrows of our enemies have been fitted to the string, and destruction might seem inevitable."

16. After all their vamping and vaunting, the wicked are alike snails and abortions, v. 8. Compare Eccle. viii. 12, 13.

17. The destruction of the wicked is awfully sudden, as by a whirlwind, v. 9. Compare Prov. xxix. 1; 1 Thess. v. 3. This is righteous. It could not be otherwise. They would not be warned. Morison: "In the midst of their oppressive and impious career the tokens of divine judgment may overtake them, in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye." Clarke: "From the time that the fire of God's wrath is kindled about you, it will be but as a moment before ye be entirely consumed by it." Dickson: "Howsoever the ungodly hope to procure for themselves good cheer by their works of iniquity, and rejoice awhile in their hopes, yet before they find any ripe satisfaction by their ill deeds, suddenly they are destroyed."

18. The victory of the righteous over all who oppose their salvation will be so perfect, that it is now one of the greatest exercises of faith simply to believe that the sons of God shall wet their feet with the blood of all their foes, v. 10. The victory of David over Saul, of Elijah over Ahab, of the martyrs over the persecuting emperors was complete without their lifting a finger.

19. It is impossible for good men to refrain from rejoicing at the defeat of the malicious schemes of ungodly men, even though it involves the ruin of many, v. 10. Compare Ex. xiii. Isa. xiv. But this rejoicing must not spring from malice, nor from gratified impatience. It must be that God is honored, innocence vindicated, wickedness put down, and the cause of truth rendered triumphant.

20. However things may seem to be here, in the end all will be so well with the righteous that he himself shall rejoice in it, v. 10. Compare Isa. iii. 10. No man serves God for nought.

21. God has a government on earth, v. 11. "If no sin were punished here, we might be tempted to think there was no God, or that he was not just. And if all sin were adequately punished how could we believe in the divine mercy?"

22. A great end of judgments is attained when God is glorified and sinners are brought to confess his righteousness and authority, v. 11. Compare Isa. xxvi. 9.

23. O ye righteous, lift up the head. Give thanks at the remembrance of God's holiness, mercy and providence. Your redemption draweth nigh. Rejoice and be exceeding glad, for great is your reward in heaven. The more you are rubbed by affliction here, the brighter you will shine hereafter.

24. And, O sinner, wilt not thou think on thy ways? Because they are sinful, they are dark, dangerous and dismal. They lead to hell. They lead no where else. O! it is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. "All nature cannot furnish images adequately to represent the dreadful doom that awaits you, if you die in your sins." Oh that you were wise!

PSALM LIX.

To the chief Musician, Al-taschith, Michtam of David; when Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him.

- 1 Deliver me from mine enemies, O my God: defend me from them that rise up against me.
- 2 Deliver me from the workers of iniquity, and save me from bloody men.
- 3 For, lo, they lie in wait for my soul: the mighty are gathered against me; not for my transgression, nor for my sin, O LORD.
- 4 They run and prepare themselves without my fault: awake to help me, and behold.
- 5 Thou therefore, O LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel, awake to visit all the heathen: be not merciful to any wicked transgressors. Selah.
- 6 They return at evening: they make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city.
- 7 Behold, they belch out with their mouth: swords are in their lips: for who, say they, doth hear?
- 8 But thou, O LORD, shalt laugh at them; thou shalt have all the heathen in derision.
- 9 Because of his strength will I wait upon thee: for God is my defence.
- 10 The God of my mercy shall prevent me: God shall let me see my desire upon mine enemies.
- 11 Slay them not, lest my people forget: scatter them by thy power; and bring them down, O Lord our shield.
- 12 For the sin of their mouth and the words of their lips let them even be taken in their pride: and for cursing and lying which they speak.
- 13 Consume them in wrath, consume them, that they may not be: and let them know that God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth. Selah.
- 14 And at evening let them return; and let them make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city.
- 15 Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied.
- 16 But I will sing of thy power; yea, I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning: for thou hast been my defence and refuge in the day of my trouble.
- 17 Unto thee, O my strength, will I sing: for God is my defence, and the God of my mercy.

ON several clauses of the title see on titles of Psalms iv. xvi. lvii. When Saul sent, and they watched the house to kill him doubtless refers to that interesting scrap of history (which see) in 1 Sam. xix. 11-18, especially v. 11. Doubtless this tells its historic occasion, and David is its author, though Clarke thinks not so. Scott dates it B. C. 1061; Clarke, B. C. 445. The names of the Most High in it are Elohim God, Jehovah LORD and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2; ii. 4. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Deliver me from mine enemies, O my God. Deliver, as in Ps. vii. 1; xxii. 20. Enemies, uniformly so rendered, Ps. iii. 7; vi. 10; l. 9. Defend me from them that rise up against me. Defend, in the future, thou wilt defend. It expresses the strong confidence David had in his escape. Yet the language of petition is not excluded. The same form of the verb is elsewhere rendered defend, Ps. xx. 1; set on high, Ps. lxix. 29; xci. 14; cvii. 41; set up, Isa. ix. 11. Horne renders it exalt. It signifies to set up so as to render safe. Them that rise up, we had the same participle in Ps. xvii. 7. Alexander renders it insurgents or assailants.

2. Deliver me from the workers of iniquity. Deliver, as in v. 1. Workers of iniquity, as in Ps. v. 5; vi. 8. It describes those, who make a trade of sin, particularly of injustice. And save me from bloody men, literally men of bloods. See on Ps. v. 6. Compare Ps. xxvi. 9; lv. 23. David was now so situated that none but God could save him. The city was surrounded by Saul's troops; David's house was besieged by Saul's bloody guards, who watched him with murderous purpose. Saul was determined to have him sick or well, dead or alive. The two verses make known his desire, and the peril of his situation arising from the hatred and violence of his assailants, and from their unprincipled and murderous characters.

3. For, lo, they lie in wait for my soul. Lie in wait, elsewhere lie in ambush. Soul here evidently signifies life. They had surrounded David's house, but not openly. They supposed he could not go out without their seeing him. The mighty are gathered against me. Mighty, also rendered strong, fierce, rough, Ps. xviii. 17; Gen. xlix. 7; Pr. xviii. 23. The plea is from their power, guile, numbers and cruel wrath. He had not provoked their violence. He was hunted, not for my transgression, nor for my sin, O LORD. The basest deceivers and the worst criminals are so much in the habit of making solemn protestations of innocence, that an assertion of our freedom from criminality has with many very little weight. Yet to the innocent it is an unspeakable consolation to be able to deny every charge; and before God in prayer the argument of injured innocence has prodigious power. It was to the Lord David was making his protestation of innocence. The whole power of such a plea depends on its being true. If false, it brings down wrath. In denying transgression, he emphatically denies that form of it, which implies revolt. Saul himself knew David had committed no crime, 1 Sam. xviii. 12-17; xix. 1-7.

4. They run and prepare themselves without my fault. Run expresses activity and energy, Gen. xviii. 7; Ps. cxix. 32; Cant. i. 4. Alexander says both verbs are 'military terms.' So they sometimes are; but the cases cited above express no more than activity and diligence. Prepare, see on Ps. lvii. 7, where its participle is rendered fixed. It here signifies to set things in order, or make arrangements. Without my fault, a new assertion of freedom from crime and from blame. Fault, commonly iniquity. Innocence cannot condemn itself; cannot but lay its claim on a fit occasion to protection. Awake to help me, and behold. For a time wickedness had seemed to reign. David now calls on God to awake, to stir himself up to attend to his condition, to behold or see the real state of the case, and so to help, literally to meet him, evidently in a friendly way.

5. Thou, therefore, O LORD God of hosts, the God of Israel, awake to visit all the heathen. Some have alleged that this accumulation of divine names proved this Psalm to be later than the time of David. But one acquainted with Jewish history and theology to the time of Samuel might fitly use all these names. That David did such things is historically certain from 2 Sam. vii. 18-29, especially in v. 27. Gejerus: "The names contain the reasons for the divine help being immediately extended to him." Compare Pr. xviii. 10. Awake, not the same word so rendered in v. 4, but awake as out of sleep. Thus in Ps. xlv. 23, "Why sleepest thou, O Lord? Arise," or awake. Though the word visit is sometimes taken in a good sense, yet it far more frequently signifies to punish or do judgment on the guilty, Isa. xiii. 11; Jer. ix. 25; li. 52. The heathen, in the plural nations, or Gentiles. The use of this word has led some to doubt whether the Psalm could refer to the Sauline persecution. But it is sufficient to justify its use under the circumstances to state that Saul had heathen among his prominent men, as Doeg the Idumean; that the entire persecution was unworthy any prince, who professed the true religion, and was in its inception and entire prosecution heathenish in principle and manner; that it was an oft-repeated lesson that numerous and powerful as were the Gentiles, yet they were in the grasp of the Almighty, who threshed them in his anger; and much more would he punish a people who knew his laws and rebelled against them. God is the judge of all the earth. Tholuck: "At the judgment of the heathen, the judgment of heathenish-minded Israel will not fail to take place, for God is good to that Israel only that are of a clean heart, Ps. lxxiii. 1." Calvin thinks that in speaking of all the heathen or nations, it is probable David may have been struggling with a temptation with which he was severely assailed, connected with the number of his enemies, for these did not consist merely of three or four abandoned individuals. They formed a great multitude, and he rises above them all by reflecting that God claims it as his prerogative, not only to reduce a few refractory persons to submission, but also to punish the wickedness of the whole world." Hengstenberg: "That the Psalmist especially places God here before his eyes as the judge of all the heathen, so that he might be no more disturbed by the great number and might of his enemies, is manifest from the eighth verse." David often spoke of the number of his foes as very great, Ps. xxvii. 3; cxviii. 10-12. Be not merciful to any wicked transgressors. Ainsworth: Be not thou gracious to any that unfaithfully work iniquity; Edwards: Show no favor to any perfidious workers of iniquity; Green: Show no favors to any who practise idolatry; Horne: Thou wilt not be merciful to any wicked transgressors. The verb is in the future; often rendered be gracious, Amos v. 15; Mal. i. 9; the same as the first word in Psalm li. The Hebrew all is best rendered any to suit English idiom. Transgressors, a participle describing persons who transgress in a treacherous manner. On the imprecatory form see Introduction, § 6.

6. They return at evening. Ordinary laborers quit work in the evening. Although David's foes were not idle during the day, yet like dogs, which infest oriental cities, they renewed with great eagerness their pursuit of him at night when honest men commonly went to sleep. They make a noise like a dog, and go round about the city. See on Ps. xxii. 16. The terrible hunger of the undomesticated dog of the east led him to howl and prowl about cities and to run furiously in every direction for something to eat; so David's foes felt such insatiable raven for their prey that they acted more like fierce brute beasts than like human beings. They were actuated by a blind fury as were the dogs at night. The verbs of this verse are in the future; but the English is perhaps right in giving them in the present.

7. Behold, they belch out with their mouth. Belch out; Calvin, prate; Edwards, speak without reserve; Alexander, pour out. See Ps. xix. 3; cxlv. 7; Pr. i. 23; xv. 2; Ecc. x. 1. It was not necessary to say what they uttered, because such men speak curses, lies, reproaches, predictions of evil. The Chaldee supplies sharp words. Swords are in their lips. See on Ps. lv. 21; lvii. 4. Their speech is thus lawless and cruel, because they fear not God. For who, say they, doth hear? Our version makes this question to proceed from the persecutors. This gives the best sense. The sentiment is precisely the same as that often expressed by the wicked, Ps. x. 11; xciv. 7.

8. But thou, O LORD, shalt laugh at them; thou shalt have all the heathen in derision. Heathen; see on v. 5. On the divine derision of the foolish schemes of the wicked, see on Ps. ii. 4; xxxvii. 13. Calvin: "When the wicked have perfected their schemes to the uttermost, God can, without any effort, and, as it were in sport, dissipate them all."

9. Because of his strength will I wait upon thee. This clause is very obscure. The following are the different constructions put upon it. For his strength some read my strength. Then we may read, I will keep my strength to thee. So the Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Anglo-Saxon, Clarke, an old English Psalter, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Green, Mudge and Horsley. The sense then is: I will repose my strength on thee. But Mudge, Horsley and Green make strength a title of God, O my strength. The church of England gives another sense: My strength will I ascribe unto thee. Reading my strength requires a change in the Hebrew text, which is authorized by only fourteen of Kennicott's and De Rossi's MSS. Others suppose that by his strength is meant God's strength. This of course demands a change of the person of the pronoun from his to thee in a very short clause. Such transitions may be found, but they rather surprise us when they occur, and we ought not to suppose them to exist, where they do not. The third mode of explanation is that by his strength we are to understand the strength of Saul, or of the embodied enemy. Then the sense is, 'On account of the power of my foe I look to Jehovah.' This is a good sense, though it requires a change of number in the pronoun from that of v. 8. Yet that is not infrequent. This is the sense our translators seem to have gathered from the place. So Calvin: His strength is with thee, I will wait. So Bishop Hall: "The more strong and the more malicious Saul is, the more will I look to thee." The prophet gives the best reason in the world for his conduct: For God is my defence, refuge, high tower, or high fort; see on Ps. ix. 9; xviii. 2; xlv. 7.

10. The God of my mercy shall prevent me. Prevent, see on Ps. xvii. 13; xviii. 18; here it signifies go before, in the way of guidance and protection. Mercy, in Ps. li. 1 rendered lovingkindness. God shall let me see my desire upon mine enemies. The Chaldee: God will show to me his vengeance against my oppressors; Waterland: God shall make me look upon my enemies; Green: God shall let me look in the face of those who lie in wait for me; see on Ps. liv. 7. Enemies, not as in v. 1, but as in Ps. v. 8, meaning unfriendly observers.

11. Slay them not, lest my people forget. The sense seems to be, Do not suddenly or utterly destroy them, but so bring about thy gracious ends, by marked providences weakening their dangerous power, that it shall make a profound impression on my people, and they shall not soon or easily forget it. Compare 2 Sam. iii. 29. Scatter them by thy power. Break the head of their strength, dissolve the bonds that hold them closely together, and make them wanderers. The same verb in another form in v. 15 is rendered, Let them wander up and down. In Gen. iv. 12 the participle is rendered a fugitive. And bring them down, O Lord our shield. Shield, see on Ps. iii. 3; vii. 10; xviii. 2.

12. For the sin of their mouth and the words of their lips let them even be taken in their pride. Hammond thinks the meaning is, 'Every word of their lips is the sin of their mouth, so many words, so many sins.' So Hengstenberg: 'They sin as often as they speak.' Taken, caught, holden. It is the verb that is used for capturing a city. In their pride, i. e., while they are indulging their haughty tempers and insolent speeches. And for cursing and lying which they speak. Calvin: "He means that their mouth was continually filled with horrid imprecations, and that they were wholly addicted to deceit and calumniating." Instead of for, some read with, and some from; but it points out the cause of their being taken. Cursing, rendered swearing, Jer. xxiii. 10; an oath, Deut. xxix. 12; execration, Jer. xlii. 18.

13. Consume them in wrath, consume them, that they may not be. Consume, waste, utterly destroy, finish, make an end of. This is not contrary to the prayer of v. 11. He prays not that their lives may be taken away, but that their combination and conspiracy may be brought to an end; that they may not be, as they now are a powerful band of evil doers, having every apparent advantage on their side. Patrick: "Let them waste away by degrees in their dispersions, till there be none of them found." And let them know that God ruleth in Jacob unto the ends of the earth. Them refers to men in general, and is in sense connected with the last words of the clause, q. d., Let men to the ends of the earth know. It was a great point gained when mankind were convinced of the power and providence of the true God, Ex. ix. 16; Jos. iv. 24; 1 Sam. xvii. 46; 1 Kings viii. 43; Isa. lii. 10; Dan. vi. 26, 27. Jacob, here, as often elsewhere, a term designating the church of God.

14. And at evening let them return. The verb is in the future, the prophetic form. The same verb in v. 6 is also in Hebrew in the future, but is probably rightly put in the present in English. See Introduction, § 6. If this is correct then the meaning is, As they delighted to play the dog in howling and fierceness at night, so let them act out the part of the dog in their being outcasts. And let them make a noise like a dog, a noise expressive of distress and disappointment. They once howled for the innocent as prey. Let them now howl and whine like the dog, who failed to secure any prey. And [let them] go round about the city. To this day in the cities of the east dogs live at large. They roam about, especially at night, in quest of food which they may seize.

15. Let them wander up and down for meat. Wander, the future of the verb rendered scatter in v. 11; i. e., let them lead (or they shall lead) the life of vagrants, often perplexed and distressed even for food. And [let them] grudge, if they be not satisfied. Grudge, murmur, or tarry all night, viz., in the street, i. e., let no one pity them; if they hunger, let them hunger and howl. On the imprecatory form see Introduction, § 6.

16. But I will sing of thy power. Sing, always so rendered. It expresses a glad-some exercise, Ps. xiii. 6. Power, commonly rendered strength, sometimes might. See on Ps. viii. 2. Yea, I will sing aloud of thy mercy in the morning. Sing aloud, shout, shout for joy, see Ps. v. 11. Mercy, as in vv. 10, 16. Power and lovingkindness, guided by wisdom, can effect for us the greatest deliverances, and when so exercised for us, are proper themes of the devoutest thanksgiving. In the morning, see on Ps. v. 3. Some think that In the morning has a relation to Saul's servants watching for David in the morning to kill him, 1 Sam. xix. 11. For thou hast been my defence and refuge in the day of my trouble. Defence, as in v. 9. Refuge, a way of flight or a place to flee to, Jer. xvi. 19; xxv. 35. Trouble, strait, distress, vexation, affliction, particularly such as arises from enemies; see on Ps. ix. 9; x. 1.

17. Unto thee, O my strength, will I sing. Calvin: My strength is with thee, I will sing Psalms; Fry: O my strength, thou art the theme of my song. The common version gives the true meaning. Sing, not the same as either of the words so rendered in v. 16, but another found in Ps. ix. 11; lvii. 7. For God is my defence and the God of my mercy. Defence, as in verse 16. God of my mercy as in v. 10, meaning God who is the source and author of mercy to me, in English idiom, My merciful God.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The spirit of persecution is awfully wicked. It overrides all barriers, forgets all public services, contemns all private worth. Innocence seems only to provoke it. It is as fierce against a son-in-law as against a stranger. It balks not at murder. The great mass of persecutors are doomed men.

2. Whatever means we may adopt for our preservation, and however successful they may be, God is the sole author of deliverance, and we ought to pray, and praise, and preach accordingly. Michal used a device, but God was the Saviour of David. So he felt at the beginning, and so he felt at the end of his troubles.

3. We shall find it necessary to cry for help and deliverance as long as we have enemies; and we shall probably have enemies as long as we live, v. 1. Even if God restrains persecutors, he may leave us to be harassed by our adversary the devil. So that we must cry to God as long as we live. "Prayer is our best weapon against our enemies, the best of all means, and the first of all to be used." No power but that which is invoked in prayer is a match for our foes.

4. We should be very careful not to furnish either cause or occasion to right-minded men to be unfriendly to us; but we should not be dismayed, if, with all prudence and innocence on our part, adversaries should still arise, even in the visible church of God. The temper and character of wicked men are such as to bring about a result so painful, v. 2.

5. The more vicious and depraved our foes may be, if our cause is surely right, the more confident may we be that God will amply protect us. We may in truth plead the barbarity and unreasonableness of wicked men as a reason why God should not help them, but succor us, v. 2.

6. When we find men practising the arts of chicanery and guile, lying in wait and not dealing frankly, it is wise to be on our guard against them, and put no confidence in them, but betake ourselves wholly to the Lord, v. 3. "When power and subtilty combine against the righteous, where can they look but to the throne of heaven?" And this we may do in perfect confidence; for Jehovah 'has taken the church, with all her believing members, under his powerful support.'

7. When our foes are mighty, let us think of David, how God remembered him and all his afflictions, and saved him from the power of one of the most terrible leagues and conspiracies ever formed, v. 3.

8. If we are innocent, unmerited suffering can do us no real harm. It is sin, not sorrow that inflicts mortal wounds. "When we suffer for well-doing, we are conformed to our Redeemer, and have an evidence of our acceptance with God. We should indeed greatly fear suffering as 'evil doers, or busy-bodies in other men's matters;' but we ought not to be either afraid or ashamed of the hatred of the workers of iniquity."

9. While we have a right boldly to assert our innocence in a given matter, if we can do so in truth, and while it is an unspeakable comfort to be able to do so with a clear conscience; yet in doing so we ought strictly to confine ourselves to the matter in hand, and not deny that we are sinners by nature and practice against God our Maker, v. 3. Morison: "The consciousness of integrity as it respects our fellow-men will in no way tend to diminish in a mind divinely illuminated the sense of manifold transgressions against God."

10. The zeal and diligence of the wicked in the cause of unrighteousness might well reprove the languor and tardiness of saints in the work of faith and labor of love, v. 4. In the church of God nothing is the source of more mischief than the want of true zeal and liveliness. It is only when 'many run to and fro' that 'knowledge shall be increased.'

11. Dickson: "The Lord will let the plot go on, and the danger of the godly grow, as if he minded not to take notice of it, that he may first put his children to prayer, and then appear in the fit time: awake to help me, and behold," v. 4.

12. When once we get Jehovah with all his glorious names, titles and attributes secured to our cause, we are safe, come what will, v. 5. It is a special part of wisdom to bring to mind such excellent things in God's character and government as are best suited under the circumstances to strengthen our confidence, and awaken our joyful hopes.

13. Those who live and act like heathen should remember that unless they repent the doom of such wicked transgressors awaits them, v. 5. "Counterfeit professors and professed pagans are in effect all one before God."

14. That sin is most degrading and sinners dreadfully debased are shown by the fact that inspiration itself has used the strongest language and the most forcible metaphors to impress these ideas upon us. Here the wicked are compared to dogs, v. 6. The Scriptures often do the same, Ps. xxii. 16, 20; Matt. vii. 6; Phil. iii. 2; Rev. xxii. 15. Other Scriptures compare them to swine, to the ass, to the silly dove. Oh that men saw their real character. If they did, surely they could not live as they do.

15. When men pour out torrents of abuse, of reproaches, of calumnies, of harsh and severe censures and judgments, and persist in such courses, you may know that they have so far lost all sense of shame, and all fear of God as virtually to deny providence and to be practical atheists, v. 7. Sinning hardens the heart, sears the conscience, blinds the mind, perverts the affections and distorts nature itself until he, who was once the joy of his mother, is a monster of depravity.

16. God's people may always and confidently expect enlargement and deliverance, however dark their present prospects may be; for he counts as nothing all the cunning, power and malice arrayed against them, v. 8. True, the wicked think not so. "No sooner," says Calvin, "does God connive at their proceedings, than their pride and insolence take occasion to manifest themselves: for they forget that even when he seems to have suspended operation, he needs but nod, and his judgments shall be executed."

17. If our foe is strong, God is stronger, and we should make him our defence, v. 9. We need no more.

18. Trusting in God, we have a right to anticipate good and not evil, v. 10. To God no set of circumstances creates a crisis, an emergency, or an exigency. He is eternally and infinitely calm.

19. God will surely make the incorrigible enemies of his people a gazing-stock to all his saints, v. 10. They, who have such delight in beholding the miseries and mortification of others, are but preparing to receive shame and everlasting contempt from all right-minded men, as well as undying reproaches and recriminations from their companions in sin.

20. It is lawful for us to ask God so to order his providence and execute judgment respecting the wicked as to strengthen the faith and all the graces of his own people, v. 11. Calvin: "We are apt to think, when God has not annihilated our enemies at once, that they have escaped out of his hands altogether; and we look upon it as properly no punishment that they should be gradually and slowly destroyed."

21. And let the wicked remember that all sparing is not in the end a mercy. It may be in wrath, v. 11. Some apparent preservations are really but reservations.

22. God can break the power of leagues against his saints, without slaying the conspirators, by simply scattering them as he did at Babel, or at the court of Saul, v. 11. It is a great mercy when in his providence he defeats wicked men, who have wily counsels, by introducing confusion and perplexity.

23. How can the righteous perish or suffer real damage when God is his God, v. 1; his shield, v. 11; his refuge and defence, vv. 16, 17? What more can he want?

24. If there is a God and he has a government, it is impossible to doubt that he will have dealings of terrible severity with impenitent men, who have uttered lies and curses, reproaches and calumnies, taunts and boastings against the innocent and against the truth, v. 12. If such die unpardoned and unrenowned, and are eternally left with their vile propensities, and denied the means of gratifying them, their damnation will be truly dreadful. Henry: "There is a great deal of malignity in tongue-sins, more than is commonly thought of."

25. However long God may spare his enemies, not for their sakes but to show forth his own long-suffering, yet if they prove incorrigible, they shall surely and totally perish and be consumed. The prayers of God's people and the prophecies of his servants make all this certain, v. 13.

26. God loves his church and rules in and over her with a perfect government, whatever seemings there may be to the contrary, v. 13. He loved and ruled her when she used to be called Jacob, Israel, Zion, Jerusalem. He loves her still. He will love her to the end. She is Christ's body.

27. By comparing vv. 6, 14, 15, we learn how terribly God sometimes punishes men in the way in which they have chosen to sin. David's foes chose to act like dogs, and God left them to act out to the bitter end the characters they had chosen to assume. Horne: "The punishment inflicted on the wicked often carries the mark of their crime;" Dickson: "It is suitable to God's justice and no strange thing to see such as have been messengers, servants, officers of persecuting powers, or searchers out of the godly as beadles, or blood-hounds, made beggars, vagabonds, and miserable spectacles of God's wrath before they die, roving to and fro like hungry and masterless dogs."

28. Let us call on our souls after every great deliverance and often to sing, shout, and sing Psalms to the Lord. Our last victory shall be our greatest. "How glorious will be that morning when the united anthems of redeemed millions shall proclaim the eternal victory of the church."

29. As long as we live let us make frequent and pious mention of the mercy of God, and of the God of our mercy, v. 17.

30. The minds of many, perhaps most evangelical commentators, seem to have been turned, especially by considering the curses foretold in this Psalm, to the case of the poor Jews, who have long and wickedly rejected Messiah and brought on themselves terrible plagues and woes. Reader, do you pray for the descendants of Abraham?

PSALM LX.

To the chief Musician upon Shushan-eduth, Michtam of David, to teach; when he strove with Aram-naharaim and with Aram-zobah, when Joab returned, and smote of Edom in the valley of salt twelve thousand.

1 O God, thou hast cast us off, thou hast scattered us, thou hast been displeased; oh turn thyself to us again.

2 Thou hast made the earth to tremble; thou hast broken it: heal the breaches thereof; for it shaketh.

3 Thou hast shewed thy people hard things: thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment.

4 Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee, that it may be displayed because of the truth. Selah.

5 That thy beloved may be delivered; save with thy right hand, and hear me.

6 God hath spoken in his holiness: I will rejoice: I will divide Shechem, and mete out the valley of Succoth.

7 Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine; Ephraim also is the strength of mine head; Judah is my lawgiver;

8 Moab is my washpot; over Edom will I cast out my shoe: Philistia, triumph thou because of me.

9 Who will bring me into the strong city? who will lead me into Edom?

10 Wilt not thou, O God, which hadst cast us off? and thou, O God, which didst not go out with our armies?

11 Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man.

12 Through God we shall do valiantly: for he it is that shall tread down our enemies.

ON several parts of the title see on titles of Psalms iv. xvi. xlv. lvii. Hengstenberg and Alexander think that Upon Shushan-eduth here refers to the law of God as found in the books of Moses. Proof is sought in 2 Kings xi. 12; Deut. xxxi. 19. The enigmatical titles are, however, very difficult of explication, and perhaps the reader will not be satisfied with this view. This is the last of the six Psalms having Michtam in the title. To teach has not before occurred in a title. The original word signifies both to teach and to learn, though in this form always rendered teach. It probably has much the same import as Maschil, to give Instruction. The historic occasion of the Psalm is next given, When he strove with Aram-naharaim and with Aram-zobah, when Joab returned, and smote of Edom in the valley of salt twelve thousand. Strove is well rendered. It does not signify conquered or gained a victory. The result was favorable to Israel but this word simply announces a conflict, a battle. Aram designates Syria; and Naharaim, Mesopotamia. Calvin renders it, With the Syrians of Mesopotamia. Naharaim is literally the two rivers; i. e., Tigris and Euphrates, between which lay a large country inhabited by men descended of ancient Syrians. In Gen. xxiv. 10; Deut. xxiii. 4; Jud. iii. 8, the word Naharaim is rendered Mesopotamia. Aram-zobah designates that part of Syria, to which Syria of Mesopotamia was tributary, and which at that time was ruled over by Rehob. Clarke thinks it the same as Celosyria. It is not supposed that this title mentions all the successes of David's army, but only some of the early and principal victories. Sacred history explicitly states his victory over the Syrians of Damascus also, which was much nearer to Jerusalem than either of the countries named. We have next an allusion to the victory over the Edomites in the valley of salt. All the record we have of these events is in 2 Sam. viii. x.; 1 Chron. xviii. To David as head of the nation, to Joab as the highest officer in the army, and to Abishai as head of one of the divisions of the army under Joab, these victories are variously ascribed according to the view the writer had in his mind. The present name of the Valley of salt is probably El-Ghor. It lies a few miles south of the Dead Sea. It is very desolate. It is on the borders of the ancient Idumea. The valley of salt was subsequently famous for another victory over the Edomites by the forces of Amaziah, 2 Kings xiv. 7. The historic record mentions eighteen thousand slain, and here but twelve thousand. The greater of course includes the less. The discrepancy may be explained by supposing that the title contains the numbers slain by one division of the army, or that the twelve thousand were slain in the battle, and the residue in the flight. Or an error may have crept into the text. Every scholar admits that there is sometimes serious difficulty in settling the numbers of the Old Testament. In this place Calvin has two and twenty thousand, the common version twelve thousand, while the original is two ten thousand, which taken in one way would mean twenty thousand, i. e., two tens of thousands. Hammond refers the numbers slain to different battles and so avoids the difficulty.

There was much confusion and trouble in the kingdom during the latter part of Saul's life, and the early part of David's reign. Doubtless defeat was sometimes experienced by David's forces. The heathen nations had become very fierce and cruel. This may account for the sad and depressed tone of the first verses. There remained enemies unsubdued, as well as intestine troubles unsettled even after the victories here alluded to. If this is so, there is no need of adopting the conjecture of Hare, Secker and others that the first three verses belong to Ps. lxxxv.

There is no room for serious doubt that David wrote this Psalm about B. C. 1040, as Scott dates it, although Clarke puts it 500 years later. The only name of the Lord used in this Psalm is Elohim God, on which see on Ps. iii. 2. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. O God thou hast cast us off. The Chaldee: Thou hast left us; Syriac: Thou hast forgotten us; Edwards: Thou hast forsaken us; Other ancient versions, Calvin, Amesius, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander agree with the English text. Cast off, see Ps. xliii. 2; xlv. 9. The complaint is that the nation was treated as if God had rejected it. Thou hast scattered us. Margin and many others, broken us; hast broken; in Ps. lxxx. 12; lxxxix. 40, broken down. Mudge: Thou hast made a breach upon us. The latter part of Saul's administration was full of disaster to the nation, nor did David's accession at once bring relief. The people were not all of a sudden united on him, and the heathen were very daring and troublesome. Thou hast been displeased. The sins of Saul had been countenanced or connived at by a great body of the people. Irreligion had grown apace and God was angry with the people, and made them feel his judgments. But he is a God of mercy: Oh turn thyself to us again. Chaldee: Turn to us again in thy glory; Edwards: Bring us to life again; Jebb: Oh return to us. In Ps. xxiii. 3, the verb is rendered restoreth. In the title of this Psalm it is simply returned. In this clause it is in the future, expressing desire and expectation.

2. Thou hast made the earth to tremble. Earth probably the land of Israel. Tremble, shake or quake; see on Ps. xviii. 7; xlvii. 3. Thou hast broken it; Septuagint and Vulgate: Hast troubled it; Jebb: Hast rent it asunder; Alexander: Hast riven it. David is not speaking of an earthquake and of fissures made in the earth, but by the metaphor of an earthquake and its ordinary effects he describes the rent and torn condition of his nation. Saul had brought the nation to the verge of ruin. Heal the breaches thereof; for it shaketh. So critical was the state of the nation that it tottered to its fall. To heal its breaches would be to restore it to its former vigor. Compare 2 Chron. vii. 14. None but God could give effectual relief. Hence the application to the throne of grace.

3. Thou hast showed thy people hard things, very uniformly rendered. The divine severity is truly dreadful. When Jehovah's wrath is kindled but a little we perish. Thou hast made us to drink the wine of astonishment. See on Ps. xi. 6. Astonishment; in Isaiah li. 17, 22, the same word is rendered trembling. Examine Job xxi. 20; Ps. lxxv. 8; Jer. viii. 14; xxv. 15, 28; xlix. 12; li. 57; Ezek. xxiii. 32-34; Rev. xiv. 10. The Chaldee has wine of malediction; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, wine of sorrow; Waterland, a myrrhate draft; Edwards, an intoxicating liquor; Anderson, wine of trembling. Respecting this metaphor one view is that it is taken from any ordinary fermented wine that will intoxicate; a second, that it is taken from wine drugged so as to stupefy but not to kill; the third, that it is taken from wine drugged with poison, intended to kill. Of these opinions the first is the least probable; and the second more probable than the third. The people were astonished, stupefied by the awful judgments of God. They had neither heart nor power to do anything effectual. Sorrow had filled their hearts. Such a state of things continuing would soon waste away any people. But

4. Thou hast given a banner to them that fear thee. Banner, the word occurs about twenty times; applied to a ship it means her sail; applied to Korah and his company, a sign, i. e., a signal warning to others, Nu. xxvi. 10; in Nu. xxi. 8, 9, a pole; in all other cases, banner, ensign, or standard. What was the banner God had given them? In Ex. xvii. 15, we have Jehovah Nissi, the Lord my banner. It would make good sense to say that the Lord had given himself, and so had become the banner of his people. But the next clause gives us an interpretation which we are bound to adopt: That it may be displayed because of the truth. The banner then is the truth, the truth of God, which had been much obscured in the reign of Saul, but was now to be lifted up in the pious care of David for the sound instruction of the people and for the pure worship of God. In David's accession to the throne itself there was a remarkable display of the truth of God's promise. It was a pledge that God would yet unite and succor his people.

5. That thy beloved may be delivered, save with thy right hand, and hear me. It would make good sense to connect the first clause of this verse with the preceding verse, and so some do. But it seems better to make the whole verse a prayer. The beloved are the same as those that fear God in v. 4. David asks that they may be delivered from their personal and national miseries, from their discouraged and disheartening views, and especially from all their foes, and that in a marked manner, by God's right hand, denoting a powerful deliverance.

6. God has spoken in his holiness. 'God has spoken and his holiness forever precludes the possibility of his failing to fulfil his word: I rely on his truth as in v. 4; I rely on his infinite rectitude, his holiness.' Some think that David regarded God as bound by an oath. And God's word is as good as his oath. Compare Am. iv. 2. God may have spoken, 1. By oracle when David, on some occasion not recorded, consulted it, and so in his holiness may mean as it often does in his sanctuary, or in his holy place. This is not well supported; yet the Chaldee, Septuagint, Vulgate, Doway, Mudge, Street, Secker, Dimock and Morison adopt it. 2. The reference may be to the specific promise made to David through Nathan; see 2 Sam. vii. 10-17 and 1 Chron. xvii. 9-15. 3. The promises and prophecies relied on may be those made to the fathers, and often repeated, Gen. xii. 1-3; xv. 7-21; Josh. i. 6 and xii.-xvii. The pronoun I which occurs so often in this and in subsequent verses designates either the Jewish nation, or David himself as the head of that people. The latter is the better interpretation. David is the author of the Psalm, but composes it for public use. Resting on God's word he breaks forth by saying: I will rejoice; I will triumph, or, I will exult. Instead of a mournful dirge, he breaks forth into joy. Pool: "Therefore I will turn my prayers into praises and rejoicings for what God has already done, and, as I am assured, will further do, on my behalf." He then tells us how he will claim, and conquer, or portion out the land: I will divide Shechem, and mete out the valley of Succoth. Shechem and Succoth were both famous in history. The reason for mentioning them here is not certainly known. Some suppose that they had been strongly enlisted for the house of Saul, and were much opposed to David; and that he here says they shall not form an exception to his kingly sway. Shechem was west, and Succoth east of the Jordan. By naming them both some think he asserts by synecdoche that he will divide the whole land, on both sides of the river. Divide, in Num. xxvi. 53, 55, 56 in the passive form, and in Josh. xiii. 7; xviii. 5, 10 in the active. Mete out, commonly rendered measure. It occurs very often in Ezekiel xl.-xlvii. as well as in the books of Moses.

7. Gilead is mine. Gilead, sometimes taken for the large tract of country east of the Jordan and included in the land of Israel, Deut. xxxiv. 1; sometimes only that fine fertile mountainous region lying east of the Jordan and held in considerable part by the tribe of Gad, which was very warlike, as was predicted by Jacob and Moses, Gen. xlix. 19; Deut. xxxiii. 21. This is the country here intended. Mount Gilead is a mountain about nine or ten miles long. There was also a city called Gilead. But the land held by Gad is pretty certainly pointed out here. Manasseh is mine. Manasseh, the eldest son of Joseph had descendants enough to constitute a full tribe. They settled in nearly equal numbers on each side of the Jordan. To them belonged much if not all of that fine grazing country, Bashan. Though not equal to Ephraim, yet this was a powerful tribe, Gen. xlviii. 15-22; xlix. 22-26; Deut. xxxiii. 13-17. Ephraim also is the strength of mine head, corresponding to the predictions just cited respecting the two sons of Joseph. The strength of the head was for pushing, and so this place corresponds to the predictions in Gen. xlviii. 19; Deut. xxxiii. 17. Yet this tribe did not always play the man, Ps. lxxviii. 9-11. The tract of land held by it was large, central and very productive. Samaria was in the territory of Ephraim, and was the capital of the ten tribes. Judah is my lawgiver, or governor. We have the same expression in Ps. cviii. 8. The allusion to Gen. xlix. 10 is clear. "No government could stand, which was not resident in Judah," says Calvin. That which most strikingly distinguishes several clauses of this verse from the prophecies in Genesis and Deuteronomy is first their brevity, and then David as head of the nation claiming them as his own.

8. Moab is my washpot. Eastern hospitality and eastern customs required that for refreshment the feet of guests and others should be washed. This was done by menials, 1 Sam. xxv. 4. Our Saviour could perform no act more likely to impress a lesson of humility than by washing his disciples' feet. Gataker, LeClerc and Anderson refer to the father of profane history as giving an anecdote of Amasis, who expressed the meanness of his own origin by comparing himself to a pot for washing the feet in. The meaning of the Psalmist is that he would reduce or had reduced Moab to a very low condition of servitude, and this he certainly did, 2 Sam. viii. 2; 1 Chron. xviii. 1, 2. Clarke: "The Moabites shall be reduced to the meanest slavery." Over Edom will I cast out my shoe. Edom or Idumea was inhabited by the descendants of Esau. They bore an old grudge against the Israelites. Often it broke out into hostilities. But David says he would reduce them to subjection. The form of expression which he uses has been variously explained. Some think it means he will put his foot on the neck of his enemies, as eastern conquerors used to do; some, that he says he will cast his shoe to them, as his slaves, that they may clean it; and some, that he speaks of Edom as a mean place to be used for inferior purposes, as a place where a man casts his shoes. All services rendered to the feet, as washing them, or removing the shoes, were humble, Matt. iii. 11; Mark i. 7; Luke iii. 16; Acts xiii. 25. Hence the force of such words as we find in 1 Tim. v. 10. David completely subjected the Edomites, 2 Sam. viii. 14; 1 Chron. xviii. 13. Clarke: "I will subject the Edomites to the meanest offices." Philistia, triumph thou because of me. Church of England: Philistia, be thou glad of me; Calvin: Palestina, triumph over me; in Ps. cviii. 9, Over Philistia will I triumph. Taking the words as they stand we may regard them as ironical, or as expressing a feigned or abject though reluctant submission, as in Ps. xviii. 44; or as stating that Philistia must receive him with shouts as subjects welcome a prince. The second mode of explanation is attended with fewest difficulties.

9. Who will bring me into the strong city? Who will lead me into Edom? Whoever will look into the travels of Stevens in the East, cannot doubt that the strong city here spoken of is Petra, by nature and art so fortified as, according to the ancient modes of warfare, to seem to defy the assault of great armies, if there were even but comparatively few within it to defend it. See Obad. vv. 3, 4. Some think however that the reference is to the fenced cities of Edom generally. Others think David has in his eye Rabbah, the great city of the Moabites; but in this verse he seems to be speaking of Edom, and not of Moab. By these questions, he admits that no mortal power is adequate to the task:

10. Wilt not thou, O God, which hadst cast us off? and thou, O God, which didst not go out with our armies? This refers to the periods of disaster alluded to in the opening of the Psalm. But God had changed the tide of victory, and David appeals to him to finish the work of subjecting all the hostile nations, and to give to Israel the whole of Canaan.

11. Give us help from trouble. Lord, to whom shall we go but unto thee? Thine is the kingdom, the power, the wisdom and the mercy we all need. Help, always so rendered, as in Ps. xxvii. 9; xxxv. 2; xlv. 1. Trouble, as in Ps. iii. 1; iv. 1; lix. 16. It is specially suited to express trouble arising from foes. Indeed in the plural it is often rendered foes, adversaries, or enemies. For vain is the help of man. The particle rendered for is literally and; but in sentences like this the best scholars think they convey the force of the original by using for. Help, not the same Hebrew word as in the first clause of this verse, but a word commonly rendered salvation, safety, victory, deliverance, a few times help, Ps. xxxiii. 17; li. 14. The nation had been trying to do without God, and they wrought only misery and mischief for themselves. Their wisest plans and greatest efforts were nugatory. God does not help man to govern the world; he governs the world. "Such confidences as are not derived from God are worthless and vain."

12. Through God we shall do valiantly. Hengstenberg regards this clause as a virtual quotation from Balaam's prophecy, Num. xxiv. 18, where he says, "Israel shall do valiantly." Perhaps it may be, but two ordinary words in a clause are hardly sufficient to establish a quotation. For he it is that shall tread down our enemies. As in the preceding verse, for is instead of and. Tread down, as in Ps. xlv. 5. It is the act of one who loathes an object, and so treads it under foot. In Pr. xxvii. 7 the same form of the verb is rendered loatheth. Enemies, troublers, adversaries. Clarke: "Through thee alone shall we do valiantly; Thou alone canst tread down our enemies, and to thee alone we look for conquest."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Sin is dreadful. It has filled hearts, and houses, and nations, and our world with woe. Scott: "The anger of God against sin is the sole cause of all misery, personal or public, in families, churches and nations, which has been, is, or shall be endured, in time or to eternity," v. 1.

2. Among the worst temporal consequences of sinning against God are dreadful public calamities, loss of public confidence, misrule in many forms, anarchy, confusion, wars, famines, pestilences, men's hearts failing them for fear, injury, oppression, violence, vv. 1-3.

3. It is much to the credit of any man, after long and fearful contests, wrongfully waged against him or his cause, wholly to forgive and forget all personal injury, and mourn over public calamities, and pray and labor for the public good, vv. 1-3. "It is the glory of a man to pass over a transgression."

4. It is well when our distresses, personal or national, lead us to a throne of grace, and make prayer our frequent business, vv. 1, 2.

5. Let good men commit their country to God. David's country was perhaps reduced to a lower point of depression than it is easy for us to conceive, and he carried the case to God, vv. 1, 2. Let us do the same. There is hope of peace when we look to the God of peace.

6. If God should send on each man and nation the judgments which they deserve, every one would soon be drinking the wine of astonishment, v. 3.

7. If we see hard things, let us remember that our sins call for them, that they are perhaps necessary for our growth in grace, and that good men such as David saw the same, v. 3. David's Greater Son saw still harder things than any of his people.

8. If we have been in affliction, and prosperity begins to return, let us not forget our chastisements, but remember them for our own good and for God's glory, vv. 1-3. Such an exercise promotes both humility and hope, Lam. iii. 19, 20, 21.

9. Those who fear God have sources of encouragement that the world knows not of, v. 4. They have a banner, for which they would die. Under it they can never perish; see on Ps. xxv. 14.

10. If the banner of God's truth and covenant are so glorious in their effects on those who know and love the gospel, why should it not be displayed in every valley and on every mountain-top, and sinners of every nation and tongue under heaven be led to embrace Jesus Christ and his salvation? Compare Isa. xi. 10.

11. It is perfectly safe for the righteous always to fight under the banner of truth, because the truth is always for them and not for their enemies, v. 4.

12. Though the world thinks not so, yet it is abundantly clear that those who fear God are his beloved ones, vv. 4, 5.

13. In none of our distresses is it safe or wise or right for us to call in and rely on power not omnipotent, v. 5. God's right hand is full of strength.

14. Because God is holy he cannot speak a word that is not true, and because he is holy he will fulfil all he has promised and all he has threatened, v. 6.

15. Whatever success and advantage a Christian may gain, yet his great reliance for final victory is not on what he sees, or feels, or does, but on God's blessed word, v. 6. God hath spoken . . . I will rejoice.

16. The conquest of surrounding hostile nations to David's government was a type of the blessed reign of Messiah, who shall yet be Lord of every land and nation to the glory of God the Father, vv. 6-8. He must rule over all the earth, for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.

17. The conquest and subjugation of Moab, Edom and Philistia by David, acting under a special direction of God, who would punish those nations for their sins, can never warrant wars of conquest and of cruelty waged by men, who have no such revelation from heaven. By the gospel all tyranny and cruelty are forbidden. Let invading conquerors remember that.

18. It is not conclusive evidence that we are not called to undertake a given work or perform a certain duty, because it is very difficult, or even impossible for us to succeed without special help from God, vv. 9, 10. If God calls David to take Petra, he shall take Petra.

19. God undertaking for us, we can do anything, v. 10. Only let us look to him alone.

20. Whatever our trouble may be, let us look to God for help, v. 11. When we think we can carry our own burden, it is always too heavy for us.

21. Never trust in man. His help is vain, v. 11. Cursed is he that trusteth in man, and maketh flesh his arm. This is a universal sin.

22. Let us expect an answer to our supplications. Henry: "David prays in hope. His prayer is, Give us help from trouble, v. 11. Even in the day of their triumph, they see themselves in trouble, because still in war, which is troublesome even to the prevailing side."

23. However feeble we may be in numbers, in strength, in resources, yet through God we can do valiantly, v. 12.

24. Jehovah treads down many and mighty as easily as few and feeble foes, v. 12.

25. Let us be doubly careful that we do not at any time ascribe to creatures the honor due to God alone, v. 12. Dickson: "Praise of the valor and gallantry of victorious soldiers must not separate betwixt God and the victor: but whatsoever God doth in us or by us, must be no less wholly ascribed unto God, than if he had done all the work without us; for, both the valor of the instrument, and the victory are the works of the Lord."

26. Tholuck: "The course of life alternates between the heights and depths. Such was the experience of David, as here recorded." Let us not hope to cross the sea of life without storms.

PSALM LXI.

To the chief Musician upon Neginah, A Psalm of David.

- 1 Hear my cry, O God ; attend unto my prayer.
- 2 From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed : lead me to the rock that is higher than I.
- 3 For thou hast been a shelter for me, and a strong tower from the enemy.
- 4 I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever : I will trust in the covert of thy wings. Selah.
- 5 For thou, O God, hast heard my vows : thou hast given me the heritage of those that fear thy name.
- 6 Thou wilt prolong the king's life : and his years as many generations.
- 7 He shall abide before God for ever : oh prepare mercy and truth, which may preserve him.
- 8 So will I sing praise unto thy name for ever, that I may daily perform my vows.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iv. xi. Neginah is the singular of Neginoth, literally, Upon a stringed instrument. Calvin, Morison and more than thirty MSS have the plural. David wrote this Psalm ; 1. The title ascribes it to him ; 2. The contents throughout suit David. Scott dates it B. C. 1021 ; Clarke, B. C. 536. Commentators are not agreed as to its historic occasion. The Syriac says it was written " by David, when Jonathan made known to him the determination of Saul who was devising David's death. But spiritually it intimates a prayer with the giving of thanks." Tholuck gives the title thus : " A PSALM of David, sung at Mahanaim, beyond Jordan on the borders of Palestine, when he fled from before Absalom." The historic record referred to by Tholuck and others who take the same view is found in 2 Sam. 8th chapter. Dimock and Anderson both say : " It is generally agreed that this Psalm refers to 2 Sam. xvii. 22, 24." The phrase, from the ends of the earth indicates that it was written in exile. The historic occasion of this Psalm is probably much the same as that of Ps. iii. This conjecture is more probable than that of the Syriac, or that of Mudge, who thinks it was written on the same occasion with Ps. lx. The Psalm has a public use derived from the typical character of David. Hengstenberg : " Even in our day the Psalm has its complete use, inasmuch as the promises in 2 Sam. vii. have undoubtedly their complete fulfilment in Christ." The only name of the Most High here used is Elohim God, on which see on Ps. iii. 2. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Hear my cry, O God. Hear, as in Ps. iv. 1 ; xvii. 1 ; xxviii. 2. Cry, as in Ps. xvii. 1 and often. Here it clearly means earnest supplication. Attend unto my prayer. Attend, also hearken, give heed, as in Ps. v. 2 ; lxxxvi. 6 ; cxlii. 6 ; Pr. xvii. 4. Prayer, invariably so rendered, Ps. iv. 1 ; lv. 1. The intent of both clauses is to secure the gracious notice of God to his petitions ; and as he was urgent and vehement he uses strong language, and in different words twice asks for the same thing.

2. From the end of the earth will I cry unto thee, when my heart is overwhelmed. Cry, not from the same root as cry in v. 1, but from the same as cried in Ps. iii. 4 ; Ps. xviii. once rendered call, once cry, vv. 3, 6. For earth it is better to read land, meaning the land of Israel, to a remote part of which David had now been driven, perhaps by Absalom's rebellion ; see on Ps. xxxvii. 3, 9. In Mahanaim David found refuge during the early part of Absalom's rebellion. Although it seems to have been a place of some note, yet it was in the tribe of Gad, Josh. xxi. 38, and was remote from Jerusalem. It had been the centre of Ishbosheth's kingdom, 2 Sam. ii. 8. To David, who had been used to the delights of the daily public worship of God in Jerusalem it must have been a dreary place, so that his heart was overwhelmed.

The Chaldee and Syriac read, in the anxiety of my heart; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway, when my heart was in anguish; church of England, when my heart is in heaviness; Edwards, now when my heart is sinking. We can never be so remote from the usual scenes and places of public worship as to excuse us from devotion. Lead me to the rock that is higher than I. It is a poor and low sense, and ill suited to the circumstances under which the Psalm was written to make rock here mean the city of Petra, as Mudge does. On the general use and import of the word rock, see on Ps. xviii. 2, where it is rendered strength. God is the rock of all his saints. Scott: "The divine mercy, support and protection formed the rock on which he desired to rest his soul, out of the reach of the tempestuous waves, which dashed and raged below." Hengstenberg: "The Psalmist grounds his prayer not only on what God has been, but on what he always is to him." To be able to avail ourselves of God's protection, we must be led, guided and lifted up by him, for he is high, beyond our reach; nay, without special grace we cannot find or know him at all, Job xxiii. 3, 8, 9. With this verse and the next compare Ps. xviii. 2; lxii. 2.

3. For thou hast been a shelter for me. Shelter, in Ps. xiv. 6; xlv. 1, refuge; in Jer. xvii. 17; Joel iii. 16, hope. David is encouraging himself by his past experience. Perhaps too he refers to all his past history. Why should he not? It was all marvellous. And [thou hast been] a strong tower, [Heb. tower of strength] from the enemy. Tower, see on Ps. xlviii. 12. Strength, as in Ps. viii. 2. David is trying to lay hold on God. To this end he calls to mind former deliverances. "Nothing doth more strengthen our faith, than the remembrance of God's succor in times past."

4. I will abide in thy tabernacle for ever. Abide, sojourn, dwell, be an inhabitant. It expresses more than an occasional or temporary connection with God's worship. Tabernacle, as in Ps. xv. 1; xix. 4; xxvii. 5, 6; not applied to the temple; this Psalm was written before the temple was built. I will, or shall, expressing either a purpose or a hope, perhaps both. For ever expresses as great a duration as is predicable of his existence, first, in this world, equivalent to as long as I live; secondly, as God's house on earth was always a type of heaven there is doubtless a reference to the pleasing hope and solemn purpose he had of spending his eternity (literally eternities) in heaven; see on Ps. xxiii. 6. I will trust in the covert of thy wings. Some think the allusion is to the wings of the cherubim over the mercy-seat; but the cherubim were in the holy of holies, which was entered by the high-priest only, and not even by the king. The allusion pretty certainly is to the feathered dam covering her young. See on Ps. xvii. 8. Compare Ps. xxxvi. 7; lvii. 1; lxiii. 7; xci. 4. The confidence of a soul abiding under the protection of God is a firm trust. Calvin is confident that this verse is expressive of David's sentiments after he had returned from his exile; but there is no objection to the admission that it is the language of his heart, so soon as he was able to recover from the painful surprise of his banishment.

5. For thou, O God, hast heard my vows. No sincere act of divinely appointed worship ever escapes the favorable notice of God. Hast heard, that is so as to respond favorably; see on Ps. iv. 1. Vows, see on Ps. xxii. 25; i. 14; lvi. 12. Thou hast given me the heritage of those that fear thy name. Hast given, freely granted. Heritage, inheritance, or possession. It means either the land of Israel, which was the heritage of Israel, and over which David was to rule; or, as David was a true worshipper of God, he should have such an inheritance as God has promised to all who fear him; or, as David was a type of Christ, this clause may have a reference to the great promise and prophecy in 2 Sam. vii. 12-17; 1 Chron. xvii. 11-14. These words were the polar star of David's life and destiny. He seems seldom to have forgotten them. If the reference is to the typical character of David, then God had granted him a great honor, viz., to rule a people who should give a name to his church forever, and in a way that made him a type of his great descendant, who should eternally be a king. These several views are not inconsistent with each other, and may be united. Some succeeding verses require that we do not lose sight of the last.

6. Thou wilt prolong the king's life. King in the third person is often used by David as a designation of him, Ps. xx. 9; xxi. 1, 7. He also uses it of Christ, Ps. ii. 6; xlv. 1; xiv. 14. It was not he personally, but he in his posterity, Messiah, that was to be so enduring. The promise finds its parallel and enlargement in Isa. liii. 10-12. The Hebrew literally is, Days upon the days of the king thou wilt add. The king must be the root and the offspring of Jesse, Jesus the Son of God. The words have no ample fulfilment in the person of David. Neither has the next clause: And his years as many generations, literally, His years (shall be) as generation and generation, i. e., generation upon generation. We are forced by every fair rule of interpretation to say that this whole verse has no adequate fulfilment without including Messiah. Calvin: "There can be no doubt that the series of years, and even ages, of which he speaks, extends prospectively to the coming of Christ." In this evangelical commentators generally agree.

7. He shall abide before God for ever. He, that is the king before mentioned. David actually reigned over even Judah hardly forty years. But this king is the Son of man mentioned by the prophet, Dan. vii. 13, 14. Instead of abide, some very well read sit, as expressive of dignity and permanence. Before God, says Hengstenberg, "is under the protecting guardianship of God's grace; compare 2 Sam. vii. 29." Oh prepare mercy and truth, which may preserve him. This reminds one of Ps. lxxii. 15, "Prayer also shall be made for him continually." The Prayer is for the king. Alexander thinks mercy and truth are personified as in Ps. xl. 11; lvii. 3. Perhaps they are, but we get as good a sense by taking them without a figure. Prepare, often so rendered, also appoint. Preserve, as in Ps. xi. 7; xxv. 21; often rendered keep, as in Deut. xxxii. 10.

8. So will I sing praise unto thy name for ever, that I may daily perform my vows. Sing praise, as in Ps. vii. 17; lvii. 7; rendered also sing, sing praises, and by some sing Psalms; from the same root as the word rendered Psalms in many of the titles. To sing praise was to express gratitude in solemn devotions. David was a pattern in this duty. He had promised no less in his vows, and he was determined to perform them.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is a sad mistake with some to offer prayers and then care no more for them. It is not the prayer but the answer to it that brings the blessing. David looked out and pleaded for that, v. 1.

2. However unfriendly our situation may be to the maintenance of habits of devotion, yet we must not give up our intercourse with God even from the ends of the earth. David from Mahanaim, Daniel from Babylon, the sailor from the mast-head, the prisoner from his cell, the sinner in his guilt and wretchedness must all call on God, v. 2. Morison: "There is no scene of exile from which the humble suppliant may not look to the rock that is higher than he." Henry: "That which separates us from other comforts should drive us so much the nearer to God, the Fountain of all comfort." If we cannot go to a house of worship, God himself has promised to be to us for a little sanctuary, Ezek. xi. 16.

3. If real saints have such a longing for God's appointed public worship, what shall be thought of professing Christians, who voluntarily exile themselves from the privileges of God's house under an evangelical ministry? v. 2.

4. If we should always pray, how much more should we do so when deeply afflicted, v. 2. Scott: "When cares, fears, sorrows, or temptations, like a wild deluge, overwhelm our hearts, our cries unto God should be more fervent than ever." The greater the need, the louder should be the cry for help.

5. Stoicism is no part of a pious character. True religion refines the sensibilities, and so of necessity the child of grace feels poignantly griefs that affect others but little, v. 2. Sorrow brings weeping and "weeping must quicken praying, not deaden it."

6. It is a sad mistake to be driven from devotion, public or private, by the very causes that ought to make the throne of grace more precious than ever. Not so with David, v. 2. Slade: "Some unwise people plead their trials, at home and in the world, as a reason why they cannot attend to spiritual duties. This shows a very unchristian state of mind and heart."

7. If ever we are safe, or happy, or blessed, it must be by finding a Rock that is higher than we; and if we are but led thither, all shall be well, v. 2. To attain such heights of bliss and safety, we must have divine aid and guidance. Scott: "We should therefore pray fervently for the Holy Spirit of promise, that we may by his gracious teaching and assistance 'believe to the saving of our souls.'"

8. The protection which every believer has found in God is truly wonderful, v. 3. The shelter is ample and the tower strong. No enemy can reach him.

9. A fair trial of God's love and care would surely determine any wise man to be for him and not for another, vv. 3, 4. Scott: "As genuine experience is acquired, encouragement will abound."

10. In true religion nothing compares with the favor and service of God, v. 4. No griefs for outward afflictions were so pungent as those which took from David the enjoyments of God's house. "He accounts it a higher pleasure to lie as a suppliant before the altar, than to sit upon the throne of a king."

11. If the tabernacle and service of God on earth are so dear to the saints, how unspeakable must be the glories and joys of the upper temple, Heb. ix. 8, 9, 24. Heaven will not come short of any pious expectation ever entertained of it.

12. On the general doctrine of vows, vv. 5, 8, see REMARKS on Ps. xxii. 25; l. 14; lvi. 12. With God a vow never comes to be out of date. Tholuck: "David promises never more to forget that he owes these blessings neither to his own sagacity and valor, nor to blind fate, but that he will forever sing praises to the name of the Lord, and that his whole life shall be the payment of the vows which he made in the hour of need."

13. Very different is the portion of the sinner from the heritage of those that fear the Lord, v. 5. The joys, passions and hopes of the wicked are transient, delusive, unsatisfactory; the prospects and expectations of the righteous endure forever and brighten every day. Even their sorrows are blessed, being sent in covenant love.

14. If David had the honor of being according to the flesh the ancestor of Christ and of receiving promises of the glory of that descendant's kingdom; *believers now are no less endearingly related to the same blessed and exalted personage. Compare Matt. xii. 48-50. Dickson: "The inheritance of the chief of God's servants, and of the meanest and weakest of them, is one."

15. Some are afraid of being singular, or of being esteemed so; but if we ever reach heaven, it will not be without divine grace making us differ from others, v. 5. The saints are peculiar in their belief, principles, practice, destiny.

16. As Christ's kingdom is permanent and abiding, so of course are all the blessings secured to believers, vv. 6, 7. Compare Luke i. 32, 33. Blessed be God.

17. Great as our wants and necessities may be, they cannot exceed the measure of the mercy and truth secured in the covenant of redemption to Christ himself and through him to all believers, v. 7.

18. Dickson: "The best retreat, that can be made, after wrestling and victory over troubles, are prayer and praises, according to David's example," vv. 7, 8. Henry: "Praising God, and paying our vows to him must be our constant daily work."

PSALM LXII.

To the chief Musician, to Jeduthun, A Psalm of David.

- 1 Truly my soul waiteth upon God: from him cometh my salvation.
- 2 He only is my rock and my salvation; he is my defence; I shall not be greatly moved.
- 3 How long will ye imagine mischief against a man? ye shall be slain all of you: as a bowing wall shall ye be, and as a tottering fence.
- 4 They only consult to cast him down from his excellency: they delight in lies: they bless with their mouth, but they curse inwardly. Selah.
- 5 My soul, wait thou only upon God; for my expectation is from him.
- 6 He only is my rock and my salvation: he is my defence; I shall not be moved.
- 7 In God is my salvation and my glory: the rock of my strength, and my refuge, is in God.
- 8 Trust in him at all times; ye people, pour out your heart before him: God is a refuge for us. Selah.
- 9 Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie: to be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanity.
- 10 Trust not in oppression, and become not vain in robbery: if riches increase, set not your heart upon them.
- 11 God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this; that power belongeth unto God.
- 12 Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy: for thou renderest to every man according to his work.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xxxix. A marked peculiarity of this Psalm is the frequent recurrence of one word rendered in the English text truly, only and surely. Some have made this very significant. But it is probably not of any importance further than that it was a fit word in each place to give the author's precise meaning. That David wrote the Psalm is generally admitted. Even Clarke expresses no doubt about it. It seems to be commonly agreed that it was composed on the occasion of Absalom's rebellion. Amyrald: "There is in it throughout not one single word (and this is a rare occurrence) in which the prophet expresses fear or dejection, and there is also no prayer in it, although, on other occasions, when in danger, he never omits to pray." In it we have these names of the Most High, Elohim God and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; ii. 4. Hengstenberg: "The reason why Elohim is used throughout is because the Psalmist is speaking of God in opposition to everything of an earthly and human nature." On Selah see Introduction, § 15. Alexander seems confident that the theme or burden of the Psalm is a contrast between God and man, as objects of confidence. Scott dates it B. C. 1060; Clarke, B. C. 1023. Of course Scott does not favor the idea that it relates to Absalom's rebellion. In this Clarke is probably nearer the truth.

1. Truly my soul waiteth upon God. Truly, the original is found six times in this Psalm, once rendered truly, once, surely, and four times, only. It will make good sense to render it surely or truly throughout, and so some do, as Venema, Jebb. This is often its meaning. Yet it also has the signification of only, merely. Piscator, Amesius, Hengstenberg and Alexander render it only in every case in this Psalm. Calvin has it nevertheless or yet. Others vary the rendering as is done in the English version, or according to each one's judgment. No important point is gained by the adoption of either rendering. Yet if a preference is given to any exclusively, perhaps it is best to read only. Waiteth, better rendered (is) in silence. The corresponding verb is in Ps. iv. 4 rendered, Be still; in Ps. xxx. 12, Be silent; in Ps. xxxvii. 7, Rest. It is found in v. 5 of this Psalm. Reading it (is) in silence, the whole clause may be rendered, Unto God only is my soul silent. Margin: My soul keepeth silence unto God.

This is the rendering of many, q. d., I bow in silence to every word and act of the Almighty. Clarke: "He has a right to lay on me what he pleases; what he lays on me is much less than I deserve, therefore, am I dumb before God;" Pool: "My soul silently, quietly and patiently looks up to God for deliverance, and that in his time and way, without murmuring or despair, or using indirect or sinful practices." He did this to God only. To man, however wise or great, he answered, and argued, or remonstrated, as the case might be, but not to God. Anderson: "Doubtless the Psalmist intended to say that his soul was quiet, submissive, and subject; the rebellious affections being tamed and subdued." To God and to God only he implicitly yielded control of everything. From him cometh my salvation, q. d., If he cannot save me, none else can. Salvation, sometimes rendered help, but commonly salvation; see on Ps. iii. 2, 8.

2. He only is my rock and my salvation. Rock, see on Ps. xviii. 2; lxi. 2. It is the word used by Moses in Deut. xxxii. 4, 15. Salvation, as in v. 1. This clause asserts both David's creed and his purpose. He believes he has no other; his resolution is to reject all other aid and safety. He is my defence, high tower, high fort, or refuge; see on Ps. ix. 9; xviii. 2; lix. 9, 17. Compare Ps. cxliv. 2; Isa. xxv. 12. I shall not be greatly moved. Chaldee: I shall not be moved in the day of great affliction; Arabic: So that I shall never be moved; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: I shall be moved no more; Ainsworth and Venema: I shall not be moved much; Hengstenberg: I shall not be much shaken; Pool: "Though I may be shaken, I shall not be overthrown;" Clarke: "I may be shaken, but cannot be cast down." In Ps. xvii. 5; xxxviii. 16, other forms of the same verb are rendered slip; but see on Ps. x. 6; xlv. 5.

3. How long will ye imagine mischief against a man? The rendering is very various. Venema: How long will ye throw yourselves (violently) upon a man? Edwards: How long will ye thrust yourselves against a man? Hengstenberg: How long do you rage all of you like a storm let loose against a man? The difficulty arises in good part from the fact that the verb rendered imagine mischief is found here only, and that a kindred word in the Arabic has been a chief guide to the meaning. Although we may be in doubt respecting the precise signification of the word, yet we can be at no loss concerning the import of the passage, which is a remonstrance against his enemies for pursuing him with evil devices, evil speeches, violence and rage. He warns them: Ye shall be slain all of you. This rendering is substantially supported by Calvin, Ainsworth, Venema, Amesius, Piscator and Jebb; but the ancient versions, also Fabritius, Edwards, Fry, Hengstenberg and Alexander, give the verb an active sense, Will ye murder him all of you? or, Ye would all of you murder; or, Ye all go about as manslayers. If we take it in the former sense, then the last clauses are well rendered in the English version: As a bowing wall shall ye be, and as a tottering fence. But if we take the verb in the active sense, then the meaning is, Will ye murder (or ye murder) the man who is as a bowing wall and a tottering fence? The decisive reason for following the common version is the general spirit of the Psalm, which is not supplicatory, or deprecatory, but bold and confident. In his weakness David did compare himself to a partridge, and even to a flea, 1 Sam. xxiv. 14; xxvi. 20. But he was then in a low tone of feeling, and had Saul and the mass of the kingdom against him. This Psalm is anything but dispirited and timid. He predicts that his enemies shall be slain, fall down and be as a bowing wall and a tottering fence, i. e., be as nothing to hinder David's return to Jerusalem and to his throne. So it soon came to pass. Tottering, thrust down, struck, or overthrown. See on Ps. xxxvi. 12. Compare also Ps. cxi. 4; Isa. xxx. 13.

4. They only consult to cast him down from his excellency. Consult, purpose, advise, counsel. One thought is uppermost in their minds, and it has assumed the form of a regular plan. The Hebrew verb is in the preterite. Cast down, also drive, drive out, thrust away, chase. Excellency, dignity, elevation, exaltation. The meaning is that their one deliberate plan was to hinder David from attaining the great hopes and realizing the proper ends of the royal dignity. For this purpose, They delight in lies. The war against David and against Christ has always been carried on by falsehood. Men have relished these untruths. The verb is in the future will delight, like, accept, enjoy, take pleasure in, have a favor to. They bless with their mouth, but they curse inwardly. Inwardly; margin, in their inward parts. Parallel passages are Ps. xii. 2; xxviii. 3; lv. 21; see also Jer. ix. 8.

5. My soul, wait thou only upon God. Here we have the same words as in the first clause of v. 1, except 1, that here soul is spoken to, as is David's wont, Ps. xlii. 5, 11; xliii. 5; 2, here we have the verb be silent or wait in the imperative mood; see on v. 1. The meaning is, Bow to the sovereign will of God; in silence submit to him, hoping in his mercy, and not despairing of his aid, but being subject to him in a spirit of patience. Good reason had David thus to exhort his soul: For my expectation is from him. Expectation, as in Ps. ix. 18 and elsewhere; often hope, once the thing that I long for, Job vi. 8; vii. 6.

6. He only is my rock and my salvation; he is my defence: I shall not be moved. This verse is exactly like v. 2, except that greatly in v. 2 is here omitted. This shows a growth of confidence. There he said he should not be moved greatly; here he says he shall not be moved at all.

7. In God is my salvation and my glory. Salvation, always so rendered or safety, see on Ps. xii. 5; li. 12. My glory, as in Ps. iii. 3. The rock of my strength. Rock, as in vv. 2, 6. Rock of my strength is equivalent to the rock where I find my strength, or my strong rock. And my refuge is in God. Refuge, in Ps. lxi. 3, shelter.

8. Trust in him at all times. Trust, as in Ps. iv. 5, also rendered hope. Ye people, pour out your heart before him. People, in the singular, meaning the Jewish nation. We pour out our hearts before God, when we tell him all that is in our hearts, whether it be our burdens, our griefs, our shame and penitence, or our joy and gladness. In distress we sometimes resign ourselves to despondency or despair when we ought to be praying in hope of an early deliverance. God is a refuge for us. Refuge, as in v. 7.

9. Surely men of low degree are vanity, and men of high degree are a lie. Chaldee: Wherefore the sons of men are nothing, and the sons of a man are a lie; Arabic: All the sons of men pass away as a shadow, and those who are laid in the balances are liars; John Rogers' translation: As for men, they are but vayne, men are dysceatful; Calvin: Nevertheless, the sons of Adam are vanity, and the children of men a lie; Ainsworth: Surely the sons of base men are vanity, the sons of noble men are a lie; Edwards: Men of low rank are vanity; those of an elevated station are a mere nothing. On the use of the words Adam and Ish, here rendered men, see Introduction, § 16. None of the ancient versions justify us in making any such distinction as is conveyed in the English version, or by Ainsworth and Edwards. Clarke's interpretation is pleasing but fanciful: "Adam was the name of the first man when formed out of the earth; Ish was his name when united to his wife, and they became one flesh. Before, he was the incomplete man; after, he was the complete man: for it seems, in the sight of God, it requires the male and female to make one complete human being." The sum of what is taught by this clause is that men by whatever name called are vain, fleeting, of little force, and disappoint our expectations, as a lie, if credited, would do. Nay, more. To be laid in the balance, they are altogether lighter than vanity. Altogether is here used in its old sense of conjunctly.

The word together is better. Put all men together in the scales, and they go up, or as we say, fly up. They are lighter than vanity. A Hebrew could not have used stronger language to express his conception of the utter nothingness of our miserable race. The pertinence of this verse is to establish the great truths, that God only is worthy of reliance, that he only is a refuge.

10. Trust not in oppression, and become not vain in robbery. "An inheritance may be gotten hastily at the beginning; but the end thereof shall not be blessed." A resort to immoral or doubtful expedients for escaping poverty and other ills of life will in the end benefit no man. Oppression, not before found in the Psalms, most commonly so rendered, once extortion, and in the margin fraud and deceit. Robbery, not before found in the Psalms. Oppression here is obtaining possession of other men's property by fraud; robbery obtains that which is not its own by violence. All unjust modes of accumulation bring a curse. If riches increase, set not your heart upon them. This lesson is often taught, Ps. lii. 7; Luke xii. 15; 1 Tim. vi. 17. Even when the increase is lawful, we must guard against the love of riches or the undue care of their growth or preservation.

11. God hath spoken once; twice have I heard this, that power belongeth unto God. Power, strength, might, as in Ps. viii. 2; xxviii. 7. There is no need of explaining this as if David had two separate revelations from God. The words are best taken in the popular sense, that God had repeatedly impressed upon his mind the lesson, as in Job xxxiii. 14. This impression had been made not merely by God's word, but perhaps especially by his providence. The English text agrees with the Chaldee, Syriac, church of England, Calvin, Amesius, Ainsworth, Piscator, Fabritius, Pool, Jebb, Fry and Tholuck. But another rendering is favored by many: God has spoken once or one word, yea, there are two which I have heard. This is sanctioned by the Arabic, Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Gill, Horne, Clarke, Morison, Hengstenberg and Alexander. Venema and Scott approve either way of rendering. For twice Edwards has oftentimes; and no doubt that is the meaning, if we read the word as an adverbial numeral. But if we read: Two things have I heard, then we must not close this verse with a period, but connect it with the next. The first thing he heard was concerning God's omnipotence. The other of the two things is now mentioned:

12. Also unto thee, O Lord, belongeth mercy. Mercy, as in Ps. v. 7; in Ps. li. 1, lovingkindness. Some think the publication of these perfections of God here intended was chiefly made at Sinai, others in all revelation. But the phrase, God hath spoken once, yea, twice, principally teaches the certainty of the thing; see Tillotson's Sermon on this passage. For thou renderest to every man according to his work. Instead of for, the Syriac and Arabic read and; Alexander, but; Fry, truly; Calvin, certainly. The renderings of Fry and Calvin are sanctioned by the English translators in some other places, Gen. xxix. 32; Ex. iii. 12; 1 Kings i. 13; Isa. lxiii. 16, where we have surely, certainly, assuredly, doubtless. Some are offended that in the rewards of the last day God will render to every man according to his works. But the doctrine is often asserted in Scripture, Prov. xxiv. 12, 29; Jer. xxxii. 19; Ezek. vii. 27; Matt. xvi. 27; Rom. ii. 6; 1 Cor. iii. 8; Eph. vi. 8; 1 Pet. i. 17; Rev. xxii. 12. What is more fair than that a man's life and character should furnish the rule of the divine distribution? See on Ps. xviii. 25, 26. If our works are wicked, we shall be lost; if they are good, we shall be saved, yet not for any merit that is in them, but only for Christ's sake.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. While true religion is not exclusive, in the sense of denying admission to any humble soul to the privileges of the Gospel, it is always exclusive, in the sense of denying to any but God only the supreme homage of the heart, vv. 1, 2, 5, 6, 9. True piety finds and pronounces God all-sufficient. The proffer of another is an offence to the believer as it is to God himself.

2. Silence, unmurmuring submission to the divine will, and patient waiting on God are better than all the pragmatistical efforts of any man to help himself, vv. 1, 5. God, the author of our trials, never errs. "Christ would not be delivered from his sufferings by any other means than those which the Father ordained." Let us walk as he walked. No doubt David had a sharp conflict with his own heart. He was a very spirited man; but by God's grace he obtained the victory over his own will.

3. It is marvellous grace in God by his word, Spirit and providence to make so clear to all teachable spirits the essential matters of religion; in particular that salvation is wholly of him. The rescue of Israel at the Red sea; the escape of David in the Sauline persecution and in Absalom's rebellion and the conversion of every sinner may well make every man cry, From him cometh my salvation, v. 1.

4. What time we are afraid and our enemies fierce, let us in imitation of David call to mind the appropriate titles of the Almighty our Rock, our Salvation, our Defence, our Glory, the Rock of our strength, our Refuge, vv. 2, 6, 7, 8. These words fall far short of the excellent truths they represent. Still when we can thus address God, "we may draw the animating conclusion that we shall not be shaken or cast down by anything that the malice or wickedness of men can effect." Believers are led to rely more and more upon God, the more they prove him, and experience his grace, and the more they study and understand the covenant of his love with its exceeding great and precious promises. Though a true Christian may be worsted in a battle, yet he always in the end comes off conqueror, and more than conqueror through him that loved him.

5. If God is for us, we shall not be greatly moved, v. 2. Nay, we shall not be moved at all, v. 6, in any way that will do us real damage. Dickson: "As a man resolveth to believe and follow the course of sound faith, so he may assure himself of establishment and victory over all temptations, notwithstanding his own weakness."

6. It is no new thing, and, if God is with us, it is no ruinous thing, to have many and mighty foes banded together against us, employing all the arts of deceit and all the rage of malice for our destruction. Scott: "However blamelessly the believer may conduct himself, he must expect a measure of the same enmity, with which the world treated his Saviour; when every device was framed, every deceit used, and every slander propagated, to 'cast him down from his excellency.' But the doom of David's persecutors, and of the crucifiers of Christ, may be expected by all, who endeavor to tempt his people to sin, or to vilify their characters." Nothing can be more vain than the constant and amazing efforts of ungodly men to harm the followers of the Lamb, vv. 3, 4. There is no infatuation like that of an unregenerate man, a foe of God and of all goodness.

7. The awful doom of incorrigible sinners, and in particular of persecutors, is made certain in two ways. 1. The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it: "Ye shall be slain all of you." 2. Their proclivities, even now, show their destiny: they are 'as a bowing wall and as a tottering fence,' v. 3. The strongest of the wicked are but feeble. Every fair trial evinces their weakness and the badness of their cause, Isa. xxx. 13; Jer. xii. 5.

8. So futile are all counsels and devices against God and righteousness, that it is a marvel that the wicked do not cease to consult, v. 4. If directed against truth and God's people, one plan is as foolish as another, for each one shall come to nought. Wisdom is not wisdom, if it is employed against the Almighty.

9. How can any expect that the God of truth will allow men to succeed, who 'delight in lies?' All the laws of his moral government must be reversed before such could be the case. If there is anything that God hates, it is deceit. He has set the whole might of his omnipotence against it.

10. It is a great comfort that God is our only hope, and trust, and expectation, vv. 5, 6, 8. When we find him, we need seek no further. He is all-sufficient. The more he is tried, the more he is found to be the very friend we need.

11. If God has dealt well with us, and made his candle to shine upon us, and made us to triumph, when our foes were many, our fears strong, and our discouragements great, then we ought to show forth his praises, and summon all whom we can influence to unite with us in such a course of piety and devotion as will secure to them the same blessings, v. 8. Dickson: "The duty of comforted and victorious believers is to communicate the fruit of their experience, for strengthening their brethren, and edification of others."

12. In all acts of devotion, in particular in prayer and supplication, we should give earnest heed to the matter of engaging our affections in the work, so that we shall truly pour out our hearts before God, v. 8. There is no substitute for godly sincerity. "God is not mocked."

13. Are our enemies lively, our burdens heavy, our temptations terrible? then surely our resort should be to God in prayer, v. 8. Even when our trials are light we must still look to God. I have known a man to behave well under a terrible trial, who lost his temper and behaved badly under a very slight provocation. In the former case he went to the throne of grace; in the latter, he attempted to walk alone.

14. There are many ways of drawing us from God and from duty, many snares spread for our feet, many ways of falling into idolatry. There are dangers at home and dangers abroad, dangers in prosperity, and dangers in adversity. David names some in vv. 9, 10, but they are mere samples. Remember this is a wicked, dangerous world.

15. Let every one beware of reliance on man, v. 9. He is often indisposed, and still oftener unable to minister the slightest relief, Ps. cxviii. 8, 9. The very best and greatest man is a poor creature. Luther: "Many are to be found, who trust in the favor of kings and princes; and on that account they are puffed up with pride and insolence, and oppress others with the more confidence; and especially if they see their wall bowing and giving way; that is, if they see a man declining in his affairs, who was once in prosperity, or if they see him not protected by wealth and influence against injury: such an one as this, they endeavor to overthrow wholly; and to that end, ingratiate themselves with the powerful, and wind themselves into the affections of those, on whom they depend, as on a propitious deity. But such see not how fallacious is the favor of man, and how variable and uncertain are their wills, nor will they believe it to be vain, until they find it out by experience and are brought to lament their error." To do us real good in important matters men are wanting in will and power, in candor and fidelity, or in energy and promptness. All, all that is under the power of sin is nought, nought, nought.

16. Apparent and even long-continued success is no evidence that our course of life is either right, safe, or pleasing to God, v. 8. He, who makes his prosperity the test of his virtue, has no better evidence of his uprightness than had many of the most atrocious wrong-doers, who have cursed the earth.

17. Let good men be very careful what means they employ to promote their own advancement, or effect their own deliverance. Sin is worse than poverty, reproach and the most depressed condition of our affairs. Oppression and robbery, like all other sins, will in the end do us no good. "When in affliction, turn whithersoever you like, if you turn not to God, you will find no rest." Sin is worse than all other evils. It makes earth like hell, and it makes hell what it is.

18. Trust not in wealth, however acquired, or secured, v. 10. Nothing is more uncertain, deceitful, or unsatisfying. Scott: "Reliance on increasing riches, however obtained, is idolatry, and totally inconsistent with the life of faith." Arnd: "Riches are like a stream, which soon flows to a person, and may also soon flow away, so that where one had first to pass with a boat, he may in a short while be able to cross by a step, and by and by to walk over with dry feet." Compare Job xx. 15; Ps. xxxvii. 16; xxxix. 6; lii. 7; Pr. xi. 4, 28; xxiii. 5; Matt. xiii. 22; Mark x. 23.

19. Great truths often taught in Scripture and enforced in providence, respecting the character and government of God ought to make a deep and lasting impression on our minds and hearts, v. 11.

20. When God thus speaks to saint or sinner, he changes not, v. 11. If God says a thing once, it is true; if he says it often, it shows that in his kindness he would often remind us of it. 'The word of God is a decree, steadfast and irreversible.' The Scripture cannot be broken, John x. 35. The promises and the threatenings will all be kept.

21. It is a great thing to have the mind clear and the faith settled respecting the Power of God, v. 11. If we think anything is too hard for him, half our troubles, and those the heaviest we will try to bear without his aid. It was therefore a great revelation that the Lord made to the patriarch: "I am the Almighty God," Gen. xvii. 1. Since his ascension to glory the Saviour has taught us no more weighty truth than his almightiness, Rev. i. 8. "All the powers of all the creatures are derived from God, depend upon him, and are used by him as he pleases," John xix. 11.

22. Nor is it less important that our views of the mercy of God be clear and settled, v. 12. This was among the earliest and clearest revelations God made of himself, Ex. xxxiv. 5-7. In a religion of sinners the absence of mercy would be like the absence of light in a world where the inhabitants depended entirely on vision for ability to do anything.

23. But it is very important that our views of God's power and mercy should harmonize, vv. 11, 12. Dickson: "To induce a soul to trust in God only, it is necessary, that it so look to his power, as it looks to his mercy, and lay hold on both: faith hath need of both, as of two wings, to carry it up to God above all vain enticements, and terrors, and temptations." God has power to save, and a kindness inclining him to save.

24. Whatever misgivings may arise in our minds respecting the justice of the divine conduct in the unfinished affairs of this life, all our doubts will be at once and forever removed when God shall wind up this dispensation in the decisions of the last day, and render to every man according to his work, v. 12. "No service done to God shall go unrewarded, nor any affront given him go unpunished, unless it be repented of."

25. The character of God is a perfect and glorious whole. He has power to crush the heaven-daring and to raise the poor from the dunghill. He has mercy that condescends to the vilest, takes a favorable notice of the poorest pious services, and forgives innumerable sins. He has justice that forever bars the gates of heaven against the wicked, and as certainly bars the gates of hell against the righteous, vv. 11, 12. He has wisdom that never erred, that cannot err; faithfulness that reaches to the heavens in height and to all generations in duration; holiness that is glorious, and every conceivable perfection. Oh study God's character. Study it all.

26. Is God inflexibly, eternally and unchangeably just, then, if we are innocent, or our cause is good, we may know assuredly that he will, in due time, redress our wrongs, and relieve our sufferings. But we cannot plead his justice in any matter, where we are even partially in the wrong. Let appeals to the divine justice be never made without great reverence and after great heart-searchings.

PSALM LXIII.

A Psalm of David, when he was in the wilderness of Judah.

- 1 O God, thou art my God; early will I seek thee: my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is;
- 2 To see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary.
- 3 Because thy lovingkindness is better than life, my lips shall praise thee.
- 4 Thus will I bless thee while I live: I will lift up my hands in thy name:
- 5 My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness; and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips:
- 6 When I remember thee upon my bed, and meditate on thee in the night watches.
- 7 Because thou hast been my help, therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice.
- 8 My soul followeth hard after thee: thy right hand upholdeth me.
- 9 But those that seek my soul, to destroy it, shall go into the lower parts of the earth.
- 10 They shall fall by thy sword: they shall be a portion for foxes.
- 11 But the king shall rejoice in God; every one that sweareth by him shall glory: but the mouth of them that speak lies shall be stopped.

ON A Psalm of David see on title of Ps. iii. On When he was in the wilderness of Judah opinions are divided, some thinking this Psalm was written in the Sauline persecution; others, in the rebellion of Absalom. During both these periods David was often in the wild parts of Judah. Those, who hold that the Psalm refers to the Sauline persecution, point us to 1 Sam. xxii. 5; xxiii. 14, 25; xxiv. 1; Josh. xv. 55, 62, and assert that the forest of Hareth, and the wilderness of Ziph, Maon, and Engedi were all in the tribe of Judah. But those who contend that the title points to the rebellion of Absalom also cite 2 Sam. xv. 23, 28; xvi. 2, 14; xvii. 16, 29 in proof that the title refers to this latter period. The common impression is that the reference is to that region mentioned in Matt. iii. 1; iv. 1, as the wilderness, or the wilderness of Judea. We have some light from other quarters, perhaps enough to guide us. David never calls himself king during the life of Saul. After that event he uses the title freely. Yet in v. 11 of this Psalm he speaks of himself as "the king." Calvin, however, thinks that it was great magnanimity in David to call himself king, at a time when he was not and had not been in actual possession of the kingdom, but relied upon the divine promise alone for his authority. This can hardly be regarded as satisfactory. David acknowledged Saul's kingly authority till that persecutor died. David was very far from arrogating either titles or prerogatives. There is also a striking correspondence between the description of the situation of David and his friends in v. 1 of this Psalm, and the account given of them in 2 Sam. xvi. 2, 14, in fleeing from Absalom. Hengstenberg also urges that this stands in close connection with such Psalms as confessedly relate to the affair of Absalom. He cites Psalms iii. iv. xlii. lxi. and adds: "Modern criticism ought to be somewhat distrustful of itself, as the fact is evident, that, in general, only those Psalms are related to each other, which are announced by the titles to belong to each other." But few commentators, as Patrick, Slade and Alexander agree with Hengstenberg in referring this Psalm to the time of Absalom. Gill and Morison are not clear whether it refers to the time of Saul or of Absalom. The great mass of commentators, as Theodoret, Luther, Diodati, Ainsworth, Venema, Pool, Henry, Chandler, Scott, Clarke and Dickson agree with Calvin in supposing it to have been written in the time of Saul. The forms of title prefixed to four of the ancient versions, also Hilary, Jerome, Augustine and Bellarmine for Judah in the title read Idumea. But there is no warrant for this, nor for the Syriac in saying, it relates to David's interview with "the king of Moab when he said, My father and mother fled to thee from the face of Saul; and I also take refuge with thee. The Davidic authorship is generally admitted though Calmet thinks it is a prayer by the captives in Babylon. Scott dates it B. C. 1060; Clarke, B. C. 1061. In it we have Elohim God and Eli my God, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; v. 4; xviii. 2. This ode has been greatly praised by many, much read and esteemed by more.

1. O God, thou art my God. My God includes the two ideas of omnipotence and covenant relation, q. d., O God, thou art mighty, almighty, the Governor of the world, and thou hast promised to be my friend and helper. Thy word has been pledged to me. I now plead the fulfilment of all thou hast promised. Early will I seek thee; in its participial and infinitive form rendered diligently seek, Pr. vii. 15; xi. 27. A man, who begins his labor early, is supposed to be diligent and in earnest. It is authorized to retain early here, Pr. xiii. 24; see also Pr. i. 28; viii. 17. The corresponding noun always signifies morning. David was in great earnest because he was in great straits, and had hope in God alone. My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee in a dry and thirsty land, where no water is. My soul and my flesh, i. e., my whole nature. David's condition in the wilderness was very trying. He was poor, destitute, forsaken, persecuted, deprived of the privileges of God's public worship, and having but small personal religious enjoyment. Indeed if this Psalm refers to the rebellion of Absalom, David knew his present sufferings were brought on by his former sins, 2 Sam. xii. 9-12, and so he must have been greatly overwhelmed. His outward condition is well set forth in 2 Sam. xvi. 14; xvii. 2, 29. Now he seeks God as his Father, greatly desiring the light of his countenance, and as his Deliverer from pressing and sore distress. No doubt the great want felt by David was the soul-cheering presence of the Lord. Hengstenberg: "A king who could not get even a drink of water to quench his thirst! all human fountains of consolation and happiness were dried up to the Psalmist. But he thirsts all the more earnestly after the divine fountain which still remained open to him. It is by this that he is known as a child of God." His wish was

2. To see thy power and thy glory, so as I have seen thee in the sanctuary. He specifies no instances of religious enjoyment in the sanctuary. It was not necessary. He had had frequent refreshment in God's worship, when his soul had had blessed discoveries of the divine power and majesty. In spiritual communion with God David had long found his chief enjoyment. He loved to think of such seasons. To see God is to enjoy him, Ps. xxvii. 13; xxxiv. 8, 12; xlix. 19; Matt. v. 8; John iii. 36. Some explain glory, as referring to the ark of the covenant, but that was kept in the holy of holies, and David did not see it in the sanctuary.

3. Because thy lovingkindness is better than life, my lips shall praise thee. Lovingkindness, as in Ps. li. 1. It is better not to exist than to exist without God's favor. It is better to die enjoying his lovingkindness than to live without it. Life, some think, means prosperity. It probably never has that signification in Hebrew. There is nothing gained by separating this clause from the words My lips shall praise thee. Praise, commend, glory or triumph, Ecc. viii. 15; 1 Chron. xvi. 35; Ps. cvi. 47.

4. Thus will I bless thee while I live. Bless, as in Ps. v. 12; xvi. 7. It is the word of benediction. Thus refers to the manner of exalting God, which he had previously stated. The clause contains a vow that while life lasted he would publish the honor of God as he had been doing. I will lift up my hands in thy name. Mant: "The practice of lifting up the hands in prayer towards heaven, the supposed residence of the object to which prayer is addressed, was anciently used, both by believers, as appears from various passages of the Old Testament, and by the heathen, agreeably to numerous instances in the classical writers." This is true not only of prayer regarded as supplication, but of any act of religious worship, adoration or praise, Ps. cxxxiv. 2. In this place to lift up hands is to praise and bless and extol God.

5. My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness; and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips. It is an expression of hope of better days and of a purpose to give to God the praise of a favorable change. Scott: "The Psalmist waited for the pleasure of communion with God, with more ardent desire than any epicure ever anticipated the enjoyment of sensual pleasure." The clause points to a luxurious banquet, here used for a large measure of all the blessings now wanted by David, but which he hoped to obtain. All this David says, not because he sees clearly how it is to be brought about, but because he trusts in the living God, however dark present appearances.

6. When I remember thee upon my bed and meditate on thee in the night watches. Chaldee: If I shall remember thee upon my bed, in the watches I will meditate in thy word; Arabic: I remembered thee upon my bed, and in the early morning thou art the subject of my thought; Calvin: I shall surely remember thee upon my couch, I will meditate upon thee in the night watches; Alexander: When I remember thee upon my bed, in the night watches I will meditate upon thee. Perhaps the reader will not err in preferring the common version. In the time of David the Hebrews divided the night into three watches of equal length. After the subjugation of the Jews by the Romans they adopted the division of four watches of equal length. Meditate, see on Ps. i. 2.

7. Because thou hast been my help, therefore in the shadow of thy wings will I rejoice. Help, as in Ps. xxvii. 9; xxxv. 2; in the plural once rendered helpers. If anything could win the confidence of an ingenuous soul to God, it would be such a history and experience as David had in his eventful life, full of perils and deliverances. They led him to rest in God. On the figure of the last clause see on Ps. xvii. 8; xxxvi. 7; lvii. 1; lxi. 4. This rest in God was not reluctant or despondent. It made him shout for joy as the verb is rendered in Ps. v. 11.

8. My soul followeth hard after thee. The verb is in the past tense, but expresses what had long been and still was the habit of David's heart; commonly rendered cleaveth, or sticketh, Gen. ii. 24; xxxiv. 3; Josh. xxiii. 8; Ps. cxix. 31. Hengstenberg: "Cleaves to him, like a bur to a coat;" Clarke: "My soul cleaves, or is glued after thee;" Waterland: "My soul hath kept close—hath adhered to thee." The common version is good. It is the same in several other places, as 1 Sam. xiv. 22; 2 Sam. i. 6; 1 Chron. x. 2. It expresses the exceeding eagerness and intentness of David after a close walk with God. But he should not have had any mercy left, nor should he have been alive but for the good hand of God upon him: Thy right hand upholdeth me. Right, equivalent to strong and perhaps friendly. In reviewing his history, yea, in looking at his present circumstances David felt that God alone, stayed, held up, or maintained him, as the verb is rendered in Ps. xvi. 5; xvii. 5.

9. But those that seek my soul, to destroy it, shall go into the lower parts of the earth. The war on David both by Saul and by his own rebellious son was fierce, cruel, deadly. His foes cared not what should become of him, if they could but be rid of him. But they brought on themselves the ruin which they sought for him. Alexander with confidence renders the first clause: And they to (their) ruin are seeking my soul, and in proof refers to Ps. xxxv. 8. Lower parts of the earth, the pit, the grave are always thought of as down 'under ground.' The prediction is that the earth should soon cover them. Some think there is a reference to the earth opening and swallowing them alive as it did Korah and his company, Num. xvi. 31-34. But David's enemies did not so perish, as we know from history. Indeed the very next verse tells the manner of their death, and their want of burial.

10. They shall fall by the sword: they shall be a portion for foxes. How Absalom and his followers perished is recorded in 2 Sam. xviii. 16-17. None of them seem to have had burial. Even Absalom himself was thrown into a pit, and a great heap of stones was laid upon him. Foxes, in our version always so rendered, though Hengstenberg renders it jackals.

11. But the king shall rejoice in God. In the fall of Absalom the king, his father, had deep sorrow, 2 Sam. xviii. 33; xix. 1-7. But in God he could rejoice and be glad. That lesson was deeply impressed upon him by the awful judgments of God on his foes. Nor should the king alone rejoice in God. Every one that sweareth by him shall glory. By him, i. e., by the king, see Gen. xlii. 15; 2 Sam. xv. 21. Indeed some kind of oath seems to have been taken in regard to persons of less consideration than a king, 1 Sam. i. 26; xx. 3. Or, the particle may be rendered to and not by, and then the meaning is that every one that sweareth allegiance to him should glory. But others think that the swearing is by God, and that here as in other places solemn swearing is put by synecdoche for the whole of worship, see Isa. xix. 18; xlv. 23; lxxv. 16; Rom. xiv. 11. The prediction is that such should in the end glory, or boast, or praise. But the mouth of them that speak lies shall be stopped, i. e., they shall not in the end glory, or boast, or praise. Their falsehoods shall at last cover them with confusion. Every mouth shall be stopped, and all the world shall become guilty before God. Of the unprofitable servant it is said, "And he was speechless." For an example of the confusion and humiliation of a slanderer and reviler even in this life, see 2 Sam. xix. 19, 20.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is no new thing for a good man to be driven to the wilderness, and deprived of the comfort of the society of God's people and the enjoyment of God's ordinances. It so happened to David, and to many of the best men that ever lived, Heb. xi. 37, 38. Some think prophecy teaches that God's saints shall yet be sorely persecuted.

2. We should always approach God, not only as God, glorious and almighty, but as our God, v. 1. He keepeth covenant. Arnd: "Just as the magnet has lost all its power when it does not quickly turn to the north, so faith has lost all its power and is dead, when it does not without delay turn to God, and say, O my beloved God;" Tholuck: "The power of prayer consists in the knowledge that God is our God;" Cobbin: "There is nothing in this world to satisfy the desires of a heavenly-minded man." Even ordinances, though often the means of refreshment, are powerless without God's own gracious presence.

3. This is a reason why the saints of all ages have so uniformly found it good to give their earliest thoughts to sacred things, v. 1. Was there ever a truly devout man, whose devotions uniformly began not till hours after he had been awake? Horne: "The Christian dedicates to God 'the sweet hour of prime;' he opens the eyes of his understanding, together with those of his body, and awakes each morning to righteousness."

4. While resolutions made in reliance on human strength yield to temptation, yet it is well for us to strengthen ourselves by a good purpose. Early will I seek thee, v. 1. It is a great thing fully to have made up our minds. To many a temptation it is a fit answer: I have said I will, or I have said I will not, Ps. xxvii. 8; xxx. 1.

5. The preciousness of access to God and of a covenant relation to him is sure to be sensibly felt by the real child of God in times of distress and deprivation, v. 1. Commonly the greater the trial, the more eagerly does the pious mind turn to Jehovah and rely upon him. To offer to satisfy such a soul with the things of time is to offer ashes to one dying of thirst. "Gracious souls look down upon the world with a holy disdain, and look up to God with a holy desire."

6. A great benefit of religious instruction is found in the impression received from it, and a great blessing connected with God's spiritual worship is found in the pleasant memories it allows us to carry through life, v. 2. Calvin: "It is noticeable of ignorant and superstitious persons, that they seem full of zeal and fervor so long as they come in contact with the ceremonies of religion, while their seriousness evaporates immediately upon these being withdrawn. David, on the contrary, when these were removed, continued to retain them in his recollection, and rise, through their assistance, to fervent aspirations to God."

7. If men are surprised at the conduct of consistent Christians, their wonder would cease if they saw things with the same eyes as God's people do, v. 2. The saints have some just sight of eternal things. They have seen God's power and glory.

8. God's people give up much, but they gain more. Sometimes they yield up life itself, and get eternal life. Even here the Lord satisfies them as with marrow and fatness, vv. 3, 5. Tholuck: "Life is valueless without the divine mercy." There is not an exercise of the renewed soul, that does not promote the sum of its happiness; and there is not a want of a penitent soul that is not met in the Gospel and promises of God.

9. That these things are so is established by universal Christian experience and by the unanimous suffrages of God's children. Why then, O why will not sinners turn from transgression, secure a crown of life and be forever saved?

10. Whatever be our circumstances let us not forget that our duty continually calls us to bless and praise the Lord with joyful lips, vv. 3, 4, 5.

11. Genuine devotion is something that affects the heart. It has in it the fire of love. It moves the affections, v. 5. Scott: "Can any candid man read this Psalm, and then speak of true devotion as merely intellectual, a dispassionate exercise of the understanding, without any warm emotions or affections of the heart? Weighed in the balance of such phlegmatic Christians, the man after God's own heart must be numbered among enthusiasts; for, though his devotion was most rational, it certainly was most fervent and enraptured; and in fact the more rational on that very account."

12. Such is the nature of true religion and the power of divine grace, that it gets good out of all evil, and turns even a sleepless night to some valuable account, v. 6. Blessed is the man, who has learned the art of not wasting precious hours in the night-watches, although he may be denied the repose, which his weary nature demands!

13. Some men sadly err by living on from month to month in barrenness and darkness relying entirely on exercises and experiences of former days; but those also err, who in the day of their trial never recur to what God has done for them in former straits, v. 7. We should often call to mind the years of the right hand of the Most High, when the candle of the Lord shone upon us. This will cheer us, 'when we see the wicked wallowing and rioting in the abundance of the things of this world, while we ourselves are left to pine under the want of them.'

14. In following hard after God, our great aim should be to be intent upon knowing him, serving and pleasing him, being accepted of him, being made like unto him, longing for his fellowship and the light of his countenance, and seeking to be forever with him, v. 8.

15. There is no hope that any man will be able to behave wisely, to keep his good resolutions, or even to seek salvation, except as he is inclined and strengthened thereunto by God, who upholdeth him, v. 8. The best of us is as a rag. But with help from on high we can do wonders, Heb. xi. 33-38. Arnd: "God holds heaven and earth with his hand, he will therefore be able both to hold up and to bear such a little atom of dust as thou art."

16. Though we may not have the gift of prophecy respecting the end of our adversaries, as David had of his, yet we may know as assuredly as did he or any prophet, that wicked and relentless haters and persecutors of God's people shall certainly come to an end no less dreadful than that, which overtook the miserable men that sought to destroy David, v. 9. Horne: "Their habitation must be in the 'pit;' their punishment, the flaming 'sword' of almighty vengeance; and their companions, those crafty and malicious ones, who, having contributed to seduce, will help to torment them."

17. If outwardly and to all human appearance the end of one of God's people should resemble that of David's foes, and he should fall by the sword, and his bones be scattered on the earth's surface, as in v. 10; yet there is this for their joy that they sleep in Jesus, that their dust is precious in his eyes, and that their Redeemer lives, and will bring them with him in glory.

18. The greatest men are best employed in gladly adoring and serving God, v. 11. The king can do nothing beyond that in dignity and nobleness.

19. But the enjoyments of religion, even the highest of them are not reserved for crowned heads. They are also for every true worshipper. So that the poor pious peasant, artisan, exile, beggar or prisoner shall at last glory as much as any other, v.

11. "Christ's second coming will be the everlasting triumph of all his faithful friends and followers, who may now therefore triumph in the believing hopes of it."

20. The overthrow of the wicked will at last be with dreadful confusion, v. 11.

21. How blessed is the believer. At home, abroad, surrounded by friends, menaced by foes, in his own abode, in exile, he has peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ; "his soul hangeth upon him, as its chief, its only good. With God he sleeps, and with God he awakes, with God he lives, and with God he hopes to die." He will soon be in glory singing the song of Moses and the Lamb.

PSALM LXIV.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

1 Hear my voice, O God, in my prayer: preserve my life from fear of the enemy.

2 Hide me from the secret counsel of the wicked; from the insurrection of the workers of iniquity:

3 Who whet their tongue like a sword, and bend their bows to shoot their arrows, even bitter words:

4 That they may shoot in secret at the perfect: suddenly do they shoot at him, and fear not.

5 They encourage themselves in an evil matter: they commune of laying snares privily; they say, Who shall see them?

6 They search out iniquities; they accomplish a diligent search: both the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart, is deep.

7 But God shall shoot at them with an arrow; suddenly shall they be wounded.

8 So they shall make their own tongue to fall upon themselves: all that see them shall flee away.

9 And all men shall fear, and shall declare the work of God; for they shall wisely consider of his doing.

10 The righteous shall be glad in the LORD, and shall trust in him; and all the upright in heart shall glory.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xi. That David wrote this Psalm is admitted by all the ancient versions, by Calvin, Diodati, Ainsworth, Patrick, Pool, Dimock, Gill, Dodd, Henry, Scott, Edwards, Jebb, Morison, Hengstenberg, Tholuck, Alexander. Calmet, followed by Clarke, however, thinks it a complaint of the captives of Babylon. We cannot assign to it a historic occasion, although one or two of the ancient versions attempt to do so. The amount of evil speaking noticed in it points to a time of dreadful tumult. There is nothing gained, but something lost, by seeking special occasions for Psalms that describe David's conflicts during a considerable part of his life. Scott dates the Psalm B. C. 1060; Clarke, about B. C. 568. The names of the Almighty in this Psalm are Elohim God and Jehovah LORD; on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2.

1. Hear my voice, O God, in my prayer. Hear, as in Ps. iv. 1; xvii. 1; lxi. 1. Prayer, elsewhere rendered complaint, meditation, communication. See on Ps. lv. 2, where it is complaint. Vulgate: Hear, O God, my prayer, when I entreat; Green: Hear my prayer, O God, when I pour out my complaint; Horsley: Hear my voice, O God, in my secret prayer. But there is no evidence that the word signifies private, as distinct from public prayer. This Psalm was directed to the leader of the prayers which were set to music. There is an intimate connection between prayer and meditation when rightly performed. Preserve my life from fear of the enemy. Preserve, as in Ps. xii. 7; xxv. 21; lxi. 7; more frequently keep; in the future, will keep. This form expresses confidence that the prayer would be answered. Fear is here used either for the tormenting passion of fear, or for the cause of fear as in Ps. liii. 5, i. e., Preserve me from cowardice and unmanly behaviour and my life from danger, or from that which might reasonably create alarm. His life was now in peril.

2. Hide me from the secret counsel of the wicked. Secret counsel, in the Hebrew one word; in Ps. xxv. 14, secret; in Ps. lv. 14, counsel. From the insurrection of the workers of iniquity. Insurrection, an assembling, a multitude, a crowd, a tumultuous body of men. See on the cognate verb in Ps. ii. 1, rendered rage, and on the word rendered company in Ps. lv. 14. Workers of iniquity, see on Ps. v. 5; and compare Ps. vi. 8; lix. 2. The two clauses of the verse describe the two kinds of hostility shown to David, plotting and violent rage of wicked men. Clarke: "Workers of iniquity are those who make sin their labor, their daily employment. It was their occupation and trade." The verb is in the future will hide, thus expressing hope that the complaint would be heard, the prayer answered.

3. Who whet their tongue like a sword. He who has been subjected to the taunts, revilings, slanders and lying machinations of a large number of men will see the force of this terrible clause. Comparing words to swords is frequent in the Psalms, Ps. lv. 21; lvii. 4; lix. 7. When words are made as sharp as possible by wit and malice, they have a frightful keenness of penetration. Whet, in the Hebrew whetted, or have whetted, implying that they have done it for some time, and are doing it still. And bend their bows to shoot their arrows, even bitter words. The common version supplies a great deal. The verb in Hebrew is have bent. This is not the only case where we have bending arrows in the Hebrew for bending bows to shoot arrows; see Ps. lviii. 7. On the mode of bending the [cross] bow, see on Ps. vii. 12. Literally it would be have trodden their arrows, bitter words. In Hebrew the last noun is singular, word, speech. The Chaldee has it, They have smeared their arrows with a grievous and deadly poison. And no poison rankles like grievous words. The same word here translated bitter is rendered bitterness in 1 Sam. xv. 32; 2 Sam. ii. 26; and bitter in Pr. v. 4; Ecc. vii. 26.

4. That they may shoot in secret at the perfect. The more mischief a slanderer does and the more stealthily he does it, the more does he rejoice in the evil he has wrought. Perfect, in the third person singular,—meaning David. On perfect see on Ps. xxxvii. 37. It designates a man of integrity, simplicity, sincerity, as the corresponding noun is rendered. The Syriac and Hengstenberg render it innocent; Edwards, upright. In the great troubles with Saul, David was not in the least to be blamed. Saul himself publicly so confessed. 1 Sam. xxvi. 21-25. The less ground of hatred they had, the higher their envy rose. Suddenly do they shoot at him, and fear not. Hengstenberg: "Suddenly" is "while he is thinking there is no harm." The same word occurs in v. 7. It has uniformly the same signification. Both the verbs are in the future, will shoot and will not fear. Fear not, i. e., fear not God, fear not anything that wise and good men fear.

5. They encourage themselves in an evil matter. The verb is in the future, encourage, elsewhere strengthen, make strong, still better here harden, as the same verb is oftentimes rendered in reference to Pharaoh, Ex. iv. 21; ix. 12. So also in Josh. xi. 20. To be of good courage in wickedness must harden the heart. Indeed boldness in wrong-doing can only be acquired by a dreadful process of deadening the sensibilities. They commune of laying snares privily, or of hiding snares. Commune, tell, declare, speak, or show forth, what snares they have hid, are now hiding, or intend to hide. See on Ps. ii. 7; ix. 1; xlv. 1. The verb commune is in the future, showing an expected continuance of the same evil course. They say, Who shall see them? Them may refer either to the snares, or to these persons spreading them. The question either declares their belief in the consummate artifices they were employing, or it expresses their practical atheism in denying that even Jehovah took account of their nefarious schemes. The latter is probably the right view; if so, the clause is parallel to Ps. x. 11; xii. 4; lxxiii. 11; Job xxii. 13.

6. They search out iniquities, or wickednesses, or unrighteousness, i. e., methods of accomplishing their wicked purposes. And they rack their brain to find out something more nefarious and fatal than ever, and so They accomplish a diligent search. There is much diversity in rendering this clause. Our version is not literal, but it fairly gives the sense. Both the inward thought of every one of them, and the heart is deep. Deep, the word is used in the sense of profound, or unsearchable as in Job xi. 8; xii. 22; Pr. xx. 5; it is also used in a bad sense, as dangerous, entangling, ruinous, Pr. xxii. 14; xxiii. 27; Eze. xxiii. 32. Here it may include both ideas, in-scrutable, and ruinous. Inward thought, in Ps. v. 9, inward part; in Ps. cix. 18, bowels; in Ps. xlix. 11, inward thought; in Ps. li. 10, within me.

7. But God shall shoot at them, with an arrow; suddenly shall they be wounded. The structure, the leading ideas and to some extent the very words are evidently borrowed from vv. 3, 4, especially from v. 4. Alexander: "By an abrupt but beautiful transition he describes the tables as completely turned upon the enemy." Thinking to destroy others, they are destroyed themselves. Suddenly shooting an arrow at the upright man, God suddenly shoots an arrow at them; and the wound is incurable. Hengstenberg's rendering of the verse is very forcible: There God shoots at them with a sudden arrow; there are THEIR wounds.

8. So shall they make their own tongue to fall upon themselves. Calvin: "The poison concocted in their secret counsels, and which they revealed with their tongues would prove to have a deadly effect upon themselves." No man can injure others as much by his wicked speeches as he injures himself, because by sin he provokes God to fight against him, and his resources are infinite. However much foresight the wicked may have, it is all borrowed, and God will never lend them enough to subvert his designs, nor to bring real or incurable evil on one of his people. Parallel passages are found in Ps. vii. 14-16; ix. 16; x. 2; xxxv. 8; xciv. 23; cxli. 10. This shall be so marvellously done that, All that see them shall flee away. God's judgments are often frightful even to spectators. It was so when he made the violence and slanders and wickedness of Saul to return on his own pate: "And when the men of Israel that were on the other side of the valley, and they that were on the other side Jordan saw that the men of Israel fled, and that Saul and his sons were dead, they forsook the cities and fled: and the Philistines came and dwelt in them." 1 Sam. xxxi. 7; 1 Chron. x. 7. Parallel passages are found in Num. xvi. 34; Ps. xl. 3; liii. 5. When God chooses, he can easily make the wicked a terror to themselves and to all their friends.

9. And all men shall fear, and shall declare the work of God, i. e., all classes of men, cotemporary or in later times, who see or hear of these judgments, which are as instructive to us as to the subjects of Saul and of David, shall be inspired with a wholesome dread of offending the divine majesty, and shall tell of the 'admirable work of divine power, and wisdom, and faithfulness,' and justice by which the wicked are put down and the righteous exalted, Saul and his false courtiers slain and David enthroned. This wonderful history instructs millions of men every week: For they shall wisely consider of his doing. Such amazing acts of providence are so clearly the doing of God and are withal so instructive that they can hardly fail to impress their lessons on men so as to bring them to consideration, and to wisdom.

10. The righteous shall be glad in the LORD. They shall see that these are his doings, that they are worthy of him, and so they are glad, or rejoice in Jehovah, in his existence, perfections, government, word and ordinances. Or, the word righteous being in the singular may mean the same as perfect in v. 4, and so this may refer to David. The more extended is perhaps the better view, the change of number being common. And shall trust in him. Trust, as in Ps. vii. 1; lvii. 1, always rendered trust, or put trust. And all the upright in heart shall glory, or make their boast. The same form of the same verb is found in Ps. xxxiv. 2; lii. 1. Compare Ps. lxiii. 10.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. In all our troubles, whether beset by 'the unceasing and infinite malice of the devil, the perfidy of men, or the ingratitude of the world,' it is best to carry our cause immediately to God in prayer, v. 1.

2. When men are so outrageous and behave so ill as to fill us with fear, we may mention their very depravity as a plea before God; for, if we are right, 'the more cruel and unjust the conduct of our enemies may be, we have proportionally the better ground to believe that God will interpose in our behalf.' Horne: "A victory gained by the fear of God over the fear of man is a necessary step, and a happy prelude, to a full and final triumph over every enemy of our salvation."

3. David had often virtually offered the same petitions contained here, but on a renewal of his afflictions, he has recourse to the same prayers, but in varied forms of expression.

4. Good men may be in danger, the best of men in the greatest danger, so as to fill them with fear, v. 1. David had a united kingdom against him. It is a wonder that he escaped.

5. Yet God can preserve us in the midst of the direst hazards. Neither in purpose nor in resources is God ever wanting to his faithful children. "The danger cannot be so great, that in it help may not be had from God."

6. No man knows what plots may now be laid against his person, or name, or life, and it is not necessary that he should, for his defence is not in himself but in another, v. 2. 'God can so overrule and outwit the devices of our enemies,' that they shall either adopt foolish measures, or he will defeat their wise counsels. He can do either. He has often done both.

7. "Children that are corrupters" is one of the odious titles earned by the wicked. They band and counsel together in secret, and then openly rise up against men better than themselves, v. 2. Sinners egg each other on in their wicked courses. It has always been so.

8. If we must have foes, it is better they should be strangers than kindred, and enemies of God than doers of his will, v. 2.

9. It is better to have all manner of evil spoken against us falsely than truly; yea, it is better to be reproached for conscientious adherence to duty than to be praised for dereliction of duty. Of all the things laid to David's charge he was innocent, and so the charges did him no real damage, although maliciously aimed at his destruction, v. 3.

10. If David, the modest, humble man, who in difficult circumstances acted so wisely, and was withal the man after God's own heart, was permitted to be so traduced that probably no mere man was ever more vilified than he, vv. 3, 4, surely we, who fall so far short of his attainments in everything good ought not to be surprised if we suffer sadly in the same way. Yea, against the spotless Son of God the tongues of men were more envenomed than ever against his type and progenitor, David. "Would to God it had never been since employed against him and his disciples, or by his disciples against each other."

11. The ingenuity of man has been wonderfully tasked and exercised in two things, inventing destructive weapons of war, and devising various methods of ruining men by wicked words. The list of the former is found in military writings. But the various forms of evil speaking can hardly be catalogued. Evil speakers have arrows, sharp, barbed, dipped in poison. They have 'swords, flaming swords, two-edged swords, drawn swords, drawn in anger, with which they cut, and wound, and kill the good name of their neighbor.' Sins of the tongue are commonly very cruel. When slander is secret, as it commonly is, you cannot defend yourself from its assaults. Its canons are infernal. One of them is, If a lie will do better than the truth, tell a lie. Another is, Heap on reproach; some of it will stick.

12. The reason why wicked men are so bad is that they do not fear what they ought to fear, and especially they do not fear God, v. 4.

13. Let every one beware of hardening his heart in sin. This he may do by refusing to think; by indulging in sin after pondering the wickedness he is about to perpetrate; but chiefly by encouraging himself in the way of transgressors, saying, 'All will be well,' when God says the contrary, v. 5.

14. Men ought to suspect their own motives, and the righteousness of their cause, when they find themselves about to employ the arts of chicanery and commune of laying snares privily, v. 5. Tortuousness and indirection have a consanguinity with meanness and crime. Horne: "Sin doth not often appear abroad without a veil; and the more atrocious the sin, the more specious the pretence which is to cover it. Envy and malice crucified the Son of God; but, during the course of the proceedings against him you hear only of zeal for the law, and loyalty to Cæsar."

15. The denial of providence is often virtually made; and in its effects on the heart is every way as unhappy as the denial of a God, v. 5. If God does not see or hear, how can he help or save? or who will trust him?

16. Why will the wicked dig into hell? Why will they torture their brain for that which, without repentance, will damn them forever? v. 6. Henry: "Half the pains that many take to damn their souls would serve to save them."

17. Because sinners are in their plots and combinations too deep and inscrutable for us, therefore we must hand them over to God, that he may put a hook in their nose, restrain them from doing us harm, and guide their actions so as to bring glory to his name. The poor man must fall by the hand of his enemy unless there be higher than the highest of mortals.

18. Who ever saw a blind man that refused to be led to a place of safety when he was told that frightened horses were galloping towards him, or that a terrible storm was rising? Yet sinners are blinder and are utterly perverse. Every good man on earth sees the bow of the Almighty made ready and the arrow about to pierce the rash and heaven-daring sinner, and he gives him warning, but, without divine grace, it is all in vain.

19. The retribution that will overtake the incorrigibly wicked will be condign, terrible, sudden and richly deserved, vv. 7, 8. "Where desperate malice is seen, there sudden mischief may be foreseen." Calvin: "God is ever watching, as it were, the opportunity of converting the stratagems of the wicked into means just as completely effective of their destruction, as if they had intentionally employed them for that end." O why will not sinners repent and live?

20. It was not merely of old that wicked men fled from their companions who had fallen under God's judgments. I have seen more than one wicked man forsaken by his boon companions when the hand of God touched him, and made him feel the beginnings of dire retribution.

21. It is well when the divine judgments are abroad in the earth, if men learn righteousness, and fear, and declare the work of God, v. 9.

22. If men would think aright, it is impossible they should continue as foolish as they are. Oh that they would wisely consider, v. 9. Compare Deut. xxxii. 29.

23. Because the righteous rejoice in the LORD, their joy shall continue forever, v. 10. He is the fountain of living waters. He is a well-spring of salvation to all who look to him.

24. Christian joy and trust go well together, v. 10. One strengthens the other. Joy without trust would soon pass away for want of vigor and solidity. Trust without joy would be a sullen exercise. But the two united can carry the soul through midnight darkness without tremor.

25. Tholuck: "God does not exercise his judgments for the gratification of our passions or revenge, but with the sublime and holy design to instruct us that his hand pierces the doings of man, and that the works of men, even of the ungodly, must serve him as instruments for the accomplishment of his own purposes; that the righteous may ever rejoice in being under the jurisdiction of such a Lord; and lastly, that the community of believers should render to him the praises which he is worthy to receive. We must, therefore, be on our guard, lest in rejoicing at the downfall of the ungodly by the hand of God, we dim the sacred flame by unholy feelings," vv. 9, 10. Compare Pr. xxiv. 17, 18.

26. What an unspeakable blessing it is to be allowed to lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty, free from the tempests which have tossed the barks of so many good men, of whom David was but a sample. But let us not forget that a calm which puts us to sleep may be more fatal than a storm which keeps us wide awake. David was in more danger when he was attracted by the beauty of Bathsheba, than when Saul was pursuing him in the wilderness.

27. It seems impossible for the pious mind to dwell long on this Psalm without a growing impression that there is in it a reference to Christ and his persecutors. In remarking on vv. 7-10, Morison says: "In the fearful retribution here described, how much is there to remind us of the fate of that nation who filled up the measure of their iniquity by crucifying the Lord of Glory."

PSALM LXV.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm and Song of David.

- 1 Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in Zion : and unto thee shall the vow be performed.
- 2 O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come.
- 3 Iniquities prevail against me : as for our transgressions, thou shalt purge them away.
- 4 Blessed is the man whom thou choosest, and causest to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts : we shall be satisfied with the goodness of thy house, even of thy holy temple.
- 5 By terrible things in righteousness wilt thou answer us, O God of our salvation ; who art the confidence of all the ends of the earth, and of them that are afar off upon the sea :
- 6 Which by his strength setteth fast the mountains ; being girded with power :
- 7 Which stilleth the noise of the seas, the noise of their waves, and the tumult of the people.
- 8 They also that dwell in the uttermost parts are afraid at thy tokens : thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice.
- 9 Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it : thou greatly enrichest it with the river of God, which is full of water : thou preparest them corn, when thou hast so provided for it.
- 10 Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly, thou settlest the furrows thereof : thou makest it soft with showers, thou blessest the springing thereof.
- 11 Thou crownest the year with thy goodness ; and thy paths drop fatness.
- 12 They drop upon the pastures of the wilderness : and the little hills rejoice on every side.
- 13 The pastures are clothed with flocks ; the alleys also are covered over with corn ; they shout for joy, they also sing.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xxx. Though a few have given it a later authorship yet the title, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic and the great mass of modern interpreters ascribe it to David. Without cause the Vulgate ascribes it to Jeremiah and Ezekiel. To these the Complutensian adds Haggai. The Doway has a note admitting that the Hebrew does not give Jeremiah and Ezekiel, but citing the authority of the Septuagint. Yet Clarke says it is not in the "best copies of the Septuagint." Nor is it in any copy of the Septuagint now at hand. Those who maintain for it a historic occasion are of many minds. The Syriac says it was composed on the removal of the ark to Zion. The Arabic refers it to the transmigration of the people to Babylon. Mudge thinks it was "composed by a person just come to Jerusalem from some very distant parts, where, upon his prayers and vows, he had been signally delivered from the fury of the sea, and uproar of the natives ; which leads him into a general acknowledgment of the divine Providence, which extended itself to the end of the earth." Some make it a thanksgiving for rain after drought and refer to 2 Sam. xxi. Some think it was composed for the feast of tabernacles, and some for the passover, or for spring. It was evidently composed when some mercy had awakened the spirit of gratitude, and the mind was led to take an extended view of God's goodness. This is often the case. Luther : "It is the custom of the prophets, when they speak of the mercies and gifts of God of one kind, to speak also of others, especially of his grace." Morison : "I cannot help thinking that the Psalm, in addition to its primary reference, contains in it some distant prophetic allusion to the blessings of redemption, the conversion of the Gentiles, and the glory and felicity of the Gospel church." Scott dates it B. C. 1017 ; Clarke, about B. C. 520. On Elohim God, the only name of the Most High in it, see on Ps. iii. 2.

1. Praise waiteth for thee, O God, in Zion. Waiteth, as in Ps. lxi. 1. Chaldee : Before thee praise is reputed as silence. The other ancient versions : Praise becomes thee, befits thee, is agreeable to thee. Hammond thinks the exact sense is : To thee belong silence and praise. Boothroyd : "Praise waiteth as a servant, whose duty it is to do what thou commandest." Others also personify praise, and think that waiting points to servants watching in silence the signs of their master's will. If we understand it without a personification, the meaning is that at all times in God's church there is found matter of praise and a heart for the work. This praise should not be babbling, but reverential, not tumultuous but chastened. The chief place of praise in Judea was Zion; but now it is the church of God, wherever found. Luther: "Whoever now believes in Christ, and acknowledges him, gives thanks to the true God, in the true Zion." And unto thee shall the vow be performed. The Arabic and Vulgate, without cause, add to this clause the words, in Jerusalem. On the vow see on Ps. xxii. 25; i. 14; lvi. 12; lxi. 5, 8. As long as the world shall stand there will be constantly occurring new causes of gratitude, best expressed in acts of solemn worship.

2. O thou that hearest prayer, unto thee shall all flesh come. Surely this points to the calling of the Gentiles, for the Jewish people are never in Scripture once called all flesh. To hear prayer is to answer it. Prayer, as in Ps. iv. 1 and title of Ps. xvii. That which shall surely cause all flesh to go to God will be a sense of want and of dependence, awakened by the power of God's word and Spirit.

3. Iniquities prevail against me. The renderings and interpretations are chiefly of two classes. The ancient versions and many moderns have words of iniquities, or iniquitous actions, meaning those of other people. Others understand his own iniquities. This is probably correct. The words do not seem to refer to indwelling corruption, but to the accusing power of sin, provoking the anger of God. This agrees with the next clause. Diodati: "We were overcome with evils and calamities, which we had drawn upon ourselves by reason of our sins." Pool: "Iniquities prevail against me; i. e., they are a burden too heavy for me, as he complains, Ps. xxxviii. 4. They are so many and great, that for them thou mightest justly reject my prayers, and destroy my person." The clause is parallel to Isa. lix. 2. But David is not left in despair: As for our transgressions, thou shalt purge them away. Purge, forgive, cleanse, put off, but far the most frequently make atonement, or make reconciliation, literally cover; see Ps. lxxviii. 38; Jer. xviii. 23; Num. xxxv. 33; Isa. xlvii. 11. In the last four books of Moses it is more than fifty times rendered make or made atonement. Bishop Hall: "O God, our iniquities stand in the way of thy mercies, and prevail strongly against all the endeavors of my reformation: but, do thou both mercifully forgive, and powerfully remedy our offences."

4. Blessed is the man, whom thou choosest, and causest to approach unto thee, that he may dwell in thy courts. Very elliptical, but the ellipsis in each case easily supplied. Blessed, as in Ps. i. 1; xxxii. 1, happy, literally, O the blessednesses of the man. Choolest, in the future will choose, quite uniformly rendered; see Deut. iv. 37; xii. 5, 11, 14, 18, 21, 26; Ps. xxv. 12; xlvii. 4. Causest to approach, in the future, shalt bring near. Dwell, very uniformly rendered, see on Ps. xv. 1. Courts, as in Ps. lxxxiv. 2, 10. We shall be satisfied with the goodness of thy house, even of thy holy temple. Satisfied, filled, satiated, see on Ps. xvii. 15. Compare Ps. lxiii. 5. Goodness, also rendered pleasure, good, see on Ps. iv. 6; xiv. 1; xvi. 2. Temple, a name given to the tabernacle as well as to the more solid structure built by Solomon, Ps. v. 7; xviii. 6; xxvii. 4. The transition from he to we is quite in accordance with Hebrew usage. It is a jejune interpretation of this passage, that supposes it to refer merely to the outward participation of divine worship. We must include also the blessings which are apprehended by faith.

5. By terrible things in righteousness wilt thou answer us. Calvin, Ainsworth, Piscator, Fabritius, Amesius, Hengstenberg and Alexander do not supply by, but read, terrible things. Understanding the verse according to the sense thus conveyed, we see how God answered the prayers of his friends in the terrible things brought on the Egyptians, the Canaanites, the Philistines, the Syrians, the Babylonians, and on the Jews and the Gentiles who resisted early Christianity. God often defends his chosen people by terribly punishing their foes. This is the best interpretation, the prevailing signification of the participle being terrible, fearful, dreadful, and not wonderful, as some would render it; see Gen. xxviii. 17; Ex. xv. 11; Ps. xlv. 4; Isa. lxiv. 3; in Ps. lxiv. 4, 9, one form of the verb is rendered fear, shall fear, and in v. 8 of this Psalm it is rendered are afraid. God's judgments are terrible not only to the wicked on whom they fall, but to spectators, sinners and saints. Yet the righteous do not fear so as to despair, but they rather trust the Lord, for these terrible things are never sent but in righteousness. The address is to the Most High: O God of our salvation, who art the confidence of all the ends of the earth, and of them that are afar off upon the sea. The God of our salvation is God the author of our salvation. He is also a fit object of the confidence, trust, hope of men, however remote from Mount Zion, not only in distant parts of the holy land, but in the corners of the world, yea, upon the sea. The Chaldee renders the last clause, And of the islands of the sea which are remote from the continent. God is not only worthy of hope and trust, but he is so exclusively; and he shall yet be confided in by the most distant people. Hengstenberg: "God is called the confidence of all the ends of the earth, in reference to what he is actually in himself, not in reference to his being acknowledged as such." Compare Isa. xlii. 4. Calvin: "It follows that the grace of God was to be extended to the Gentiles." Great is this God,

6. Which by his strength setteth fast the mountains. It is probable that by mountains here we are also to understand kingdoms or empires, Ps. xlvii. 3; Jer. li. 25. God is the Father of nations, as well as the Maker of the world, Ps. xxii. 28. The obvious reference however is primarily to the fabric of creation. The reader may have been familiar with mountain scenery from infancy. If so, he can doubtless remember many times in his life, even when very young, that he thus gained high conceptions of the power of God. Or if he never saw a great mountain, until he was adult, he can easily recall the profound impressions the sight made upon him. The imagery is therefore well chosen, as it shows the strength of the Creator. Being girded with power. Strength and power, though quite different words in Hebrew, are interchangeably rendered strength, might, power. Here they both refer to the almightiness of God.

7. Which stilleth the noise of the seas, the noise of their waves. By God's power the mountains were steadfast. The ocean also, often lashed into fury, and exhibiting amazing violence, was a continual proof of the constant superintendence and controlling providence of God. Jehovah manages it exclusively and literally. But vast agitated waters are in Scripture an emblem of nations in commotion, and so he adds that God stilleth the tumult of the people. People, in the plural peoples, or nations. Figures drawn from great waters are found in Ps. xlvii. 2, 3; xciii. 3, 4; Isa. xvii. 12, 13. The doctrine here taught is the same as that in Ps. lxxvi. 10.

8. They also that dwell in the uttermost parts are afraid at thy tokens. Uttermost parts, i. e., of the earth, as is explained in v. 5, where we have the masculine of the word here found in the feminine. Are afraid, from the same root as the participle rendered terrible in v. 5. God's wonders declaring his eternal power and Godhead are everywhere—within us, above us, beneath us, around us. Some of the tokens he displays in blighting vegetation, in lightning, in tempest, in earthquake are enough to strike terror into the heart of the rudest savage. But the reference here is more immediately to the effect exerted on people dwelling far from the scene of national tumults, by the amazing providence of God over public commotions. If there were sufficient material for writing a history of all the effects of such an event as the destruction of Sennacherib's army on distant nations, we should all be astonished at its revelations. The prophet now proceeds to state that the effect of God's dealings with the people should not be merely to inspire terror, but also to an equal extent gladness. Thou makest the outgoings of the morning and evening to rejoice. John Rogers' translation: Thou makes both the mornynge and evenyng starres to prayse thee. The outgoings of the morning is a phrase meaning the east, the point from which the morning comes; and the outgoings of the evening, the west, where we behold the setting sun, followed by the evening. The phrase embraces the world, from the rising of the sun to the going down of the same. The extensive region thus described is of course put for the people in it. The meaning then is, Thou makest the inhabitants of the world from east to west rejoice at the amazing displays of thy power over nature and nations; see Isa. xli. 5. The prophet is celebrating God's power and goodness in "dispelling the storms of the counsels of war, slaughter and bloodshed. For war is nothing less than a horrible storm and tempest, which hurls into confusion all things divine and human." But the prophet now leaves this subject and passes to themes most pleasing to the pious husbandman.

9. Thou visitest the earth, and waterest it. The verbs are in the preterite. Calvin: "They denote action continually going forward, and may therefore be rendered in the present tense." Science has never revealed the half that the smile of God does to fertilize the earth. If he would but remove the curse from it, it would again be as Eden for fruitfulness, Gen. iii. 17-19. One of the ways, in which he blesses it is by watering it. In many countries the rains are frequent, and fall as they are needed. In others they are gathered in reservoirs and distributed by artificial rivulets over immense plateaus. In some cases the tide is with unspeakable advantage turned in on vast meadows and grain fields. In yet others, streams overflow their banks bringing down from higher regions large deposits of fertilizing mud, and soaking the earth that it does not become parched again for months. This was the case with many ancient rivers as well as the Nile, Ecc. xi. 1; Isa. xxxii. 20. In Isa. xxiii. 3, Sihor means Nile. Thou greatly enrichest it [the earth] with the river of God, which is full of water. So that there is an abundant supply of water for all purposes, in particular for agriculture, which is here specially noticed. For river the Syriac and Arabic have rivers. Horsley: "God is he who filleth the rivulets with water." The objection to this mode of explaining the phrase, the river of God, is that it demands an unwarranted change of the Hebrew text. Others by the river of God understand the Jordan, which ran through the holy land, and which like the Nile overflowed its banks and enriched its low grounds. But is Jordan ever once called the river of God? Others by river of God understand Siloah, or Shiloah, whose waters go softly, Isa. viii. 6, and flow "hard by the altar of God." Calvin thinks this river is held in contrast with the Nile and that there is an allusion to Deut. xi. 10-12. But is Siloah ever in Scripture called the river of God? Others suppose the river of God to be a great river, according to the Hebraism explained in Ps. xxxvi. 6. This is legitimate. But river in Scripture sometimes means an abundance, a full supply, as in Ps. xxxvi. 8, on which see. Anderson: "The treasures of water which descend from the clouds may, with great poetical beauty, be termed the river of God. He collects them there by the wonderful process of evaporation, and he pours them down. They are entirely in his hand, and absolutely beyond the control of man. 'The keys of the clouds,' say the Jews, 'are peculiarly kept in God's hand, as the keys of life and resurrection.'" Possibly this is the best explanation. It well agrees with Scripture teaching and known facts. See Lev. xxvi. 4; Deut. xi. 14; Job v. 10; xxxviii. 28; Joel ii. 23. Hengstenberg's rendering is: The fountain of God has plenty of water. Alexander gives yet another view: "The river of God, as opposed to earthly streams. However these may fail, the divine resources are exhaust-less." Thou preparest them corn, when thou hast so provided for it. Calvin: "This means, that the reason of that abundance with which the earth teems, is its having been expressly formed by God in his fatherly care of the great household of mankind, to supply the wants of his children." If after formed he had added [and by rain prepared] the sense would have been complete.

10. Thou waterest the ridges thereof abundantly. Ridges, everywhere else rendered furrows. It means the uneven surfaces produced by plowing. Perhaps furrows, meaning the depressions in plowed ground would be the better rendering here, and ridges, of the corresponding word in the next clause. Thou settlest the furrows thereof. The rain dissolves the hard clods and smooths the uneven surfaces. Thou makest it soft with showers. There is no substitute for moisture in softening the earth for the growth of plants; and there is no method of diffusing moisture so good as when it drops as the rain and distils as the dew. Thou blessest the springing thereof. Springing, branch, budding, or growth. Thereof, i. e., of the earth, where earth is put for the things which grow in it. Luther: "Thou art the right Master-cultivator, who cultivates the land much more and much better than the farmer does. He does nothing more to it than break up the ground, and plough, and sow, and then lets it lie. But God must be always attending to it with rain and heat, and must do everything to make it grow and prosper, while the farmer lies at home and sleeps."

11. Thou crownest the year with thy goodness. The translation perfectly expresses the idea of the original, although the verb is in the preterite hast crowned. But see on the first clause of v. 9. Luther: "In the spring, there first appear the blossoms; and then, shortly after, the strawberries and cherries; and then, ere long, plums, apples, and berries of various juice and virtue; (to say nothing about the perpetual verdure of the herbs which flourishes all the while, and is continually revived with fresh supplies of dew.) To these we are to add, the infinite variety of herbs and odors. And then, at the time of harvest, our barns are filled with wheat, rye, barley, and corn, and grain of every kind. In the autumn, our presses overflow with wine of an infinite variety of taste and fragrance, and our vats are filled to the brim. Thus the Lord fills the whole revolution of the year, and every part of it, with his overflowing and infinite goodness." And thy paths drop fatness. Paths, goings, or ways, Pr. v. 6, 21. Wherever God goes in mercy, there is fertility, so that a piece of hitherto barren land visited by him has the smell of a field, which the Lord hath greatly blessed. Fatness, always so rendered, see Ps. xxxvi. 8; lxxiii. 5. It seems here specially to refer to productiveness, and so this is parallel to the first clause. This remarkable effect of God's goings is seen everywhere, even in uncultivated lands.

12. They [thy goings] drop [fatness] upon the pastures of the wilderness. These pastures were unplowed and generally broken parts of the country, to which flocks and herds were driven at certain seasons of the year for grazing. There they were herded and guarded with care. Though the hand of man had done nothing to make them fertile, yet God had greatly beautified them by a delightful freshness. And the little hills rejoice on every side. Literally, The hills are girded with joy; see margin. Hills abounded in the uncultivated lands, where the pastures of the wilderness were. And by God's blessing on them making them fruitful, they are said to have a girdle, not of such ornaments as men and women wore in oriental countries but, of gladness, or rejoicing, as if for a joyous dance.

13. The pastures are clothed with flocks. Church of England: The folds shall be full of sheep; Meibomius: The flocks clothe the mountains; Delaney: The fields have clothed themselves with cattle; Hengstenberg: The flocks are clothed with lambs. The common version is sustained wholly or substantially by Calvin, Ainsworth, Pisca-tor, Fabritius, Venema, Amesius, Mudge, Green, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Hammond, Tholuck and Alexander. This clause relates to the unplowed ground; the next, to cultivated land: The valleys also are covered with corn. • Corn, all grains which grow in ears, and which are used for making bread. They [the valleys] shout for joy. Shout, a very exultant word, sometimes rendered triumph, or make a joyful noise, used to describe the joy of angels at the creation, the loud cries of Israel in battle, the joy of the pious at the removal of the ark; Josh. vi. 5; 1 Sam. iv. 5; Job xxxviii. 7; Ps. xli. 11. They [the valleys] also sing. This verb and the last are both in the future. The latter is the weaker word, but this is not the only case in Hebrew poetry where the stronger word goes before. The last five verses of this Psalm contain as beautiful poetry as perhaps was ever written, even by the pen of inspiration.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Take from God the sincere and intelligent praise, which he receives in Zion, and what has he left? v. 1. The wicked will not exalt his name. They love his gifts, but condemn the giver.

2. The praise offered to God should be reverent. It may be loud but not clamorous, v. 1. It may be with thundering hallelujahs as it is in heaven, when it is the expression of the fulness of the heart, but even then it should be with solemn awe. "The LORD is in his holy temple: let all the earth keep silence before him," Hab. ii. 20. Compare Isa. lx. 15; Heb. xii. 22-29.

3. Although all the parts of appointed worship are to be duly performed, and well agree with each other, yet they are not all obligatory at the same time. One entire act of devotion may consist of praise, v. 1.

4. Vows, consisting of engagements to serve God in the ordinary way of revealed duty, or in a way lawful but not binding except through our promise, are a part of true worship, v. 1. See REMARKS on Ps. xxii. 25; I. 14; lvi. 12; lxi. 5, 8.

5. Of all we know of God, nothing should more cheer us than this, Thou that hearest prayer, v. 2. Whatever God might be in himself, if he were deaf to our cries, we should be forever undone. Calvin: "The answer of our prayers is secured by the fact, that in rejecting them God would in a certain sense deny his own nature." Dickson: "The hearing and granting of prayer are the Lord's property, and his usual practice, and his pleasure, and his nature, and his glory."

6. The conversion of the heathen nations ought not to have awakened surprise or opposition among the Jews; for their own Scriptures predict that glorious event, v. 2. We poor sinners of the Gentiles should never cease to admire and adore the grace that thus enriches us.

7. In all worship a deep sense of personal unworthiness becomes us, v. 3. Henry: "Our sins reach to the heavens, iniquities prevail against us, and appear so numerous, so heinous, that, when they are set in order before us, we are full of confusion, and ready to fall into despair. They prevail so against us, that we cannot pretend to balance them with any righteousness of our own; so that when we appear before God, our own consciences accuse us, and we have no replication to make." Compare Ps. xxxviii. 4; xl. 12. Calvin: "God will not be entreated of us, unless we humbly supplicate the pardon of our sins." Tholuck: "Every prayer should begin with the confession that our lips are unclean." Morison: "It is the sense of sin which drives us to the cross."

8. But mere convictions of guilt will save no one. We must exercise hope and confidence in God that he will put away our sins, v. 3. This is the stay of the soul. The number and aggravation of our offences need not hinder this boldness. God's word amply warrants even the chief of sinners to come and plead for mercy.

9. Many, many are the blessings of those who are chosen and called of God, and made true worshippers, v. 4. Sometimes we have enumerations of such blessings; see Ps. ciii.; Rom. v. 1-11; 1 Cor. iii. 21-23; but even these are imperfect. There is a telling in God's mercies, and we shall be telling them forever.

10. The doctrine of a divine election of sinners to the blessings of salvation is as certainly taught in the Old Testament as in the New, v. 4. It is greatly to be regretted that a truth, which has often caused the hearts of God's servants to break forth into thanksgivings, should have been rejected by some and by others received with suspicion. Compare v. 4; Matt. xi. 25, 26; Luke x. 21; Eph. i. 3-6. Our eternal salvation depends on our election, John vi. 37, 44. This choice of God is most free, none of our works constraining him thereto, Rom. ix. 11-13. The proof of our election is always and only to be found in a holy life.

11. The true friends and worshippers of God are not tossed from vanity to vanity, but are satisfied with the goodness of his house, v. 4. The glorious things of God do fill and sate the soul, Jer. xxxi. 25.

12. True religion always was experimental, v. 4. Morison: "How useless are ordinances, if we have no communion with God in observing them. Without experience in religion everything else must be vain and fruitless."

13. It is vain to expect all summer and no winter, all sunshine and no cloud, all pleasant and no terrible things, v. 5. No vigorous character was ever formed under mere blandishments and indulgences. There is need for the severe as well as for the mild. Calvin: "It is in no common, or ordinary manner that God has preserved his church, but with terrible majesty. It is well that this should be known, and the people of God taught to sustain their hopes in the most apparently desperate exigencies."

14. Remoteness from any supposed centre of the religious, or political world does not place a man beyond the pale of God's providential care and blessing, v. 5. He fills the heart of the poor heathen with food and gladness. He sends his Gospel to the islands of the sea and to us Americans, inhabiting a land not known to the civilized world till nearly fifteen hundred years after the birth of Christ. Hengstenberg: "The mercies of God are coextensive with human need." Luther: "One may run over the wide world, even to its utmost extremity, yet thou, O Lord, art the only foundation on which the trust of man's heart can stand and remain." Let men and nations beware how they treat Christ and his Gospel, Matt. xiii. 17; Luke x. 24; xii. 48.

15. The stupendous works of God are of excellent use in furnishing us with conceptions and images of the strength and power of the Creator, v. 6. If God had never done anything requiring omnipotence, we should certainly doubt whether he had that infinite perfection; but who can look at the mountains, the ocean, or the starry heavens, and be skeptical?

16. Dickson: "There is nothing so turbulent, and raging, and reasonless in the whole world, which God doth not rule and bridle, and make quiet as he pleaseth: he stilleth the noise of the seas, the noise of their waves," v. 7. Bishop Hall: "The sea brooked not me, nor I the sea, an unquiet element made only for wonder and use, not for pleasure." Yet in what element do more creatures sport and rejoice?

17. In like manner God stills the tumult of the people, v. 7. The terrible commotions resulting from seditions, persecutions, tyranny, insurrection and civil war are uncontrollable by any but the hand of omnipotence. The Lord can hush all nature and all nations as in a moment. We do not think enough, or make enough of the power of God. We are too much like that lord in Samaria, 2 Kings vii. 2.

18. If men did not dislike the knowledge of God, it would be impossible to account for the present deplorable ignorance of the divine character among mankind; for God gives tokens in the uttermost parts of the world, infallible signs of his eternal power and Godhead, v. 8. Calvin: "It would seem as if the more perspicacity men have in observing second causes in nature, they will rest in them the more determinedly, instead of ascending by them to God."

19. Miserable as this world is, every human bosom has sometimes been glad. But whatever rejoicing earth in all her length and breath has ever witnessed, had God for its author, v. 8.

20. The goodness of God is wondrously manifest in nature, and nothing in nature more than in water, v. 9. There are billions of tons of this great element. The great reservoirs of it are salted, so as to keep it perfectly pure, yet not so much salted as to destroy the life of innumerable tribes of living things. Into these great reservoirs all the rivers pour their floods. Thence by evaporation all lands are provided with supplies of the purest, sweetest water falling from the clouds. Thus the face of nature is refreshed, and the surplus of water, percolated through various earths, sands and minerals, is kept cool and sweet for drink, or impregnated with medicinal properties, that heal tens of thousands. To man water is a great necessity. It is an ingredient of every human body. When cold it is a tonic; when warm, a laxative; when hot, a stimulant. It is one of the best emetics. It has no equal as a purifier. Arnd: "When a visit is made by rich and affectionate friends, they do not come empty, but bring with them a blessing, a good gift, to testify their favor. . . So when in time of drought God gives a gracious fertilizing shower, it is as if he paid us a visit, and brought along with him a great blessing, that we may mark his love and his goodness."

21. But in Scripture water is an emblem of the Holy Ghost in his abundant, refreshing and purifying influences, and so verse 9 has been by many understood to point to the effusion of the blessed Spirit. Scott: "The rising of 'the Sun of Righteousness,' and the pouring out of the Holy Spirit, that 'River of God,' full of the waters of life and salvation, render the hearts of sinners, which before were hard, barren and worthless, fruitful in every good work; and change the face of nations far more than the sun and rain do the face of nature." Morison: "I know not but this imagery may have been introduced by the Spirit of God for the purpose of picturing to our minds the wonderful character of the moral transformation, which takes place in the hearts of men, when showers of divine influence are poured down from heaven, when the wilderness and solitary place are made to rejoice and blossom as the rose." Compare Isa. xxxii. 15; xxxv. 7; xlv. 3-6.

22. The census of any thrifty agricultural people, respecting the products of their labor in the fruits of the earth, will fill any devout mind with wonder and with gratitude, v. 10. Yet the earth has long been under a curse. But a time is coming when she shall yield her increase, and when a teeming population shall in all lands be supplied with the fruits that God shall cause to grow. The future of this world, agriculturally, socially, civilly, politically and religiously, is far brighter than any part of its history, since the first pair forsook the path of duty.

23. It is well for us to dwell upon the wondrous beauties of the seasons and the blessings they bring with them. If we did it with any right views and feelings, surely we should find our reflections profitable, vv. 9-13.

24. Those happy persons, to whom God has appointed the innocent pleasures of rural life, and whom he has exempted from the weariness of study, the anxieties of trade and the frightful scenes familiar to military men, ought to be not only contented, but devoutly thankful, vv. 9-13.

PSALM LXVI.

To the chief Musician, A Song or Psalm.

- 1 Make a joyful noise unto God, all ye lands:
- 2 Sing forth the honour of his name: make his praise glorious.
- 3 Say unto God, How terrible art thou in thy works! through the greatness of thy power shall thine enemies submit themselves unto thee.
- 4 All the earth shall worship thee, and shall sing unto thee; they shall sing to thy name. Selah.
- 5 Come and see the works of God: he is terrible in his doing toward the children of men.
- 6 He turned the sea into dry land: they went through the flood on foot: there did we rejoice in him.
- 7 He ruleth by his power for ever; his eyes behold the nations: let not the rebellious exalt themselves. Selah.
- 8 Oh bless our God, ye people, and make the voice of his praise to be heard:
- 9 Which holdeth our soul in life, and suffereth not our feet to be moved.
- 10 For thou, O God, hast proved us: thou hast tried us, as silver is tried.
- 11 Thou broughtest us into the net; thou laidest affliction upon our loins.
- 12 Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads; we went through fire and through water: but thou broughtest us out into a wealthy place.
- 13 I will go into thy house with burnt offerings: I will pay thee my vows,
- 14 Which my lips have uttered, and my mouth hath spoken, when I was in trouble.
- 15 I will offer unto thee burnt sacrifices of fatlings, with the incense of rams: I will offer bullocks with goats. Selah.
- 16 Come and hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul.
- 17 I cried unto him with my mouth, and he was extolled with my tongue.
- 18 If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me:
- 19 But verily God hath heard me; he hath attended to the voice of my prayer.
- 20 Blessed be God, which hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy from me.

ALL parts of the title are explained on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xxx. The authorship cannot be certainly determined. The Arabic and some others ascribe it to David. To this there is no unanswerable objection. Some think it was written by some cotemporary of the royal singer, unknown to us. Quite a number give it a much later date. "Venema refers it to the reign of Hezekiah, and supposes it to celebrate the deliverance which was effected by the destruction of Sennacherib's army. Rudinger is of opinion that it celebrates the opening of the second temple, after the return from Babylon." Clarke dates it about B. C. 520 years; Scott, B. C. 1023. Both date and authorship are uncertain. Many notice some resemblance to Ps. xlvii. We have here two names of the Almighty, Elohim God and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; ii. 4. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Make a joyful noise unto God, all ye lands. Make a joyful noise, in the Hebrew one word, rendered as here in Ps. lxxxi. 1; xcvi. 4, 6; c. 1; very often shout, as in Ps. xlvii. 1; shout for joy, as in Ps. lxxv. 13; triumph, as in Ps. lx. 8. It expresses exultant gladsome emotions. Edwards: Sing with exalted voices to God; Alexander: "The verb is plural in its form, which shows that earth has a collective sense." Our translators therefore did right in rendering it, all ye lands; they might have read, Ye dwellers in the whole earth.

2. Sing forth the honor of his name. The various renderings give the same sense as the common version: Sing praises to the glory of his name; Sing Psalms to the glory of his name; Sing the honor of his name; Celebrate the glory of his name. Make his praise glorious. Chaldee: Order the glory of his praise; Syriac: Sing to the honor of his praise; Calvin: Make glorious his praise; Edwards: Give him the glory of his praise. Abenezra supposes the sense to be, Let it be your glory to praise him. So also Patrick: Place your principal glory in this, that you have the honor to sing his praises. But Calvin is perhaps right when he says the sense is that we highly exalt his praises that they may be glorious.

3. Say unto God, How terrible art thou in thy works. The Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Ainsworth, Edwards, Fry and Alexander make terrible agree with works. How fearful are thy doings. But the church of England, Calvin, Piscator, Fabritius, Venema, Amesius, Jebb and Hengstenberg, guided by the proper rendering of v. 5 below, sustain the common version and supply the words art thou in. Terrible, the same as in Ps. lxxv. 5, on which see. It is also rendered fearful, dreadful. It occurs again in v. 5. God has often stricken the hearts of his foes with terror. See history. He built up the Jewish nation by showing great terrors, Deut. iv. 34; xxxiv. 12. Through the greatness of thy power shall thine enemies submit themselves unto thee. Submit themselves, see on Ps. xviii. 44. The margin reads lie, or yield a feigned obedience. God's foes should at least profess submission to him, because they should be persuaded of the greatness of his power.

4. All the earth shall worship thee. All the earth, as in v. 1. Worship, do obeisance, do reverence, bow down, or worship, 2 Sam. i. 2; ix. 6; Ex. xx. 5; Ps. v. 7. The Romish Church is very anxious to give it in the second commandment the sense of adore, and so she often renders it as here and in many places. But even the Doway Bible sometimes has worship, as in 2 Sam. ix. 6; Gen. xxvii. 29; and bow down, as in Gen. xxvii. 29; xxxiii. 3; xxxvii. 7. The word is used to express bowing down as an act either of civil or religious worship. And [all the earth] shall sing unto thee. Sing, as in v. 2. They shall sing to thy name. Sing, as in the preceding clause. God's name here means himself, as revealed to us.

5. Come and see the works of God. Works, as in Ps. xli. 8. The invitation is not merely to take a sight of God's works, but to consider or regard them as the word is also rendered, v. 18; Ps. xxxi. 7; Ecc. xi. 4. He is terrible in his doing toward the children of men. Terrible, as in v. 3. Doing, action, work, deed, 1 Sam. ii. 3; Ps. ix. 11; xiv. 1. Sons of men, sons of Adam, see Introduction, § 16. God's acts of providence are well suited to fill all minds with dread. To his foes his fear is a torment, while to his friends it is a strong confidence, Isa. viii. 14, 15; 1 John iv. 18; Pr. xiv. 26. Compare Ps. xl. 5. The doing of God might be devoutly considered in the plagues of Egypt, in the overthrow of Pharaoh, in the fall of Jericho, in the destruction of the Canaanites, in short, in all history. One of these events is immediately mentioned:

6. He turned the sea into dry land. If Pharaoh and his hosts had possessed any real sagacity, they would not have assayed to follow the Israelites. They knew that the sea was made to stand on heaps for the chosen people, and not at all for their persecutors. But they were blind, mad, incorrigible. On they pressed, and the power, which stayed the waves for Israel, withdrew; the waters found their level, and the persecutors sank like a stone. They went through the flood on foot. Flood, almost uniformly rendered river, as in Gen. ii. 10; Ps. xli. 4; lxxii. 8. If here it is river, it refers to the crossing of Jordan, which was also miraculously effected and was every way an event suited to impress the mind of any one, Josh. iii. These escapes of Israel and the destruction of their foes were so marked that it could not but awaken gladness in pious minds: There did we rejoice in him. The particular form of rejoicing, caused by the rescue of Israel and the overthrow of their foes at the Red sea is given at length in the exultant song of Moses and Miriam, Ex. xv. 1-21; one of the most elevated compositions in the Hebrew language. The passage of the Red sea might well have led each one to say:

7. He ruleth by his power for ever. The divine government is conducted, not by the permission, assistance, or sufferance of men or angels; but by God's own inherent and resistless energy. It shall be so to eternity. His eyes behold the nations. Pool: "He sees all their secret and subtle devices, and can and will defeat them, when he sees fit." Alexander: "The divine inspection here described implies that man can no more evade God's power than resist it." God's providence is as truly and as constantly over the wicked as over the righteous, though for a different end. Let not the rebellious exalt themselves, i. e., Let them not act, as if God had them not in his power, and would not hold them to a strict account. Compare Isa. xiv. 13-15; Obad. 4.

8. Oh bless our God, ye people, and make the voice of his praise to be heard. Bless, as in Ps. v. 12. As all people, all nations, receive the divine mercies, and all have good cause to bless him, they should speak openly of his works and publish his praise. If the nations had not been shockingly depraved, they would long since have been won to the faith, and obedience, and worship of Jehovah by the wonders he has showed. He is evidently God,

9. Which holdeth our soul in life. The nation of Israel was evidently kept and continued in existence against the fixed and malicious purposes of surrounding nations, not by its own inherent strength, but by the power of Jehovah. Often did it seem as if destruction was at the door, but God averted such strokes as would have wiped them out of existence. And suffereth not our feet to be moved, i. e., so as to be rooted out as a nation. Many a deliverance wrought for Israel, for the Gospel church, and for individual Christians has been like life from the dead. Perhaps it is this verse more than any other which led some of the ancient interpreters to entitle this A Psalm of the Resurrection.

10. For thou, O God, hast proved us: thou hast tried us, as silver is tried. Instead of For we might better read Yet, or Though, as some suggest. Proved, as in Ps. xvii. 3; in Ps. vii. 9, try; in Ps. xxvi. 2, examine. It implies thorough searching, close scrutiny. Tried, as in Ps. xvii. 3. It signifies melting, refining, or founding when applied to precious metals. To try as silver is to test severely, see on Ps. xii. 6. Though God had brought his chosen people to great eminence, yet it had been by such trials, as no other nation had endured. Alexander: "The general idea here is that of affliction, as a means both of trial and purgation, and is carried out in the following verses."

11. Thou broughtest us into the net. Net, sometimes rendered fort, fortress, hold, strong place; also snare, net, Ezek. xii. 13; xvii. 20. Net is the word here. They were not caught in some artifice of enemies, but God himself had allowed their affairs to become complicated and themselves perplexed. Thou laidest affliction upon our loins. Affliction, here only. There is great diversity in the rendering, chain, tribulation, affliction, straitness, sore pressure, heavy load. A heavy burden is perhaps the best rendering, as the word is here evidently used figuratively in connection with the loins. The probable reference is to the general course of severe discipline by which God had trained Israel.

12. Thou hast caused men to ride over our heads. Anderson: "To ride over signifies to insult or tyrannize over. Or the image may be taken from the trampling of war-horses in the day of battle." Clarke: "Thou hast permitted us to fall under the dominion of our enemies; who have treated us as broken infantry are when the cavalry dashes among their disordered ranks, treading all under the horses' feet." Pool thinks it means to "ride upon our shoulders. By thy permission they have used us like slaves, yea, like beasts to carry their persons or burdens. Compare Isa. li. 23." We went through fire and through water. Anderson: "Fire and water, the one of which elements consumes, while the other suffocates, is a proverbial expression, signifying extreme danger and complicated calamities." See Num. xxxi. 23; Ps. xxxii. 6; lxix. 2; Isa. xliii. 2; Ezek. xv. 7; xxx. 8. Thus far the verse had a remarkable fulfilment in the sufferings of the Israelites in Egypt. Yet they were not left there to groan and perish. But thou broughtest us out to a wealthy place. The last word occurs seldom. In various translations we have it, refreshment, wide place, rest, fruitful place, affluence, abundance, place of ease. There was a wonderful difference between living as bondmen in Egypt and as proprietors in Judea. The consideration of such mercies affected the heart of the Psalmist:

13. I will go into thy house with burnt offerings. House does not necessarily signify the temple properly so called. The name is given to the tabernacle, Ex. xxiii. 19; Josh. ix. 23; Judg. xviii. 31; xix. 18. On burnt offerings see Ps. l. 8. The Psalmist makes an engagement in good faith and with an honest heart to pay the public worship of the dispensation under which he lived. I will pay thee my vows. Vows, see on Ps. xxii. 25; l. 14; lvi. 12; lxi. 5, 8; lxxv. 1. These vows seem to have been of things, which became obligatory because they were promised. He says of them,

14. Which my lips have uttered, and my mouth hath spoken, when I was in trouble. Clarke: "This is generally the time when good resolutions are formed, and vows made:—but how often are these forgotten when affliction and calamity are removed." Compare Jer. xxii. 23.

15. I will offer unto thee burnt sacrifices of fatlings, with the incense of rams, I will offer bullocks with goats. In this verse are mentioned all the kinds of four-footed creatures that were appointed to be offered in sacrifice under the law. This shows that the Psalmist had made very comprehensive vows, and felt called upon to exercise unusual gratitude. The sense is well given by Scott: "I will liberally provide for every part of the service at the tabernacle;" by Clarke: "Thou shalt have the best of the herd and of the fold;" and by Patrick: "I will not come empty into thy house; so I will not bring thee a niggardly present; but offer sacrifices of all sorts, and the best and choicest of every kind." Scott well says, 'The incense of rams' conveys no clear meaning; and he proposes an amended translation: "I will offer unto thee the burnt-sacrifices of fatlings, even rams, with incense; I will offer bullocks and goats." Horsley renders the verse thus: "Offerings of fatlings I will offer unto thee, with incense; I will sacrifice rams, bullocks, and full-grown goats." That incense should not be connected with rams is admitted by the Chaldee, Arabic, Ethiopic, Ainsworth, Piscator, Fabritius, Amesius, Edwards and Fry.

16. Come and hear, all ye that fear God, and I will declare what he hath done for my soul. All the Scriptures are for public use; but the wicked neither understand nor relish the lively oracles, nor the experiences of God's children. So the Psalmist asks not the scoffing world, but those who fear God, to listen to his song. God's children make an attentive audience.

17. I cried unto him with my mouth, and he was extolled with my tongue. I cried, in my danger and distress; I prayed with great fervor and earnestness; and even then I forgot not to adore and exalt God. I knew that if he chose, he could save me. I had no hope in any other, and I solemnly said so. I remember my trying circumstances. I magnify his mercy. When rescued, I gave him thanks. Patrick: "The ardent prayers, which I made unto him, in a very low condition, are now turned into the highest praises of his powerful goodness." Calvin: "The term extol intimates, that we cannot honor God more in our worship than by looking upwards to him for deliverance."

18. If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me. Clarke: "If I have seen iniquity in my heart—if I have known it was there, and encouraged it; if I pretended to be what I was not; if I loved iniquity, while I professed to pray and be sorry for my sin:—the Lord Adonai, my Prop, Stay, and Supporter, would not have heard; and I should have been left without help or support." Regard, see on v. 5, where it is rendered see.

19. But verily God hath heard me. The issue showed that God approved the Psalmist's character and conduct. Sometimes the divine vindication is so marked that none can deny that the Lord has done it. He hath attended to the voice of my prayer. Attended, rendered attend in Ps. xvii. 1; lv. 2; lxi. 1, and hearken in Ps. v. 2.

20. Blessed be God, which hath not turned away my prayer, nor his mercy from me. Blessed, from the same root as bless in v. 8. God's mercy is the cause of our deliverance from unjust and violent men, whom we have not wronged; for though we have not sinned against them, we have sinned against God.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. To those, who wholly reject vocal music from God's worship, a considerable part of Scripture must appear strange, vv. 1, 2, 8.

2. No nation or tribe is so degraded or wretched that it has not abundant cause for showing forth the glory of God, and uttering his praise, v. 1. Morison: "As Jehovah is entitled to the universal and undivided homage of all the dwellers upon earth, the Psalmist here calls upon all lands to shout joyfully before him, to chant the glory of his name, and to celebrate the praise of his infinite perfections."

3. We should do all in our power to make the worship of God not only decent, solemn, and impressive, but glorious, v. 2. We should never seek to set forth God's praises moderately, but in the highest strains and most animated manner. Scott: "Nothing but human depravity prevents this reasonable employment from being as universal on earth as in heaven."

4. Take from the Bible its awful doctrines, and from providence its terrible acts, and the whole system, under which God has placed us, would be emasculated, vv. 3, 5. "Much of religion lies in a reverence for the Divine Providence."

5. Neither God nor religion are responsible for the feigned submission, the real hypocrisy of many in the world, v. 3. Were they wise, or docile, or ingenuous, the truths and judgments, which make them hypocrites, would make them the honest and sincere followers of the Lamb.

6. How glorious will be the day when the fulness of the Gentiles shall be brought in, and all the earth shall serve Jehovah and his Christ. This worship shall not be feigned, but shall abound in hearty singing, v. 4. Calvin: "Praise is the best of all sacrifices, and the true evidence of godliness." One of the richest sources of joy to believers is the anticipation of the time when all flesh shall see the salvation of God.

7. It should be a considerable part of our business in this life earnestly to call men's attention to the wonderful works and terrible doings of the Almighty, v. 5. This is the prescribed duty of parents, of teachers and of preachers of the gospel, yea, of all men as they have opportunity.

8. All God's doings are worthy of pious notice and remembrance; but some of his acts deservedly make such an impression on a man, a nation, or a generation, that they may well be mentioned till time shall end, yea, some of them while eternity endures. Such was the history of one day's transactions at the Red sea. Such was the march across the Jordan, v. 6. But 'in redemption by the death of Christ, and the glories which followed that grand event, we have far more surprising and affecting subjects to contemplate, than Israel's deliverance from Egyptian bondage.' The conversion of a man's soul and his safe and happy death in Christ will be themes of rejoicing forever. Hengstenberg: "God's guidance of his people is a constant drying up of the sea and of the Jordan, and the joy over his mighty deeds is always receiving new materials."

9. God's kingdom is from everlasting to everlasting. He ruleth by his power for ever, v. 7. Whoever will duly consider the nature and history, the perils and escapes of his own life, will not want evidence of the constant care of a sleepless and almighty providence.

10. Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth, but wo to him that striveth with his Maker. Let not the rebellious exalt themselves, v. 7. No man ever hardened himself against God and prospered.

11. Whoever can truly say Our God will not rest satisfied without calling on all around him to bless God, v. 8. A regenerated child of God correctly judges that his own private estimate of the divine blessings is not enough, but that he should heartily endeavor to make others partakers of the true knowledge and worship of the Most High.

12. Both persons and nations should acknowledge that their life in its beginning and in its continuance is wholly from God, v. 9. And surely he, who depends on another for life, is wholly dependent. Oh that men would humble themselves under the mighty hand of God, and own that their existence, and all their privileges, civil, social and religious come from above. As God supports natural life, so does he spiritual life; and so all believers in Christ are wondrously safe.

13. The whole of life is a test, a trial of what is in us, so arranged by God himself, and it is of great importance that we so regard it, v. 10. Nothing is more quieting to the pious soul than to remember, It is the Lord. Compare Job i. 21; Amos iii. 6.

14. Many of the tests to which God subjects his people are painful, vv. 11, 12. Sometimes captivity, hard bondage, cruel oppression, fire and water, heat and cold, are sent to prove them. Sometimes their trials are wholly unknown to the world. We ought to be specially thankful, if we are saved from tyranny, from persecution for conscience' sake, from all that class of trials, which bring upon us the fiendish passions of men. When men are let loose to ride over our heads, we are indeed in a sad case.

15. However long and sharp the trials of God's people may be, they shall have a happy issue out of them, and a blessed enlargement, which none but God can give, v. 12. O yes, the trial of their faith, being more precious than of gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, shall be found unto praise, and honor, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ, 1 Pet. i. 7. Compare Isa. i. 25; xlviii. 10; Zech. xiii. 9. Arnd: "The pious martyr Babylas said, when he was led to death: 'Be now joyous, O my soul, God is doing good to thee.'"

16. It is right for persons of every rank and condition to observe all the ordinances appointed by God in the dispensation under which they live, vv. 13, 15. Especially should we feel and confess that we are miserable sinners, and so must ever come with a deep sense of unworthiness, and with a lively faith in the great sacrifice of the one Mediator.

17. My soul, remember the vows and promises thou hast made to God in the day of sorrow. Hast thou paid them? vv. 13, 14. Or hast thou passed thy word to thy Maker and been found a liar? O how is this? Of nothing must a more awful account be given than of broken vows.

18. If it is praiseworthy to tell of outward deliverances and to invite others to listen to a narrative of God's mercies in that behalf; surely it cannot be wrong to state clearly, modestly and thankfully God's dealings with our souls. It is one proof of the low state of piety in this century that there is so little solemn and profitable conversation among professors of religion concerning the work of God in their own hearts. Scott: "Besides the general example of gratitude for our mercies, which we publicly exhibit; we should more particularly declare to those who fear God, what he has done for our souls, and how he has heard and answered our prayers: they alone are capable of understanding our experience, and they will be edified and encouraged by it, and will join with us in prayer and praise, and this will turn to our mutual comfort, and to the glory of God." Morison: "It is an excellent sign of the power of religion in the heart, when it pants for opportunity of bearing testimony to the faithfulness and mercy of Jehovah in the dispensations of his providence and grace." Henry: "God's people should communicate their experiences to each other; we should take all occasion to tell one another of the great and kind things, which God has done for us, especially for our souls." Tholuck: "The experience of every individual pious man is the common possession of all."

19. True prayer is earnest; it cries unto God, v. 17. Length is no substitute for fervor in our devotions.

20. It cannot be denied that there is much praying in the world; but it must be admitted that much of it fails to bring the blessing. Why is this? An answer may be found in v. 18. We ask that we may consume it upon our lusts, our pride, our ambition, our ease, our sloth, our vanity, our worldliness. Horne: "The prayer which is heard is the prayer of the penitent, heartily grieved and wearied with sin, hating and longing to be delivered from it." Slade: "There must be no double dealing with Jehovah." John ix. 31. Calvin: "Integrity of heart is indispensable." Henry: "If I have favorable thoughts of iniquity, if I love it, indulge it, allow myself in it, if I treat it as a friend, and bid it welcome, make provision for it, and am loath to part with it, if I roll it under my tongue as a sweet morsel, though it be but a heart-sin that is thus countenanced and made much of, if I delight in it after the inward man, God will not hear my prayer."

21. The comfort of answered prayers is very great, vv. 19, 20. Indeed it constitutes the substance of the Christian's support. We may use it as we will and when we will. Scott: "The feeblest petition of the repenting sinner, coming from a broken heart, will by no means be despised." God may turn his ears from prattling prayers, or preaching prayers, but never from penitent, believing prayers.

22. If prayer is answered, if blessings descend, we should never forget that it is all of mercy, v. 20. Calvin: "It is entirely of his free grace that God is propitious, and that our prayers are not wholly ineffectual." Henry: "What we win by prayer, we must wear with praise."

PSALM LXVII.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, A Psalm or Song.

- 1 God be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us; Selah.
- 2 That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations.
- 3 Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee.
- 4 Oh let the nations be glad and sing for joy: for thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth. Selah.
- 5 Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee.
- 6 Then shall the earth yield her increase; and God, even our own God, shall bless us.
- 7 God shall bless us; and all the ends of the earth shall fear him.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xxx. That David wrote this ode is admitted by the Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate, and is esteemed probable by Luther, Patrick, Dodd, Scott, Morison and Hengstenberg. The Syriac and Abenezra say its author is unknown. The silence of many commentators on this matter shows that their minds are not clear. Of course it has no known historic occasion. The Syriac says "the people sang it when they brought David over the river Jordan," after the suppression of Absalom's rebellion. That occasion is described in 2 Sam. xix. 11-43. But I find no support for this opinion. The Syriac has better foundation for saying that "to us it intimates a prophecy in it concerning the calling of the Gentiles and the preaching of the apostles, and also concerning the judgments of the Lord." Horsley thinks it is "a hymn for the feast of the tabernacles, prophetic of a general conversion of the world to the worship of God." Patrick thinks it probable it was used in blessing the people, after bringing the ark to Jerusalem. But the contents of the Psalm are our sole guide in this matter, and they fix no occasion for its special use. Scott dates it B. C. 1023; Clarke, about B. C. 520. The only name of the Most High in it is Elohim God, on which see on Ps. iii. 2. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. God be merciful unto us, and bless us; and cause his face to shine upon us. This is the substance of the form of benediction (with a change of person in the pronoun) used by the priests under the law, Num. vi. 24-26. Tholuck: "The shining countenance of God on his people is a gracious one, the lustre of which refreshes the hearts, and pours blessings on all the ways of the people." Be merciful, in Ps. li. 1, Have mercy. Bless, as in Ps. v. 12; lxvi. 8. For the sense of causing his face to shine, see on Ps. iv. 6; xxxi. 16. The Hebrew verbs both here and in Num. vi. are in the future, though perhaps well rendered in the imperative; yet if we use the future, they contain a promise of a blessing yet to come. Us has no doubt a primary reference to the godly among the Israelites. To them as to us all blessings come through mercy and grace. Rich and numerous were the blessings that God promised to Israel, as may be seen in Deut. xxviii. 1-14, which may be regarded as an 'expansion' of Num. vi. 24-26.

2. That thy way may be known upon earth, thy saving health among all nations. God's way is his covenant, says Calvin; his procedure, says Hengstenberg; his mode of dealing with his people, says Alexander; the 'way' to eternal life, says Horne. Clarke explains it as equivalent to "Thy will, thy gracious designs towards the children of men,—Thy way of reconciling them to thyself,—of justifying the ungodly, and sanctifying the unholy. . . God's way is God's religion." The more evangelical the explanation of the first clause, the better it tallies with the second, which is parallel. Our version has saving health. But the word occurs more than seventy times in the Hebrew Bible and in more than fifty instances it is rendered salvation, sometimes help, welfare, deliverance, twice health, Ps. xlii. 5, 11, here only, saving health. See on Ps. xlii. 11. Saving health seems to have been inserted from an old translation in use in the days of King James.

3. Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee. People in both cases plural, nations. Praise, the same verb in both clauses, rendered give thanks in Ps. vi. 5; in Ps. xxxii. 5, confess. The verb is in the future in both instances, shall praise, but well enough rendered in the imperative. Both are forms of prediction. See Introduction, § 6. It clearly foretells the time when the Gentiles shall have the light of the Gospel.

4. Oh let the nations be glad and sing for joy; or, The nations shall be glad and shout for joy. Verses 3, 5 in precisely the same words call on all nations to give thanks. Verse 4 assigns a reason for so doing. God shall make them glad and give them cause for shouting. The calling of the Gentiles to a participation of the blessings of the Gospel was to them life from the dead. It opened to them boundless fields of glad thought and emotion. It showed them, contrary to their former apprehensions, that the world was not governed by chance, nor by demoniacal hatred, but equitably: For thou shalt judge the people righteously, and govern the nations upon earth. The rule of Christ over the nations is righteous altogether. The glory of any government depends on its righteousness. The Scriptures give us all needed assurance on this point, and make it the foundation of rejoicing, Ps. xevi. 10-13; xevii. 1, 2; xeviii. 8, 9; Isa. xi. 3-10. This righteousness is marvellously displayed in all the provisions of the Gospel. People, plural peoples, see on Ps. ii. 1. Nations, as in v. 3.

5. Let the people praise thee, O God; let all the people praise thee. In Hebrew and English this is a literal copy of v. 3. It is repeated because it calls attention to a great and neglected duty, because in v. 4, abundant cause is assigned for performing it, and because God would teach us that his salvation would awaken thanksgiving. No man can read the writings of early Christians converted from heathenism without seeing that they felt themselves almost as marvellously rescued, as if they had been brought out of hell itself.

6. Then shall the earth yield her increase. The verb is in the preterite, has yielded. So confident is the prophet that he speaks of it as already accomplished. It points us to a time foretold when abundance and praise shall mark the world for a long time together. Temporal and spiritual blessings shall yet abound, the earth shall yet yield her increase of food and her harvest of souls and her revenue of praise, Ezek. xxxiv. 27; Ps. lxxxv. 12. And God, even our own God shall bless us. Bless us temporally, spiritually, eternally, in all respects. Bless as in v. 1, and with allusion to it. He repeats:

7. God shall bless us. There is no doubt of it. And all the ends of the earth shall fear him. God's goodness to his people leads his enemies to wish to be his friends. Calvin: "Every benefit, which God bestowed upon his ancient people, was, as it were, a light held out before the eyes of the world, to attract the attention of the nations to him."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. While it is lawful for us to pray for ourselves individually, it is also consonant with the nature of true piety to join others with ourselves in supplicating blessings: God be merciful unto us, v. 1, etc.

2. We shall have need to pray for mercy as long as we live, v. 1. No child of God can go to a communion table, or leave this world with more fitting words on his lips than these: "God be merciful unto me a sinner." We need mercy at every step. We shall need it to the last.

3. Mercy shall flow to those who rightly pray for it, v. 1. Believing prayer never asks more than is promised. A heart to pray is a pledge that the blessing shall come.

4. Without God's blessing we are nothing, vv. 1, 6, 7. Why are we so careless to secure it? Henry: "God's speaking well to us amounts to his doing well for us."

5. What a poor thing is the soul of man separated from God, and how necessary to its well-being is its communion with its Maker, v. 1. Without his love we die; without a sense of it we wither. Henry: "We need desire no more to make us happy, than to have God's face shine upon us, to have God love us, and let us know that he loves us."

6. There is a connection between the blessings that descend on Christians, and the salvation of others, who are yet in their sins. This seems to be taught in the obvious connection between vv. 1, 2, and vv. 6, 7. See REMARKS on Ps. li. 12, 13. Compare John vii. 38. Scott: "When the Lord shines upon his people, and fills them with light, purity, and consolation, it exceedingly tends to spread the knowledge-of his salvation." No out-pouring of God's Spirit on his people is without good to others.

7. "The world is ignorant of true religion, till God by his own instruments reveals it." This ignorance is none the less dangerous, because it is wilful and by human power incurable.

8. If praise and thanksgiving have been made by God tests of genuine piety, vv. 3-5, then it is to be feared that there is not much piety in the world. Ten lepers were healed. Only one returned to give glory to God. The world is full of murmurers and complainers. How few abound in hearty thankful praise.

9. The Gospel was designed to be and it is great cause of joy to men, v. 4. How could it be otherwise? Clarke: "The great work which is performed by it is in destroying the power, pardoning the guilt, cleansing from the infection of all sin; and filling the soul with holiness, with the mind that was in Christ." Such a religion must conduce to human happiness. It is for a lamentation that so few of the nations of the earth have yet heard that Gospel, but the work is going on and shall go on yet faster.

10. Let God's people openly and uniformly acknowledge and vindicate the divine righteousness in all respects and at all times, v. 4. This is not asking much, but we cannot do less than this without gross sin.

11. We do greatly misrepresent the Jewish religion, when we speak of it as excluding any humble penitent soul from its blessings. Where will any find more fervent prayers for the conversion of the Gentiles than in this very Psalm? vv. 3-5.

12. It would greatly add to the comfort of pious souls to remember that God reigns in all nature, and that he and he only can make the earth to give her increase, v. 6. He controls second causes, being himself the First Cause.

13. How richly God blesses his own people they know and testify, vv. 6, 7. God never had one faithful servant, who was not an honest and a willing witness of the riches of grace poured upon every believing soul.

14. True piety is never separate from the fear of God, v. 7.

15. Surely good times are coming. So the prophecies declare; so the prayers of saints for centuries lead us to expect. Horne: "Hasten, O hasten the dawning of that happy day, when congregations of converted Gentiles shall everywhere lift up their voices, and perhaps in the words of this very Psalm sing to thy praise and glory, thou blessed Lord."

16. The conversion of the Jews is a most desirable, and will be a most important event. When God blesses them with his salvation, then the ends of the earth shall soon fear him, v. 7. Paul argues in the same way, Rom. xi. 12.

PSALM LXVIII.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm or Song of David.

1 Let God arise, let his enemies be scattered: let them also that hate him flee before him.

2 As smoke is driven away, so drive them away: as wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish at the presence of God.

3 But let the righteous be glad; let them rejoice before God: yea, let them exceedingly rejoice.

4 Sing unto God, sing praises to his name: extol him that rideth upon the heavens by his name JAH, and rejoice before him.

- 5 A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows, is God in his holy habitation.
- 6 God setteth the solitary in families: he bringeth out those which are bound with chains: but the rebellious dwell in a dry land.
- 7 O God, when thou wentest forth before thy people, when thou didst march through the wilderness. Selah:
- 8 The earth shook, the heavens also dropped at the presence of God: even Sinai itself was moved at the presence of God, the God of Israel.
- 9 Thou, O God, didst send a plentiful rain, whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance, when it was weary.
- 10 Thy congregation hath dwelt therein: thou, O God, hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor.
- 11 The Lord gave the word: great was the company of those that published it.
- 12 Kings of armies did flee apace: and she that tarried at home divided the spoil.
- 13 Though ye have lain among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold.
- 14 When the Almighty scattered kings in it, it was white as snow in Salmon.
- 15 The hill of God is as the hill of Bashan; a high hill as the hill of Bashan.
- 16 Why leap ye, ye high hills? this is the hill which God desireth to dwell in; yea, the LORD will dwell in it for ever.
- 17 The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels: the Lord is among them, as in Sinai, in the holy place.
- 18 Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive: thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the LORD God might dwell among them.
- 19 Blessed be the Lord, who daily loadeth us with benefits, even the God of our salvation. Selah.
- 20 He that is our God is the God of salvation; and unto God the Lord belong the issues from death.
- 21 But God shall wound the head of his enemies, and the hairy scalp of such a one as goeth on still in his trespasses.
- 22 The Lord said, I will bring again from Bashan, I will bring my people again from the depths of the sea:
- 23 That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies, and the tongue of thy dogs in the same.
- 24 They have seen thy goings, O God; even the goings of my God, my King, in the sanctuary.
- 25 The singers went before, the players on instruments followed after; among them were the damsels playing with timbrels.
- 26 Bless ye God in the congregations, even the Lord, from the fountain of Israel.
- 27 There is little Benjamin with their ruler, the princes of Judah and their council, the princes of Zebulun, and the princes of Naphtali.
- 28 Thy God hath commanded thy strength: strengthen, O God, that which thou hast wrought for us.
- 29 Because of thy temple at Jerusalem shall kings bring presents unto thee.
- 30 Rebuke the company of spearmen, the multitude of the bulls, with the calves of the people, till every one submit himself with pieces of silver: scatter thou the people that delight in war.
- 31 Princes shall come out of Egypt: Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God.
- 32 Sing unto God, ye kingdoms of the earth; oh sing praises unto the Lord; Selah:
- 33 To him that rideth upon the heavens of heavens, which were of old; lo, he doth send out his voice, and that a mighty voice.
- 34 Ascribe ye strength unto God: his excellency is over Israel, and his strength is in the clouds.
- 35 O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places: the God of Israel is he that giveth strength and power unto his people. Blessed be God.

ON the several parts of the title see on titles of Ps. iii. iv. xxx. The authorship is ascribed to David by the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Calvin, Ainsworth, Horne, Henry, Pool, Clarke, Patrick, Tholuck and Hengstenberg. Its historic occasion is not certain. Some think David is here celebrating victories in general gained over the enemies of his country. But this assigns to it no time. Some think it was written on occasion of the victories recorded in 1 Chron. xix. 6-19; 2 Sam. xii. 26-31. Others fix it to the time of removing the ark of God either from Kirjath-Jearim or from the house of Obed-Edom. Which of these conjectures is most probable, the reader must judge for himself. The Psalm confessedly abounds in beauties, excellencies and difficulties. Amyrald: "There are in it poetic descriptions, bold metaphors, frequent apostrophes, magnificent personifications, and words which are of rare occurrence, and well selected, and therefore not easily understood." Muis styles it "the torture of critics and the reproach of commentators." Pages might be filled with like confessions. Hengstenberg and Alexander think there is a close connection between this and Ps. xviii.

This Psalm certainly contains Gospel truths. Luther: "It is a signal prophecy concerning Christ." Horne applies it to Christ throughout. Vitringa says it refers to "the ascension of Christ into heaven and his sitting at the right hand of the Father, and the effects thereof." The Syriac styles it "a prophecy concerning the dispensation of Christ and the calling of the Gentiles to faith." Pool: "By the spirit of prophecy David looked through and beyond the present actions and types unto the great mysteries of Christ's resurrection and ascension into heaven, and of the special privileges of the Christian church, and of the calling of the Gentiles unto God." Anderson: "As every thing under that dispensation was typical or prophetic, it is very natural to regard the triumphant manner in which the ark ascended the holy mountain, as an emblem of the far more triumphant ascension of the Lord Jesus Christ to the highest heavens." Paul explicitly quotes and applies to Christ a portion of this Psalm, Eph. iv. 8-13. Scott dates it B. C. 1045; Clarke, about B. C. 1042. Hengstenberg quotes with approbation Boettcher as saying: "It belongs assuredly to the most remote age of Hebrew poetry;" and Hitzig: "The poem may be pronounced with confidence to be as remarkable for its antiquity as for its originality." The names of the Most High in this Psalm are Elohim God, El God, Jehovah LORD Adonai Lord, on which respectively see on Ps. iii. 2; v. 4; i. 2; ii. 4. We have here, for the first time in the Psalms, Shaddai the Almighty. It is found in Genesis, Exodus, Leviticus, Job, Isaiah, Ezekiel and Joel; in all the Scriptures not quite fifty times. It is uniformly rendered. It occurs again in Ps. xci. 1. It asserts the all-sufficiency of God. We have also twice in this Psalm God's name, Jah, which is the poetic form of Jehovah, and of the same signification. It does not occur often, and is chiefly found compounded with the verb Hallelu, praise ye, Jah the Lord. We have had no other Psalm in which so many of the names of God are used. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Let God arise, let his enemies be scattered: let them also that hate him flee before him. The whole verse is but a slight variation of the words used by Moses "when the ark set forward." "Rise up, LORD, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee flee before thee." The four verbs are the same here and in Num. x. 35. Following the Hebrew many versions read: God shall arise; his enemies shall be scattered; and they who hate him shall flee before him. But see Introduction, § 6. Calvin and others, perhaps with reason, regard the first verse as a preface of the whole Psalm, as containing the subject of the whole. Tholuck: "It is indeed a theme which in ever new variations is being repeated at different epochs in the history of the kingdom of God, until the final judgment shall absorb and complete all the preceding judgments of God." God is always arising, and scattering his foes. He does so in every generation. In Num. x. 35 the name of the Supreme Being used is Jehovah LORD; here it is Elohim God. But both names are used separately and conjointly in the first two chapters of Genesis; and to an intelligent pious Jew this signified no more than it does to an intelligent pious Christian.

2. As smoke is driven away, so drive them away; as wax melteth before the fire, so let the wicked perish at the presence of God. Luther: "Two beautiful emblems, smoke and wax; the smoke disappears before the wind; the wax before the fire. It is most contemptuous to compare, to smoke and wax, such mighty enemies who think they can combat heaven and earth." Smoke, as a figure of evanescence is employed in Ps. xxxvii. 20; cii. 3. Wax as an emblem of dissolution is found in Ps. xxii. 14; xevii. 5. Perish, in Hebrew the same and in the same form as in Judges v. 31, where Deborah sings: So let all thine enemies perish, O LORD. The verbs drive away and perish are both in the future. Read either way, it is a sure word of prophecy. Deborah added, But let them that love him be as the sun when he goeth forth in his might; so David says:

3. But let the righteous be glad; let them rejoice before God: yea, let them exceedingly rejoice. Righteous, in the plural, showing that they are all included, however many there may be of them. The verbs here also are in the future. Be glad, in Ps. v. 11 rejoice. Rejoice, as in Ps. ix. 2. Hengstenberg renders it shout for joy; Alexander, triumph. Exceedingly rejoice, margin (literally) rejoice with gladness; Hengstenberg, exult for gladness. The verbs of this verse are in contrast with those of v. 2.

4. Sing unto God, sing praises to his name. The first verb here is cognate to the word Song, and the second to the word Psalm in the title. The first verb is the same as in Ps. xlii. 6; lxv. 13; the second, as in Ps. vii. 17; ix. 11; lxi. 8; and is by many rendered sing Psalms. Extol him that rideth upon the heavens by his name JAH, and rejoice before him. This rendering is substantially supported by the Chaldee, Calvin, John Rogers' translation, Bishops' Bible, Genevan translation, church of England and Jebb. Horsley: Cast-up-a-way for him that is riding through the wilderness; in JAH is his name, therefore exult before him. This is in the leading parts substantially supported by several of the ancient versions, also by Jerome, Venema, Ainsworth, Chandler, Waterland, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander. Extol, in Ex. ix. 17; Pr. iv. 8, the same Hebrew word is rendered exalt. But in Isa. lvii. 14; lxii. 10, it is rendered cast up, meaning to make smooth or plain a way. Diodati: "The terms are taken from what is used to be done at the triumphal coming in of kings, whom they used to meet, and make plain and mend the ways by which they are to come, if they be broken, or ragged, or stopped; so here is meant the preparation for the bringing in of the ark: but especially the spiritual preparations for Christ's coming, and reception in the world; which is a wilderness, void of all goodness, justice, and life; which preparations were made by his prophets, and especially by John the Baptist, Isa. xl. 3; Mal. iii. 1; Matt. iii. 3." Hengstenberg admits that the manner of preparing the way was by songs of praise; and this is extolling him. As to reading wilderness or deserts instead of heavens, it is surely no improvement, and Hammond, supported by Buxtorf, has shown satisfactorily that the word in the plural, as it is here, may signify heavens; yet it is but candid to admit that Calvin reads upon the clouds, and that the word is nowhere else rendered heavens, but always plain, desert, wilderness, campaign. The Chaldee has it the ninth heaven. Others have it the seventh heaven. But these are human additions. By his name Jah is better than in Jah is his name, and signifies that he comes in his own appropriate name and character as the self-existent, independent, eternal and unchangeable Jehovah. As reasons for rejoicing before him we have the matters contained in vv. 1-3; also in vv. 5, 6.

5. A father of the fatherless, and a judge of the widows is God in his holy habitation. Fatherless, often joined with stranger and oftener with widow. Sometimes the stranger, fatherless and widow are all named together, Deut. xxiv. 19-21; Ps. cxlvi. 9. These terms always describe those, who are in a helpless or forlorn condition. Although the religion of the Jews cast the shield of its mighty protection over widows and orphans, yet such were the corrupt opinions of surrounding nations in regard to the weak, and such is the evil propensity of men to take advantage of those who cannot defend themselves, that even in Jewry widows and orphans were words expressive of a very low condition. Calvin: "There can be no doubt that orphans and widows are named to indicate in general all such as the world are disposed to overlook as unworthy of their regard. Generally we distribute our attentions where we expect some return. We give the preference to rank and splendor, and despise or neglect the poor." In this we are not like God. Hengstenberg: "Orphans and widows are expressions designed to individualize the miserable." Father and Judge seem to bear the general sense of defender, protector, vindicator; the first best expresses the pity and tenderness of God; the latter, his authority and ability to protect. His holy habitation may mean either heaven, where God sits as a Judge forever; or the tabernacle, where by laws and statutes, by Urim and Thummim, and by judgments as the head of the government he made himself known.

6. God setteth the solitary in families. These senses are suggested. 1. God makes those of like temper to dwell in a house; 2. God gives the solitary a home; 3. Hammond, followed by many scholars for solitary reads destitute, and gets this sense: God relieves the destitute so that he may abide at home and not seek abroad. Boothroyd: God maketh outcasts to dwell at home; Patrick: God provides for those who are utterly destitute, and settles them in comfortable habitations; Hengstenberg: God makes the solitary to dwell in houses. By solitary he understands miserable, and the blessing they receive consists in being brought under roof and shelter. 4. Horsley: God is bringing home his chosen ones, meaning from the Babylonish captivity. 5. Others refer the passage to the settlement in their own homes in Canaan of those, who had been bereft of friends in Egypt, or in the wilderness. 6. The Chaldee, Syriac, Calvin, Piscator, Fabritius, Amesius, the Genevan translation and Jebb sustain the reading of the English text. Clarke: "Is not the meaning, God is the author of marriage; and children, the legal fruit of it, are an inheritance from him?" Pool: "Such as were single and solitary he blesseth with a wife and children, as he did Abraham. Houses are often put for posterity, Exod. i. 21; Ruth iv. 11; 2 Sam. vii. 11." There is no better sense. He bringeth out those which are bound with chains. The release of prisoners is a favorite figure of inspired writers, Ps. cii. 20; cxlvi. 7; Isa. xlii. 7; xlix. 9; Zech. ix. 11, 12. Some refer this language to the release of Joseph from prison; some, to the deliverance of Israel from Egypt; some, to the rescue of the destitute from want and poverty; and some to the changes mercifully brought about in giving a people a good instead of a bad government. All desirable changes among men or nations are the fruit of God's mercy and power. But such language has a wider reach and points to the rescue of God's penitent people from wrath, guilt, gross darkness, fatal error, the dominion of sin, and the slavery of vile lusts and appetites; and bringing them forth to the liberty of the children of God. But the rebellious dwell in a dry land. But, only, surely, or truly; see on Ps. lxii. 1. By the rebellious, the Chaldee understands the Egyptians, who were reluctant to dismiss the Israelites. But the subsequent context shows that it has a wide application. Indeed Israel, when rebelling, found the words awfully true. They are of universal application, and are parallel to Ps. xxxii. 10; Pr. ix. 12; Isa. iii. 11; Ezek. xviii. 4. To dwell in a dry place is to lack comforts and refreshments, and so to be miserable.

7. O God, when thou wentest forth before thy people, when thou didst march through the wilderness; Selah:

8. The earth shook, the heavens also dropped at the presence of God; even Sinai itself was moved at the presence of God, the God of Israel. These verses are a simple rehearsal of the great historic fact that God led his people forth from Egypt and through the wilderness. The remarkable effects produced on the natural world are recorded in Ex. xix. 16-20. Nor was this a solitary case, Judg. v. 4, 5. Instead of Sinai itself, some read this Sinai; some connect the pronoun with God, this God; and some this (was at) Sinai. In favor of this God we have Isa. xxv. 9. There are objections to referring dropped to the manna. It is never used in that connection, but another word, rained, Ex. xvi. 4; Ps. lxxviii. 24. Nor does it probably refer to the plague of thunder and hail and rain in Egypt, Ex. ix. 22-34. After dropped the Chaldee supplies dew. May we not by dropped understand lowered? Yet as these verses are clearly borrowed from Judg. v. 4, we may supply rain or water. This agrees with verse

9. Thou, O God, didst send a plentiful rain, whereby thou didst confirm thine inheritance, when it was weary. God's inheritance was either the land of Canaan, made over to the Israelites as an inheritance, or it was the body of pious Israelites themselves. The next verse favors the first view. The weariness seems to refer to the people, but it may imply the thirstiness of the soil of Judea until it was watered from heaven. Nothing but miraculous interpositions saved the Israelites from fainting and perishing in the wilderness. Instead of plentiful rain the Chaldee has vivifying dews, and spontaneous rains; Ainsworth, a rain of liberalities; Venema, a shower of abundances; Mudge and Edwards, blessings; Hengstenberg, a rain of gifts; Alexander, a rain of free gifts. Among the blessings granted to the Israelites in the wilderness were manna, quails, and water in great abundance. To confirm here means to strengthen, inducing a state the opposite of being weary.

10. Thy congregation hath dwelt therein, i. e., in the promised land, which was the inheritance of the Israelites. Thou, O God, hast prepared of thy goodness for the poor. Canaan was the gift of God to the people escaped from bondage. So are all the blessings God bestows on his children who are poor, afflicted, humble, lowly; see on Ps. ix. 12; xviii. 27. Goodness, in Ps. iv. 6; xiv. 1, 3, good; in Ps. xvi. 2, goodness.

11. The Lord gave the word: great was the company of those that published it. Gave in the future, but see Introduction, § 6. In the rest of the verse the allusion is clearly to the song of Deborah, already noticed. Those that published it, one word, a participle in the feminine. Women took part in shouting the triumphs of armies, Ex. xv. 20; Judg. xi. 34; 1 Sam. xviii. 6. It is only remotely that this verse can allude to the giving of the law. It may refer to the preaching of the Gospel in the same way as Ps. xix. 4 is made to do in Rom. x. 18.

12. Kings of armies did flee apace; and she that tarried at home divided the spoil. The verbs in Hebrew are in the future, but are doubtless well rendered in the preterite. The Scriptures mention great kings and famous kings and mighty kings, who fled before Israel, or were slain by their hosts, Ps. cxxxv. 10, 11; cxxxvi. 17-20; Josh. viii. 2; Judg. i. 6, 7; iv. 24, and many other places. On dividing the spoil of their enemies, see Num. xxxi. 26-54; Josh. xxii. 8; 1 Sam. xxx. 24. Some of the accounts of ancient spoil seem almost fabulous.

13. Though ye have lain [in many editions lien] among the pots, yet shall ye be as the wings of a dove covered with silver, and her feathers with yellow gold. Lowth: "I am not at all satisfied with any explication I have ever met with of these verses, either as to sense or construction, and I must give them up as unintelligible to me." But is not this the import of the passage, Though in former times in Egypt, in the wilderness, and in camp your condition has been depressed, yet there shall be a great change and ye shall be beautified? Pots here only; in Ezek. xl. 43, rendered hooks. Others render it end-irons, hearth-stones, trivets, tripods; many, pots. In either case it refers to a low and sorrowful condition. Some think it refers to the kilns of Egypt. The plumage of some species of pigeons or doves is changeable according to the light in which it is seen, and in any good light is as rich in color as silver or gold. Patrick: "Though you have endured great hardships in Egypt, where you looked not like valiant soldiers, but rather like vile scullions besmudged among kettles and pots, you shall hereafter appear most beautiful and splendid, and the wings of your armies shall shine like those of a dove when they glisten as if they were covered with silver and gold." Alexander: "The beautiful allusion to the colors of a dove's plumage seems intended to suggest the idea of a peaceful and splendid prosperity." Henry: "From a low and despised condition they had been advanced to splendor and prosperity." Many give a like exposition. Many practical writers, especially in the seventeenth century, applied this verse to the fallen state of God's people by nature, and to their backslidings after conversion, followed by the excellences of redemption, sanctification and glory. Dr. Gill thinks this is the best use of all. Those, who have thus regarded the passage, are so many and so respectable, that it is not wise to scorn them.

14. When the Almighty scattered kings in it, it was white as snow in Salmon. Diodati: "After all these victories obtained against the enemies of the church, the land, which before seemed horrid through war and desolation, Ps. lxxiv. 20, became beautiful, and flourishing in justice, peace, and blessings, even as the hill of Salmon, being shady and dark of its own nature, and as the Hebrew name imports, becometh white when the snow is fallen upon it. Concerning this hill see Judg. ix. 48." Alexander: "The change from war to peace is likened to the dazzling whiteness of snow in the midst of blackness or darkness." Salmon signifies shade. Snow is just the reverse of darkness.

15. The hill of God is as the hill of Bashan; a high hill as the hill of Bashan. On the country called Bashan, see on Ps. xxii. 12. The mountain of Bashan was renowned for its size, beauty and fertility; but Mount Zion was its equal, not in these respects, but in being the chosen spot where Jehovah revealed himself in so glorious a manner. By a figure well understood more is meant than is expressed as in 1 Pet. iv. 3. The meaning is, Mount Zion is far better than Bashan. In Isa. ii. 2, it is said the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills. This is a plain and obvious sense, approved by many; among later writers, by Pool and Hengstenberg. Others understand that the meaning is that Bashan is a great mountain, in Hebrew phrase, a mount of God, displaying the vastness of God's creative power. This may be warranted; see on Ps. xxxvi. 6; lxxv. 9. Compare Ps. civ. 16. Horsley: A hill of God is the hill of Bashan. A hill of lofty brows is the hill of Bashan. But this is not so good as that already suggested.

16. Why leap ye, ye high hills? Hammond: "The word rendered leap ye occurs here only, and is by guess rendered to leap." Chandler has it, Why look ye askance? i. e., why are ye jealous? Aquila and Jerome, Why contend ye? Clarke: Why envy ye? Pool well paraphrases it: "Why do ye triumph and boast of your height, and look upon poor Zion with scorn and contempt, as an obscure and inconsiderable hill, if compared with you?" Leaping would point to scornful exultation expressed by vaulting. This is the hill, which God desireth to dwell in, yea, the LORD will dwell in it forever. The Most High is here revealed by his two names Elohim and Jehovah. He chose Zion, and not the greatest mountain on earth. He made it great by his choice. To this day the greatest ranges and highest peaks of mountains are as nothing for celebrity compared with Mount Zion.

17. The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels. The enemies of Israel often tried to make themselves formidable by chariots, Ex. xiv. 7; Judg. iv. 3; 1 Sam. xiii. 5; 2 Sam. viii. 4; x. 18. Here David opposes to them the chariots of God. The fullest representation made of this matter is found in 2 Kings vi. 17. But such ideas were familiar to the minds of pious men of old. There is some doubt as to the rendering of the numbers in this verse. The Hebrew and Clarke read two myriads of thousands doubled; John Rogers' translation, many thousande tymes a thousande; Calvin and Genevan translation, twenty thousand thousand; Horsley, twenty thousand thousand of thousand. The difficulty respecting Hebrew numbers has been previously explained; see on title of Ps. lx. Myriad may mean ten thousand, or be used indefinitely for a vast multitude, Ps. iii. 6. There is a still further difficulty. It is evident that the authors of the English version and many others regarded the word rendered angels as included in the Hebrew text, for they do not mark it as supplied, and yet there is no word corresponding to it except the word rendered double. That word occurs nowhere else, and modern authorities will not allow us in any case to render it angels; for it is literally thousands of repetition, i. e., thousands repeated. Jude 14 would allow us to read holy myriads there; and the theology of the Jews would allow us to supply angels here. But it is evident that the authors of the common version thought they had on this subject some light, of which we know nothing. Compare Deut. xx. 1-4; Ps. xx. 7. The law was given from Sinai by the ministration of angels, Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2. Jewish writers give as a confident tradition that there were seventy thousand angels at the giving of the law. There may have been many more. The Bible does not fix the number. But the latter part of this verse seems to allude to that transaction: The LORD is among them as in Sinai, in the holy place. This is supposed to be elliptical, and might be read, The Lord (Adonai) is among them (the chariots or angels) as in Sinai, so also in the holy place (or Zion) at this time. Alexander: "Under the law, Sinai was renewed in Zion. Under the Gospel, Zion superseded Sinai."

18. Thou hast ascended on high, thou hast led captivity captive: thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the LORD God might dwell among them. With unspeakable delight does the pious mind here find Messiah, and in the New Testament an inspired exposition of the whole verse, Eph. iv. 8-16. The passage no doubt has its primary application to God as a conqueror for Israel. God having engaged in the conflict won the day and ascended to his seat or throne either on Mount Zion or in heaven. He led captivity captive, a phrase occurring first in the song of Deborah, Judg. v. 12, and signifying that he had taken many captives, or that he had put away cause of fear that his people should be subject to captivity. The gifts were the spoils of the enemy, and they were designed for the stubborn, the refractory, or rebellious Israelites, that a sense of God's kindness might win them to himself. But all this is low, compared with the high and ultimate sense of the passage as expounded by Paul in application to Christ, who has ascended up far above all heavens, who turned the captivity of his people, who bound their enemies Satan, sin and death, who received great gifts, especially of the Holy Ghost, for men, Acts ii. 4, 33; and who bestows his gifts on rebellious man. Thus the LORD God (Jah Elohim) Immanuel, God with us, dwells among sinners.

19. Blessed be the LORD, who daily loadeth us with benefits, even the God of our salvation. Blessed, see on Ps. v. 12; xviii. 46. Daily, literally day by day, meaning continually. Loadeth, this verb may be taken either in a good or bad sense; here manifestly in a good sense. The LORD God of this verse is Adonai El.

20. He that is our God is the God of salvation. God, in each case in this verse is El. Salvation, in the plural, salvations, see on Ps. iii. 2, 8. Chaldee: Our God is strength and redemption. And unto God the LORD belong the issues from death. Why the name of the Most High is thus rendered in this verse does not appear. The Hebrew is Jehovah Adonai, Jehovah the Ruler, commonly LORD Lord. Calvin has it the Lord Jehovah; Alexander, Jehovah the Lord. The sense of the clause is that on

God we depend for our escapes, deliverances, or goings forth from death. Death is not a monarch, but a servant of God. Calvin: "Death may threaten us in ever so many forms, yet God can easily devise the necessary means of preservation."

21. But God shall wound the head of his enemies, and the hairy scalp of such a one as goeth on still in his trespasses. But, rendered truly in Ps. lxii. 1; in this place by Calvin surely; see on Ps. lxii. 1. To wound the head and hairy scalp is to kill; elsewhere smite, smite through, strike through, pierce, Num. xxiv. 8, 17; Job xxvi. 12; Ps. cx. 5. It expresses the infliction of a deadly blow. God will send utter destruction on such as persist in trespasses. His people's enemies are his enemies. Alexander: "The hairy scalp is merely a poetical equivalent to head."

22. The Lord [Adonai] said, I will bring again from Bashan, I will bring my people again from the depths of the sea. Three explanations are offered. One is that God here reminds his people of having delivered them from Og, king of Bashan and his hosts, and of having brought them through the Red sea, that thus he may teach them anew the lesson of their dependence. This is the view of Calvin. Another is that God here assures his people that though their case should become sad, even as if they were in terror of the power of Og, king of Bashan, and in the perils of the Red sea, yet he would safely bring them through all their troubles as he had done their fathers. This view is favored by Patrick, Gill, Pool, Henry, Horne, Scott, Anderson. A third supposes that God is not in v. 22 speaking of his people at all, but of his enemies, and is telling them that though they should climb to the heights of the great mountains, or hide in the sea yet he would thence bring them forth to punishment. The historic Scripture explaining the allusion to Bashan is Num. xxi. 33-35. The passage of the Red sea is recorded in Ex. xiv. This last view is confidently held by Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander. In favor of it it may be stated that my people is supplied outright, not being even taken from the context, whereas enemies are expressly named in vv. 21, 23. A passage supposed by some to be quite parallel to this is found in Amos ix. 2, 3. On the other hand we have the judgment of a long line of very judicious commentators in favor of the second view stated. Besides some suppose that the phrase The Lord said at the beginning of v. 22 refers to 2 Sam. iii. 18, where Abner says, The Lord hath spoken. In that place we find expressly my people.

23. That thy foot may be dipped in the blood of thine enemies, and the tongue of thy dogs in the same. The first clause is parallel to the last clause of Ps. lviii. 10. For dipped the margin has red. The meaning is that the true Israel should gain as complete a victory as a conqueror does when pursuing his retreating foes, he dips his feet in the blood of the slain. We know the fondness of the dog for blood, and are furnished in sacred history with an illustration, 1 Kings xxii. 38. If these verses continue the discourse begun in v. 18, then they point to the resurrection and ascension of Christ, the spread of the Gospel, the downfall of paganism, the striking dumb of heathen oracles and the perfect victory of Messiah over his enemies.

24. They have seen thy goings, O God; even the goings of my God, my King, in the sanctuary. If the imagery is drawn from the return of the ark to Jerusalem after successful wars, then we may give to they a very extended signification, and include all who had seen the wonders wrought by Jehovah—the same Jehovah who had long shown his glory in the sanctuary, and who was David's God and King. David points away from himself and invites the people to adore God. The Lord is God and King, and a man of war heading his armies in battle and in their triumphant return.

25. The singers went before, the players on instruments followed after. The order of the procession here noted is, says Hengstenberg, "because, in intellectual true religion, the Word takes everywhere the first place." Among them were the damsels playing with timbrels. The instrument known to moderns, most nearly resembling the ancient timbrel, is the tambourine. Hengstenberg calls it the 'hand-kettle-drum.' It was struck with the fingers. It was the same with the tabret, Gen. xxxi. 27; Ex. xv. 20; 1 Sam. x. 5; Nah. ii. 7. In joyful processions for victories females bore a part, Ex. xv. 20; 1 Sam. xviii. 6, 7.

26. Bless ye God in the congregations, even the Lord, from the fountain of Israel. The margin renders the last phrase, Ye that are of the fountain of Israel, meaning all the people of the stock of Israel. Compare Deut. xxxiii. 28; Isa. xlviii. 1. The congregations are the assemblies of God's people. Bless, the usual word for benediction. In further describing the procession he says:

27. There is little Benjamin with their ruler. Benjamin signifies a son of days, meaning that he was the son of Jacob's old age, Gen. xlv. 20. For little the Septuagint has the younger. The tribe of Benjamin was never very numerous; and after the loss of so many of their people on account of the crime of the men of Gibeah, it was very small, Judges xix. xx. xxi. Yet this Benjamin furnished a Ruler, King Saul. Himself at first modestly declined the kingdom on the ground that his tribe was so inconsiderable, 1 Sam. ix. 21. The only objection to supposing Saul to be alluded to is that it would have been unseasonable to call to mind his reign, which had in it so many crimes and disasters. To this it is replied, first, Saul had done great things for the good of his country, 1 Sam. xiv. 47, 48; secondly, so far from ignoring the good Saul had done, David made sincere and tender lamentation for him after his death, 2 Sam. i. 17-27. [There are] the princes of Judah and their council. Some read the princes of Judah in their assembly. David was of the tribe of Judah, and the prophecies going before had long marked out that as a ruling tribe, holding assemblies or councils for the government of the nation, Gen. xlix. 8-10; Deut. xxxiii. 7. The princes of any people were the heads of tribes or of families. Moreover [there were] the princes of Zebulon, and the princes of Naphtali. Benjamin and Judah were near to the holy city. Zebulon and Naphtali were very remote from it. Benjamin and Judah were two of the most Southern tribes; Zebulon and Naphtali were two of the most Northern. They were also remarkable for their prowess, Judges v. 18, and for their learning, Gen. xlix. 21; Judges v. 14. This enumeration is equivalent to saying, All the tribes of Israel, small and great, near and remote, are there. Other explanations are offered, but none so good as this. It is noticeable, and has often been remarked, that the four tribes here named are conspicuous in New Testament history. Our Saviour began his ministry in Zebulon and Naphtali, and called most of his apostles from those tribes. Our Lord himself sprang out of Judah. Several of his apostles were of the same tribe. Paul was of the tribe of Benjamin, Matt. iv. 12-22; Heb. vii. 14; Phil. iii. 5. If the prophet is still continuing his reference to gospel times, the naming of these tribes has a special significancy.

28. Thy God hath commanded thy strength. The people Israel are here addressed. Commanded, a word of frequent occurrence. It expresses authority. Strength, that kind of might which wins the battle and gives stability to kingdoms. Strengthen, O God, that which thou hast wrought for us. Strengthen, cognate of the noun strength in the same verse. The prayer is for stability to Israel in all the varied interests of the nation, especially in the settlement of the land, and in freedom from the fear of surrounding nations; see Isa. xxvi. 12.

29. Because of thy temple at Jerusalem shall kings bring presents unto thee. The common version is abundantly sustained. The temple may mean either the tabernacle, or the more durable structure built by Solomon; see on Ps. v. 7; lxxv. 4. Here it pretty certainly points to the tabernacle. Presents, found here only, and in Ps. lxxvi. 11; Isa. xviii. 7; but the bringing of gifts as an act of worship to the true God is often mentioned, 2 Chron. xxxii. 23; Ps. lxxii. 10, 11; Isa. lx. 3-11; Matt. ii. 11.

30. Rebuke the company of spearmen. This is a clause not easily rendered or interpreted. In favor of the common version are Calvin, church of England, Bishops' Bible, Genevan translation, Piscator, Amesius and Hammond. But the margin, all the ancient versions, John Rogers' translation, Fabritius, Edwards, Jebb, Boothroyd, Horne, Mudge, Green, Horsley, Fry, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander prefer, Rebuke the beasts of the reeds. Some explain that rendering to mean, Destroy our enemies, which are like the destructive beasts, the lion, crocodile and hippopotamus, that live among the reeds, Isa. xxxv. 7; Jer. xlix. 19; 1. 44; Zech. xi. 3. But spears and other missiles were often made of reeds, and the word company is plural, so that company of the spear is perhaps the best rendering. Yet great respect is due to the learning of those who take a different view. That the image of terrible beasts may have been before the prophet's mind appears from the next clause: [Rebuke] the multitude of the bulls with the calves of the people. On bulls as persecutors, see on Ps. xxii. 12. Compare Isa. xxxiv. 7; Jer. l. 11. Others think bulls and calves are here introduced solely as objects of worship in Egypt, and that God is invoked to destroy the Egyptian worship, as in the first clause he was asked to destroy the Egyptian power represented by the beasts of the reed. Referring the whole verse thus to the Egyptian power and worship gives a good sense. The prophet asks God to go on conquering, Till every one submit himself with pieces of silver, i. e., either bring the tribute money or (which is better) bring the presents mentioned in v. 29, and humbly own that Jehovah is God alone. Scatter thou the people that delight in war. The Hebrew is in prophetic style, he has scattered, i. e., he surely will scatter. Pool well explains the phrase delighting in war as referring to those "that without any necessity or provocation, and merely out of a love to mischief and spoil, make war."

31. Princes shall come out of Egypt, i. e., they shall come bringing the presents and submitting themselves. On the word princes, (literally fat ones) see on Ps. xxii. 29. This clause favors the application of the first part of v. 30 to Egypt. This prominence is properly given to Egypt because that was in David's day a powerful kingdom and very hostile to the true religion, and the scope of the prophecy is that people remote, mighty and hitherto much opposed to the worship of Jehovah shall adore him. In like manner a people even more remote, no less hostile to the true religion, and yet covering a much larger district, and even more powerful, Cush, shall do as Egypt. Ethiopia shall soon stretch out her hands unto God. The Hebrew is very strong: Cush will hasten to extend her hands to God, or more literally will cause her hands to run out to God. We need not determine whether this stretching out of the hands is in supplication, or in the offering of presents. The two always go together. How great was the Ethiopia of Scripture appears from passages in more than one of the subsequent prophets. See Concordance. The land here described lay beyond Egypt and around the upper part of it. One of the first converts to Christianity from among the heathen was a great man of Ethiopia, Acts viii. 26-39.

32. Sing unto God, ye kingdoms of the earth; O sing praises unto the LORD. On the two verbs see on v. 4, where they both occur. Sing praises

33. To him that rideth upon the heavens of heavens, which were of old. The heavens of heavens are the third heavens, the highest heavens, the abode of the peculiar presence and glory of Jehovah. In v. 4 we have a similar phrase but quite another word rendered heavens. The riding is that of majesty and triumph. There is no place so glorious but that God is the glory of it, so bright but that he is the light thereof. He has supreme, perpetual and universal dominion. The heavens, and especially the heaven of heavens, are fit similitudes to represent antiquity. They were of old. Lo, he doth send out his voice, and that a mighty voice. Either God commands the thunder, or speaks in the thunder; see on Ps. xxix. 3, 4.

34. Ascribe ye strength unto God. Strength, as in Ps. viii. 2; often rendered power. It occurs five times in this Psalm, twice in this verse. His excellency is over Israel, and his strength is in the clouds. Some put the words over Israel at the close of the first clause, but, though admissible, this is no improvement. Excellency, so rendered, or highness, when referring to God. In the clouds, exalted above all earthly powers.

35. O God, thou art terrible out of thy holy places. Terrible, as in Ps. xlv. 4; xlvii. 2; lxxv. 5; lxxvi. 3, 5. It is the participle of the verb rendered fear, and be afraid in Ps. iii. 6; xxiii. 4. Holy places, sanctuaries, not often in the plural. Calvin: "The plural number is used because the tabernacle was divided into three parts." Wherever God has a sanctuary, or holy place, his word and worship are suited to beget awe. The God of Israel is he that giveth strength and power unto his people. Strength, as in v. 34. Power, in the plural powers, also rendered strength. Whoever has power, or might, or strength of any kind, has it from God, the God of Israel. Blessed be God. The usual form of blessing the Elohim.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. In prayer, praise, confession, adoration or supplication we can often find excellent patterns in the holy Scriptures, as David does in the words of Moses and Deborah, quoted in this Psalm, vv. 1, 2. One reason why we should study God's word and commit large portions of it to memory is that we may have the best language for devotion.

2. It is vain to deny that unrenewed men are the enemies of God, v. 1. They are so spoken of in all the Scriptures.

3. When God arises, all opposers are scattered and flee away, v. 1. All the combined powers of earth and hell are dissolved and dissipated before him. He may endure with much long-suffering the vessels of wrath; but he will at last arise. Luther: "When the Jews thought that they had gained the victory, now that Christ was laid in the grave, God awakes and calls Christ from the dead. Then the tables are turned: the disciples assemble, the Jews divide, some to grace who believe, others to wrath who are destroyed by the Romans."

4. The destruction of the wicked is easy and very natural, v. 2. It is like the passing away of smoke, or the melting of wax. They may make a great show, they may bluster, they may appear ever so formidable, but they shall perish. Calvin: "God needs no array of preparation in overthrowing his enemies. He can dissipate them with a breath."

5. When men boast of their strength and courage, their freedom from fear and their undaunted spirit, and say nothing can unman them, they have not been in the awful presence of God and know not how even they would shrink, and melt away, and perish there, vv. 1, 8, 9.

6. The Scriptures justly maintain a strong and fearful contrast between both the character and the destiny of the wicked and the righteous. They are not alike. They do not think, feel, or fare alike, vv. 2, 3. Heaven and hell are appropriate places for the reception of their respective inhabitants.

7. As it is a privilege, so it is a duty to be glad, to rejoice, yea, exceedingly to rejoice, v. 3. He, who knows and loves and receives little, may rejoice little. But surely he, who has experienced the saving grace of God, ought not to be tame and torpid in his exultations. If we duly rejoiced in God, we should not so often seek a portion here below. When the heart is full of joy in God, the trifles and vanities of time lose their enchantments.

8. Our joy should be solemn as well as lively, and should take a devotional turn, v. 4. "Is any merry? let him sing Psalms." There is not an hour, a condition, an event, but in some respects calls for praise. We have God, his perfections, his works, his word; we have Christ and his benefits; we have the Sabbath and its hallowed influences; we have food, raiment, shelter and friends. What have we not? If we are Christians, all things are ours. As we cannot rejoice in the Lord too much, so we cannot extol him too highly.

9. We mightily wrong God, when we take from him the honor, which he well deserves, for his care, and love, and pity to widows and orphans, strangers and prisoners, the neglected and injured, the crushed and destitute of earth, vv. 5, 6. How much is God honored, when the widow says, 'I trusted in God and was not forsaken;' when the orphan says, 'I was cast on the Lord from the womb and was not left to want;' when the stranger says, 'I was among a people whose speech I knew not, but God raised me up friends;' when the prisoner says, 'I was bound in affliction and iron, but Jehovah was a light unto me.' Scott: "God's condescension is equal to his majesty: he always patronises the afflicted and oppressed; and poor sinners, helpless and exposed more than any destitute orphans, are readily admitted among his sons and daughters, and share all the blessings of that high relation." Arnd: "Great potentates in the world respect the noblest and the richest in the land, the men who may adorn their court and strengthen their authority. But the highest glory of God is to compassionate the miserable." Never did God so manifest his glorious pity and condescension, as when his Son became incarnate, married our nature, and died for his helpless yet malignant foes.

10. Very few have a just estimate of the blessings of the family state, or are adequately thankful for them, v. 6. Let us often sing our song of praise on account of them. Many good treatises have been written on this subject; but it is not exhausted. How many precious thoughts are at once presented by the very mention of husband, wife, father, mother, brother, sister, daughter, son. When for his sins God drove man out of paradise, he allowed him to carry with him two of its most precious institutions, marriage and the Sabbath. No good man is ready to say which of these is the greatest blessing.

11. The wretchedness of a sinful state is dreadful. Verily the rebellious dwell in a dry land, v. 6. Who ever had comfort in pride, or lies, or fraud, or violence? "The wages of sin is death." Henry: "The best land will be a dry land to those that by their rebellion have forfeited the blessing of God, which is the juice and fatness of all our enjoyments."

12. We may feel very easy about going into great trials, even such as passing through a wilderness, if only God be with us, v. 7. He never brings his people into difficulties, but to bring them out again. He never forsakes his loved ones. With his chosen, Christ is ever present.

13. Such grand and awful displays of the divine majesty as were made at Mount Sinai ought not to be forgotten, but frequently mentioned, v. 8.

14. All our valuable supplies are from above, v. 9. Compare Ps. lxxviii. 24, 27; Jas. i. 17. The food of the Israelites was supplied as they needed it, to try and to humble them, Deut. viii. 16. But far richer blessings come on the Gospel church. We have Christ the true bread that came down from heaven, and the Holy Spirit, who is poured out in floods on thirsty souls. We have the antitypes, the substance, the consummation, the glory. We are bound for the heavenly Canaan.

15. It is a grand excellence of true religion that it suits the poor, the afflicted, the humble, v. 10. To such it is real goodness. No unpardoned, unconverted sinner ever dreamed of such blessings and refreshments as every renewed soul experiences.

16. When God speaks the word, the contest is decided, vv. 11, 12; Ecc. ix. 11. God is judge of all. Without him no man, nor thing can stand; with him the feeble is as David, and weak things have power. Calvin: "The mightiest preparations, which the enemies of the Church may make for its destruction, shall be overthrown." All the victories of Israel's armies under David are small and mean, compared with the glorious spiritual victories of the Church under the great Captain of salvation. There are no trophies like souls redeemed from sin, and death, and hell. Arnd: "Is it not a valuable spoil, that so many thousands of men have been converted from heathenism, among whom have been so many glorious teachers and lights of the church, such as Justin, Augustine, Ambrose, not to speak of the innumerable martyrs, brought out of heathenism, and put to death because of their attachment to the Christian faith?"

17. The depth from which, and the height to which God raises those on whom he sets his love, must both be brought into the estimate, if we would judge aright of the divine mercy, v. 13. We go from the pots. We become as doves. We escape hell. We rise to heaven.

18. What a blessing is peace! The prophet compares it to the snow that made Salmon to glisten, v. 14. Dickson: "As a dark, dusky mountain, whereupon groweth no green thing but black heath, is made white, when covered with snow; so is a disgraced, shamed, impoverished, enslaved land made glorious again by a merciful manner of delivery manifesting the Lord's kind respects unto it."

19. No exaltation is like that, which comes from a connection with God and his religion, vv. 15, 16. Mount Sinai, Mount Zion and Mount Calvary are the three most famous mountains on earth, yea, they are and ever will be much spoken of in heaven; yet thousands of peaks and ranges are in themselves more striking and more worthy of note. The reason is that from one, the law was given, on another, was the temple, on the third, sin was expiated.

20. We need not fear that God cannot defend us at all times and in all cases. He has the power. He has the will. He has the resources. He has the agents. He is the Lord of hosts. His armies are numerous and mighty. He has "an innumerable company of angels." And the Lord is among them.

21. Of all the acts and scenes of earth none are so important, none so well worthy of celebration as those connected with the birth, life, death, resurrection and ascension of Christ, v. 18. This theme the prophets often introduce without notice. On this subject they never tire. By bloodshedding Christ redeemed us. By rising from the dead and ascending to heaven we have assurance of his power to save us. Truly the Sabbath, which commemorates Christ's resurrection, ought never to be a fast-day. It is true that "Christ did not enter into his glory without a battle going before, and that with strong and many enemies: and in his fighting he carried the victory, and after his victory he triumphed, first in the cross and then in his ascension, over sin, Satan, the world, hell, the grave and all." Let us never lose sight of Christ.

22. It should never be forgotten, and it should greatly heighten our estimate of Christ's love, that he showed his kindness to his foes—even the rebellious, v. 18. Compare John xv. 13; Rom. v. 8, 10; 1 Pet. iii. 18; 1 John iii. 16.

23. Our praises and thanksgivings should keep pace with the mercies we receive. If God loads us with daily benefits, why should we not daily shout and sing of his love? v. 19.

24. If we are in the right, we have God on our side; and if we have God on our side, we need fear nothing; for he is the God of salvations, of all kinds and varieties of deliverances for his people, vv. 19, 20. Let us walk by faith, not by sight. God has ten thousand ways, unseen and unthought of by us, to save us from trouble and from death. "When Jehovah takes the field, deadly is the battle to his enemies," and glorious is the victory to his friends.

25. It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, v. 21. Surely the Lord would not use such terrific language as he does respecting the doom of sinners, if it were not inconceivably dreadful. Nothing can protect persistent and obstinate offenders from the sword of Divine Justice. Compare Amos ix. 3, 4; Obad. 4.

26. Nothing in nature, respecting God's friends or foes, is beyond his control, v. 22. Bashan and the ocean are alike in the hollow of his hand and exposed to his view.

27. Whatever appearances there may be to the contrary for a season, yet in all cases ultimately God will make his church triumphantly victorious, to the eternal shame of her enemies, v. 23.

28. If any wish to read providence so as to understand it, let them go to the sanctuary, v. 24. God's goings are incomprehensible without the light of the lamp of his house, his blessed word. Compare Ps. lxxiii. 16, 17. As the Shechinah dwelt in the Sanctuary, so does God in answer to the prayers of his people there display his glory, and thence come forth to bless and save his chosen.

29. Our religion should be social and lively, v. 25. Even our most solemn acts of worship should not be gloomy or doleful. And in this joyful service let all unite. Dickson: "Where all receive a benefit, it becometh all the people publicly and solemnly, and with their best expression, as God appointeth, to praise God, and in his worship to see that all things be done orderly." On instrumental music, see REMARKS ON Ps. xxxiii. 2.

30. Though formalists and hypocrites abuse public worship to the neglect of secret devotion, yet public worship is binding, v. 26. All God's people know it to be edifying and comfortable. It is to the pious a great means of promoting the observance of closet duties.

31. In the great work of glorifying God, and maintaining his worship, no tribe, or family, or person is so exalted or obscure, so learned or ignorant, as to be excused from the blessed service, v. 27.

32. We may safely and confidently pray for all that God has commanded or promised, v. 28. We need no other warrant than his word for presenting any petition before him.

33. Two things we ought never to forget. One is that if we have succeeded in our enterprises, on the battle-field, in agriculture, in trade, in preaching God's word, in anything, it was because God commanded our strength, and gave us success. The other is that for the future we are as dependent on divine succor as if we had no experience of the divine kindness in days past, v. 28. Not in our wit or wisdom, not in our experience or ability, not in great captains nor heavy battalions, not in the patronage of kings and governments, not in funds or estates, but in the Lord Jehovah is all our hope and all our salvation.

34. God gets his chief honor on earth, from having amongst us an organized church, a people publicly united in his service, as in the temple, still more in the gospel church, v. 29. She is the light of the world, the salt of the earth, the depository of the truth, the witness for God and Christ, the conservator of good morals, good manners and true religion.

35. There is no army that God cannot rebuke, no armada that he cannot bring to nothing, v. 30. Men may have the best arms, but all will be in vain without God's assistance. Men may be trained to war till they are as fierce as bulls of Bashan, and they may be such a multitude that no man can count them, yet in a moment God can make them destroy each other, and tread each other down as the mire of the streets. Let us not be afraid though an host should encamp against us. Calvin: "In comparing their enemies to the beasts mentioned in v. 30, and taking notice that they delighted in war, it was no doubt David's intention to influence the minds of the people of God to the contrary dispositions of clemency and mercy, as being that frame of spirit in the exercise of which they might expect to receive the divine assistance. The more violently their enemies raged, and the more lawless their attempts might prove, they had only the more reason to expect the interposition of God, who humbles the proud and the mighty ones of this world."

36. It is clear from verse 30 and many passages of Scripture that the love of war, with its scenes of carnage, forms no part of a gracious character. Hatred, and wrath, and strife, and clamor are never pleasant to a child of God. Henry: "David had himself been a man of war, but could appeal to God, that he never delighted in war and bloodshed for its own sake; as for those that did, and would not agree to the fairest terms of peace, he does not doubt but God would scatter them. Those are lost to all the sacred principles of humanity, as well as Christianity, that can delight in war, and take pleasure in contention; let them expect that, sooner or later, they shall have enough of it, Isa. xxxiii. 1; Rev. xiii. 10." Scott: "May the Lord speedily so strengthen his cause upon earth, that all the proud, idolatrous and oppressive,—all that delight in war, or maintain opposition to his church, may be scattered and brought down; that all kings and nations may share the blessings of his Gospel, and sing praises to his name." Amen and amen.

37. Ever since the propagation of the true religion, and especially since the promulgation of Christianity remarkable changes have been going on in the world, and marvels of mercy have been displayed. For a long time there were powerful and flourishing churches in Egypt and Ethiopia, v. 31. There shall be again. There are now thousands of Christians on earth, who were born idolaters, and some of them cannibals. Divine grace has lost none of its saving energy.

38. All flesh should and shall praise God. Mighty kingdoms are no exception, v. 32. Pure Christianity shall yet wonderfully and widely prevail on the earth. God has promised it and he will surely bring it to pass. When this shall be, rests with him; but it shall surely be. When that event shall take place, the worship of false gods will utterly cease.

39. Let us never forget that God is exalted, v. 33. Nothing more infallibly marks worship as base than lack of profound reverence for the divine majesty. The Lord rideth upon the heavens. We are worms crawling upon earth.

40. God is strong; God alone is strong; God is so strong that he cannot be resisted, v. 34. Ascribe to him strength as ye do to nothing else. Angels have strength, but it is all derived and limited. He is the author of life and all our mercies.

41. God is majestic. He is highly exalted. His excellency is over Israel, v. 34. None is high as God is high.

42. God is holy. His presence makes a place holy, v. 34. Without him nothing is holy. His holiness is a consuming fire. Henry: "No attribute of God is more dreadful to sinners than his holiness." And no attribute of God is more rejoiced in by unfallen angels and redeemed men than his holiness.

43. It has often been found that to none is God more terrible than to those, who in their health and prosperity affected to be incapable of fear, v. 35. This will appear in the most signal manner in the last day.

44. If we have any strength or success, let us never forget that it is all from God, v. 35. It is only he that makes strong the arms of the hands of his people. Scott: "While all unite in ascribing power and dominion unto him, may all experience strength communicated from him, enabling them to resist temptation, and to overcome every enemy of his salvation." What God is and has, he is and has for his people's good.

45. Blessed be God, v. 35. "If all be from him, let all be to him."

PSALM LXIX.

To the chief Musician upon Shoshannim, A Psalm of David.

- 1 Save me, O God; for the waters are come in unto my soul.
- 2 I sink in deep mire, where there is no standing: I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow me.
- 3 I am weary of my crying: my throat is dried: mine eyes fail while I wait for my God.
- 4 They that hate me without a cause are more than the hairs of mine head: they that would destroy me, being mine enemies wrongfully, are mighty: then I restored that which I took not away.
- 5 O God, thou knowest my foolishness; and my sins are not hid from thee.
- 6 Let not them that wait on thee, O Lord God of hosts, be ashamed for my sake: let not those that seek thee be confounded for my sake, O God of Israel.
- 7 Because for thy sake I have borne reproach; shame hath covered my face.
- 8 I am become a stranger unto my brethren, and an alien unto my mother's children.
- 9 For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up; and the reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen upon me.
- 10 When I wept, and chastened my soul with fasting, that was to my reproach.
- 11 I made sackcloth also my garment; and I became a proverb to them.
- 12 They that sit in the gate speak against me; and I was the song of the drunkards.
- 13 But as for me, my prayer is unto thee, O LORD, in an acceptable time: O God, in the multitude of thy mercy hear me, in the truth of thy salvation.
- 14 Deliver me out of the mire, and let me not sink: let me be delivered from them that hate me, and out of the deep waters.
- 15 Let not the waterflood overflow me, neither let the deep swallow me up, and let not the pit shut her mouth upon me.
- 16 Hear me, O LORD; for thy lovingkindness is good: turn unto me according to the multitude of thy tender mercies.
- 17 And hide not thy face from thy servant; for I am in trouble: hear me speedily.
- 18 Draw nigh unto my soul, and redeem it: deliver me because of mine enemies.
- 19 Thou hast known my reproach, and my shame, and my dishonour: mine adversaries are all before thee.
- 20 Reproach hath broken my heart; and I am full of heaviness: and I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none.
- 21 They gave me also gall for my meat; and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink.
- 22 Let their table become a snare before them: and that which should have been for their welfare, let it become a trap.
- 23 Let their eyes be darkened, that they see not; and make their loins continually to shake.
- 24 Pour out thine indignation upon them, and let thy wrathful anger take hold of them.
- 25 Let their habitation be desolate; and let none dwell in their tents.
- 26 For they persecute him whom thou hast smitten; and they talk to the grief of those whom thou hast wounded.
- 27 Add iniquity unto their iniquity: and let them not come into thy righteousness.
- 28 Let them be blotted out of the book of the living, and not be written with the righteous.
- 29 But I am poor and sorrowful: let thy salvation, O God, set me up on high.
- 30 I will praise the name of God with a song, and will magnify him with thanksgiving.
- 31 This also shall please the LORD better than an ox or bullock that hath horns and hoofs.
- 32 The humble shall see this, and be glad: and your heart shall live that seek God.
- 33 For the LORD heareth the poor, and despiseth not his prisoners.
- 34 Let the heaven and earth praise him, the seas, and everything that moveth therein.
- 35 For God will save Zion, and will build the cities of Judah, that they may dwell there, and have it in possession.
- 36 The seed also of his servant shall inherit it: and they that love his name shall dwell therein.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xi. xlv. That David wrote this Psalm is admitted by the title and the great mass of commentators, and is declared by Paul, Rom. xi. 9. It is idle to spend time in answering men who claim for it a much later origin. It is in vain to seek for it a historic occasion. It is very decidedly Messianic. The only question is, whether it is directly and fully prophetic or Typical-Messianic. There is no valid objection to the admission that in some parts David, as a sufferer, speaks as a type of Christ, and that in others he rises to the height of unqualified prediction respecting Messiah. Verse 4 is cited in John xv. 25; v. 9, in John ii. 17; Rom. xv. 3; v. 21, in Matt. xxvii. 34, 48; Mark xv. 23; John xix. 28, 29; vv. 22, 23, in Rom. xi. 9, 10; and v. 25, in Acts i. 16, 20. Sound commentators generally admit that it has its fulfilment in Christ. Theodore: "It is a prediction of the sufferings of Christ, and the final destruction of the Jews on that account." Calvin: "David wrote this inspired ode, not so much in his own name, as in the name of the whole church of whose head he was an eminent type." Vitringa: "It is admitted among Christians, that in the sixty-ninth Psalm Christ, and Christ as a sufferer, is to be placed before our eyes. We add, that it refers to Christ crucified as the Evangelists Matthew, Mark and John apply it." Fabritius: "In this Psalm David is a figure of Christ." Alexander: "The only individual in whom the traits meet is Christ." Hodge: "This Psalm is so frequently quoted and applied to Christ in the New Testament, that it must be considered as directly prophetic." Similar remarks might be cited from Gill, Anderson, Scott and others. Calvin's first remark on this Psalm is: "There is a close resemblance between this and the xxii. Psalm." Many others have observed the likeness. This is a composition of great beauty and poetic excellence. Scott dates it B. C. 1021. The names of the Most High in it are Elohim God, Adonai Lord and Jehovah LORD, on which respectively see on Ps. iii. 2; ii. 4; i. 2.

1. Save me, O God; for the waters are come in unto my soul. Waters, a favorite emblem of Scripture for overwhelming distress; see on Ps. xlii. 7. Compare Ps. lxxxiii. 10; lxxxviii. 7. As David was not a faint-hearted, but a truly heroic man, we may conceive how heavy must have been the pressure of his load of grief to make him cry so bitterly. If we apply these words to Christ, who had neither remorse nor despair, and was incapable of either, what a conception they give us of the dreadful load of human hatred, diabolical malice and divine wrath which he bore. The type and antitype each felt that his case was beyond any effectual aid from man; hence the cry: Save, help, rescue, deliver me. See on Ps. iii. 7; xii. 1. Gill: "The petitioner is Christ; not as a divine person, as such he is blessed forever, and stands in no need of help and assistance; but as man, and in distressed and suffering circumstances." That Jesus felt the deepest distress and offered the humblest and most earnest prayers is sufficiently declared in Scripture, Matt. xxvi. 39; John xii. 27; Heb. v. 7. The great troubles of David and of Christ were in the soul or heart. Hengstenberg: "When one is covered over with water, the water comes into his soul."

2. I sink in deep mire where there is no standing. Mire, here only and in Ps. xl. 2, where it is rendered miry. The figure is of turbid waters in a river or sea, probably the latter. Deep, rendered depths in Ps. lxxviii. 22; Mic. vii. 19; in Zech. x. 11 deeps; literally mire of the deep. The sea, when troubled, often casts up mire and dirt, Is. lvii. 20. When one finds himself in such thick waters, and can reach no bottom, get no footing, nothing solid to stand upon, it is all over with him, unless he can get help from another. I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow me. Deep waters, as in v. 14. Deep, a noun, commonly rendered depths, Ps. cxxx. 1; Isa. li. 10; Ezek. xxvii. 34. Here the overflowing is distinctly expressed. The verbs sink and come in Hebrew are in the preterite. The trial had lasted some time and was not yet over. The language expresses the wild confusion arising from great distress. Horne: "The divine displeasure, like a stormy tempest, was let loose upon him; the sins of the world as deep mire enclosed and detained him; whilst all the waters of affliction went over his head and penetrated to his vitals."

3. I am weary of my crying. With crying would better give the sense. It does not mean that he was tired of earnest prayer; but that he had prayed so long, so earnestly and under such distress of mind that his nature was exhausted. Although he had found no relief, yet he persevered. What else could he do? My throat is dried. Calvin gives the sense, My throat is become hoarse with crying. Throat, also rendered neck or mouth, Isa. iii. 16; Ezek. xvi. 11; Ps. cxlix. 6. Mine eyes fail while I wait for my God. When we long watch for a messenger whom we expect by a given road, and he does not come into view, the eyes become weary. Cresswell: "The metaphor is taken from the pain occasioned to the eyes when they are long and intently fixed upon the same point." Fail, elsewhere faint, are consumed. It is applied to the eyes, to the flesh, to the heart, to the soul, to the spirit, to the life, Ps. xxxi. 10; lxxiii. 26; lxxxiv. 2; cxix. 81, 82, 123; cxliii. 7; Jer. xiv. 6; Lam. ii. 11. Calvin: "Although his bodily senses failed him, the vigor of his faith was by no means extinguished." While I wait for my God. Painters have endeavored to give us a conception of Christ's wan and agonized countenance in the garden and on the cross; and sometimes they have made us shudder; but none of them have ever succeeded in doing justice to the subject. There never was such thirst as Christ had; no eyes ever failed as his; because none ever bore such wrath as he bore, Ps. xxii. 14, 15; Zech. xiii. 7.

4. They that hate me without a cause are more than the hairs of mine head. This clause is applied to himself by our Saviour, John xv. 23-25. There is a like clause in Ps. xxxv. 19, on which see. David had foes; Christ had more. For an explanation of the phrase more than the hairs of mine head, see on Ps. xl. 12. It is equivalent to innumerable. They that would destroy me, being mine enemies wrongfully, are mighty. He had said his foes were many. Here he says they are mighty. There was no doing anything with them. They pursued their course out of hatred, and their hatred was without a cause, and so was itself wrongful. A discerning man is always sorry when one without provocation does him a wrong; for he is sure the thing will not stop there. Conscious guilt will beget hatred towards the injured, and thus another wrong will follow. Poor human nature without God's Spirit decides thus: "I have injured a man, therefore I hate him." Whoever knew a man to do one deliberate injury and there stop, unless by divine grace he became penitent? If I have wronged a man I can apologize, or ask pardon, or make restitution; but how can I deal with a man, to whom I owe no apology, who is malignant and obstinate? David often for himself declares truly that he had done nothing to merit at the hands of men the treatment he received, Ps. xxxv. 7, 19; xxxviii. 19, 20. It is better to suffer undeservedly, than deservedly, 1 Pet. ii. 19-21; iv. 13-16. But we ought to see to it that we lie not, when we protest our innocence. Enemies wrongfully; Calvin renders it lying adversaries; and Hengstenberg, lying enemies. They fabricated grounds of their own hatred, and on these they endeavored to induce others to hate him. This was true of David's foes. It was much more true of Christ's enemies. Then I restored that which I took not away. The meaning is, 'I have been treated as if I were a cheat, a thief, or a robber, when I am wholly innocent. I have wronged no man.' Patrick: "I have been so far from provoking their malice, that I am content, rather than quarrel with them, to part with my own right; and make satisfaction for a wrong that I never did them." The verse is parallel to Ps. xxxv. 11. David had sad experience of false accusations, 2 Sam. xvi. 8. The particular matter here referred to is not stated. Walford: "There is an apparent impropriety in the language of this clause, though the sense is perfectly clear. It is a proverbial expression, to mark the injustice and extortion of the enemies that are referred to, who compelled the speaker, without any right, to yield up his goods to persons to whom he was not indebted." We all know how often our Saviour was wrongfully accused. Some apply this passage directly to him. Diodati: "I am guiltless, though I am used as if I were guilty. It is spoken of Christ, meaning that he who was just suffered for us men, who were unjust, Isa. liii. 4-6; 1 Pet. iii. 18." Gill: "Christ satisfied justice he had never injured, though others had; he fulfilled a law and bore the penalty of it, which he never broke; he made satisfaction for sins he never committed; and brought in a righteousness he had not taken away; and provided a better inheritance than was lost by Adam." Scott: "Then did the Lord Jesus make restitution for our robbery, and satisfaction for our crimes, and restored to the divine law that honor which he had not taken away. David indeed was hated wrongfully, and in many things receded from his right: but the whole and especially the concluding words were far more emphatically verified in Christ." Horsley says, the meaning is, "I have been accountable for the crimes of others." Anderson: "This pre-eminently applies to Christ, who was perfectly holy, but who, by bearing the punishment due to the guilt of man, made satisfaction to divine justice for sins, which he never committed, and restored those blessings which he never took away." Others might be quoted to the same effect.

5. O God, thou knowest my foolishness; and my sins are not hid from thee. We get no light on this passage by the various renderings. Nor is there any reason for taking foolishness in the sense of simplicity of character. The original is never used in a good sense. Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander regard these words as David's confession of sin before God. This is simple and natural. Tholuck: "It is one of the wiles of Satan, that man, when persecuted with unmerited reproaches, becomes more prone to delude himself as to his real guilt. Not so David. He ignores righteousness before the Lord, though he may courageously show his face to man." One, who may be free from all the charges man brings against him, may for good cause deeply abase himself before God. Calvin, Diodati, Piscator, Patrick, Boothroyd and Morison, regard the words as a simple appeal to omniscience for his innocence. This is not very natural or good. But hear Calvin: "As a means of preserving himself from succumbing under the perverse judgments of men, David appeals to God as the judge of his cause; and possessing as he did the approving testimony of a good conscience, he regards in a great measure with indifference the unjust estimate which men might form of his character." Diodati: "Thou knowest whether I be guilty of those faults which are laid to me or no." Those, who take the clause as a protestation of innocence, are not agreed whether Christ or David only is to be regarded as the speaker. Calvin and Patrick apply it to David only. But Morison applies it to Christ. Augustine, Gill, Horne, Horsley and Fry regard Christ as the speaker, and suppose that he is stating his sufferings for the sins and follies of men, made his by imputation. Horsley: "The Messiah here may speak of the follies and crimes of men, for which he had made himself answerable as his own." The strongest Scripture language supporting this interpretation is Isa. liii. 4-6; 2 Cor. v. 21. There is great room for doubt whether this view is correct. The Scriptures never speak of Christ as suffering for his sins, but always for our sins. See preliminary observation No. 2, on Ps. xl. Scott: "Perhaps it should be explained as the language of the type, rather than of the antitype." Like Ps. xl. this whole Psalm cannot be fairly made a simple and direct prophecy respecting Christ. Patrick's paraphrase is: "O GOD, the righteous Judge, I make my appeal to thee, who knowest the very worst of me: and protest, that whatsoever my mistakes or my wilful sins have been, which cannot escape thy sight, I never did them [my enemies] any injury, nor give them cause to persecute me."

6. Let not them that wait on thee, O Lord GOD of hosts, be ashamed for my sake: let not those that seek thee be confounded for my sake, O God of Israel. The appeal is to the self-existent, independent, eternal and unchangeable Ruler of the universe, who is a God of might, has all resources, and hears prayer. Compare Ps. xxv. 3. Ashamed and confounded, see on Ps. vi. 10; xxii. 5; xxv. 3; xxxv. 4; xl. 14. It is lawful to appeal to God to preserve his honor untarnished in the eyes of good men. "Do not disgrace the throne of thy glory," Jer. xiv. 21. Compare Ex. xxxii. 11, 12; Num. xiv. 13-16. Such argument is never powerless. To good people, who wait on him, and seek him God will never give cause to distrust him, or to question his faithfulness. We may at a glance see how fatal to Christian hope it would have been for God in one clear case to have given the ultimate victory to sin and sinners. Sure hope and pious confidence would have given up the ghost, if David had perished in the Sauline persecutions; or if Christ had continued under the power of death.

7. Because for thy sake I have borne reproach; shame hath covered my face. The two clauses are parallel, and give the reason for the prayer in v. 6. It was not on his own account but on God's account that he endured shame. He professed belief in God's promises, and for that was despised. This was true of David. It was true of Christ! Isa. l. 6. For avowing fealty to God, and confidence in the fulfilment of all he had promised they were both persecuted with deadly malice. Calvin: "Reproach is more bitter to an honorable man, than to suffer a hundred deaths. For many will be found ready to suffer death, who cannot bear reproach."

8. I am become a stranger unto my brethren, and an alien unto my mother's children. By brethren we may understand any blood relations; by mother's children those most endeared to us; see on Ps. l. 20. The anguish of being disowned by those, whose friendship ought to have been reliable, cannot be easily estimated. Compare Ps. xxvii. 10; xxxviii. 11. How much of such anguish Jesus bore may be learned from Isa. liii. 3; John i. 11; vii. 5; viii. 48, and parallel passages.

9. For the zeal of thine house hath eaten me up. See a like clause in Ps. cxix. 139. Zeal, often so rendered, Isa. xxxvii. 32; lix. 17; more commonly jealousy, Ps. lxxix. 5; Isa. xlii. 13; Ezek. xxxvi. 5; Zech. i. 14; viii. 2. The true application is given in John ii. 14-17. No doubt David had a genuine and burning though imperfect zeal for the church; but our Saviour's zeal did eat him up. And the reproaches of them that reproach thee are fallen upon me. This is by infallible authority applied to Christ, Rom. xv. 3. Hodge: "Such was my zeal for thee, that the reproaches cast on thee I felt as if directed against myself." It is impossible to dishonor God without dishonoring his Son, John x. 30; xiv. 11; xvi. 15. The unity of Christ and of the Father is perfect. Patrick's paraphrase is, "I could not endure the blasphemies which I heard against thee, but they moved my indignation as much as if they had been against myself." The noun and verb rendered reproach are cognate. The noun is rendered with entire uniformity; see on Ps. xv. 3. The verb is in the Psalms uniformly rendered; in other books sometimes rail or defy, 2 Chron. xxxii. 17; 2 Sam. xxiii. 9. It expresses contumely, scorn, reviling. If David was grieved with blasphemies against God (2 Sam. xii. 14;) Christ much more.

10. When I wept and chastened my soul with fasting, that was to my reproach. For I wept and chastened my soul, the Syriac and Arabic have I humbled my soul with fasting; Calvin: And I wept, my soul fasted; Ainsworth: And I wept, with fasting afflicted my soul; Fry: I wept away my soul in fasting; Green: When I humble myself with fasting; Alexander: And I wept (away) my soul or wept myself away, in fasting. The sense is, When I wept, and, as an act of humiliation of my soul, fasted; see on Ps. xxxv. 13. Weeping and fasting go together, 2 Sam. xii. 16-22. It is sad indeed when even acts of piety and humiliation are ground of new reproaches. When everything a man does is perverted by his foes, he is in great temptation, and none but God can sustain him. How Christ's enemies perverted even his most benevolent deeds, as well as his acts of piety all the gospels declare.

11. I made sackcloth also my garment. The three chief outward tokens of grief common among the Israelites were weeping, fasting and covering the person with coarse cloth, to which some added dust and ashes; see on Ps. xxx. 11; xxxv. 13. To him that is afflicted pity should be shown; but when David and Christ were most afflicted even for the sins and calamities of men, they had no sympathy from the wicked, but were for a derision. And I became a proverb to them. Proverb, parable, similitude, in a bad sense a taunting speech, as in the margin in Isa. xiv. 4, or by-word, as in Ps. xlv. 14.

12. They that sit in the gate speak against me. Those, who sit in the gate, are judges, Job xxix. 7-17; Deut. xxv. 7; Josh. xx. 4; Ruth iv. 1, 2; 1 Kings xxii. 10; Lam. v. 14. The gates of cities were the places of judgment. Calvin: "Had David been molested only by vulgar buffoons and the refuse of the people, it would have been more easily endured; for it is not surprising when mean persons, who have no regard to what is becoming and honorable, degrade themselves by indulging in defamation without shame. But when the very judges, forgetful of what is demanded by the dignity of their office, abandon themselves to the same audacious conduct, the iniquity and baseness of it are greatly aggravated." The judicial proceedings against Jesus Christ were a disgrace to human nature. All have not so explained these words. Rosenmüller: "They that sit in the gate—vain and idle persons who spent their time there, where there used to be a confluence of people." Tholuck: "They sit in the gates where idlers assemble." Cresswell: "They that sit in the gate; i. e., the elders. The expression may, however, be put for the crowd assembled there to hear the decisions of the magistrates." Alexander: "It seems more natural to make the sitters in the gate mean simply those frequenting public places." This is answered by Calvin: "Although men of every rank and condition assembled at the gates, yet none but the judges and counsellors sat there." In Deut. xxv. 7, the Chaldee interprets gate to mean the gate of the house of judgment; and in Ruth iv. 1, to mean the gate of the house of Judgment of Sanhedrim. And I was the song of the drunkards. Some think this clause points to those, who had wealth and were able to purchase costly liquors. But the more correct opinion is that it designates the dregs of society, who had been degraded by drunkenness, and kindred vices. Patrick explains it "of the idle and dissolute companions, who, in their drunken meetings, make abusive songs and libels on me;" Tholuck, of the "inns where drunkards meet, (Job xxx. 9), gossiping and singing away the conscientious scruples, which the sight of a man, who weeps over the sins of the race, might possibly have aroused." The margin, more literal than the text, for drunkards has drinkers of strong drink. Chrysostom says the peculiar liquor here named was made of the juice of the palm-tree. The word occurs more than twenty times in the Hebrew Scriptures, and is invariably rendered strong drink except in this place, and in Num. xxviii. 7, strong wine. The Hebrew is that from which the Greeks and Latins took their word Sicera, which Ainsworth defines as embracing all manner of strong drink except wine. In Scripture this strong drink is carefully distinguished from wine, Lev. x. 9; Num. vi. 3; Deut. xiv. 26; Judg. xiii. 4, 7, 14; Pr. xx. 1; Mic. ii. 11. There is no evidence that the mean and drugged intoxicating liquors of the east were beyond the reach of the poor. How ribaldry prevailed amongst high and low against the Lord of glory during his sojourn on earth we all know, Matt. xi.

19; Luke vii. 34. While the wicked were thus raging and insulting, he, whom they hated and reviled, was very differently occupied :

13. But as for me, my prayer is unto thee, O LORD, in an acceptable time. Almost the only resource left the persecuted and innocent sufferer is his access to the throne of the heavenly grace. Tyrants cannot close that fountain of refreshment. Prayer, always so rendered; see on Ps. iv. 1; vi. 9. The time acceptable is the time of God's good pleasure, the time of favor, the time of his good will. If we would pray so as to be heard and answered, we must pray at such time as God appoints, not when it is too late, not when life is ended. So some understand it. Others connect it with the next clause, and make the speaker refer the time of answer to God's sovereign will. So that it would read: In the time that pleases thee hear me. The sense is good. The English text is best. O God, in the multitude of thy mercy hear me, in the truth of thy salvation. Hear, i. e., answer, give what is sought. This he asked of the multitude, abundance, greatness, or plenty of God's mercy, goodness, kindness, merciful kindness, or lovingkindness. He also asked for these blessings in the truth of God's salvation. Truth, the opposite of fiction, faithlessness, deception, falsehood. The truth of God's salvation is the truth which he has provided and promised to secure salvation to such as trust in him, Isa. xlix. 8; lv. 6; lxi. 2; 2 Cor. vi. 2. Salvation of the same root as save in v. 1.

14. Deliver me out of the mire, and let me not sink. Mire, not the same as in v. 2, but dirt in Ps. xviii. 42, and clay in Ps. xl. 2. It is rendered dirt in Isa. lvii. 20; clay in Isa. xli. 25; and five or six times mire, as in Mic. vii. 10; Zech. ix. 3; x. 5. In vv. 14, 15, there is no doubt a reviving of the figurative language of vv. 1, 2. Deliver, as in Ps. vii. 1. Let me be delivered from them that hate me, and out of the deep waters. All the terms have been explained in previous verses. This clause gives the true sense of that next preceding.

15. Let not the waterflood overflow me, neither let the deep swallow me up. Overflow, as in v. 2. Swallow, as in Ps. xxi. 9, and commonly; in Ps. lv. 9, destroy. Deep, as in v. 2. And let not the pit shut her mouth upon me. Calvin: "Let not the great multitude and weight of my afflictions overwhelm me, and let not sorrow swallow me up." Tholuck: "David prays that the one vista of the bright heavens above might not be stopped, that the pit might not shut its mouth over him."

16. Hear me, O LORD, for thy lovingkindness is good. Hear, as in vv. 13, 17. Lovingkindness, in v. 13, mercy. Good, pleasant, rich, precious. Turn unto me according to the multitude of thy tender mercies. Turn, elsewhere have respect, look, regard. Averting the face expresses displeasure or neglect; so looking to one expresses favorable regard. See on Ps. xxv. 16; xl. 4. Multitude of tender mercies, see on Ps. li. 1. The distress expressed in the petitions of this verse is very great.

17. Hide not thy face from thy servant. See on Ps. xliii. 1; xxvii. 9. The hidden face of God deeply distresses the soul, whether it relates to the aspects of providence, or to sensible communion with him. For I am in trouble. Trouble, as in Ps. iii. 1; iv. 1. Hear me speedily. Hear, as in vv. 13, 16. Speedily, hastily, suddenly, shortly, swiftly. Margin: Make haste to hear me.

18. Draw nigh unto my soul, and redeem it. To the eye of sense, judging from appearances, it seemed as if God had withdrawn to a distance and left the sufferer to the power of his foes. Hence the earnest request that he would come near unto his soul and deliver it, for it was in great peril. As long as we may lawfully call on God, and can exercise faith, our affairs are not desperate. Deliver me because of mine enemies. The enemies had brought things to a state, from which none but God could deliver. It was therefore a fitting occasion for the display of his justice, power and grace. Or it means that if God would deliver him, it would teach a lasting lesson of wisdom to his enemies. Hengstenberg regards Ps. xiii. 4 as parallel.

19. Thou hast known my reproach, and my shame, and my dishonour. If the passage is spoken of David, we know what contumely was heaped upon him in the time of Saul and of the rebellion. If it is spoken of Christ, we have parallel passages in Ps. xxii. 6, 7; Isa. liii. 3; Heb. xii. 2. Reproach and shame, commonly so rendered. Dishonor, more frequently rendered shame, reproach, confusion. Mine adversaries are all before thee, i. e., their number, power and malice, with all their devices, are known to thee, q. d., 'Nothing in my case in any of its relations is hidden from the all-seeing eye, although for the present he seems to leave me to the power of my enemies.' Calvin: "Lord, thou knowest how, like a poor sheep, I am surrounded by thousands of wolves." Alexander: "The conviction that God knows all involves a persuasion that he will do justice to both parties." Hengstenberg: "It is a great consolation in unmerited sufferings, when reflections on the omniscience of God take full possession of the soul." The verse doubtless has its principal fulfilment in Christ, and, together with several verses following, is best interpreted by those portions of the Gospels, which narrate his sufferings near the close of life.

20. Reproach hath broken my heart. Upon this expression a modern writer has founded a theory respecting the physical causes of the death of Christ, viz., that he died of a broken heart, i. e., that grief and pain burst his heart. But all this is set aside by the fact that Jesus Christ did not die of exhaustion, but by a voluntary surrender of his life. Just before expiring he cried with a loud, strong voice, and then dismissed his own soul. The passages of Scripture establishing this position are sufficient, Matt. xxvii. 50; Mark xv. 37; Luke xxiii. 46; John x. 11, 18; xix. 30. Although the phrase yielded up the ghost or gave up the ghost occurs often in our English Bible, yet neither in the Septuagint, nor in the Greek Testament is there found such a phrase applied to any mere man as that used by Matthew or that used by John respecting Christ. Mark and Luke, rendered literally, say, He expired; John, he delivered up the spirit; and Matthew, he dismissed the spirit. It is unaccountable that our version should have rendered these and like phrases in the Hebrew all in the same words, so that Sapphira is made to leave the world even as Christ. Doddridge well says that Christ's words in John x. 18, the language of Matthew, and the strong cry which so much impressed the centurion show that Jesus "died by the voluntary act of his own mind, according to the power received from the Father, and in a way peculiar to himself, by which he alone, of all men that ever existed, could have continued alive, even in the greatest tortures, as long as he pleased, or have retired from the body whenever he thought fit." Jesus died like the Prince of life. Reproach may become an intolerable burden. To Christ's pure and holy mind the vile accusations against him were in the highest degree afflicting and grievous. A broken heart is in Scripture a figure for great and violent anguish of mind, Ps. li. 17. And I am full of heaviness. In the Hebrew the whole phrase is expressed by one word variously rendered; I am afflicted; I am quite dejected; I faint with sickness; I am sick. Tholuck: "The reproach, which had broken his heart, also crushed his body." And I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none. Looked, tarried, waited. Take pity, be sorry, bemoan. Comforters, a participle often so rendered. Horne: "In the extremity of his passion, Christ was left alone, without a comforter, a friend, or an attendant; while all that were round about him studied to infuse every bitter and acrimonious ingredient into his cup of sorrow." Even his apostles 'could not watch with him one hour.' He was betrayed by one, denied by another, forsaken by all. He trod the wine-press alone, and of the people there was none with him. Christ's death was solitary. Even his Father hid his face from him. David was never so forsaken by all.

21. They gave me also gall for my meat; and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink. Meat, food, nourishment, here only. Thirst, always so rendered. Taken literally we know of nothing in the life of David corresponding to these words. If we take them figuratively, we know his foes dealt out to him the bitterness or sourness of malice. But these words find a literal fulfilment in Christ, as we learn from infallible authority, Matt. xxvii. 34, 48; Mark xv. 23. There were two, if not three, periods in the agony of our Lord when some liquid was offered him. First they offered him vinegar (always so rendered) mingled with gall (a word found only in Matt. xxvii. 34; Acts viii. 23.) In the second they gave him simply vinegar, (the same word is used as before) but there is no mention of any addition to it, Matt. xxvii. 48. In the third they gave him wine, the word always so rendered in the New Testament, Matt. ix. 17; John ii. 3, 9, 10; 1 Tim. v. 23, mingled with myrrh, a name applied to an aromatic balsam. It is impossible to reconcile all the accounts thus given in the gospels with the idea that drink was offered to the dying Saviour but once. The vinegar may have been that in common use among the Roman soldiers. The wine and myrrh may have been good wine spiced. Both of these may have been suited to alleviate suffering. But the vinegar mingled with gall was certainly offered in derision or despite. In this Psalm it is noticed in sad complaint, and not as an act of kindness. One evangelist expressly says that once drink was offered in mockery, Luke xxiii. 36. Because the Scripture cannot be broken, the potion was actually given in any other temper than that of love. The word rendered gall occurs eleven times in the Hebrew Bible. It is eight times rendered gall, once poison, once venom, and once hemlock. This gall is not that on the liver of animals, but that which grows on a root or plant, Deut. xxix. 18. In the judgment of our translators it was a poisonous herb, probably a powerful narcotic. See marginal rendering of Deut. xxix. 18; xxxii. 33; Job xx. 16; Hos. x. 4. Vinegar, uniformly rendered. It occurs but a few times. Christ's enemies treated him cruelly, and his outward sufferings were but a fit emblem of the bitterness of his soul.

22. Let their table become a snare unto them: and that which should have been for their welfare, let it become a trap. This verse is clearly connected with the next three, so that the right use of one being ascertained, we know the application of the others. Christ applied to his scornful countrymen the twenty-fifth verse, and this goes with it. Paul makes the same application of this verse and the next, Rom. xi. 9, 10; so that we have the key to the right exposition. In the Hebrew of vv. 22-25 the future and the imperative are both used, though our version employs only the imperative. See Introduction, § 6. Whatever the form of the verb, it is clearly the language of prediction. Augustine: "These things are not said by way of wishing, but, under the form of wishing, by way of prophecy." Christ prayed for, not against his murderers, Luke xxiii. 34. The prediction in the first clause is that their table, their most ordinary and necessary enjoyments shall lose their pleasantness and involve them in trouble, as a snare does the animal caught in it. If the common version of the last clause of this verse is correct, then the Hebrew is very elliptical. The Chaldee renders it: And let their sacrifices be for an offence. Hammond thinks this gives the true sense, understanding by sacrifices, victims, or peace-offerings. Edwards: And [let] their sumptuous feasts prove a trap to them; Hengstenberg renders it: And [let] their peace [be] their fall; Alexander: And to those secure, thinking themselves safe, (let it be for or become) a trap. Welfare, in the plural, welfares, prosperities. In the singular the word is commonly rendered peace. Snare, sometimes gin. Trap, uniformly rendered.

23. Let their eyes be darkened, that they see not. This verse is quoted by Paul in application to the Jews, who rejected the gospel, Rom. xi. 10. Parallels are found in Isa. vi. 9, 10; John xii. 39, 40; 2 Cor. iii. 14. The darkening is spiritual. Those who have fought against Christ and his church, have always been void of understanding. There is no wise way of doing a foolish thing. The longer the Jews reject Messiah, the grosser is the darkness surrounding them. And make their loins continually to shake. Paul quotes the Septuagint literally: And bow down their back always. The strength of man and beast is very much in the loins. Whoever is weak in the back is fit for no hard service. Alexander: "And their loins do thou cause to bend, give way, or swerve, i. e., paralyze their strength." To take strength from the loins is to render one helpless.

24. Pour out thine indignation upon them, and let thy wrathful anger take hold of them. Indignation, often so rendered, also anger, rage. Anger, often so rendered, also wrath. Wrathful, in Hebrew a noun, rendered fierceness, wrath, fierce wrath, sore displeasure, used as an adjective, fierce. The whole verse is a prediction of the sorest punishments from the hand of Jehovah.

25. Let their habitation be desolate. This clause is quoted by Christ in his lament over Jerusalem, and applied to the Jewish nation, showing its prophetic character, Matt. xxiii. 37, 38. It is also quoted by Peter and applied to Judas Iscariot, Acts i. 16-20. He speaks of it as a prophecy: "This Scripture must needs be fulfilled." These things show that the common form of prediction is no just cause of offence. No doubt it foretells the awful doom of all those who malignantly reject the gospel and despise the person of the Mediator. The Jews and Judas were representative men, and as such the clause is applied to them. And let none dwell in their tents. This is a repetition of the prediction of the first clause, and refers to the loss of their own land by the unbelieving Jews, and, together with the first, predicts the evils that should fall on the posterity of such as wilfully and finally reject Christ and the authority of God, Ex. xx. 5; Isa. xiv. 20, 21.

26. For they persecute him whom thou hast smitten; and they talk to the grief of those whom thou hast wounded. The course they pursued was inhuman, and utterly opposite to the law of kindness, Job vi. 14; xix. 21. There is much difficulty in making application of this passage to any given period in the life of David. But it is easy to apply it to Christ, for "we did esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted. He was wounded for our transgressions," Isa. liii. 4, 5; Zech. xiii. 6, 7. When the Shepherd was smitten, the sheep were scattered. The cruelty shown to Christ was as a sword piercing the soul of his mother and of every pious spectator. The talk of these persons was harsh and scornful. Horsley renders: "And [they] have added to the anguish of those who are wounded of thee."

27. Add iniquity unto their iniquity. The ancient versions do all sustain this rendering; so do Calvin, Hengstenberg, Alexander and others. Green and Edwards: Let them commit iniquity upon iniquity; church of England: Let them fall from one wickedness to another; Ainsworth: Add sin unto their sin, i. e., Give them over to a reprobate mind. Clarke thinks it means, "Treat their perverseness with perverseness:—act in thy judgments as crookedly towards them, as they dealt crookedly towards thee. They shall get, in the way of punishment, what they have dealt out in the way of oppression." Horsley: Give them punishment upon punishment. The word rendered iniquity occurs in the Hebrew Bible nearly ninety times. In a majority of cases it denotes moral evil; but also the fruit of sin, vanity, affliction, mourning, sorrow. If by it we understand sorrow, or affliction, then the sense is that God will surely multiply their sorrows and mournings. But does not God sometimes punish one iniquity by leaving a man to commit another? Muis: "God is used to punish sins with new sins." Hammond has shown that the word rendered add does not necessarily mean more than permit; and we know God does suffer the wicked to do wickedly. Calvin thinks the sense is, Let their wickedness increase more and more. Bossuet says that by deserting the wicked, and by suffering them, though not by acting upon them, God lets them add sin to sin. That God may in wrath give men over to a reprobate mind is expressly taught, Ps. cix. 6-20; Rom. i. 28; 2 Thess. ii. 11, 12. Tholuck: "It is the curse of sin to beget new sin." And let them not come into thy righteousness. Horsley: Admit them not to thy justification; Diodati: "Let them have no share of that righteousness which thou shalt manifest in thy gospel, in grace and justification of sinners;" Alexander: "The righteousness of God is that which he bestows by the judicial act of justification, including pardon." Calvin thinks this clause of v. 27 cuts off all hope and declares the absence of all desire of amendment of life, of repentance unto salvation. Where there is no justification, there is surely no sanctification.

28. Let them be blotted out of the book of the living, and not be written with the righteous. The figure of a book containing the names of those whom God accepts is very old, Ex. xxxii. 32, 33. It was familiar to inspired writers. See concordances. Three different customs are brought in to explain its use. Dodd: "The allusion seems to have been taken from the custom of generals and commanders of armies who, upon the desertion or death of a soldier, strike him out of the muster-roll;" Mant: "This phrase alludes to the custom of well ordered cities, which kept registers, containing all the names of the citizens. Out of these registers the names of apostates, fugitives, and criminals were erased, as also those of the deceased: whence the expression 'blotting' or 'erasing names from the book of life.'" Hammond thinks it refers to the ancient custom of keeping "a register of names of those who live in any kingdom. Thus, Luke ii. 1, we have the enrolling (in our version taxing) of all in the emperor's dominions: and accordingly the word here rendered book is ordinarily taken for a catalogue; and the catalogue of the living is the number of those that are alive at any time." It matters little which of these customs gave rise to the figure of the text, although that of Mant is perhaps the most striking. The book of the living here is the same as the book of life in the New Testament. To be blotted out of this book is the same thing as not to be written with the righteous. The clauses are parallel. The meaning of the verse therefore is that these bitter and incorrigible persecutors of innocence shall not be regarded or treated as the righteous. From this figure some of the ablest commentators draw the doctrine of the divine decrees. But God's decrees are eternal and unchangeable. There are no blots in the book of God's holy, everlasting and immutable purposes. As many as are ordained to eternal life believe, Acts xiii. 48; and he that believeth shall be saved.

29. But I am poor and sorrowful, i. e., I am not one of these vile and violent men. I am poor, i. e., afflicted, humble, lowly, and sorrowful, sad, sore, grieving, pained, q. d., I am too much borne down with the hugeness of my sorrows to feel and act as my enemies seem quite at liberty to do. Let thy salvation, O God, set me up on high. Calvin: Thy salvation shall exalt me. If the verse refers to Christ, it shows how he foresaw his own resurrection from the dead, his ascension to heaven and his glorious session at the right hand of God. As it finds its fulfilment in every believer, it shows him how he should bear his sorrows and how he "should depart out of the world, joyfully relinquishing its goods, patiently bearing its evils, and confidently expecting a resurrection to glory."

30. I will praise the name of God with a song, and will magnify him with thanksgiving. All Christ's life even on earth was not made up of sorrow and anguish alone. There was an hour when he rejoiced in spirit, Luke x. 21. But all his life from his resurrection is a new life. He sorrows no more forever. Horne: "Here as in the xxii. and many other Psalms, the scene changes from sorrow to joy; from a state of suffering to one of triumph: from the passion to the resurrection;" or, these words may express the purpose of his soul to celebrate the name of God in confident assurance that deliverance would come, though it was still distant. Foreseeing it, he magnifies the Lord with thanksgiving.

31. This also shall please the LORD better than an ox or bullock that hath horns and hoofs. This verse is parallel to Ps. l. 13, 14, 23, on which see.

32. The humble shall see this, and be glad. There is no more effectual way of consoling afflicted, humble souls than by God's Spirit leading them rightly to view the deliverances which he has wrought for others; see on Ps. xl. 3. And your heart shall live that seek God. To live in this case is much the same as to be glad, 1 Thess. iii. 8. Or it expresses the spiritual and eternal life, which God secures to all who seek him, and have the exercises of the renewed soul, Ps. xxii. 26. On seeking God, see on Ps. ix. 10; x. 4; xiv. 2.

33. For the LORD heareth the poor. Heareth, i. e., is already answering, according to that in Isa. lxxv. 24. Poor, plural, often rendered needy, expressing poverty of spirit, humbleness of mind. The proposition is universal, embracing all in every place who are of this temper. And despiseth not his prisoners. The Lord's prisoners are such as go to prison for his sake and in his cause, or they are such as he has bound in affliction and iron, vv. 7, 26; Ps. cvii. 10; or they are souls under the power and guilt of sin, on whom he has yet set his love. Deliverance to the humble and afflicted is often represented by the rescue of captives, Isa. lxi. 1; Ps. lxxviii. 6. Jehovah hears even the sighing of the prisoners, Ps. lxxix. 11. He does not despise them, i. e., he lovingly notices and attends to them. How gloriously was this fulfilled in the release of our great Surety, whom God has set at liberty, and highly exalted at his own right hand. "He rose for our justification."

34. Let the heaven and earth praise him, the seas, and every thing that moveth therein. This is an animated demand, for universal praise. Horne: "The mercies of God in Christ are such, that they cannot worthily be praised by anything less than an universal chorus of the whole old and new creation." Praise, in the future, a prediction rather than a prayer.

35. For God will save Sion. In saving an individual believer God gives a pledge that he will save every other believer. In exalting his Son from the deepest humiliation he gave the most blessed assurance that he will save his whole church. By reason of her, blessings shall come on all connected with her: And [God] will build the cities of Judah; that they [the poor, the humble, the prisoners of vv. 32, 33,] may dwell there, and have it in possession. They have the blessing, which is the most opposite to the curse denounced in v. 25.

36. The seed also of his servants shall inherit it; and they that love his name shall dwell therein. To inherit a portion in the promised land was a proof of God's faithfulness to the natural seed of Abraham, and where it was enjoyed with thankfulness and in faith, it was a token and pledge of God's favor for the life to come, Ps. xxv. 13; xxxvii. 29. Calvin: "Although that land was given to the chosen people to be possessed until the advent of Christ, we should remember that it was a type of the heavenly inheritance, and that, therefore, what is here written concerning the protection of the church, has received a more true and substantial fulfilment in our day."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The very best of men may be in extreme danger. That is a good reason for looking to God, and hoping in his mercy, v. 1.
2. Let us not forget that we have for an example of suffering affliction not only the prophets, but Messias himself, vv. 1, 2. What more do we need for pattern, for encouragement, for showing us how God works deliverance? None of us have sufferings peculiar to ourselves. No temptation has befallen us but such as is common to men. Let us neither faint, nor rebel, 'neither be soured by discontent, nor sink into despair,' Heb. xii. 3.

3. When our affairs seem to be at the worst, that is a fit time for God to undertake for us, vv. 1, 2.

4. Answers to earnest, hearty, believing prayer may, for wise and holy purposes be long delayed, v. 3. The Father answered the Son in the best time and in the best way; but not till reproach had broken his heart, not till his followers were nonplused with his sufferings and humiliation, not till he had lain in the sepulchre of Joseph.

5.* Calvin: "When we reflect that David has spoken, as it were, out of the mouth of Christ, and, as it were, out of the mouth of all true saints who are the members of Christ, we ought not to think that any strange thing happens to us, if at any time we are so overwhelmed with death as to be unable to discern the slightest hope of life," v. 3.

6. Let us distinguish between pusillanimity and the manly cry of distress, v. 3. Let us bear in patience all we can bear, acknowledging the righteousness of God in all that comes upon us. Tholuck: "The piteous complaints of the prophet begin not with the first stroke of the rod, as effeminate minds are wont to do; but the hero of the battle-field, who had slain his ten thousands, is equally a hero in endurance."

7. If we have many, mighty, wanton, unreasonable enemies, so had others before us, v. 4. Let us in the name of the Lord defy all the hosts of hell. Let us remember too, that none of us suffers to himself. Tholuck: "The church is one body—You cannot touch a toe without affecting the whole body, 1 Cor. xii. 26. If our sufferings are useful to others, we should not murmur; for we shall not lose our reward." Dickson: "He that is most just may be troubled and hated without a cause, and may be dealt with as a thief."

8. It is better to suffer wrong than to do wrong, v. 4. Slander cannot destroy us, any more than it destroyed David or Christ. Calvin: "If, after we have done all in our power to make men form a favorable opinion respecting us, they misconstrue and pervert every good word which we utter, and every good action which we perform, we ought to maintain such greatness of mind as boldly to despise the world and all false accusers, resting contented with the judgment of God, and with that alone." 1 Cor. iv. 5. Several commentators here cite the case of Socrates, who, when his wife visited him in prison, and grieved at his suffering without a cause, asked, "Would you rather see me suffer as guilty?"

9. It should greatly humble us that among the most illustrious types of our Saviour, which are found among men, there was so much imperfection, foolishness and iniquity, that they properly confessed and bewailed them before God, v. 5.

10. We may boldly and confidently plead with God not to confound or put to shame any of his true and humble servants, v. 6.

11. We may well be calm under suffering, yea, glory in it, when it is for God's sake, for his cause, his truth, or his people, v. 7. Dickson: "When one of God's children is persecuted for righteousness, all the rest are waiting to see the event, and it would be a great dash to them to see the righteous lie under, or a good cause lie long oppressed."

12. To live retired, without acquaintance and without friends, is the fancy of a few; but to those, with whom friendship is a sacred thing full of enjoyment, the withdrawal of the confidence and sympathy of those, whom we had enrolled as friends, is truly dreadful, v. 8. Such has ever been matter of bitter complaint among good men. Let such mind two things: "1. In affliction for God's cause friends will more readily forsake a sufferer, than in his affliction for a civil cause: 2. The power of religion in the godly is stronger than the bonds of blood with their kinsmen, and it will make them cleave to God, when their kindred cast them off."

13. To be without zeal in religion makes duties irksome, shows that the love of God is not shed abroad within us, and proves that we are not like Christ, v. 9. A religion without zeal chills its possessor and all around him. If zeal had always been pure and benevolent, it would not have been held in so much disesteem by some.

14. Let us make common cause with God, even when his interests are most depressed, v. 9. "Even Christ pleased not himself; but, as it is written, The reproaches of them that reproached thee are fallen on me," Rom. xv. 3. We cannot be more hated or worse treated for adhering to God's cause in the day of rebuke and blasphemy than was our blessed Lord. It is a good sign when we are no less affected by injuries done to God's name and truth and people than by wrongs done to ourselves.

15. If our religion and religious actions expose us to shame, our experience is neither novel nor alarming, vv. 9, 10, 11. Those, who do not weep for their own sins can hardly be expected to understand the feelings of those, who weep for sin in themselves and others too.

16. In nothing are all classes of wicked men so united as in opposing the cause of God, v. 12. Pilate and Herod had a serious rupture, but the events attending the trial and crucifixion quite made them friends. In religion wicked magistrates and wicked rabble see eye to eye and feel heart to heart.

17. In the worst case that we can be in, let us hold fast the privilege of prayer, v. 13. Of this none can deprive us. Men may silence our defence at the public tribunals; but they cannot cut us off from supplication to God. For resisting the derisions of the proud and foolish there is nothing like prayer.

18. There is a time accepted, acceptable to God, a time fit for our respective duties, v. 13. God will not bless the farmer, who plants corn in mid-winter, nor the man, who defers prayer till life is gone, Isa. lv. 6.

19. All our hope is not merely in the fact that God is merciful, but that his mercy abounds, vv. 13, 16. In God we find "mercy, a multitude of mercies, all kinds of mercy, inexhaustible mercy, mercy enough for all, enough for each."

20. Our prayers are most likely to be suitable when the matter of them is drawn from the circumstances in which God's providence has placed us, vv. 1, 2, 14, 15.

20. We may fitly urge our sore troubles as a reason why God should speedily attend to our cry, and help us. When afflictions press hard, we may press hard our suit before God.

21. If we shall be saved from any foe, fear, or peril, it must be by God alone, v. 18. Blessed is he, who constantly so believes and acts accordingly.

22. If Christians were well informed and wise they would greatly comfort themselves with the remembrance of God's omniscience, v. 19. Often it is the chief source of consolation to them. Tholuck: "It is one of the most potent consolations that the earthly struggles of the pious are as it were performed on a stage while the Eternal with his angels and the host of perfected saints are the spectators."

23. It is worth while to suffer much, as did David and Christ, if through the divine mercy we may be brought to breathe their spirit and love the prayers they offered, and rejoice in the perfections of God as they did.

24. It is no new thing to have a heart broken with grief, v. 2. The Saviour knows all about such sorrow. He is touched with the feeling of our infirmity. However great our distresses, they do not equal his.

25. One of the infallible evidences of a foul depravity in man is that comforters are scarce on earth, v. 20. Henry: "We cannot expect too little from men, miserable comforters are they all; nor can we expect too much from God, for he is the Father of mercy and the God of all comfort and consolation."

26. It no less establishes the truth of our fallen state that tormentors are plenty in this world, v. 21. Some seem to have nothing else to do. But let not God's people be cast down on that account. "As all the sufferings of the saints are but shadows of the sufferings of Christ, so are they all mitigated and sanctified in the sufferings of Christ." We are walking in Christ's footsteps, and have his blessing, and that is enough.

27. Does not the example of our Saviour in refusing the narcotic and stupefying drugs offered him on the cross instruct us to avoid, as far as we can, even in a dying hour, those drinks, which would becloud our reason or our senses?

28. Blessings are blessings only while God makes them so, v. 22. When he says, I will curse your blessings, (Mal. ii. 2,) our case is sad indeed. Calvin: "As things which naturally and of themselves are hurtful become the means of furthering our welfare when we are in favor with God; so, when his anger is kindled against us, all those things which have a native tendency to produce our happiness, are cursed, and become so many causes of our destruction."

29. Spiritual blindness is an awful curse, v. 23. If there is any greater, what is it? Morison: "Judicial blindness is heaven's frequent punishment for abused privileges."

30. The bodily weakness and trembling brought on by sin are but signs of the elements of weakness inherent in transgression, v. 23. When the joints of Belshazzar's loins were loosed and his knees smote together, it was an index to the more fearful falling to pieces of all his powers of manliness, courage, and self-control.

31. There is no way of reconciling the language of Scripture with candor unless we admit that it is an awful thing to fall into the hands of the living God, v. 24. Tholuck: "Patient endurance in the heat of tribulation, and the forgiveness of our neighbor's offences are our duties, while it is the office of God to distribute justice among the obdurate."

32. The effects of God's judgments on men for their sins are often seen on their posterity for generations, so that their house after them is left desolate, v. 25. How such a curse has come on the murderers and rejecters of Christ the world has seen for eighteen hundred years. 'And in a sense equally awful and impressive may we regard the doom of all who reject Messiah, and despise the great salvation.'

33. It is extremely perilous to insult and injure the afflicted, v. 26. Perhaps few things are more wicked and deserving of punishment. If the wicked had any wisdom, when they see God's people afflicted, instead of deriding them, they would say, If God thus grieves, when he is chastening his children, what will he not do, when he takes hold on vengeance to punish his enemies? Luke xxiii. 31. Henry: "Those that are of a wounded spirit, under trouble and fear about their spiritual state, ought to be very tenderly dealt with, and care must be taken not to talk to their grief, and not to make the heart of the righteous sad, Zech. i. 15." Dickson: "Whatsoever may be the reason of the Lord's smiting and wounding his own children, yet their wicked enemies have no just reason to malign them, or to trouble them, and therefore their troubling them is persecution."

34. Nothing more dreadful can befall a man than to be left to sin more and more, to wax worse and worse, to add iniquity to iniquity, v. 27. Greediness and success in sinning are the foulest plague-spots that appear in this life.

35. When men are left without restraint and without interruption to sin, they have a right to believe that they are hopelessly cut off from justification, from God's righteousness, from Jehovah's plan of pardoning and accepting sinners, v. 27.

36. A wicked man may die such a death as to show that he is doomed to worse sufferings in the world to come; but whether this appear or not, the death of every sinner is the end of hope concerning him for ever, v. 28.

37. All the Scriptures unite in teaching that our salvation and eternal life depend on God and on God alone, v. 29. To a good man this is cause of joy; to the proud and rebellious, of fear and alarm.

38. If Christ's people are poor and sorrowful, their Master was so before them, v. 29. And as Christ was finally and gloriously delivered, so shall his people be. Everything that makes sure the woes of God's enemies makes sure the bliss of his saints.

39. None is so poor, so sunk down in sorrow or reproach, that God cannot save him, v. 29. Nor does the pious sufferer desire deliverance except on God's terms, and in his time and way.

40. Let us render praise and thanksgiving both in the prospect of mercies expected, and for mercies already received, vv. 30, 31. As there was never a man too humble or too penitent for sin, so never was there one too thankful for God's favors. Calvin: "There cannot be a more powerful incitement to thanksgiving than the certain conviction that this religious service is highly pleasing to God; even as the only recompense which he requires for all the benefits, which he lavishes upon us, that we honor and praise his name."

41. The deliverances wrought by God for his poor suffering people, and especially the glorious exaltation of his Son work the happiest effects on the humble of every generation, who seek God, v. 32. The history of God's dealings with his people of all past ages is the best possible commentary on all those exceeding great and precious promises, with which the Scriptures abound.

42. Circumstances of distress and of outward depression, so far from causing God to lose interest in his people, or to despise them, rather call forth his tender care and great compassion, v. 33. Prisoners are as dear to him as princes. Morison: "From the threefold bondage of sin, death and hell, he will finally rescue all his faithful servants, and will enable them to shout victory through the blood of the Lamb."

43. God's ways and character deserve great honor. The whole universe should unite in one chorus of hallelujah, v. 34.

44. Let what will come, the church is safe, because Jehovah makes her so, v. 35. Jerusalem, the type, has been trodden down of the Gentiles. But believers are receiving 'a kingdom which cannot be moved.'

45. All that is connected with Zion is so far blessed. The cities of Judah were far more honored and favored than the cities of Egypt or of Arabia, v. 35.

46. If the earthly Canaan was so much blessed, how wondrous must be the heavenly Canaan, where are gathered or gathering all that love the name of God, all that are themselves lovely in God's esteem.

47. How refreshing and encouraging it is to read and study such a Psalm as this. It is like conversing familiarly with one of the martyrs in the midst of his sufferings. Or it is as if one had heard Christ's words to his sorrowful disciples near the close of his life.

49. Christian, art thou wantonly, cruelly, slanderously treated? Remember how thy Saviour was hated without a cause, 'rejected, reviled, persecuted; condemned, buffeted, tortured; betrayed, denied, forsaken; nailed to the cross, mocked' of men and forsaken by his Father. Think of Christ's sufferings till you forget your own.

50. Scott: "It behooves us carefully to examine, whether the things which pertain to the Lord Jesus form as important a part of our religion, as they do of the holy Scriptures; and whether our judgment, experience and affections are, as it were, imbued with them, as the word of God is in all its parts."

PSALM LXX.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David, to bring to remembrance.

- 1 Make haste, O God, to deliver me; make haste to help me, O LORD.
- 2 Let them be ashamed and confounded that seek after my soul: let them be turned backward, and put to confusion, that desire my hurt.
- 3 Let them be turned back for a reward of their shame that say, Aha, aha.
- 4 Let all those that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee: and let such as love thy salvation say continually, Let God be magnified.
- 5 But I am poor and needy; make haste unto me, O God: thou art my help and my deliverer; O LORD, make no tarrying.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xi. xxxviii. With slight variations this ode is found at the close of Ps. xl. Of the literary history of the two pieces we know nothing, though some indulge in conjectures. This bears to Ps. xl. the same relation that Ps. liii. does to Ps. xiv. Some have thought this was a kind of appendix to Ps. lxix. and a sort of preface to Ps. lxxi. The supposition is harmless perhaps, but it is unsupported, and nothing is gained thereby. Whoever wrote Psalm xl. wrote this also. The titles ascribe both to David. Psalm xl. has been shown to be Typical-Messianic. This may lawfully be so esteemed also, as Gill and others think. Yet it has by some been supposed to be in this form to 'suggest general hints for prayer, to pious persons, under very afflictive circumstances.' Clarke and Scott both fix the date about 1023 years before Christ. The names of the Most High here found are Elohim God and Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2. Many commentators refer the reader solely to their exposition of Ps. xl.; but as there is some variation a few words are offered.

1. Make haste, O God, to deliver me; make haste to help me, O LORD. The variations between this and Ps. xl. 13, are a substitution of Elohim in the first clause for Jehovah, and Make haste for Be pleased. The case required speed. It seemed as if the crisis had come.

2. Let them be ashamed and confounded that seek after my soul: let them be turned backward, and put to confusion, that desire my hurt. The form is rather prediction than imprecation. See Introduction, § 6. This verse and Ps. xl. 14 are just the same except that here we have not the words together and to destroy it. Turned back and Driven back are different renderings of the same verb. For the meaning of ashamed and confounded, see on Ps. xxxv. 4, 26.

3. Let them be turned back for a reward of their shame that say, Aha, aha. In this verse we have turned back for desolate in Ps. xl. 15, and to me is here omitted. But turned back here is not the same so rendered in v. 2, but a word which might be rendered either be converted or be requited. The latter probably gives the sense. On Aha, see on Ps. xxxv. 21, 25. It is a note of derision. The general import of the verse is the same as of Ps. xl. 15.

4. Let all those that seek thee rejoice and be glad in thee; and let such as love thy salvation say continually, Let God be magnified. The very same words are found in Ps. xl. 16, except that here the second clause begins with and.

5. But I am poor and needy. See on Ps. xl. 17, where we have precisely the same words. Make haste unto me, O God. In Ps. xl. 17, we have Adonai Lord instead of Elohim God in this place. Thou art my help and my deliverer, just as in Ps. xl. 17. O LORD, make no tarrying, as in Ps. xl. 17, except that here we have Jehovah LORD, instead of Elohim God in the prior Psalm. This verse also omits the pregnant phrase found in Ps. xl. 17: The LORD thinketh upon me.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The greater our need, the greater should be our urgency in making known our requests unto God. "Prayer is a swift messenger, which in the twinkling of an eye can go and return with an answer from heaven." Sometimes God delays his answers that he may raise our estimate of his mercies and increase our longings after them.

2. A deliverance is doubly valuable, when it comes in the very nick of time, v. 1. We may confidently ask for those things which are needful for us. "Give us day by day our daily bread."

3. None but God can give effectual aid in any distress; but sometimes it is so evident that none but he can help, that we easily withdraw confidence from all creatures. It is a mercy to be able to do so, even in the greatest straits.

4. There is no weapon more commonly used against good men, than scorn and derision. The aim of the ungodly is to cover them with shame and so make them odious. In this they often think they succeed. It will therefore be but retributive justice if shame and confusion shall come on all such, v. 2. Other Scriptures are no less decisive, Dan. xii. 2. It is enough to settle forever the character of sin, that whosoever commits it will assuredly and deeply regret it; and, if he dies without genuine repentance, he will regret it eternally.

5. It is good evidence of the coming doom of ungodly men that they are now malevolent, and desire the hurt of God's people, v. 2. Wickedness towards the righteous knows no limits, except as God bounds it. It seeks the life 'to destroy it; the mind to disturb' it; the heart to entice it; and the soul to sink it to despair. It often pours out its venom in the foulest imprecations.

6. Taunts are no new thing and ought not to disturb our equanimity, v. 3. They are harmless, and have been proved to be so in a thousand cases.

7. To seek God is a part of true religion, v. 4. He, whose longings and inquiries go not out after the knowledge, favor, image, service and enjoyment of God, has no piety that will abide the test of truth, the scrutiny of omniscience.

8. Dickson: "Whatsoever be our own hard condition at any time, we should seek the welfare and prosperity of the rest of God's children, and it is the property of each of the godly in their trouble, to wish all the rest to be partakers of the blessedness which their own souls seek after, but not to be like to them in trouble or bonds," v. 4.

9. There is joy, there is gladness in salvation, v. 4. They, who assert the contrary, do slander God and his cause.

10. Pious men had rather not be delivered at all from earthly trials than be delivered at the cost of God's honor. Their desire is that he may be magnified, v. 4. If that cannot be done, they will lie still and suffer on. Paul and Silas would not sneak out of the jail at Philippi.

11. A desire to glorify and magnify Jehovah belongs to true religion, v. 4.

12. If we are poor and needy, sad and afflicted, so have others been before us; and if our trials make us meek and lowly, we cannot have too many of them, as long as we may come and tell God the worst of our case, v. 5.

13. The poorer and more afflicted we are, the more need is there that we abound in prayer and supplication, v. 5. Henry: "Poverty and necessity are very good pleas in prayer to a God of infinite mercy."

14. Scott: "No worldly possessions or distinctions can prevent the humbled sinner from feeling himself to be poor and needy; hence his entire dependence upon a merciful God, and his fervent supplications to him."

PSALM LXXI.

1 In thee, O LORD, do I put my trust: let me never be put to confusion.

2 Deliver me in thy righteousness, and cause me to escape: incline thine ear unto me, and save me.

3 Be thou my strong habitation, whereunto I may continually resort: thou hast given commandment to save me; for thou art my rock and my fortress.

4 Deliver me, O my God, out of the hand of the wicked, out of the hand of the unrighteous and cruel man.

5 For thou art my hope, O Lord God: thou art my trust from my youth.

6 By thee have I been holden up from the womb: thou art he that took me out of my mother's bowels: my praise shall be continually of thee.

7 I am as a wonder unto many; but thou art my strong refuge.

8 Let my mouth be filled with thy praise and with thy honour all the day.

9 Cast me not off in the time of old age; forsake me not when my strength faileth.

10 For mine enemies speak against me; and they that lay wait for my soul take counsel together, 11 Saying, God hath forsaken him: persecute and take him; for there is none to deliver him.

12 O God, be not far from me: O my God, make haste for my help.

13 Let them be confounded and consumed that are adversaries to my soul; let them be covered with reproach and dishonour that seek my hurt.

14 But I will hope continually, and will yet praise thee more and more.

15 My mouth shall shew forth thy righteousness and thy salvation all the day; for I know not the numbers thereof.

16 I will go in the strength of the Lord God: I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only.

17 O God, thou hast taught me from my youth: and hitherto have I declared thy wondrous works.

18 Now also when I am old and grayheaded, O God, forsake me not; until I have shewed thy strength unto this generation, and thy power to every one that is to come.

19 Thy righteousness also, O God, is very high, who hast done great things: O God, who is like unto thee!

20 Thou, which hast shewed me great and sore troubles, shalt quicken me again, and shalt bring me up again from the depths of the earth.

21 Thou shalt increase my greatness, and comfort me on every side.

22 I will also praise thee with the psaltery, even thy truth, O my God: unto thee will I sing with the harp, O thou Holy One of Israel.

23 My lips shall greatly rejoice when I sing unto thee; and my soul, which thou hast redeemed.

24 My tongue also shall talk of thy righteousness all the day long: for they are confounded, for they are brought unto shame, that seek my hurt.

LIKE the first this Psalm has no title. It required none. That David wrote it is generally admitted. A review of his life near its close probably suggested its chief topics. Hengstenberg: "There may be truth in the assumption that David here comforts the suffering righteous man in his old age with that same comfort wherewith he himself had been comforted in his old age." Clarke dates it about B.

C. 1023; Scott, B. C. 1021. We have in it three names of the Almighty, Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and Adonai Lord, on which see Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; ii. 4.

Verses 1-3 are, with slight variations, found in Ps. xxxi. 1-3. They are not here transcribed, and the reader is referred to the comment and REMARKS on the previous ode. Verse 1 in both places is the same. Verse 2 is slightly varied, here dropping the urgent word speedily and duplicating the plea for deliverance. The imagery of v. 3 is the same in both pieces. To give commandment to save reveals a purpose and a promise of salvation, Ps. xlv. 4. On verses 1-3, Tholuck says, "The old man, cast down by the visitations of providence, appears before his God. He is supported by the promise of the Lord, that those who trust in him shall never be put to confusion, and by his faith, confirmed by the experience of his whole life, that the Lord is indeed a rock and a fortress."

4. Deliver me, O my God, out of the hand of the wicked, out of the hand of the unrighteous and cruel man. Deliver me, in v. 2, cause me to escape; in Ps. xxxi. 2, and elsewhere as here. The enemy, whom he dreaded and from whose power he sought safety, is described 1, as wicked, ungodly, one that does wrong, Ex. ii. 13; Ps. i. 4; Ps. vii. 9; 2, as unrighteous, unjust, iniquitous; and 3, as cruel, literally leavened, violent, malicious, or perhaps abandoned. We say bitter persecutors and so describe the same character. Though God can sustain his people in any trials, yet the temptation brought on us by leaving us in the hands of bad men is peculiarly dreadful to the righteous, 2 Sam. xxiv. 14. By using the singular man, he does not intimate a fear of one only. His resort is to God alone.

5. For thou art my hope, O Lord God: thou art my trust from my youth. Adonai Elohim here mentioned is a fit object of hope and trust, expectation and confidence. Tholuck: "He has clung to faith and hope throughout the entire period of his existence." David relied on God when he was a mere lad, 1 Sam. xvii. 37. Nay, he now acknowledges that God took care of him before he knew his Preserver.

6. By thee have I been holden up from the womb. The care of God over little children by their parents, by his angels, and by his direct exercise of power, is astonishing. If we saw no other proof of God's providence, his care of little children ought to remove all skepticism on the subject. See on Ps. xxii. 9, 10. But David goes back still further: Thou art he that took me out of my mother's bowels. The wonder is that any one is ever born, or born alive. To many the womb is the grave. Birth is 'a great and wonderful, though a common and neglected work of God's power and goodness.' "Blessed be God that ever I was born," said Halyburton. My praise shall be continually of thee. Such tokens of divine regard as he had received in his formation, birth and protection demanded that his lips should be opened in praise. He declares his purpose never to cease to speak to the honor of his Creator and Preserver. Alexander: "In thee is my praise always; it originates, revolves, and ends in thee."

7. I am as a wonder unto many. Wonder, often so rendered, also sign, miracle. Several ancient versions and not a few moderns render it prodigy. Diodati explains it that men 'have been afraid of me, because that such strange accidents and afflictions have befallen me; and have scorned, and had me in abomination by reason of my extreme miseries.' Calvin, Ainsworth, Green, Horsley, French and Skinner, Alexander and others give it the same explanation. But the word rendered wonder may as well be taken in a good sense. So the Arabic has it: I am become the admiration of many. Anderson: "Others suppose that the word rendered wonder, implies that the great and many dangers to which he had been exposed, and the extraordinary deliverances from them which he had experienced, marked him out as an object of wonder, so that men looked upon him as if he were exempted from the common lot of mankind, as if he possessed a charmed life, and were invulnerable to all assaults." The translators of the English Bible evidently had the first view; for they rendered the particle in the next clause but; yet its far more common rendering is and, which if used here would have the sense of for, and so some do give it. But thou art my strong refuge. Refuge as in Ps. xiv. 6; xlv. 1, also rendered shelter, and figuratively hope, meaning object of hope. Strong, in Hebrew not an adjective but a noun, and we may read refuge and strength.

8. Let my mouth be filled with thy praise and with thy honor all the day long. The Hebrew verb is in the future. Many think that is the better rendering here. This duty of praise was most agreeable to David. He was fully purposed to engage in it. Yet he felt his dependence on God for grace to do anything aright, and so it gives a good sense to make it a prayer as in the common version. Honor, a word in Hebrew, that we have not before had in the Psalms, often rendered as here, also beauty, glory, majesty. Here it seems clearly to mean declarative glory. To praise God he desires and resolves shall be his work all the day, i. e., continually. An ingrate has no praises for God in the day of adversity; but the true child of God praises him in the darkest night. He at least says, God is holy and righteous, and adores him for his perfections. He also thanks him for mercies past, and for mercies left.

9. Cast me not off in the time of old age. Parallel passages are found in Ps. xcii. 13-15; Isa. xlv. 3, 4. To cast off is to cast away, or reject as valueless or offensive. Forsake me not when my strength faileth. Forsake, often leave. It expresses the desertion of the feeble or helpless by such as might give aid. When his servant grew sick and feeble, that Amalekite went away and left him, 1 Sam. xxx. 13. But God never so treats his servants. David had given to God the dew of his youth, and the vigor of his manhood, and God had given him infallible tokens of divine acceptance. He might, therefore, confidently plead that he might not be neglected when he most needed God's help, seeing that he had grown old in his service. Such a plea, when true, God never despised.

10. For mine enemies speak against me. Enemies, always so rendered. For speak against, several read speak of me; Alexander: have said (so) to me, i. e., have told me that God would forsake me, or had forsaken me. These enemies had spoken wrongfully, and David declares their speeches slanders against God, and desires Jehovah so to prove. And they that lay wait for my soul take counsel together. The foes of David were never fair, but sly and cunning, laying wait, literally watching, but in a bad sense. They were also deadly. They lay wait for the soul, or the life.

11. Saying, God hath forsaken him: persecute and take him; for there is none to deliver him. Hath forsaken, the preterite of the same verb found in v. 9. Pursue is better than persecute here; and catch is the sense of take. The wicked often say that things are or will be thus or so, because thus and so would they have them. Even the basest men, engaged in the most atrocious schemes for wronging and injuring others, often persuade themselves that Providence has put no obstacle in the way, but has even called them to their nefarious deeds. So great a support does the human mind receive from a persuasion of the divine sanction, that the wicked often assert that God approves when he abhors their whole procedure. If this Psalm was written during Absalom's rebellion, as some think, there is in this verse probably an allusion to the words of Ahithophel in 2 Sam. xvii. 1, 2.

12. O God, be not far from me; O my God, make haste for my help. The same forms of petition are found in Ps. xxii. 11, 19; xxxv. 22; xxxviii. 21, 22; lxx. 1. It has always been an artifice of the wicked to allege that God is against his people, else he would not allow them to be brought into such straits. "It was therefore," says Calvin, "an evidence of heroic fortitude on the part of David, thus to rise superior to their perverse judgments, and, in the face of them all, to assure himself that God would be gracious to him, and to betake himself familiarly to him."

13. Let them be confounded and consumed that are adversaries to my soul: let them be covered with reproach and dishonor that seek my hurt. The import of these two clauses is just the same. Confounded, often also rendered ashamed; see on Ps. vi. 10; xxv. 2, 3; xxxv. 4. Consumed, also rendered waxed old, as a garment, signifying useless through age. Covered, arrayed, as with a garment, or filled, as a pool with rain, 1 Sam. xxviii. 14; Isa. lix. 17; Jer. xliii. 12; Ps. lxxxiv. 6. Reproach, commonly so rendered, once shame and twice rebuke. Dishonor, also rendered shame, reproach, confusion. All the verbs of this verse in Hebrew are in the future; and are so rendered by many. Scott: "There is no reason to think, that David had recorded one prayer in the Psalms, which St. Paul would in similar circumstances have scrupled."

14. But I will hope continually. The very perfections of God, which made him foresee and foretell the doom of his enemies, caused him to hope, wait, trust. All God's nature inspires confidence and so quietness of mind, if we and our cause are right. Continually, also rendered always, sometimes daily. And [I] will yet praise thee more and more. Some read: I will add to all thy praise; others: I will add this to thy praise; others: I shall be added to thy praise. Horsley adopts the last and thinks the sense is: Thy mercies to me will furnish the servants of God with a new topic of thy praise and thanksgiving. Alexander prefers the first and thinks the sense is: To all thy praise which I have uttered hitherto, I will continue still to add. The common version gives the exact sense, though it is not so literal as the first of those suggested. Patrick: "That shall be the subject of my songs, to publish thy mercy and truth in judging righteously between me and my enemies: this shall be my continual employment; though I shall never be able to tell the least part of that mercy, which will appear in my deliverance from such formidable enemies." Scott: "Because thy benefits towards me are innumerable, I cannot but continually meditate on them, and rehearse them."

15. My mouth shall shew forth thy righteousness and thy salvation all the day. It was his purpose to do it now, in confident expectation of deliverance from his persecutors; and to do it yet more hereafter when God's righteousness, or justice should be manifested in his deliverance. This he would do all the day, or continually, for there was no danger of running into excess: For I know not the numbers thereof. Numbers, in the plural. Alexander: "I know not numbers to express them;" church of England: I know no end thereof. The Chaldee, Syriac and a great weight of authority are in favor of the English version. Hammond thinks there is singular elegance in this passage. The verb show forth and the word numbers are cognate.

16. I will go in the strength of the Lord God. Go, a verb of frequent occurrence, rendered go, go in, come, come in, enter in. Some suppose it refers to going into the tabernacle, but it is applied to any going. It may express the tenor of the life. Strength, plural strengths, that is, abundance of strength. Some of the ancient versions read, I will enter into the strength, meaning, I will avail myself of his strength. Lord Jehovah is better than Lord God. I will make mention of thy righteousness, even of thine only. Here as in verse 15, righteousness embraces all that is comprehended in faithfulness, based upon infinite rectitude. Make mention, or record, the usual rendering; in other forms commonly remember. Here literally: I will cause to remember. After our deliverances no righteousness, faithfulness, wisdom, mercy, or power is worthy of religious mention, but those of God only.

17. O God, thou hast taught me from my youth. Divine teaching has been the joy of God's people in all ages. A heart to praise is as needful as a theme for praise. To our shame we often have the occasion without the disposition. In David's case the teaching had been effectual: And hitherto have I declared thy wondrous works. Declared them willingly, joyfully, thankfully, to thy honor. The verb is in the future, shall declare. Some make it a vow, or the expression of a purpose respecting time to come. In that case hitherto should belong to the first clause, and I will declare [show or tell] thy wondrous works to the last. The objection to this is that it destroys the connection with what follows. That the grammar is not against the common version is clear. Hengstenberg has it: Hitherto have I made known thy wonders.

18. Now also, when I am old and grayheaded, O God, forsake me not. Forsake, as in v. 9. Old and grayheaded, literally unto old age and gray hairs. Such mercy he desired of the Lord, Until I have shewed thy strength unto this generation, and thy power to every one that is to come. Strength, literally arm, that being in man the chief instrument of exercising strength for deliverance; also rendered power. Chaldee: The strength of thy arm. Power, also rendered might, strength, mastery. Generation and every one that is to come, many think, are in apposition. Some think the latter is the more comprehensive. Our translators evidently thought so. Shewed does not signify furnished an instance of, but declared as in v. 17. The blessing here sought is manifestly great, if we reflect on the feebleness of the aged, and their absolute dependence on God. If God forsakes us all past experiences are nothing.

19. Thy righteousness also, O God, is very high, who hast done great things. As in vv. 15, 16, righteousness includes not only the essential rectitude and inflexible justice of God, but also his faithfulness in the fulfilment of all his promises, and in the exercise of all his attributes for the defence of his chosen. In this as in every other sense God's righteousness is very high, i. e., 'it is in itself very sublime, or it is in the eyes of those who consider thy dealings with me very exalted, glorious or illustrious.' Elsewhere he says: "Thy righteousness is like the great mountains," which are very grand and elevated objects. Chaldee: To the high heavens; Hengstenberg: Stretches to heaven. The English version gives the whole sense. O God, who is like unto thee? Compare Ps. xxxv. 10; lxxxvi. 8; lxxxix. 6, 8; Ex. viii. 10; ix. 14; xv. 11; Deut. iii. 24; xxxiii. 26; 2 Sam. vii. 22; 1 Chron. xvii. 20. God is incomparable.

20. Thou, which hast shewed me great and sore troubles, shalt quicken me again, and shalt bring me up again from the depths of the earth. Troubles are often spoken of as depths, deep places, the sorrowful as dead men, and relief from trouble as a restoring to life, Ps. lxxxviii. 6; cxxxviii. 7. So we may understand this verse. The only objection to this explanation is that the word rendered depths commonly means the sea. This is true, especially in the singular form, but we also read of "the seas, and all deep places," where we have the same word as here, Ps. cxxxv. 6. Such bold figures derive great force from the doctrine of the resurrection. Indeed they have little or no fitness where it is not known and believed. Like other ancient worthies, David was by it greatly sustained. Without that last great deliverance—"a better resurrection"—"the resurrection of the just"—all minor deliverances were as nothing.

21. Thou shalt increase my greatness, and comfort me on every side. The expected deliverance was to be followed by enlargement and increased blessings. To those in covenant with God one mercy is the forerunner of another. The resurrection itself will be followed by ineffable glories. Ainsworth properly regards greatness as signifying magnificence, majesty, honor. Christ himself suffered and then entered into his glory. Instead of comfort me on every side, the Hebrew is: Thou shalt compass, thou shalt comfort me. Some would read: Thou shalt turn, thou shalt comfort me, meaning thou shalt comfort me again; and the verb does bear this rendering, but the former is perhaps the better view.

22. I will also praise thee with the psaltery, even thy truth, O my God. Psaltery, see on Ps. xxxiii. 2; lvii. 8. Truth, the general word for divine veracity, is here used as synonymous with faithfulness. God is to be adored for all his attributes. He is particularly to be praised for keeping covenant. Unto thee will I sing with the harp, O thou Holy One of Israel. Harp, see on Ps. xxxiii. 2; xliii. 4. Holy One of Israel is a title given to Jehovah not less than thirty times in the Scriptures; more than twenty times in Isaiah alone. It is most honorable. He possesses all and infinite perfections. No other god is holy.

23. My lips shall greatly rejoice when I sing unto thee; and my soul, which thou hast redeemed. Horsley: My lips shall move briskly, when I sing unto thee, and my soul shall rejoice, which thou hast redeemed. Praising God is a delightful privilege, but a miserable task—the drudgery of hypocrites.

24. My tongue also shall talk of thy righteousness all the day long. Talk of, literally meditate, then utter. Righteousness, as in vv. 2, 15, 16, 19. For they are confounded, for they are brought unto shame, that seek my hurt. Here we have the fulfilment of the prediction uttered in v. 13. He was so confident of triumph, that he sang of it before it came. To his mind, it was as if judgment had been already executed.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Without settled confidence in God, we cannot enter into rest, v. 1.
2. Scott: “It is very honorable to God, that his word encourages sinners to plead their confidence in him, as a reason why he should save and help them,” v. 1.
3. Dickson: “As long as a child of God liveth in the world, he must look for new afflictions, as here the experience of the Psalmist tossed in his old age warneth us,” v. 1.
4. Henry: “They that are at home in God, that live a life of communion with him, and confidence in him, that continually resort unto him by faith and prayer, having their eyes ever toward him, may promise themselves a strong habitation in him, such as will never fall of itself, nor can ever be broken through by any invading power,” vv. 1–3.
5. God is the best, the only safe refuge in the day of trial, v. 3.
6. It is a great mercy, one highly to be prized, one earnestly to be prayed for, that we may be delivered from wicked, unrighteous, cruel and unreasonable men, v. 4; 2 Thess. iii. 2. Wild beasts are not more dangerous, and are never so refined in their cruelty.
7. None but God can effectually deliver us from any threatened evil, and particularly from those terrific combinations of ungodly men, which are often formed against his cause and servants, v. 4. Dickson: “It is a great advantage to be a confederate with God, when we have to deal with his enemies and ours in any debate.”
8. If in contests with men we see our cause is bad, let us abandon it, and ask God to forgive us for having engaged in it; but if we know that the matter for which we contend is weighty as well as just, let us not fear the issue, nor hesitate to bring our complaints before Jehovah.
9. When men are ungodly, they are so far ready to be cruel, v. 4. Compare Luke xviii. 2, 4. Every sin has its kindred vices. Ungodliness implies all.
10. A solid foundation for wisdom and confidence is found in a life-long experience of the divine guidance and mercy, v. 5. Such an experience gives a hope that maketh not ashamed. It is a great thing to be habituated from early life to trust in the Lord, and hope in his mercy. Happy are they who seek the Saviour early. Slade: “Should they be cut off, as many are, when young, they will be removed from this troublesome world, to a land of perfect peace and perfect beauty; transplanted, as flowers in the bud, to bloom and ripen in paradise. And should they live to be old, their gray hairs will be honorable; and they will be blessed with solid comfort and satisfaction in looking back upon the years, in which they have walked with God, through the grace of his Holy Spirit."

11. Very few days of man's appointing are more fitly observed in a serious, religious way, than the anniversary of one's birth, which was a wonder second only to the new birth. Rich is the mercy therein displayed. But for this our "very birth would be an entrance into a thousand deaths."

12. It is a pious custom, adopted by all good men, often and solemnly to review the events of providence in their own lives and histories, v. 6. In this matter we should follow the wise and pious. If we thought more on such matters, we should oftener sing 'songs in the night.'

13. If ungodly men wonder at the righteous now for their peculiar principles, and sometimes for their singular sufferings, they will wonder still more at the victories which they shall accomplish, and the glory that shall be revealed in them. Let not the saints therefore be cast down because they find that they are made gazing-stocks, v. 7. Christ himself was "a sign everywhere spoken against." His Apostles were reputed the off-scouring of all things. All this did not in the end diminish their happiness. God was their refuge, and he is as willing to be ours.

14. It is right to form a solemn purpose to praise God abundantly, and to offer fervent prayer that we may be able to keep our engagements, v. 8.

15. The aged believer with his long experience, has a solid ground of confidence and assurance in approaching God, v. 9. In his infinite mercy Jehovah does not reject a truly broken heart, offered him by the aged sinner, 2 Chron. xxxiii. 13. But how hard it is for inveterate sinners to approach God with any boldness! Slade: "It is a sad thing to be looking for religion in old age, when we ought to be enjoying the comforts of it—to be sowing when we ought to be reaping." Tholuck: "If God did help us in the time of our youth and manhood, when our strength aided us to overcome many difficulties, how much more will his strength deliver us when ours is gone, especially when the wicked challenge his mighty arm."

16. If God should forsake us at any stage of our existence we should be undone. But there is peculiar dreariness attending an old age unsupported by the grace and power of God. And there is a peculiar sweetness attending pious old age. God is not offended at decrepitude. Scott: "As old age approaches, our strength in many respects will fail us: but God will not cast off his gray-headed servants, when they are no longer capable of laboring as they have done. And his people should imitate his example, in their kindness towards such as have spent their health and strength in their service." Henry: "He that was our Help from our birth ought to be our Hope from our youth. If we received so much mercy from God before we were capable of doing him any service, we should lose no time when we are capable."

17. So long as we live and serve God we may expect to have enemies, who will do what they can to injure us, especially with their tongues, v. 10.

18. No man knows what plottings may be going on for his destruction, v. 10. Yet they are powerless, if God does not allow them to gain head.

19. Egregiously do the wicked err in their judgments of spiritual things, and in particular of the designs of God in his providential dealings with his people, v. 11. Calvin: "Measuring the favor of God only by what is the present condition of men, they conceive that all whom he suffers to be afflicted are despised, forsaken, and cast off by him." How different from this is God's exposition of his own government. "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten." Horne: "They who saw David ascending Mount Olivet in tears, when Absalom had driven him from Jerusalem, and they who beheld Jesus led forth out of the same Jerusalem, to be crucified on Mount Calvary, were tempted to regard both the one and the other, as finally deserted by God." Let us not be blind through unbelief, nor talk to the grief of those whom God has wounded, Ps. lxxix. 26.

20. The more pressing and violent our foes, the more urgent may we be with God to appear for us, vv. 11, 12.

21. The doom of the wicked is coming. Their woes will soon be upon them, and they will be dreadful, yea, intolerable, v. 13.

22. As good men, however cast down, are never quite in despair, so they have a right to hope always, v. 14. God's word and providence both justify such confidence. True faith looks not so much at appearances as at what God has said and done to his people.

23. The longer we live and the more we know and experience, the more should we abound in praise to God, v. 14.

24. A sense of our ignorance and insufficiency, and of the inadequacy of our services should not deter us from honestly and heartily endeavoring to do our whole duty, v. 15. Let us know what we can, and do what we know.

25. All our strength in living, in serving God, and in suffering for him, is in and from the Lord, and should be so declared by all, by the aged in particular, v. 16. Tholuck: "To praise the righteousness and goodness of the Lord is the proper employment of old age." He, who fights without God, will but beat the air.

26. God's righteousness and all his perfections throw all our attributes quite into the shade, so as to be unworthy of notice, v. 16. God is God alone. No glory, no power, no love, no wisdom, no holiness, no justice, no mercy in comparison of his are worthy to be mentioned.

27. Divine teaching is both necessary and sufficient to bring us to think and speak well of God and his marvellous doings, v. 17. Indeed we can do no duty without the help of divine grace.

28. Consistent piety, exhibited through youth and manhood may be pleaded in the day of darkness and sorrow as a reason why God should not forsake us; because it is most agreeable to his nature to remember old friendships, vv. 17, 18. Calvin: "His reasoning is, Since thou, O God, hast from the commencement of my existence given me such abundant proofs of thy goodness, wilt thou not stretch forth thy hand to succor me, when now thou seest me decaying through the influence of old age?"

29. Aged saints have some great advantages in speaking for God and religion; and they ought not to keep silent, but utter the memory of all his goodness, and show forth his praise all the day long, v. 18. Tholuck: "Are there better preachers of the works of God to be found than hoary parents in the circle of their children, or grand-parents in that of their grand-children?"

30. It is to God's unspeakable and everlasting glory that much as he has done, filling the earth with the fame of his deeds, he has yet done all things in righteousness, v. 19. One act of unrighteousness or unfaithfulness on his part would forever destroy pious confidence. It is therefore for a perpetual joy to the church on earth and the church in heaven that the Judge of all the earth doeth right, and can do no wrong. There is no more glorious song sung in heaven or earth than those found in Deut. xxxii. 4; Rev. xvi. 5, 7.

31. God is incomparable, v. 19. Were it not so, it would be impossible to see how his character could be a fountain of joy, or we find repose on his bosom. We dare not wholly trust the best men, or the chief angels. But we can trust an infinite God.

32. There are no depths of earthly woe, from which the arm and mercy of God cannot rescue his suffering children, v. 20. David found it so. Calvin: "We must be brought down even to the gates of death before God can be seen to be our deliverer."

33. Henry: "Sometimes God makes his people's troubles contribute to the increase of their greatness, and their sun shines the brighter for having been under a cloud," v. 20.

34. It is no small part of heavenly wisdom in times of trial to seize upon the strong doctrines of Scripture for our consolation, such as those of the universal providence of God and the resurrection, vv. 20, 21.

35. Whatever may befall believers here, it is certain that their career in the next world will be brighter and brighter for ever, v. 21. Dickson: "As no trouble cometh alone, but multitudes of troubles joined together, when the Lord will humble and try a man; so no comfort cometh single or alone, when the Lord will change the man's exercise, but a multitude of comforts joined together: Thou wilt comfort me on every side."

36. On the use of musical instruments in God's worship, see REMARKS on Ps. xxxiii. 2, 3.

37. Wherever God has a people, there praise and joy should abound, vv. 22-24. Tholuck: "We think it a lovely sight to see an old man spend his days in singing the praise of God with trembling lips to the notes of the harp. And there is no more beautiful sight to God—and the notes of the harp sound up to the highest heaven." Morison: "The motives of gratitude and triumph under the New Testament are augmented a thousand-fold; and the consecration of both heart and life should be in proportion to the benefits enjoyed."

38. To aged saints this Psalm furnishes an excellent form of prayer. Let them often employ it. Cobbin: "At all periods of life there is a necessity for prayer, but it is most urgent in old age. When the heart and flesh fail, who can be our strength but God? When worse enemies than Ahithophel conspire against our peace, whither can we flee but unto God as our rock and fortress? When the earth is receding beneath our feet, God alone can be our hope and trust."

39. We cannot preach to the aged without preaching to the young. This Psalm offers fit occasion to say to the young, Behold the wisdom of early piety. Youth may be your only period of life. If you do not improve that, you may be forever undone. But if you live to old age, you will need all the consolations arising from the fact that you early gave your hearts to God. "Oh come to God, ye young people, without delay; or you may never come at all. The world will tempt and court you; but believe it not; it is a wicked flatterer, full of deceit, promising pleasure but ending in ruin," Matt. vi. 33.

PSALM LXXII.

A. Psalm for Solomon.

- 1 Give the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the king's son.
- 2 He shall judge thy people with righteousness, and thy poor with judgment.
- 3 The mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills, by righteousness.
- 4 He shall judge the poor of the people, he shall save the children of the needy, and shall break in pieces the oppressor.
- 5 They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations.
- 6 He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass: as showers that water the earth.
- 7 In his days shall the righteous flourish; and abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth.
- 8 He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth.

- 9 They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him; and his enemies shall lick the dust.
 10 The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents: the kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts.
 11 Yea, all kings shall fall down before him: all nations shall serve him.
 12 For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth; the poor also, and him that hath no helper.
 13 He shall spare the poor and needy, and shall save the souls of the needy.
 14 He shall redeem their soul from deceit and violence: and precious shall their blood be in his sight.
 15 And he shall live, and to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba: prayer also shall be made for him continually; and daily shall he be praised.
 16 There shall be a handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon: and they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth.
 17 His name shall endure for ever: his name shall be continued as long as the sun: and men shall be blessed in him: all nations shall call him blessed.
 18 Blessed be the LORD God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things.
 19 And blessed be his glorious name for ever: and let the whole earth be filled with his glory. Amen, and Amen.
 20 The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended.

ON supplying A Psalm in the title, see on title of Ps. xi. Scott and Clarke date this ode B. C. 1015. The names of the Most High in it are Elohim God and Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2. For Solomon, or To Solomon in the title is better than Of Solomon. Some very respectable writers have conjectured that Solomon wrote it, or at least reduced it to poetical measure. But several ancient versions, also Diodati, Ainsworth, Calmet, Patrick, Henry, Clarke, Horne, Pool, Morison and Dickson correctly ascribe it to David. The last verse is decisive. Theodoret regarded Messiah and his reign as its only theme; but that is an extreme view. Solomon is certainly spoken of, though chiefly as a type of Christ. The Psalm is therefore Typical-Messianic. This view is attended with comparatively few difficulties. Calmet well states the case: "Transported with joy and gratitude at the crowning of Solomon, David addressed this Psalm to God, in which he prays him to pour out his blessings on the young king and upon the people. He then, rapt in a divine enthusiasm, ascends to a higher subject, and sings the glory of the Messiah, and the magnificence of his reign. So that in this Psalm we may see a great number of expressions, which cannot relate to Solomon, unless in a hyperbolical and figurative sense: but applied to Christ, they are literally and rigorously exact." Pool: "That David, or at least the Holy Ghost, who dictated this Psalm, did look beyond Solomon, and unto the Messiah, of whom Solomon was an illustrious and unquestionable type, seems manifest from divers passages of this Psalm, which do not agree to Solomon, nor to any other king but the Messiah, and from the confession of the Jewish doctors themselves, who so understand it." Horne and others present similar views. See Isa. xxxii. 1-7; Luke i. 32, 33; John v. 22, 23.

1. Give the king thy judgments, O God, and thy righteousness unto the king's son. Solomon was both king and the king's son. This honor pertained neither to David nor Saul, both of whom were the sons of obscure men. David prays and predicts that to his son, the king, Solomon, God would grant judgments and justice, by which we are not so much to understand decisions in his favor, when he was in the right, as grace and wisdom to give decisions pleasing to God and consistent with justice. "Thus his reign would be an apt resemblance, as it was an evident type, of the kingdom of Messiah." Alexander: "The judicial power, under the theocracy, was exercised in God's name, and by his representatives; see Deut. i. 17; Pr. viii. 15; 2 Chron. xix. 6." Very aptly does Solomon, whose name signifies peaceable, or perfect, and the entrance on whose work was marked by consummate wisdom, typify King Messiah, who was the root and offspring of David, Isa. ix. 7; xi. 3, 4.

2. He shall judge thy people with righteousness, and thy poor with judgment. Righteousness and judgment, as in v. 1. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway put the verb judge in the infinitive, and the Syriac, Arabic, church of England and Ainsworth connect it with v. 1, so as to give the same sense as if it were in the infinitive; but the Chaldee, Calvin, Venema, Tremellius and Junius, Piscator, Fabritius, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander follow the Hebrew and render it in the future, without any particle connecting it with v. 1. Morison thinks there is an obvious connection between the petition of v. 1 and the prediction of v. 2, between the gifts supplicated and the character to be ultimately sustained, and so he commends the rendering of the church of England, of Green and others, who begin v. 2 with the word Then. But if v. 1 is as truly a prediction as v. 2, it is not necessary to preserve such connection. People may either designate the Jewish nation, over whom Solomon reigned, or the whole body of God's redeemed, the church, of which the tribes of Israel were a figure. The latter view best corresponds with the designations afterwards given of God's servants, as the poor, humble, lowly, afflicted.

3. The mountains shall bring peace to the people, and the little hills, by righteousness. We shall get the same general idea from this verse, whether by mountains and hills we understand all parts of the land, or regard them as figurative designations of kingdoms or governments. The proper effect of good government is peace, a word used in Scripture to include not merely quiet, but the blessings of plenty, prosperity and general happiness. Morison: "The word is often used to denote all manner of prosperity." All this is produced in or by righteousness, i. e., by a government conducted on right principles. The same is taught elsewhere, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. The blessings of good government are very great; see 1 Kings iii. 28. The blessings of Messiah's reign are greater than those of all other governments. They are unspeakable, inconceivable. Compare Isa. lxiv. 4; 1 Cor. ii. 9; Eph. iii. 8. The word peace in the first clause is to be repeated in the second, as in righteousness in the second belongs also to the first.

4. He shall judge the poor of the people. Poor, as in v. 3. Judge, often used in the sense of govern with protection, also avenge so as to vindicate, Judg. xvi. 31; 1 Sam. iv. 18; 2 Sam. xviii. 19, 31. He shall save the children of the needy. Judgment results in salvation. By the needy, elsewhere often rendered poor, we are to understand the poor of the preceding clause, either under Solomon such as from poverty were thought to be unable to contend with the rich and powerful, or under Messiah the poor in spirit. And [he] shall break in pieces the oppressor. Break, also rendered bruise, crush, humble, destroy, Isa. liii. 10; Lam. iii. 34; Jer. xlv. 10; Job vi. 9. Oppressor, the participle of the verb rendered oppress, defraud, do wrong, do violence. The meaning is he will effectually suppress wrong and outrage. How wisely Solomon did this is seen in the first act of his royal life. How much more effectually Messiah does it by his conquering grace is shown by the sanctifying power of his word and Spirit.

5. They shall fear thee as long as the sun and moon endure, throughout all generations. Here we rise quite above Solomon to the great antitype under whose reign men shall be truly pious. Thee refers to God, who is addressed in v. 1. As long as the sun, literally with the sun, i. e., parallel with his career, as long as the sun is with them. And moon, literally before the moon, i. e., as long as the moon shines. These expressions are explained by the last clause generation of generations or throughout all generations. Solomon reigned not more than forty years. Under his descendants instead of holding its own his kingdom lost much. Neither did piety flourish greatly. So that this verse must relate to the perpetuity and glory of Christ's kingdom.

6. He shall come down like rain upon the mown grass: as showers that water the earth. Solomon's reign was just, peaceful and eminently suited to revive all the interests of his nation, for "every man dwelt safely under his vine and fig-tree, from Dan even to Beersheba, all the days of Solomon," 1 Kings iv. 25. In this it was a fit though feeble type of the beneficent reign of Messiah, under whose authority all the spiritual and eternal interests of believers are eminently prospered. The way in which this is done is most refreshing, even like rain upon meadows newly mowed, where the roots and tufts of grass, which have long been shaded, are now exposed to a scorching sun. In a parched region, as Judea was for many months of the year, a pouring shower was a very fit emblem of the refreshment of Messiah's dominion. Patrick: "He shall not endeavor to be formidable to them like a tyrant; whose government imitates the thunder, storms and tempests: but condescend most graciously to the meanest, and rule them in so soft and gentle a manner, as shall make his authority no less acceptable and beneficial, than the rain is to the after-grass, or dripping showers, which fall in the summer heat, to refresh the parched earth." If such was the reign of Solomon, how much more glorious and excellent is the dominion of Christ, who by his blessed Gospel, and the saving influences of his Spirit pours light, life, peace and joy into the hearts of men otherwise the most wretched and afflicted.

7. In his days shall the righteous flourish. Flourish, grow, bud, spring, blossom. Flourish gives the sense, expressing the benign effects accompanying the Gospel. This clause was but feebly fulfilled in Solomon's time. Though the word righteous here and in many other places is singular, yet it includes all the just. And abundance of peace so long as the moon endureth, [or till there be no moon.] Abundance, elsewhere much, great, manifold, sufficient. Though Christianity has not yet gained sufficient influence to expel national contests from among men, yet finally it shall cause men to 'learn war no more.' Just so far as it is truly embraced, it extinguishes the lust of power and the fires of contention, and gives peace of conscience and peace with God. Jesus, in a far higher sense than any other, is the Prince of peace. Under him concord flourishes.

8. He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. The passages of Scripture, showing the correct understanding of these words so far as Solomon's dominion is concerned, are Gen. xv. 18; Ex. xxiii. 31; Deut. i. 7; xi. 24; Josh. i. 3, 4. These contain the promises. Those which declare the historic verity are 1 Kings iv. 21, 24; 2 Chron. ix. 26; Ezra iv. 20. Scott: "The queen of Sheba came to Jerusalem with munificent presents, and all the kings round about brought tribute or gifts to him. Yet this faintly shadowed forth the Redeemer's kingdom." This verse has and is to have its most glorious fulfilment in the setting up of Christ's kingdom in all the world. Phrases, like this, "From Dan to Beersheba," or like those in this verse, seem soon to become proverbial, and denote the whole region or territory under consideration; see Am. viii. 12; Mic. vii. 12; Zech. ix. 10. Hengstenberg: "The dominion of this king extends from any one sea to any other sea, and from any river even to the ends of the earth,—it is a kingdom of boundless extent." That this is the right view of these words is clear from the expansion and interpretation they receive in the following verses.

9. They that dwell in the wilderness shall bow before him. Wilderness here does not seem to refer at all to any particular locality, as the wilderness of Judea, of Shur, of Paran, or of Sin, but in general to all wild, or desert parts of the world. They that dwell in the wilderness is in Hebrew all expressed by one short noun Ziim. In Isa. xiii. 21; xxxiv. 14; Jer. l. 39, it is rendered wild beasts of the desert. Here it means the wild, fierce and roaming tribes of men. Shall bow, not the verb rendered bow down in the second commandment, Ex. xx. 5, and fall down in v. 11, also often worship; but one rendered couch, bring low, cast down, subdue, Num. xxiv. 9; Jud. xi. 35; Ps. xvii. 13; xviii. 39. The next clause shows that complete mastery is designed. And his enemies shall lick the dust. Enemies, as in Ps. iii. 7, and often. Lick, also rendered lick up; see 1 Kings xviii. 38; Num. xxii. 4; Mic. vii. 17. Perhaps the phrase, lick the dust, had its origin in the form of curse pronounced on the serpent, Gen. iii. 14. Clarke thinks it denotes 'abject vassalage;' Hengstenberg, 'reverence and submission.'

10. The kings of Tarshish and of the isles shall bring presents. On Tarshish see on Ps. xlviii. 7. Isles, places reached by navigation. Presents were tokens of good will, feigned or sincere. The kings of Sheba and Seba shall offer gifts. Sheba and Seba are first used in Scripture as the names of men, Gen. x. 7, 28. They afterwards were used to designate places. Alexander: "The distant south is represented by Sheba, a province of Arabia Felix; and Seba, now commonly supposed to be Mercæ, a part of ancient Ethiopia, both famous for their wealth and commerce." It is candid to say that much difficulty attends the geography of these places. But the import of the whole verse as indicating the reception of Messiah by distant nations is undoubted. There is also an evident prophecy of the visit of the queen of the South to Solomon, 1 Kings x. 1-10; 2 Chron. ix. 1-9; Matt. xii. 42; Luke xi. 31. The prophet waxes more bold:

11. Yea, all kings shall fall down before him; all nations shall serve him. This verse may be admitted to have had such a fulfilment in Solomon as to make him a remarkable type of Christ, 1 Kings iv. 20, 21; x. 23-25. But surely it is not torturing the passage to say that its complete and glorious fulfilment can be found in Christ only, and not in him as yet, for he is still waiting till his enemies become his footstool. Scott: "No doubt the millenium is here foretold." The falling down and serving here are the very words, which in the second commandment are rendered bow down and serve. That we are here to understand religious homage and obedience, is evident from the extent of the homage and service predicted.

12. For he shall deliver the needy when he crieth. Deliver, as in Ps. vii. 1, 2; xxii. 20. Needy, as in v. 4. Crieth, an earnest word as in Ps. xviii. 6, 41. He shall deliver the poor also, and him that hath no helper. Poor, as in vv. 2, 4. "Woe to him that is alone." In his distress he has no helper, or none helping him, Ps. x. 14.

13. He shall spare the poor and needy, and shall save the souls of the needy. Poor, not as that in vv. 2, 4, 12, but in Ps. xli. 1; in the margin sometimes rendered weak, or sick. Needy, as in vv. 4, 12. The word rendered spare is also rendered regard, pity, have pity. This verse as well as verses 12, 14 far more fitly "express the spiritual blessings of Christ's kingdom, than any temporal effects of the very best government on earth." Indeed Solomon never saved men's souls, though he saved their lives, when others were seeking to destroy them. Compare Job xxix. 12.

14. He shall redeem their soul from deceit and violence. Redeem, commonly so rendered, sometimes, do the part of a kinsman, and sometimes, avenge. The participle is rendered avenger, or revenger of blood. The nearest of kin was to redeem and also, if necessary, to avenge. Deceit, fraud, violence, injustice, wrong, cruelty. And precious shall their blood be in his sight. So far as Solomon is here alluded to, the meaning is that "he will not be prodigal of the lives of his subjects, casting them away merely to gratify his own revenge, or covetousness, or insatiable desire of enlarging his empire, as earthly kings commonly do, but, like a true father of his people, will tenderly preserve them." Solomon wasted neither blood nor treasure in insane wars. But the passage applies to Christ also. He will not suffer the blood of his saints to be shed for nothing. If persecuted even unto death, he will avenge it. It shall cry to him from the ground and from underneath the altar, Gen. iv. 10; 1 Sam. xxvi. 21; 2 Kings i. 13; Ps. cxvi. 15; Rev. vi. 9, 10.

15. And he shall live, and to him shall be given of the gold of Sheba: prayer also shall be made for him continually; and daily shall he be praised. There is a difference among interpreters respecting this verse, some thinking that throughout the verse the king (Solomon, or Christ) is spoken of; others, that the needy man or poor man is spoken of. In favor of the former view, we have Calvin, Luther, Diodati, Ainsworth, Venema, Piscator, Pool, Morison, Nicolson, Patrick, Dickson and Scott. Indeed so united have been the views of interpreters that often they do not hint at another exposition. Gill, however, gives both views, seeming to prefer the latter. Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander are decidedly in favor of the latter, although Alexander says that the former gives "a good sense in itself and appropriate to the context." There is not much reason to doubt that the former is correct, and that the English version gives the meaning of the prophet. Solomon's happy reign ended with his natural life. Jesus, our king, was dead, but is alive forevermore. Because he lives, his people live also, John xiv. 19. Tribute of gold was brought from afar to Solomon, 1 Kings x. 2; 2 Chron. ix. 1, 13, 14. Gold was also brought as a present to Christ, Matt. ii. 11. But as gold is precious, so the meaning is that the most excellent offerings should be made to him. Prayer is not to be made for the happiness and well-being of the person of Christ, since his exaltation; but we express our good-will to him by prayer for the spread and stability of his kingdom and glory, Ps. xviii. 4; Matt. vi. 10, and parallel passages. The church of England reads: Prayer shall be made unto him; the Septuagint: Prayer shall be made concerning him. Praise and blessing were fitly offered to Christ when on earth; and are fitly offered to him in glory, Matt. xxi. 9; Mark xi. 9; Luke xiii. 35; Rev. v. 12, 13.

16. There shall be a handful of corn in the earth upon the top of the mountains; the fruit thereof shall shake like Lebanon: and they of the city shall flourish like grass of the earth. The word translated handful may also be rendered heap, or abundance, and is so rendered by the Syriac, John Rogers, the Bishops' Bible, church of England, Edwards, Green, Rosenmüller, Tholuck and Hengstenberg. But the Genevan translation, Calvin, Diodati, Ainsworth, Amesius, Meibomius, Tremellius and Junius, Piscator, Secker, Nicolson, Patrick, Pool, Henry, Horne, Jebb, Clarke, Scott and Alexander give their weight in favor of the common version. The other renderings, such as firmament, do not seem to be entitled to much thought. The difficulty arises from the fact that the word rendered handful is found nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible, and is of doubtful derivation. The English text has antiquity and the analogy of other Scriptures to support it, Matt. xiii. 31; Mark iv. 31; Luke xvii. 6. The corn here referred to is Christ, who speaks of himself as a corn of wheat, John xii. 24. Gill says that Christ is compared to wheat "for its choiceness and purity, and for its usefulness for food; and he may be compared to a handful of it, because of the little account he was made of here on earth, and the little that was expected of him; and on account of the small beginnings of his kingdom, which came not with observation." He also quotes R. Obadiah Gaon as giving the same interpretation: "Messiah shall be at first as an handful of corn; but afterwards a multitude of disciples shall grow as the grass." Some think the figure is made stronger by supposing that the mountains here mentioned are dry and barren places. Others imagine they are mentioned because they are conspicuous objects. The things concerning Jesus Christ were not done in a corner, Acts xxvi. 26. Lebanon is supposed to mean the trees of Lebanon. The wonders of salvation by Jesus Christ are grand indeed. Lebanon has nothing so glorious, although its majestic cedars and firs wave to and fro, or shake under strong winds. Alexander: "From the city seems to mean from Jerusalem or Zion, as the centre of Messiah's kingdom and his royal residence, out of which this productive influence was to go forth," Isa. ii. 3; Mic. iv. 2.

17. His name shall endure for ever. Surely "a greater than Solomon is here."

For although he reigned longer than many a king, and his fame is still great, yet it is Jesus Christ that has a name above every name, which shall last and even increase to everlasting, or perpetually, as the original signifies. His name shall be continued as long as the sun, literally before the sun, or in the presence of the sun. Nor should he be a curse to men: And men shall be blessed in him. Thus should be fulfilled the predictions recorded of old, Gen. xii. 3; xviii. 18; xxii. 18; xxviii. 14. The form of expression here found was used in later times, Jer. iv. 2. A more literal rendering would be: And in him shall they bless themselves, or call themselves blessed. All nations shall call him blessed. In the preceding clause blessed is equivalent to receiving a benediction, as in Ps. v. 12; in this it is equivalent to very happy, as in Ps. i. 1.

18. Blessed be the LORD God, the God of Israel, who only doeth wondrous things. Blessed, i. e., praised. It is a doxology. Jehovah God was the God of the man and of the people called Israel. The history of his dealings with them showed how marvellous were his works. There was none like him. Scott: "God alone has done most wonderful things, in blessing the nations by Jesus Christ; and he will do wonderful things." They will all result in the exaltation of his Son."

19. And blessed be his glorious name for ever. Blessed, praised, receiving benediction as in v. 18. For ever, as in v. 17. His glorious name, literally his name of glory. A parallel is found in Neh. ix. 5. And let the whole earth be filled with his glory. The verb is in the future, shall be filled. The prophet was confident of the event. A parallel is found in Num. xiv. 21. The prophet closes the verse with the solemn words, Amen, and Amen. On this phrase see on Ps. xli. 13. The Septuagint: So let it be, So let it be. The repetition is significant.

20. The prayers of David the son of Jesse are ended. This may mean either: 1, that this is the last Psalm, which David ever composed, being written after Solomon was actually king, and but a short time before David's death; 2, that this was the last composition he wrote which belonged to the class called prayers; 3, that David having foretold and prayed for the kingdom of Solomon, and for the glory of Messiah, he felt as if he had no more to ask for; 4, that this is the last Psalm which David himself arranged for public worship, the rest being collected by Hezekiah and, after him, by Ezra; or, 5, that this is the end of the second book of Psalms, according to the Jewish method of dividing the Psalter. The Syriac interprets it to favor this last view. Yet it cannot be shown that the book of Psalms was at so early a day divided into five books by the Jews themselves. See Introduction, § 11. The Arabic wholly omits this verse and closes with Alleluiah. The reader will not forget Montgomery's beautiful hymn founded on this Psalm:

"Hail to the Lord's anointed."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. There can be no more fit employment for the aged than prayer, v. 1. Compare Luke ii. 37. Parents, stricken in years, ought to pray much for their children, especially if called to posts of difficulty in Church or State. They should earnestly supplicate God's blessing in the way of divine guidance and support. No man is fit for any office without endowments from God. Blessed is he who by God's Spirit is prepared for his work. Scott: "Pious parents will be the more earnest in prayer for their children, in proportion to the importance of those stations which they are likely to occupy." Good men will not forget posterity.

2. We are specially bound to pray for our rulers, whether they are our kin or others, v. 1. Compare 1 Tim. ii. 1-3. Dr. R. Anderson: "All who desire the success of missions should make continual 'supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks,' 'for kings and for all that are in authority,' that missionaries, in the several countries where they labor, 'may lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty.'" We ought to pray for others besides those under whose government we live—even all rulers.

3. The best thing we can ask for children or rulers is that they may be governed by God's decisions, and controlled by his word, v. 1.

4. Good government is a great blessing, whatever be its form, vv. 2, 3. Perhaps the worst settled government on earth is not so bad as anarchy. But how blessed is the reign of Messiah, Isa. xxxii. 17, 18. Indeed inspired poets and prophets have exhausted all the beauties of language in foretelling the blessedness of Christ's kingdom. It has every excellence. It is conducted by righteous rulers and laws, v. 2. It protects and provides for those who cannot take care of themselves, v. 3.^a It is stable as the mountains. No wrong-doer can resist it, v. 4. Christ rules his subjects not by tyranny and cruelty, not by racks and whips, but by godly fear, v. 5. However low may be the condition of Christ's people at a given time, yet they shall be revived and made to flourish. Nor is Christ's kingdom composed of abjects and wretches, but of souls righteous in the eye of the law, and in heart also, v. 7. His kingdom is also peace, as well as righteousness and joy in the Holy Ghost, v. 7. It is catholic, embracing all lands, bringing salvation to savage and polished nations, to kings, peasants and paupers, the most exalted and the most down-trodden, vv. 8-13. "The man that hath nothing within him or without him to commend him to Christ, to assist, help, relieve, or comfort him in heaven or earth, is not despised by Christ." Christ deals gently with his people, and rescues them, not permitting tempters and tyrants to destroy or harm them, highly valuing their lives, v. 14. Christ's kingdom shall be everlasting, vv. 7, 15, 17. The glory and excellency of the nations shall be brought into it. It shall be maintained not by arms and craft, but by acts of devotion, especially by prayer and praise, v. 15. Christ has no reluctant subjects. All his people are willing in the day of his power. Nor does his kingdom come with observation; nor is it dependent on appearances, v. 16. Though temporal princes may not aspire to universal empire, nor to be like Christ in some things, yet ought they to imitate him in their care of the poor, and needy, and defenceless, in seeking to be beloved and justly praised as well as revered, and in putting down oppression and wrong-doing.

5. There is hope for the heathen in the promises and prophecies of God's word, vv. 8-11. Tholuck: "The most uncivilized, the most distant, and most opulent nations shall pay their homage to him."

6. It shall be for an everlasting joy that Christ shall die no more, but is forever beyond the reach of the insults of the wicked, and the power of evil. He shall live, v. 15.

7. As prophecy foretells, so also duty requires that the best of everything shall be given to the service and for the honor of Christ, v. 15. To offer him the lame, and the torn, and the mean, and the blemished is to imitate the Jewish Church in her most corrupt days.

8. In this Psalm we have ample instruction on the matter of offering religious worship to Christ. The fit object of prayer and praise must be divine, v. 15. Compare Acts vii. 59, 60.

9. It is our wisdom to conform all our plans to the method of God, which is to bring great results from causes by carnal men esteemed contemptible, v. 16. It is only fools who despise the day of small things.

10. The perpetuity and enlargement of Christ's kingdom are fair arguments for his divinity, vv. 15, 17. So thought Napoleon, when he compared the work of great earthly conquerors with the work of Christ. For these temporal monarchs, when dead a hundred years, no man was willing to die. But Jesus has millions of followers in every age, who would not hesitate to lay down their lives for his cause and honor.

11. Eternity will be required to show to angels and men the greatness of the blessing, which Christ is to his ransomed ones. None are more ready than they to say they cannot fathom the depths, nor measure the height of his love and mercy.

12. Benediction shall forever and ever be heaped upon him, who has brought salvation to men, v. 17. Are we now doing our part in this work?

13. It were to be wished that God's people and ministers were better acquainted with the doxologies of Scripture, and did more abound in the use of them, vv. 18, 19.

14. As Christ shall live and reign, be known, loved and adored eternally, let us take his yoke upon us, for it is light; let us receive him as the Lord our righteousness; let us richly partake of his Spirit; let us follow his footsteps; let us be kind to his people and cast in our lot with them; let us not live to ourselves, but to him that bought us with his blood; let us glory in his cross; let us not be offended in him, nor ashamed of him or his word; let us live and die in his service and to his glory.

PSALM LXXIII.

A Psalm of Asaph.

- 1 Truly God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart.
- 2 But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped.
- 3 For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked.
- 4 For there are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm.
- 5 They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men.
- 6 Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain; violence covereth them as a garment.
- 7 Their eyes stand out with fatness: they have more than heart could wish.
- 8 They are corrupt, and speak wickedly concerning oppression: they speak loftily.
- 9 They set their mouth against the heavens, and their tongue walketh through the earth.
- 10 Therefore his people return hither: and waters of a full cup are wrung out to them.
- 11 And they say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the Most High?
- 12 Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches.
- 13 Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency.
- 14 For all the day long have I been plagued, and chastened every morning.
- 15 If I say, I will speak thus; behold, I should offend against the generation of thy children.
- 16 When I thought to know this, it was too painful for me;
- 17 Until I went into the sanctuary of God; then understood I their end.
- 18 Surely thou didst set them in slippery places: thou castedst them down into destruction.
- 19 How are they brought into desolation, as in a moment! they are utterly consumed with terrors.
- 20 As a dream when one awaketh; so, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image.
- 21 Thus my heart was grieved, and I was pricked in my reins.
- 22 So foolish was I, and ignorant: I was as a beast before thee.
- 23 Nevertheless I am continually with thee: thou hast holden me by my right hand.
- 24 Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory.
- 25 Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee.
- 26 My flesh and my heart faileth: but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion for ever.
- 27 For, lo, they that are far from thee shall perish: thou hast destroyed all them that go a whoring from thee.
- 28 But it is good for me to draw near to God: I have put my trust in the Lord God, that I may declare all thy works.

PSALMS l. lxxiii.—lxxxiii. were written by Asaph. See Introduction, § 4, and on title of Ps. l. Alexander: "There is not the slightest ground for doubting the correctness of the title, which ascribes the Psalm to Asaph." If 2 Chron. xxix. 30 proves there were two Asaphs, as some maintain, it also proves there were two Davids, Psalmists. Scott dates it B. C. 1020; Patrick, Jebb, Rosenmüller and Clarke give it a later date, some as late as the captivity. In this ode are five names of the Creator; Elohim God, El God, Gel-yohn Most High, Adonai Lord and Jehovah LORD, on which respectively see on Ps. iii. 2; v. 4; vii. 17; ii. 4; i. 2. Hengstenberg thinks it is nearly related to Psalms xxxvii. xlix. Luther: "This is a Psalm, that instructs us against that great offence and stumbling-block concerning which all the prophets have complained: namely, that the wicked flourish in the world, enjoy prosperity, and increase in abundance, while the godly suffer cold and hunger, and are afflicted, and spit upon, and despised, and condemned; and that God seems to be against his friends and to neglect them, and to regard, support and give success to his enemies. This offence has existed, and has exercised and vexed the godly from the very beginning of the church." The modern Jews put this and the sixteen compositions next following into what they call the third book of Psalms. But see Introduction, § 11.

1. Truly God is good to Israel, even to such as are of a clean heart. Truly, see on Ps. lxii. 1. The Septuagint and the versions, which follow it, read, How good is God; Calvin and others: Yet God is good; Hengstenberg and others: Only good is God, meaning that God is always good. Alexander thinks this verse is "the theme of the whole Psalm." Israel is explained in the last clause of the verse as designating such as are of a clean heart. Scott: "The same distinction between an Israelite by nation, and the true Israelite, which is often made in the New Testament, is here explicitly established." Compare Matt. v. 8; John i. 47–51; Rom. ii. 25–29. Hengstenberg: "The distinction which the Psalmist makes among the Israelites themselves, at the very beginning of the Psalm, goes directly against those, who consider the Psalm as having a national reference." Good, sometimes rendered goodness, Ps. lxxviii. 10; cvii. 9. God is goodness itself, Matt. xix. 17. Calvin: "The Psalmist does not ascend into the chair to dispute after the manner of the Philosophers, and to deliver his discourse in a style of studied oratory; but, as if he had escaped from hell, he proclaims with a loud voice, and with impassioned feeling, that he had obtained the victory."

2. But as for me, my feet were almost gone; my steps had well nigh slipped. As for me, well rendered. There is a fitness in making it emphatic. The man, who makes the profession in v. 1, is the very one, who had endured the most distressing temptations to an opposite belief—temptations which were within a very little of casting him into the gulf of atheism, leading him to deny providence, and thus ruining him forever. Gone, turned aside, gone down, declined, wrested, perverted. Slipped, literally poured out, like water flowing in any channel open to it. We met the same word in Ps. xxii. 14. It expresses extreme sadness and dejection. The cause of this dreadful depression was that he was tempted to give up first truths of religion.

3. For I was envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. Envious, elsewhere also rendered zealous, and jealous. We had it in Ps. xxxvii. 1. It may signify either that he felt the risings of sinful envy towards the wicked themselves, or that he was jealous of God's love to him, when he saw Jehovah showering outward blessings on his open enemies. The latter is the more probable. But he may have been tempted in both ways. Foolish, literally boasters, those who think and say that they are something when they are nothing. The Chaldee renders it scoffers; Syriac, the unjust; Arabic, the lawless; Boothroyd, the madly profane; Ainsworth and Fry, the vain-glorious; Hengstenberg, the haughty; Alexander, the proud. Prosperity, literally peace, and so the fruits of peace. Sometimes the enemies of God have no sad changes for a long time. The foolish of the first clause are the same as the wicked, the ungodly of the last; see on Ps. i. 1. Saw, in the future shall see. What Asaph saw he expected to continue to see. He had long noticed this, and perceived no signs of a change.

4. For there are no bands in their death. Bands, found only here and in Isa. lvi. 11. 6. It has occasioned much difficulty. Le Clerc: They have no pains when they die. Hammond has an unusually long note upon it. His conclusion is that we may read, There are no pangs in their death, meaning they die with ease; or, There are no heavy burdens bound on them in their death, meaning no hard sufferings; or, There are no sentences of death, from courts or diseases, upon them; or, There are no conspiracies for their deaths, meaning no persons bound by agreement to destroy them. The idea of band, or tie, in some form is to be preserved in the translation. Chaldee: They are not terrified nor troubled on account of the day of their death. They think not much of dying before death comes. And when they do die, it is often not with that distress, or even that concern, which one would expect. Jebb: They are in no terror of death. Diodati: "They do sweetly pass over their natural course of life, and are not violently drawn to an untimely death, through sickness or other chances." Clarke's note is very good: "Many of the godly have sore conflicts at their death. Their enemy then thrusts sore at them that they may fall; or that their confidence in their God may be shaken: but of this the ungodly know nothing. Satan will not molest them; he is sure of his prey; they are entangled, and cannot now break their nets: their consciences are seared, they have no sense of guilt. If they think at all of another world, they presume on that mercy which they never sought, and of which they have no distinct notion. Perhaps, 'they die without a sigh or a groan; and thus go off as quiet as a lamb'—to the slaughter." But their strength is firm, fat, rank, plenteous. Chaldee: Their heart is fat and brave; Ainsworth: Lusty is their strength; Edwards: But [they] are lusty and strong; Fry: Their strength is perfect and firm; Mudge: But they are plump and strong; Green: But [they] are vigorous and strong.

5. They are not in trouble as other men; neither are they plagued like other men. Trouble, a noun elsewhere also rendered toil, labor, sorrow, misery, pain, travail, grievousness. Plagued, elsewhere also rendered smitten, stricken, literally touched. The corresponding noun is commonly rendered the plague. It is so more than fifty times in Leviticus. See also Gen. xii. 17; Ex. xi. 1. The prophet throughout this account speaks not of wicked men universally, but tells what often happens to them. Nor does he speak so much of the reality as of appearances in their case. The verb is in the future, signifying that appearances are that they will not be plagued at any time of life like other men; their exemption from trouble seems to last a long time.

6. Therefore pride compasseth them about as a chain. Pride, swelling, haughtiness. Chains of gold were used for ornament, and some think also as badges of office. Compare Gen. xli. 42; Cant. i. 10; iv. 9; Ezek. xvi. 11; Dan. v. 7, 16, 29. Violence covereth them as a garment. The Chaldee divides and renders the verse differently: Therefore pride compasseth them about: the crown which they put on their head is from their rapine. But the common rendering is better. To be clothed or covered with any sin or vice shows the great lengths men have gone in evil. Calvin: "David meant to comprehend, in one word, the whole attire of the person."

7. Their eyes stand out with fatness. Chaldee: Their countenance is changed by fatness. Scott: "Their looks discovered their excessive sensuality and voluptuousness." No doubt the common version gives the sense. Morison: "They are conspicuous for the grossness of their sensuality." They have more than heart could wish. There is diversity in rendering this clause. Church of England: They do even what they lust;

Ainsworth and Venema: They pass the imaginations of the heart; Amesius: The thoughts of their heart exceed all proper bounds; Edwards: They are prosperous beyond the imagination of their hearts; Clarke: They surpass the thoughts of their heart. The object of the prophet is not so much to tell how wicked they are, but to let us see how prosperous they appear to be. If the common version does not give the meaning, it comes very near it. Perhaps the exact sense is, They have more than they expected. They have more than a right heart could wish.

8. They are corrupt. I can find no reason for this rendering. The verb of which the above is a translation is that from which lexicographers derive our English word, mock. Jerome: They have scoffed; Calvin: They become insolent; Fry: They speak jestingly of evil, literally, they joke and talk; Abu Walid, quoted in Hammond: They prate foolishly in their speech; Hengstenberg: They scoff; Alexander: They mock. Pretty certainly the sense is, They are deriders. And [they] speaking wickedly concerning oppression. They by speech suggest, favor and argue for oppression, extortion, cruelty. They speak loftily, or from on high, as if they were some great ones. Clarke: "They vindicate excessive acts of government; they push justice to its rigor. They neither show equity, lenity, nor mercy: they are cruel, and they vindicate their proceedings."

9. They set their mouth against the heavens. The ancient versions quite agree with the English in rendering this clause. So also do Calvin, Venema, Ainsworth, Tremellius and Junius, Piscator, Edwards, Pool and others. The sense then seems to be that the prosperous wicked speak impudently and profanely against God's name, word, worship, providence, Gospel and people; they pour contempt on all serious piety, they make light of eternal things. They blaspheme. But the church of England has it: For they stretch forth their mouth unto the heaven; Fry: They set their mouths in the heavens. This rendering is favored by Jebb and others. Alexander: "They speak as if they thought themselves superior beings, their mouth in heaven." This view of the passage is not so good as the first. It makes it virtually a repetition of the last preceding clause, and so there is no progress in the description. And their tongue walketh through the earth. They say they are licensed characters. They have no bridle on their tongues. They roam at large like wild beasts. They say what they will and of whom they will. Henry: "They take liberty to abuse all that come in their way. No man's greatness or goodness can secure him from the scourge of the virulent tongue; they take a pride and pleasure in bantering all mankind." They are traducers. They are full of reproaches and of bitterness. Such a state of society fills good men with the deepest distress.

10. Therefore his people return hither; and waters of a full cup are wrung out to them. Chaldee: Therefore they are turned against the people of God, that they may slay them, and smite them with mauls, so that they may shed tears. In Hebrew poetry waters rather point to adversity than prosperity. In the second clause them refers to God's people, not to the wicked. Return, as in Mal. iii. 18. It is probably to be taken for an act of the mind, particularly of reflection. So Diodati interprets it as returning to these thoughts. Ainsworth: "By waters of a full cup are meant abundance of tears." God's people are often filled with sorrow, when they look at the afflictions of the righteous and the success of the wicked. Against temptations arising from such a source David warns us in Ps. xxxvii. Into this very matter the weeping prophet inquires, Jer. xii. 1. False reasonings on this subject involved Job's three friends in their serious errors. Scott: "The verse is in the future, and it seems most natural to explain it, as the Psalmist's apprehension, that the prosperity of daring sinners would eventually prove an invincible temptation, and a great source of sorrow to believers." Alexander thinks the most natural interpretation is "that which understands the sense to be, that God still suffers or requires his people to survey the painful spectacle and drain the bitter draught presented by the undisturbed prosperity of wicked men." No commentator has better expressed the spirit of the passage than Henry: "Because the wicked are so very daring, therefore his people return hither; they are at the same pause, the same plunge, that I am at; they know not what to say to it, any more than I do, and the rather, because waters of a full cup are wrung out to them; they are not only made to drink, and to drink deep of the bitter cup of affliction, but to drink all; care is taken that they lose not a drop of that unpleasant potion, the waters are wrung out unto them, that they may have the dregs of the cup. They pour out abundance of tears when they hear wicked people blaspheme God and speak profanely." Ps. cxix. 136.

11. And they say, How doth God know? and is there knowledge in the Most High? The church of England has it: Tush, say they, how should God perceive it? is there knowledge in the Most High? Prosperity unsanctified soon leads to practical atheism; see on Ps. x. 11. It is the language, not of good men, but of the wicked. So says the next verse:

12. Behold, these are the ungodly, who prosper in the world; they increase in riches. Ungodly, in v. 3 wicked. The prosperity which the wicked have is only in the world, or this age. The word rendered who prosper, is an adjective, the prosperous, and is, perhaps, to be regarded as nominative to the verb rendered increase. Riches, also rendered wealth, substance, strength, power, valor. It may signify that these men were to all appearance growing in wealth, numbers, and influence, so as to carry everything their own way.

13. Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency. Both clauses describe the man who serves God; one expressing the uprightness of his motives; the other, of his life. In vain qualifies both clauses. Verily, see on v. 1, and on Ps. lxii. 1. Innocency, always so rendered when it refers to moral character, equivalent to blamelessness. The state of the Psalmist's mind was this: If these foolish, wicked, ungodly men are allowed to enjoy such quiet and prosperity under the government of God for a long time, what am I to think of the laws of providence? As yet, my own abhorrence of wickedness and freedom from iniquity appear to produce no advantage, but, on the contrary, unhappy results. Calvin: "Truly I have labored in vain to obtain and preserve a pure heart and clean hands, seeing continued afflictions await me, and, so to speak, are on the watch to meet me at break of day. Such a condition surely shows that there is no reward for innocence before God, else he would certainly deal somewhat more compassionately towards those who serve him."

14. For all the day long have I been plagued, and chastened every morning. Plagued, as in v. 5. Chastened, the Hebrew word is a noun elsewhere rendered chastisement, rebuke, reproof, correction. Alexander: "While they, though wicked, still increase in wealth, and seem secure forever, I, who have faithfully endeavored to avoid sin and to do the will of God, am subjected, every day and all day, to privation and distress."

15. If I say, I will speak thus; behold, I should offend against the generation of thy children. Diodati: "That is, I do God's church a great deal of injury, which hath always been under afflictions, if I think or say, that all her piety hath been without hope, or her hope without effect." For offend, Ainsworth has unfaithfully wrong; Edwards, betray; Fry, wrong; Horsley, be a traitor to; Green, be false to; Hammond, deal perfidiously with. We do a great wrong to believers, and a special harm to weak Christians, when we tell our foolish and wicked thoughts. Hengstenberg: "What had gone before was a soliloquy. Those who fear God never let their inward doubts become known abroad. They do not repair with them to the streets, where ignorant people would make them the occasion of open ungodliness; but they take them to the sanctuary of God; and give expression to their doubts, like the Psalmist, when they can, at the same time, make known their victory." The generation of God's children here are the same as the generation of the righteous, Ps. xiv. 5; the generation of them that seek God, Ps. xxiv. 6; the generation of the upright, Ps. cxii. 2. Hammond: "The word generation often signifies a set or sort of men." The generation of God's people includes all who love and fear God, profess his religion, maintain his worship, obey his laws and trust his grace.

16. When I thought to know this it was too painful for me. There are no subjects more inscrutable than the nature and providence of God. No creature can comprehend either. Such knowledge is high. We cannot attain unto it. For painful Boothroyd has difficult; Green, hard; Horsley, perplexing. The word rendered too painful is a noun, elsewhere in this Psalm rendered trouble; see on v. 5. It is a travail, a grievousness to even good men to see a course of events which no mortal can explain, and which, without revelation, must confound us. Calvin: "Whoever, in applying himself to the examination of God's judgments, expects to become acquainted with them by his natural understanding, will be disappointed, and will find that he is engaged in a task at once painful and profitless; and, therefore, it is indispensably necessary to rise higher, and to seek illumination from heaven." But the Psalmist is not in despair. This verse contains not a finished sentence, q. d., I was for a while confounded, 17. Until I went into the sanctuary of God. Sanctuary, so rendered by many; in Ps. lxxviii. 35, holy places. Horsley thinks it means, "Until I entered into the secret grounds of God's dealings with mankind." Cresswell thinks the meaning is, "Until I entered into the grounds of God's dealings with men, as explained by the sacred writings, which are laid up in the place dedicated to his worship." Luther: "Until I hear or read the word, and find what God saith concerning the ungodly; and until I look into the histories and behold the judgments of God, which have been since the foundation of the world." God's word was kept in the sanctuary, it was there illustrated in public worship, and explained by the priests, whose lips kept knowledge, and were commanded to expound it, Mal. ii. 7. In the sanctuary too for many centuries God spake by Urim and Thummim, though we have no evidence that in this matter Asaph sought answer by oracle. God's word is wonderful and makes all plain: Then understood I their end. The Bible brings this life and the next, time and eternity, human conduct and the last judgment, the sinner's career and the sinner's end into view at once. This makes a vast difference. Indeed it affords a perfect clearing up of doubt, and quite removes perplexity on this hard point of providence. In God's house he learned that the lot of the wicked was not desirable.

18. Surely thou didst set them in slippery places. In Moses' last great sermon we have the same idea: "Their feet shall slide in due time," Deut. xxxii. 35; compare Ps. xxxv. 6. In Job xxvii. 7, 8; Ps. xc. 5, the same doctrine is taught, though in different language. Many parallel passages are found in the sacred writings given to the church before or during the time of Asaph. Surely, by some rendered only, as in v. 1; Ps. lxii. 1. Slippery places, literally slipperinesses, or smoothnesses. Set, in v. 28 and often rendered put. Here in Hebrew it is in the future, will set. See Introduction, § 6. The common version doubtless gives the sense. Thou castedst them down into destruction. Castedst, literally hast caused them to fall. Destruction, plural destructions, only here and in Ps. lxxiv. 3, where we read desolations. The latter rendering is followed by many. Their fearful elevation makes their fall the more dreadful. "When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish; it is that they shall be destroyed for ever." The ox is fattened for the slaughter.

19. How are they brought into desolation as in a moment! Desolation, often rendered astonishment, Deut. xxviii. 37; Jer. xxv. 9; Ezek. xxiii. 33. They drink the wine of astonishment. Yea, They are consumed with terrors. There are no greater cowards than the greatest blusterers. None finally suffer more with terrors than those who appear to be commonly most free from apprehension. Nor can such tell at what moment they may be seized with the most terrible fears, and never be able to shake them off, no, not while eternity endures. Nor will God himself then help or save or pity them, Isa. xxvii. 11; Jer. xiii. 14. Compare Zech. vii. 11-13. Yea, more:

20. As a dream when one awaketh; so, O Lord, when thou awakest, thou shalt despise their image. Chaldee: As a dream vanishes from a man, when he awakes; so, O Lord, in the day of great judgment when they shall be raised from their sepulchres, thou wilt in wrath despise their image. Image, always so rendered except in Ps. xxxix. 6, where it is vain shew. Horsley would so render it here: Like the dream of a man beginning to wake publicly, O Lord, thou renderest their vain show contemptible. Green has it: As a dream, when they awake, vanisheth away, so shalt thou, O Lord, when thou rousest them up, make their imaginary happiness to disappear. Diodat's paraphrase is good: "When these vain shadows of the world shall be past, in which thy providence seemeth to sleep, when thou shalt bring forth everything into the light of thy judgment, thou shalt make it appear that their prosperity hath been but a false illusion: and thou shalt change this worldly lustre into everlasting ignominy."

21. Thus my heart was grieved. Syriac: My heart was troubled; Calvin and Edwards: My heart was in a ferment; Fry: My heart has been vexed. And I was pricked in my reins. Calvin and Hengstenberg: I was pierced in my reins; Edwards: I felt acute pains in my reins. Reins, see on Ps. vii. 9; compare Ps. xvi. 7; xxvi. 2. Alexander: "The verbs are properly reflexives, my heart exacerbates itself, I pierce myself, and are perhaps intended to describe his sufferings as the fruit of his own sin and folly."

22. So foolish was I, and ignorant. Chaldee: I am a fool, who know not; Arabic: I am vile and ignorant; Jebb: I myself was brutish and did not know; Alexander: I (am) brutish and know not (the true state of the case.) Brutish is better than foolish. I was as a beast before thee. Beast, Hebrew, Behemoth, either such a monster as is described in Job xl. 15, or in the plural cattle in general; see Ps. viii. 7; l. 10; any beast whatever. This verse and the preceding Clarke paraphrases: "The different views which I got of this subject quite confounded me: I was equally astonished at their sudden overthrow, and my own ignorance. I felt as if I were a beast in stupidity. I permitted my mind to be wholly occupied with sensible things, like the beasts that perish, and did not look into a future state; nor did I consider, nor submit to the wise designs of an unerring Providence." Compare Ps. xlix. 10; xcii. 6; xciv. 8; Pr. xxx. 2.

23. Nevertheless I am continually with thee: thou hast holden me by my right hand. The two clauses teach the constant care and support of divine providence towards him, notwithstanding his great errors and brutish ignorance. "The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations," 2 Pet. ii. 9. By faith we have hold on God; but our grip is often feeble. Our great safety lies in this that God holds us with an omnipotent grasp, and never entirely lets us go. The deliverance was as remarkable as the danger had been great. His mind was now satisfied that a holy, wise and powerful God was his friend, guide, and support. This was attended with confidence for the future:

24. Thou shalt guide me with thy counsel, and afterward receive me to glory. Of difficult verses perhaps none is better translated than this. Counsel, applied either to God's word, or to his plan. Glory doubtless includes eternal blessedness, and all that leads to it. See on Ps. iii. 3; viii. 5. Calvin: "It comprehends the whole course of our happiness from the commencement, which is seen here upon earth, even to the consummation which we expect to realize in heaven."

25. Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee. The words supplied in the English text doubtless give the sense. Edwards: Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is nothing upon earth I love equally with thee; Clarke: Who is there to me in the heavens? And with thee I have desired nothing in the earth; Green: Whom have I in heaven but thee? And on earth I delight in none besides thee. Instead of besides thee, the church of England and Horne read in comparison of thee. Alexander: "With thee can denote either combination or comparison." There is no protector, provider, or portion that can be desired in comparison with God, or that can make us happy without God.

26. My flesh and my heart faileth. Faileth, also rendered is spent, is consumed, is ended, is finished. The verb is in the preterite; but the common version probably gives the sense. In ourselves we are poor creatures. We know nothing, deserve nothing, can do nothing; and withal we shall soon pass away. Our powers constantly tend to decay. But God is the strength of my heart. Strength, also rendered rock. See on Ps. xviii. 2, 31, 46. All our courage and firmness come from Jehovah. His strength is made perfect in our weakness. Calvin: "No man will cast himself wholly upon God, but he who feels himself in a fainting condition, and who despairs of the sufficiency of his own powers. We will seek nothing from God but what we are conscious of wanting in ourselves." But the true believer knows that all his help must come from God. Yea, more, he knows that Jehovah himself must not only sustain him here, but satisfy him hereafter: [God is] my portion for ever. Portion, also rendered inheritance, that which lawfully falls to one's share; see on Ps. xvi. 5; xvii. 14. A child of God, though he suffer long and severely, fares well; for he has God for his portion. It is far otherwise with the wicked;

27. For, lo, they that are far from thee shall perish. Perish, as in Ps. i. 6; ii. 12; see on those places. To be far from God denotes irreligion; as to draw near to God, to be brought nigh to God, and to walk with God denote true piety and its blessings. The reason, why the Psalmist is so confident that a sad end will come to the wicked is that it always has so turned out: Thou hast destroyed them that go a whoring from thee. Chaldee: Thou hast destroyed all them that have wandered away from thy fear; Edwards: Thou cuttest off every one that apostatizes from thee; Fry: Thou cuttest off all who are faithless to thee. Sutcliffe: "To forsake the true God for false gods is spiritual adultery." Calvin: "It is the worst kind of adultery to divide our heart that it may not continue fixed exclusively upon God. Harlotry is the name given in Scripture to a withdrawing of the affections from Jehovah, and setting them on things below, whether they be false gods or riches, or anything loved and sought by carnal men. Compare Ex. xxxiv. 15; Num. xv. 39; Ps. cvi. 39; Jer. iii. 9, 20; Ezek. xxiii. 3, 5, 7; James iv. 4.

28. But it is good for me to draw near to God. The nearness of this verse is in contrast with the being far off in v. 27. Such is the form of the original that it may mean either God's drawing near to the Psalmist, or the Psalmist's drawing near to God. Perhaps both senses may be gathered according to James iv. 8: "Draw nigh to God, and he will draw nigh to you." I have put my trust in the Lord God, the Lord Jehovah, the self-existent, eternal, independent, unchangeable Ruler of the world. Trust, so rendered here only, twice hope, twice shelter, and often refuge; see on Ps. xiv. 6; xlv. 1. He who has refuge in God is courageous—That I may declare all thy works, i. e., publish and celebrate with gratitude and praise God's doings, even the very events of providence, which at the first seemed inscrutable.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. However appearances may be to the contrary, even for a considerable time, yet God loves his church, the true Israel, v. 1. This we should steadfastly believe. "Good thoughts of God will fortify us against many of Satan's temptations."

2. All the Scriptures require holiness. An Israelite with guile is no Israelite, v. 1. One may be called, and by good men esteemed a Christian, he may rest in the Gospel, and make his boast of God and of Christ. He may know God's will, and in his conscience and by his profession approve the things that are more excellent, being instructed out of the divine word, and be confident that he himself is a guide of the blind, a light of them which are in darkness, an instructor of the foolish, a teacher of babes, having the form of knowledge and of the truth in the Scriptures; and yet he may want a clean heart, and innocence of life. When one's heart is not right in the sight of God, any seeming rectitude of life is delusive; and when outward behaviour is wicked, it is idle to plead that the heart is right.

3. Even good men, though gifted and inspired, are in danger of sad lapses into sin and sinful errors, v. 2. Nothing but divine grace can preserve them. Henry: "The faith of even strong believers may sometimes be sorely shaken, and ready to fail them. There are storms that will try the firmest anchors. Those that shall never be quite undone, are sometimes very near it," Rom. xi. 20; 1 Cor. x. 12; 1 Pet. iv. 18.

4. Of all hard questions in divinity perhaps none are more suited to give the tempter an advantage against us than those respecting God's providence over the world. Compare Gen. xlii. 36; Job xxi. 7-15; Jer. xii. 1, 2. God's government is full of insoluble mysteries. It must be so. We are worms and he is wonderful in working. Tholuck: "We all confess to the indubitable article of faith, that God governs the world. How different would our constancy in affliction be, were we indubitably to believe it. But affliction is generally accompanied by dejection, dejection issues in doubt, doubt gives rise to mental conflict; the struggle becomes intense." Calvin notices the case of Brutus, who on his defeat by Antony said: "Whatever I have believed concerning virtue had no foundation in truth, but was the invention of men." Mere nature can go no further, can say no more, can do no better.

5. When but half a story is told, or half a drama enacted, it is very unfair to pronounce on the character of the whole. That which is behind may give an entirely different face to things. God's providence over his people and his enemies must not be judged till time and eternity can both be brought into the estimate, vv. 4-20. Here, says Calvin, "the ungodly for the most part triumph; and although they deliberately stir up God to anger, and provoke his vengeance, yet from his sparing them, it seems as if they had done nothing amiss in deriding him, and that they will never be called to account for it. On the other hand, the righteous, pinched with poverty, oppressed with many troubles, harassed by multiplied wrongs, and covered with shame and reproach, groan and sigh."

6. There is a consanguinity between all the evil principles of unrenewed men, vv. 6, 8, 9, 11, 12. Although at a given time they may not all be developed, they are there, and will come forth when the occasion calls for them. Pride reigns; violence breaks forth; if they cannot argue, they can at least scoff; they speak wickedly; they regard injustice, if advantageous for the present, as something at least excusable; they speak swelling words; they utter sentiments derogatory to God; they claim exemption from the ninth commandment, and, in fact, from the whole decalogue; they deny providence, and God's omniscience; they are ungodly, or, as Paul expresses it, they are free from righteousness. The Scripture account of human nature is nowhere flattering. Sanctified affliction is a blessing; unsanctified prosperity, a curse. It is better to die in faith than to live in unbelief.

7. Let the believer wait and all will come right, although now all is dark and disheartening. Let him not yield to the seducer. Dickson: "A temptation sometimes may be so powerfully borne in upon the spirit of a child of God, as to seem to be admitted, yielded unto, and subscribed unto, as in vv. 13, 14, we see." To yield to any temptation is sinful. To yield to one involving so much atheism is very dreadful. Let us ever hold fast the doctrine that God is righteous.

8. If we cannot explain God's ways, let us say nothing until such time as we can get the key to unlock the mystery of his providence, v. 15. Often we best glorify God by silence. The chief design of some trials doubtless is to shut our mouths, Ps. xxxix. 2. Blessed is the man who has grace to learn the lesson. In that state of mind he may come to know something. 'All true wisdom among men consists in being docile, and in implicitly submitting to the teachings of God.' Henry: "It is bad to think ill, but it is worse to speak it." Dickson: "So long as a temptation remaineth under dispute, and is not come to a settled decree and resolved practice, it hath not obtained full victory." Men adopt a false principle when they say, We may as well speak out all we think and feel.

9. In all conditions in life there is much in nature and in providence above our comprehension, v. 16. It will probably be so in all the stages of our future existence. It must be so, while a finite creature is the student, and Jehovah the subject of his inquiries. In heaven itself they sing the song: "Great and marvellous are thy works, Lord God Almighty." The next world will no doubt make plain much that was here inexplicable; but only to allow glorious mysteries to burst upon our enraptured view forever.

10. It is for a comfort and an encouragement, that so far as our duty is concerned, and so far as we must understand things necessary to our salvation, God's word and the worship he has instituted make all so plain that we may most reasonably rest satisfied, v. 17. Compare Matt. v. 3-11; Luke vi. 20-26. If men are poor in worldly goods, yet they may be rich in faith, and that makes heaven sure. Scott: "We shall never get ground against such temptations as the Psalmist had by merely speculating; and shall rather find our minds perplexed with new difficulties and objections, till we bring the whole matter and weigh it in the balance of the sanctuary. But attention to the sacred Scriptures, and fervent prayer, will soon extricate us from these labyrinths."

11. The more secure in their own minds the wicked are, the greater will be their surprise and amazement when their downfall shall come, vv. 18, 19. The ruin which they have taken a life-time to work out, will come upon them as in a moment, and they will be consumed with terrors. Compare Job xxvii. 20; Rev. ii. 27; xviii. 21. The career of God's foes, taken in connection with its termination, is truly doleful.

12. Of all the forms of predicting the downfall of the wicked, none are more terrific to a contemplative mind than those which declare that they shall be lightly esteemed, yea, despised by their Maker himself, v. 20. Here God's tender mercies are over all his works. Even the wicked have many blessings. But by and by God will forget to be gracious. The enemies of God will be slighted by him that made them.

13. We often gain our greatest victories by sinking into utter self-disesteem, and confessing our own nothingness and folly, v. 22. First the Psalmist says he was foolish, then ignorant, then that he was like a beast, a brute. If any would be wise, let him become a fool that he may be wise.

14. It is an unspeakable mercy to have a sweet sense of the presence of God at all times, and especially in the day of temptation, v. 23. His presence is life. The weakest saint can do the most difficult things, if God will be with him.

15. Nothing but faith will ever rectify the mistakes of reason on divine things, vv. 2-24.

16. Divine guidance is essential to our attaining eternal glory, v. 24. Tholuck: "The path of the godly may be slippery and rough, but an invisible hand will hold their right hand, guide them with a wise counsel, and ultimately, after shame and wretchedness, lead them in honor and glory to that place, where they shall be received by him who was their highest good on earth."

17. As God is the support, so also is he the portion of the soul, vv. 25, 26. He is an all-sufficient good. He is the sole sufficient good. There is none like him, there is none beside him, there is none with him. He is unmixed good, moral excellence itself in perfection. Without God heaven would be no heaven. All the saints and angels, all the martyrs, prophets and apostles, though making a goodly company, could not make a heaven. "The Lord God giveth them light, and the Lamb is the light thereof."

18. At no time, more than when their hopes exult, are the frailty and mortality of man welcome themes to pious souls, v. 26. Nor is there any incongruity in this. A good man's hope is not in bodily vigor, nor in anything natural, but in him who giveth us the victory over death and hell and all our foes. If we are weak, he is mighty. If we are fools, he is wisdom itself.

19. It is not strange that people have often swooned away under powerful preaching, in which the future misery of the wicked was portrayed, v. 27. Perdition and destruction are fearful words. What makes the matter the more appalling is that after all that is said on the subject, our conceptions are inadequate; for eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, nor the heart of man conceived the things that God hath prepared for them that hate him.

20. Sin must be the worst thing in the universe, v. 27. There it is denominated a being far from God, and harlotry, also iniquity, unrighteousness, defilement, transgression, a horrible thing. God never misleads us by the names he gives things. He never puts bitter for sweet. Blessed is he, who fully adopts Bible views of sin, and flees to the only remedy, the blood and righteousness of Christ.

21. Communion with God, accompanied by trust in him and a heart to declare his doings, is the life of our lives. It is the chief attainment of our earthly existence. The reason why so many good men often cry out, My leanness, my leanness, is that they so seldom have intimate fellowship with the Father and with his Son through the Holy Ghost.

22. The whole Psalm warns us not to judge after the sight of our eyes, nor to be pleased with mere appearances, however fair or plausible. Fine linen often covers an aching heart. A pleasing exterior is often but the ornament of a sepulchre full of dead men's bones. This world in all its forms is delusive.

23. It is no new thing for wickedness to be successful, and for injustice to triumph for a season, Eccle. v. 8; ix. 2, 3.

24. As each one of us must soon pass away, heart and flesh failing, let us both labor and pray for the needful preparation for our last, great, solemn change.

25. Henry: "Those that with an upright heart put their trust in God shall never want matter of thanksgiving to him."

PSALM LXXIV.

Maschil of Asaph.

1 O God, why hast thou cast us off for ever? why doth thine anger smoke against the sheep of thy pasture?

2 Remember thy congregation, which thou hast purchased of old; the rod of thine inheritance, which thou hast redeemed; this Mount Zion, wherein thou hast dwelt.

3 Lift up thy feet unto the perpetual desolations; even all that the enemy hath done wickedly in the sanctuary.

4 Thine enemies roar in the midst of thy congregations; they set up their ensigns for signs.

5 A man was famous according as he had lifted up axes upon the thick trees.

6 But now they break down the carved work thereof at once with axes and hammers.

7 They have cast fire into thy sanctuary, they have defiled by casting down the dwellingplace of thy name to the ground.

8 They said in their hearts, Let us destroy them together: they have burned up all the synagogues of God in the land.

9 We see not our signs: there is no more any prophet: neither is there among us any that knoweth how long.

10 O God, how long shall the adversary reproach? shall the enemy blaspheme thy name for ever?

11 Why withdrawest thou thy hand, even thy right hand? pluck it out of thy bosom.

12 For God is my King of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth.

13 Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength: thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters.

14 Thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces, and gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness.

15 Thou didst cleave the fountain and the flood: thou driedst up mighty rivers.

16 The day is thine, the night also is thine: thou hast prepared the light and the sun.

17 Thou hast set all the borders of the earth: thou hast made summer and winter.

18 Remember this, that the enemy hath reproached, O LORD, and that the foolish people have blasphemed thy name.

19 Oh deliver not the soul of thy turtledove unto the multitude of the wicked: forget not the congregation of thy poor for ever.

20 Have respect unto the covenant: for the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty.

21 Oh let not the oppressed return ashamed: let the poor and needy praise thy name.

22 Arise, O God, plead thine own cause: remember how the foolish man reproacheth thee daily.

23 Forget not the voice of thine enemies: the tumult of those that rise up against thee increaseth continually.

ON Maschil see on Ps. xxxii. This ode was for permanent use in the church. It is specially designed for times of commotion and persecution. On the authorship there are various opinions. Some ascribe it to Asaph, the cotemporary of David, and the author of Psalms l. lxxiii. This is perhaps correct. See on Psalm l. and Introduction, § 4. Those, who take this view, regard the Psalm as wholly prophetic. Why may it not be? Asaph was a seer. The language of the Psalm is indeed very much in the preterite form. But this may only show the certainty of the events predicted. This view relieves the interpretation of much difficulty. The ancient versions generally give us no light on the subject; but the Syriac gives Asaph as the author, and says it respects the time "when David saw the angel destroying the people, and wept and said, Let thy hand be against me and my offspring, and not against these innocent sheep. It is also a prediction of the siege of the city of the Jews, forty years after the ascension [of Christ,] by the aged Vespasian, and by his son Titus, who slew myriads of Jews and destroyed Jerusalem; and from that time even to the present day the Jews have been despised." If we regard the Psalm as prophetic, then there is no difficulty in supposing it was written by Asaph the seer. This view, though not preferred, is regarded as admissible by Ainsworth, Patrick, Pool, Muis, Henry, Scott and Morison. It is preferred and defended by Gill. It has been objected that such a prophecy uttered before the building of the temple would have been a "great discouragement to the building of it." But Solomon knew that there was "a time to break down," as well as "a time to build up." He knew that all earthly grandeur was fleeting. Very soon after the first temple was built, God told Solomon that both it and the nation should be brought to ruin, if Israel profaned the covenant, 1 Kings ix. 6-8. No man of sense expects earthly structures to last forever, and Solomon knew this would not. That this Psalm is a prophecy is admitted by many, who doubt or deny that it was composed in David's time. And there is no more difficulty attending its interpretation as a prediction uttered more than four hundred years before the event, than if it had been spoken but a short time before the fall of the city. Another opinion is that the author of this Psalm was indeed called Asaph, but that he was a different person from the cotemporary of David, who wrote Psalms l. lxxiii. Patrick conjectures it may be Asaph, who was keeper of the king's forest in the days of Nehemiah, Neh. ii. 8. Others think it was penned by some one called Asaph, who lived at the time of the captivity. Others conjecture it was by a cotemporary of Isaiah, Isa. xxxvi. 3, 22. Another opinion makes Asaph signify the posterity and successors of the great singer and seer of that name; as Jacob and David are often used for the descendants of those men. There seems to be no reason for supposing that Jeremiah wrote this Psalm, as a few have conjectured. Much less does there seem to be a shadow of evidence in favor of the opinion of Geddes that Mattathias mentioned in 1 Maccabees may have been the author. He, who would learn the use of the name Asaph in Scripture, may consult 2 Kings xviii. 18; 1 Chron. vi. 39; ix. 15; xv. 17; xvi. 7; xxv. 1, 2, 9; xxvi. 1, 2; 2 Chron. v. 12; xx. 14; xxix. 13, 30; xxxv. 15; Ezra ii. 41; iii. 10; Neh. ii. 8; vii. 44; xi. 17, 22; xii. 35, 46; Isa. xxxvi. 3, 22.

To what scene of desolation does the Psalm refer? Grotius applies it to the destruction of Shiloh, the city once so famous as the place of the tabernacle, but, being despoiled of the ark by the Philistines, it fell into decay and became a proverb for desolation; see Josh. xviii. 1-10; Ps. lxxviii. 60; Jer. vii. 12-14. But the tabernacle was not burned at Shiloh, though it had not in it the ark, 2 Chron. i. 3. Moreover this Psalm expressly refers to Mount Zion, vv. 3, 7. A few have applied the Psalm to the invasion of Judea by Sennacherib. But that haughty invader was not permitted to enter Jerusalem, nor shoot an arrow into it, nor cast a bank against it, 2 Kings xix. 32, much less to waste it and destroy the sanctuary. Calvin, Calmet, Pool, Henry and Tholuck suppose that the Psalm had its fulfilment in the destruction of the holy city by the Chaldeans, about five hundred and eighty-eight years before Christ. The chief objection to this is a clause in v. 9: "There is no more any prophet." Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel survived this desolation; but neither of them remained in Jerusalem; and for a time they all seem to have been silent. If the Psalm is interpreted as applying to Nebuchadnezzar's spoiling the holy city, the phrase under consideration must mean there was no seer left at Jerusalem. This would not be overstraining anything.

Others extend the scope of the prophecy so as to include the desecration of the temple by Antiochus Epiphanes in the times of the Maccabees, one hundred and sixty-seven years before Christ, and of course during the time of the second temple. Rosenmüller applies it to this time. But although Antiochus did many atrocious things, yet he did none of the things mentioned in vv. 6, 7. He defiled the temple, but he did not destroy it. This is urged by Theodoret. So that the reference to this dreadful persecutor, if real, cannot be exclusive. Others, following the Syriac title, refer it to the destruction of Jerusalem by the Romans. Clarke: "It is not so clear whether the desolations here refer to the days of Nebuchadnezzar, or to the desolation that took place under the Romans about the seventieth year of the Christian era." A full and candid examination of the whole subject would perhaps bring us to think that the Psalmist here groups together most of the appalling incidents attending the desolation of the temple and holy city from the time of Nebuchadnezzar to the days of Titus. One event followed another till the work was complete, and the prophecy fulfilled. Is there anything wild or unreasonable in this suggestion? See Jer. lii. 4-30; Matt. xxiv. 3-22, compared with Maccabees and Josephus. Morison calls this Psalm a "sombre and melancholy ode." Mant says: "It would be difficult to name a finer specimen of elegiac poetry than this pathetic Psalm of Asaph." Its date is decided very much by authorship. Clarke regards it as a late composition. Scott dates it B. C. 580. It is probably four hundred and eighty years older. In it we have Elohim God, El God and Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; v. 4; i. 2.

1. O God, why hast thou cast us off for ever? Hast cast off, as in Ps. xliii. 2; xlv. 9; lx. 1, 10. In this form the rendering is uniform. For ever, elsewhere also rendered constantly, always, perpetually. Hengstenberg: "The peculiarity of this Psalm is marked by the very frequent use of the word for ever, vv. 1, 3, 10." Why doth thine anger smoke against the sheep of thy pasture? Anger, as in Ps. ii. 5, 12, and often rendered wrath. Smoke, always so rendered in the English text or margin. The figure is drawn from the smoky vapor proceeding from the nostrils of furious animals. Sheep of thy pasture, a favorite mode of representing the covenant relation between God and his people, Ps. xxiii. 1; lxxix. 13; lxxx. 1 and often. The terrible sufferings of God's people by the hand of the Chaldeans, of Antiochus, and of Titus, all looked as if God had finally given them up to destruction. But as the second temple followed the first, as the awful sufferings of God's people in the second century before Christ were followed by greater glory than had ever before been seen in either temple, even Immanuel himself, so the fall of Israel was the riches of the world and the diminishing of them was the riches of the Gentiles. See Rom. xi. 15. God hath not forever cast off his people, but all Israel shall be saved. Calvin: "It is to be observed that the faithful, when persecuted by the heathen nations, lifted up their eyes to God, as if all the evils which they suffered had been inflicted by his hand alone. They were convinced that had not God been angry with them, their enemies would not have been permitted to take such license in injuring them." In this they were correct, Amos iii. 6.

2. Remember thy congregation, which thou hast purchased of old. For purchased of old the Chaldee reads hast had from the beginning, hast redeemed from Egypt; several other ancient versions: hast possessed from the beginning; Hengstenberg: hast acquired of old. Remember, also think upon, as in Gen. xl. 14. Congregation, as in Ps. i. 5; vii. 7, commonly so rendered, meaning the body of the Jewish nation, regarded as the worshippers of the true God. This people he calls the rod of thine inheritance, which thou hast redeemed. Redeemed or ransomed, viz., from Egypt. Redemption was commonly effected by a kinsman, who bought back the lawful captive with money. But God brought his people out of Egypt by his strong arm; yet he saves sinners from wrath by the blood of his Son. The lot of thine inheritance, is 'the heritage which thou hast measured out for thyself.' Hammond: "It signifies a nation to which through all successions God had a peculiar right and title." The prophet at once shows his meaning by speaking of this mount Zion wherein thou hast dwelt. There God revealed himself in glory. There he manifested his merciful kindness.

3. Lift up thy feet unto the perpetual desolations. Perpetual, in v. 1 for ever. Any of the desolations, supposed to be referred to in this Psalm, seemed to last a long time. To lift up the voice is to speak, Gen. xxxix. 18. To lift up the hand is to smite, Isa. xxvi. 11. To lift up the feet is to come forth. Green: Hasten thy steps. Gejerus paraphrases it: "Advance not slowly or by stealth, but with large and stately steps, full in the view of all; come to thy sanctuary, so long suffered to lie waste; examine what has been done there, and let thy grace and aid, hitherto so much withheld, be extended to us." The desolations are in the latter clause of the verse described as embracing a general ruin: Even all that the enemy hath done wickedly in the sanctuary. This would apply to the Chaldeans, to Antiochus, or to the Romans. Although Antiochus did not destroy the temple, yet he defiled it. Piscator thinks the sense is: "Speedily consider the desolations which the Babylonians have made in this holy mountain, in which thou dwelledst."

4. Thine enemies roar in the midst of thy congregations. Roar, in the Hebrew preterite—have roared. The rendering of the verb is uniform; see on Ps. xxxviii. 8. It is applied to the roar of lions over their prey. For congregations Ainsworth, Amesius, Tremellius and Junius have synagogues; as our translators have in v. 8. It is not certain when synagogue worship began. It is certain it abounded after the restoration from Babylon. All the word can be fairly made here to mean is the set place of meeting. Sometimes it is rendered the set time, the appointed time, for brevity solemnity, in the plural feasts. It is often rendered congregations. Hengstenberg thinks "there is a manifest allusion to the name of the tabernacle: 'The tabernacle of meeting.' Now the import of this name is expressly given in Ex. xxv. 8; xxix. 42, 43, 45, 46; Num. xvii. 7. The tabernacle was so called, not because the people assembled there, but because God met his people there." These invaders not only made a violent and tumultuous noise; but they performed other acts of like character. They set up their ensigns for signs. Ensigns and signs are the same word, sometimes rendered tokens, wonders. Here it evidently refers to banners or emblems of power. The import of the phrase doubtless is that the tokens of their power were seen everywhere, even in the temple, where the tokens of Jehovah's supreme authority had long been displayed.

5. A man was famous according as he had lifted up axes upon the thick trees. This is confessedly a difficult text. The renderings are various but do not give much light. The senses gathered from it are chiefly two. One is that among these ruthless invaders a man was famous among his companions in proportion to the part he took in destroying the curious wood-work of the temple. So Patrick and others. A still better sense is gathered by contrasting this verse with the next, q. d., In former days, when the temple was building, it was esteemed an honor to fell and hew timber for the sanctuary. Bishop Hall: "It was heretofore thought an employment of much honor and merit in those men, who did cut down and square the timber-trees for the building of the holy sanctuary." This seems also to have been the sense gathered by our translators:

6. But now they break down the carved work thereof at once with axes and hammers. What the carved work of the temple was may be seen in 1 Kings vi. 18, 29, 32, 35. The utter destruction accomplished by the Chaldeans on Jerusalem and its buildings is narrated in 2 Kings xxv. 8-17; Jer. lli. 12-23. Axes and hammers here only. The word rendered axes in v. 5, is not the same. Perhaps that in v. 5 is the name of axes proper, and this of hatchets, or small axes. Ainsworth has beetle; Jebb and Hengstenberg, hatchet; Fry, hatchets; and Alexander, sledge. The reason for destroying the carved wood-work before burning the temple was to express contempt and rage, and to secure the precious metal that overlaid the ceiling of the sanctuary.

7. They have cast fire into thy sanctuary. This might suit the desecrating of the holy city by the Chaldeans, by Antiochus, or by the Romans. Antiochus did not burn the temple, but he burnt its gates. The other invaders burnt and demolished it. They have defiled by casting down the dwellingplace of thy name to the ground. Chaldee: They have prostrated to the dust thy tabernacle in which thy name was invoked. Calvin: They have polluted the dwelling-place of thy name, levelling it with the ground.

8. They said in their hearts, Let us destroy them together. Destroy, never so rendered elsewhere, but commonly vex or oppress. By them we are to understand the whole body of the Jewish people. The enemies said all this in their hearts. It was their real and cordial wish. This was shown by their overt acts: They have burned up all the synagogues of God in the land. Synagogues, see on v. 4. Applied to locality it signifies set places of meeting. Whether others than the apartments of the temple are here referred to is not certain; but it is highly probable that "places where prayer was wont to be made" and where the law was read and explained to the people were early established in Judea. The fervent piety existing at times in the Jewish nation would warrant the belief that much was done to cultivate religious knowledge and affections in social meetings. Whether these were held in synagogues properly so called, or in other structures we may not now certainly know. But whatever the edifices were invaders wasted them by fire. It is true that all Israel were required to unite in the solemnities of the temple service thrice a year, Deut. xii. 5-16, and that no tribe was allowed to set up an altar for itself. Nor were burnt-offerings at any time made in the synagogues, although sacrifices by persons, or families were allowed in other places than the temple, 1 Sam. xvi. 3, 5; xx. 6; 1 Kings xviii. 30-38.

9. We see not our signs. Signs, see on v. 4. The meaning is, We no longer see the usual tokens of God's presence and supremacy, to which we have so long been accustomed, or, We no longer see miracles wrought in our behalf as our fathers saw of old. There is no more any prophet. In the first temple were found the oracle, the holy fire, the ark of the covenant, the cloud of glory, and the spirit of prophecy. From the days of Nebuchadnezzar, all these were wanting except that for a short time God sent Zechariah, Haggai and Malachi to prophesy after the Babylonish captivity. The time of the public service of the prophets Jeremiah, Ezekiel and Daniel, and their relation to the visible church after the destruction of the first temple have already been explained. Alexander: "The complaint of this, as of a recent loss, shows that the period meant is not that of the persecutions under Antiochus Epiphanes, when the gift of prophecy had been withdrawn for many generations." But it is mentioned as one of the sad things without saying how far back it dated. And it is worthy of remark that the very same thing is mentioned in 1 Maccabees iv. 46; ix. 27; xiv. 41. So that this very phrase might be used in the songs of the Jews from the days of Jeremiah to the time of Zechariah, and from Malachi to John the Baptist, and from Titus to this day. Neither is there among us any that knoweth how long; i. e., how long these troubles shall last. On the last two clauses compare Ezek. vii. 26; Lam. ii. 9; Am. viii. 11; Mic. iii. 6.

10. O God, how long shall the adversary reproach? How long? see on Ps. iv. 2; vi. 3. Adversary, enemy, foe, one who causes trouble, sorrow, distress, affliction. Reproach, often rendered defy, also upbraid, and rail against. Shall the enemy blaspheme thy name for ever? Enemy, always so rendered; also in vv. 3, 18. Blaspheme, often so rendered, also contemn, despise, abhor, provoke. The long-suffering of God could not be demonstrated, if he sent condign punishment on the wicked as soon as they go astray.

It is a desirable state of mind and a proof of a new heart to be afflicted by wickedness chiefly because it is a dishonor to God.

11. Why withdrawest thou thy hand, even thy right hand? pluck it out of thy bosom. Admitting the common version to be correct, the sense seems to be, "Why withholdest thou thy hand from relieving thy people and putting down their foes? Do not stand as an unconcerned spectator of our affliction, with thy hand in thy bosom, but draw it forth and help thy people." This is the best sense, perhaps. But for it some would read them; and for pluck, consume. Several fine scholars gather this sense: "How long wilt thou withdraw thy hand? Yea, wilt thou withdraw it from the midst of thy bosom? Consume, therefore these ungodly men, who so proudly despise thee." By the right hand we are to understand the power of God. Strong pleas are urged:

12. For God is my king of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth. The first ground of confidence is the long-standing covenant relation of Israel with the Almighty; he is my king of old. The second is that he had formerly done great things for them when oppressed, working salvation (literally salvations) for them in the midst of the earth, or before the eyes of all people. The history of the Jewish nation and church was made up of a series of well known wonders.

13. Thou didst divide the sea by thy strength. No doubt the reference is to the passage of God's chosen people through the Red sea, mentioned so often in Scripture, Ex. xiv. 16, 21; Josh. xxiv. 6, 7; Neh. ix. 11; Ps. lxxviii. 13. But there are allusions to the sea, which much resemble this, but which have no reference to the great deliverance at the Red sea, as Job xxvi. 12; Isa. li. 15; Jer. xxxi. 35. In all these our version speaks of dividing the sea. The verb is not that used in this verse, but one that signifies to break, to rest, find ease, so that to divide the sea may mean to break up its waves so as to make it still; whereas the verb divide in this verse signifies to sunder, so as to cleave. Thou brakest the heads of the dragons in the waters. Dragons, whales in Gen. i. 21; Job vii. 12; serpents in Ex. vii. 9, 10, 12; sea-monsters (margin sea-calves) in Lam. iv. 3; in all other places (eight in all) dragons, Deut. xxxii. 33; Neh. ii. 13; Ps. xci. 18; cxlviii. 7; Isa. xxvii. 1; li. 9; Jer. li. 34, and here. Perhaps it was not designed to designate any particular kind of inhabitant of the waters. Mant: "What animal is meant by this name is not well ascertained. But it seems to have been some aquatic or amphibious creature commonly known in the neighborhood of Egypt, but not the crocodile, as that is noticed under a different name in the following verse." No sea-monster had power to hurt the Israelites in their passage through the Red sea. Some of them are said to live a thousand years, but God at last breaks, or crushes them, so that they die. Alexander thus paraphrases: "Thou hast subdued and crushed the sea and its most terrible inhabitants." Some think that the clause teaches that the cleaving of the waters of the sea caused the death of many large fishes. Others by dragons understand the Egyptians, who persecuted the Jews. Some include other foes besides; see Isa. li. 9, 10; Ezek. xxix. 3, 4. To whatever the allusion is, it seems to designate an evil so prodigious as to fill the imagination, Isa. xxvii. 1; Ezek. xxxii. 2. God controls all causes, all evils, even such as are monstrous.

14. Thou brakest the heads of leviathan in pieces. The word leviathan occurs in the Hebrew Scriptures six times. In Job iii. 8, it is in the text rendered mourning, but in the margin leviathan. In Job xli. 1, we again have the word, and the whole of that chapter is occupied in a description of leviathan. We have it also in Ps. civ. 26, and twice in Isa. xxvii. 1. The other place is this verse. Simonis thinks we know neither the etymology of the name, nor the language to which it belongs. Perhaps he is right, though Gesenius thinks otherwise. Bochart has a lengthened argument to show that the word when used without a figure means the crocodile. Gese-nius gives this as the meaning in Job xli. 1. A large weight of modern authority lies on that side. Some affirm that in the Egyptian language Pharaoh signifies crocodile. Here the reference seems to be rather to the princes of Egypt than to its monarch, for we have heads of leviathan, the word rendered heads often signifying chiefs, captains. Tholuck: "He calls the nation of the Egyptians a monster, and a crocodile of the water, because that rapacious beast is peculiar to the river Nile." This relieves the clause of considerable difficulty, and there is no place where such a view would not give a good sense. And [thou] gavest him to be meat to the people inhabiting the wilderness. If this means that the bodies of the Egyptians, drowned in the Red sea were washed ashore, and became food for beasts of prey, all is plain and easy. The original would bear this. 'The people inhabiting the wilderness' is in Hebrew one short word, Zim. It occurs six times, and is thrice rendered 'wild beasts of the desert,' Isa. xiii. 21; xxxiv. 14; Jer. l. 39; see on Ps. lxxii. 9. Tholuck: "The pursuing hosts of Pharaoh were drowned in the waters and their bodies cast ashore to become the food of jackals, the inhabitants of the wilderness." Nor did God's wonders then cease.

15. Thou didst cleave the fountain and the flood. Cleave, applied to hatching eggs, to splitting wood or rocks, to dividing the sea, Isa. lix. 5; xlviii. 21; Ecc. x. 9; Ps. lxxviii. 13. Here the reference, as some think, is to the opening of the Red sea to make a way for the Israelites, or to the passage of the Jordan, as recorded in Josh. iii. 14-17. Alexander prefers the latter. But Calvin, Scott and others apply it to the cleaving of the rock, whence gushed the stream of water for the supply of the wants of the people. This is admissible; and is supported by the Chaldee. It makes the description more rapid, and so coincides with the best rules of poetry. Besides, the opening of rivers is specially named in the next clause: Thou driedst up mighty rivers. The chief difficulty here is that more than one river is mentioned. The Chaldee names three, the Arnon, the Jabbok and the Jordan. This interpretation is supported, in part, by the record in Num. xxi. 12-16, from which it is clear that God dried up at least another river besides the Jordan.

16. The day is thine, the night also is thine: thou hast prepared the light and the sun, Gen. i. 3-5, 14-18; Ps. viii. 3; xix. 1-6; cxxxvi. 7-9; Isa. xlv. 7; Matt. v. 45, are parallel passages. The passage in Isa. xlv. 7, was uttered for the very purpose of claiming for God before the Persian Cyrus the honor of creating the darkness and the light, both of which, in their alternations, are great blessings.

17. Thou hast set all the borders of the earth. Set, prepared, established, fixed. Borders, elsewhere bounds, coasts. The earth has the exact size and configuration, and the precise quantity of sea and of dry land, and is divided by national boundaries in the way that the Almighty determined. He is the author of all nature and the father of all nations, Deut. xxxii. 8; Ps. xxiv. 1, 2; Acts xvii. 26. Thou hast made summer and winter. Though day and night, summer and winter, are brought about according to what men call the course of nature, yet the laws of nature are nothing but the usual modes of divine operation in nature. Alexander: "God is not only the ordainer of these changes, but the author of the causes which produce them."

18. Remember this, that the enemy hath reproached, O LORD, and that the foolish people have blasphemed thy name. Enemy, as in vv. 3-10. Foolish, rendered also fool, vile, 2 Sam. iii. 33; Isa. xxxii. 5. On the verbs rendered reproached and blasphemed, see on v. 10; also on v. 22. Some govern the word Jehovah by reproached. Others have it as in the common version.

19. Oh deliver not the soul of thy turtledove unto the multitude of the wicked. The church is here called thy turtledove, because she is gentle, sorrowful, defenceless, hating noise and strife, having neither a disposition nor weapons to protect herself, and being loved of God. Her enemies have always been a multitude, elsewhere rendered a troop. Of the wicked is supplied by our translators. The reference is to the enemy of former verses. He repeats the request in other words: Forget not the congregation of thy poor for ever. God's poor are the meek, the humble, the afflicted of his church. Congregation, in the preceding clause rendered multitude; but there applied to the wicked, here to the righteous.

20. Have respect unto the covenant. Have respect, elsewhere consider, regard, look to. Covenant, so rendered with great uniformity. It refers to the engagement of Jehovah to be the God of his people. He urges this the more, For the dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty. Cresswell: "For the dark places of the earth, i. e., the caverns of Judea, are full of the habitations of violence, i. e., of men who live by rapine." Clarke: "The caves, dens, woods, etc., of the land, are full of robbers, cut-throats, and murderers, who are continually destroying thy people; so that the holy seed seems as if it would be entirely cut off, and the covenant promise thus rendered void." Perhaps it is better here to read earth than land, and to extend the description to the whole world, asking God to keep his covenant with his people, else they will become like the rest of the world addicted to 'injustice and violence,' to 'wrong and outrage.'

21. Oh let not the oppressed return ashamed: let the poor and needy praise thy name. Patrick: "O let not thy poor afflicted servant, who implores thy aid against these barbarous oppressors, be denied his suit, and go away ashamed to see himself disappointed of his hope; but let him, and all the rest of thy miserable people, who were never in greater need of thy help, be restored to praise thy goodness in their ancient possessions."

22. Arise, O God, plead thine own cause. The cause of his saints is the cause of God. He has united his honor with their final deliverance and their complete success. Whoso reproaches God's people for trusting in Jehovah reproaches the Almighty himself: Remember how the foolish reproacheth thee daily; see on v. 18.

23. Forget not the voice of thine enemies. The petition is that God in judging between his people and their foes would decide the controversy according to the tenor of the language used by the wicked. Or the prayer may import that all sin has a tongue and continually calls for vengeance, as did the blood of Abel, and the sin of Sodom, Gen. iv. 10; xviii. 21. Both views lead to the same result. The tumult of those that rise up against thee increaseth continually. When wickedness is rampant and outrageous, it is time for God to work. The more unendurable any state of things becomes, the louder may we call for help. It is remarkable that the Psalm closes without any expression of hope of deliverance. Horne: "While speaking, the church seems to hear the tumultuous clamors of the approaching enemy, growing every minute louder as they advance: and we leave the 'turtle-dove' without the divine assistance, ready to sink under the talons of the rapacious eagle."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. So uniform is the experience of God's people in all ages that the Maschils of Asaph or David suit them thousands of years after they were written.

2. It is not sinful, but oftentimes a part of our religious duty to inquire why the Lord deals thus and so with us, v. 1. How else should we discover the end of the Lord in the chastisements he sends upon us? God did not condemn Job for so doing.

3. Slade: "It is sad and distressing for the people of God to behold the wicked in the exercise of their ungodly power; insulting the worshippers and worship of their Lord, casting dishonor upon their holy religion, and ready to defile and destroy the house of God itself." Are you grieved for the affliction of Joseph?

4. We cannot too carefully guard both our hearts and lives against everything which might tend to bring God's displeasure in the form of public calamities upon the church or nation. When disasters stalk abroad, it is often our only comfort that we have not been willing instruments in the hands of wicked men or fallen angels, in bringing down the divine wrath.

5. Whatever God may do with guilty nations and degenerate churches, it is a blessed truth that he will never destroy the sheep 'whom he has purchased and brought into his pasture, and in whom he dwells by his Spirit,' v. 1; John x. 28, 29.

6. It is no new thing for the church of God to be left in such circumstances as to compel her to utter loud and bitter cries and complaints. This Psalm throughout.

7. Let all God's people ever plead his relation to them, and their relation to him, vv. 1, 2, 4, 7, 8, 10, 12, 19. They may well remind him that they are the sheep of his pasture, and thus magnify the free and distinguishing grace, which made them to differ from others. They may call themselves his congregation, his company, his assembly; by his gracious and merciful presence, and the indwelling of his Spirit distinguished from all other assemblies, companies and congregations. The very houses in which they meet are the dwelling-places of Jehovah's name. Even their most common places of meeting, whether called synagogues, houses of prayer, schools of the prophets, chapels, or, in times of persecution, conventicles, are sacred in the eyes of him who governs all things. This is as true under the Gospel as under the old dispensation, Matt. xviii. 20. Let them ever plead that Jehovah is their King, and that he has been so of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth. Let them urge that if the church is weak, sad, defenceless, she is still the Lord's turtle-dove.

8. It is not possible that God should be indifferent to the miseries of his people, nor to the violence of their enemies. In due time he will lift up his feet, he will hasten to avenge his own elect, v. 3; Luke xviii. 7. See 2 Maccabees vi. 14-16. Though not inspired, it embodies the substance of what is often declared in God's word.

9. It is not unusual with the Almighty to seem long to delay deliverances to his afflicted people. Oftentimes their desolations and tribulations appear perpetual, v. 4. Such an impression is made by these facts: 1. Sin is a terrible evil, very difficult to cure, and requiring severe chastisement; 2. When we are suffering, time seems much longer to us than when we are in the midst of enjoyments.

10. The more cruel, brutish and violent men are, the more earnestly should God's people call on his holy name, vv. 4, 6, 7, 8, 10, 18, 22, 23.

11. Any voluntary and hearty connection with the cause of God is honorable, and shall be so declared in the last day. God took it well of David that he meditated the building of the temple. He made men famous, who even did the carved work of the sacred edifice, v. 5. Under the Gospel even the giving of a cup of cold water to a disciple out of love to Christ, shall meet an everlasting reward.

12. We do but deceive ourselves when we believe that the unregenerate delight in anything more than in the destruction of all good, vv. 6, 7, 8. Be not surprised, O child of God, when thou seest false professors or avowed enemies, doing wickedly in the church, scattering fire-brands, arrows and death, boasting of their triumphs and trophies, insulting the humble, hindering much good and offending against the generation of God's children.

13. The hearts of God's people must be sad when they lack the usual tokens of God's presence, v. 9. Especially is this true when they are driven from his house and his ordinances. How could it be otherwise?

14. Afflictions seldom, if ever, come single. What an assemblage of miseries is recorded in this one ode! Commonly it happens, as saith the prophet Ezekiel, vii. 26, 27.

15. To us who have a full revelation of the mind and will of God on all matters affecting truth, duty and destiny, it may seem a small matter to want the presence of a living prophet. But it was far different with the church of old, v. 9. Then many of the most glorious truths of religion both as to the course of providence and the plan of salvation were but dimly shadowed forth.

16. Yet even we may long for light, and desire to know more than we do, and to inquire how long our calamities shall last, v. 9.

17. It may give us an insight into the true nature of wickedness, when we see that rising to its height, it reproaches and blasphemes God himself, vv. 10, 18, 22. The wicked foam out their own shame. They outrageously insult the God of heaven.

18. We may well ask God to work, v. 11. Every day our enemies are too mighty for us. Always, except when checked by his almighty power, they are gaining some advantage against the truth.

19. God's people should 'intermingle meditations with their prayers.' Thus they shall 'acquire renewed vigor to their faith, and stir up themselves to greater earnestness' in supplication, v. 12. Especially let them think over the history of the church in troublous times and in days of persecution.

20. God has ever been famous for doing great things and mighty, marvellous things which men do well to tell to one another, vv. 12-17.

21. It is for the unspeakable consolation of God's people that the author of creation and of universal providence, is the author of redemption, vv. 13-17. Therefore, they need not fear.

22. Inspired men did not rail or revile, but taught a simple and important truth, when they asserted that sin was folly and sinners fools, vv. 18, 22.

23. As the feebleness and poverty of the church are good reasons for committing her to the care of God, so we are assured that for these things God will not cast her off, but will rather save her, vv. 19, 21.

24. Those persons and preachers, who decline to think and speak of gospel mercies and free salvation as secured by covenant, do deprive themselves and others of much of the blessed comforts of God's word. Such was not the manner of the inspired Psalmist, v. 20. Tholuck: "'Look upon the Covenant.' This is the eternal asylum of the saints of God even in the greatest peril. And though they have broken it, shall the unbelief of man make the faithfulness of God without effect? Rom. iii. 3;" 2 Tim. ii. 13.

25. How extreme the wretchedness of not having the true religion, v. 20. Truly they do multiply their sorrows that hasten after another God.

26. When we can truly plead that our cause is God's own cause, we need never fear the want of success in prayer, though the answer may for awhile be delayed, v. 22.

27. If we are compelled to close our most solemn and urgent devotions, and our most earnest supplications, without seeing one ray of light beaming upon our path, it may comfort us to remember that so the pious Psalmist closed this complaint, v. 23. To hope against hope is the most blessed kind of hope.

28. Let us pray without ceasing. "We may do more by our prayers than the mightiest by their weapons: the poor may do as much as the rich; and more, if they be poor in spirit."

29. It is well when our complaints relate chiefly not to our own temporal interests, but to the injury done to religion by the course of the wicked, and to the want of the gracious presence of God. Asaph did not complain of personal discomforts, nor of the want of armies, or of captains, or of horsemen, but of the absence of God's presence, and of the dishonor done to religion.

30. The only hope of the church is in God himself. Unless he be with us and for us 'there is no standing before an enraged multitude, especially when armed with power and filled with barbarous rage.'

PSALM LXXV.

To the chief Musician, Al-taschith, A Psalm or Song of Asaph.

1 Unto thee, O God, do we give thanks, unto thee do we give thanks: for that thy name is near thy wondrous works declare.

2 When I shall receive the congregation I will judge uprightly.

3 The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved: I bear up the pillars of it. Selah.

4 I said unto the fools, Deal not foolishly: and to the wicked, Lift not up the horn:

5 Lift not up your horn on high: speak not with a stiff neck.

6 For promotion cometh neither from the east, nor from the west, nor from the south.

7 But God is the judge: he putteth down one, and setteth up another.

8 For in the hand of the LORD there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture; and he poureth out of the same: but the dregs thereof, all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them.

9 But I will declare for ever; I will sing praises to the God of Jacob.

10 All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off; but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iv. xxx. lvii. On the authorship of this poem see Introduction, § 4, and on Psalms l. lxxiii. lxxiv. There is no good reason for doubting that it was written by the author of those compositions. It is but candid, however, to say that many learned men ascribe it to a much later writer than the cotemporary of David. Of those, who thus hold, some admit with Hengstenberg, that the Psalm is prophetic. If so, it at once removes one of the chief arguments in favor of a later authorship. Scott dates it B. C. 1048. Clarke affixes no date. Alexander: "The immediate historical occasion we have no direct means of ascertaining." This is quite true. It is mere conjecture that fixes it to David's accession to the throne, the pestilence sent for numbering the people, or the destruction of Sennacherib's army. We have here Elohim God and Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Unto thee, O God, do we give thanks, unto thee do we give thanks. Give thanks, as in Ps. vi. 5; also rendered praise, confess. The repetition expresses much liveliness. The Hebrew verb is in the preterite, but is no doubt correctly rendered here. Calvin gives it in the future. The cause for such worship is next stated: For that thy name is near thy wondrous works declare. Near, nigh, at hand. There is no better rendering. God's name is here put either for God himself, or for that by which he makes himself known. Both senses are authorized. God's presence is declared by his wondrous works, miracles, or marvellous works. God's providence is always bringing wonders to pass and evincing his presence with his people. Hengstenberg: "One of God's wonders placed before the eyes gives reality also to all the others."

2. When I shall receive the congregation I will judge uprightly. There is some doubt whether the translation of this verse is correct; although it is supported by Fabricius, Piscator, Junius and Tremellius, Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Hare, Jebb and the church of England. Some of the variations are unintelligible; some convey a poor sense; others substantially support the common version. Of the latter class a few are cited: Ainsworth: When I shall receive the appointment, I will judge righteousness; Green: When I shall receive again the courts of justice, I will judge uprightly; Edwards: When the proper time is come, I execute righteous judgment; Hengstenberg (with whom some agree) is still different: For I shall fix a time when I shall judge righteously. Evidently one person is the speaker here. That person is either David as king of Israel, or Messiah as typified by David or God as Judge of the whole earth. If we regard the speaker as David or as Christ, the common version is perhaps best. Then the sense is that David as type, or Messiah would reign in equity. But if the speaker is God, the Judge of all, then the sense is that God has set the time, when in his infinite wisdom and mercy he will deliver his people, and that the whole matter of administering succor is in his power, not in theirs, and that he will effectually do all they need, though it involves the overthrow of their enemies. Arnd: "Our God, who governs the world by his omnipotence and wisdom, has appointed to all things a boundary, and has also fixed a time and an hour for his judgment, and when this comes, he reveals his judgments, and no man can hinder them." Alexander: "The parties to be tried are the foes and oppressors of God's people."

3. The earth and all the inhabitants thereof are dissolved. The ancient versions are quite uniform in their rendering, except that for dissolved or melted the Syriac has abased or laid low. We have no right to change the Hebrew text, as Houbigant does, so as to read: The earth and all the inhabitants are established. The meaning of the clause is well given by Clarke: "The earth and all its inhabitants depend on me; and whenever I withdraw the power by which they exist and live, they are immediately dissolved." Dissolved, in Ps. xli. 6, melted. The clause declares that nothing has stability but as God gives it, and that though the whole world were leagued against God and his church, yet at his will they should melt away. He has power to do anything. I bear up the pillars of it [the earth.] The Chaldee and several other ancient versions: I have established its pillars forever; Calvin: I will establish the pillars of it. The Hebrew verb is in the preterite and primarily signifies to weigh. He, who made the earth, can easily destroy it, or do anything else requiring the exertion of omnipotent power. He can defend his church against all her adversaries.

4. I said to the fools, deal not foolishly. The speaker in this verse is no doubt the prophet, inspired by the Holy Ghost. Fools, literally boasters. Foolishly, boastfully. Bythner thinks madness enters into the meaning of those words. No doubt all wicked exultation is an act of madness. The triumph of the wicked is short. And to the wicked, Lift not up the horn. The fools of the first clause are the wicked, or ungodly of this. Two explanations are given of lifting up the horn. One is that the "metaphor is borrowed from the habits of horned animals, and is nearly equivalent to the act of holding the head high, as a sign of pride." Perhaps a better explanation is that some eastern nations to this day, on occasions of celebrating victory or of making merry, use an ornament for the head made in the shape of a horn. This horn is of a conical form, and when massive necessarily gives to the wearer an appearance of stiffness in the neck. If this is correct, it explains well the words of the next verse.

5. Lift not up your neck on high: speak not with a stiff neck. For stiff neck Parkhurst reads retorted neck, and remarks that "this is a well-known gesture of pride, contempt or disdain." The word rendered stiff is elsewhere rendered hard, grievous and arrogancy, 1 Sam. ii. 3; Ps. xxxi. 18; xciv. 4. The prophet further warns the wicked against their haughtiness by reminding them that any apparent advantage one man has over another is solely by the ordering of providence:

6. For promotion cometh neither from the east, nor from the west, nor from the south. Promotion, in the Hebrew plural, rendered by Calvin exaltations; by Piscator, Fab- ritius, Junius and Tremellius, Amesius, Edwards, Jebb and Fry, exaltation; by Green, advancement. But for exaltations some read mountains. Venema has it: Because nothing is from the east and the west, from the desert and the mountains. The north is not mentioned, unless it is included under the word we render south, which is literally desert; by which it is generally agreed there is reference to the great desert on the south: but others include the wilderness of Damascus, which lay to the north, 1 Kings xix. 15. If this is correct every quarter is included. However we may understand particular phrases, we can hardly doubt that the meaning of the prophet is, that the threatened evils could not be averted, the impending ruin could not be turned aside by human aid from any quarter. All this was to prepare the mind for the truth of the next verse:

7. But God is the judge: he putteth down one, and setteth up another. It is by him that kings reign, and princes decree justice. Hammond well says that the word rendered judge “signifies somewhat more than an ordinary justiciary; for to such it scarcely belongs to bestow honors and preferments at pleasure. It is the style by which the captains and managers of the wars of the people of Israel were styled, as Gideon and Samson.” Jehovah “being the sovereign Lord and Governor of the world easily lays those low that proudly exalt themselves against his authority; and lifts up those that humbly submit themselves unto him.” Warner thinks here is an allusion to astrology, and that the meaning is that the fortunes of men are not governed by the planets but by God’s providence. Although the general tenor of God’s providence is mild and long-suffering, yet even he will not permit the wicked always to go unpunished:

8. For in the hand of the LORD there is a cup, and the wine is red; it is full of mixture; and he poureth out of the same: but the dregs thereof, all the wicked of the earth shall wring them out, and drink them. It was common to represent a portion good or bad by a cup. Blessings are so represented in Ps. xvi. 5; xxiii. 5. But evils, afflictions, and awful judgments are frequently represented in the same way, Ps. xi. 16; lxxiii. 10; Isa. li. 17; Jer. xxv. 15; Ezek. xxiii. 31–34; Matt. xx. 22; xxvi. 39; John xviii. 11; Rev. xiv. 10; xvi. 19. There is probably a reference to wines drugged till they produced the most terrible effects. But whether this is so or not, the general character of the imagery unmistakably represents ‘fear, distress, despondency, horror, infatuation, anguish and despair.’

9. But I will declare for ever; I will sing praises to the God of Jacob. The God of Jacob was he, who wrought marvellous deliverances from mighty and enraged enemies. The first and second clauses are parallel. Jehovah had so delivered his people and punished his enemies, that it was the duty of piety humbly and tremblingly to adore and sing praises, sing psalms, or make music.

10. All the horns of the wicked also will I cut off; but the horns of the righteous shall be exalted. For an explanation of the metaphors here used, see on vv. 4, 5. There is less difficulty in making God the speaker here, than in supposing that these are the words of Asaph, or of David represented by Asaph, or of the church; though the latter would be admissible, and is adopted by Calvin and others.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Luther says, “this is a Psalm of consolation against all turbulent and hardened hypocrites, who boast of their church and their name, and despise all threatenings, and all exhortations; ever speaking like those arrogant hypocrites in Ps. xii. ‘Who is Lord over us?’” Let the wicked tremble.

2. The righteous shall never cease to give thanks, v. 1. Their mercies shall never cease to flow; and their hearts shall never be unmoved by the divine kindness.

3. Neither here nor in the next world are marvels wanting to God's people, v. 1. Henry: "There are many works which God does for his people, that may truly be called wondrous works, out of the common course of providence, and quite beyond our expectation."

4. By terrible things in righteousness God often keeps the world in awe. The wondrous works, which save his people, often confound his enemies, v. 1. Morison: "The signs of an avenging deity are the exertions of his mighty power and outraged forbearance."

5. Christ's kingdom over the world, like God's whole government, is righteous, v. 2. In any government nothing can compensate the want of essential justice. Christ's righteousness was not wrought out nor is it manifested by trampling on law.

6. God, who made, can easily dissolve, destroy the most stable things known on earth, v. 3. Nothing is too hard for him. He will work and none can hinder. Tholuck: "When all around us is in confusion, and the firmest strong-holds give way, we should still retain the belief, that God is only waiting for his set time."

7. He who can thus dissolve all nature can also bear up all things, so that nothing shall perish but at his bidding, v. 3. By him all things stand together. His power is infinite.

8. No new thing happens to the world when everything falls into confusion, when rapine and injustice carry the day, when insolence holds the sceptre over the heads of the innocent, Ecc. v. 8.

9. Nothing is more vain or mad than glorying in a thing of nought; and such is everything but God, his nature, his word, his grace, his blessing, v. 4. Man is vanity and lies. Dickson: "Such as are acquainted with true wisdom justly account all wicked men to be fools, forsakers of God's teaching, and followers of their own wit and will, to the ruin of their own bodies, souls, houses and fame." The higher the wicked rise the more dreadful shall be their fall.

10. Insolence is a common ingredient of sin manifested either towards God or man, v. 5. There is a general impression that pride was the first sin ever committed. Perhaps it may have been. Pride will make hell insufferable.

11. The world is full of practical atheism, vv. 6, 7. Few men really believe that Jehovah governs this world, that everything happens by his ordering, and that all causes, agents and means are nothing without him. Forgetfulness of God is as common as it is dreadful.

12. All we have we have received; and all we have received is from God, v. 7. This is as true of temporal as of spiritual blessings. All come from God.

13. Much of the language of Scripture respecting the punishment of the wicked is admitted to be figurative; but the figures used are often of the most terrible character, v. 8. How dreadful must be the doom of the finally impenitent, when the Bible, the best expressed volume in the world, employs the most terrific imagery to portray it.

14. The redeemed on earth always have, and the redeemed in glory ever shall have themes of admiring gratitude, calling them to glorify God and to publish his honors abroad, v. 9.

15. No argument for the divine goodness to believers is more fair or more conclusive than the historical, v. 9. The God of Jacob, of Daniel, of Paul is still the God of all saints.

16. Could the righteous see how soon and how terribly the wicked shall be cut off, they would not murmur, or repine, or indulge envy at any prosperity granted to the enemies of righteousness, v. 10.

17. Tholuck: The "Psalmist cannot grow weary with praising. His imperishable theme is the truth that the righteous shall finally prevail, v. 10. To God's people good days are coming.

18. Scott: "Let Christian magistrates remember their obligations to him, from whom they have their authority; that they may judge righteously, maintain by the improvement of their talent, and by all Scriptural means, the cause of piety; that they may crush the haughty oppressor, and protect, advance and exalt the righteous. And let the people recollect, from whom their rulers have their authority; that they 'may be subject not only for wrath, but also for conscience' sake."

PSALM LXXVI.

To the chief Musician on Neginoth, A Psalm or Song of Asaph.

- 1 In Judah is God known: his name is great in Israel.
- 2 In Salem also is his tabernacle, and his dwellingplace in Zion.
- 3 There brake he the arrows of the bow, the shield, and the sword, and the battle. Selah.
- 4 Thou art more glorious and excellent than the mountains of prey.
- 5 The stouthearted are spoiled, they have slept their sleep: and none of the men of might have found their hands.
- 6 At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep.
- 7 Thou, even thou, art to be feared: and who may stand in thy sight when once thou art angry?
- 8 Thou didst cause judgment to be heard from heaven; the earth feared, and was still,
- 9 When God arose to judgment, to save all the meek of the earth. Selah.
- 10 Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee: the remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain.
- 11 Vow, and pay unto the LORD your God: let all that be round about him bring presents unto him that ought to be feared.
- 12 He shall cut off the spirit of princes: he is terrible to the kings of the earth.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iv. xxx. The argument for the authorship is the same as in Ps. lxxv. Luther thinks the subject matter of this is the same as that of Ps. xlv. Alexander thinks this had respect originally to the same historical occasion as Ps. lxxv. only that the former was a prediction, while this is a commemoration of the great event of delivering God's people. The Septuagint and many moderns refer the Psalm to the occasion of the invasion of the Assyrians under Sennacherib. Some think it refers to the victory obtained by David over the Philistines in the valley of Rephaim. The former of these views is the more probable. Neither is certain. Both Scott and Clarke date it B. C. 710. The names of the Most High in it are Elohim God and Jehovah LORD, on which respectively see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. In Judah is God known. Tholuck: "The tribe of Judah designates the entire nation, as in Ps. cxiv. 2." Judah was a powerful tribe and the seat of political power for the whole nation. God was known by the whole history of the Jewish nation, by the laws and statutes he gave his people, and by the judgments he executed. His name is great in Israel. God's name is that by which he makes himself known, Ps. cxxxviii. 2. Israel was the fit name of Jacob as the founder of the Jewish nation. It here specially designates those who know God in prayer, who are Israel after the Spirit. "The church of true believers is now the theatre of the glory of God."

2. In Salem also is his tabernacle. Salem and Jerusalem are here identical. Many of the best scholars, Jewish and Christian, maintain that they are always so, though a few ingenious writers have expressed a different opinion. The principal Scriptures cited in the discussion are Gen. xiv. 18; Josh. x. 1, 3; xviii. 28; Judges xix. 10. Tabernacle, tent, covert, pavilion. And his dwellingplace in Zion. Dwellingplace, refuge, habitation, is strictly parallel to tabernacle; as is Zion to Salem.

3. There brake he the arrows of the bow, the shield, and the sword, and the battle. Calvin: "The Assyrians were compelled to raise the siege by the miraculous interference of God, who in one night destroyed that army with dreadful slaughter by the hand of his angel, 2 Kings, xix. 35." To whatever event the prophet refers, the breaking consisted in rendering useless these weapons, and powerless the hostile array. God often did this.

4. Thou art more glorious and excellent than the mountains of prey. John Rogers' translation: Thou art of more honoure and myght than the hylles of robbers. Mountains are the figurative representations of kingdoms, and mountains of prey are kingdoms that practise rapine and spoliation. The figure is drawn from mountains made terrible by being inhabited by powerful animals that live on prey, Cant. iv. 8; Nah. ii. 11, 12; iii. 1. The Psalmist says that God is over and above all earthly dynasties, however exalted, and terrible. Their glory fills a little part of this world; his fills heaven and earth. Their glory is derived and finite; his is infinite and underived. Their glory is fleeting; his is eternal. Their excellence may come to nought in a moment. His is unchangeable.

5. The stouthearted are spoiled. The Assyrians and many others invaded distant lands for prey, but instead of getting it, their treasures carried with them became a spoil to the invaded. Tholuck: "They came to the mountains of Jerusalem for prey, but they were obliged to leave prey behind them on those very mountains." All this was according to the prediction, Isa. xiv. 25. They have slept their sleep. "They slept, but never waked again." The sleep here is the sleep of death. The historic account is brief and striking: "It came to pass that night, that the angel of the LORD went out, and smote in the camp of the Assyrians an hundred and four-score and five thousand: and when they arose early in the morning, behold, they were all dead corpses," 2 Kings xix. 35. Sleep is more than once used in the Old Testament for death, Ps. xiii. 3; Jer. li. 39, 57; Nah. iii. 18. The stout-hearted fall and perish as easily as any others before the wasting pestilence. They may call themselves the lords of the world. But God often crushes them before the moth. And none of the men of might have found their hands. Chaldee: They could not take their weapons in their hands; Arabic: They were not able to fill their hands. Hammond thinks the sense is, They have not been able to use their hands for resistance, for offence, or even for defence. Compare 2 Chron. xxxii. 21. If this Psalm does not refer to the destruction of the Assyrian army, yet the failure of that invasion at least furnishes apt illustrations of the end of all daring schemes of wickedness, however magnificently gotten up.

6. At thy rebuke, O God of Jacob, both the chariot and horse are cast into a dead sleep. The chariot is put for those that rode in it in stateliness. The allusion to the horse teaches that either their horses were destroyed by the angel, or that their masters being dead they soon perished for want of care. The historic narrative does not mention what became of the horses, though the chariots, drawn by the horses, are mentioned, and seem to have been much trusted in. But the God of Jacob, the God who defended Jacob, brought all their pomp to nothing. The dead sleep is death. Tholuck: "The poet describes the scene, as if we were walking along with him through the camp, which so lately was so full of life, but is now silent as death."

7. Thou, even thou, art to be feared. The repetition of thou gives a sense much as if the Psalmist had said, Thou alone. To be feared, very commonly so rendered.

To those, who oppose God, he is terrible. They have good cause for trembling. And who may stand in thy sight when once thou art angry? This clause is parallel to the preceding. Stand, the opposite of fall, Ps. i. 5. Clarke: "In the moment thy wrath is kindled, in that moment judgment is executed."

8. Thou didst cause judgment to be heard from heaven: the earth feared and was still. Hammond supposes that the descent of the angel to destroy the Assyrian army was accompanied with "sensible attestations from nature, thunders and earthquakes," as when Jonathan smote the Philistine garrison, and "there was trembling in the host, in the field, and among all the people: the garrison, and the spoilers, they also trembled, and the earth quaked: so it was a very great trembling," 1 Sam. xiv. 15. The effect of the fear was stillness, that is, when the Assyrians were filled with fear, for a time there was peace, the land of Israel had rest. Alexander: "The last Hebrew verb is especially applied to repose after the noise and agitation of war. See Josh. xiv. 15; Judg. v. 31; Isa. xiv. 7." This remarkable effect was produced,

9. When God arose to judgment, to save all the meek of the earth. To judgment, i. e., to execute judgment upon his foes and in behalf of his people, who are the meek, the humble, the poor, the afflicted of the earth.

10. Surely the wrath of man shall praise thee. God often overrules the wickedness of men to his own glory, as in the cruelty of Joseph's brethren, in the hardness of Pharaoh's heart, in the betrayal and crucifixion of Jesus Christ, and here in discomfiting the greatest and best equipped armies. Some think it refers to the effects of judgments on angry men themselves, bringing them to be true worshippers, Isa. xxvi. 9; Hos. v. 15. But the former sense is the more obvious and is commonly received. Where the wicked passions of men cannot be made conducive to God's glory, he refuses to let them loose: The remainder of wrath shalt thou restrain. Remainder, remnant, residue. Restrain, gird, gird in, well rendered restrain. Clarke: "God often so counterworks the evil designs of men against his cause and followers, that it turns out to their advantage, and his glory; nor does he permit them to go to the extent of what they have purposed, and of what they are able to perform. He suffers them to do some mischiefs, but not all they would or can do."

11. Vow, and pay unto the Lord your God. Vows were either conditional or unconditional. The former were made before the benefit was received, and in the hope of making it sure. Such was Jacob's vow recorded in Gen. xxviii. 20-22. Unconditional vows were made in gratitude for mercies already received. This was the kind of vow here called for. Jehovah had wrought a great deliverance. It was right to renew promises and engagements to be his, and to serve him. These vows could not be innocently broken or forgotten; they must be paid. The breach of lawful vows is accompanied with great guilt. The next clause further explains this: Let all that be round about him bring presents unto him that ought to be feared. Those round about the Lord are his worshippers, who have seen his wondrous works, and not the heathen nations around Judea. Presents here are votive offerings. Unto him that ought to be feared, in Hebrew one word, literally to the fear, i. e., to the proper object of fear; see Gen. xxxi. 53; Isa. viii. 13.

12. He shall cut off the spirit of princes, i. e., of such princes as rise up against him, and persecute his church. Look at Pharaoh, Adoni-bezek, Saul, Belshazzar and Sennacherib, who soon after his flight was slain by the hands of his sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer, "as he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his God." 2 Kings xix. 37. Alexander: "The future form of the verb includes a potential sense. He can do it when he will, and he will do it when he has occasion." He is terrible to the kings of the earth, i. e., the ambitious and cruel kings, who wished to live, and rule as if there was no God to call them to account. Terrible, the same form of the same word is in v. 7, rendered to be feared. God is known even to the heathen by the judgments, which he executeth.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Of vast importance to Christian comfort is the doctrine of God's unchangeableness. Cobbin: "He who miraculously defeated Sennacherib can as easily overthrow all the enemies of his church. Individual rebels must bend before him or break. Collective powers opposed to his kingdom will, in his own time, sleep the sleep of death."

2. Though it does not appear from the Psalm itself, yet from the history of the Assyrian invasion given in 2 Kings xix. 15-19, we learn that the wonderful deliverance wrought for Israel was in answer to prayer, Isa. xxxvii. Let all men pray.

3. Every people have evidence of Jehovah's being, power and Godhead; but none know him as his Church, vv. 1, 2. The innermost things of the sanctuary are the most excellent.

4. Dickson: "It is not for the worthiness of any people or place, that the Lord is among them, or manifested there; but it is his own free choice, among whom, and where he will reside. The place where the vile Canaanite had been, and the place longest possessed and abused by the Canaanite, will he choose for his chief dwellings; he will turn the Canaanites' Salem to be Jerusalem: and the stronghold of the Jebusites to be the place of his temple," v. 2.

5. The privileges of God's people under the Sinaic covenant were great; but they are much greater under the Gospel. The harmony of God's attributes was visible even then, but now it is illustrious in the cross of Christ, vv. 1, 2.

6. God has many ways of defeating the wicked, v. 3. Compare Isa. xxxvii. 29. Luther: "It is a terrible thing to kick and fight against him, who can, in a moment, take away that which is the chief thing in battle—the spirit of a man!"

7. How little is human greatness, how feeble is human strength, how marred is human worth, when compared with God's, v. 4.

8. Even the most puissant men are seen to be powerless when they fall in death, v. 5. A live dog is better than a dead lion.

9. The best appointed armies, the most magnificent warlike preparations under God's rebuke soon come to nought, v. 6.

10. It would be an unspeakable mercy to this world if it were possible to bring the minds of all its inhabitants directly and powerfully under the control of the fear of God, vv. 7, 11, 12. Morison: "Compared with the Eternal there is no object of legitimate fear in the universe. He can do whatsoever seemeth good to him. Before him no enemy can possibly stand, when once his wrath is kindled. Beneath his shadow the most inveterate and formidable foes cannot injure the objects of his unchanging love."

11. Those, who deny God's providence over this world, do yet sometimes hear such awful judgments of the Almighty as to make them tremble at his terrible majesty, vv. 8, 9.

12. Dickson: "When ordinary means and advertisements do not make the persecutors of the church cease, God hath extraordinary judgments from heaven whereby he will speak to his adversaries," v. 8.

13. God's meek, lowly, afflicted ones are safe come what will, v. 9. Even sometimes by terrible things in righteousness will he answer them and save them. Tholuck: "Believers may with unshaken confidence look at the rage of man."

14. Morison: "What an unspeakable consolation to know that the permitted opposition of the church's bitterest enemies shall contribute to her good, and that there is a voice which says to every invading foe, 'thus far shalt thou come, and no farther.'"

15. Let us be more concerned that God be glorified than that we be free from distress and suffering, v. 10. So that he is praised and honored, the saints have in all ages been content to endure pain, and poverty, and persecution. There is no higher wisdom given to mortals. It is an exercise of the sublimest faith. We must often wait, and give God time to work out his plans before we form a judgment of them. Some things may for a season look as if God was permitting his name, cause and people to be covered with dishonor, but when his chosen are duly tried, humbled and purified, then he will glorify himself and, in due time, his people also.

16. Whatever the malice of man may be, he is a chained lion, v. 10. Henry: "Men must never permit sin, because they cannot check it when they will; but God can."

17. There is no end to human malice and human wickedness, till the grace of God renews the heart, v. 10. Even terrible judgments falling on the wicked do not remove the "remainder of wrath."

18. Respecting vows as a part of religious worship, see on Ps. xxii. 25.

19. If there should be no other way of saving his people from cruelty, God will destroy their foes, v. 12. This he can do in the twinkling of an eye. Clarke: "Even in the midst of their conquests, he can fill them with terror and dismay, or cut them off in the career of victory." Luther: "The Almighty Warrior is our Captain. He holds in his hand the hearts and spirits of our enemies. Without arms or weapons of men, he can lay our adversaries prostrate in a moment."

20. Dickson: "The use of the Lord's deliverances of his church, which the people of God should make, is to call on God in their troubles, engage themselves to glorify him in word and deed for his mercies, and to entertain the consciousness of their obligation," v. 11.

21. Horne: "If such should have been the gratitude and devotion of Israelites, for a temporary deliverance from the fury of an earthly tyrant; how much higher ought that of Christians to rise, for eternal redemption from the great oppressor."

PSALM LXXVII.

To the chief Musician, to Jeduthun, A Psalm of Asaph.

- 1 I cried unto God with my voice, even unto God with my voice; and he gave ear unto me.
- 2 In the day of my trouble I sought the Lord: my sore ran in the night, and ceased not: my soul refused to be comforted.
- 3 I remembered God, and was troubled: I complained, and my spirit was overwhelmed. Selah.
- 4 Thou holdest mine eyes waking: I am so troubled that I cannot speak.
- 5 I have considered the days of old, the years of ancient times.
- 6 I call to remembrance my song in the night: I commune with mine own heart: and my spirit made diligent search.
- 7 Will the Lord cast off for ever? and will he be favourable no more?
- 8 Is his mercy clean gone for ever? doth his promise fail for evermore?
- 9 Hath God forgotten to be gracious? hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies? Selah.
- 10 And I said, This is my infirmity: but I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High.
- 11 I will remember the works of the LORD: surely I will remember thy wonders of old.

- 12 I will meditate also of all thy work, and talk of thy doings.
 13 Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary: who is so great a God as our God!
 14 Thou art the God that doest wonders: thou hast declared thy strength among the people.
 15 Thou hast with thine arm redeemed thy people, the sons of Jacob and Joseph. Selah.
 16 The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee; they were afraid: the depths also were troubled.
 17 The clouds poured out water: the skies sent out a sound: thine arrows also went abroad.
 18 The voice of thy thunder was in the heaven: thy lightnings lightened the world: the earth trembled and shook.
 19 Thy way is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known.
 20 Thou leddest thy people like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iv. xxxix. lxii. On the authorship see Introduction, § 4 and on Psalms l. lxxiii. lxxiv. Alexander: "If the particular historical occasion be the crisis of affairs in the reign of Josiah, the name Asaph must be understood as a description of the family, and not of its progenitor." But there is nothing requiring us to give the ode a connection with any special piece of history. Calvin: "Whoever was the penman of this Psalm, the Holy Spirit seems, by his mouth, to have dictated a common form of prayer for the church in her afflictions, that even under the most cruel persecutions the faithful might not fail to address their prayers to heaven." Tholuck calls it a "a melancholic song of complaint, deriving consolation from the wonderful works of God in the past." Hengstenberg: "Our Psalm is related in such a striking manner to the 3d chapter of Habakkuk, that the agreement can only be explained by the supposition that the one writer made use of the expressions of the other." Luther: "This Psalm sets forth to us God and the ways of God: that is, how he works, and what he does, in his church and in the saints." Scott admits that the date is uncertain, but favors the opinion that it was written as early as the time of David, and by that Asaph, who was his contemporary. In it we have Elohim God, Adonai Lord, El God, Gel-yohn Most High and Jah LORD, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; ii. 4; v. 4; vii. 17 and on Ps. lxxviii. at the beginning. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. I cried unto God with my voice, even unto God with my voice. The meaning is, prayed very earnestly and fervently; q. d., I prayed, O I prayed earnestly. Nor was his prayer in vain: And he gave ear unto me, see on Ps. v. 1.

2. In the day of my trouble I sought the Lord. He means that he sought God's assistance and favor. He implored divine interposition. This he did in the most painful state of mind, in trouble, affliction, adversity, distress. My sore ran in the night and ceased not. Clarke: "This is a most unaccountable translation: the literal meaning of the words, which we translate my sore ran, is my hand was stretched out, i. e., in prayer." This is supported by the margin, Jerome, Calvin, Piscator, Symmachus, Fabritius, Ainsworth, Hammond, Edwards, Patrick, Fry, Jebb, Scott, Tholuck and Alexander. The other renderings are generally mere interpretations and not translations. The phrase teaches that the Psalmist was importunate in prayer, and persevered in that holy exercise even in the night, when men generally seek repose in sleep. His distress was great. He was inconsolable: My soul refused to be comforted. When our affliction assumes such a cast that we nurse our grief, it is wrong and becomes a great tormentor. Yet grief may often be great without being sinful.

3. I remembered God, and was troubled. The latter verb is also rendered mourned, made a noise, was moved, was disquieted, roared. It expresses deep and painful agitation. Some think the meaning of the prophet is, 'Though I remembered God, yet it brought me no consolation: my grief continued.' On two occasions thoughts of God may afflict believers, first, when they are borne down by a sense of guilt, and fear that he is angry with them; secondly, when they remember how he formerly appeared for their deliverance, but now seems to have forgotten them, and to pass over their case and their judgment. The latter was probably the case here. Tholuck gives another turn to the thought: "There are moments in the life of every believer when God and his ways become unintelligible to them. They get lost in profound meditation, and nothing is left to them but a desponding sigh." I complained, and my spirit was overwhelmed. Complained, mused, meditated; here probably meditated. My spirit, my inmost soul. Calvin: "However much we may experience of fretting, sorrow, and disquietude, we must persevere in calling upon God even in the midst of these impediments."

4. Thou holdest mine eyes waking. This rendering is substantially supported by the Chaldee, church of England, Piscator, Tremellius and Junius, Fabritius, Amesius, Ainsworth, Edwards, Horsley, Green, Fry, Tholuck, Clarke, Scott and Alexander. The sense then is, 'Up to this time my grief is so great that I cannot sleep.' As the Psalmist's grief banished sleep, so did it language: I am so troubled that I cannot speak. Arnd: "In such troubles a man is often quite powerless, so that he cannot speak, but only thinks upon God, and hopes in him; thus his thoughts and his hope are instead of words; and God, who searches the heart, knows what is the mind of the spirit." Sometimes griefs are light and merely disturb enough to lead men to express them in colloquy, in soliloquy, or in sighs and complaints. At other times they are so overwhelming as to stun and produce silence. Nor are the feelings of God's people unvarying even under the same sad dispensation of providence. Sometimes silence is followed by prayer and lamentation; and these are sometimes followed by silence. Compare Ps. xxxii. 3. Such a state of mind, and trouble so deep would naturally arouse all the intellectual powers, especially the memory and the powers of comparison and judgment:

5. I have considered the days of old, the years of ancient times. Considered, thought of, counted, reckoned. He brought them under review. Ancient times, ages, perpetuities. It here means all past times. In such a review he looked for marked deliverances in cases like his own, as he also contrasted God's dealings towards himself and others on former occasions, with his present low state.

6. I call to remembrance my song in the night. Call to remembrance, the same form of the same verb rendered in v. 7 remembered, and in v. 11 twice, will remember. It is in the future, as are all the verbs of this verse. Song, a kind of song to be used with stringed instruments. In the night. He had previously seen God's mercies in a way that so impressed him as to make him give praises in the dead hours of the night. Scott: "He determined to recollect his own experience of such mercies and deliverances, as had led him to spend a part of the night in singing praises to God." I commune with mine own heart. Commune, quite as in v. 3 rendered complained, and in v. 12, will talk. On the exercise of mind thus described see on Ps. iv. 4, though the verb there used is not the same as here. And my spirit made diligent search. The word indicates a careful scrutiny, a searching inquiry. Three things proper to be inquired into in times of calamity are, 1, Wherefore does God thus afflict us? 2, What is our present duty? 3, When and how may we hope for deliverance? But oftentimes unbelief suggests foolish and wicked questions:

7, 8, 9. Will the LORD cast off for ever? and will he be favourable no more? is his mercy clean gone for ever? doth his promise fail forevermore? hath God forgotten to be gracious? hath he in anger shut up his tender mercies? Scott: "He was strongly tempted to conclude that God had cast him off forever, and would show him no more favor. 'But,' says he, 'can this be? Can he who was known to delight in mercy cease to be merciful? Will he break his own promise? Is he so angry as no more to pardon the penitent and pity the miserable? This cannot be. I will reject with abhorrence the dishonorable thought.' It is one of the sorest trials, when the word or promise of God seems to be of none effect.

10. And I said, This is my infirmity. Infirmity, variously rendered as disease, sickness, wound, desertion, affliction, petition, death, dejection. If this clause is to stand by itself, infirmity is the best rendering. Some unite it with the next, But I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High, and render them thus: This my affliction is a change of the right hand of the Most High. But this is not good. Anderson well gives the sense: "The Psalmist acknowledges his sin in questioning or yielding to a feeling of suspicion in reference to the divine love, and the truth of the divine promises; and confesses that this flowed from the corruption of his nature and the weakness of his faith." Good men know what a tormentor discouragement is. They flee from it. They war against it by resorting to the higher truths of religion:

11. I will remember the works of the LORD [Jah.] Will remember, in v. 6 will call to remembrance. It is found in the next clause. He would so remember God's dealings with his people of old as to meditate upon them and be encouraged by them. Surely I will remember thy wonders of old. History and prophecy are the two great sources of comfort to the saints. The former tells us what God has done; the latter, what he will do. To faith they both reveal wondrous things. God never changes. He is of one mind.

12. I will meditate also of all thy work, and talk of thy doings. The first verb is in the preterite, but may be rendered in the future as here, or it may signify 'I have long thought over God's providence. Of course I will do so now, as no other resource is left me.'

13. Thy way, O God, is in the sanctuary. The Chaldee, Syriac, John Rogers' translation, Bishops' Bible, church of England, Edwards and Green read, Thy way, O God, is holy; the Arabic, Piscator, Fabritius, Tremellius and Junius, Amesius, Houbigant, Waterland, Mudge, Horsley, Fry, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander all give this sense, Thy way, O God, is in holiness. If this is correct, then the prophet declares that God is a God of spotless rectitude in all his ways. But many scholars favor the common rendering. Scott: "The way of God is in holiness; and so consists with his testimonies, his promises, and his covenant. It is 'in the sanctuary,' and being beyond the reach of man's wisdom cannot be understood, except by those who enter into the sanctuary, and weigh all things in the balances of the sanctuary;" Clarke: "I must go to the sanctuary to get comfort, as I went before to get instruction, see Ps. lxxiii. 17;" Calvin: "The word sanctuary is to be taken either for heaven or for the temple. I am rather inclined to refer it to heaven, conceiving the meaning to be, that the ways of God rise high above the world, so that if we are truly desirous to know them, we must ascend above all heavens." The temple was the type of heaven, and God's plans and ways were there sufficiently explained to faith, obedience, submission and consolation, though not enough to reason and curiosity. Who is so great a God as our God? Our God made this world. He has always governed it. In every conflict between the power of Jehovah and that of the gods of heathen nations the victory has always been with the Most High. Nothing can resist or defeat him. All the gods of the heathen are vanities, Ps. cxv. 2-8.

14. Thou art the God that doest wonders. The annals of false gods are filled with fables, and follies, and vagaries. The record of Jehovah's doings is the true history of the universe, every part of which teems with wonders, marvels, wondrous works. Thou hast declared thy strength among the people. Declared, made known, as the same form of the same verb is rendered in Ps. xcvi. 2. Strength, might, power, i. e., effective energy. People, plural, peoples, Gentiles, the nations, Rom. i. 19, 20.

15. Thou hast with thine arm redeemed thy people, the sons of Jacob and Joseph. Pious Israelites never forgot the great deliverance from Egyptian bondage and cruelty. They repeated it when they read the ten commandments, when they worshipped in the temple, when they abode at home, and when they went abroad. The arm is the emblem of the strength referred to in the preceding verse. Both Jacob and Joseph are favorite names in Hebrew poetry. Either of them designates the people Israel. The use of both of them is emphatic, designating all the people descended from Jacob. Walford gives another reason, viz., that as the Israelites derived their birth from Jacob, so they were sustained by Joseph in Egypt, who became to them a second parent.

16. The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee; they were afraid: the depths also were troubled. Horne: "The waters of the Red sea are here beautifully represented as endued with sensibility; as seeing, feeling, and being confounded, even to the lowest depths, at the presence and power of their great Creator, when he commanded them to open a way, and to form a wall on each side of it, until his people were passed over." There may also be an allusion to the passage of the Jordan. But waters and seas are also emblems of overwhelming distresses and calamities; and these are under the control of the Almighty. At his rebuke they flee away.

17. The clouds poured out water: the skies sent out a sound: thine arrows also went abroad.

18. The voice of thy thunder was in the heaven: thy lightnings lightened the world: the earth trembled and shook. Some refer these words to all the terrible commotions and agitations of the heavens in storms and tempests. And it is certain that God controls all the elements, that he is the father of the rain, that the thunder is his voice, that he sends forth the lightning like arrows. But may we not apply both verses specially to the destruction of the Egyptians at the Red sea? Josephus says: "As soon as the whole Egyptian army was within the Sea, it flowed to its own place, and came down with a torrent raised by storms of wind, and encompassed the Egyptians. Showers of rain also came down from the sky, and dreadful thunders and lightning, with flashes of fire. Thunderbolts also were darted upon them; nor was there anything which used to be sent by God upon men, as indications of his wrath, which did not happen at that time; for a dark and dismal night oppressed them." See Ex. xiv. xxiv. On the phenomena of storms and tempests see on Ps. xviii. 7-16. Compare Hab. iii. 3-15.

19. Thy way is in the sea, and thy path in the great waters, and thy footsteps are not known. All this was shown in the passage of the Red sea. God then led his people in a way never travelled before nor since, never marked out by mortal man.

20. Thou leddest thy people like a flock by the hand of Moses and Aaron. Clarke: "In the eastern countries, the shepherd does not drive, but leads his flock." Mant: "After the sublime and awful imagery of the four preceding verses, in which thunders and lightnings, storms and tempests, rain, hail and earthquakes, the ministers of the Almighty's displeasure, are brought together and exhibited in the most impressive colors; nothing can be more exquisite than the calmness and tranquillity of this concluding verse, on which the mind reposes with sensations of refreshment and delight." Num. xxxiii. 1; Ps. lxxx. 1; Mic. vi. 4.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Prayer should be earnest and fervent. We should cry unto God, v. 1. Languid devotion, that moves not our hearts, can hardly be expected to move God.

2. Such cries God will hear, v. 1. He never turns away his ear from the fervor of true faith pleading his promises.

3. Is any afflicted? let him pray, v. 2. Moaning, sighing and complaining will do no good till we lift our hearts and send our petitions on high. Henry: "Days of trouble must be days of prayer."

4. Prayer should be importunate and persevering. It should, if necessary last all night, v. 2. God's elect cry day and night unto him, Luke xviii. 7. Tholuck: "They are real men of prayer with whom, when answers fail to be forthcoming, the thirst for prayer gets not weakened, but inflamed with great ardor."

5. As far as possible we should control our griefs. They ought not to be immoderate. Nor ought we to refuse proper consolation, v. 2. If God offers us comfort, let us accept it thankfully.

6. It is dreadful when a remembrance of God troubles a believer, v. 3. It shows how sad his state is, and how feeble his faith must be. Henry: "Spiritual trouble is, of all others, most grievous to a gracious soul. Nothing wounds and pierces it like the apprehensions of God's being angry, the suspending of his favor, and the superseding of his promise."

7. In our meditations on divine things let us not venture on thoughts too deep for us, v. 3. The old enemy delights in drawing us into things too painful for us. He is a wise man, who knows the limits of his own mind.

8. Let the anxious, careworn, but humble believer remember that it is no new thing to spend sleepless nights, v. 4. Morison: "When the pressure of great calamity is felt, and when the soul is withered with burning grief, the blessing and refreshment of sleep almost forsake the wakeful sufferer." Death will give such long repose, Isa. lvii. 2.

9. It is better to be dumb than to speak foolishness—to be unable to speak at all than to utter sinful words, v. 4. "Small troubles are loquacious; the great are dumb." Often silence is the sum of our duties.

10. The right study of the history of God's dealings with ourselves or others is always useful, though it is humiliating and sometimes depressing, v. 5. Luther: "You will find that the works and doings of God from the beginning have been these,—to be merciful to and to save and help the sorrowful, the distressed, the destitute, and the afflicted; and to visit, in vengeance, the secure, the proud, the despisers, and the wicked."

11. It is a great part of heavenly wisdom to know how to make a right use of past mercies and deliverances, when God gave us songs in the night, v. 6. Some abuse them by so relying on them as not to care much for present experiences. Others quite forget all God has formerly done for them, and are as unbelieving as Israel after being brought through the Red sea.

12. Morison: "How necessary it is for those who would come to any right understanding why God contendeth with them, to commune with their own heart and make diligent search. It is only in this way that the cause of the divine chastisements can be discerned, and that the rebellious heart of man can be brought to acquiesce in the inflictions of God's paternal discipline."

13. True piety will reject the conclusions of unbelief, however they may seem supported by appearances, vv. 7-10. Cobbin: "Good men are sometimes greatly depressed. Faith is not always in lively exercise. The harp is often hung upon the willows. This is not owing to the possession of religion, but to a deficiency of it. It is the good man's infirmity." Unbelief says, There is no hope, there is no help even in God. Faith says, When I sit in darkness the Lord shall be a light unto me. Henry: "Despondency of spirit, and distrust of God, under affliction, are too often the infirmities of good people, and, as such, are to be reflected upon by us with sorrow and shame."

14. Good resolutions are good things, vv. 11, 12. If we ever rise to communion with God, or attain to the wisdom of the just, it will be in consequence of a solemn, deliberate purpose, made in reliance on divine grace.

15. If we would know and experience more of divine things, we must meditate more upon them, and upon God's methods of graciously dealing with his people. "The works of the Lord for his people have been wondrous works." We may well study them.

16. Religious conference is an important duty. We should talk of God's doings, not only with our hearts, but also with our friends, v. 12. Compare Mal. iii. 16, 17.

17. God never does wrong. His way is in holiness, v. 13. O what matter of rejoicing is this! The opposite thought would drive the saints to distraction.

18. If we would know God aright, we must study him not only in the stars, the trees, the birds, the beasts, the fishes and the flowers, but we must study him in the Sanctuary. There is his way, v. 13.

19. We must not judge the Lord by any rules we would apply to men, or even to angels. He is a God that doeth wonders, and so is above all creatures, v. 14.

20. The heathen are 'without excuse' for living in so gross ignorance of the glorious perfections of Jehovah, v. 14. If they liked to retain God in their knowledge, they would not be sunk down into so gross superstition.

21. If 'history is philosophy teaching by example,' church history is religion speaking by facts, and surely ought to be studied with care, vv. 15, 20.

22. All nature is subject to God. Who is more lawless, less controlled by reason than waters and lightnings, and yet they obey God, as the ox doth his driver, vv. 16-18.

23. Dickson: "The Lord draweth deep in working out the delivery and salvation of his own people, bringing them at first into extremity of danger, and then making a plain and clear escape from all their straits," v. 19. Tholuck: "The Lord of hosts has a way of his own, on which none can follow him." Our great business is to hear, obey, acquiesce, not to judge, comprehend, nor explain God's ways.

24. When God has a work to accomplish, he will be at no loss for fit instruments to bring it about. He can raise up Moses from the bulrushes, and make Aaron his brother eloquent, v. 20.

25. Horne: "Give us, O blessed Lord Jesus, those meek and lowly and teachable dispositions which become the sheep of thy pasture; set over us skilful and watchful shepherds, and be thou ever both with them and with us: until having surmounted all difficulties and dangers, led by thy grace, and supported by thy providence, we all come, in perfect safety, to the land of everlasting rest, there to live with thee, one fold under one Shepherd, world without end."

PSALM LXXVIII.

Maschil of Asaph.

1 Give ear, O my people, to my law: incline your ears to the words of my mouth.

2 I will open my mouth in a parable: I will utter dark sayings of old:

3 Which we have heard and known, and our fathers have told us.

4 We will not hide them from their children, showing to the generation to come the praises of the Lord, and his strength, and his wonderful works that he hath done.

5 For he established a testimony in Jacob, and appointed a law in Israel, which he commanded our fathers, that they should make them known to their children :

6 That the generation to come might know them, even the children which should be born ; who should arise and declare them to their children :

7 That they might set their hope in God, and not forget the works of God, but keep his commandments :

8 And might not be as their fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation ; a generation that set not their heart aright, and whose spirit was not steadfast with God.

9 The children of Ephraim, being armed, and carrying bows, turned back in the day of battle.

10 They kept not the covenant of God, and refused to walk in his law ;

11 And forgot his works, and his wonders that he had showed them.

12 Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers, in the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan.

13 He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through ; and he made the waters to stand as a heap.

14 In the daytime also he led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire.

15 He clave the rocks in the wilderness, and gave them drink as out of the great depths.

16 He brought streams also out of the rock, and caused waters to run down like rivers.

17 And they sinned yet more against him by provoking the Most High in the wilderness.

18 And they tempted God in their heart by asking meat for their lust.

19 Yea, they spake against God ; they said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness ?

20 Behold, he smote the rock, that the waters gushed out, and the streams overflowed ; can he give bread also ? can he provide flesh for his people ?

21 Therefore the LORD heard this, and was wroth : so a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel ;

22 Because they believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation :

23 Though he had commanded the clouds from above, and opened the doors of heaven,

24 And had rained down manna upon them to eat, and had given them of the corn of heaven.

25 Man did eat angel's food : he sent them meat to the full.

26 He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven : and by his power he brought in the south wind.

27 He raineth flesh also upon them as dust, and feathered fowls like as the sand of the sea :

28 And he let it fall in the midst of their camp, round about their habitations.

29 So they did eat, and were well filled : for he gave them their own desire ;

30 They were not estranged from their lust : but while their meat was yet in their mouths,

31 The wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them, and smote down the chosen men of Israel.

32 For all this they sinned still, and believed not for his wondrous works.

33 Therefore their days did he consume in vanity, and their years in trouble.

34 When he slew them, then they sought him : and they returned and inquired early after God.

35 And they remembered that God was their rock, and the high God their redeemer.

36 Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues.

37 For their heart was not right with him, neither were they steadfast in his covenant.

38 But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not : yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath.

39 For he remembered that they were but flesh ; a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again.

40 How oft did they provoke him in the wilderness, and grieve him in the desert !

41 Yea, they turned back and tempted God, and limited the Holy One of Israel.

42 They remembered not his hand, nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy :

43 How he had wrought his signs in Egypt, and his wonders in the field of Zoan :

44 And had turned their rivers into blood ; and their floods, that they could not drink.

45 He sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured them ; and frogs, which destroyed them.

46 He gave also their increase unto the caterpillar, and their labour unto the locust.

47 He destroyed their vines with hail, and their sycamore trees with frost.

48 He gave up their cattle also to the hail, and their flocks to hot thunderbolts.

49 He cast upon them the fierceness of his anger, wrath, and indignation, and trouble, by sending evil angels among them.

50 He made a way to his anger; he spared not their soul from death, but gave their life over to the pestilence;

51 And smote all the firstborn in Egypt; the chief of their strength in the tabernacles of Ham:

52 But made his own people to go forth like sheep, and guided them in the wilderness like a flock.

53 And he led them on safely, so that they feared not: but the sea overwhelmed their enemies.

54 And he brought them to the border of his sanctuary, even to this mountain, which his right hand had purchased.

55 He cast out the heathen also before them, and divided them an inheritance by line, and made the tribes of Israel to dwell in their tents.

56 Yet they tempted and provoked the most high God, and kept not his testimonies:

57 But turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers: they were turned aside like a deceitful bow.

58 For they provoked him to anger with their high places, and moved him to jealousy with their graven images.

59 When God heard this, he was wroth, and greatly abhorred Israel:

60 So that he forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, the tent which he placed among men;

61 And delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemy's hand.

62 He gave his people over also unto the sword; and was wroth with his inheritance.

63 The fire consumed their young men; and their maidens were not given to marriage.

64 Their priests fell by the sword; and their widows made no lamentation.

65 Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine.

66 And he smote his enemies in the hinder parts: he put them to a perpetual reproach.

67 Moreover he refused the tabernacle of Joseph, and chose not the tribe of Ephraim:

68 But chose the tribe of Judah, the mount Zion which he loved.

69 And he built his sanctuary like high palaces, like the earth which he hath established for ever.

70 He chose David also his servant, and took him from the sheepfolds:

71 From following the ewes great with young he brought him to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance.

72 So he fed them according to the integrity of his heart; and guided them by the skilfulness of his hands.

ON Maschil see on title of Ps. xxxii. The Arabic calls this poem A Sermon of Asaph to the people. On the authorship see Introduction, § 4, on Psalms l. lxxiii.-lxxvii. Clarke thinks it was written "after the separation of the ten tribes of Israel; and after the days of Rehoboam, and before the Babylonish captivity." Scott says, "it is probable that Asaph wrote it some time after the death of David. As nothing is referred to, later than David's advancement to the throne, and his subsequent conduct, there is no ground for supposing that it was written at a much later period." There seems to be no good reason for supposing, with Calmet, that it commemorates the events occurring in the days of Asa, and noticed in 2 Chron. xv. xvi. Alexander gives it an earlier date than Scott, and thinks it may have been written before David "was acknowledged by the whole race of Israel, 2 Sam. v. 5." Hengstenberg is probably correct in giving the famous Asaph as the author. The general design of the ode is to give instruction. This is done; 1, by a succinct rehearsal of God's mercies to Israel; 2, by recounting the ingratitude and disobedience of ancient Israel; 3, by giving fit and earnest warnings; and 4, by giving solemn and seasonable exhortations. The doctrine of the divine sovereignty in exalting Judah above Ephraim, and David above all others in Israel is also clearly stated. We have here four names of the Almighty, Jehovah LORD, El God, Elohim God and Gel-yohn Most High, on which respectively see on Ps. i. 2; v. 4; iii. 2; vii. 17.

1. Give ear, O my people, to my law. The speaker here is the prophet, not God. In many cases the righteous claim a special interest in God's people, as their own, Judg. xii. 2; xiv. 3; Ruth i. 16; 1 Chron. xxviii. 2; Ps. cxliv. 2. It is an affectionate mode of address. There has always been a recognized unity among God's people. They are members of the same body, fellow-heirs of the same kingdom. A reference to Prov. iii. 1; iv. 2; vii. 2, shows that it is not unusual for inspired teachers to apply the phrase my law to their own instructions, just as Paul calls the Gospel my Gospel, 2 Tim. ii. 8. Law; it occurs more than two hundred times, and is uniformly rendered. The Arabic reads my precepts; Calvin, Diodati and Ainsworth think it means my doctrine. It is best rendered law. It was of binding force. Incline your ears to the words of my mouth. Because they were right words, solemn words, words of truth and soberness, the words of God, he claims eager attention to them, Ps. x. 17.

2. I will open my mouth in a parable. By parable, Calvin understands "grave and striking sentences, such as adages, or proverbs, or apothegms." It comes from a verb, which signifies to reign, to bear rule, to have power. Here it has much the same signification as the word rendered law in v. 1. The matters to be presented were of great weight and worthy of good heed. They should be delivered in few words, and those well chosen. This ode embodies the substance of the eventful history of the Israelites for a long time. I will utter dark sayings of old. For dark sayings the Chaldee, Calvin and Jebb have enigmas; Syriac, parables; Arabic, mysteries; Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic and Doway, propositions; Ainsworth, hid things; Street, pointed truths; Edwards, weighty truths; Green, dark truths; Hengstenberg and Alexander, riddles. In the English Bible the word is eight times rendered riddle, once proverb, once dark saying, (in the plural) once dark speeches, once dark sentences and twice dark sayings.

3. Which we have heard and known, and our fathers have told us. The matter is not new; but the summing up is new. The law required a careful and frequent recital of divine doings and teachings by the aged to the young, Deut. iv. 9; vi. 6-9.

4. We will not hide them from their children, showing to the generation to come the praises of the LORD, and his strength, and his wonderful works that he hath done. Children, literally sons. Strength, might. Wonderful works, in Ps. ix. marvellous works; in Ps. lxxv. 1, wondrous works. The things, of which the prophet was about to speak, were not fables, nor human inventions. They were not only written in the sacred books, but were woven into the history and traditions of the whole nation.

5. For he established a testimony in Jacob. Testimony, commonly so rendered, or witness, see on Ps. xix. 7. God gave his law and his ordinances to Israel that the nation might to all the earth witness of the truth. And [he] appointed a law in Israel, which he commanded our fathers, that they should make them known to their children. Law, as in v. 1.

6. That the generation to come might know them, even the children which should be born, who should arise and declare them to their children. Children, in each case sons. The rule was, The father to the sons, the elder to the younger shall make known the words and works of Jehovah. See Gen. xviii. 19; Isa. lix. 21; 2 Tim. iii. 15. All this was not done for the sake of pomp or ceremony, but,

7. That they might set their hope in God. They, i. e., both fathers and children, each successive generation. The sin and misery of man is that he has hope in himself, in the creature, in vanity, in a thing of nought. The end of all sound religious instruction is to withdraw the desires and expectations from all finite things and to raise them to God alone. And not forget the works of God. If all our expectation is from God and is built on the history of his mercy to those, who have gone before us, and on his testimony, we cannot easily forget him or his doings. But keep his commandments. Practice is the life of piety. All true religion is practical. The great design of the Mosaic dispensation was not to increase the national glory of Israel; but to teach the people obedience to God's will, and so to secure to them temporal and eternal good through Jesus Christ. All God's wonders were made known to successive generations that they might do these things:

8. And might not be as their fathers, a stubborn and rebellious generation; a generation that set not their heart aright, and whose spirit was not steadfast with God. Stubborn, also rendered revolting, revolters, backsliding, rebellious. Rebellious, in vv. 17, 40, 56 rendered provoking; in 1 Kings xiii. 21, disobedient. Aright, also rendered right, fashioned, prepared, made ready, established, ordered, fixed. See on Ps. li. 10; lvii. 7. Steadfast, faithful. Calvin enumerates the four sins mentioned in this verse as 'apostacy, provocation, treachery and hypocrisy.' The history of the generation of Israelites, that came out of Egypt is so full of unfaithfulness, murmuring and rebellion that to this day it is for a profound and inexplicable wonder.

9. The children of Ephraim, being armed, and carrying bows, turned back in the day of battle. We have no historic account of any particular act of cowardice and shameful retreat on the part of the tribe of Ephraim, though some think this place records the fact. But many regard Ephraim in this case as designating all the tribes, because Ephraim was a very numerous and powerful tribe, and because the ark of the covenant, in the time of the judges, was kept at Shiloh in the bounds of that tribe. This explanation is accompanied with so few difficulties, and the contrary with so many, that a large number of the best commentators speak very confidently. Numbers xiv. and Josh. vii. record sad defeats to the Israelites. The books of Joshua and Judges both show how slow the Israelites were to take full possession of the land given them. To be armed with bows was to be well equipped. For those thus prepared for battle to turn back was an act of disgraceful cowardice and gross unbelief.

10. They kept not the covenant of God, and refused to walk in his law. How faithless and disobedient the Israelites were, in all their history, is declared by their own prophets. Their early history was no exception.

11. And [they] forgot his worship, and his wonders that he had shewed them. A deliverance seemed only to be made an occasion of denying God's power and mercy so soon as any new difficulty arose. The levity, childishness and stubbornness of the nation brought out of Egypt, because described by an inspired writer, seem to us without a parallel. But would not our own behaviour, if justly recorded, appear in even a worse light?

12. Marvellous things did he in the sight of their fathers, in the land of Egypt, in the field of Zoan. The marvellous things of this verse are the wonders of v. 11. Scott: "Zoan was a principal city of Egypt, in which perhaps Pharaoh kept his court." It was the centre from which went forth the plagues, which are well called wonders. Alexander: "Zoan was by the Greeks called Tanis, and was the ancient capitol of Lower Egypt." Clarke: "It was situated in the Delta, on one of the most easterly branches of the Nile." Tholuck: "In its place there remains to the present day the village of San." Some think Zoan is synonymous with Egypt, as the name of the place where the government is located often designates the whole land. After the plagues, came the marvellous passage of the Red sea:

13. He divided the sea, and caused them to pass through; and he made the waters to stand as a heap. See on Ps. lxxvii. 16. Calvin: "The order of nature was reversed when the waters stopped in their course, and were even raised up into solid heaps like mountains." See Ex. xv. 8; Josh. iii. 13; Ps. xxxiii. 7; Hab. iii. 15.

14. In the daytime also he led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire. See Ex. xiii. 21, 22. That pillar of glory was the emblem of the divine presence and providence. It has not before been noticed in the Psalms. But it is spoken of in Ps. xcix. 7, where we learn that God's voice was sometimes heard from that excellent glory; and in Ps. cv. 39, where we learn that in the daytime the cloud was for a covering.

Here it is said to have been a light all night. In both respects it must have been a great comfort, perhaps more, a necessity. It is not necessary for us to know the precise appearance of this pillar either by day or by night. The centre of this cloud or fire rose up towards heaven in the form of a column; but to what height we know not. The Scriptures give no minute account of it. Towards his people it had a bright side, but towards his enemies dark, Ex. xiv. 19, 20. The prophet next refers to the miraculous supply of water:

15. He clave the rocks in the wilderness and gave them drink as out of the great depths.

16. He brought streams also out of the rock, and caused waters to run down like rivers. See Ex. xvii. 1-7; Num. xx. 1-13. Allusions to the same thing are found in Ps. cv. 41; cxiv. 8. The spiritual signification of such wonders is well expressed in Isa. xli. 18; xliii. 20; John vii. 37; 1 Cor. x. 4; Rev. xxii. 1, 17. All this gushing forth of water prefigured the blessings secured by the Mediator. "The rock that followed them was Christ." To modern travellers a particular rock is sometimes shown, with the statement that it was one of the rocks, smitten by Moses, that yielded water to the Israelites. But of this there is no certainty, although appearances are said to favor the supposition. Wilderness, found also in vv. 19, 40, 52, often rendered desert. See on Ps. xxix. 8; lxxv. 6. Marvellous as were God's mercies, they had but little effect for good:

17. And they sinned yet more against him by provoking the Most High in the wilderness. The special reference seems to be to Ex. xvii. 7, although the words suit many acts in the history of that wonderful people. Provoking, in v. 8 the same word is rendered rebellious; in v. 56, provoked. Alexander: "The very means, which should have made them more obedient, made them more rebellious." None but Jehovah could help or save in that great desert through which they were passing.

18. And they tempted God in their heart by asking meat for their lust. Brown: "Men tempt God when they unseasonably and irreverently require proofs of his presence, power and goodness; when they expose themselves to danger from which they cannot escape without the miraculous interposition of his providence; and when they sin with such boldness as if they would try whether God could or would know and punish sin, Ex. xvii. 2; Matt. iv. 7; Mal. iii. 15; Acts v. 9." The form of tempting here noticed, consisted in 'requiring unnecessary proof of what should have been promptly believed.' Further trial may be necessary to evince human character, but not divine excellence. God has abundantly shown in his works of creation, providence and grace, in nature and in revelation what he is and what he will do. They tempted God in their heart, i. e., in the fountain of all moral conduct. Sin is first conceived, then brought forth. For their lust, literally for their souls, meaning that they said they could not support life without it, or that they wished it for the gratification of the inordinate desires of their will, as the same word is rendered in Ps. xli. 2, or for their pleasure, as we have it in Ps. cv. 2. Anderson thinks the word means "the sensitive or animal appetites." Calvin: "The sin with which the Israelites were chargeable consisted in this, that not content with the food which God had appointed them, they gave loose reins to their lust," Ex. xvi. 2; Nu. xi. 4; 1 Cor. x. 6; Jas. iv. 2, 3.

19. Yea, they spake against God; they said, Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? They limited the Almighty, as the phrase is in v. 41. How they spake against God is told us in Nu. xi. 4. How great this sin is may be seen from 2 Chron. xxxii. 19; Job xxxiv. 37; Rom. ix. 20; Rev. xiii. 6. Alexander: "The unreasonableness of the doubt is aggravated by the use of a divine name [El] which implies omnipotence. As if they had said, Can he do this, who can do everything?"

20. Behold, he smote the rock, that the waters gushed out, and the streams overflowed. If this composition is constructed, as some think, with careful attention to the chronological order of events, then the sole reference is probably to Nu. xx. 11. In that case verse 15 refers solely to Ex. xvii. 1-7. But there is nothing gained by excluding allusion to both miracles in each verse. The people were unbelieving about everything. One miracle for their relief seemed only to awaken distrust of God's power and goodness in another matter, and they said, Can he give bread also? can he provide flesh for his people? Bread, commonly so rendered, sometimes meat, food, loaves, victuals. See Ps. xiv. 4; xlii. 3. Used specifically, it signifies what we mean by bread. Flesh, found also in v. 27; also rendered food in Ex. xxi. 10. When specific, it signifies animal not vegetable substance. They say: "He has given us water; but can he give us bread or meat?"

21. Therefore the LORD heard this, and was wroth: so a fire was kindled against Jacob, and anger also came up against Israel. See Num. xi. 1-15. Jacob and Israel are both names for the whole body of the people. See Ps. xiv. 7. God was not angry without cause. As a judge hears a matter before he pronounces sentence, so God heard the whole matter of these complaints, had 'full and perfect knowledge' of their criminality. In both Testaments fire is an emblem of the consuming wrath of God. See on Ps. xi. 6; 1. 3. Compare Matt. iii. 10; xviii. 8. Whether there was an actual bursting forth of flame, and if so, whether it had an unusual appearance, or whether the fire was the invisible consuming curse of God, we need not decide. The curse was the fire, whether visible or not. Tholuck: "The fire was a real fire." Scott: "Probably some of them were destroyed, as Nadab and Abihu had been, by fire from the Lord, or by flashes of lightning, perhaps from the fiery pillar." The place was called Taberah, a Burning. All this came upon them for their murmurings, which sprang from a discontented mind, which sprang from unbelief:

22. Because they believed not in God, and trusted not in his salvation. The great sin of the world in all ages has been want of faith in God's power, goodness and veracity. Without faith it is impossible to please God, or to be pleased with God. If he cannot be believed, he cannot be trusted; and so misery and guilt will mark the course of the unfaithful. That their unbelief was not cured is the more remarkable:

23. Though he had commanded the clouds from above, and opened the doors of heaven,

24. And had rained down manna upon them to eat, and had given them of the corn of heaven.

25. Man did eat angels' food: he sent them meat to the full.

Of the manna we know no more than the Bible tells us, especially in Ex. xvi. 4-35; Num. xi. 7-9. That it was very suitable food is certain, for it was prepared and sent by God in love, and as an emblem of the food and life sinners should find in God's dear Son, John vi. 29-58; 1 Cor. x. 3. To open the doors or gates of heaven signifies the same as opening the windows of heaven in Mal. iii. 10. It denotes the pouring out of a great blessing, heavenly in its origin. The manna was rained, Ex. xvi. 4. It is called corn because it was found in grains, as wheat is. It is called corn of heaven, because it came from above. Cruden: "It is called angels' food, which may insinuate either that it was made and prepared by their ministry; or that angels themselves, if they had need of any food, could not have any that was more agreeable than manna was; it being of heavenly original, and of singular vigor and efficacy for preserving and nourishing those who used it according to God's appointment: Or, as it is in the margin, every one did eat the bread of the mighty; that is, even the common Israelites fed upon it as delicious food, as the greatest nobles and princes did." Angels, never elsewhere so rendered, but mighty ones, strong ones. The word usually rendered angels signifies messengers. But the angels are mighty ones, (they excel in strength, Ps. ciii. 20,) and so our version probably gives the sense. The Chaldee: Men ate the food which descended from the habitation of angels. The ancient versions all lend their authority to our English translation; but modern scholars very generally prefer mighty ones to angels. Meat, the word so rendered occurs ten times in the Hebrew Bible. In Gen. xxvii. 3, it is rendered venison; in Gen. xlii. 25; xlv. 21, it is rendered provision; it is six times rendered victual, or victuals; in this place only, meat. The corresponding noun is hunter, so that the primary signification of the word nearly corresponds to our English word game. The quails sent were usually taken in hunting.

26. He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven: and by his power he brought in the south wind. Often in Scripture is the stormy wind said to be caused and also allayed by God, Gen. viii. 1; Ex. xv. 10; 1 Kings xix. 11; Ps. cxxxv. 7; cxlvii. 18; Isa. xxvii. 8. East wind, see on Ps. xlviii. 7. South wind, not elsewhere found in the Psalms, literally south, meaning the south wind here, as also in Cant. iv. 16. These winds brought the abundance of fowls mentioned in the verses following.

27. He rained flesh also upon them as dust, and feathered fowls like as the sand of the sea:

28. And he let it fall in the midst of their camp, round about their habitations.

29. So they did eat and were well filled: for he gave them their own desire. Rained, as in v. 24. Like the rain it came from over their heads, and it fell abundantly. The historic record is in Ex. xvi. 12, 13; and especially in Num. xi. 31–34. The least quantity of fowls gathered by any man was ten homers, over ninety bushels. For two whole days and a whole night the people gathered flesh. The fowls were piled up more than three feet deep around the camp to the distance of a day's journey in every direction. This Psalm does not determine whether the flesh they had was all of one kind, but in Ex. xvi.; Num. xi.; Ps. cv. we are told that quails were sent; the word so rendered is thought to describe a species. Habitations, dwelling-places, tabernacles. Well filled, full, filled, satisfied, satiate. They ate till they could eat no more, till they had the object of their desire, their greediness, their lust, to the full. Yet

30. They were not estranged from their lust. Estranged, alienated, i. e., weaned. Lust, same as desire in v. 29; only here it means the wicked lust itself, and not the object of it. But while their meat was yet in their mouths,

31. The wrath of God came upon them, and slew the fattest of them, and smote down the chosen men of Israel. The place where all this happened was well called Kibroth-hattaavah, i. e., the graves of lust. The manner of destruction is described in v. 21. Fattest of them, literally the fatness of them, meaning the most luxurious, those who most pandered to their own appetites, and most pampered their flesh. Chosen, often also rendered young, because such were selected to go forth to war, those, who would have been selected as the best specimens of health and vigor.

32. For all this they sinned still. For, rather in, or 'after, or in respect to. Sinned, offended, trespassed. They went on sinning, and believed not for his wondrous works. That is, even his great wonders, or miracles did not bring them to believe. Neither speculative atheism, nor atheism of heart, nor practical atheism was ever cured by miracle, because they are all found in a wicked disposition. "Men are not always in a mood to be convinced." It is not want of evidence, but the want of right dispositions that keeps men from believing God.

33. Therefore their days did he consume in vanity, and their years in trouble. The great fact, that forty years were spent in accomplishing the journey of a few days, and that when Israel was on the verge of the promised land, they were required to begin new and painful wanderings for nearly two-fifths of a century, forcibly illustrates this verse. Patrick: "Though they travelled up and down, very much and very long, yet it was to no purpose; for they were never nearer to their journey's end; nor were ever free from one plague or other, till they (that generation) were utterly destroyed." Vanity, emptiness, fruitlessness. Trouble, terror; see Lev. xxvi. 16.

34. When he slew them, then they sought him: and they returned and inquired early after God. It is according to fallen human nature to be very gracious when the pangs are upon us, Jer. xxii. 23; but when suffering is over, or judgments are averted, we soon relapse into former carelessness and unbelief, unless we have special grace given us. The awful death of some was well suited to beget awe in the minds of their wicked companions. It showed them that they had to deal with omnipotence. For a short time a sore judgment had some effect. They returned from their open rebellion, but they did not return unto the Lord their God, Hos. vii. 10. They sought, searched, inquired, yea, to the eye of man they seemed to inquire, seek early, betimes, diligently, literally in the morning; but there was no thorough moral revolution effected in their characters:

35. And they remembered that God was their rock, and the high God their redeemer.

They were overwhelmingly convinced in their judgments and intellects, as they had often been, and now called to remembrance how they had often yielded assent to the truth that God was their rock, strength, strong-hold; see on Ps. xviii. 2. In the last clause we have three names of God. Redeemer, see on Ps. xix. 14.

36. Nevertheless they did flatter him with their mouth, and they lied unto him with their tongues. They did not honestly intend to fulfil their promises. They engaged to do enough; but they did nothing. Deceit underlaid all their religious acts. How often they did this their history shows:

37. For their heart was not right with him, neither were they steadfast in his covenant. Right, prepared, fixed, established; see on Ps. li. 10. Steadfast, faithful, established. They did not take firm hold of the covenant. They were not true to their engagements. See on Ps. xxv. 10.

38. But he, being full of compassion, forgave their iniquity, and destroyed them not: yea, many a time turned he his anger away, and did not stir up all his wrath. Full of compassion, in Hebrew one word, several times rendered as here, more frequently merciful. Forgave, in Hebrew the verb is in the future, but is best rendered in the preterite; elsewhere rendered pardon, purge, reconcile, more commonly make atonement. Here the meaning is that he so overlooked their evil conduct as not utterly to destroy them as a nation, or people. Many a time, literally he multiplied, as in the margin of Isa. lv. 7; or, as in the English text of that place, he did it abundantly. Anger, in Ps. ii. 5, wrath; see on Ps. xviii. 7. Wrath, fury, hot displeasure; see on Ps. vi. 1.

39. For he remembered that they were but flesh; a wind that passeth away, and cometh not again. A striking parallel passage is found in Ps. ciii. 14-16. Alexander: "Flesh, a common Scriptural expression for humanity or human nature, as distinguished from superior beings, and especially from God." Wind, by some rendered breath, by others spirit. Clarke much prefers the latter: The spirit goeth away, and it doth not return. He argues earnestly for it. The sense is the same whether we use wind, breath, or spirit; only if we read wind, or breath, we use a figure; if we read spirit, we speak plainly.

40. How oft did they provoke him in the wilderness, and grieve him in the desert! Their history was filled with the records of great mercies, great wickedness and terrible judgments. Cresswell: "They provoked God at least ten times, (Num. xiv. 22,) during the first two years of their journey through the wilderness: 1. At the Red sea, (Ex. xiv. 11, 12;) 2. At the waters of Marah, (Ex. xv. 24;) 3. In the wilderness of Sin, (Ex. xvi. 2;) 4. When they kept the manna until the following day, (Ex. xvi. 20;) 5. When the manna was collected on the Sabbath, (Ex. xvi. 27;) 6. In Rephidim, where there was no water, (Num. xx. 2, 13;) 7. At Horeb, when a molten calf was made, (Ex. xxxii. 1, etc;) 8. At Taberah, (Num. xi. 1, 2, 3;) 9. When they lusted for flesh, (Num. xi. 4;) 10. When they murmured at the news brought by the men who had been sent to search the land, (Num. xiv. 1, etc.)” These outbursts of wickedness were signs of what was going on in their hearts all the time. Wilderness and desert are here used interchangeably, although in Hebrew they are different words, the former not uniformly implying sterility, as the latter. Provoke, rebel against, as in vv. 8, 17. Grieve, elsewhere displease, vex, 1 Kings i. 6; Isa. lxiii. 10. See on Ps. lvi. 5.

41. Yea, they turned back from their engagements, from their temporary reformations, from God, from his law, from his service. They returned to their former evil ways. And tempted God, see on v. 18. And limited the Holy One of Israel. Limited, the Hebrew word signifies to set marks. They questioned whether he could do all things. They refused to believe in his infinite perfections and providence, unless he would do all things according to their plan. In short, they thought the Almighty very much such an one as themselves, Ps. l. 21. Holy One of Israel, see on Psalm lxxi. 22.

42. They remembered not his hand, nor the day when he delivered them from the enemy. All sin disinclines the mind to retain the memory of God’s nature and ways; so that forgetfulness of God is a synonyme for wickedness. Enemy, also adversary, but more commonly rendered trouble, tribulation, distress, anguish, affliction; especially denoting trouble caused by foes. Calvin thinks the enemy is Pharaoh. The reference seems to be to the afflicted condition of Israel in Egypt.

43. How he had wrought his signs in Egypt, and his wonders in the field of Zoan. Signs, marks, tokens, miracles, often as here followed by wonders. See on Ps. lxxiv. 4, 9. On Zoan, see on v. 12. Here begins an enumeration of the plagues of Egypt.

44. And had turned their rivers into blood; and their floods that they could not drink. The record of this plague is in Ex. vii. 19–25. See also Ps. cv. 29. This plague lasted seven days. All the running water of the land was corrupted.

45. He sent divers sorts of flies among them, which devoured them. For divers sorts of flies the Chaldee has mixtures of living creatures of the wood; other ancient versions Venema and Alexander, the dog-fly, or dog-flies; Calvin, a mixture; Ainsworth, a mixed swarm; Piscator, Fabritius and Edwards, a swarm of insects; Amesius, Tremellius and Junius, a pest of animals; Bythner, a mixed collection of beasts; Fry, the fly; Morison, pernicious and destructive insects; Walford, the horse-fly; Mant, the ravens fly; Hengstenberg, vermin; Tholuck, mosquitoes. Hammond: “The word, I suppose, comprehends all creatures of equivocal generation, which so frequently change from reptile, and back again.” Alexander: “The best interpreters are now agreed that it means the Egyptian dog-fly.” Of dog-flies Philo says: “They rest not until they have satisfied themselves with blood and flesh.” Schafer: “The dog-fly gorges itself with blood, and makes bloody boils, severe pains.” Anderson thinks it was the Ethiopian fly, called Zimb. Bruce says: “As soon as this plague appears, and their buzzing is heard, all the cattle forsake their food, and run wildly about the plain, till they die, worn out with fatigue, fright and hunger. No remedy remains but to leave the black earth and hasten down to the sands of Atbara; and there they remain, while the rains last, this cruel enemy not daring to pursue them further.” Whatever creatures were intended, they were great tormentors and fatal to life. They devoured. Scott: “This word, devoured, shows that, besides the loathsomeness of flies, and their maggots; a variety of venomous insects, reptiles, or animals, were sent among the Egyptians, to bite, and sting, and harass them; and that in many instances their bite or sting was mortal.” Every warm climate abounds with pernicious flies and insects. In this, Africa excels. Every traveller has his tale to tell of noisome insects. The last is no exception. Du Chaillu (p. 321.): “We were troubled on the prairie by two very savage flies, called by the negroes the boco and the nchauna. These insects attacked us with a terrible persistency which left us no peace." The historic record of this plague is in Ex. viii. 20-24, where the word flies is in every case supplied by our translators. And frogs, which destroyed them. Frogs, in our English Bible and in all the ancient versions uniformly rendered. The word signifies generally all kinds of frogs and toads, some of which are said to be venomous. How terrible this plague was may be seen from the record in Ex. viii. 1-15. The frogs came into every Egyptian house, and bed-chamber, and bed, and oven, and kneading-trough. See also Ps. cv. 30. The vast quantities of these creatures, besides tormenting all human beings by their invasion of every place, became, when they died, the means of poisoning the air with putrid animal matter.

46. He gave also their increase unto the caterpillar. Caterpillar, always so rendered in our version. It signifies devourer, because these creatures consumed every green thing. Anderson: "We are so little acquainted with the various kinds of destructive insects that ravage eastern countries, that it is somewhat difficult to determine the particular species meant by this term. It is distinguished from the locust in Solomon's prayer at the dedication of the temple, 2 Chron. vi. 28, and in Joel i. 4, where it is mentioned as eating up what the locust had left." We find no record of a plague of caterpillar separate from that of the locust. And their labor unto the locust. If the devourer was the locust; then the latter clause explains the former. Compare Ex. x. 13-15. See on Ps. cv. 34, 35. Locust, as in Ex. x. 4, 12, 13, 14, 19. It is sometimes rendered grasshopper, these creatures being generically the same. Anderson: "The locust receives no fewer than ten different names in Scripture, each of which indicates something characteristic. The name here given is from its fecundity. No animal is more prolific." Alexander: "Both the animal names in this verse are really designations of the locust, one meaning the devourer, and the other denoting the vast numbers of that insect."

47. He destroyed their vines with hail. See Ex. ix. 22-35; Ps. cv. 33. Vines, always so rendered. Hail, see on Ps. xviii. 12. And their sycamore trees with frost. Sycamore, a tree wholly and generically different from the American and English sycamore. Anderson: "It bears fruit resembling the fig, whilst its leaves are like those of the mulberry-tree; whence its name (sycos) a fig-tree, and (moros) a mulberry-tree." It was valuable as a wood, it gave a fine shade, and it furnished much food for the common people. Frost, margin great hailstones, here only.

48. He gave up their cattle also to the hail, and their flocks to hot thunderbolts. Hail, as in v. 47. Hot thunderbolts, in Hebrew one word, elsewhere rendered burning heat, burning coals, coals, arrows; see on Ps. xviii. 12. Cattle and flocks, or beasts and cattle, meaning all useful domestic animals, see Ex. ix. 23-25. Gave up, i. e., so shut up and delivered over that they could not escape.

49. He cast upon them [the Egyptians] the fierceness of his anger, wrath, and indignation, and trouble, by sending evil angels among them. Fierceness, elsewhere also fury, wrath, sore displeasure. Anger, as in Ps. ii. 5, 12; vi. 1; xviii. 7. Wrath, commonly so rendered. Indignation, also rendered rage, anger, see on Ps. xxxviii. 3. Trouble, also rendered, distress, anguish, affliction, tribulation, adversity, as in Ps. ix. 9. There was a vast accumulation of ills upon Pharaoh and his kingdom, all proceeding from the great displeasure of Jehovah. These calamities came by angels of evils, not intending wicked angels, as the Septuagint would seem to teach, but such as were messengers of evil things, bringing curses and not blessings. By angels Abenezra and Fry understand Moses and Aaron. The traditionary exposition given in the Apocrypha is very striking; see Wisdom of Solomon xvii. 2-11. Verses 50, 51 show that verse 49 refers to the awful night of the slaying of the first-born. The historic record of that event is found in Ex. xii. 29, 30. In Ex. xii. 23, the work of death is said to have been done by a destroyer; see also Heb. xi. 28. As in Ps. xxxiv. 7, the singular, destroyer, may be put for the plural, or for one angel, having others under his command. Calvin: "We may simply consider the angels here spoken of as termed evil, on account of the work in which they were employed,—because they inflicted upon the enemies of the people of God terrible plagues to repress their tyranny and cruelty."

50. He made a way to his anger; he spared not their soul from death, but gave their life over to the pestilence;

51. And smote all the first-born in Egypt; the chief of their strength in the tabernacles of Ham. A way, a path, meaning, an avenue, or channel. Anger, as in v. 49. Life over to pestilence is on several accounts a better rendering than that of the margin, beasts to the murrain, although that curse did also come on Egypt, Ex. ix. 3–7. But that is not the subject here spoken of. Pestilence, in Ex. ix. 3, murrain. The slaying of the first-born included animals as well as men. Alexander: "The poetical description of the first-born in the last clause of v. 51 is derived from Gen. xlix. 3, (compare Deut. xxi. 17,) and that of Egypt from Gen. x. 6." The children of Ham settled Africa.

52. But made his own people to go forth like sheep, and guided them in the wilderness like a flock. People, nation, the Israelites. The chief resemblance between these people and sheep or flocks was in their feebleness and incapacity to guide and take care of themselves, and in the excellent care they received from their Shepherd. Calvin: "It is a singular token of the love, which God bare towards them, that he did not disdain to humble himself so far as to feed them as his own sheep." Jehovah was their banner, protector, provider and portion.

53. And he led them on safely, so that they feared not. There is special reference to the passage of the Red sea, which was accomplished without difficulty or apprehension, Ex. xiv. 22, 29, 30; xv. 19; Heb. xi. 29. They were amply protected. The allusion is not to their wicked unbelief and the fears thence arising, (see Ex. xiv. 11; xv. 23, 24; Num. xi. 1; xiv. 1–4; xvi. 41; Ps. cvi. 7, 8,) but to the fact that there was left no cause of rational fear. But the sea overwhelmed their enemies, Ex. xiv. 26–28; xv. 19; Heb. xi. 29. While the world shall stand, the overthrow of Pharaoh and his host shall remain a grand display of the retributive justice of the Almighty.

54. And he brought them to the border of his sanctuary, even to this mountain, which his right hand had purchased. For border of his sanctuary Edwards has his holy land; Hengstenberg, his holy boundary. The precise sense is given by Alexander: "The frontier of the land which he had set apart as holy;" or by the Chaldee: "The boundary of the place of the house of the sanctuary." The latter best suits the next clause, which says the reference is to this mountain, though Tholuck and some others think that expression equivalent to "mountainous country," but this is not well sustained by usage. Mountain, rendered hill in Ps. ii. 6; iii. 4. Purchased, elsewhere bought, redeemed, possessed, got, attained. Here it is used in the sense of obtained, or acquired. Right hand, the emblem of power.

55. He cast out the heathen also before them. See on Ps. xlv. 2, 3. And divided them an inheritance by line. "The lines are fallen unto me in pleasant places," Ps. xvi. 6, shows a like use of the same word, which is also rendered cord, lot, coast, region. The whole clause designates a portion measured out and so assigned. And made the tribes of Israel to dwell in their [the Canaanites'] tents, Josh. xiii. 7; xix. 51.

56. Yet they tempted and provoked the most high God. Tempted, as in vv. 18, 41. Provoked, in v. 8 rebellious, on which see. Most High, as in v. 17; in v. 35, high; see on Ps. vii. 17. And kept not his testimonies. Kept, see on Ps. xii. 7; xvii. 4. The meaning of the clause is, They were without hearty love to the word of God, though he had often borne witness for the truth and against them.

57. But turned back, and dealt unfaithfully like their fathers. Turned back, in Prov. xiv. 14, the participle of the same verb is rendered backslider. Dealt unfaithfully, one verb, commonly rendered dealt treacherously, sometimes dealt deceitfully; in Ps. lxxiii. 15, offend. Like their fathers, i. e., the new generation was much like the old. "In every age they showed themselves to be an impious and wicked people." They were turned aside like a deceitful bow. Deceitful bow, literally bow of guile; the same form of expression is found in Hos. vii. 16, where the context would indicate that want of strength to carry the arrow to the mark, allowing it always to fall short, was the chief point of resemblance intended. Aside is not in the Hebrew, though, if our idiom required, it might be inserted. The Hebrew simply implies any turning.

58. For they provoked him to anger with their high places, and moved him to jealousy with their graven images. How contrary these practices were to the law under which they lived is clear from Deut. xii. 1-4. The high places were the tops of hills commonly shaded where the Canaanites had worshipped their false gods. They proved a continual snare to the Israelites. See 2 Kings throughout. Compare Ex. xx. 4, 5. Idolatry is pleasing to the flesh. It leaves the soul to wallow in its sins. It requires no real piety to be ever so much devoted to the worship of false gods. Yea, the more earnest and hearty the devotee, the more is God displeased:

59. When God heard this, he was wroth, and greatly abhorred Israel. Heard, as in vv. 3, 21. Wroth, the corresponding noun is in verse 49 rendered wrath. The same preterite participle is so rendered in Ps. lxxxix. 38. The future participle is so rendered in vv. 21, 59 of this Psalm. It expresses great anger. Abhorred, elsewhere also refused, rejected, cast off, cast away, contemned; in Ps. liii. 5, despised; in Jer. vi. 30, the participle is rendered reprobate.

60. So that he forsook the tabernacle of Shiloh, the tent which he placed among men. How God set up his glorious worship in Shiloh is recorded in Josh. xviii. 1, and noticed in 1 Sam. i. 3. How the ark was taken thence never to be returned is recorded in 1 Sam. iv. 10, 11. By the weeping prophet the ruin of Shiloh as a city of solemnities is used to prefigure the ruin of Jerusalem, Jer. vii. 12, 14; xxvi. 6, 9.

61. And delivered his strength into captivity, and his glory into the enemy's hand. The ark is twice spoken of as the emblem of God's strength, 2 Chron. vi. 41; Ps. cxxxii. 8, i. e., "The seat of his powerful and glorious presence, whence he put forth and manifested his strength in behalf of his people." Over it rested the glory, and so the ark is called the glory in 1 Sam. iv. 22; Rom. ix. 4. It is true that they are different words rendered glory here and in 1 Sam. iv. 22; but each word is rendered glory, honor.

62. He gave his people over also unto the sword. There is probably a special allusion to 1 Sam. iv. 10. Gave over, as in v. 50; gave up, in v. 48. And was wroth with his inheritance. Wroth, as in v. 59. The fact that the Israelites were above all others God's people and his inheritance is here mentioned as a circumstance showing the greatness of the provocation given.

63. The fire consumed their young men. Calvin: "This language is metaphorical, as is evident from the history of the event referred to, which informs us, that those that perished who were of the chosen of Israel, to the number of thirty thousand men, fell by the sword of the enemy, and not by fire, 1 Sam. iv. 10. This figure points out the suddenness of the dreadful calamity." This figure is found in the pentateuch, Num. xxi. 28. Compare v. 21. Young men, in v. 31 rendered chosen men. The corresponding verb is in this Psalm thrice rendered chose, vv. 67, 68, 70. And their maidens were not given to marriage. Not given to marriage, literally, not praised; but our version gives the sense. Simonis explains thus: "Not praised or celebrated in nuptial songs;" Luther: "They must remain unmarried;" Bythner: "Remained unmarried; as marriage songs were sung at nuptials;" Clarke: "Were not celebrated with marriage songs;" Diodati: "They had not been honored with nuptial songs according to the customs of those times: see Jer. vii. 34; xvi. 9; xxv. 10. The meaning is, they had not been honorably married, because that men were grown scarce by reason of the wars, Isa. iv. 1; Jer. xxxi. 22. Or, they had been married without any solemnity, like poor bond-women; or privately, as in the time of public calamities."

64. Their priests fell by the sword. The reference is to the death of the sons of Eli, 1 Sam. iv. 11, 17. And their widows made no lamentation. We have a similar phrase in Job xxvii. 15. The historic reference seems to be to the wife of Phinehas, 1 Sam. iv. 19-22. She, however, was but one of a class. No doubt many other distressing cases occurred. The widows were so occupied with their own dangers, or with the public calamities, that they seemed to forget to lament their husbands; or the bodies of their husbands lying on the battle-field and not brought home for burial, the usual lamentation was not made over them; or the widows were carried into captivity, and were afraid to lament, 'lest they should enrage their conquerors.'

But God is merciful. His anger will not burn for ever against his people. For a season he may seem not to regard. But to his people he will in due time send help.

65. Then the Lord awaked as one out of sleep, and like a mighty man that shouteth by reason of wine. Then is better than any other rendering and is fully sustained by authority and usage, as in v. 34. It marks the conjuncture when God undertook their cause. He puts forth great energy, as one refreshed by wine. Some think the wine made the sleep profound. But surely that is not the sense. John Rogers' translation: Lyke a gyaunte refreshed with wyne; Hengstenberg: Like a warrior rejoicing with wine. Clarke: "One who, going forth to meet his enemy, having taken a sufficiency of wine to refresh himself, and become a proper stimulus to his animal spirits, shouts, gives the war-signal for the onset; impatient to meet the foe, and sure of victory." The consequence of God's undertaking their cause was:

66. And he smote his enemies in the hinder parts. The reference seems to be to 1 Sam. v. 6, 9, 12; vi. 1-18. The precise form of the disease called emerods mentioned in those places is not certainly known. See the Bible dictionaries. Thus he put them to a perpetual reproach. Scott: "By the emerods, the Lord disgraced as well as discomfited the Philistines, and constrained them to send back the ark: and by the golden images of the emerods and of the mice that marred the land, they were led to publish and perpetuate their own disgrace." Hinder parts, see Ex. xxvi. 12; xxxiii. 23; 1 Kings vii. 25; 2 Chron. iv. 4. Having humbled the Philistines, God now executed a purpose long before announced, (Gen. xlix. 10) to put the seat of power for the nation in the bounds of the tribe of Judah, though for a time it had been at Shiloh in the tribe of Ephraim:

67. Moreover he refused the tabernacle of Joseph, and chose not the tribe of Ephraim. Joseph was the father of Ephraim, and so the tabernacle takes his name. His descendants bore this mark of the divine displeasure for their sins.

68. But he chose the tribe of Judah, the mount Zion which he loved. He had long before by prophecy declared his intention of making Judah the seat of the theocracy. In 2 Sam. v. 6-10 we have the first mention of Zion. From that time it became famous, an emblem of the true church, a figure of heaven itself. After the Philistines restored the ark, it rested at various points until finally by divine direction its abode was fixed on mount Zion.

69. And he built his sanctuary like high palaces. Some have thought this a prediction of the grandeur of the temple, or a declaration of its magnificence as already built; but the word rendered sanctuary designated the tabernacle for hundreds of years. The word palaces is supplied by our translators. The Syriac, Hare, Seeker and Edwards read on high; Tholuck, like the heights of heaven; Hengstenberg, like high mountains; Alexander: "The construction most agreeable to usage is that which supplies hills or mountains." Like the earth which he hath established forever. Zion beyond the literal evidently has also a figurative sense. Its great exaltation is not its literal elevation. Nor was it the abode of the ark but for a few centuries. But the church of God lasts for ever. Nothing can subvert it.

70. He chose David also his servant. He chose David in preference to Saul, a Benjamite and not a servant of God, David and not any Ephraimite, to make him the great instrument of organizing his public worship with Psalms, and also to make him so striking a type of Messiah, that it is often difficult to tell whether a portion of Hebrew poetry relates only to David, solely to Christ, or first to David as a type, and then to Christ as the antitype. In the prophets Christ more than once bears the name of David. Nor did God choose David because of his high birth. And [he] took him from the sheep folds:

71. From following the ewes great with young he brought him to feed Jacob his people, and Israel his inheritance. From following, a frequent rendering of our translators. To feed, keep, be a shepherd to. The participle of the verb is often rendered shepherd. See on Ps. xxiii. 1. Compare Ps. lxxx. 1; Zech. xiii. 7.

72. So he [David] fed them according to the integrity of his heart; and guided them by the skilfulness of his hands. Guided, as a shepherd guides, often rendered led, Ps. xxiii. 3; lxxvii. 20. To lead and to feed the flock was the sum of the shepherd's office. From the last Hebrew verb being in the future some have thought that when Asaph was writing this Psalm, David was still on the throne with prospect of reigning for some time to come. Integrity, elsewhere also simplicity, uprightness, perfection. Skilfulness, wisdom, understanding, applied both to God and man, to finite and infinite wisdom, Ps. cxxxvi. 5; cxlvii. 5; Pr. xiv. 29; xv. 21. David was divinely taught.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The language and deportment of teachers to learners and of ministers to people should be kind and affectionate, using tones and terms of endearment, v. 1.

2. People should be invited and in all proper ways urged to pay close and earnest attention to the calls of God and the lessons of wisdom. Men must be awaked and aroused. Dickson: "Such is our dulness and slowness of heart to understand and believe what the Lord saith to us, that we have great need to be admonished and stirred up to attention and hearing with faith."

3. Preachers should study with care, not seeking meretricious ornament, but laboring to teach sound doctrine in those forms of speech best suited to impress divine truth, v. 2. See Ecc. xii. 9-11.

4. It is no objection to divine truth that it is often uttered in parables and in sayings dark to carnal men, v. 2. This mode of teaching is delightful to such as love the truth. Jesus adopted it, Matt. xiii. 34; Mark iv. 34. Those who have the right spirit are sure to learn and remember.

5. We should not despise truths because they are old, vv. 2, 3. Such are often the most important. In religion that which is new is worthless. "Divine doctrine is no new doctrine." The Bible and its truths are venerable for antiquity.

6. If in God's mercy we are made acquainted with weighty truths involving the divine glory and human salvation, let us not conceal them, but faithfully transmit them to others; especially to the young committed to our care, vv. 4, 5, 6. Clarke: "Five generations appear to be mentioned in these verses,—1. Fathers; 2. Their children; 3. The generation to come; 4. And their children; 5. And their children.

They were never to lose sight of" these things. Morison: "With what scrupulous diligence should the heads of families in every age train their offspring for God." Scott: "To perform this important duty to good purpose, we must enforce our instructions by a consistent example. It is awful to think how many parents, by their negligence and wickedness, become the murderers of the souls of their children."

7. Those great religious truths which suit one generation, are no less applicable to all who come after them, vv. 5, 6. This fact is no mean evidence of the divine origin of Scripture. The Bible is for all times. Its author knew what was in man.

8. The Scriptures are a great blessing. They are to us God's testimony, v. 5. Compare Rom. iii. 2. Oh that the families and nations who have God's word would love it, obey it and spread it according to its infinite value.

9. All religious knowledge and culture which fail to raise us to right affections towards God and communion with him, are of no avail, v. 7. Till we set our hope in God, remember his works, and keep his commandments, we are undone.

10. In all the Bible there is not once a name given to sin, indicating that God regards it as a trifle. On the contrary it is called stubbornness, rebellion, wrong-heartedness, instability, cowardice, covenant-breaking, refusal to follow the only perfectly good rule, vv. 8-10. Left to themselves, men often call good evil and evil good; but God and inspired men never commit such errors. Sin must be a horrible thing.

11. Displeasing God sooner or later brings defeat, v. 9. Sin makes men cowards, Pr. xxviii. 1. Horne: "How often is this the case with the Christian soldier! Let not him who hath just put on his spiritual armor boast like him who is putting it off when the fight is over and the victory obtained." Arms, numbers, former successes will not save us.

12. Forgetfulness of God is a sin of all nations and ages, vv. 11, 42. It is the source of innumerable iniquities. It attends all depravity. It is a universal sin.

13. Truly great events bear frequent recital, vv. 12-64. Yet it is remarkable how inspired writers dwell much on things which profane historians think unworthy of notice. How infrequent are even allusions, in modern classics, to any portion of the mighty events recorded in this Psalm. Yet what class of occurrences has ever more affected the destinies of the world?

14. All nature is controlled by God, vv. 13-16, 20, 23, 26. The seas, all waters, the clouds, the fires of heaven, the rocks, the great deep, fowls of every description, all creatures, all winds, all elements obey his voice and do his will. Of course nothing can of its own power, without divine permission, hurt any child of God, Ezek. xxxiv. 25-28; Hos. ii. 18.

15. There is a mystery in iniquity. If there is no power beyond the inherent force of discipline and instruction, it is incurable. Men's persistency in sin is inscrutable, vv. 17, 30, 32, 40, 56, 57. We read the history of the Israelites and we marvel. We honestly look at our own history and we see the same record of ingratitude and perverseness, and we are confounded. Horne: "Mercies are followed by provocations; provocations are punished with judgments; to judgments succeed repeated provocations, which call down fresh judgments."

16. In all ages the parent sin of men has been unbelief, vv. 19, 20, 22, 32. By reason thereof "the world despises, more unconcernedly than all things else, the threatenings of God and his promises also." Tholuck: "Unbelief is so deeply rooted in the human heart, that when God performs miracles on earth, unbelief doubts whether he can perform them in heaven, and when he does them in heaven, whether he can do them on earth, Matt. xvi. 1." Doubting any perfection of God is tantamount to robbing him of his glory.

17. "Mercies abused are in general the precursors of God's righteous judgments upon individuals, families and nations," vv. 20, 21.

18. The greater the gift, the greater is the sin of lightly esteeming it. Dickson: "Had the Lord fed Israel with the dust of the earth, or roots of grass, or any other mean thing, they would have had no reason to complain: but when he giveth them a new food, created every morning for their cause, sent down from heaven fresh every day, of such excellent color, taste, smell, and wholesomeness; what a provocation of God was it, not to be content now, in special, when he gave them abundantly of it?" vv. 23-25.

19. God's plan of feeding Israel in the desert was to prove and humble them, Deut. viii. 16. Every dispensation of God's providence, whether prosperous or adverse, is suited more or less to show what is in us. But the manna was to humble as well as try. John Newton says: "I could not understand this for a time. I thought they were rather in danger of being proud, when they saw themselves provided for in such an extraordinary way. But the manna would not keep; they could not hoard it up, and were therefore in a state of absolute dependence from day to day: this appointment was well suited to humble them. Thus it is with us in spirituals. We should be better pleased, perhaps, to be set up with a stock or sufficiency at once, such an inherent portion of wisdom and power, as we might depend upon, at least for common occasions, without being constrained, by a sense of indigence, to have continual recourse to the Lord for everything we want. But his way is best."

20. Both Christ and Paul clearly teach that the manna was a type of our Saviour, John vi. 32, 33, 35; 1 Cor. x. 3, 4. Why do men still despise this bread from heaven? Not only do poor blinded Jews generally reject him; but millions, who have not an intellectual doubt of his Messiahship, will not believe on him with the heart. If it was a sin to loathe the manna, what must be the sin of rejecting Jesus Christ? Why are men offended in him? Ho is the Son of God; the sinner's Friend. O shall we not give thanks for such a Saviour? Reader, wilt thou not receive him joyfully? Wilt thou not eat this bread of heaven and live forever?

21. Our desires for particular forms of temporal good things should be very moderate. We know not that they will prove blessings. They may turn out to be curses. It was so when Israel lusted after flesh, vv. 26-31. With God's blessing an affliction is a mercy. Without his blessing any good thing is a curse, Mal. ii. 2. Compare Hos. xiii. 11.

22. From the terms employed and from the effects produced, as well as from the examples recorded, there must be something exceedingly terrible in the divine displeasure, vv. 31, 33, 34, 44, 51, 53, 55, 59. It is called the fierceness of anger, wrath, indignation. Its effects are dreadful. It slays, it smites, it makes life a vanity, a trouble, it turns rivers into blood, it makes man the sport of winged insects, and of all creatures, even the most loathsome, it renders fruitless the greatest toil and industry, it sends destructive hail and tempests, it wastes flocks and herds by pestilence and casualty, it makes the good angels ministers of evil things, it opens channels to God's hot displeasure where nothing but good was expected, it blasts the fondest hopes of parental love, it overwhelms men with sudden and total ruin.

23. The history of every people shows the absolute necessity of divine grace to change the heart and purify the life. For help and strength from God there is no substitute, John xv. 5. If mercies and wonders without number are sent on men, without the grace of God's Spirit, the record will ever be, for all this they sinned still, v. 32.

24. Sometimes even here God lets us see how utterly vain and fruitless are the lives and toils of sinners, v. 33. In eternity sin in every case will appear to be folly.

25. When zealous young preachers begin their labors, they often have strong hopes of being useful to unconverted men on sick and dying beds; but as they advance in life their experience commonly very much represses the ardor of their expectations, vv. 34, 35. The more wisdom they acquire in these things, the stronger is their impression that generally men die as they live. Religious impressions, begotten by terror, commonly soon pass away.

26. Fair appearances of piety are of no avail, where the affections are not truly engaged. Without holiness no man can see the Lord. Without love, and faith, and hope, and all the graces of the true Christian, our vows, our worship, our professions are flattery and lies, v. 36.

27. Without a right heart, there can be no stability of Christian character, no steadfastness in God's covenant, v. 37. But a right heart is obtained only in conversion; and conversion is by the renewal of the Holy Ghost. How careful then ought all to be not to quench, resist, grieve or vex that blessed agent, the author of all piety in man.

28. Inspired writers never grow weary of celebrating the love and compassion of God, v. 38. The reason is, the theme is worthy of their best songs, and their hearts cannot forget the debt they owe to the love of God.

29. It is for an unspeakable joy that God employs his infinite knowledge in tenderly considering our frailty, our liability to err, our natural weakness, and the shortness and uncertainty of our lives, v. 39. He pities us, not because we deserve pity, but because he loves to show mercy to such as need and seek it.

30. One of the greatest sins we can commit is to limit the Holy One of Israel, v. 41. This we do, when we think God is such an one as ourselves, when we doubt his ability or readiness to fill the penitent with good things, when we pervert his fatherly chastisements to discouragement, when we think our case so sad that God himself cannot deliver us, when we prescribe to him times, and plans, and methods of succor, or when we 'set bounds to his power, truth, wisdom, or mercy.'

31. God's judgments on others, especially those sent for our sakes, should deeply affect us, vv. 43-51. We should often speak of them, fear him whose wrath is so terrible, whose love for his children is so great that he will rebuke kings and root up kingdoms rather than see his chosen perish. Compare Pr. xxiv. 17; Obad. 12.

32. God's people are never safer than when his and their enemies are perishing all around them, vv. 52-54. Noah, Lot, and the Christians at Jerusalem give us like patterns.

33. There are few if any families on earth inhabiting lands, which were not taken from others by some awful judgment of God in the convulsions of nations.

34. The fact that human nature shows the same moral obliquities from age to age, through all generations, is irrefragable proof that human depravity is hereditary, and that there is original sin, v. 57. No fairer argument can be constructed. If we act like our fathers, it is because like them and through them we are fallen creatures.

35. The human heart is very deceitful, v. 57. It promises well, and performs ill. It is deceitful above all things. If God were not omniscient, it would deceive him. It often deceives our neighbor. It more frequently deceives ourselves.

36. We cannot too carefully guard the worship of God against all corruption, especially by the use of images or pictures, whether material or existing only in our own imaginations, vv. 58, 59. Compare Ex. xx. 4, 5; Ps. xcvi. 7.

37. It is a great wonder that God has not been driven by our iniquities, utterly to withdraw from the earth as he did from Shiloh every token of his gracious presence, v. 60.

38. In all ages God has set but little store by the externals of religion compared with the estimate in which he has held vital piety. A very precious vessel was the ark of the covenant! It contained the tables of the law, the pot of manna, and Aaron's rod that budded. Over it stood the cherubim. On it rested the Shechinah, the visible glory of God. It was the mercy-seat. It had carried Israel safely through perils of the worst kind. Yet when his chosen people rebelled against God, and forgot the true source of their safety, he gave up the ark to their bitterest foes, v. 61.

39. How just and terrible are inspired descriptions of the horrors of war, vv. 61-64. See Isaiah xiii. 2-18; Jeremiah iv. 19-31. If original sin may be argued from the sinful likeness of the child to the parent, surely actual depravity is proven by the existence of war, Jas. iv. 1, 2. Oh that all Christians would remember that war shall be banished by the prevalence of principles now taught by Christianity, and not by some new revelation hereafter to be received.

40. If God intends to save, he will surely accomplish his purpose, v. 65. His deliverances are as glorious to him as they are cheering to his people. The most puissant principalities in the hands of God have no power of resistance.

41. We are taught in v. 66, that some punishments inflicted by God in this life are highly and permanently disgraceful. In many cases we see the like ourselves. Why may it not turn out at last that all sin shall be for dishonor? It shall in every case, Dan. xii. 2. Henry: "Sooner or later, God will glorify himself by putting disgrace upon his enemies, then when they are most elevated with their successes."

42. God is a sovereign and will do what he pleases with his own, vv. 67-70. He only is fit to govern this world. He rejects Ephraim and chooses Judah; he rejects Shiloh and chooses Jerusalem; he rejects Saul and chooses David. Ephraim, Shiloh and Saul have no right to complain because no injustice is done; Judah, Jerusalem and David have no right to boast because mercy is shown.

43. Let no one despise the day of small things, vv. 70-72. Jesse brought not his little son to the sacrifice. But God, who looketh not on the outward appearance but on the heart, chose the neglected David and raised him step by step till his throne was settled and his kingdom established. He had been faithful over a few things and God made him ruler over many things.

44. How sad is the history even of churches planted by the Lord. How soon and how sadly the best of them forget their calling and their privileges, and go after folly. Left to themselves their former strict profession of God's truth and zeal in his worship become mere occasions of hardening them in pride. The natural consequences are heresies, schisms, superstition, vain jangling, loss of charity and of comfortable walking with God.

PSALM LXXIX.

A Psalm of Asaph.

1 O God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance; thy holy temple have they defiled; they have laid Jerusalem on heaps.

2 The dead bodies of thy servants have they given to be meat unto the fowls of the heaven, the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the earth.

3 Their blood have they shed like water round about Jerusalem; and there was none to bury them.

4 We are become a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and derision to them that are round about us.

5 How long, LORD? wilt thou be angry for ever? shall thy jealousy burn like fire?

6 Pour out thy wrath upon the heathen that have not known thee, and upon the kingdoms that have not called upon thy name.

7 For they have devoured Jacob, and laid waste his dwellingplace.

8 Oh remember not against us former iniquities: let thy tender mercies speedily prevent us; for we are brought very low.

9 Help us, O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy name: and deliver us, and purge away our sins, for thy name's sake.

10 Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is their God? let him be known among the heathen in our sight by the revenging of the blood of thy servants which is shed.

11 Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee; according to the greatness of thy power preserve thou those that are appointed to die;

12 And render unto our neighbours sevenfold into their bosom their reproach, wherewith they have reproached thee, O Lord.

13 So we thy people and sheep of thy pasture will give thee thanks for ever: we will show forth thy praise to all generations.

ON the title see on title of Ps. iii. On the authorship, object and date of this ode see on Ps. lxxiv. and places there referred to. Luther thinks it is a prayer to God against future destruction by Chaldeans. Calvin is confident that "it was composed long after the death of David." Because verses 6, 7, are found in Jeremiah x. 25, Mudge thinks it is not unlikely that it was written by that weeping prophet. Horsley thinks it was composed during the distresses of Manasseh's reign. But is it not prophetic? At least may it not have been written before the calamitous events, in which it had its most striking fulfilment? Commentators are pretty generally agreed, that this Psalm is nearly related to Ps. lxxiv. Several critics think they find a great similarity in the Asaphic Psalms. Does not this obtain to such a degree as to discourage the idea of different authorships? Scott dates this ode B. C. 588; Clarke says, "Undoubtedly the Psalm was composed during the Babylonish Captivity." The names of the Almighty found in it are Elohim GOD, Jehovah LORD and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2; ii. 4.

1. O God, the heathen are come into thine inheritance. Heathen, nations, Gentiles, as in Ps. ii. 1. Inheritance, as in Ps. ii. 8; lxxviii. 55, 62, 71. The theory of a serial fulfilment of the things here written, 1, in the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar; 2, in the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes; 3, in the utter ruin of Jerusalem by the Romans, is perhaps the best mode of exposition if it be regarded as prophetic. There was no invasion of Judea in Asaph's time, followed by such effects as are here described. The tense of the verbs does not at all weaken this mode of exposition; see on Ps. lxxiv. Calvin: "The prophet complains that when the heathen came into the heritage of God, the order of nature was, as it were, inverted." Thy holy temple have they defiled. Temple, or palace as in Ps. v. 7; xi. 4. Hengstenberg: "The pollution of the temple by the heathen presupposes its previous pollution by the Israelites," Ezek. v. 11; xxiii. 38. Tholuck: "They treated the temple as if he had ceased to exist, to whose honor it had been built." They have laid Jerusalem on heaps. Heaps, not the word rendered heap in Ps. lxxviii. 13, which signifies a wall; this word signifies ruins.

2. The dead bodies of thy servants have they given to be meat unto the fowls of the heaven, and the flesh of thy saints unto the beasts of the earth. How great was the dishonor of being denied sepulture, and how great was the horror of such an end may be learned from 1 Sam. xvii. 44-46. Indeed the Scriptures are full of this matter, Ps. lxiii. 10; Isa. xiv. 11, 18, 19; 1 Sam. xxxi. 8-13; 2 Sam. iv. 12; xxi. 9, 10; 1 Kings xiv. 11-14; Jer. vii. 33; viii. 2; xvi. 4; xxxiv. 20; Ezek. xxix. 5; xxxii. 4; xxxix. 17-20. Very early in their history did the Jews regard the burial of the dead as a religious duty. All Christian churches carefully attend to this weighty matter. It would be shocking if a diverse sentiment prevailed. Calvin:

"Men have always had such a sacred regard to the burial of the dead, as to shrink from depriving even their enemies of the honor of sepulture." These dreadful calamities come not merely on wicked and hypocritical men, but also on God's servants and saints, two terms which clearly designate pious people.

3. Their blood have they shed like water round about Jerusalem; and there was none to bury them, i. e., there was no friend or relative left in the land to perform the last sad offices, they having been carried into captivity; or, if any such remained, they were afraid to show so much affection as to bury the bodies of their loved ones; or, there were so many dead they could not be buried by the survivors. Calvin: "God having intended that, in the burial of men, there should be some testimony to the resurrection at the last day, it was a double indignity for the saints to be despoiled of this right after death." On such sufferings coming on the righteous, see 1 Cor. xi. 29-32; 1 Pet. iv. 17, 18.

4. We are become a reproach to our neighbours, a scorn and derision to them that are round about us. This verse with very slight change is taken from Ps. xlv. 13, on which see. They endured this scorn from men for the Lord's sake, and it is fitly pleaded as a reason why God should show pity. God has graciously taught this doctrine, Isa. xxxvii. 22, 23. Neighbours may include Canaanites in their midst, invaders, and surrounding nations. Clarke: "The Idumeans, Philistines, Phœnicians, Ammonites and Moabites all gloried in the subjugation of this people; and their insults to them were mixed with blasphemies against God."

5. How long, LORD? wilt thou be angry for ever? shall thy jealousy burn like fire? How long? see on Ps. vi. 3. Be angry, as in Ps. ii. 2, 12; lxxxv. 5. Jealousy, often so rendered, also zeal, see on Ps. lxix. 9. Here it expresses God's inflexible determination to vindicate his own honor and authority against those who offend, even though they be his servants and his saints.

6. Pour out thy wrath upon the heathen that have not known thee, and upon the kingdoms that have not called upon thy name. Heathen, plural as in v. 1. Gentiles, nations, parallel to kingdoms. To have the knowledge of God is to have the true religion, Pr. ii. 5; Hosea iv. 1; John xvii. 3. To call on the name of the Lord is to worship him, Gen. iv. 26; 1 Cor. i. 2. Not to know God, nor to call on his name is to be heathen, without the knowledge or practice of the true religion. Pour out, in Hebrew as in English—in the imperative; see Introduction, § 6. Calvin: "Lord, how is it that thou afflictest us so severely, upon whom thy name is invoked, and sparest the heathen nations who despise thee?" Alexander: "As if he had said, If thou must pour out thy wrath let it rather be on those who neither know nor worship thee than on thine own peculiar people;" Tholuck: "Shall not the heathen now as in days of old be brought to the knowledge that the King of kings is ruler in Israel?" Perhaps it is better to regard the verse as a prediction. Yet it is true that God's people cannot be saved without the overthrow of their incorrigible foes; nor is there a doubt of the perfect righteousness of all the judgments sent by God.

7. For they have devoured Jacob and laid waste his dwellingplace. If Jacob deserved evil at the hands of God, he did not deserve it at the hands of these people. If they were executing Jehovah's will, it was not because they regarded the honor of the Most High. If they glorified him, they did it unintentionally. These predictions of evil find a parallel in Isa. x. 12-15.

8. Oh remember not against us former iniquities. The church of England reads old sins. If God's children forsake him, he will visit their iniquities with a rod, and their transgressions with stripes. It is well when men are punished for their sins in time and not in eternity; so that we may properly confess, and bewail, and forsake, and obtain pardon for them all. Time may obliterate our remembrance of sin, but with God it never grows out of date. Humble confession and true repentance do not always avert the temporal consequences of evil doings; it is an infinite mercy that to the penitent the divine displeasure goes no farther than the grave. For God to remember sin is to punish it, not to pardon it, Ps. xxv. 7. Alexander thinks by former iniquities we are to understand the iniquities of former generations. But doubtless all past sins are referred to. Let thy tender mercies speedily prevent us. Tender mercies, as in Ps. xxv. 6; xl. 11; li. 1. Prevent, come before, or go before. What the best of mere men have always needed and shall always need at God's hands is not justice, but infinite compassions. If we cannot obtain forgiveness because it will glorify the riches of God's grace, we cannot obtain it at all. Our wretchedness may move God to show mercy, and to hasten the application of it, and so it is added, for we are brought very low, i. e., in outward estate, in civil condition, in distresses.

9. Help us, O God of our salvation, for the glory of thy name, and deliver us and purge away our sins, for thy name's sake. Help and deliver, commonly so rendered. Purge away, pardon, forgive, expiate; see on Ps. lxxviii. 38. The appeal to the glory of the divine name is ancient and prevalent. If that move not God, nothing will. Of him, and through him, and to him are all things. God will not deny himself.

10. Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is their God? The appeal is still to the regard God is known to have to the honor of his name, especially among the Gentiles, as in Ex. xxxii. 12-14; Num. xiv. 11-20. Let him be known among the heathen in our sight by the revenging of the blood of thy servants, which is shed. Let him be known, literally, He shall be known. To revenge blood was condignly to punish criminals by proper authority, Deut. xxxii. 43.

11. Let the sighing of the prisoner come before thee. Perhaps Judea was seldom if ever successfully invaded, and lives taken, that prisoners were not also captured and carried away. This was fearfully the case in the time of Nebuchadnezzar. The lives of such were sad in the extreme. Here we read of their sighing. In Ps. cii. the same word is rendered groaning, and in Mal. ii. 13, crying out. The church of England has it, sorrowful sighing. It expresses any mourning noise. How sad was the case of the captives of Babylon may be learned from Ps. cxxxvii., as well as from the book of Jeremiah. According to the greatness of thy power preserve thou those that are appointed to die. Those that are appointed to die, literally, the sons of death, meaning those who are in peril of instant death, perhaps here such as were likely to be put to death by their cruel captors. Some think it admits that before God they were worthy of death. The prayer is that the people of Israel, though captives, might not be wasted, but that God would give them favor even when in the power of their enemies. Such is the greatness of God's power, even the poor captives in Babylon cannot be destroyed, if God will undertake for them.

12. And render unto our neighbors sevenfold into their bosom their reproach, wherewith they have reproached thee, O Lord. Reproach, as in Ps. xv. 3. Reproached, see on Ps. xlii. 10. As the reproach, wherewith the wicked reproach God, falls upon the saints, so the reproach of the wicked poured upon the saints is regarded by the Lord as despite towards himself. Render, return, bring back. The Hebrew is in the imperative. Neighbors, as in v. 4. Sevenfold, i. e., to the full, seven being the number of perfection. The retributive justice here alluded to is the same as in Ps. xviii. 25.

13. So we thy people and sheep of thy pasture will give thee thanks for ever: we will shew forth thy praise to all generations. Sheep of thy pasture, sheep whom thou keepest, or feedest. To give thanks and show forth praise is the proper fruit of God's mercy on all right-minded beings. So far as they are truly pious they will solemnly purpose to spend their eternity in so blessed employment. Compare Isa. xliii. 21.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. How excellent is God's word. It suits the state of his church from age to age. Hundreds of times has this Psalm been sung as suiting the state of God's church.

2. It is not merely dreadful events, but dreadful events, tending to impair the power of religion, and hinder the cause of Christ, that most deeply penetrate with grief the hearts of the pious, as we see in this ode.

3. When we are in any trouble, our best resort is to proper acts of devotion, as we learn from this Psalm. If we can bring our woes before God in prayer, we have done the best possible thing.

4. Dreadful calamities, involving church and state, saint and sinner, public interests and private happiness, are no new thing, vv. 1-3. Morison: "How mournful is the scene here described! The armies of the idolaters in possession of the land of promise—the temple defiled by their unsanctified mirth—the fair city of Zion in the dust—the bodies of the slain Israelites devoured by the fowls of heaven—their blood flowing in rivers round about Jerusalem—the rites of sepulture altogether denied—and shoutings of derision and of unholy triumph heard on every side." Calvin: "How cruelly the Assyrians conducted themselves is well known. And under the tyranny of Antiochus, if a man dared simply to open his mouth in defence of the pure worship of God, he did it at the risk of immediately forfeiting his life."

5. It is an unspeakable blessing, seldom duly prized, to live in times free from bloody persecutions.

6. The opposition of false religion to that which is from heaven is deadly, vv. 1-3. Dickson: "Nothing is to be expected of God's enemies towards God's people, when they fall into their hands, but savage cruelty, and barbarous inhumanity, for which they are to answer to God, to whom the complaint of the living, and the cry of the blood of the slain call for vengeance."

7. One of the horrible fruits of war is found in its brutalizing effects on many, v. 2. When men become 'drunk on blood, they vomit crime.' An 'insatiable thirst for slaughter,' if generally prevalent in a community, very soon makes life a burden.

8. Horne: "To behold, or even to imagine, heaps of slaughtered bodies lying unburied, and exposed to birds and beasts of prey, is inexpressibly shocking to humanity. But with what unconcern are we accustomed to view, on all sides of us, multitudes 'dead in trespasses and sins,' torn in pieces, and devoured by wild passions, filthy lusts, and infernal spirits those dogs and vultures of the moral world! Yet to a discerning eye, and a thinking mind, the latter is by far the more melancholy sight of the two."

9. Our Saviour will watch the sleeping dust of all his saints whether they have an honorable burial or not. We may therefore safely commit that whole matter to him; yet in ordinary circumstances it is as impossible as it is undesirable for us to cultivate a total indifference to the treatment of our mortal remains when we are dead and gone. See Jer. xxii. 19; xxxvi. 30.

10. Dickson: "Falling in battle before the enemies may prove that God hath a just cause against the party overcome; but it cannot prove that the victor's cause is good," v. 2.

11. Whoso learns to sin without remorse will soon learn to sin without measure, v. 3.

12. When men mock our miseries and laugh at our calamities there is a dreadful keenness of edge given to all our other afflictions, v. 4. "There is a persecution sharper than that of the axe. There is an iron that goes into the heart deeper than the knife. Cruel sneers, and sarcasms, and pitiless judgments, and cold-hearted calumnies—these are persecutions." True, if we are reproached for the name of Christ, we are happy not for the reproach, but because the spirit of glory and of God rests upon us, 1 Pet. iv. 14.

13. God's delays in sending relief often seem long and even tedious, v. 5. But let us remember that such delays are doubtless needful, that God's honor is of more importance than our ease, that God always sees in us just cause for every stroke he inflicts, that the wicked can go no further than infinite wisdom permits, that the least sin is a greater evil than any merely temporal calamity, and that one design of all our chastisements is to cure our foolish impatience.

14. God's anger is terrible. It burns like fire, v. 5. But this is the joy of believers, 'When they deserve punishment, his wrath burns fiercely indeed but not eternally.'

15. The coming doom of the heathen is so terrible that it may well afflict any pious soul, v. 6. Richard Baxter said that none of his petitions were more fervent or affecting to his own heart than those for poor, benighted Heathen and Mohammedan nations.

16. We have great need to ask forgiveness for our old sins, vv. 8, 9. Those enlightened from above do habitually trace their sufferings to some particular sin or sins or to their sinfulness in general. Nor can solid peace ever be secured without an interest in the precious blood and infinite righteousness of Jesus Christ.

17. Nor will a little mercy answer our purpose. We need mercies, yea, tender mercies, yea, a multitude of his tender mercies, v. 8.

18. When we come to God in prayer, we should fill our mouth with arguments, vv. 8-10. We may plead our low estate, we may argue that God has helped us hitherto; that present deliverance will be for his glory; and that if he fails to hear us, the enemy will reproach both him and us, both his cause and ours.

19. The worse our case, the greater will be the honor to our deliverer, v. 8.

20. It is an unspeakable privilege to search the annals of antiquity, and encourage ourselves by the records of God's works of mercy to his people of old, v. 9. It is far different with carnal men. Hengstenberg: "The world, when it prays, prays only as an experiment, having no connection with history."

21. If God shall help us, he must find cause of mercy in himself, and not in us, v. 9. We are vile. He is perfect and infinite.

22. It is a blessed comfort to find that good men have borne the taunts and derision of the vile in all ages, and yet have made good their escape to heaven, v. 10. It is sufficient that the servant be as his Lord, and the disciple as his Master. Let us imitate our Saviour, who, when he was reviled, reviled not again: when he suffered, he threatened not; but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously.

23. We may rest assured that the blood of all the saints will be avenged, v. 10. All the Scriptures so declare, and none more clearly than the last book of the sacred volume, Rev. xviii. 4-8; xix. 1-6.

24. It is a proof of the dreadful depravity of man that from age to age, poor prisoners are so generally ill-treated; while at the same time, it is a proof of the kindness of God that their case is distinctly and repeatedly mentioned in his holy word, v. 11.

25. Ought not pious people more closely to imitate their heavenly Father in caring for those who have been condemned to die? An eminent Christian lady keeps a record of all, who have been sentenced to death, so far as she hears of them, and prays for them every day till their end come. Is not such conduct in sympathy with the heart of God?

26. He can have but feeble support who relies on any created arm; but he, who trusts in God's almightiness shall never fail, nor be disappointed, v. 11.

27. The day of scorners is coming, assuredly and awfully coming, v. 12. As Shimei was brought to humble himself, so shall it finally be with every despiser, especially every scorner of Gospel grace.

28. As much as possible let our lives abound in thanksgiving and praise, that thus we may glorify God and be abundantly prepared to honor him in the same way to all eternity. "Those lives that are entirely devoted to God's praise, are assuredly taken under God's protection."

PSALM LXXX.

To the chief Musician upon Shoshannim-Eduth, A Psalm of Asaph.

1 Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel, thou that leadest Joseph like a flock; thou that dwellest between the cherubim, shine forth.

2 Before Ephraim and Benjamin and Manasseh stir up thy strength, and come and save us.

3 Turn us again, O God, and cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved.

4 O LORD God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry against the prayer of thy people?

5 Thou feedest them with the bread of tears; and givest them tears to drink in great measure.

6 Thou makest us a strife unto our neighbours: and our enemies laugh among themselves.

7 Turn us again, O God of hosts, and cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved.

8 Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt: thou hast cast out the heathen, and planted it.

9 Thou preparedst room before it, and didst cause it to take deep root, and it filled the land.

10 The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars.

11 She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river.

12 Why hast thou then broken down her hedges, so that all they which pass by the way do pluck her?

13 The boar out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it.

14 Return, we beseech thee, O God of hosts: look down from heaven, and behold, and visit this vine;

15 And the vineyard which thy right hand hath planted, and the branch that thou madest strong for thyself.

16 It is burned with fire, it is cut down: they perish at the rebuke of thy countenance.

17 Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand, upon the son of man whom thou madest strong for thyself.

18 So will not we go back from thee: quicken us, and we will call upon thy name.

19 Turn us again, O LORD God of hosts, cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved.

ON the several clauses of the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xlv. lx. lxix. Calvin: "Those who are most learned adduce nothing but probable conjectures upon the words Shoshannim and Eduth." Calvin and Clarke think there is a close affinity between this and Ps. lxxix.; Hengstenberg, between this and Ps. lxxvii. Calvin calls this "a sorrowful prayer, in which the faithful beseech God that he would be graciously pleased to succor his afflicted church." Tholuck calls it "a song of complaint, composed at a time when the worst had not yet happened to Israel, but when various heathen nations were wasting the country." Luther says it "is a prayer against those most bitter and daily enemies, the neighboring Philistines, Syrians, Moabites, Edomites, etc." Horne thinks it was composed when the church was "still in captivity." Calvin thinks "it was composed in behalf of the ten tribes, after that kingdom began to be wasted by various calamities." Was Benjamin (mentioned in v. 2) one of the ten tribes? Calvin seems to take this for granted. Hengstenberg argues for it. Alexander accepts it as probable. But the great mass of scholars doubt not that Judah and Benjamin remained united in the temple service. The support of this view is clear and full, 1 Kings xii. 21. A part of the very ground, on which the temple and the holy city stood belonged to the tribe of Benjamin. If any ask, then, why does the prophet mention Ephraim and Manasseh? several reasons may be assigned. 1. Those tribes and Benjamin followed the ark in the march to Canaan, Nu. ii. 17–23. The ark was the token of God's strength. In v. 2, we may have a poetic allusion to the order of the camps. 2. Merrick thinks these tribes mentioned to show that the Psalm was written when some foe was hovering on their borders and beginning to devastate the land. This supposes the tribes all yet united, at least in sympathy with each other. 3. Patrick and some others think the Psalm may relate to the time when Hezekiah wrote a letter to the remnant escaped from Assyria; especially to Ephraim and Manasseh inviting them to Jerusalem to keep the passover which invitation was accepted by some, 2 Chron. xxx. 1–23. 4. Merrick: "If the Psalm was not written on any such occasion, it may be most reasonable to suppose that Benjamin, Joseph's only brother by the same mother, and Ephraim and Manasseh his sons, are in the second verse equivalent to Joseph who in the preceding verse represents the whole posterity of Israel." Clarke is confident that this and Ps. lxxix. were written by the same author. Most commentators speak diffidently of authorship. Whether Asaph wrote it the reader must judge. See Introduction, § 4, on Ps. l. and Ps. lxxiii–lxxix. This Psalm, may be prophetic or it may have had a historical occasion. Of those who take the latter view, some think it was written on occasion of the destruction of the holy city by the Chaldeans; others, on occasion of the carrying away of the ten tribes; yet others, on occasion of the invasion of Sennacherib. This latter view is favored by the Septuagint, which styles it "A Psalm for the Assyrian." If we regard the Psalm as written in prophecy to suit the church in any and all her distressing circumstances, we give it the widest use. In it we find these names of the supreme Being, Elohim God, Jehovah LORD and El God, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2; v. 4. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Give ear, O Shepherd of Israel. Give ear, as in Ps. v. 1; xvii. 1. Shepherd, as in Ps. xxiii. 1, a participle, one that feeds, or acts the part of a shepherd. The allusion is probably to Genesis xlviii. 15, where we have the same. God had long been a Guide, a Support, a Protector to the descendants of Jacob, hence the title Shepherd of Israel. Thou that ledest Joseph like a flock. Joseph here is equivalent to Israel in the preceding. Each name may be applied to the whole nation descended from Jacob. The participle rendered thou that ledest may refer to the past, 2 Sam. vi. 3; or to the present, Ecc. ii. 3; or to the future, Isa. xi. 6. God had all along taken good care of the Israelites. Thou that dwellest between the cherubim, a form of speech of frequent occurrence, Ex. xxv. 22; Ps. xcix. 1. Such language is not used after the captivity, though it might be in allusion to history. The cherubim (or cherubs) stood over the mercy-seat, or propitiatory. Between them the Shechinah appeared. At the captivity the ark disappeared and was never replaced. Neither did the visible glory of the Lord appear any more. Shine forth. As the sun long obscured at last bursts through the clouds and gladdens all creation by shining in his strength, so the Psalmist desires God to be as the light of the morning when the sun riseth, even a morning without clouds.

2. Before Ephraim and Benjamin and Manasseh stir up thy strength. The ark was a token of God's power. It is more than once called the ark of God's strength. Going through the wilderness the tribes here named marched behind the ark, Num. ii. 18–24. This is perhaps the most natural and approved explanation. But Mudge followed by Dodd and Clarke gives another, viz., that these tribes represent the whole nation, Benjamin being incorporated with Judah, Manasseh comprehending the country beyond Jordan, and Ephraim all the rest. This gives a very good sense and is not over-strained. Stir up thy strength, arouse thy might, exert thy power. And come and save us, or, go forth for salvation to us.

3. Turn us again, O God. Restore or rescue us as the same verb is rendered, Gen. xx. 7; Ps. xxxv. 17. And cause thy face to shine. See on Ps. iv. 6; xxxi. 16. And we shall be saved. This rendering is literal and declares the effect of God's restoring his people and causing his face to shine. The petitions of this verse ask for the reviving of God's work of grace, and for the kindly aspects of his providence.

4. O LORD God of hosts, how long wilt thou be angry against the prayer of thy people? The Lord of Sabaoth, or the God of Sabaoth is a title of great honor. It is given some hundreds of times. God commands the hosts of the starry worlds, the vast armies of angels and of saints in glory, the great armies of men on earth, and the vast array of causes at work in all worlds. This great God is the right one to manage our affairs. When he hides his face we are troubled. His silence is dreadful. Delay to answer our prayers may be misinterpreted as denial of our petitions, but almost uniformly "the faithful fear God's anger, when they perceive that their prayers are not forthwith heard." On How long? see on Ps. iv. 2.

5. Thou feedest them with the bread of tears. Bread of tears and bread of affliction, are forms of expression but little liable to be misunderstood, though purely Hebraistic. The meaning is that Israel ate tears instead of bread, or bread wet with tears, or that while they ate bread they wept. And givest them tears to drink in great measure. Hengstenberg: "This clause can only be translated: Thou causest them to drink with a measure of tears;" Horne: "There cannot be a more striking picture of Zion in captivity. Her bread is dipped in tears; and her cup is filled to the brim with them." Tholuck: "Their bread was so steeped in tears that they became their food, and so copious was their weeping, that their tears became their drink."

6. Thou makest us a strife unto our neighbors. The meaning is either 1. They strive with us; or 2. They strive among themselves concerning us. There is a rivalry among them which shall do us the most harm. Both were true. Neighbors, as in Ps. xxxi. 11; xlv. 13; lxxix. 4, 12. It adds much to the weight of our griefs, when they are brought on us by those, from whom we had a right to expect something very different. And our enemies laugh among themselves. They laugh at our miseries. They are glad to see us suffering. They rejoice and triumph over us. They mock our sorrows. Calvin: "They talk among themselves by way of sport and mockery at our adversities." Enemies, the word commonly so rendered, as in Ps. iii. 7; vi. 10. Both the verbs are in the future.

7. Turn us again, O God of hosts, and cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved. See on v. 3. God of hosts, as in v. 4. Calvin: "God did not here intend to indite for his people a vain repetition of words: his object was to encourage them, when bowed down under the load of their calamities, boldly to rise up, heavy though the load might be. This ground of support was often presented to them; and it is repeated the third time in the concluding verse of the Psalm."

8. Thou hast brought a vine out of Egypt. Here begins as perfect a specimen of allegory as is to be found in any language. It is a whole. It has in it nothing superfluous. The church of God, embodied in the Jewish nation, was brought out of Egypt, as a vine. This is a favorite and beautiful figure of Scripture. Horne: "The vine is a plant weak and lowly, and needing support; when supported, wild and luxuriant, unless restrained by the pruning-knife; capable of producing the most valuable fruit; but, if barren, the most unprofitable among trees. In all these respects it is a lively emblem of the church, and used as such by Isaiah v. 7, by Ezekiel xv. xvii. xix., and by our Lord himself, Matt. xxi. 33." The bringing of this vine out of Egypt is much celebrated in the Scriptures of both Testaments. This was, says the elder President Edwards, "the most remarkable of all the deliverances noticed in the Old Testament, the greatest pledge and forerunner of future redemption by Christ, and much more insisted on in Scripture than any other. Indeed it was the greatest type of Christ's redemption of any providential event whatsoever." Thou hast cast out the heathen. When the heathen nations inhabiting Canaan had filled up the measure of their iniquity, they were by God's command destroyed, expelled or subjugated. The mode of ejecting them was chiefly by wars waged by the Israelites at the command of God, and rendered decisive by divine assistance. And planted it. The settlement of the Israelites in the promised land was attended by so many marvellous circumstances as to be clearly of God.

9. Thou preparedst room before it. Arabic: Thou hast prepared the way before it; Calvin: Thou hast cleansed the ground before it. The meaning is that God had removed the mighty nations, who would have been hindrances to Israel's settlement in Canaan. And didst cause it to take deep root. Chaldee, Arabic and Vulgate: Thou didst plant its roots; Calvin: Thou hast rooted its roots. That is, after planting it, thou didst cause it to grow. And it filled the land. Its growth was vigorous and rapid. The powerful nations, that had inhabited the promised land, rapidly lost political power, and Israel succeeded.

10. The hills were covered with the shadow of it, and the boughs thereof were like the goodly cedars. Goodly cedars, literally cedars of God, i. e., great cedars, see on Ps. xxxvi. 6. Some European Commentators, who are accustomed to see the small cultivated vines of the old world, seem rather surprised at the boldness of the figure in this and in the next verse. But 1, we have here an allegory; 2, in countries where the forests are unbroken, the vine attains a great size, rising to the top of the most majestic trees and covering them with its fruit and foliage. Anderson has collected some testimonies on this subject from the history of the Barbary States, and from the history of Virginia. Rosenmüller in like manner speaks of the vine in Persia as rising to great heights.

11. She sent out her boughs unto the sea, and her branches unto the river. The sea here mentioned is the Mediterranean; the river, the Euphrates, Gen. xv. 18; Deut. xi. 24; Josh. i. 4; 1 Kings iv. 20, 21; Ps. lxxii. 8.

12. Why hast thou then broken down her hedges, so that all they which pass by the way do pluck her? Jehovah himself was a wall of protection to his people. His perfections and providence put a hedge about them, Job i. 10; Ps. xxxiv. 7; Is. v. 2. When he withdraws they are sadly exposed. This verse and the next contain the gist of the allegory. How comes it that God, who is wise and just, should have taken such pains with a vine for long years, and then leave it exposed to utter destruction? Berleberg Bible: "Shall all this be for nought and in vain? Or hast thou planted it on this account, that the enemies might devour it?"

13. The boar out of the wood doth waste it, and the wild beast of the field doth devour it. By the boar Patrick thinks reference is had to the king of Assyria and the havoc made by his barbarous soldiers, 2 Kings xix. 23-26. By the wild beast Theodoret understands Nebuchadnezzar. The Berleberg Bible names Pul, Tiglath-pileser, Shalmaneser, and Sennacherib. If this Psalm is prophetic and applicable to all the times of the church's distress, it is best by boar and wild beast to understand generally the fierce and cruel enemies of Israel. The Talmud notices that the middle letter of the word rendered wood in this verse is the middle letter of the Hebrew Psalter.

14. Return, we beseech thee, O God of hosts. Return, in vv. 3, 7, 19; Ps. lxxxv. 4, turn. It is best to supply us. If so, then see on vv. 3, 7. If we read return, then the plea is for a restoration of God's presence. Look down from heaven, and behold, and visit this vine. Clarke: "Let thine eye affect thine heart." The meaning is, Visit in mercy and bless.

15. And the vineyard which thy right hand hath planted. According to the English translation the verbs of the preceding clause are to be understood as repeated here; but some take the first word to be a verb, and render it maintain, establish, protect, or sustain. This is better. To put vineyard for vine is to change and even mar the figure. Protect that which thy right hand hath planted, is the better rendering. The right hand denotes skill and strength. God had shown great wisdom and power in establishing the Jewish nation. And the branch that thou madest strong for thyself. The radical idea of this allegory is probably found in Gen. xlix. 22, where the word here rendered branch is twice rendered bough; not that rendered branch in Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12. It is hundreds of times rendered son, in the plural, sons. Taken without a figure it is a prayer for Israel as a son, whom God had raised up. But the Chaldee, Abenezra and R. Obadiah by the branch understand Messiah himself. The Septuagint, Vulgate, Syriac, Arabic and Ethiopic, read Son of man. If it refers to Messiah, this is the first place where he is called the Son of man. Many favor this interpretation. The prophets, always esteeming the coming Saviour a welcome theme, oftentimes give no notice that they are about to introduce that high matter. It may be so here, though it must be confessed that it would be an unusual interruption of a form of discourse demanding an unbroken connection. For the very next words are:

16. It is burned with fire, it is cut down. That, which God's right hand had planted, was burned. Israel, containing the visible church, was in a sad state, like a vine over which hot flames had passed and it was then cut down, or, as the same word is elsewhere rendered, cut up. They perish at the rebuke of thy countenance. They refers to those that wasted and destroyed the vine. So Street, Green, Jebb, Horsley, Fry. But Calvin, Patrick, Pool, Hammond, Scott, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander apply the phrase to the people of Israel. Horne is doubtful whether it refers to the adversaries, or to the Israelites.

17. Let thy hand be upon the man of thy right hand, upon the son of man whom thou madest strong for thyself. The best commentators admit that this refers to Christ. If so, it strengthens the conjecture that the same forms of expression in v. 15 referred to him also. The man of thy right hand, may mean the man raised up by thy right hand or raised up to sit at thy right hand. Let thy hand be upon him is thus explained by Alexander: "Let thy hand fall not on us but on our substitute." Scott: "'The man of God's right hand' and 'the son of man' point out the promised Messiah very clearly."

18. So will not we go back from thee. The stability of a people or of a church could never be predicated or pledged upon the courage, success or piety of a temporal prince. The Son of man exalted at God's right hand can give to his people steadfastness, preserve them from backsliding and keep them from falling, Luke xxii. 32; Heb. iv. 14; x. 23. Quicken us, and we will call upon thy name. For a time they had been in a dead state. Now they desired to be made alive. New life being imparted, they would delight in his worship and religion would be greatly revived.

19. Turn us again, O LORD God of hosts, cause thy face to shine; and we shall be saved. See on vv. 3, 7, 14.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. So surely as God hides his face, so surely will the righteous be in trouble. If he withdraws, it matters little who else is present. If he does not shine, the tapers of earth will be found very dim, v. 1.

2. If we have a heart to pray, we may confidently expect that God will have an ear to hear, v. 1. If we have a case, and desire to present it, we may know that God holds his court open.

3. While we should neither deny nor forget any of the attributes of God, we should specially call to mind the gentleness and loving-kindness of God in times of our deep affliction. Then too we should recall and revive the memory of the history of his past favors to all his people, v. 1.

4. We may always in faith and earnestness plead God's relations to us, as our Shepherd and as the glorious God dwelling between the cherubim, v. 1. There is no truth in theology that may not bring consolation to a trembling believer.

5. God has power to save, whenever he chooses to exert it, v. 2. Sometimes his omnipotence seems to slumber, but when he stirs it up, all enemies flee, stand aghast, or are consumed.

6. If we fall into any decay of nature or of grace, God alone can recover and deliver us, vv. 2, 3, 7, 14, 19. This should make us speed our flight to the mercy-seat. We do but lose time when we go to others before we go to the Lord.

7. Children should be taught and encouraged to cry mightily to the God, who heard and helped their fathers, v. 2. He is a God that changes not. What he has done once, he will do again, if the necessities of his people or the honor of his name require it.

8. Dickson: "As the apostasy of God's people from God is the fountain of all their calamity; so their repentance and returning unto God is the first step unto their relief from procured misery of captivity, or any other calamity," v. 3.

9. How mysterious the whole doctrine of repentance and conversion must be to those who think themselves naturally good, v. 3. Scott: "We can neither expect the comforts of his love, nor the protection of his powerful arm, except we are partakers of his converting grace." It is madness for carnal men to expect God to treat them as dear children.

10. Delay is not denial. God's time and way of answering our prayers are the best. Let us trust him. Let us not misinterpret him, v. 4. This would give the adversary the very advantage he seeks.

11. Yet if our prayers are not answered, we ought to inquire the cause, and be concerned, till we have a token for good, v. 4. Prayer is but a means to the divine blessing. Great and long-continued trials call for deep heart-searchings, as well as for earnest appeal to God.

12. It is mournful to be compelled to believe that after all the religious rites and forms in the world, there is but little hearty devotion and acceptable prayer offered to God. Else why should there remain so much that looks as if God were really and terribly angry with us? v. 4.

13. One of the great troubles of the Christian life is that we are naturally so much more affected and oppressed with natural than with moral evil, with our sufferings than with our sinfulness. "The tears of repentance are very rare, and soon dried up, but the tears of sorrow for affliction easily flow." It is well when worldly grief is followed by godly sorrow.

14. It is a great blessing to have neighbors! What an awful desolation earth would be, if each man, or each family were in perpetual solitude. And yet how often do neighbors themselves become chief sources of our miseries, v. 6. They envy, annoy, suspect, revile, persecute us. They seek our ruin.

15. Laughter, mockery, railing, ridicule are not new, though they are very keen weapons, v. 6. Let us not render railing for railing, but rather let us speak kind words for angry, good words for evil, and leave our revilers in God's hands.

16. God is in history, v. 8. Let us often look at the generations of old. The lessons of the past are full of instruction. Especially should great chains of providence be studied link by link. They reveal wonders.

17. God has filled our mouths with the most amazing arguments to be pleaded with him for accomplishing our full and final deliverance, vv. 8-12. When we can truly urge that God has begun a work, we have an irrefragable argument put into our mouths. How can he leave his work incomplete? Shall he not finish the house, whose foundations he has laid? Shall he plant a vine, and then lay and leave it waste?

18. Unfruitfulness in churches or in persons is just cause for the divine displeasure; and the measure of the sins of men and nations, unless brought to deep repentance, will be full after awhile, v. 8. If God destroys one nation for its sins, and its successor is not by such divine judgments deterred from adding iniquity to iniquity, even more horrible woes will come on the latter than on the former. The Jewish nation suffered far more terribly in its final overthrow than did the seven nations of Canaan, that preceded them.

19. Nations are planted and transplanted by the Lord, v. 8. Man could not make a nation. It is everywhere in Scripture claimed to be the work of Jehovah.

20. The good providence of God over nations in their later history is as necessary as it was in the beginning, v. 9. If they take root, it must be wholly owing to divine culture.

21. God's mercy can make great the smallest things and people, vv. 9, 10, 11, 15. He can take Israel from a hard bondage in the brick-kilns and make him renowned over the whole world for his puissance. He can take David from the sheep-cote and send his name over all the earth as the sweetest of lyric poets, as a great prince and a warrior, who had slain his tens of thousands.

22. If calamities overtake us we may rest assured either that God would correct in us something wrong, or make us useful to others as examples of suffering affliction, v. 12. "The curse causeless shall not come."

23. Dickson: "As present-felt misery commendeth prosperity past, so past prosperity augmenteth present misery, where the two conditions are compared," vv. 8-14.

24. Seldom if ever do troubles come alone, vv. 12, 13. Where there has been much sinning we may expect much suffering. If Israel apostatizes from God, and practises ingratitude, idolatry, pride, unbelief, covetousness, that people may expect evil in many a form.

25. How welcome to the humble believer are discoveries here and there, all through Scripture, of the Branch, the Stem of Jesse, the Plant of renown, the Root and the Offspring of David, the Son of man, vv. 15, 17. And as the prophets asked no formal leave to bring in this matter, so neither need we apologize for dwelling on so glorious a personage. Jesus should always be to us a welcome theme.

26. It is impossible for us to be too careful to avoid backsliding, v. 18. It is the bane of piety, the misery of Christians. If we are kept from declension, it must be by the power of God through Jesus Christ. Let us by solemn covenant engagements, by prayer, by ceaseless vigilance, by self-exhortation guard against so great a sin and misery as will overtake us if we go back from God.

27. Let not our faith be staggered at the terrible indiscriminateness, with which the divine judgments seem to fall on communities composed of saints and sinners; see this Psalm; Ecc. ii. 14; ix. 3. In times of public calamity the righteous, from the refined sensibility of their nature, if from no other cause, often suffer even more than the wicked.

28. Let every people, enjoying the blessings of peace and ordinary prosperity, of civil and religious liberty, remember that they hold their franchises and immunities solely by the bounty of God. Every people have sinned enough to provoke the wrath of the Almighty. Let them humble themselves and cry for mercy. Let them put away their idols and do works meet for repentance.

29. Let those who are in the most afflicted circumstances not forsake the throne of grace. Rather let them with great liveliness and warm desires cleave to the Lord with purpose of heart.

PSALM LXXXI.

To the chief Musician upon Gittith, A Psalm of Asaph.

- 1 Sing aloud unto God our strength: make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob.
- 2 Take a psalm, and bring hither the timbrel, the pleasant harp with the psaltery.
- 3 Blow up the trumpet in the new moon, in the time appointed, on our solemn feast day.
- 4 For this was a statute for Israel, and a law of the God of Jacob.
- 5 This he ordained in Joseph for a testimony, when he went out through the land of Egypt: where I heard a language that I understood not.
- 6 I removed his burden from the burden: his hands were delivered from the pots.
- 7 Thou calledst in trouble, and I delivered thee; I answered thee in the secret place of thunder: I proved thee at the waters of Meribah. Selah.
- 8 Hear, O my people, and I will testify unto thee: O Israel, if thou wilt hearken unto me;
- 9 There shall no strange god be in thee; neither shalt thou worship any strange god.
- 10 I am the LORD thy God, which brought thee out of the land of Egypt: open thy mouth wide, and I will fill it.
- 11 But my people would not hearken to my voice; and Israel would none of me.
- 12 So I gave them up to their own hearts' lust: and they walked in their own counsels.
- 13 Oh that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my ways!
- 14 I should soon have subdued their enemies, and turned my hand against their adversaries.
- 15 The haters of the LORD should have submitted themselves unto him: but their time should have endured for ever.
- 16 He should have fed them also with the finest of the wheat: and with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iv. viii. xi. On the date and authorship see Introduction, § 4, on Psalms l. lxxiii.—lxxx. Alexander: "In the absence of any proof to the contrary, the Asaph of this title must be assumed to be the cotemporary of David." Clarke gives no date. Scott dates it B. C. 1045. Horsley is confident that it is older than the time of David, but he assigns no sufficient ground for such an opinion. Hengstenberg is clear that this Psalm has a "prophetic character." Tholuck: "Asaph, the cotemporary of David, is probably the author." There is not entire agreement as to the specific object or design of the Psalm. Clarke: "It is pretty generally agreed that it was either written for, or used at the celebration of the feast of Trumpets, (Lev. xxiii. 24,) which was held on the first day of the month Tisri, which was the beginning of the Jewish year; and on that day it is still used in the Jewish worship. According to Jewish tradition, credited by many learned Christians, the world was created in Tisri, which answers to our September. The Psalm may have been used in celebrating the feast of trumpets on the first day of Tisri, the feast of tabernacles on the fifteenth of the same month, the creation of the world, the feasts of the new moons, and the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt; to all which circumstances it appears to refer." Tholuck calls it,

"A passover Psalm, which contains at the same time a sermon of God to his people." Hengstenberg, Alexander and others take much the same view. Luther thinks it was sung at the feast of tabernacles. The fact is, this ode is fit to be sung on any joyous occasion of worship in Israel. The names of the Most High found in this Psalm are Elohim God, El God and Jehovah LORD, on which see on Psalms iii. 2; i. 2; v. 4. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Sing aloud unto God our strength. Sing aloud, elsewhere sing, shout, cry, cry out, shout for joy, rejoice, greatly rejoice, triumph. The ancient versions have praise, sing praises, rejoice exceedingly. Strength, the word so often used in declaring that Jehovah is the source of all the might of his people, Ps. xxviii. 7; xlv. 1. In the Psalter the word first occurs in Ps. viii. 2. Make a joyful noise unto the God of Jacob. The verb is elsewhere rendered cry, cry aloud, shout, shout for joy, triumph. It is the word used to describe the joyful worship of angels at the completion of creation, Job xxxviii. 7. The two clauses are a loud call to the public and joyful worship of Jehovah. The patriarch Jacob had rich experience of God's almightiness, because by it the enraged heart of Esau was so changed that he became kind. See on Ps. xx. 1.

2. Take a Psalm. Psalm, the original twice so rendered, and twice melody. The cognate verb is commonly sing, sing Psalms, sing praises, praise. The rendering of the common version is good. This clause calls for the use of words of praise. And bring hither the timbrel. Timbrel, the Hebrew word occurs seventeen times, is eight times rendered as here, and nine times tabret. It designates any drum, or tambourine known to the Israelites. This instrument is first noticed in Job xxi. 12; Gen. xxxi. 27. It was played by women. [And take] the pleasant harp with the psaltery. On harp and psaltery see on Ps. xxxiii. 2.

3. Blow up the trumpet. The trumpets or cornets of Scripture were of various shapes and materials. They were used to call assemblies, to celebrate sacrifices, to proclaim the jubilee, and on occasion of several feasts. In the new moon is explained by two other phrases closely following, in the time appointed, on our solemn feast day. Many think there is special reference to some one annual feast. If this is so, it was probably the passover. See introductory remarks on this Psalm, also v. 5.

4. For this was a statute for Israel, and a law of the God of Jacob. Statute, commonly so rendered. Law, commonly rendered judgment. Each word signifies a fixed ordinance. The latter is sometimes rendered right, as in Ps. ix. 4. Some so read it here. Israel, the people descended from Jacob.

5. This he ordained in Joseph for a testimony, when he went out through the land of Egypt. Whatever was pleasant in the condition of the Israelites in Egypt was mainly through the influence of Joseph; for when there arose another Pharaoh, who knew not Joseph, they fell into great affliction. So that there is peculiar propriety in here using Joseph as a name for the nation. On testimony see on Ps. xix. 7. The passover was not only a fixed ordinance; it was a standing testimony. The pronoun he may refer, 1, to God, when he went forth to destroy all the first-born in the land; and then led Joseph forth from Egypt; or, 2, to Joseph (i. e., the Israelites) when he publicly went out of Egypt. The latter is the more common interpretation. The preposition through might be upon or over, implying the triumphant character of the march out of Egypt. Where I heard a language that I understood not. What does this mean? Four views are taken. 1. Joseph (meaning the Israelites) heard the language of the Egyptians, which was to them a foreign tongue, "a strange language," Ps. cxiv. 1. The chief difficulty lies in the use of the pronoun I, instead of he. The Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Vulgate and Ethiopic read, he, instead of I. In this view the language heard by the Israelites was the Egyptian. 2. Some think the language meant is that found in the next verse: "I removed his shoulder," etc., i. e., Israel heard words of great delight, when God undertook to deliver his people. The great objection to this is that the word rendered language does not mean sentence, but language or tongue, (literally lip) as in Gen. xi. 1, 6, 7. Yet some think it means that Israel heard the voice of God as on Mount Sinai, instructing them in the way they should walk. It was then they said, "Let not God speak with us lest we die." 3. Another interpretation is that God is the speaker here, and that by a figure of speech he represents himself as not being acquainted with the language spoken by the Egyptians, or by the Hebrews after their long residence in Egypt. It was strange to him. This figure is no more bold than that where God says he had known no other nation but that of Israel, Amos iii. 2. 4. Doederlein "interprets the words as an abrupt exclamation of the Psalmist upon feeling himself suddenly influenced by a divine afflatus, and upon hearing an oracle addressed to him by God, which consisted of what immediately follows, from v. 6 to the close of the Psalm, and which is spoken in the person of God." Is not this overstrained? The second view has for its support more authority than either of the others. But the third makes the grammatical construction very easy and simple. All agree that in v. 6 God is the speaker. Why may he not be in this clause?

6. I removed his shoulder from the burden. How heavy the burdens on the children of Israel were may be seen in Ex. v. 5-19; vi. 6, 7. His hands were delivered from the pots. Pots, in the English version elsewhere rendered seething pots, kettles, caldrons, baskets, Job xli. 20; 1 Sam. ii. 14; 2 Chron. xxxv. 13; Jer. xxiv. 2. By pots here Clarke understands "the moulds and furnaces in which they formed and baked their bricks." Kennicott thinks they were large vessels in which the earth was mixed and worked up for making bricks. Hengstenberg: "Baskets of this kind were found in the sepulchral vaults of Thebes, of which Rosellini first furnished drawings and descriptions: the Israelites used them for carrying from one place to another the clay and manufactured bricks." Pool: "In the general, the word seems to note all those vessels, wherein they carried water, straw, lime, bricks, etc." Scott thinks it doubtful whether the word means earthen vessels made by the Israelites, or the kilns, where bricks were burnt, or baskets used in their work, or the flesh-pots which they afterwards regretted. The parallelism would make them baskets in which burdens were borne. From these their hands were delivered or passed away, literally will pass away, implying not only that Egyptian servitude was ended, but should never return.

7. Thou calledst in trouble, and I delivered thee. The historic account of the cry of the oppressed Israelites is found in Ex. ii. 23-25; iii. 7, 9. Their deliverance was in several respects the most famous and important event in ancient history. I answered thee in the secret place of thunder. The verb is in the future, will answer, as is also the verb of the next clause, will prove. But see Introduction, § 6. Those, who should insist on reading these clauses in the future, would of course make them prophetic. But it seems certain that this Psalm was not written till after the events mentioned in this verse. This clause has received three interpretations. 1. Scott: "Some think that the secret place refers to the cloudy pillar, from the hidden recess of which JEHOVAH spoke in mercy to his people, and in thunder to his enemies." 2. Calvin: "The meaning simply is that the people were heard in a secret and wonderful manner, while, at the same time, manifest tokens were given by which the Israelites might be satisfied that they were succored by the divine hand." 3. Alexander following Lowth and Walford: "The secret or hiding-place of thunder is the dark cloud charged with tempest, which overhung Mount Sinai at the giving of the law, Ex. xx. 18." See also Deut. iv. 10, 11, 36. The intelligent reader must judge which of these is to be preferred. I proved thee at the waters of Meribah. The historic event here alluded to is recorded in Num. xx. 2-13. The trial to which the Israelites were there subjected was that of an inadequate supply of water for a short time. If the preceding clause would seem to relate to Sinai, this relates to an event of prior date; but in Hebrew poetry the historic order of events is not always preserved. Luther: "He makes mention of the waters of strife (Meribah) in order that he may remind them of their sins."

8. Hear, O my people, and I will testify unto thee. People, or nation. God's word and ordinances are often represented as a testimony. Surely he is a competent and credible witness. See on Ps. l. 7. O Israel, if thou wilt hearken unto me. It is better to render it, Oh that thou wouldst hearken. The corresponding Greek particle has the optative sense in Luke xix. 42.

9. There shall be no strange God in thee; neither shalt thou worship any strange God. There are different words rendered strange in this verse, but the difference in signification is very slight. In this verse it is nothing. Either of them might be rendered foreign, alien. The prohibition is to seek after a heathen God. This was very clearly right as none pretended that any false God had helped them, Deut. xxxii. 12. Bow down, as in the second commandment. The future here has the force of the imperative as in several precepts of the decalogue.

10. I am the LORD thy God which brought thee out of the land of Egypt. This quite corresponds with the preface of the moral law, Ex. xx. 2. Clearly the inspired writer was thinking of that code. Some make this clause parenthetical. It assigns the awful authority, under which all these things are said. If connected with the next clause it gives it peculiar force: Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it. Hengstenberg: "I am rich for all thy necessities, even for thy boldest wishes." God, who had saved them from great troubles, could supply all their need and meet all their desires in days to come. Tholuck: "Let them open their hearts and mouths ever so wide, he would fill them; as infants and young birds are fed by their mothers, so he would satisfy them."

11. But my people would not hearken to my voice; and Israel would none of me. People and Israel mean the same. Both clauses express strong aversion; the latter, utter unwillingness, total disinclination of heart. Chaldee: They acquiesced not in my word.

12. So I gave them up to their own hearts' lust. Tremellius and Junius: Wherefore I gave them up to walk according to the desire of their own heart; Edwards, Jebb and Green: So I gave them up to the imaginations of their own hearts; Walford: So I gave them up to the purposes of their heart; Clarke: So I gave them up to the obstinate wickedness of their heart; Alexander: And I gave them up to the corruption of their own heart. The word rendered lust occurs ten times, and in the text of the English Bible is uniformly rendered imagination except here; in the margin sometimes hardness, stubbornness. And they walked in their own counsels, plans, purposes. Pool: "They practised those things, both in conversation and in religious worship, which were most agreeable, not to my commands or counsels, but to their own fancies and inclinations."

13. Oh that my people had hearkened unto me, and Israel had walked in my ways! People and Israel as in v. 8. Hearkened, as in vv. 5, 8, 11. To walk in God's ways is habitually to obey him. See on Ps. i. 1. Clarke: "Nothing 'can be more plaintive than the original: sense and sound are surprisingly united."

14. I should soon have subdued their enemies, and turned my hand against their adversaries. Enemies, very uniformly rendered. Adversaries, those who vex, afflict, distress, or, bring into straits. Subdued, elsewhere humbled, brought down, brought low. Alexander: "The phrase [turn my hand] denotes mere action; the idea of hostile or destructive action is suggested by the context." The verb is sometimes rendered requite, recompense. In such cases the word hand is not added.

15. The haters of the LORD should have submitted themselves unto him. Haters of the LORD, literally those hating Jehovah. The word expresses strong dislike, settled enmity. Submitted, the verb literally signifies lied, deceived, dealt falsely, dissembled, yielded feigned obedience, 1 Kings xiii. 18; Zech. xiii. 4; Lev. xix. 11; Josh. vii. 11 and margin of 2 Sam. xxii. 45. See on Ps. xviii. 44. The Israelites had trouble in all their generations with the heathen. In all the verse God identifies himself with his people. But their time should have endured forever. Their time, meaning their continuance, prosperity and power, should have been enduring.

16. He should have fed them also with the finest of the wheat, literally the fat of wheat, meaning the best part or quality of it. For he some would read I. Either gives the sense. And with honey out of the rock should I have satisfied thee. Does this mean a miraculous supply of honey? Hengstenberg thinks this probable. But is this necessary? Moses says God made his people "suck honey out of the rock," Deut. xxxii. 13. Compare 1 Sam. xiv. 25. Seventeen or eighteen times we have the phrase "a land flowing with milk and honey." Wild honey was a part of the food of John Baptist. The ideas of the verse are taken from Deut. xxxii. 13, 14. Alexander: "Wheat and honey, by a natural and primitive association, are here put for the necessities and the luxuries of human sustenance, and these again for the highest enjoyment and prosperity." The paraphrase of the old Psalter quoted by Clarke has: "He fed thaim with the body of Criste and gostely understanding; and of hony that ran of the stane, that is, of the wisdom, that is swete to the hert." Clarke: "Several of the fathers understand this place of Christ." Calvin: "The meaning simply is, that the grace of God would have continued to flow in an unbroken and uniform course, had it not been interrupted by the perverseness and wickedness of the people."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. God's worship should not only be secret, but also social and public; and his public worship should be audible and intelligible, not tame, nor boisterous, but triumphant. "Sing aloud," "Make a joyful noise," v. 1. Mute worship can edify none but him, who offers it. Henry: "We must be warm and affectionate in praising God; we must with a hearty good will show forth his praise, as those that are not ashamed to own our dependence on him, and our obligations to him."

2. When God is our strength, we are irresistible and our foes are nothing, v. 1. He makes the feeble to be as David.

3. One advantage of the study of good history is that there we learn how safe is he, who trusts Jehovah. The God of Jacob is the God of all who wrestle like Jacob, v. 1.

4. As a great part of our enjoyment consists in the constant reception of blessings; so a large part of our duty consists in rendering suitable thanks and praises for benefits received, v. 2. Scott: "All the worship, which we can render, is far beneath his glorious excellences, and our immense obligations to him, especially in our redemption from wrath and sin."

5. Verses 2, 3, call up the subject of instrumental music. See REMARKS on Ps. xxxiii. 2.

6. A ritual is not in itself like a moral precept; but when God prescribes a ceremony it is to be sacredly observed because he enjoins it, vv. 4, 5. Compare John iii. 15. Dickson: "It is a sufficient motive for any religious action that God hath ordained it; and no less authority than divine can warrant a man in matters of religion."

7. All God's word and ordinances are for a testimony to us, vv. 5, 8. The tabernacle was the tabernacle of witness. The ark was the ark of the testimony. God testifies to us. He declares. He swears. Not to believe him is to make him a liar.

8. It is well for us to be reminded of our humble origin, v. 6. We should often think of the hole of the pit, whence we were digged. All Israel was taught to say, "A Syrian ready to perish was my father," Deut. xxvi. 5.

9. As the people of the Jews never rose to all the sublimity of praise, which God's mercies in bringing them out of Egypt would have warranted, so neither shall we ever adequately thank him for his many and great favors displayed in redemption, vv. 5, 6, 7, 10. Calvin: "As God has not only withdrawn our shoulders from a burden of brick, and not only removed our hands from the kilns, but has also redeemed us from the cruel and miserable tyranny of Satan, and drawn us from the depths of hell, the obligations under which we lie to him are of a much more strict and sacred kind than those under which he had brought his ancient people."

10. In all ages prayer has been a great means of good to miserable sinners, v. 7. This suits the poorest beggars. Ask and have is the rule.

11. God's answers are not the less to be heeded, because they sometimes come to us in an alarming manner, from the secret place of thunder, v. 7. The same is taught in Ps. xlv. 4; lv. 5.

12. Everything is a test of character, v. 7. God proves us by prosperity and by adversity, by joy and by sorrow, by hunger and by thirst, by sickness and by health, by all his word and by all his providences.

13. Nothing can make amends for a perverse will, a wicked inclination of the heart, v. 8. If men have not a mind to hearken, they will surely perish. If there be first a willing mind, our service is accepted according to what we have, and not according to what we have not.

14. How amazingly is human nature fallen and sunk, when, even after all God's warnings, men yet fall into abominable idolatries, v. 9. God cannot allow another to be partaker of honors due to him without denying himself. It is as much his prerogative to be God alone as to be God at all.

15. Then are past mercies rightly used when they lead us to enlarged petitions and increased earnestness in prayer, v. 10. It is dreadful when success hardens our hearts, or makes us lifeless in devotion.

16. No form of profession or of worship is in any measure pleasing to God where the will and affections are not engaged, v. 11. It is sad indeed when we suppose that decency of appearance will be accepted by Jehovah for heartiness of soul. Henry: "All the wickedness of the wicked world is owing to the wilfulness of the wicked will. The reason why people are not religious is, because they will not be so."

17. Of all the judgments of God none are so terrible as spiritual judgments, v. 12. When God's wrath against one is not very hot, he says, I will deprive him of health, or riches, or public favor, or children, or friends; but when he is greatly incensed, he says, He is joined to idols, let him alone. Tholuck: "Man will return to the all-sufficient God, though by circuitous and thorny paths, if some tender parts continue in his heart; but if these are gone, then the judgment of induration will ensue." Calvin: "It is assuredly the most dreadful kind of punishment which can be inflicted upon us, and an evidence of the utter hopelessness of our condition, when God, holding his peace, and conniving at our perverseness, applies no remedy for bringing us to repentance."

18. Salvation is so important and desirable that God declares it to be in his view precious. Oh that my people had hearkened, etc., v. 13. The Lord is not willing that any should perish. He has sworn that he has no pleasure in the death of the sinner. Scott: "The Lord delights in the conversion of sinners, and in the faith and obedience of his people."

19. God does not afflict willingly, v. 14. There is a need-be for all the righteous suffer. Calvin: "The procuring cause of our misery is in ourselves."

20. "The foes of God's people are the foes of God himself," v. 15. Their cause is his cause. If we would mind God's interests, he would mind ours, for ours are his.

21. How is it possible to satisfy the demands of men who hate God himself? Calvin: "Peace with the reprobate cannot be looked for except in so far as God restrains their rage by hidden chains. A lion shut up in an iron cage still retains his own nature, but he is kept from mangling and tearing in pieces those who are not even more than five or six feet distant from him." The humblest believer may safely say to the proudest persecutor as Christ said to Pilate: "Thou couldest have no power at all against me, except it were given thee from above," John xix. 11.

22. Nothing is too good for God's servants, v. 16. The finest of the wheat, honey out of the rock, all things needful for body and soul, for time and eternity, all, all are theirs, 1 Cor. iii. 21-23.

23. Morison: "There is still a retribution in human events; and the great Sovereign of the universe is perpetually carrying on a system of punishment and reward, extending even to the concerns of individuals, and often drawing a line of demarcation between the enemies and friends of God."

24. Horne: "Christ is the 'bread' of life, he is the 'rock' of salvation, and his promises are as 'honey' to pious minds. But they who reject him, as their Lord and Master, must also lose him as their Saviour and their reward."

PSALM LXXXII.

A Psalm of Asaph.

1 God standeth in the congregation of the mighty; he judgeth among the gods.

2 How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked? Selah.

3 Defend the poor and fatherless: do justice to the afflicted and needy.

4 Deliver the poor and needy: rid them out of the hand of the wicked.

5 They know not, neither will they understand; they walk on in darkness: all the foundations of the earth are out of course.

6 I have said, Ye are gods; and all of you are children of the Most High.

7 But ye shall die like men, and fall like one of the princes.

8 Arise, O God, judge the earth: for thou shalt inherit all nations.

ON the title see on title of Ps. iii. On the authorship see Introduction, § 4, and on Psalms l. lxxiii.-lxxxii. Piscator thinks that by Asaph we are here to understand the posterity of Asaph, and that the title is an inscription to them and does not determine the authorship. Kimchi and Clarke think the Psalm was written by some one in the time of Jehoshaphat, who undertook to reform the courts of justice in his day, 2 Chron. xix. 5-7. Scott is doubtful whether it was written in David's time, or in the days of Hezekiah. Venema, Patrick, Edwards, Dodd and Morison think its author lived in the days of Hezekiah. For Isaiah, who lived in Hezekiah's time, complains much of the judges of those days, Isa. i. 10, 23. Gill, Hengstenberg and Alexander (the latter confidently) think it was written by Asaph, who flourished in the time of David. This is probably correct. Horsley thinks this Psalm foretells the just judgment of God on the unjust judges of our Lord Jesus Christ. No doubt the principles of just judgment and the consequences of unjust judgments are the same in all ages and in all cases. Horsley's view is embraced by few, if any. Yet our Saviour cites a passage from this Psalm to vindicate himself against the charge of blasphemy, John x. 34-36. The Syriac styles it "an invective against the impious Jews." The design of this composition seems clear from the language throughout. Gill: "This Psalm was written for the use of persons in power, for the instruction of kings and princes, judges and civil magistrates." Alexander calls it "A brief but pregnant statement of the responsibilities attached to the judicial office under the Mosaic dispensation." Scott dates it B. C. 1048; Clarke, B. C. 912. On Selah see Introduction, § 15. The names of the Almighty here found are Elohim God, El God and Gel-yohn Most High, on which see on Psalms iii. 2; v. 4; vii. 17.

1. God standeth in the congregation of the mighty; he judgeth among the gods. Chaldee: God whose majesty carries in the congregation of the just, who are mighty in the law, judges in the midst of the judges; church of England: God standeth in the congregation of princes; he is judge among gods; John Rogers' Translation: God standeth in the congregacyon of the goddes, and is a judge among the judges; Edwards: God stands in the assemblies of judges; he judgeth among magistrates; Amesius: God stands in the assembly of the mighty God, among the magistratès he judges. The first word doubtless points to Jehovah. Standeth may indicate a posture of authority, and a readiness to render assistance. Congregation, the same word so rendered in Ps. i. 5; vii. 7. It designates any assembly good or bad. Here it embraces the whole body of judges or of the people to be judged. The mighty, El, which may denote either God himself as the mighty God, or the chief magistrate as embodying the judicial authority of the land. This latter view is supported by the parallelism of the next clause, He judgeth among the gods, the men of authority. Alexander: "The idea is, that as the judges were gods to other men, so God would be a judge to them."

2. How long will ye judge unjustly, and accept the persons of the wicked? Judge, as in v. 1. God judges and man judges. Dreadful may be the effects of erroneous human judgments; but they will be revised, and perhaps most of them will be reversed in whole or in part. No good man can sit in either temporal or ecclesiastical courts, and observe the course of proceeding without seeing the necessity of a tribunal above that of mortals. Some from weakness, some from prejudice, some from passion, some from interest, and some from party-spirit judge unjustly. The word rendered unjustly is rendered as an adverb here and in Deut. xxv. 16; as a noun, unrighteousness, or iniquity in Lev. xix. 15, 35; Ps. vii. 3; liii. 1. To accept persons is to show partiality, favoring one above another. The literal rendering would be lift up the faces. Whether this means to cheer one by favoring him, or to admit him to a private interview may be doubtful.

3. Defend the poor and fatherless. Defend, almost uniformly rendered judge. It here signifies the redressing of wrongs. Poor, the opposite of rich in worldly goods, defenceless, see Ruth iii. 10. The Scripture abounds in denunciations against those who oppress the poor, or refuse to give him succor when he is drawn to destruction, Pr. xiv. 21; xxi. 13. Fatherless, as in Ps. x. 14, 18. It is once rendered orphan, Lam. v. 3; sometimes equivalent to destitute, forlorn, helpless. Do justice to the afflicted and needy. Do justice, justify, give him his rights. Afflicted, also rendered poor, humble. See on Ps. ix. 12. Needy, very commonly rendered poor. It is rendered do lack in Ps. xxxiv. 10. Such cannot command the usual influences and appliances to move judges and rulers, but God is their avenger.

4. Deliver the poor and needy. Deliver, often so rendered, once carry away safe, and in one form, cause to escape. Poor, the same word so rendered in v. 3. Needy, see on Ps. lxxii. 4, 12, 13. All these terms are used to point out those that are of themselves unable to contend with the rich and powerful. Rid them out of the hand of the wicked. Rid, also rendered pluck, deliver, recover, preserve. The hand is the emblem of power, here of power wrongfully used. Wicked, rendered ungodly in Ps. i.

5. They know not, neither will they understand. They, not the poor and needy, but the rulers, are perversely and stubbornly ignorant of the first principles of right and equity. They have no conscience about the duties of their office. Power has puffed them up and hardened their hearts. They walk on in darkness. This verb is also in the future, will walk. Alexander: "Darkness is a figure both for ignorance and wickedness." The speaker is still the prophet. The language expresses the absence of hope as to any change for the better. All the foundations of the earth are out of course. Chaldee, Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Calvin and Jebb read are moved; Syriac and Fabritius, shake; Arabic, tremble; Piscator, Tremellius and Junius and Amesius, are removed; Green, are in a tottering state; Clarke and Tholuck, totter; Edwards, are unsettled; Horsley, are disordered; Fry, are displaced; Hengstenberg and Alexander, are shaken. Earth may mean the whole world or the land, i. e., the land of Israel. Diodati: "From this corruption of the head proceeds a general disorder and ruin of the whole state." Patrick: "The foundations of the kingdom, which are Justice and Truth, are shaken; all things are in confusion, and in danger to come to ruin." Alexander: "The denial or perversion of justice is described as disorganizing society."

6. I have said, Ye are gods. Gods, Elohim. The office of the magistrate was as dignified and awful as any of them claimed it to be. They were invested with the character of representatives of God. Therefore they acted under the highest responsibility. Their name was dreadful; so was their position; and, if their power was abused, their doom should be dreadful also. And all of you are children of the Most High. The phrase is parallel to the former, Ye are gods. Criswell: "Ye are men of the highest rank and power;" Alexander: "It denotes the closest and most intimate relation to Jehovah, as the supreme or sovereign God;" Patrick: "I have put my majesty upon you."

7. But ye shall die like men. But, better surely. Like men, like Adam. As he fell from holiness and dignity, so shall ye fall from your honor and greatness. Or, ye are as liable to death as other men. Your office will not protect you from disease and corruption. And [ye shall] fall like one of the princes. To fall is to fall in death. The same word is rendered die, perish, rot, Gen. xxv. 18; Ex. xix. 21; Num. v. 27. It is often followed by the words with the sword. The parallelism would show that death is here threatened. Some suppose that a violent death is implied. And it is a remarkable fact that cruel, ambitious and deceitful rulers are not apt to prolong their lives. Every generation gives examples of sore and sudden deaths of tyrants and oppressors. By falling like one of the princes, some suppose there is reference to the kings who were destroyed by the Israelites at taking possession of Canaan. The same word is applied to the princes of the Philistines. But it is also applied to any ruler, captain, or chief. Some suggest a slight change of the Hebrew text so that the word would be rendered poor, not princes. This would give a good sense, but we have no right to change the text. Calvin translates it, Ye shall fall, O princes! as one of the people.

8. Arise, O God, as in Ps. iii. 7; vii. 6. Judge the earth. Judge, rendered defend in v. 3. Judge so as effectually to succor and protect. Clarke: Take the sceptre, and rule, thyself; Diodati: "Seeing thy ministers and officers have subverted justice; come and reëstablish thy kingdom in the world by thy Spirit and word, and chiefly by the presence of thy Son," Ps. xcvi. 10. For thou shalt inherit all nations. God is the Father of all nations, the Author of all government, the Parent of all rulers and people. Men pervert God's authority when they turn bloody or tyrannical. They misrepresent the fountain of all government, when they pervert justice. Some think this last clause has allusion to Christ as the rightful Lord of all the world.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Government is of God, v. 1. It was not originated by men meeting and consulting whether they would or would not be subject to law. Civil government is a divine ordinance. "There is no power but of God. The powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power resisteth the ordinance of God; and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation," Rom. xiii. 1, 2. If God's word opposes tyranny, it also opposes anarchy.

2. Consequently rulers of every rank are to be honored. Jehovah himself calls them gods, vv. 1, 6; Ex. xxii. 28. The magistrate is "the minister of God, a revenger to execute wrath upon him that doeth evil," Rom. xiii. 4. Religious persons and religious teachers are never at liberty to speak evil of their rulers, to revile them, to try to bring them into disesteem. We must give honor to whom honor is due. Luther: "Who will set himself against those on whom God bestows his own name? Whoever despises them, despises at the same time the true Magistrate, God, who speaks and judges in them and through them, and calls their judgment his judgment;" Hodge: "Obedience is not enjoined on the ground of the personal merit of those in authority, but on the ground of their official station."

3. Dickson: "No judge is absolute lord over a people, but is in subordination to God, who is Judge above all judges, and will judge of all the decrees of judges under him;" Hodge: "The design of civil government is not to promote the advantage of rulers but of the ruled. . . . When rulers become a terror to the good, and a praise to them that do evil, they may still be tolerated and obeyed, not however, of right, but because the remedy may be worse than the disease."

4. The duties of magistrates are very difficult and onerous. They have great need of wisdom, truthfulness, courage, calmness, humility, benevolence, patience and a nice sense of justice. Compare Pr. xvi. 10; xvii. 7; xxviii. 16; Ecc. iv. 13; x. 16. As to the doom of wicked rulers the Scriptures give us fearful examples in many and no less fearful predictions, Isa. xiv. 14, 15; Ezek. xxviii. 1-11.

5. However great rulers may be, they are still strictly accountable to Jehovah, v. 1. Luther: "They must understand that they are not placed over stocks and stones, nor over swine and dogs, but over the congregation of God: they must therefore be afraid of acting against God himself when they act unjustly." Even though they may inflict punishment on a wicked nation, yet if they do it wantonly or cruelly, they shall smart for it, Isa. x. 7. Many a sinner has been punished for the malignity, arrogance or recklessness with which he brought evil on those whom God had sent him to chastise.

6. Because princes and rulers are under God's control and accountable to him, the righteous may be very calm and quiet respecting public affairs even in times of distraction. God presides in the wildest confusion, v. 1. Henry: "Let subjects consider this, and be comforted with it; for good princes and good judges, who mean well, are under a divine direction, and bad ones, who mean ever so ill, are under a divine restraint." Tholuck: "Here is the mighty consolation of those who have no strength and support of their own, that God, who has invested earthly tribunals with his power, for the special purpose of protecting the helpless against oppressors, will assuredly watch over their proceedings, and seize the sceptre when his judges pervert justice and become oppressors."

7. If the duties and responsibilities of rulers are so great, then it is clear that they should be made subjects of frequent and earnest prayer, 1 Tim. ii. 1-3. And because their trials are great, we should not make them greater by harsh judgments or hard speeches concerning them, nor by hesitating to pay all taxes lawfully imposed, nor by making factious opposition to their acts and measures.

8. Rulers should never forget that they are liable to err, and that all, who have gone before them, have erred, and some of them very egregiously, v. 2. Self-distrust and close vigilance over themselves are necessary to none more than to rulers. The records of government are full of blots made by human weakness and human wickedness. Many rulers 'make fellowship with the unjust, and for the sake of covetousness withhold justice from the poor and fatherless, for whose protection in particular earthly tribunals are invested with power.' Calvin: "Kings and such as are invested with authority, through the blindness which is produced by pride, generally take to themselves a boundless liberty of action. . . They think it would derogate from their elevated rank were they to be governed by moderate counsels; and although their own folly is more than enough to urge them on in their reckless career, they, notwithstanding, seek for flatterers to soothe and applaud them in their vices. . . They cannot bear to be subject to reason and laws."

9. Let all, who hold authority in families, in schools, and in civil communities, remember that to God nothing is more offensive, or to man more injurious, or to themselves more disgraceful than partiality, v. 2.

10. A chief object of government is to protect, defend, succor and do justice to the poor and fatherless, the afflicted and needy, the humble and destitute, vv. 3, 4. Compare Deut. xxvii. 19. The mighty and the majority can protect themselves. The feeble and the minority need the defence of good laws and good rulers. If the government fails to secure these, it will become an intolerable burden. Dickson: "The touchstone of magistrates' justice is in the causes and cases of the poor, fatherless, afflicted and needy, who are not able to attend long their suits of law, and have no friends or money to deal for them; to whom therefore the mighty should be eyes to direct them, and a staff to their weakness, to support and help them to their right." Calvin: "There is a certain devilish frenzy which infatuates the princes of the world, and leads them voluntarily to pay greater respect to wicked men than to the simple and innocent." Horne: "Every oppressor of the poor is a likeness of 'that wicked one,' and every upright judge will endeavor to resemble the Redeemer. For this purpose he will be always willing to admit, diligent to discuss, solicitous to expedite the cause of the poor and injured person, and to afford such an one the speediest, the cheapest, and the most effectual redress, equally contemning the offers, and the frowns of power."

11. This Psalm and this subject press on our notice the importance of justice as an element of social and civil life. There is no substitute for it. Some talk of charity, nor can it be denied that there is much scope for its exercise. But no charity can make a character virtuous, or a community happy, if JUSTICE is wanting. For this reason all good governments carefully guard against every species of bribery, for "a gift destroyeth the heart," and "a wicked man taketh a gift out of the bosom to pervert the ways of judgment," Ecc. vii. 7; Pr. xvii. 23. "Presents and gifts blind the eyes of the wise, and stop his mouth that he cannot reprove," Eccus. xx. 29. Such practices bring great distress. Henry: "The miscarriages of public persons are public mischiefs." Clarke: "Justice is at the head of all the institutions in a well regulated state: when that gets poisoned or perverted, every evil, political and domestic, must prevail. Even religion itself ceases to have any influence." There can be no stable and salutary government where injustice is an element. Morison:

"What a blessing to live under a government, where the rights of the meanest subject are held sacred, where the officers are peace, and the exactors righteous."

12. It is a sad thing when rulers and judges are ignorant of the principles which ought to guide them, and too indolent to inform themselves, v. 5. Oh that all judges would observe the rule of the apostle: "Be swift to hear, slow to speak, slow to wrath," James i. 19.

13. Perhaps the worst form of stable, uniform government on earth is better than anarchy; but next to anarchy, systematic misrule is the direst calamity that can befall a state. Bad rulers are a frightful scourge. Hengstenberg: "Everything is ruined by them,—they ruin everything." Morison: "How terrible is the state of any nation, in which wicked men are the principal parties raised to posts of honor, and in which the ungodly are protected, and the excellent of the earth are trampled in the dust," Ps. xii. 8. Dickson: "When justice and judgment-seats are corrupted, and judges do not mind justice in their places, then the pillars of that land or kingdom must stagger, and all matters go to ruin, or a perilous alteration."

14. It is a solemn duty to remind judges and rulers of the frailty of their lives. "Their high office cannot secure immortality." "Death mingles sceptres with spades." Tholuck: "Death, which levels all men, is the most effective sermon for earthly rulers."

15. Sometimes God makes terrible examples of wicked rulers even before they pass into eternity. Strange judgments happen to them, and hurry them away. Compare Job xxxiv. 24–28. Writers not addicted to superstition have often recorded the marked and awful severity of the calamities which befall tyrants and persecutors. Several commentators quote those words of the heathen poet: "Few kings and tyrants go down to Pluto, the son of Ceres, without being put to a violent death, before they have completed the ordinary term allotted to the life of mortal man." Scott: "As for ungodly rulers, their disgrace and misery will equal their present abused distinctions; and they will feel the insignificance of that preëminence, which made them forget that they were men, when death shall arrest them and hurry them to judgment." Calvin: "The dignity, with which judges are invested, can form no excuse or plea, why they should escape the punishment which their wickedness deserves."

16. Dickson: "Albeit the oppressed servants of God cannot find justice at men's hands, yet there is help to be had from God, and by prayer, longer or shorter; as the Lord furnisheth unto them, must they seek their ease and comfort: arise, O God, judge the earth," v. 8. Calvin: "We ought to beseech God to restore to order the confusions of the world, and thus to recover the rightful dominion which he has over it." Green: "Since the judges, thy vicegerents, are so corrupt, take the government of the land into thine own hands," Prov. xxi. 1.

17. There is hope for the future. God shall yet inherit all nations, v. 8.

18. This Psalm suggests that we should not be amazed if when we look for judgment, behold oppression; for righteousness, and behold a cry. It has always been so, Isa. v. 7; Eccle. iii. 15; v. 8.

19. Henry: "There are two words with which we may comfort ourselves and one another, in reference to the mismanagement of power among men; one is, Hallelujah, the Lord God omnipotent reigneth; the other is, Surely I come quickly." We ought not therefore to be very much cast down by the unjust judgments of men.

20. Morison: "Let the kings and judges of the earth be wise, and kiss the sceptre of the Redeemer's grace, let them serve him in fear, lest he should speak to them in his wrath, and vex them in his sore displeasure."

21. How glorious is God. In his nature he is pure and perfect. He is everywhere. He governs all things. He rules and overrules. Horne: "All magistrates act in his name, and by virtue of his commission. He is invisibly present in their assemblies, and superintends their proceedings. He receives appeals from their wrongful decisions; he will one day rehear all causes at his own tribunal, and reverse every iniquitous sentence, before the great congregation of men and angels."

PSALM LXXXIII.

A Song or Psalm of Asaph.

- 1 Keep not thou silence, O God: hold not thy peace, and be not still, O God.
- 2 For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult: and they that hate thee have lifted up the head.
- 3 They have taken crafty counsel against thy people, and consulted against thy hidden ones.
- 4 They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance.
- 5 For they have consulted together with one consent: they are confederate against thee:
- 6 The tabernacles of Edom, and the Ishmaelites; of Moab, and the Hagarenes;
- 7 Gebal, and Ammon, and Amalek; the Philistines with the inhabitants of Tyre;
- 8 Assur also is joined with them: they have holpen the children of Lot. Selah.
- 9 Do unto them as unto the Midianites; as to Sisera, as to Jabin, at the brook of Kison:
- 10 Which perished at En-dor: they became as dung for the earth.
- 11 Make their nobles like Oreb, and like Zeeb: yea, all their princes as Zebah, and as Zalmunna:
- 12 Who said, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession.
- 13 O my God, make them like a wheel; as the stubble before the wind.
- 14 As the fire burneth a wood, and as the flame setteth the mountains on fire;
- 15 So persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm.
- 16 Fill their faces with shame; that they may seek thy name, O LORD.
- 17 Let them be confounded and troubled for ever; yea, let them be put to shame, and perish:
- 18 That men may know that thou, whose name alone is JEHOVAH, art the Most High over all the earth.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. xxx. On the authorship of this Psalm see Introduction, § 4, and on Psalms l. lxxiii.—lxxxii. This is the last Psalm bearing the name of Asaph. Luther: "This is a prayer of the same nature as Psalm lxxx." Yet there is great diversity of view respecting the historic occasion and even the date of this ode. Venema: "Some refer it to the times of David, some to the times of Jehoshaphat, some to the times of Jehoram, as Clericus, others to the times of Hezekiah, others to the return from Babylon, others to the times of Esther, as Altingius, and others to the times of Judas Maccabeus." Some think the Psalm had its historic occasion in events not known to us. A large number think it had its origin in the events noticed in 2 Chron. xx. 1–25. Among these are Amesius, Calmet, Patrick, Clarke, Edwards, Morison, Scott, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander. Others regard it as prophetic and suited to all times when combinations of wicked men are formed against the church and people of God. This would allow Asaph, the cotemporary of David, to be the author. Some, who think there is special reference to the days of Jehoshaphat, regard Jehaziel as the author, 2 Chron. xx. 14. Scott dates it B. C. 892; Clarke, B. C. 896. Amyrald: "It may be applied now to the enemies of the Christian Church, of which Israel was the type. The most important and formidable of these are assuredly sin and Satan, from whom we most especially long to be delivered." Horne: "As while the world endureth there will be a church, and while there is a church she will have her enemies, who are to increase upon her as the end approacheth, this Psalm can never be out of date. And to the spiritual adversaries of his soul, every private Christian may apply it at all times." On Selah see Introduction, § 15. The names of the Almighty here found are Elohim God, El God, Jehovah LORD and Gel-Yohn Most High, on which respectively see on Ps. iii. 2; v. 4; i. 2; vii. 17.

1. Keep not thou silence, O God: hold not thy peace, and be not still, O God. The first name of God here used is Elohim; the second, El. This use of two names is expressive. All the clauses have the same general significance. The prayer is that God would not allow wickedness to go on unchecked. The first clause has not before occurred. It is also found in Isa. lxii. 6. The corresponding verb is rendered rest, stand still, be still, forbear. On the second see on Ps. xxviii. 1; xxxv. 22. The third is elsewhere rendered be quiet, rest, be in rest. The language is earnest and the call loud. The peril of God's people was great, and it seemed as if he had done nothing to arrest the ruin prepared for his chosen.

2. For, lo, thine enemies make a tumult. All the tribes of people mentioned in subsequent verses were notorious for their hostility to the worship and service of Jehovah. They were his enemies. At first these foes may have been stealthy and cunning; but now they make a tumult, rage, roar, cry aloud, are in an uproar. The verb expresses a boastful and malicious confidence of success. This is further expressed by the parallel clause: And they that hate thee have lifted up the head, i. e., they rage and are confident; they anticipate an easy, early, complete victory. See Judges viii. 28.

3. They have taken crafty counsel against thy people. Taken crafty counsel, literally will craftily devise a secret. The meaning is: They have done so, and will continue to do so. Crafty counsel, see on Ps. xxv. 14; lv. 14; lxiv. 2. There must have been great plottings among so many and so remote nations in order to effect so vast a combination. And consulted against thy hidden ones. The verb here also is in the future. They will continue to do as they have done. Hidden ones; Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic and Street: Saints; Edwards: Favorite ones; Mudge, French and Skinner: Treasured ones; Green: Those whom thou protectest; Jebb: Secret ones. The English text is supported by the great mass of scholars. By hidden ones Diodati understands those "who in thy church, where thou art present, do shelter themselves under thy protection in humility, fear and faith: Ps. xxvii. 5." The purpose of the combination is next stated:

4. They have said, Come, and let us cut them off from being a nation; that the name of Israel may be no more in remembrance. They waged a war of extermination. The wonder is that they did not effect their purpose. So many and so powerful nations firmly united, one would think, might have eaten up the Jews. Their rancor was terrible, their malice diabolical, their numbers vast.

5. For they have consulted together with one consent. With one consent, literally with the heart; Chaldee, with the whole heart; Arabic and Jebb, with one heart; some other versions and Edwards, unanimously; Fry, with one accord; Alexander, heartily. They are confederate against thee; i. e., against God, whose people and church they sought to destroy. Confederate, literally they will cut the covenant, means they have made a covenant by cutting the sacrifice in two and passing between the parts. Alexander: "The preterite tense [of the first verb] and the future [of the second] represent the combination as already formed and still continued." Here begins the list of allies:

6. The tabernacles of Edom. Edom is one of the names of Esau, Gen. xxxvi. 1. It signifies red, and was given him for 'that same red pottage,' for which he sold his birth-right, Gen. xxv. 30. He settled in the mountainous district south of the Dead sea, where his posterity became numerous and mighty. Their land is called Edom or Idumea. Bozra was the capital of eastern Edom, but the chief city of the land was Petra, famous for its strength. The Edomites had a hereditary hatred to the descendants of Jacob. They refused to let the Israelites pass through their territory on their journey from Egypt to Canaan. Though they and other tribes named in this Psalm had cities, yet some of their people probably dwelt in tents. But as in Israel the war cry was, "Every man to his tent," 2 Sam. xx. 1; 1 Kings xii. 16; 2 Chron. x. 16; so other nations used tents in war. The tents here spoken of are probably tents of war, or they may be abodes. And the Ishmaelites. These were the descendants of Ishmael, whose father was Abraham and whose mother was Hagar, the Egyptian. Ishmael was born B. C. 1910 years. He lived to be one hundred and thirty-seven years old, and was the father of twelve sons, who were the heads of so many tribes in the north-western part of Arabia. Although Ishmael attended the death-bed of his father, and although there is no record of any act of hostility done by him against Isaac, yet Paul says he persecuted Isaac, Gal. iv. 29; and it is not unlikely that his seed remembered how Isaac though younger obtained the blessing instead of their father, and so hated his descendants. Next we have the tents of Moab. Moab was the son of Lot by his oldest daughter, Gen. xix. 30-38. "The same was the father of the Moabites," whose territory for a long time lay in a region chiefly east and south-east of the Dead sea, though at times it was much extended. They hated the Israelites in all their generations. In the days of Moses Balak was their king, and their cruelty was intense, Num. xxii. xxxiii. Moses died in their territory, Deut. xxxiv. 5. They were bloody idolaters. Chemosh and Baal-peor were among their idols, Jer. xlviii. 13; Num. xxv. 3. And the Hagarenes. These people are here only called Hagarenes; but in 1 Chron. v. 10, 20, they are called Hagarites. They were the descendants of Abraham by Keturah, who is by some thought to be the same as Hagar. For a time they inhabited a district, east of Gilead. Cresswell: "They are probably the same as the Saracens."

7. Gebal. This may designate the Gebalene of the Romans, which was a part of Idumea; or the country called by the Greeks Byblos, a district in Phœnicia. In regard to this latter place we read of the Gibriles in Josh. xiii. 5. The same word is rendered stone-squarers in 1 Kings v. 18. They held a seaport between Tripoli and Sidon, and had some renown, Ezek. xxvii. 9. And Ammon. The Ammonites were descended from Ben-ammi, a son of Lot by his younger daughter, Gen. xix. 30-38. They lived in a district east of Judea. Their capital city was Rabbah on the river Jabbok. They worshipped Moloch, 1 Kings xi. 7; 2 Kings xxiii. 13. They remained a somewhat powerful people till after the close of the canon of the Old Testament, but were subdued by Judas Maccabeus, 1 Mac. v. 6-44. And Amalek. Amalek was a grandson of Esau and the son of Eliphaz by a concubine, Timna, Gen. xxxvi. 12. Some have thought this man was not the father of the Amalekites, who are mentioned more than a hundred years before his birth. But may not the people mentioned in Gen. xiv. 7, be designated as Amalekites, because they then inhabited the land afterwards inhabited by the children of Amalek? The home of the Amalekites was Arabia Petrea between the Dead sea and the Red sea. They were the Bedouins of their time. They were always hostile to Israel, Ex. xvii. 8-16; Num. xiv. 45. Haman, one of this tribe, was true to the instincts of his ancestors. Next in this roll of infamy we have the Philistines. The original word is simply Philistia, meaning the inhabitants of that country. See on Ps. lx. 8. Philistia and Palestine are the same word. We apply the former to the land as held by the heathen in Canaan and the latter to the land as held by the Jews. The exact territory thus designated depended on the time, when the word was used, for the boundary varied. The people here referred to held the southern seacoast of Canaan. They were idolaters, worshipping Baalzebub and Dagon. They were great enemies of the Israelites. Their great city was Gaza. They were very warlike. They united with all the rest already named and with the inhabitants of Tyre. This city once possessed the commerce of the world. Tyre is not mentioned by Moses or Homer, being built after their time. It was the daughter of Zidon and mother of Carthage. Its inhabitants were idolaters, and though friendly in the times of David and Solomon, yet the devotees of Baal and of Ashtaroth could never be well pleased with the worshippers of Jehovah.

8. Assur also is joined with them. Assur or Ashur was the second son of Shem, Gen. x. 22. He was the father of the Assyrians. Assyria had not always the same bounds. At one time it was a mighty empire. Its power was often employed against the ancient people of God. They [all these others] have holpen the children of Lot, who were the Moabites and Ammonites.

9. Do unto them as unto the Midianites. Midian was the fourth son of Abraham by Keturah after his marriage to her, Gen. xxv. 2. His descendants led a wandering and predatory life. In the days of the Judges they had two celebrated princes, Oreb and Zeeb called nobles in v. 11 of this Psalm. The dreadful overthrow of these robbers by Gideon is recorded in Judges vii. 19–25, [Do unto them] as to Sisera, as to Jabin, at the brook of Kison. Jabin was the king of Canaan and reigned in Hazor. He was a great warrior. Sisera was his general. How the latter was ingloriously slain by a woman and how the power of his master left him may be learned in Judges iv. 1–24; v. 1–31. The Kison or Kishon is a small stream rising in the plain of Esdraelon near the foot of Mount Tabor. This stream is still at times impetuous and dangerous. In 1799 many Arabs attempting to escape the French after the battle of Mount Tabor perished in its waters. This was after the middle of April.

10. Which perished at En-dor. En-dor is not mentioned in the history of the destruction of Jabin's forces, but it was only four or five miles south of Tabor. This place is mentioned in Joshua xvii. 11, as lying in the territory of the tribe of Manasseh. It is more frequently thought of as the residence of the witch, whom Saul consulted, 1 Sam. xxviii. 7–25. They became as dung for the earth. Of all the uses to which man is put, that of becoming manure to the fields seems to be the poorest; though the figure here used is perhaps not so much in regard of fertilization, as it is of the loathsomeness of their carcasses and of the manner in which they were trodden down. See like expressions in 2 Kings ix. 37; Jer. viii. 2; ix. 22; xvi. 4; xxv. 33; Zeph. i. 17.

11. Make their nobles like Oreb, and like Zeeb. These Midianites were slain and beheaded as the enemies of Israel, Judges vii. 25. Yea, [make] all their princes as Zebah, and as Zalmunna. The record of these kings of Midian is in Judges viii. 4–21. They were slain by Gideon.

12. Who have said, Let us take to ourselves the houses of God in possession. Alexander: "This relates not to the former but to the present enemies of Israel, and assigns the reason why they should experience the same fate with their predecessors." Many commentators notice the beauty of the idea conveyed by the word rendered houses; in Ps. xxiii. 2; lxxv. 12; Joel ii. 22, pastures; in Ps. lxxiv. 20; Jer. xxv. 37, habitations. Where the Lord, the Shepherd, abides, there only are shelter and refreshment found.

13. O my God, make them like a wheel. Wheel, in Isa. xvii. 13, a rolling thing; in the margin this tumbledown. That would be the better rendering here, although the ancient versions favor the English. Calvin renders it a whirling ball; Patrick says,

"Make them run as swiftly as a ball down a hill;" Diodati: "Overthrow both them and their designs, as a bowl thrown down a steep place;" Waterland, Edwards, Morison, Lowth and Secker render it chaff; Hengstenberg, a whirl; Fry, thistledown. [Make them] as the stubble before the wind. Alexander unites the two clauses of the verse—Make them like the whirling chaff before the wind. Chaff, see on Ps. i. 4.

14. As the fire burneth a wood, and as the flame setteth the mountains on fire. The language is striking and terrible.

15. So persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm. Both verbs are in the future. On prairies even mounted travellers have had to flee for their lives before the devouring fire. In mountainous regions the fire is still more rapid, at least in ascending. Venema: "Having placed before our eyes the judgment of God upon the enemies, as illustrated by the example of antiquity, he now describes it in a sublimer style, with images drawn from wind, storm and fire."

16. Fill their faces with shame. Alexander: "The word translated shame is very strong, and means contempt, disgrace, ignominy." It is elsewhere rendered as here, also reproach, dishonor, ignominy, confusion. Do this, that they may seek thy name, O LORD. There are three ways of explaining these words. 1. That the Psalmist prays that these enemies may have a salutary shame, leading them to seek God in truth. This is the more obvious and easy method. 2. That the seeking of God here mentioned is a forced subjection. 3. That they in the last clause refers to men generally and not to the people made ashamed. The first has the fewest difficulties. Either of them gives a good sense.

17. Let them be confounded and troubled forever; yea, let them be put to shame, and perish. All these verbs express a dreadful conception of God's vengeance on his incorrigible foes. Calvin: "He heaps together so many words, partly because the reprobate, though often chastised, are nevertheless so incorrigible that ever and anon they are mustering up new strength and courage; and partly because there is nothing which it is more difficult to be persuaded of than that such as wallow at ease in great outward prosperity will soon perish." On the first verb see on Ps. vi. 10, where it is rendered be ashamed. On the second, see on Ps. vi. 10, where it is rendered sore vexed. On the third, see on Ps. xxxiv. 5, where it is rendered were ashamed. It is often rendered be confounded or brought to confusion. On the fourth, see on Ps. i. 6. The word is truly awful. The verbs are in the future.

18. That men may know that thou, whose name alone is JEHOVAH, art the Most High over all the earth. Chaldee: And they shall know that thou art thy name [i. e., art worthy of thy name—art what thy name truly imports] JEHOVAH [and that is as much as to say that thou] alone art the Most High over all the inhabitants of the earth. See 2 Kings xix. 19; Isa. xxxvii. 16.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The church of God is often in such a case that if left a little longer under the power of evil, she would be crushed. Her perils are not shadows but realities. From her foes she can expect no mercy and from herself no succor. All her resources are in God alone, v. 1.

2. It is right earnestly to ask God's early attention to our affairs, v. 1. The church of all ages has done so. Calvin: "It is unquestionably our duty to wait patiently when God at any time delays his help; but in condescension to our infirmity, he permits us to supplicate him to make haste." And when he sees that the right time is come he makes no tarrying, but cuts short his work in righteousness.

3. It is well for us when our enemies are God's enemies, so that his cause and our cause are identical. Dickson: "A conspiracy against the church is a conspiracy against God." Calvin: "The welfare of the people, whom he has taken under his protection, cannot be assailed without an injury being, at the same time, done to his own majesty." Horne: "Christ and the Church, like man and wife, are one; they have one common interest; they have the same friends, and the same foes."

4. The carnal mind is enmity against God. The wicked are his enemies. They hate him, v. 2. Gill: "They hate his being, perfections, purposes and providences; hate his Son without a cause, and even do despite unto the Spirit of grace; hate the law and its precepts, the Gospel and its doctrines and ordinances, and the ways, worship and people of God."

5. It is no new thing to see wickedness and the wicked rampant and outrageous. They make a tumult; they lift up the head, v. 2. To the eye of sense such things are alarming; but to the eye of faith it is a sign that the end is at hand; for "the more din the enemy makes, the more insolent he is, the higher he lifts up his head, he is the more near to be knocked down by God's appearing for his people against him." So teaches history. So teaches the Bible.

6. The wicked resort not only to rage and violence, but also to crafty counsel, v. 3. One half of the plots formed against the church, if directed against any work of man, would have ruined it long ago. But the infinite knowledge and wisdom of God can soon subvert any schemes of men and devils. Let not the humble be afraid of wily politicians. God can easily defeat them all.

7. The safety of God's people does not depend on their number, wit, prowess, or inherent strength, but on him, who has made them his hidden ones, v. 3. He that touches them touches the apple of his eye, Zech. ii. 8. In the time of trouble he shall hide them in his pavilion: in the secret of his tabernacle shall he hide them, Ps. xxvii. 5. They are in no sense hidden from the notice or care of God, Isa. xl. 27; Ps. xxxviii. 9; Hos. v. 3; 2 Tim. ii. 19. Nor is their course clandestine or cunning. Their very candor makes them suspected. Though they are not ostentatious, they are not deceitful. Nor do they make a secret of their love to Christ. Nor do they try to hide their sins from the eyes of God, but freely confess and bewail them. They have renounced the hidden things of dishonesty and do not walk in craftiness. Nor do they pass through life without a mark upon them. The world fixes its stigma; and God puts his name in their foreheads. They are the light of the world. And yet they are God's hidden ones. They are hid in God. The being, the providence, every perfection of God and every part of his word are chambers where the humble find refuge. See Ps. xxxii. 7; lxxxiv. 11; Pr. xviii. 10. They are God's hidden ones, because they are secretly nourished, having meat to eat which the world knows not of. Nor is their true character known, 1 John iii. 1. Nor does any roll of church-membership on earth contain a correct list of their names. They are often hidden under the calumnies, suspicions and outeries of the wicked. Their best acts are misjudged, and their best qualities misnamed. And they are all hid in Christ, Col. iii. 3, 4. They are all hidden under the shadow of Jehovah's wings. Though unknown, they are yet well known, where it is of most importance to be known.

8. The hostility of the wicked against the people of God is intended to be a war of extermination, v. 4. Some wars are undertaken for the defence of rights assailed, of honor slighted, of territory seized; but here is a war that has from the days of Cain to this hour been deadly and without just cause.

9. In opposing God's cause and people the wicked are ever unanimous, v. 5. In the ranks of his professed friends there is discord; but his foes work with one consent. They may hate one another, but their hatred to Christ and his people is a master passion. There was no love lost between Herod and Pilate. Indeed they were enemies; but over the meek and lowly Jesus and his agonies they dropped their private quarrel and formed the friendship of the damned. Scott: "Hypocrisy and profaneness, superstition and skepticism, and even enthusiasm and atheism often confederate against his humbling doctrine and holy cause."

10. Though piety is not hereditary, yet sin, particularly in the shape of hostility to God's cause and people, descends from generation to generation, until grace changes the heart, vv. 6, 7. Temporal advantages accruing to the wicked by commerce with his people will never root out their hatred to God and his chosen. Tyre was much enriched by trade with Judea, but even Tyre joined the league. The Huguenots enriched France, and covered the nation with the glory of their arms and of their learning; but Louis XIV. and Charles IX. cared not for all that.

11. Diversity of taste, age, nationality, laws and superstitions do not hinder men from earnestly coöperating against God's truth and people, vv. 6, 7, 8. Here we have the names of ten different nations, the extremes of which were remote from each other, hardly any two of them worshipping the same gods, most of them speaking tongues unknown to the rest, yet all confederate against God and his people. Among the leaders in wicked persecution are often found false brethren, as here we have the Moabites and Ammonites, children of Lot, who was rescued from the four kings by the love and prowess of Abraham.

12. A reference to the historic narrative shows that the Midianites destroyed each other; so that v. 9 contains a prediction that God's enemies in other cases shall do the same thing, Judges vii. 12-22. The greater their number, the more terrible was their destruction. No marvel that so signal a defeat of foes, and so marvellous a deliverance of his church was held in pious remembrance in all the generations of Israel, Isa. ix. 4. Victory does not go by numbers.

13. The wicked, who have perished, in their war on God and his church, were examples to all who shall come after them, vv. 9-11. Let the ungodly of this and succeeding generations beware lest they in their turn become monuments of wrath and beacons to those, who shall come after them.

14. The longer God delays his interposition and the more imminent the peril of his people, the more manifest and glorious is the deliverance wrought by him for them as in the case of Midian, v. 9.

15. To make war on God's people is to make war on God. Their houses are his houses, v. 12.

16. Who is able to stand before the great and terrible God? When his hand lays hold on vengeance, his foes perish suddenly and perpetually, as the Midianites, v. 9; become objects of contempt, v. 10; in the midst of their greatest boastings sink to rise no more, v. 12, being unable to resist as the grain under the wheel or the chaff before the wind; are consumed with terrors and wrath, as the mountain forest wrapped in flames, v. 14; filled with fear and covered with shame, vv. 15, 16. Consternation, disgrace and sorrow are the fruits of resisting God.

17. No doubt the inspired writer intended by the forms of expression used in vv. 9-17 to teach us the justice of all the troubles brought on the wicked; but let no one thence infer the lawfulness of using the language of cursing or imprecation. See Introduction, § 6. Henry: "That which we should earnestly desire and beg of God for our enemies and persecutors, is, that God would bring them to repentance, and we should desire their abasement in order to this; no other confusion to them than what may be a step toward their conversion."

18. God shall yet be gloriously exalted in the sight of all his creatures. In the end there shall not be found a dog to move his tongue against him. All the earth shall keep silence before him, or break forth into hallelujahs at the mention of his name, 2 Chron. xx. 29.

19. It is a great wonder that the church of God survives, seeing how she is beset on all hands by implacable enemies. The secret is found in the mediatorship of Christ.

PSALM LXXXIV.

To the chief Musician upon Gittith, A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

- 1 How amiable are thy tabernacles, O LORD of hosts!
- 2 My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the LORD: my heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God.
- 3 Yea, the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O LORD of hosts, my King, and my God.
- 4 Blessed are they that dwell in thy house: they will be still praising thee. Selah.
- 5 Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee; in whose heart are the ways of them.
- 6 Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well; the rain also filleth the pools.
- 7 They go from strength to strength, every one of them in Zion appeareth before God.
- 8 O LORD God of hosts, hear my prayer: give ear, O God of Jacob. Selah.
- 9 Behold, O God our shield, and look upon the face of thine anointed.
- 10 For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God, than to dwell in the tents of wickedness.
- 11 For the LORD God is a sun and shield: the LORD will give grace and glory: no good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly.
- 12 O LORD of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. viii. xlii. and Introduction, § 4. It seems nearly certain that the author of Ps. xlii. wrote this. It is probable David wrote both. The Syriac ascribes it to him. Calvin: "In all probability David was its author." Luther confidently speaks of David as the author. Henry: "Though David's name be not in the title of this Psalm, yet we have reason to think he was the penman of it." Scott: "It is generally thought that David composed it." Pool: "The author of this Psalm seems to have been David." It is a pleasing and affecting thought that we find the sons of Korah honorably mentioned, and honorably employed about the temple many generations after their father had so terribly perished with Dathan and Abiram, Num. xxvi. 9-11. "Notwithstanding the children of Korah died not." Blessed be God for such mercies. From 1 Chron. ix. 19; xxvi. 1-19, we learn that these descendants of Korah were employed as keepers and as porters of the tabernacle. From 2 Chron. xx. 19, we learn that they were singers in the temple. Their name is found in the title of ten Psalms, viz., xlii. xlv. xlviii. lxxxiv. lxxxviii. The general scope of this ode is pretty obvious. Luther: "This is a Psalm of consolation, which breaks forth into the most sweet and powerful expressions in praise and love of the ministry of the word." Alexander: "The Psalmist celebrates the blessedness of intimate communion with God, and prays that he may himself enjoy it." The names of the Almighty here found are Jehovah LORD, El God and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; v. 4; iii. 2. On Sabaoth of hosts, see on Ps. xxiv. 10. On Selah see Introduction, § 15. Scott dates this poem B. C. 1021; Clarke prefixes no date.

1. How amiable are thy tabernacles, O LORD of hosts! Amiable, ancient versions generally, How beloved. The word occurs nine times, and is five times rendered beloved and twice well-beloved; Fry: How lovely; Alexander: How dear [to me]. Hengstenberg: "The word signifies always beloved and never lovely." Tabernacles, dwellings, dwelling-places, habitations, commonly rendered as here. See on Ps. xxvi. 8; xliii. 3. The sanctuary had different apartments, hence the plural form. Patrick's paraphrase is: "It is impossible to express the affection I have to thy dwelling-place, O Lord." The appointed worship of the true God has in all ages possessed great attractions for the regenerate.

2. My soul longeth, yea, even fainteth for the courts of the LORD. Longeth, desireth. It expresses the greed of the lion for his prey, Ps. xvii. 12; lasting and earnest desire; several times rendered as here, Gen. xxxi. 30. Fainteth, fails, is consumed. Courts, plural, because there were more apartments than one. My heart and my flesh crieth out for the living God, q. d., my whole nature is intensely wrought up to desire not only the privilege of worship, but actual communion with God. Without God all rites, though divinely appointed, profit not. This verse more than any other shows that the Psalmist was now in some way deprived of the privileges of the sanctuary, either in the time of Saul, or in the rebellion of Absalom.

3. Yea, the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, even thine altars, O LORD of hosts, my King, and my God. Sparrow, always rendered bird or fowl, except in this place and in Ps. cii. 7. In Ezek. xxxix. 4, it is applied to birds of prey. From the habits and notes sometimes ascribed to this bird, the word is supposed to designate the sparrow; but the same would as readily point out several other kinds of birds. No species of the sparrow is very much inclined to build its nest in houses. The Chaldee has pigeon; Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopie, Tremellius and Junius, Piscator, Fabritius, Amesius, Edwards, Jebb and Green, sparrow; Hengstenberg, bird. Alexander thinks both sparrow and swallow are put for small and helpless birds in general. Swallow is no less a doubtful rendering, though in one other place it is so rendered, Pr. xxvi. 2. It comes from a word denoting freedom, and may be applied to the swallow, or the ring-dove, or the Jerusalem dove. All the ancient versions render it turtle. Hengstenberg: "The word need not be exactly defined." Clarke thinks it very unlikely that birds of any kind were allowed to build their nests, and hatch their young in or about the altars, which were kept in the greatest purity, and had on them perpetual fires. "But," says Paxton, "the altar is here by a synecdoche of a part for the whole, to be understood of the tabernacle, among the rafters of which the sparrow and swallow were allowed to nestle; or rather for the buildings which surrounded the sacred edifice, where the priests and their assistants had their ordinary residence." Delaney however thinks the altars were now desolate, and supposes the Psalmist refers to the time when there was one altar at Hebron and another at Gibeon. But this is not probable. There were two altars in the tabernacle and temple—the altar of incense and the altar of burnt-offering. Two views of this verse claim notice. One is that the Psalmist here compares himself to these birds, and says that but for God's house he would have been like a sparrow, a wanderer. This is the sense as given by Arnd, Hengstenberg and Alexander. The other view is that which makes David deplore his absence from God's house, in which he has less privileges than the birds. This is the more common interpretation, and is naturally suggested by the words. Morison: "I confess I see a great beauty in adhering to the sense given in the common version."

4. Blessed are they that dwell in thy house. Blessed, the same as the first word in the Psalter. It occurs again in vv. 5, 12; a plural noun equivalent to O the blessednesses. The blessings connected with a regular and devout attendance at God's house are so many and so great that the strongest terms may well be employed to describe them. Even the visitor of the sanctuary may be blessed, but those who dwell there are sure of great and numerous mercies. Some think there is a special reference to priests and Levites, and here perhaps particularly to the sons of Korah employed about the temple and having their residences near by. Of all stated and devout worshippers it is added: They will be still praising thee. They will have cause to praise thee. They will be in the habit of praising thee. In nothing is the force of good habits more seen than in the lively and thankful worship of God's house. Calvin: "Never will a man praise God from the heart, unless, relying upon his grace, he is a partaker of spiritual peace and joy."

5. Blessed is the man whose strength is in thee. Blessed, as in v. 4. Strength, might, power, often united with refuge, confidence, tower. His strength is in God by his own act of faith. The public worship of God in the temple was a call on the nation to repose their confidence, and to trust their homes and their all to God, as they thrice a year left them unprotected. In whose heart are the ways of them. Ways, the word does not express mental habits, but highways, causeways, from a verb signifying to cast up. The roads leading to Jerusalem were highways well cast up and provided with bridges. They were carefully inspected and repaired before each feast. A literal rendering would be highways in their hearts. Good: "The ways are in his heart, i. e., the highways to the temple are the objects of his delight." The way of the righteous is a highway, Pr. xvi. 17, and the pious love to walk in it. Henry: "Having placed their happiness in God as their End, they rejoice in all the ways that lead to him." The plural of this last clause shows that man in the first clause denotes a class.

6. Who passing through the valley of Baca make it a well, or, Passing through the valley of Baca, they make it a well. The valley of Baca is the valley of mulberry-trees. See 2 Sam. v. 23, 24; 1 Chron. xiv. 14, 15. The valley of Baca may be any valley of mulberry-trees, or it may designate the valley of Rephaim in particular, 2 Sam. v. 22, 23. The valley here referred to was on some highway to Jerusalem. The fruit of the mulberry when fully ripe was delicious, cooling and well fitted to allay thirst. It was famed even at Rome. These trees may have been planted, and no doubt were left uninjured, that by their shade and fruit they might refresh the pilgrims going to and from Jerusalem. The mulberry of Palestine was tenacious of life even in sandy soils, if it had moisture. In casting up a causeway through such a valley ditches would be left on either side, and perhaps pools were expressly made near the road that both man and beast might be supplied with refreshing drink. However sterile these valleys may have been, they could at least be made to supply drink to the weary pilgrims: The rain also filleth the pools. Thus the meaning would seem to be, Blessed are they who enjoy the privilege of going up to Jerusalem, for although they pass through the valleys of mulberry-trees, yet even there they find water. Another interpretation, borrowed from some of the ancient versions, is to render it valley of tears, or valley of weeping, (the church of England, vale of misery;) but this is not supported by the best ancient versions; and then it requires us to read, not Baca, but Bacah, whence Bochi, and in the plural Bochim, Judges ii. 1, 5. Nor would this mode of explanation so well sustain the figure of the text.

7. They go from strength to strength. As the visits of the Israelites to the holy city were divinely directed, and in the time of such pilgrimages their homes were divinely protected, so no doubt a kind providence preserved them from excessive exhaustion in their journey, and they entered Jerusalem with vigor and animation. They had strength to enjoy the festivals. This is the lowest sense of the passage, but is doubtless the basis of the higher sense, viz., that devout worshippers advance in vigor of religious character. Strength, often so rendered, also activity, wealth, substance, valor, power. In this place the margin has company. Horsley reads, from wall to wall; Merriek, from station to station; many (among them several ancient versions), from virtue to virtue, signifying thereby courage; several, from host to host; Waterland and Fry, from valley to valley. But Calvin, church of England, Mudge, Green, Street, Jebb, Clarke, Hengstenberg, Alexander and others have strength. Edwards renders it, He grows stronger and stronger as he walks. Calvin: "The saints are continually acquiring fresh strength for going up to Mount Zion, and continue to prosecute their journey without weariness or fatigue, until they reach the wished-for place, and behold the countenance of God." Parallel passages abound in the Scriptures, Isa. xxxv. 6-8; xl. 29-31; xlviii. 21. Every one of them in Zion appeareth before God, i. e., God supports the strength of the pilgrims, not allowing them to fall by the way, but conducting them safely to worship at his holy hill. In like manner he supports the faith, courage and might of his people until each of them stands perfect before him in glory. The verb is in the future, shall appear. As the weight of authority is in favor of the English text, the variations of rendering are not noticed.

8. O LORD God of hosts, hear my prayer. The general prayer is in a form often used. It is repeated, Give ear, O God of Jacob. God's answer to Jacob at Bethel always renders an allusion to that patriarch relevant to the subject of prayer.

9. Behold, O God our shield. Literally, Our shield see thou, O God. In v. 11, we again have the word shield as here. From this many suppose that God and shield are here in apposition, and that God is here addressed as our shield. The grammar and the sense will admit this explanation. But they will also admit that the prophet here prays that God would behold our shield, even the Saviour of sinners. This view is adopted by many. It is incorporated into the devotional language of millions. It is justified by the fair construction of the parallel clause, And look upon the face of thine anointed. David was God's anointed. But in a much higher sense Jesus, of whom David was a type, was God's Messiah. Scott: "David is generally supposed to have looked forward to the promised Messiah, of whom he was the type and progenitor." Henry: "He has an eye to the Mediator." Calvin: "There is no doubt, that in uttering these words, the object which he aspired after was to obtain the divine favor through the intervention of the Mediator of whom he was the type." Gill: "It is best to apply it to Christ, afterwards called a sun and shield." Cocceius, Bossuet, Bellarmine, Horne, Fry, Morison, Dickson and others allow a direct reference to Christ through David as a type.

10. For a day in thy courts is better than a thousand. The Chaldee explains thus: For it is better to dwell in the court of thy sanctuary one day, than to spend a thousand in exile. Calvin, followed by Henry, Clarke, Hengstenberg and Alexander: For better is one day in thy courts than a thousand elsewhere. But may not the comparison be between the courts of the Lord and the tents of wickedness, as in the next clause? In many languages it is common to anticipate such explanatory clauses. It is clear that we cannot let the words stand alone, for then they would teach that a very short time spent in God's house is better than a much longer time, which is contrary to the whole scope of the ode. I had rather be a doorkeeper in the house of my God than to dwell in the tents of wickedness. Be a doorkeeper, margin, sit at the threshold. None but the priests could lawfully enter the innermost apartments of the tabernacle or temple. David says that any place in God's house is better than a residence among the wicked. Venema: "To the house of God he opposes not any and every kind of tents, but such as are rich, powerful, glorious and splendid, which excite the lusts of the flesh, and in their very nature please the fancy, and seem fairly to promise happiness." He gives his reason for his choice:

11. For the LORD God is a sun and shield. Chaldee: For the Lord God is as a high wall and a strong shield; Syriac: For the Lord God is our nourisher and our helper; church of England: For the Lord God is a light and defence. Our English text is sustained by Calvin, Tremellius and Junius, Piscator, Fabritius, Amesius, Venema, Edwards, Jebb, Fry, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander. The first noun occurs largely over a hundred times and is uniformly rendered sun. Shield, see on Ps. iii. 3; vii. 10. Diodati: "The Lord God is the author of all joy and goodness to his children, and their protector against all evils;" Arnd: "As the natural sun is the light, life, and joy of all natural things, so God himself is the light of all those who dwell in his house, their salvation, and the strength of their life. But the Lord is not only a sun, he is also a shield, such a protection as covers the body and the soul like a shield, so that no murderous weapon of the devil and of men can strike and mortally wound us." Any correct knowledge of the ancient shield, and every new discovery of the uses of light in creation show the beauty of the figures here employed. Many think that the prophet here says of Messiah that he is a sun and a shield. If this is so, we have here proof of his divinity in his being called LORD and God. Compare John xx. 28. The LORD will give grace and glory. Grace, favor, meaning undeserved kindness, unmerited love. See on Ps. xlv. 2. Glory, honor, see on Ps. iii. 3; iv. 2; vii. 5. Alexander: "Grace and glory are related as the cause and the effect. The latter includes all the sensible fruits and manifestations of the divine favor." Clarke: "The Lord will give grace to pardon, purify and save the soul from sin:—and then he will give glory to the sanctified in his eternal kingdom." Scott: "In this world the Lord gives 'grace,' which he, as a sun, ripens into 'glory' in the world above." No good thing will he withhold from them that walk uprightly. Good, as in Ps. iv. 6. Its meaning is quite uniform. The reasoning is irrefragable. If the Lord gives grace and glory, which are the two things man needs in time and eternity, he will of course withhold no good thing, of which we can conceive. These mercies are for those who walk uprightly. The walk denotes the tenor of the life. See on Ps. i. 1. Uprightly, sincerely, perfectly, without blemish, without spot, meaning, with integrity of heart. See on Ps. xv. 2.

12. O LORD of hosts, blessed is the man that trusteth in thee. Blessed, as in vv. 4, 5. On trusting in God, see on Ps. iv. 5; ix. 10.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. If we are not pleased with the solemn worship of God, it is because we lack the true spirit of devotion, and if we lack the spirit of devotion, we have no piety, vv. 1, 4. Henry: "Gracious souls see a wonderful, an inexpressible beauty in holiness and in holy work." As true piety prevails, love for the worship of God increases.

2. While mere strength of religious emotions is no proof that they are genuine, so it is no proof that they are spurious. The Psalmist's fervor rose very high. It produced marked effects on his soul, his heart, and his flesh, v. 2. We cannot have too much religious affection, if it is pure and holy. Well may we long, faint, and cry out for God. When the queen of Sheba saw the wonders of Solomon's court, "there was no more spirit in her," 1 Kings x. 5. How much more may all the powers of the soul fail in view of the ineffable glories of God, even as sometimes revealed in his earthly courts.

3. While carnal men may be affected with the decency, the dignity, the solemnity of God's worship, and may approve of its good effects on the minds, morals and manners of the community, yet that which above all else endears God's house to regenerated men is God himself, v. 2. "Shew us the Father, and it sufficeth us" is still the cry of gracious souls.

4. Exile from home, from country, and from the usual privileges of the sanctuary is very trying, so that many strong men have sunk under the weight of their sorrows, v. 3. Yet let the pious remember that God can sustain them, and comfort them. Let no one banished from the usual sphere of his labors and enjoyments fall into despondency. Jesus reigns. Let us find out present duty, and do that. Henry: "It is better to be serving God in solitude, than serving sin with a multitude." Reader, are you kind to exiles and foreigners?

5. Let all believers, however tempted, however forsaken of man, hold fast the promises of God, and plead his covenant relation. In the words, "my King and my God," uttered in faith, there is more consolation than in all human reasonings.

6. Those who are tempted lightly to esteem Gospel ordinances and privileges, know not how soon they may be taught their value and preciousness by being cut off from them, v. 4. This is a sad way of becoming wise, but some will learn in no other way.

7. It is well worth inquiry whether in modern churches praise occupies as conspicuous a place as it should, v. 4. Believers always have more, in which to rejoice and for which to give thanks, than they have calling for mourning and sadness. In themselves they are vile and worthless. In God's covenant they are rich indeed.

8. Henry: "Those who have the new Jerusalem in their eye, must have the ways that lead to it in their heart, v. 5. If we make God's promise our strength, we must make God's word our rule, and walk by it."

9. To his saints God is all in all, v. 5. Our strength is in him. He is our wisdom. He is all our salvation.

10. If our way is through the valley of Baca, by God's grace we may make it a well and find refreshment. From the tone of Paul's Epistle to the Ephesians, or the spirit of Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, who would suspect that either of these works was written from a prison? It is much more important for us to learn wisdom by our trials than to escape from them. Out in the Ægean sea, about forty miles from Miletus, lies a rocky and desolate island, formerly remarkable as the Botany Bay for Roman criminals. Its name is Patmos. Jesus permitted the cruel Domitian to banish to this dreary spot the venerable John, beloved of his Master, that here in this Baca he might receive the apocalyptic visions, the sublimest of prophecies. John never was happier, never was more filled with the Holy Ghost, than in this horrid abode.

11. As God supported Israel in all the journey from Egypt to Canaan, Deut. viii. 4; xxix. 5; Neh. ix. 21; and as he showed a very marked providence towards his chosen in their pilgrimages to the holy city, Ex. xxxiv. 24, so God will forever protect and help all his chosen in their march to the heavenly Zion, v. 7.

12. If the pious find it so good to draw near to God on earth, what will it not be to appear before him in the mount Zion above! v. 7. Here indeed are the lively oracles, the holy sacraments, the preached word, the prayers of saints, the high praises of Jehovah, the ministers of the gospel and the saints, who tremble at his word; but in the temple above are the spirits of just men made perfect, ministers, prophets, apostles, martyrs, confessors, angels and the glorious Lamb as he had been slain. An infinite tide of unchanging love rolls in on the great assembly. Hallelujah follows hallelujah. The glories of redemption are more seen in one hour there than in a lifetime here.

13. Prayer should not be counted a mere form. Its end is not secured till we get the answer, v. 8.

14. We cannot make too constant use of Christ's mediation, v. 9. Calvin: "We are here taught, that the only way in which God becomes reconciled to us is through the mediation of Christ, whose presence scatters and dissipates all the dark clouds of our sins."

15. If our love to God and his house were as strong as it should be, as strong as it was in the bosom of the Psalmist, we should not find it necessary to spend so much time in seeking for evidences of a renewed state, and for marks of gracious affections, v. 10. Love is its own evidence. When it commands the soul, we cannot doubt its existence. When one desires God's word more than his necessary food, when he thinks it the highest privilege to be a worshipper of God, when he joyfully resigns his all to Jehovah, then his evidences are usually comfortable. One reason why many doubt their piety is because it is doubtful.

16. How amazing are the relations which God sustains to his people, when everything in society from a shepherd to a king, everything in war from a shield to twenty thousand chariots, and everything in nature from a bird covering her young to the Sun shining in his strength are laid under contribution to show us something of his goodness and of our resources, v. 11.

17. How rich and inexhaustible is the mine of God's word. How this Psalm grows on us when we study it. What volumes of pertinent matter might be written even on v. 11.

18. When the prophet says that God will withhold no good thing from his people, he includes not only such things as they may esteem good, but all things that are really such, v. 11. We have a list of good things in 1 Cor. iii. 22, very different from any which a carnal man would make out.

19. Let us never forget that no ardor of affections, no correctness of religious opinions, no boldness of religious profession, and no decency of private character will be accepted by God in lieu of a holy life, expressed in this Psalm by walking uprightly, v. 11.

20. No mortal can conceive the blessings of the man, who thus walks with God. Three times in this short Psalm, the prophet cries out, O the blessednesses of such.

21. God has a right to expect and demand our confidence at all times, v. 12. He does no wrong. Job said no more than each man ought to say, "Though he slay me, yet will I trust in him." Calvin: "Whoever has learned how great a blessedness it is to rely on God, will put forth all the desires and faculties of his mind, that with all speed he may hasten to him." This is the way to be always blessed. Nicolson: "This acclamation (in v. 12) may be intended to answer an objection: 'If those be blessed who dwell in thy temple, then those must be wretched who are exiled from it.' No, says the Psalmist, though there be many advantages enjoyed by those who can attend the ordinances of God, and some may attend them without profit; yet he who trusts in God can never be confounded. Faith in God will always be crowned."

22. One of Luther's reflections on this Psalm is: "Let the world have their rich ones, their powerful ones, and their wise ones, and their consolations in this world; let them trust and glory in their wisdom, their might, their wealth, and their possessions,—my heart triumphs in the living God."

PSALM LXXXV.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm for the sons of Korah.

1 LORD, thou hast been favourable unto thy land; thou hast brought back the captivity of Jacob.

2 Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people; thou hast covered all their sin. Selah.

3 Thou hast taken away all thy wrath: thou hast turned thyself from the fierceness of thine anger.

4 Turn us, O God of our salvation, and cause thine anger toward us to cease.

5 Wilt thou be angry with us for ever? wilt thou draw out thine anger to all generations?

6 Wilt thou not revive us again: that thy people may rejoice in thee?

7 Shew us thy mercy, O LORD, and grant us thy salvation.

8 I will hear what God the LORD will speak: for he will speak peace unto his people, and to his saints: but let them not turn again to folly.

9 Surely his salvation is nigh them that fear him; that glory may dwell in our land.

10 Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other.

11 Truth shall spring out of the earth; and righteousness shall look down from heaven.

12 Yea, the LORD shall give that which is good; and our land shall yield her increase.

13 Righteousness shall go before him; and shall set us in the way of his steps.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. lxxxiv. On the date, scope and authorship of this ode there is much diversity among learned men. Morison: "The composition itself is evidently one of exultation and triumph;" Tholuck calls it "A song of complaint." Scott dates it B. C. 520; Clarke, B. C. 536; Hengstenberg says, "The time of composition cannot be determined;" Alexander: "There is nothing in the title, or in the Psalm itself, to determine its date or confine its application to any particular historical occasion." Many Jewish writers think it was composed by Ezra. Some commentators think it was written on the occasion of the return of David after Absalom's rebellion. Others refer it to the destruction of Sennacherib's army, and yet others to the return of the Jews from Babylon; while Calvin says, "It was probably indited to be sung by the people when they were persecuted by the cruel tyranny of Antiochus." This ode well suits the state of the church in many stages of her history. Does this Psalm contain a prophecy respecting redemption by Christ? The affirmative is supported by the Syriac, Calvin, Diodati, Venema, Dimock, Horne, Fry, Dodd, Gill, Henry, Clarke, Scott, Morison and others. Some think the key to the interpretation of this Psalm is found in Lev. xxvi. 3-13. But it has a higher sense than would be gathered from that Scripture taken literally. We find here these names of the Most High, Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and El God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; v. 4. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. LORD, thou hast been favourable unto thy land. He is calling to mind former times, when Jehovah had shown mercy and wrought salvation in Israel. The verbs of verses 1-3 are all in the preterite. He says, Time was when thou didst have a favor to thy land, Canaan. Thou hast brought back the captivity of Jacob. To turn captivity, or bring back captivity is to relieve from sore evils, see on Ps. xiv. 7. The man of Uz was never a prisoner to his enemies, and yet God turned his captivity, Job xlii. 10. The design of the Psalmist is to recall former deliverances for the encouragement of hope and prayer.

2. Thou hast forgiven the iniquity of thy people. Hast forgiven, see on Ps. xxxii. 1, 5. Clarke: "Thou hast borne, or carried away, the iniquity. An allusion to the ceremony of the scapegoat." This is a much better exposition than that favored by Hammond, Mudge and others, drawn from the Jewish doctors, that captivity was one way of expiation, and that captivity being ended was a sign that the sin, which brought it on, was remitted. There is but one proper way of expiation, which is by atoning blood. Thou hast covered all their sin. See on Ps. xxxii. 1. In Ps. xxxii. 5, it is rendered have hid. Alexander: "Both verbs suggest the idea of atonement as well as pardon." When a sin is covered in the Bible sense, it is wholly hidden from view.

3. Thou hast taken away all thy wrath. Taken away, gathered in, withdrawn. Wrath, rage, signifying hot displeasure with its usual tokens. Thou hast turned thyself from the fierceness of thine anger. Fierceness, in Ps. ii. 5, rendered sore displeasure. Anger, in Ps. vii. 6, rage. The sum of the first three verses is that in days past God has shown himself merciful, has averted just judgments from the land and nation of Israel. All this is designed to prepare the way for the plea about to be made.

4. Turn us, O God of our salvation. Syriac: Restore us, O God our Saviour; church of England: Turn us then, O God our Saviour. The argument is, in former days thou hast wondrously saved us and forgiven our sins; we therefore are encouraged to beseech thee to bring us out of our present distresses. Some give a higher and a spiritual meaning to the words, turn us. Clarke: "Thou hast turned our captivity;—now convert our souls;" Scott: "Our sins indeed deserve worse than all our sufferings, and retard our reestablishment: but turn and convert us to thyself by thy special grace, and make way for more complete effects of thy reconciliation to us." A right state of heart is a greater blessing than relief from any temporal distress. The only way for churches or nations to escape from the sore chastisements, which God sends for their sins, is to repent and turn to him. Heartily pious men prefer grace to any temporal good. The prayer is for something better than temporal relief. Turn here and hast brought back in v. 1 are different forms of the same verb. And cause thine anger towards us to cease, q. d., We are now feeling the sad effects of our sins in thy anger towards us; but as thou didst show us mercy in former days, so repeat thy kindness. Alexander: "The word translated anger is one which properly expresses a mixed feeling of grief and indignation." In Ecc. i. 18, it is rendered grief; in Ecc. vii. 3, sorrow; in Deut. xxxii. 27, wrath; in several places, provocation.

5. Wilt thou be angry with us for ever? Be angry, commonly so rendered; once, be displeased. It is not a word of the same root with that rendered anger in v. 4; see on Ps. ii. 5, 12, where the same word is rendered wrath. Wilt thou draw out thine anger to all generations? Literally, to generation and generation. The plea is based not only on the history of God's mercies to Israel; but on his revealed character, Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7; Ps. xxx. 5. How long the distress had lasted we know not; but a few strokes of the rod make us cry out as if we had received evil all our days.

6. Wilt thou not revive us again: that thy people may rejoice in thee? Literally, Wilt thou not turn, wilt thou (not) revive us? Turn, as in v. 4. Revive, elsewhere quicken, preserve, keep alive. None but God can bring any people out of trouble; and it is well when this truth is felt, and the justice of our afflictions is felt and confessed. Nothing but divine grace ever meets our case.

7. Shew us thy mercy, O LORD, and grant us thy salvation. Mercy, see on Ps. v. 7; li. 1. The plea is for an undeserved deliverance, a salvation not only from suffering, but also from sins. The whole case was one, in which no reliance could be put on any but Jehovah. The latter clause in the Hebrew is more hopeful than the English text indicates; literally, Thy salvation thou wilt give us; Chaldee: And thy salvation shall be given to us. If God will cause us to see his mercy, our salvation is sure. Calvin: "Salvation is the work and fruit of mercy, for no other reason can be assigned why God is induced to show himself our Saviour, but that he is merciful."

8. I will hear what God the LORD will speak. Fry thinks this "verse is evidently the soliloquy of the priest, who had consulted the oracle, and is waiting for the divine response: for we are generally to understand the petitions of the church and of every part of it as offered by the Mediator and 'High Priest of our profession.'" Hengstenberg and Alexander think it is not the Psalmist that here speaks, but the people. A third view, taken by Calvin, Diodati, Dickson, Henry, Clarke and Scott, is that the prophet here speaks in his own name. A fourth view, supported by Gill and Horne, is that the Psalmist here speaks in the name of the Jewish people or of the church. The third view is the simplest. As a prophet he declares that he will humbly hear and faithfully report what the Lord shall declare. Inspired men, even those, who had no piety, spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, Num. xxii. 8, 18, 20, 35, 38; xxiii. 8, 12, 26; 1 Sam. iii. 9, 10. He seems confident of a message of mercy: For he will speak peace unto his people, and to his saints. Calvin: "The word peace is employed by the Hebrews to denote prosperity." Clarke: "He will give prosperity to the people in general; and to his saints, his followers, in particular." The peace and prosperity which God secures are more than civil and domestic quiet. God "preaches peace by Jesus Christ." Acts x. 36. He is the Prince of peace. He secures to us peace with God, peace of conscience, and a quietness of mind worth more than all human glory. But let them not turn again to folly. Unfeigned repentance and loathing of sin are the best fruits of affliction, and are best evinced by our not repeating the follies for which we were chastened. Folly, found here only, and in Job iv. 6, where it is rendered confidence. The foolish confidence of Israel was in idols, in alliances with other nations, in birth, in an arm of flesh and in heartless ceremonies.

9. Surely his salvation is nigh them that fear him; that glory may dwell in our land. For fear, the Arabic reads worship. See on Ps. ii. 11. Those, who thus fear God, shall surely be delivered from all sin and wrath, and from all real evil. God's salvation is not far from them. Glory, honor. Dwell, continue permanently. God is glorified by a people who fear him; and he honors them.

10. Mercy and truth are met together; righteousness and peace have kissed each other. Mercy, as in v. 7. Truth, from the word Amen; see on Ps. xli. 13. Mercy and truth, as in Ps. xxv. 10. Righteousness, uniformly so rendered, see on Ps. iv. 1. Peace, as in v. 8. Are met together; Clarke, have met on the way. Kissed, as in Ps. ii. 12. From the days of Augustine to Chalmers, yea, before and since, this verse has refreshed the pious. The lowest sense gathered from it is that given by Patrick: "Goodness and fidelity, justice and concord (which are the principal glory of a kingdom) meet together, like ancient friends, which have been long absent, and embrace each other." No doubt these things are great pillars in a well ordered state. When a sound reformation takes place among a people, mercy, truth, justice and peace are soon established between man and man. To such God's mercy, truth, righteousness and peace are vouchsafed. But is there not a reference to the glorious scheme of gospel grace by Jesus Christ? Augustine: "The mercy of God is the origin and source of all his promises, whence issues the righteousness which is offered to us by the Gospel, while from that righteousness proceeds the peace which we obtain by faith, when God justifies us freely." Calvin: "The natural meaning of the passage is, that mercy, truth, peace, and righteousness will form the grand ennobling distinction of Christ's kingdom." Diodati: "This cannot perfectly agree with any but the Messiah's reign." Lowth: "How admirable is that celebrated personification of the divine attributes by the Psalmist. How just, elegant, and splendid does it appear, if applied only according to the literal sense, to the restoration of the Jewish nation from the Babylonish captivity! but if interpreted as relating to that sublimer, more sacred, and mystical sense, which is not obscurely shadowed under the ostensible image, it is certainly uncommonly noble and elevated, mysterious and sublime." Clarke: "Where did mercy and truth, righteousness and peace meet? In Christ Jesus. When were they reconciled? When he poured out his life on Calvary." Horne: "These four divine attributes parted at the fall of Adam, and met again at the birth of Christ. Mercy was ever inclined to save man, and Peace could not be his enemy; but Truth exacted the performance of God's threat, 'The soul that sinneth, it shall die;' and Righteousness could not but give to every one his due." See also Pool, Gill, Henry, Dodd, Morison, Scott, etc.

11. Truth shall spring out of the earth. Truth, as in v. 10. Either truth shall be abundant like the grass, springing out of the earth; or the blessed fruits of truth shall be abundant. And righteousness shall look down from heaven. Righteousness, as in v. 10. Alexander: "The beauty of the image in this clause is heightened by the use of a verb, which originally means to lean or bend over, for the purpose of gazing down upon a lower object." See on Ps. xiv. 2. But the word also means to look out, Gen. xxvi. 8; 2 Kings ix. 30, 32. So the force of the figure may be that justice, which had been as it were concealed for a season, now again shows her face; see Isa. lix. 14. The verbs are fitly rendered in the same tense, although in the Hebrew the former is in the future and the latter in the preterite. Scott: "Christ, the TRUTH and the LIFE sprang out of the earth, when he was born of a woman: and 'justice' looked down upon his character, obedience, and atonement, well pleased and satisfied."

12. Yea, the LORD shall give that which is good. If Jehovah gives any people these blessings, mercy, truth, justice and peace, they may be sure of great good in a thousand forms; and if he gives us an interest in his Son, in whom mercy, truth, righteousness and peace meet, we may be sure that he will do us good to all eternity, Rom. viii. 32. And our land shall yield her increase. Either first, God will bless a people among whom mercy, truth, justice and peace are cultivated and abound, rewarding the toil of the husbandman; or, secondly, in the reign of his Son, he shall gather a great harvest of love and praise from the earth where he had been once hated and blasphemed. The primary passage is in Lev. xxvi. 4. See on Ps. lxvii. 6. Compare Hag. ii. 18, 19; Zech. viii. 12.

13. Righteousness shall go before him. Alexander: "The idea here expressed seems to be that of public and solemn manifestation;" Calvin explains it of "the prevalence and unobstructed course of righteousness." All the steps God has taken in the punishment or salvation of men were in righteousness. All the steps of the Redeemer were in righteousness. He did not deny the justice of God, nor ignore the penalty of his law; but redeemed us from it by satisfying divine justice. Compare Heb. i. 8. And [righteousness] shall set us in the way of his steps. Clarke: "Perhaps this verse receives its best solution from Rom. iii. 25." Christ's example of righteousness and his glorious justifying righteousness set, or put us in the way of salvation.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is a mark of an ignoble nature to allow present afflictions to blot out the memory of past mercies, vv. 1-4. Some favors are so great as to call for everlasting songs.

2. Every mercy bestowed may be abused, and so be followed by sore calamities, vv. 1-4. Marvellous it is that Noah, who had just escaped the perils of the deluge, and Lot, who had just escaped from the storm of fire and brimstone, should so soon both fall into drunkenness.

3. The whole argument of the first part of this Psalm goes on the supposition that God is unchangeably gracious, and that if he once showed mercy, he is ready in like circumstances to do so again.

4. How precious is forgiveness, and how refreshing it is to meet the doctrine in so many places of Scripture, v. 2. Calvin: "Deliverance from punishment depends upon the remission of sin." Pardon is the first of an infinite series of blessings.

5. When God pardons, he pardons all our offences, v. 2; Rom. viii. 1. When the Lord covers our sin, he covers it all, and forever, Jer. xxxi. 34.

6. If inspired men, who are under the control of the loving, gentle Spirit of God, have such strong conceptions of the displeasure of God, how terrible it must be, v. 3. It is wrath; it is the fierceness of anger.

7. One of the best fruits of past mercies is an inclination to seek new mercies at the hand of the same kind Father, who has hitherto blessed us, vv. 1-4. Dickson: "Neither old sins nor late, neither old judgments nor present lying under wrath, must keep God's people from running unto him by prayer."

8. God only and God alone can save; and the sooner we learn that truth, the better for us, v. 4.

9. The doctrine of conversion is no novelty, v. 4. Then are temporal blessings sweetest when they succeed pardon of sin, and are poured upon a converted soul. Henry: "All those, whom God will save, he will sooner or later turn. If no conversion, no salvation."

10. If we had a due sense of the evil of sin, and of the obstinacy with which it holds its power over us, we should not so soon grow weary under divine rebukes, and faint under divine corrections, v. 5. "God's anger will not endure forever against any, but the impenitent and unbelieving."

11. If a little wrath makes men cry out as in v. 5, how intolerable will hell be! Jer. xii. 5; Matt. x. 28.

12. Truly sin kills. Men are dead in trespasses and in sins, dead in law, dead in their affections, dead in a loss of comfortable communion with God. Probably the greatest practical heresy of each age is a low idea of our undone condition under the guilt and dominion of sin. While this prevails we shall be slow to cry for reviving or quickening, v. 6. What sinners and churches need is quickening by the Holy Ghost.

13. If anything on earth gives joy, it is the reviving of religion in the hearts of God's people, v. 6; Acts ii. 46, 47; viii. 8.

14. It is not only truth, but truth that can hardly be too deeply felt, that salvation is wholly of God's mercy, v. 7. None are heirs of salvation, but the vessels of mercy. Grace made all the promises and grace will fulfil them. Grace provided a Saviour, and grace unites us to him. While life lasts we shall not be done asking for mercy. While eternity lasts, we shall not be done praising mercy.

15. To the church of all ages it is an unspeakable blessing that the prophets heard what God the Lord spoke, v. 8. Nothing more effectually destroys all 'comfort of the Scriptures,' than unbelief respecting their inspiration. If holy men did not speak as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, then we have not God's word, and our hope is vain. It is a great mercy to us that the evidences of inspiration are abundant.

16. If we would more closely imitate the prophets in humility and docility, we should get a better understanding of God's mind and will, v. 8. Especially should we carefully practise and submit to all we do know. Then should we soon know more, John vii. 17.

17. Not to sinners determined to live in sin, but to his people, his saints, does the whole word of God speak peace.

18. And how many words of peace God has spoken! Nothing can be thought of by a poor distressed believer, by an humble penitent, but that God has already said it, or something better.

19. No conversion, no richness of religious experience, no height of discoveries in the things of God can ever render it safe for us to parley with sin, to dally with temptation, to lead a careless life, or to cease our vigilance, v. 8.

20. There is no folly like sin, v. 8. It is madness, it is mischievous madness, it is the wickedness of folly. "It is egregious folly to turn to sin, after we have seemed to turn from it."

21. Let not God's people be governed by appearances, but by the promises. The dark cloud has a silver lining. Salvation is near, v. 9. Amesius: "Although we may not at once possess the desired joy, yet let us persevere in prayers, and patiently and calmly expect the issue from God."

22. If glory dwells in the land when God works salvation in and for his people, v. 9; what shame and confusion dwell there when God gives up the land to sin and sinners! Calvin: "When cruelty rages with impunity, when truth is extinguished, when righteousness is oppressed and trampled under foot, and when all things are embroiled in confusion, were it not better that the world should be brought to an end, than that such a state of things should continue?" But we are fools; God only is wise, Ps. xii. 8; Pr. xxviii. 15; xxix. 2, 12.

23. If we are God's people, we shall never be done, and never wish to be done admiring the glories and the harmonies of the scheme of salvation by Jesus Christ, v. 11. Bates: "It is the chiefest of all God's works, that contains the glorious wonders of his mercy and power, wherein he renders himself most worthy of our supreme veneration and affection. Our most raised thoughts are beneath its dignity. Though the light of the gospel hath clearly revealed so much of it as is requisite to be known in our earthly state, yet the sublimer parts are still secret, and reserved for a full discovery, by the brightness of our Saviour's appearance." How God can be just and yet justify the ungodly, how he can condemn sin and yet let the sinner go free, how he can declare and manifest his awful righteousness, and yet be righteous in bestowing life on the guilty, how he can magnify the law and make it honorable, while yet its penalty is not borne by transgressors but by their voluntary substitute, are but a few of the hard problems, which find solution in the cross of Christ. For near a half century I have been hearing and reading good discourses from time to time on this theme, yet it is as fresh and delightful as ever. Oh that I may see into it better before I die, and infinitely better after I die.

24. There is no end, there shall never be an end to the variety and duration of the good that God shall give to his people, v. 12. Inspiration confesses both the impossibility and the unlawfulness of describing in the language of mortals the glory of the upper world, 1 Cor. ii. 9; 2 Cor. xii. 4.

25. It has sometimes been objected that the Christian doctrine of a Millenium cannot be true, for the earth could not subsist the teeming millions that would naturally be found upon it, if wars and vices should cease to waste its population. But omitting other and pertinent answers that have been given, we find one here that covers the whole ground, the earth shall yield her increase, v. 12. Now and then the season is unusually propitious, and we have a specimen of what God can do when he chooses. He can without any miracle make it many times more fruitful than it has ever been.

26. The knowledge of God shall yet cover the earth as the waters cover the sea, for the mouth of the Lord has spoken it, v. 12.

27. As the whole scheme of salvation is by righteousness in all God has done, and by a glorious righteousness secured to believers, so the preaching of this doctrine is honorable to God and safe to man. It establishes God's people in the right ways of the Lord, v. 13.

28. Oh that the gospel of Jesus Christ, making known the glorious way of salvation by grace, may soon be preached in all lands.

PSALM LXXXVI.

A Prayer of David.

- 1 Bow down thine ear, O LORD, hear me : for I am poor and needy.
- 2 Preserve my soul ; for I am holy : O thou my God, save thy servant that trusteth in thee.
- 3 Be merciful unto me, O Lord : for I cry unto thee daily.
- 4 Rejoice the soul of thy servant : for unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my soul.
- 5 For thou, Lord, art good, and ready to forgive ; and plenteous in mercy unto all them that call upon thee.
- 6 Give ear, O LORD, unto my prayer ; and attend to the voice of my supplications.
- 7 In the day of my trouble I will call upon thee : for thou wilt answer me.
- 8 Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O Lord ; neither are there any works like unto thy works.
- 9 All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord ; and shall glorify thy name.
- 10 For thou art great, and doest wondrous things : thou art God alone.
- 11 Teach me thy way, O LORD ; I will walk in thy truth : unite my heart to fear thy name.
- 12 I will praise thee, O Lord my God, with all my heart : and I will glorify thy name for evermore.
- 13 For great is thy mercy toward me : and thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell.
- 14 O God, the proud are risen against me, and the assemblies of violent men have sought after my soul ; and have not set thee before them.
- 15 But thou, O Lord, art a God full of compassion, and gracious, longsuffering, and plenteous in mercy and truth.
- 16 O turn unto me, and have mercy upon me ; give thy strength unto thy servant, and save the son of thine handmaid.
- 17 Shew me a token for good ; that they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed : because thou, LORD, hast holpen me, and comforted me.

ON the title see on Psalms iii. xvii. Doubtless David wrote this Psalm. This opinion is supported by the ancient versions, many Jewish writers, Luther, Calvin, Piscator, Fabritius, Amesius, Venema, Bellarmine, Gill, Pool, Dodd, Henry, Scott, Morison, Edwards, Horne, Hengstenberg and Alexander. It is not agreed whether it was written during the time when David was persecuted by Saul, or during Absalom's rebellion. Alexander : "The whole Psalm is called a prayer, because entirely made up, either of direct petitions, or of arguments intended to enforce them." Its scope is patent on its very face. Clarke : "It is a very suitable prayer for a person laboring under affliction from persecution or calumny." Scott dates it B. C. 1021 ; Clarke thinks it was probably made during the captivity. In it we have these names of the Almighty, El God, Elohim God, Jehovah LORD and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. v. 4 ; iii. 2 ; i. 2 ; ii. 4. Anderson thinks, as the Jews would not pronounce Jehovah, that perhaps Adonai, the substituted word in reading, may be a change of the Hebrew text ; and he claims the support of many manuscripts. But why should the change be made here nine times and not frequently in other Psalms where Adonai occurs ? Adonai is unquestionably one of the inspired names of God.

1. Bow down thine ear, O LORD, hear me. In Hebrew the first three words are just the same as those used by Hezekiah in his distress respecting Sennacherib. This has probably given rise to a tradition among some of the Jews that Hezekiah used this entire prayer on that occasion. But of this there is no evidence. Hezekiah's prayer is given at length in 2 Kings xix. 15-19. The form of expression is of frequent occurrence in devotional composition, Ps. xvii. 6 ; xxxi. 2 ; xlv. 10. Hear, so as to answer. For I am poor and needy. Poor, humble, lowly, afflicted ; see on Ps. ix. 12. Needy, also rendered poor ; see on Ps. ix. 18. In speaking thus of himself, the Psalmist gives the reason for urging his prayer, q. d., 'It is well known, wherever thou art known, that thou hearest such; therefore I am bold to call on thy name.'

2. Preserve my soul. Preserve; in Ps. xvii. 8 and often, keep. It sometimes has the military idea of guard, defend, protect. See on Ps. xvi. 1. Soul, either his life that was threatened or his immortal soul which was tempted. For I am holy. Holy, in Ps. lxxxv. 8, and often, in the plural saints; godly, merciful. Some have objected to David's pleading his own good character; but if he did not go beyond the truth, and the occasion called for it, there was nothing wrong in his so doing. Job, David, Peter, John and Paul all did it, Job xxvii. 5; Ps. cxvi. 16; John xxi. 15-17; Rev. i. 10; 1 Cor. ix. 1. Nor is it presumptuous to ask God to show mercy to us for we show it to others; or to forgive us for we forgive others, Matt. v. 7; vi. 14, 15. But David does not superciliously rely on himself, but wholly on the grace of God: O thou my God, save thy servant that trusteth in thee. Any pretence of piety, that withdraws confidence from God, or that leads us to set our hope in any created arm, is idle and dangerous.

3. Be merciful unto me, O Lord. Be merciful; in Job xix. 21, have pity; in Ps. li. 1, have mercy. In v. 15, the cognate adjective is rendered gracious; in Ps. lxxxiv. 11, the cognate noun is rendered grace. For I cry unto thee daily. Even believing prayer has in it no merit; but because God has graciously promised to answer it when fervent and persevering, we may confidently plead his promise. But we must cry and that daily. The verb is in the future will cry, signifying a purpose to call till God answers. Daily, literally all the day, i. e., always.

4. Rejoice the soul of thy servant. Rejoice, make glad, cheer. It is evident that the Psalmist was much distressed and saw that no help was left for him except in God. For unto thee do I lift up my soul. Lift up, yield, bring, fetch, q. d., I commit my soul and my whole case to thee in love and confidence, knowing that thou wilt do right:

5. For thou, Lord, art good. Good, the word almost uniformly so rendered. And ready to forgive; Calvin, Piscator, Fabritius, Venema, propitious; Tremellius and Junius, Amesius, Edwards, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander, forgiving; church of England, gracious; Bythner, a pardoner. And plenteous in mercy unto all them that call upon thee. Plenteous, great, abundant. We have the same phrase in v. 15. Call, cry; see on Ps. iii. 4; iv. 1. To call upon God points out in general vital religion, or in particular sincere prayer. In each of the first five verses of this Psalm we have the word for, equivalent to because. In no case has it reference to human merits; in the last verse it points to the true source of all blessings, God's infinite grace and kindness.

6. Give ear, O LORD, unto my prayer. Give ear, as in Ps. v. 1; xvii. 1; xxxix. 12. Prayer, as in the title. And attend unto the voice of my supplications. Attend, in Ps. x. 2, rendered hearken, but in Ps. xviii. 1; lv. 2; lxi. 1, attend. Supplications, earnest entreaties for mercy. The petition is that God would take up and issue his case.

7. In the day of my trouble I will call upon thee: for thou wilt answer me. The verse is closely parallel to Ps. l. 15. Trouble and call are indeed the same words in the two places. The meaning is, I am calling now and will continue to call during my day of trouble; for I shall get my requests as I know by experience, as well as from thy word and thy excellent nature.

8. Among the gods there is none like unto thee, O LORD. All false gods are either dead things, or dead men, or lost angels; but Jehovah is the living God. Their attributes are either hateful or feeble; his are glorious and infinite. They can make nothing; Jehovah has made all things. They can neither see, nor hear, nor help, nor save; but our God doeth all things after the counsel of his own will. Not one of them is fit to be a lord; but the living God rules and reigns supreme in heaven and earth. The false gods are subjects of contempt to inspired men, Ps. cxv. 4-7; Isa. xlv. 9-20; 1 Cor. viii. 4. But all holy creatures in all worlds love, fear, obey and adore Jehovah. Instead of gods some read angels, and it is true that the original word Elohim sometimes designates angels. But the context shows that he is speaking of false gods. Calvin: "If it is objected that there is no comparison between God and the silly inventions of men, the answer is obvious, That the language is employed in accommodation to the ignorance of the generality of men." Neither are there any works like unto thy works. Several ancient versions and modern translations read: And there is nothing like thy works. The object is to declare that Jehovah is God alone, and alone fit to be worshipped. This is maintained by asserting that the false gods have never done anything admirable, as Jehovah has done, and by asserting that the very worshippers of false gods were made by the true God:

9. All nations whom thou hast made shall come and worship before thee, O Lord; and shall glorify thy name. There are two senses in which God made all nations. He made all the people composing all nations, Mal. ii. 10; Num. xvi. 22; Isa. xl. 28. Then he is the father of nations, as political bodies, Gen. xvii. 6; Deut. xxxii. 8; Ps. xxii. 28; Jer. x. 7. He sets up whom he will, and whom he will he puts down. As he made, so can he save or destroy as seems good to him. All nations, (all the heathen, all the Gentiles) shall yet worship and glorify Jehovah. There is doubtless a reference to the latter day glory, when earth shall enjoy the reign of universal peace, and truth, and love, and righteousness, when God's name shall be one, and his praise one. Compare Ps. xxii. 31; cii. 18; Isa. xliii. 7; and especially Rom. xv. 9; Rev. xv. 4.

10. For thou art great. There is nothing little, nothing finite, nothing measurable, nothing comprehensible in God. The knowledge of him is high as heaven and deep as hell. He is infinite, eternal, unchangeable, almighty. And doest wondrous things; Syriac: Produceest miracles; Arabic: Art a worker of miracles; Clarke: "Thou art a Worker of miracles. This thou hast done in numerous instances, and thereby showed thy infinite power and wisdom." The powerlessness of the false gods has been shown in all ages. Thou art God alone. His existence precludes the possibility of the existence of another. There is none with him, none beside him. Alexander: "The for, at the beginning of the verse, implies that these proofs of divinity must sooner or later have their full effect."

11. Teach me thy way, O LORD. Much is implied in this prayer. 1. I am ignorant; I know nothing as I ought to know it; I am a fool; I cannot by searching find out the way of life. 2. No creature can effectually teach me. The vail is over my heart. I am blind, and no man, no angel can open my eyes, or give me vision. 3. God, who made me, can teach me; I am not beyond his reach, I am not beyond his skill; I am not out of the pale of his mercy; foolish as I am he can make me wise unto salvation. 4. God alone and God only can do this. 5. I commit my whole case to him. I look to none other. I hope in none else. 6. This is a vital point in my case and in my judgment. I am in great earnest in the matter. Jehovah's way is life, peace, joy and glory. 7. Thus guided by the Lord, the course of my life will be neither doubtful nor erroneous. I will walk in thy truth. Then my life shall be conformed, not only to truth in general, but to thy truth in particular. I will be warned by thy threatenings; I will embrace thy promises; I will believe thy doctrines; I will conform to thy precepts; I will walk as thou wilt have me. But I cannot do this of myself; I therefore humbly pray: Unite my heart to fear thy name. Law: "Make my heart one that it may fear thy name." My heart is apt to be divided; my thoughts and affections wander; I am too often double-minded and of course unstable in all my ways; and it never will be better with me till thou undertake my case. Clarke: "Join all the purposes, resolutions, and affections of my heart together, to fear and glorify thy name." Having thus earnestly sought help from God, he felt confident that he should be heard, and so he humbly declares his purpose and his hope:

12. I will praise thee, O Lord, my God, with all my heart; and I will glorify thy name for evermore. Patrick: "I am bound to praise thee, both as the supreme LORD of all, and as my bountiful benefactor, with all the powers of my soul: and accordingly, I do now most thankfully acknowledge thee; and will never cease to honor thee, and to do thee service, as long as I have any being."

13. For great is thy mercy toward me. Mercy, as in v. 5; in Ps. li. 1, lovingkindness; it occurs again in v. 15. Great, as in v. 10. God's mercy is as unsearchable as his self-existence, or his eternity. The for of this verse may point to the theme of the praise and glory promised in v. 12, or to the gracious cause, which would surely enable him to do as there he engaged. One very great mercy he had received: And thou hast delivered my soul from the lowest hell. Compare Deut. xxxii. 22. Hell, see on Ps. vi. 5; ix. 17. That in this place more is meant than that God had rescued his life from the perils of natural death seems pretty clear: 1. The word certainly in some cases signifies what is now popularly understood by the word hell. 2. A very deep grave is not objectionable; but the lowest hell is an awful thought. 3. Every sinner deserves God's wrath; but for his violation of the sixth and seventh commandments David deserved dreadful punishments—the nethermost hell. 4. While it is an act of mercy to spare the life of a sinner, it is a much greater act of mercy to save him from eternal death and give him everlasting life: q. d., Thou hast done great things for me; thou hast even saved my soul from hell. I am therefore encouraged to come to thee and ask for new mercy.

14. O God, the proud are risen against me, and the assemblies of violent men have sought after my soul. Proud, commonly so rendered. It includes the idea of presumption. Violent; in Ps. liv. 3, oppressors; frequently terrible. Assemblies, multitudes, congregations; see on Ps. i. 5. Some think it expresses organized combination. The enemies were deadly. They sought his utter ruin. In all this they were without any proper regard for God. And have not set thee before them, i. e., they have not been governed by pious motives; they have not been moved by thy fear, nor by a regard to thy glory. We have a like phrase in Ps. xvi. 8.

15. But thou, O Lord, art a God full of compassion, and gracious, longsuffering, and plenteous in mercy and truth. Full of compassion, see on Ps. lxxviii. 38. Gracious, see on v. 3. Longsuffering, a phrase often so rendered, also slow of anger. It has not before occurred, but is found in Ps. ciii. 8; cxlv. 8. Plenteous in mercy, as in v. 5. Truth, as in v. 11. God is sincere, faithful; see Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7. The nature of God must determine the character of the worship we offer him. It is as if he had said: Thou hast revealed thyself to be such a God. Now my case is such as to afford a fit occasion for the exercise of thy glorious attributes.

16. O turn unto me, and have mercy upon me. Turn, i. e., Let not the kindly aspects of thy providence be longer averted from me. Have mercy, i. e., I deserve not these favors; I ask them of thy mere grace. Give thy strength unto thy servant. Strength, as in Ps. viii. 1; lxxxiv. 5. The strength sought would effect deliverance and impart courage. In Ecc. viii. 1, the same word is rendered boldness. Servant, as in vv. 2, 4; see on title of Ps. xviii. and on Ps. xix. 11. David would not deny his relationship as a servant to God. How could he? And save the son of thine handmaid. Jesse was a good man, and honorable mention is made of him in both Testaments; but his wife was also one of the excellent of the earth. Compare Ps. cxvi. 16; q. d., I was born thy servant; my mother was thy handmaid; it is mine to obey; and of course it is thine, Lord, to defend and protect; surely thou wilt not permit thy poor servant to be trodden down and destroyed.

17. Shew me a token for good. Shew, we might read, Do, make, execute, perform. Token, mark, sign; see on Ps. lxxv. 8. He prays, Do something by which I may know that thou wilt do me good, and not evil. That they which hate me may see it, and be ashamed, and so desist from their wicked course, and be brought to true repentance; for a proper shame essentially belongs to saving repentance, Ezra ix. 6; Ezek. xvi. 63. Because thou, LORD, hast holpen me, and comforted me. The sense of this clause would be given by the second future thus, Because thou, Lord, shalt have holpen me, and comforted me. Hengstenberg: "The preterites are to be explained by the strength of the faith which anticipates the future." This last clause is rather against the idea that the shame spoken of in this verse is that of godly sorrow. It seems rather to be that of chagrin and disappointment at the deliverance wrought for a good man. If so, the verse is a prediction.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. How blessed is the thought that in condescension no less than in majesty God is infinite. He humbleth himself to behold the things that are in heaven. But earth is far, far below heaven. When we find him bowing his ear so low as to hear the whisperings and breathings of a pious soul in this world, we should adore him for his condescending greatness, v. 1. Compare Isa. lvii. 15, 16; Job xv. 15, 16.

2. The best of princes, the greatest of kings have as much need of prayer as others; and they must pray just as other poor and needy sinners do, v. 1.

3. There is no strait, necessity or extremity, in which we ought not to betake ourselves to God, v. 1. Whatever affects our well being is proper matter to be brought reverently before God.

4. With the real child of God prayer is not a mere form, vv. 1, 6. He begs for an answer again and again. Compare Dan. ix. 17-19.

5. Our poverty and misery furnish a fit occasion for the display of God's rich mercy, v. 1. It is his wont to seek such occasions. Horne: "All prayer is founded on a sense of our own wants, and God's ability to supply them."

6. Let nothing, however sad or dark, hinder us from crying mightily to God, v. 1. Calvin: "That despair may not overwhelm our minds under our greatest afflictions, let us support ourselves from the consideration that the Holy Spirit has dictated this prayer for the poor and afflicted."

7. If either our lives or our souls are preserved and saved, it must manifestly be by the Lord, v. 2. The dangers that threaten them are so many and so mighty that all created agencies would utterly fail to secure to us protection and salvation.

8. Conscious sincerity in God's service, conscious innocency in any matter wherein we are wrongfully charged, and conscious uprightness of soul in time of calamity may not only solace ourselves, but fitly be mentioned before God in prayer, v. 2. These things do not merit the divine regard. But they evince the reality of our conversion and adoption. Calvin: "If those whom we have never injured unrighteously assail us, we have ground for double confidence before God."

9. But what shall they do who are conscious of ill desert both from God and man? Let them plead for grace, let them cry for mercy, v. 3. There is forgiveness with the Lord. Jesus died for the chief of sinners.

10. Trust in God belongs to true religion, vv. 2, 4. It is based on a knowledge of God, on approval of his character, and confidence in his perfections.

11. Although we may be free from all criminality in a given matter, which has been made the occasion of trouble to us, yet in our past lives there has been so much that was hateful to God, that it is always safe and right that we should rest the whole weight of our plea on mercy alone, v. 3. And as God has made Jesus Christ the depository of all the fulness of his grace and compassion, our prayers should all be offered in the name of Jesus, John xiv. 6, 13, 14.

12. Earnest, importunate prayer will be heard, vv. 3-7. For a while God may seem to disregard our cries. But in his own good time he will show himself gracious. But let us never forget that noise is not earnestness. Amesius: "That prayer which brings consolation principally consists in an elevation of the heart, not of the voice," v. 4.

13. When all goes wrong outwardly and inwardly, when foes beset and fears betide, we must be sad, we cannot rejoice till God appears, v. 4. He is our light.

14. All our hope and all our confidence must ultimately rest on the known nature of God revealed in holy Scripture, vv. 5, 15.

15. Every man has his troubles, v. 7. The king on his throne is no exception. The sources and kinds of our afflictions are as diversified as the countenances of men.

16. A great difference between saints and sinners in prayer is that sinners who pray at all, pray only when they are in trouble, whereas saints cry daily unto God, vv. 3-7. Compare Job xxvii. 10.

17. The reason why God never wrought a miracle to convince an atheist of the divine existence, is that the works of creation and providence are as wondrous as any miracle, v. 8. If men will not believe the former, neither would they the latter.

18. As God's right to claim the homage of all things is in his holy word rested in part on his having created them, v. 9; and as Jesus Christ is often in Scripture declared to be the Maker of all things, John i. 3, 10; Col. i. 16; Heb. i. 2, 10; our worship is no less due to the Son than to the Father. By parity of reasoning we should honor the Spirit, as we honor the Father and the Son; for he garnished the heavens; compare Gen. i. 2; Job xxvi. 13; Ecc. xi. 5.

19. There is hope for the heathen; not in the innocence of their lives, not in the harmlessness of their views and practices, not in their sincerity or morality; but in the promise of God that they shall yet worship him and glorify his name, v. 9.

20. While Christians earnestly pray for the conversion and salvation of the heathen, they ought most tenderly to compassionate their condition. The ancestors of every man now on earth were once sunk in horrible idolatry. Israelites are no exception, Josh. xxiv. 2. Most persons who speak the English language can readily trace their origin back to some race that worshipped false gods with rites as cruel as any now known on earth. Surely the spirit of missions is the spirit of the gospel.

21. But whether for the heathen or for ourselves, whether in temporal or spiritual affairs our distress prevails, our hope is in God alone, v. 10.

22. Without divine guidance and divine teaching we shall never know anything nor do anything aright, v. 11. We cannot therefore be too urgent in our prayers for special grace and special enlightening at all times.

23. A good resolution is a good thing, v. 11. Yet it is better to say, I will not, and then repent and do right, than say, I will, and then forget and break our word, Matt. xxi. 28, 31.

24. But if we are to perfect holiness in the fear of God, we must be renewed by divine grace, which alone can unite our hearts to this work, v. 11.

25. God may take the will for the deed, where the deed was impossible, but he will never take the deed for the will. He demands, and he has a right to the whole heart, vv. 12, 13.

26. In this life God's people are no little saddened that their praise is in such jarring notes, and that all their attempts to glorify him are so imperfect. Let such be not overmuch cast down. They will have a whole eternity in which to show forth the honors of their God and Saviour, and they shall do it with such intense love as will fill them with joy and ecstasy, v. 12. Horne: "The church is never in so afflicted a state, but she hath still reason to intermingle hallelujahs with her hosannas."

27. When our hopes are built solely on the promised mercy of God, it is not possible for our expectations to be too large, vv. 13, 15, 16. His compassions are infinite. He will do exceeding abundantly above all we ask or think. Dickson: "The more violent, cruel, profane and ungodly our persecutors are, the more hope is there of God's pity toward us."

28. Salvation, including the pardon of sin, the acceptance of the sinner, the sanctification of the soul, delivery from an awful hell and rising to a glorious heaven, is truly great, and should ever so be spoken of by us, v. 13. Compare Heb. ii. 3.

29. It is nothing new for good men to have violent and insolent foes, v. 14. Christ, all the prophets, all the apostles and all the reformers had bitter opposers.

30. Let us delight ourselves in the Lord our God, dwelling much on his glorious perfections, and extolling his grace and mercy, vv. 5, 15. We should never forget that he "is as firm to his purpose in abundantly performing whatever he has promised, as he is distinguished for promising liberally."

31. We may fitly plead our covenant relation with God through the vows and prayers of our pious ancestors, v. 16. Henry: "The children of godly parents, who were betimes dedicated to the Lord, may plead it with him; if they come under the discipline of his family, they are entitled to the privileges of it."

32. Luther: "God never finally forsakes his people: for here, in the church below, he often delivers the godly, who fear him, out of the greatest perils; yea, out of the very jaws of death; and plainly proves that he is ever present and near his own: for their deliverances plainly show the hand of God, and that is such a token or sign as David prays for," v. 17.

33. We have excellent models of prayer in Scripture, and especially in the Psalms; and we deprive ourselves of much pleasure and profit by not using them freely and familiarly.

PSALM LXXXVII.

A Psalm or Song for the Sons of Korah.

1 His foundation^s is in the holy mountains.

2 The LORD loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob.

3 Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God. Selah.

4 I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon to them that know me: behold Philistia, and Tyre, with Ethiopia; this man was born there.

5 And of Zion it shall be said, This and that man was born in her: and the Highest himself shall establish her.

6 The LORD shall count, when he writeth up the people, that this man was born there. Selah.

7 As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there: all my springs are in thee.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. xxx. xlii. lxxxiv. Scott dates this Psalm B. C. 1045; Clarke, about B. C. 536. Some think it was written by David. This is the more probable opinion. Others ascribe it to one of the sons of Korah, whose name is not given. Others think we have no clue whatever to the authorship.

Among those who give it a historic occasion the diversity of view is great. Some assign it to the fixing of the site of the temple; some, to the laying of the foundation, and others, to the completion of the first temple; some, to the delivery of Jerusalem from the Assyrians; some, to the laying of the foundation, and others, to the completion of the second temple; some, to the birth, and others, to the coronation of some prince; yet others refer it directly to Messias. These views are presented by very respectable writers, though commonly expressed with diffidence. None of them are supported by strong reasonings. Edwards: "Both the occasion and author of the Psalm are uncertain." Some make it prophetic. Luther: "This is a prophecy concerning the kingdom of Christ and the church, in times to come." This is as probable as that the Psalm had reference to a past or passing event. Many commentators acknowledge that this ode contains many things not easily explained. Hare and some others regard it as a fragment of a more extended composition. Its apparently abrupt beginning cannot justify such a view. Like reasoning would make many Psalms fragments. The general design of the ode is stated in different terms by many. Morison: "We may, with propriety, regard it as an ode written with a view to celebrate the foundation of the sacred city, and to set forth the preëminent honor and prosperity which should distinguish its blessed inhabitants;" Tholuck: "A glorious Psalm. Its theme is the great hope of the conversion of the world to the sanctuary of Zion;" Calvin: "What we are taught in this Psalm may be summed up in this, that the church of God far excels the kingdoms and politics of the world, inasmuch as she is watched over and protected by him in all her interests, and placed under his government." The Syriac says this Psalm is concerning the redemption of Jerusalem. We have here Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and Gel-yohn Highest, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; vii. 17. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. His foundation is in the holy mountains. His foundation is explained by Alexander as equivalent to "that which he has founded, meaning his sanctuary and his theocratical kingdom." Foundation, several read foundations, buildings, habitations. Some think it expresses the permanence of the temple in contrast with the moveable tabernacle. The cognate verb signifies to ordain, appoint, constitute. If we here understand by it ordinances or constitutions, we have a good sense. God's ordinances are in his church. Or, if we take it for the temple, then we may say that by God's ordering, its foundations are fixed on the holy mountains, by which we may understand either, 1, the range of mountains of which Zion was one, and to all of which it might be regarded as imparting a sacred character; or 2, Mount Zion, on which David built his own house and rested the ark, and Mount Moriah, on which Solomon built the temple. These two were separated by a valley not more than two or three hundred feet deep. Zion is often used so as to embrace both these mountains. It seems to be so used in v. 2. Holy mountains, literally mountains of holiness; see on Ps. iii. 4.

2. The LORD loveth the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob. Alexander: "The gates of a walled city give access to it, and power over it, and are therefore naturally put for the whole." The spirit and bearing of the verse are the same as those of Ps. lxxvii. 60; lxxvii. 68. God, of his own mere good pleasure, chose Jerusalem as the city of the great King. He chose it because so it seemed good in his sight. Having made it the centre of the theocracy, and the seat of glorious solemnities, which himself had ordained, and which refreshed and edified his people, he took pleasure in it. This love to the holy city had in view also the coming of Messias and the founding of a gospel church. These things having come to pass, and the mass of the chosen nation having rejected Messias, Jerusalem is to Jehovah no more than Petra, Gaza, Damascus or Samaria, John iv. 21. But the church, consisting of true believers, and often spoken of as Zion, is still dear to the heart of God.

3. Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God. God himself has inspired holy men to speak glorious things of thee. Good men in Israel and in surrounding nations sound their praises. Even the heathen, who hate thee, sometimes admit thy glories. Thy fame extends to the ends of the earth, Matt. xii. 42; Luke xi. 31. But some read, Glorious things are spoken in thee. This gives a good sense. It is the rendering of the Syriac. It is preferred by Clarke. It is regarded as admissible by Hengstenberg. It is argued for by Alexander; "first, because it is the strict sense and therefore not to be rejected without reason; then, because it really includes the other, but is not included in it; lastly, because it suggests the additional idea of the holy city, as the scene, no less than the theme, of the prophetic visions." Glorious things; glorious histories, glorious predictions, glorious songs, glorious doctrines, glorious laws, glorious ordinances of worship, glorious promises and privileges were rehearsed and freely spoken of in Jerusalem of old, as they also are in the true church, the mother of us all. Compare Ps. xlviii. 2, 3; 1. 2; Isa. ii. 2; lx. 1-22; Jer. iii. 17; Heb. xii. 22; Rev. xxi. xxii.

4. I will make mention of Rahab and Babylon to them that know me: behold Philistia, and Tyre, with Ethiopia. It will not do to make either the prophet, or the city of God the speaker here, but only Jehovah. He says: "I will make mention, I will announce, I will cause to be known." Rahab, a word found also in Ps. lxxxix. 10; Isa. li. 9. It no doubt designates Egypt, at some time before the loss of her national greatness. Rahab sometimes means pride; sometimes, strength; sometimes, violence. In either way it is a fit title for Egypt. Sometimes Rahab means a sea-monster, to which Egypt bore a resemblance, Ps. lxviii. 30, 31; lxxiv. 13, 14. For more than one reason the name may be applied to Egypt. Babylon was another great and mighty empire on the opposite side of Jerusalem going up from Egypt, and was long the rival and often the foe of Egypt. Respecting Philistia and Tyre see on Ps. xlv. 12; lx. 8; lxxxiii. 7. Respecting Ethiopia, see on Ps. lxviii. 31. Hammond has a note to prove that by Cush, which we here render Ethiopia, is to be understood Arabia. The note is learned, and it is now admitted that Cush at least sometimes includes more than the country south of Egypt called Ethiopia. Indeed Rosenmüller asserts that by this name the Hebrews sometimes designated all southern countries and their inhabitants. In this place we may give it a wide sense. The phrase them that know me, is equivalent to them that love and obey me, them that possess and practise the true religion. This man was born there. Was born, found also in vv. 5, 6. It is well rendered. What does it mean? Several views are taken. 1. To be born in any of the countries named in this verse is no honor, no privilege compared with being born in Jerusalem. These places are as nothing compared with the holy city. Their inhabitants are abjects compared with the citizens of Zion. 2. Others obtain pretty much the same idea by making this emphatic, omitting man and supplying fellow; q. d., The best that can be said of any of these countries is that now and then a fellow claiming some importance has been born there, but any such man is as nothing compared with the truly great men, prophets, judges and kings of Jerusalem. Such would cite Gen. xix. 9; 1 Sam. xxi. 15; 1 Kings xxii. 27; Matt. xii. 24; xxvi. 61, and several other places in proof that this is often used disparagingly. 3. Others think that the clause contains a promise of the enlargement of Zion by the birth of Israelites in their dispersion through the countries named in this verse, taken as representatives of distant nations generally. See Acts ii. 5-11. 4. Others regard this clause as containing a promise of accessions to the church by the conversion of many heathen nations, of which five are here named as samples of the rest. Such regard was born as teaching the doctrine of the new birth, so much insisted on in the New Testament, and make the passage parallel to such texts as Ps. lxxviii. 32; Isa. xix. 19–22; xlv. 5. Morison: "The glory of the true Zion over all the earth seems here distinctly to be pictured. The accession of the most hostile tribes to her glorious standard is here predicted." Horne: "The accession of the nations to the church is generally supposed to be here predicted." Tholuck: "All the nations here specified . . . became engrafted at the time when love and missionary zeal were glowing in the Christian church, and they all regarded Zion as their spiritual mother." If there is any better interpretation than this last, there is no objection to its being set forth.

5. And of Zion it shall be said, This and that man was born in her. The literal rendering would be A man and a man. It is a Hebraism. Hammond thinks it is equivalent to the English phrase man after man, and means many men. Calvin: "The number of such men among the Jews shall be great." The converts in Zion shall be many. So say many Scriptures, Isa. lxvi. 8; Acts ii. 41; iv. 4; xxi. 20. In the last verse cited for thousands we should read ten thousands. The original is myriads. Horsley applies the words to Christ: "Every one shall confess to the honor of the Israelites, that the Saviour was a native Jew." But our Saviour was born in Bethlehem. Jerusalem crucified him. And the Highest himself shall establish her. Alexander: "The pronoun is emphatic;" Hengstenberg: "He, he himself, and no others, not a weak human being;" Tholuck: "It will be seen that it is the Lord who builds her so gloriously," Matt. xvi. 19; Eph. ii. 19–22.

6. The Lord shall count, when he writeth up the people, that this man was born there. On the use of a book or roll see on Ps. lxix. 28. The Chaldee here speaks of "a book in which are written the computations of all peoples." Speaking after the manner of men, the Lord keeps 'a register of the people,' Ezek. xiii. 9. Count, number, declare, tell, announce as a scribe. What would he declare? That this man was born in Zion. What man? Every regenerated man. Clarke: "This has a spiritual meaning. When God takes an account of all professing Christians, he will set apart those for inhabitants of the New Jerusalem, who were born in Zion, who were born again, received a new nature and were fitted for heaven." Scott: "The Lord will number up, at the last day, all the true children of the church; show the eminence and excellence of their characters; and contrast them as 'one in Christ Jesus,' with all that which the world has admired and celebrated in ungodly men." Calvin: "He will write them as belonging to Zion, rather than to Babylon or any other cities; for to be one of the common people among the citizens of Zion will be a greater distinction than to be invested with the highest rank anywhere else."

7. As well the singers as the players on instruments shall be there: all my springs are in thee. Bishops' Bible: The singers and trumpeters shall rehearse: all my refreshings shall be in thee; Cresswell: Singers also, and players upon the pipe, shall chant, 'All my wells are in thee;' Walford: They sing with musical instruments, 'All my springs are in thee;' Symmachus and Aquila: And they shall sing as in leading up a dance, 'All my fountains are in thee;' Jebb: And the singers, as well as the minstrels shall say, 'All my springs are in thee;' Clarke: The people shall sing, as in leading up a choir, All my fountains, the springs of my happiness, are in thee. Many make the last clause the substance of the song used on the joyful occasion. Singers, uniformly so rendered. Players on instruments, the Hebrew is a participle of a verb, which signifies to perforate, to bore through. So it is inferred that it designates performers on wind instruments. Some render it pipers; and some dancers, because the dancers often went with the singers. There is an omission of the verb, and our English supplies shall be there; others, shall say, shall sing, or shall rehearse. This is perhaps better than the common version. Springs, elsewhere fountains, wells, Ps. lxxiv. 15;

lxxxiv. 6; Isa. xii. 3; xli. 18. Cresswell thinks it is equivalent to 'sources of refreshment, of hope and of salvation.' Calvin: "I am rather inclined to adopt, as most suitable to the subject in hand, the opinion that looking is the proper translation, the root of the word signifying an eye. It is as if the Psalmist had said, I will always be earnestly looking, as it were, with fixed eyes upon thee." There are yet other interpretations, but they hardly claim attention. Perhaps wells of salvation, meaning fountains of joy and refreshment, would best give the sense. In thee may be referred either to God or to Zion; for God is in Zion.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. God ought to be publicly worshipped. He is thereby honored. We should celebrate his works. Redemption is his chief work. As such worship is honorable, so it is pleasing to God. He has laid his foundation in the holy mountains, v. 1.

2. As Zion and Moriah could not be moved by any power but that which created them, so the church is safe in the hands of him, who founded her, v. 1. The safety of the church is not in her numbers, but in her Head, not in her ministers, but in her Mediator.

3. God's worship and presence dignify any place, thing or person pertaining to his service. Moriah and Zion were no more than thousands of other peaks or hills, till they became associated with his worship. Then they were the mountains of his holiness, v. 1. To the end of the world they will be mentioned with respect by the best men of each succeeding generation.

4. 'The cause of the origin, existence and perpetuity of the church is found only in the gracious, special, eternal and unchangeable love of God,' v. 2. No firmer ground of support or joy can be desired.

5. If we are truly pious, we will love all that God loves; and so we will love his church, v. 2. Compare Ps. cxxxvii. 5, 6. She is our mother. She is the spouse of Christ. She is the Lamb's wife. She is all glorious within. The glories of earthly kingdoms fade away before the glories of Zion, as the light of the stars is no longer visible when the sun rises. Even Balaam cried: "How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel." Those, that love, trust, fear and obey God, are his church; and he loves them more than all others besides. The glorious things spoken in Zion raise her above all comparison with human institutions. The future of the church on earth is much more glorious than the past, and her state beyond the judgment will far excel her glory in the millenium.

6. There is hope for the heathen. Many heathen countries are named in prophecy, as here v. 4. Other prophecies name other countries. To China, under the name of Sinim, a blessing is promised, Isa. xlix. 12. Then isles of the sea, distant lands, Tarshish and the uttermost parts of the earth are general terms denoting all parts of the world however remote from Judea. The prophecies respecting the enlargement of the Gentile church are very full, Isa. liv. 1-11; lx. 1-22. Believers hail with joy the spread of the Gospel anywhere, Acts xi. 18.

7. The doctrine of regeneration is no novelty. It has been a ground of hope to the church ever since there was a penitent sinner on earth. It is taught in all the Scriptures, vv. 4-6. Compare Ps. li. 10; Jer. xxxi. 33; Ezek. xi. 19, 20. If regeneration is impossible, salvation is impossible.

8. The church shall stand. Nothing can subvert her. God gives her stability, v. 5. Compare Isa. xiv. 32. Her unshaken firmness is secured 1, 'by the irreversible decree of God in her behalf; 2, by her glorious union with Christ; 3, by the doctrine relating to herself. It was revealed by God; it holds forth Christ; by the Holy Spirit Christ and his people are made one.'

9. It is a blessed truth that God is known by his people, v. 4, and that his people are known by the Lord, v. 6. Christ unites these two things in the same verse: "I am the good shepherd, and know my sheep, and am known of mine," John x. 14. Dickson: "All the elect, all the regenerate are taken notice of by God no less particularly than if their names were all written up in a book, one by one," Isa. iv. 3; 2 Tim. ii. 19.

10. Though nights of weeping are appointed to the church on earth, yet the days of her mourning shall soon be ended, and there shall be heard only the voice of joy, thanksgiving and melody; for the singers and players on instruments shall be there, v. 7. O the thundering hallelujahs of the upper sanctuary! Even on earth the songs of Zion are incomparable; but in heaven they will be far higher, purer and more enrapturing.

11. If we would be truly blessed we must join ourselves to the Lord. This is to be done by faith in Jesus Christ. Our engrafting into Christ makes us living members of his church, in and through which he pours so many blessings on the world. So that under God, through Christ, by the Spirit, our springs are in the church, Rom. xi. 17. Scott: "All the springs of life and consolation are in the church alone: and those who draw not from these wells of salvation, will most certainly be forever put off with broken cisterns which can hold no water." Nicolson: "The highest privilege is that in God's church He opens the fountains of living water;—in his ordinances God dispenses every blessing: every sincere and upright soul rejoices in opportunities to wait on God in his ordinances. Such an one can sing, All my springs are in thee. All other fountains are muddy; this alone is as clear as crystal."

12. Surely such views as this Psalm presents ought to expel the despondency and enliven the hopes of God's people. Seeing what great things God has done and what great things he has engaged to do for his church, embracing all who love him, it is unbelief to cry out, We are ruined; our enemies will swallow us up.

PSALM LXXXVIII.

A song or Psalm for the sons of Korah, to the chief Musician upon Mahalath Leannoth, Maschil of Heman the Ezrahite.

- 1 O LORD God of my salvation, I have cried day and night before thee:
- 2 Let my prayer come before thee: incline thine ear unto my cry;
- 3 For my soul is full of troubles: and my life draweth nigh unto the grave.
- 4 I am counted with them that go down into the pit: I am as a man that hath no strength:
- 5 Free among the dead, like the slain that lie in the grave, whom thou rememberest no more: and they are cut off from thy hand.
- 6 Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps.
- 7 Thy wrath lieth hard upon me, and thou hast afflicted me with all thy waves. Selah.
- 8 Thou hast put away mine acquaintance far from me; thou hast made me an abomination unto them: I am shut up, and I cannot come forth.
- 9 Mine eye mourneth by reason of affliction: LORD, I have called daily upon thee, I have stretched out my hands unto thee.
- 10 Wilt thou shew wonders to the dead? shall the dead arise and praise thee? Selah.
- 11 Shall thy lovingkindness be declared in the grave? or thy faithfulness in destruction?
- 12 Shall thy wonders be known in the dark? and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness?
- 13 But unto thee have I cried, O LORD; and in the morning shall my prayer prevent thee.
- 14 LORD, why castest thou off my soul? why hidest thou thy face from me?

- 15 I am afflicted and ready to die from my youth up: while I suffer thy terrors I am distracted.
 16 Thy fierce wrath goeth over me; thy terrors have cut me off.
 17 They came round about me daily like water; they compassed me about together.
 18 Lover and friend hast thou put far from me, and mine acquaintance into darkness.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. xxxii. xlii. liii. lxxxiv. lxxxv. lxxxvii. Leannoth has not before occurred in any title. It is the plural of a word once rendered hemlock; seven times, wormwood. Gesenius: "It was apparently regarded as a noxious or poisonous plant, and hence called the accursed." Calvin thus renders the words Mahalath Leannoth, Maschil, Upon Mahalath, to make humble, instructive; Amesius, Tremellius and Junius, To besung to a wind instrument, an instruction; Venema, Upon Mahalath responsive teaching; Piscator, Concerning an afflicting sickness; An instructive ode; Steel, An instructive Psalm on sickness, through affliction. Many virtually concur with Steel. Some regard Leannoth as a musical term, showing that the Psalm is to be sung responsively; some refer it to the instrument or tune; others, to the subject matter of the ode. It is but candid to say that this point cannot be settled, although it is not impossible that it specially regards the bitterness of soul expressed in the Psalm, or the bitter grief in which it was written. The title is generally supposed to ascribe the Psalm to Heman the Ezrahite. See Introduction, § 4. Amyrald is confident that the author is unknown. Those, who insist on this Psalm having a historic occasion, are much divided in view. Kimchi thinks it was written during the captivity in the name of the Jewish people, and in the language of a poor slave. Kennicott regards it as the prayer of a man in the last stage of leprosy, and excluded from society. Patrick supposes the author to have been cast into a dark prison, or to have been otherwise miserably treated, and here to bewail his private calamity. Tholuck: "The occasion is not known." It is very probable that the particular affliction is purposely concealed from us, as in the case of Paul's thorn in the flesh, that the language of the composition may be appropriated by many. Henry thinks it probable that the author "could see no comfort for himself, an instructor and comforter of others, and yet himself putting comfort away from him." Pool thinks it was written "upon a particular occasion, to wit, Heman's deep distress and dejection of mind almost to despair." Stier: "It is the most mournful of all the plaintive Psalms." O Lord God of my salvation, are the only cheering words in the whole composition. Tholuck calls it, "A song of deep complaint." Calvin: "It contains very grievous lamentations, poured forth by its inspired penman when under very severe affliction, and almost at the point of despair." Horsley regards it as prophetic, and calls it "the lamentation of Messiah." And we must admit, with several learned men, that many verses do peculiarly suit the "man of sorrows." Luther: "This is a prayer, as in the person of Christ and of all the saints." The church of England has appointed this as one of the Psalms for Good Friday. There is nothing to support the opinion that this is one of the penitential Psalms. Scott dates it B. C. 1020; Clarke affixes no date. We have here Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2. On Selah see Introduction § 15.

1. O LORD God of my salvation, I have cried day and night before thee. God of my salvation, see on Ps. xviii. 46. Cried, as in Ps. lxxvii. 1. Day and night, continually, as in Ps. i. 2. Calvin: "The words before thee are not superfluous. It is common for all men to complain when they are under the pressure of grief; but they are far from pouring out their groanings before God." Some fill the ears of their friends with the sad tale; others fill the air with their loud laments; yet others spend their time in murmuring against God.

2. Let my prayer come before thee. The verb is in the future, but perhaps fitly rendered in the imperative here, as in Ps. xxxvi. 11; lxxix. 11; cii. 1. Prayer, uniformly rendered. Before thee, before thy face, into thy presence. Incline thine ear unto my cry. Incline, in Ps. lxxxvi. 1, bow down; often as here. Both clauses contain an earnest petition that he may be heard and answered. He was not making an oration. His heart was in anguish.

3. For my soul is full of troubles. Troubles, afflictions, hurts, evils, miseries, griefs. Is full, a verb in the preterite, has been full and is so still. Alexander has sated. Calvin: "He does not speak of one kind of calamity only; but of calamities so heaped one upon another that his heart was filled with sorrow, till it could contain no more." The result was natural: And my life draweth nigh unto the grave. The effect of deep seated, long continued grief is to waste away the life as well as the spirits. Grave, hell, pit; see on Ps. vi. 5; ix. 17. His life was a living death.

4. I am counted with them that go down into the pit. Counted, reckoned, thought of, esteemed by those around me. It is in the preterite, q. d., It has been so and is so now. Pit, commonly so rendered, see on Ps. xxviii. 1. Griefs were before him like yawning caverns, ready to swallow him, q. d., Men regard me as good as dead; nor is this surprising, for the effect of my troubles on me has been such that I am as a man that hath no strength. Though naturally perhaps not more feeble than others, yet by sorrow he was brought so low that he had no might.

5. Free among the dead, like the slain that lie in the grave, whom thou rememberest no more. Free, the same word is applied to the wild ass that goes free, and is used in Job iii. 19, respecting the effect of death on a slave. Already men regarded his connection with society virtually dissolved; as really so, as if he were slain and lying in the grave; or as if God remembered him no more. He adds: And they are cut off from thy hand, from receiving supplies from thee as do the living. Calvin thinks the word free specially refers to the fact that 'his mind had become disengaged from all worldly solicitude, his afflictions having deprived him of all feeling.' But this is hardly sustained by the context. His feelings are still intense. Some think that free is equivalent to forsaken; but his faith in the God of his salvation was not gone. Clarke thinks the word refers to Christ, who was free to lay down his life, and free to take it again. In this he is supported by Augustine and many others.

6. Thou hast laid me in the lowest pit, in darkness, in the deeps. Pit, as in v. 4. Lowest pit, literally pit of the lowest parts. He says that he is like a man buried in a retired low place out of view of all the world. Darkness, in Ps. lxxiv. 20, dark places. Here the word is used figuratively for dreadful evils. So is the word deeps; in Ex. xv. 5, bottom; in Neh. ix. 11, deeps; in both cases it refers to the overwhelming calamities that overtook the Egyptians at the Red sea.

7. Thy wrath lieth hard upon me, and thou hast afflicted me with all thy waves. God's wrath, fury, hot displeasure is perhaps so terrible to none as to those who have tasted and seen that the Lord is gracious. Waves, see on Ps. xlii. 7. Huge, irresistible sorrows overwhelmed him.

8. Thou hast put away mine acquaintance far from me. This is at once explained by the parallel clause: Thou hast made me an abomination unto them. Abomination, in the plural abominations, as in Gen. xliii. 32; xli. 34. His acquaintance neglected him, perhaps partly from aversion, and partly from fear. They thought it perilous to stand up for him. They were afraid of being in a minority. I am shut up, and I cannot come forth. Being in straits, having one's way hedged up and like expressions are common in Scripture, Job xix. 8; Lam. iii. 7-9. The interpretations are two. This is the more common: I am environed with difficulties out of which it is impossible for me to escape. The other is, that he voluntarily confined himself to a retired life and had no heart to encounter the neglect and reproaches of his acquaintance. Both may have been true, so that he could not have gone forth and freely mingled with men if he would; and he would not have done it if he could. Walford, speaking of the whole verse, says: "Heman means either that the character of his disease was such that men could not endure to be near him, or that the state of his mind was so disordered that he became wearisome and intolerable; perhaps he includes both." Clarke thinks it refers to a leper shut out from society.

9. Mine eye mourneth by reason of affliction. Mourneth, has mourned and is mourning still. Affliction, see on Ps. ix. 13, where it is rendered trouble. This continuance of sadness surprised him the more because he had not forsaken the throne of grace: LORD, I have called daily upon thee, I have stretched out my hands unto thee. The latter clause is parallel to the former; see on Ps. xxviii. 2.

10. Wilt thou shew wonders to the dead? shall the dead arise and praise thee? In studying several preceding verses it seems almost impossible to avoid the impression that the Psalmist is speaking in the name of the suffering Jesus. But evidently this verse is uttered by the same person, who has spoken throughout the Psalm; and our Saviour never doubted, but clearly foretold his own early resurrection. He never put his imprisonment in the grave at more than the third day. Applied to the Psalmist the words seem to mean that his circumstances were distressing and urgent, that his present critical condition called for immediate succor, and that as in all ordinary cases those who died were no more brought back to see life or taste its blessings till the heavens be no more, so in the most earnest manner he asked God at once to interpose. Unbelief and weak faith often forget that the time of our deliverance is in the hands of the Father. We may not say that God cannot help us, unless he does it soon. Wonders, marvellous things. Calvin renders it a miracle. In Hebrew it is singular. It occurs again in v. 12. The word in the latter clause rendered dead is Rephaim. By some it is supposed to refer to the giants who bare that name, or to giants generally. The word is often rendered giants. But the English Bible no less than eight times renders it dead or deceased. Perhaps there may be such an idea as this included, shall even the mightiest of the dead arise? Jebb reads dead bodies. Hammond says, 'there can be no question that the word here signifies the dead, those that lie in the grave.' Chaldee has it, carcasses that are dissolved in the dust. The interrogative form in vv. 10-12, is the strongest form of negation.

11. Shall thy lovingkindness be declared in the grave? Lovingkindness, in Ps. v. 7, mercy; see on Ps. li. 1. Grave, as in v. 5. In Ps. v. 9, it is rendered sepulchre; in Gen. xxiii. 4, burying-place. Or thy faithfulness in destruction? Faithfulness commonly so rendered, derived from the word Amen. Destruction, always so rendered; the Hebrew is Abaddon, see Rev. ix. 11, the same as Apollyon, destroyer.

12. Shall thy wonders be known in the dark, and thy righteousness in the land of forgetfulness? Wonders, as in v. 10. Righteousness, here the word probably means, as President Edwards thinks it does in Isa. li. 8, God's "faithfulness in fulfilling his covenant promises to his church." Dark, in Ps. xviii. 11, rendered darkness, and here clearly equivalent to the grave. Land of forgetfulness, equivalent to death, and so called because the dead are forgotten by the living; see v. 5, and Ps. xxxi. 12; or because the dead cease to be interested in the affairs of men, Ecc. ix. 5, 10. The latter seems to be the idea here. The plea of vv. 10-12, goes on the supposition that the fearful conflict in which the Psalmist is engaged has earth for its theatre; and, if settled adversely to his interests, God's honor will suffer among men. The sole object is to show that in the present conflict and trouble, if God would show himself on the side of the Psalmist, he must manifest his favor before death supervenes and leaves the point apparently settled against his servant.

13. But unto thee have I cried, O LORD. All these things have befallen me, but I have not ceased earnestly to pray for thy help. And in the morning shall my prayer prevent thee. Prayer, as in v. 2. Prevent, go before or come before. Patrick: "Thus, O LORD, I cry unto thee in the anguish of my soul; which keeps me awake to present my prayers unto thee, before the morning light." Clarke: "I will not wait till the accustomed time to offer my morning sacrifice; I shall call on thee long before others come to offer their morning devotions." Scott: "Come more early before thee than is usual with men."

14. LORD, why castest thou off my soul? Cast off, as in Ps. xliii. 2; in Ps. lxxxix. 38, joined with abhorred; sometimes as strong a word as spew out in Rev. iii. 16, though often it means simply to reject. Why hidest thou thy face from me? Both verbs in this verse are in the future. The Psalmist feared the continuance of all his trials and probably thought they would grow worse and worse. To hide the face is to refuse to give relief.

15. I am afflicted and ready to die from my youth up. How much some suffer! I have seen a child, who at the age of twenty months had probably suffered more bodily pain than the whole congregation of a thousand souls, where its parents worshipped. Asaph seems to have been of a sad heart. Jeremiah lived and died lamenting. Heman seems to have been of the same lot and of the same turn of mind. How soon in life his troubles began we know not, but at least very early, from a child, as the word might be here rendered, and as it is rendered in Pr. xxix. 21. While I suffer thy terrors I am distracted. Calvin: I have suffered thy terrors by doubting. For distracted, the church of England has a troubled mind. The Psalmist was 'perplexed but not in despair; cast down but not destroyed.' He still cried to the God of his salvation.

16. Thy fierce wrath goeth over me. Fierce wrath, one word also rendered wrath, fury, fierceness, sore displeasure. Here it is plural, wraths. Goeth, in the preterite hath gone and is still going. In what way God was afflicting his servant we do not know; but that his sufferings were terrible none can doubt. Thy terrors have cut me off. Terrors, not the word so rendered in v. 15, but that found in Job vi. 4. Both words are strong. Cut off, consumed, destroyed. The meaning is that he was so affected by the awful impressions he had received of the divine displeasure that he was not himself any more.

17. They [thy wraths and thy terrors] come round about me daily like water; they compassed me about together. As overflowing waters perfectly surround, and as a net incloses the prey, so have they seized on me, that there is no escaping. Daily, continually.

18. Lover and friend hast thou put far from me, and mine acquaintance into darkness. Lover, participle of the verb to love. Friend, companion, fellow, often neighbor. Mine acquaintance, as in v. 8. It means any whom I have known. Alexander: "The first clause is a repetition of v. 8." And is not the last clause parallel to the first? My acquaintance are so that I cannot see them. They are like objects in a dark place. They are out of sight. He is not deploring the death of his friends, as though they were buried, but their removal from him. Nicolson; "They appear no more to give me any counsel, help or comfort, than if they were hidden in perpetual darkness."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. If we knew more of the religious experience of God's people, we should be less apt to think our trials peculiar. David and Asaph wrote much of their sorrows. The only composition of Heman extant is full of grief. Let no man despise his afflicted brother. Let no man count it imbecility to tremble under a sense of the divine wrath.

2. Some suffering on earth is designed to instruct and comfort others. That which to us is a dirge may be to others a song. How deeply afflicted Heman was, yet how consolatory is this Psalm to God's people of successive generations.

3. The Scriptures pronounce the author of this Song a very wise man, 1 Kings iv: 31; yet when plunged into sorrow he has no resources left but such as belong to the humblest child of God. He can plead God's covenant; he can give himself up to prayer, v. 1. That is all.

4. In our distresses we ought to see to it that our supplications are earnest and lively. We must cry, day and night, vv. 1, 2. Dickson: "The believer may be sure to have a good answer at length, but he must be instant, and deal still with God for it, and press it hard, and patiently wait for it, as Heman doth."

5. True heartiness in prayer seeks God's blessing, and looks eagerly for it, v. 2. A believer does not rest in the words he speaks to God, but desires the answer God may graciously vouchsafe.

6. It is no new thing for good men to have many and great troubles, vv. 3-15. When floods of ungodly men, waves of sorrow and terrors roll in upon us, let us remember God has carried others through as sore trials. It is sad indeed when we have no respite from grief, when the clouds never break away, when refuge seems to fail. But no trials can come that will justify us in failing to make God the depository of our sad tale. Dickson: "If the godly should smother their grief, and not go to God with it, then sorrow were able to choke them."

7. Of all troubles, soul-troubles are the worst, and most loudly call for compassion from man and loving-kindness from God, v. 3. In nothing are care and kindness more demanded than in diseases and distresses, which are purely mental. This Psalmist has become perfectly familiarized with "the grave," "the pit," "the dead," "darkness," "the deeps." His "anguish of soul is of the very nature, and power, and poison, and sting of hell and death."

8. When men are incredulous respecting the terrible effects produced on the body by mental distress, they know not the powers of self-inflicted torment in every rational being. Heman was a great man, but grief nearly took his life, vv. 3, 4. No doubt it shortened his days. Luther: "Where such fears and terrors of mind abound and continue, they extend to the body, bring on a paleness and emaciation, and affect the whole man." A moaning spirit gives a pining body. No mortal can explain why the loving and gentle God should permit the best of men to be so pressed and afflicted as thus to crush them.

9. If any man thinks it a small trial to be a walking corpse, or to be buried alive, or imagines that such a calamity cannot overtake him, he has but a limited knowledge of his own feebleness, or of his liability to the displeasure of God, v. 5.

10. To a pious mind it is a relief to know that troubles come from the hand of God. He then knows they are not sent in wantonness. "He doth not afflict willingly." But in some respects it overwhelms the soul to find God himself smiting it and sending his wrath and terrors upon it, vv. 7, 17. It says, God can do no wrong, yet he afflicts me thus. Is it because he sees me to be his enemy and is determined to make me a monument of his wrath? or is it because he sees so much dross in me that he keeps me in the fire so long?

11. There may be cold, selfish natures, that are not much or easily affected with the want or the loss of friends; but to one of warm, affectionate heart and confiding nature there is hardly any cup of more bitterness than that which we drink on finding that many whom we cherished as friends stand aloof from our sore, and are not grieved for our affliction, vv. 8, 18. In this life our joys are doubled and our sorrows abated by real friendship. But a fair and long trial will satisfy men that a large number of mankind will only cling to you as leaves to their trees in soft weather. When the frosts come, they will drop off.

Heaven gives us friends to bless the present scene;
Resumes them, to prepare us for the next.

Henry: "Next to the comforts of religion are those of friendship and society."

11. If God by his providence shuts us up so that we cannot come forth, then let his will be done; but let us not voluntarily shut ourselves out from commerce with men, simply because God has greatly afflicted us, v. 8. We sometimes double our sorrows by nursing them in secret. We sit in our chambers until all nature is clad in drab, or draped in black. This is unprofitable.

12. But let us be careful not to act so as to make on others the impression that our piety has rendered us callous, or insensible to those things, which were designed to grieve us. Heman did not so. His eye mourned by reason of affliction, v. 9. He is a wise man, who knows when to weep and when to laugh.

13. If the righteous can do nothing else, they can and will abound in earnest prayer, vv. 9, 13. Tholuck: "The troubled bard lives with God; from early morn to the eve he lives with him; this is evident from his pouring out his soul at early morn. It may therefore be assumed that though his prayer dies away in the accents of complaint, the light of hope continued to burn in his soul." Calvin: "As so dreadful a flood did not prevent the prophet from lifting up his heart and prayers to God, we may learn from his example to cast the anchor of our faith and prayers direct into heaven in all the perils of shipwreck to which we may be exposed."

14. If we would glorify God on earth, we should never forget that life is very short and uncertain, and that the work of life must be done in life and not in death, nor after death, vv. 10-12. To honor God by a life of holiness is the highest earthly attainment.

15. When love is strong as death, then the coals of jealousy have a most vehement flame, and the bare suspicion that God has rejected us fills us with anguish, v. 14. Arnd: "When the cross lasts long, conflicts arise about casting off. But there is no casting off; there is only a waiting for the hour of help, the hour of the Lord."

16. It is always right that we should ask God to show us wherefore he contends with us, v. 14. Often the cause is in our depravity. But if we can be well satisfied that we are suffering for the good of others, it will be no small relief to our sorrows.

17. Great as were the sufferings of the prophet recorded in this Psalm, they greatly differ from the torments of the damned, chiefly in these two things; first, he is not without hope, he is not in despair; secondly, his anguish is not eternal.

18. There are some afflictions which we never forget, v. 15. It is perhaps best we should have them still in remembrance. Often new distresses will awaken the memory of past sorrows. Heaven must be a wonderful state and a wonderful place; for there the redeemed shall have no painful views of anything past, present or future.

19. The Psalm concludes without any expression of comfort or sensible relief to the prophet's mind; yet such faith, hope and importunate prayer, as are here manifest, evince that there was at least insensible support, followed in due time by solid comforts, perhaps in death, possibly not till after death. For nearly three thousand years the pious author of this ode has been singing a very different song before the throne of the Eternal; and his eternity is but just begun.

20. Is any devout reader free from the troubles and sorrows depicted in this Psalm? let him be thankful, but not high-minded. Soon they may come on him like an armed man.

PSALM LXXXIX.

Maschil of Ethan the Ezrahite.

1 I will sing of the mercies of the LORD for ever: with my mouth will I make known thy faithfulness to all generations.

2 For I have said, Mercy shall be built up for ever: thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens.

3 I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant,

4 Thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations. Selah.

5 And the heavens shall praise thy wonders, O LORD: thy faithfulness also in the congregation of the saints.

6 For who in the heaven can be compared unto the LORD? who among the sons of the mighty can be likened unto the LORD?

7 God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are about him.

8 O LORD God of hosts, who is a strong LORD like unto thee? or to thy faithfulness round about thee?

9 Thou rulest the raging of the sea: when the waves thereof arise, thou stillest them.

10 Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces, as one that is slain; thou hast scattered thine enemies with thy strong arm.

11 The heavens are thine, the earth also is thine: as for the world and the fulness thereof, thou hast founded them.

12 The north and the south thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name.

13 Thou hast a mighty arm: strong is thy hand, and high is thy right hand.

14 Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne: mercy and truth shall go before thy face.

15 Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound: they shall walk, O LORD, in the light of thy countenance.

16 In thy name shall they rejoice all the day: and in thy righteousness shall they be exalted.

17 For thou art the glory of their strength: and in thy favour our horn shall be exalted.

18 For the LORD is our defence; and the Holy One of Israel is our King.

19 Then thou spakest in vision to thy Holy One, and saidst, I have laid help upon one that is mighty; I have exalted one chosen out of the people.

20 I have found David my servant; with my holy oil have I anointed him:

21 With whom my hand shall be established: mine arm also shall strengthen him.

22 The enemy shall not exact upon him; nor the son of wickedness afflict him.

23 And I will beat down his foes before his face, and plague them that hate him.

24 But my faithfulness and my mercy shall be with him: and in my name shall his horn be exalted.

25 I will set his hand also in the sea, and his right hand in the rivers.

26 He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father, my God, and the Rock of my salvation.

27 Also I will make him my firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth.

28 My mercy will I keep for him for evermore, and my covenant shall stand fast with him.

29 His seed also will I make to endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven.

30 If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments;

31 If they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments;

32 Then will I visit their transgression with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes.

33 Nevertheless my lovingkindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail.

34 My covenant will I not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips.

35 Once have I sworn by my holiness that I will not lie unto David.

36 His seed shall endure for ever, and his throne as the sun before me.

37 It shall be established for ever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven. Selah.

38 But thou hast cast off and abhorred, thou hast been wroth with thine anointed.

39 Thou hast made void the covenant of thy servant: thou hast profaned his crown by casting it to the ground.

40 Thou hast broken down all his hedges; thou hast brought his strong holds to ruin.

- 41 All that pass by the way spoil him: he is a reproach to his neighbors.
 42 Thou hast set up the right hand of his adversaries: thou hast made all his enemies to rejoice.
 43 Thou hast also turned the edge of his sword, and hast not made him to stand in the battle.
 44 Thou hast made his glory to cease, and cast his throne down to the ground.
 45 The days of his youth hast thou shortened: thou hast covered him with shame. Selah.
 46 How long, LORD? wilt thou hide thyself for ever? shall thy wrath burn like fire?
 47 Remember how short my time is: wherefore hast thou made all men in vain?
 48 What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death? shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave? Selah.
 49 Lord, where are thy former lovingkindnesses, which thou swarest unto David in thy truth?
 50 Remember, Lord, the reproach of thy servants; how I do bear in my bosom the reproach of all the mighty people;
 51 Wherewith thine enemies have reproached, O LORD; wherewith they have reproached the footsteps of thine anointed.
 52 Blessed be the LORD for evermore. Amen, and Amen.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. xxx. and Introduction, § 4. The date of this can hardly be very different from that of Ps. lxxxviii., as the authors were brothers. Scott dates it B. C. 968; Clarke affixes no date. Its contents show that it could not have been written before the time of David. The basis of this composition is the promise made to the son of Jesse in 2 Sam. vii. 16. The structure of the Psalm is peculiar. Henry: "Many Psalms that begin with complaint and prayer, end with joy and praise, but this begins with joy and praise, and ends with sad complaints and petitions." Some have thought that this Psalm and the preceding form a pair; but the reasons assigned are not conclusive. That this Psalm is Messianic is generally admitted, is proven by its contents, and by its being so quoted in the New Testament. We have here several names of the Most High; Jehovah LORD, El God, Elohim God, with Sabaoth of hosts added; Jah LORD and Adonai Lord; on which respectively see on Psalms i. 2; v. 4; iii. 2; xxiv. 10; lix. 5; introductory remarks on Ps. lxviii.; on Ps. ii. 4. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. I will sing of the mercies of the LORD for ever. Mercies, either in the singular or plural the same word occurs in vv. 2, 14, 24, 28, 33, 49. In the two last it is rendered lovingkindness. Here it has special reference to the sure mercies of David. Compare Isa. lv. 3; Acts xiii. 34. Sing, uniformly so rendered. It often expresses the celebration of God's worship with the aid of musical instruments. For ever, to eternity, perpetually. With my mouth I will make known thy faithfulness to all generations. Faithfulness, in fulfilling generally all he has promised and particularly what he engaged to David. We have the same word in vv. 2, 5, 8, 24, 33, 49, (in v. 49 rendered truth.) To all generations, literally to generation and generation, equivalent to all coming ages.

2. For I have said, Mercy shall be built up for ever. I have declared it as an undoubted truth. The speaker is Ethan. Mercy, all the lovingkindness which God has promised, and that is no little, especially in what he engaged respecting the throne of David. Built up, like a glorious edifice, not begun and finished in a day, but stone after stone added, till the topstone shall be laid with shoutings. The same verb in another form occurs in v. 4. The meaning is God's mercy shall be extended and continued to the consummation of what it had undertaken. Thy faithfulness shalt thou establish in the very heavens. The Hebrew is emphatic, pretty well expressed by the word very. Calvin: "The divine promise is no less stable than the settled course of the heavens;" Hengstenberg: "The faithfulness is established in the heavens, in order that it may partake of their eternity, be like them eternal;" Scott: "Above the reach of the changes which take place in this lower world;" Clarke: "What thou hast promised to do to the children of men on earth, thou dost register in heaven; and thy promise shall never fail." That which is in the heavens is very conspicuous. Thus far the prophet in the name of the church has spoken. God himself speaks next.

3. I have made a covenant with my chosen, I have sworn unto David my servant. Covenant, it occurs also in vv. 28, 34, 39. On making a covenant see on Ps. l. 5. One way of confirming an engagement was by an oath, 1 Sam. xx. 3; 2 Sam. xix. 23; Heb. vi. 16. Chosen, we have the same word slightly varied in v. 19. David was chosen of God in preference to Saul who was rejected. Christ was chosen of his Father in preference to all others. He is God's elect (the very word used here) in whom his soul delighteth, Isa. xlii. 1. David calls himself God's servant and God calls him my servant David, v. 20; Ps. xix. 11, 13; Jer. xxxiii. 21. But Christ was God's servant in a much higher sense. He rendered a much more glorious service, Isa. xlii. 1. Here follows what God had engaged to do:

4. Thy seed will I establish for ever, and build up thy throne to all generations. He saith not, And seeds, as of many; but as of one, Thy seed, which is Christ. True, the covenant with David literally and primarily related to Solomon; but even its chief reference to him was as a type of Christ, in whom secondarily and spiritually the promise was gloriously fulfilled. This is clear from the fact that Paul quotes a part of the covenant—"I will be his father, and he shall be my son," 2 Sam. vii. 14—to show that Christ was superior to angels, indeed that he was by nature the Son of God, Heb. i. 5. An inspired interpretation removes all doubt. Indeed the promise here is parallel to the words of the angel in Luke i. 32, 33. Hengstenberg: "The promise culminates in Christ." Establish, as in v. 2, and in the passive form in vv. 21, 37. In Ps. viii. 3, it is hast ordained, and in Ps. lxxviii. 9, didst confirm. Many prefer will confirm. Build, as in v. 2. To all generations, as in v. 1.

5. And the heavens shall praise thy wonders, O LORD. Heavens, either angels as in Job xv. 15, corresponding to Ps. xevii. 6, as explained in Heb. i. 6; or angels with men already redeemed and in glory. Wonders, as in Ps. lxxxviii. 10; Calvin, wondrous work. The special wonder (singular) here referred to was making the stone which the builders rejected the headstone of the corner; it was the wonder of redemption by Jesus Christ. Thy faithfulness also in the congregation of thy saints. Le Clerc proposes to supply—Men shall praise; but it is objected that this would destroy the parallelism between heavens and saints. Saints, in the plural; it occurs again in v. 7, and in the singular Holy One in v. 18. The meaning of the whole verse is, the sublimest worship both of heaven and earth shall be given to God who doeth wonders and is faithful to all his engagements. This is the common, perhaps the best interpretation.

6. Who in the heavens can be compared unto the LORD? who among the sons of the mighty can be likened unto the LORD? Chaldee: For who is there in the sky that is equalled to the Lord, who among the choirs of angels can be compared to the Lord? John Rogers' translation: For who is he among the cloudes that may be compared unto the Lorde? Yee what is he amonge the goddes, that is like unto the Lorde? Heaven, rendered in Job xxxvii. 18, sky; in Ps. xviii. 11, in the plural, skies; in Ps. xxxvi. 5, clouds; in v. 37, heaven. Compared, valued, estimated, equalled, set in array. Likened, be like is the literal. The mighty, see on Ps. xxix. 1. There can be no comparison, there is no resemblance between God and any of his creatures, even the most exalted. There is no greater gulf than that which lies between the creature and the Creator, the finite and the infinite.

7. God is greatly to be feared in the assembly of the saints, and to be had in reverence of all them that are about him. Fear is dread; reverence is awful veneration. In the Hebrew the latter word is the stronger, expressing terror. Both words are to be taken in a good sense; the English version gives the meaning. Instead of God is greatly to be feared, Ainsworth has: God is daunting terrible; Calvin and Hengstenberg: God is very terrible. For assembly some read secret; some, counsel; some, confidence; Alexander, secret council. See on Ps. xxv. 14; lv. 14; lxiv. 4. Perhaps assembly is best. For of all in the latter clause the Chaldee, Calvin and Alexander read above all. The Hebrew will bear that translation. The saints and those about him include all his worshippers in heaven and earth.

8. O LORD God of hosts. Jehovah has all armies, all causes, all agents at his disposal. He marshals the stars. He guides the angels. He is the God of battles. He is a man of war. He is in all, through all, over all. Who is a strong LORD like unto thee? The word rendered strong occurs nowhere else. The corresponding noun, found in later books, is rendered treasure, riches, strength, in the Chaldee power. Some would read, Who is strong as thou art? who is Jah as thou art? We may read, Who is like thee? Thou art strong, O Lord. Or to thy faithfulness round about thee? A better rendering is, And thy faithfulness is round about thee. Faithfulness, as in vv. 1, 2.

9. Thou rulest the raging of the sea: when the waves thereof arise, thou stillest them. See on Ps. lxxv. 7. God holds the winds in his fist. To created power nothing is more unmanageable than the sea. No man can raise or calm its huge billows, nor can he control the tumults of the people, often represented by agitated waters. But Jehovah does all this without effort. He is 'the author of storms and of calms.' Thou rulest, literally, Thou (art) ruling. Jehovah's will is almightiness. Raging, pride, lifting up, majesty.

10. Thou hast broken Rahab in pieces, as one that is slain. Rahab, a poetical name for Egypt. See on Ps. lxxxvii. 4. The allusion to the sea in v. 9, was probably in anticipation of the mention of Egypt here, as the greatest stroke that proud empire ever received was at the Red sea. Chaldee: Thou hast bruised, as one slain with a sword, the proud (one): this is the impious Pharaoh; church of England: Thou hast subdued Egypt and destroyed it; Calvin: Thou hast overthrown Egypt as a wounded man; Berlin: Thou hast bruised down Egypt like a dead carcass. Crushed, bruised, smitten, broken in pieces, destroyed. As one that is slain; Alexander: Like one mortally wounded, especially in battle. Thou hast scattered thine enemies with the strong arm. Enemies, always so rendered. God did this at the Red sea, as well as on other occasions. Scattered, as in Num. x. 35; Ps. lxxviii. 1. The word had a historic significance and was inwoven with public worship. It was easy for God to do all this, for he had an arm of might.

11. The heavens are thine, the earth also is thine: as for the world and the fulness thereof, thou hast founded them. God's power to create and sustain the universe renders it easy for him to do anything. The universal Creator is universal Proprietor. Compare Ps. xcv. 5. Fulness; Hengstenberg: the whole extent; Alexander: its contents and its inhabitants; Clarke: all the generations of men. See on Ps. xxiv. 1; l. 12.

12. The north and the south thou hast created them: Tabor and Hermon shall rejoice in thy name. Here we have the four points of the compass. The north, always so rendered; the word means covering or hiding, perhaps, some think, because "the ancients regarded the north as the seat of gloom and darkness, in contrast to the bright and sunny south." The south, literally the right hand, i. e., the right hand as you face the rising sun. Compare 1 Sam. xxiii. 19, 24. Tabor is put for the west. From its summit, which is one thousand seven hundred and fifty feet above the level of the sea, the Mediterranean can be seen. See Jer. xlvi. 18. This mountain is on the west side of the Jordan. Hermon stands for the east. It is about fifty miles from Tabor and on the east side of the Jordan. See on Ps. xlii. 6. Its highest point is not less than ten thousand feet above the level of the sea. These two mountains, being very prominent and also very beautiful objects lying in different directions, denote east and west. The import of the verse is that God has made all parts of the world, that they have his providential care, show forth his praise, and are under his dominion.

13. Thou hast a mighty arm: strong is thy hand, and high is thy right hand. Patrick: "Thy power, extending itself throughout the whole, always effects in every place whatsoever thou designest; and with an irresistible force; whether it be to punish evil doers, or to preserve and exalt them that do well." The use of terms expressing efficiency here reminds one of Ephes. i. 19.

14. Justice and judgment are the habitation of thy throne. Habitation, place, settled place, dwelling-place, foundation; margin, establishment. The corresponding verb in v. 4 is establish. Justice, righteousness; see on Ps. iv. 1. Judgment, right, see on Ps. i. 5; ix. 4. God's throne is his government, which is founded in equity and in plenty of justice. This King does no wrong. Mercy and truth shall go before thy face. Mercy, as in vv. 1, 2. Truth, uniformly truth, though often meaning firmness, fidelity, uprightness. Go before, in Ps. lxxxviii. 13, prevent. A throne, built on justice and right, and having mercy and truth prominent in all its acts and decisions, suits the case of every penitent.

15. Blessed is the people that know the joyful sound. Blessed, O the blessednesses, as in Ps. i. 1. Joyful sound, joy, (Ps. xxvii. 6), a shout (Ps. xlvii. 4) shouting, rejoicing, loud noise, here only joyful sound; in reference to Jewish festivals, jubilee, Lev. xxv. 9; blowing of trumpets, Lev. xxiii. 24. The figure is perhaps taken from the sound of the trumpets on the joyful stated feasts and observances of the Israelites. The word know is pregnant. It means not merely to recognize the sound of the trumpet, but to know its import. Then the meaning is, Many and great are the blessings that come to the people, who have God's ordinances, and understand their real significance and welcome them joyfully. They shall walk, O LORD, in the light of thy countenance, i. e., says Calvin: "They not only enjoy his benefits, but also confiding in his favor, they pass the whole course of their life in mental peace and tranquillity;" Scott: "They walk in the comfort of God's manifested presence and favor;" Patrick: "They shall spend their days most cheerfully, O Lord; being secure of thy favor, which will let them want nothing that is good for them."

16. In thy name shall they rejoice all the day. God's name is all that by which he is known, his existence, perfections, works, word, worship and providence. In all these his people even now have pleasure, and yet more and more shall they be glad, be joyful in them. Rejoice, as in Ps. ii. 11; ix. 14. And in thy righteousness shall they be exalted. God's righteousness is his essential and infinite rectitude, his faithfulness to his covenant engagements, or the glorious justifying righteousness of his saints. In his holiness he saves them. By his faithfulness he preserves them. For the sake of the righteousness of Christ they shall be exalted, lifted up on high, even taken up to God's right hand.

17. For thou art the glory of their strength. No wonder they can do the great things just spoken of, for their might is not in themselves. Jehovah himself makes their strength glorious. And in thy favor our horn shall be exalted. Favor, will, delight, pleasure, good will; see on Ps. v. 12. On exalting the horn, see on Ps. lxxv. 4, 5. Alexander: "God is at once their mighty ornament and their glorious protection."

18. For the LORD is our defence; and the Holy One of Israel is our King. The Chaldee: For our defences are of the Lord, even of the Lord the Holy One of Israel our king; margin: Our shield is of the LORD and our king is of the Holy One of Israel; Hammond says we must render it thus; Edwards: For to Jehovah belongs our shield, and to the Holy One of Israel our king; Alexander: "Our protectors are themselves protected by Jehovah." In defending our defenders, God defends us. De- fence, shield, buckler; see on Ps. iii. 3; vii. 10. On the Holy One of Israel, see on Ps. lxxi. 22. Here follows an argument built on God's former engagements.

19. Then thou spakest in vision to thy Holy One. Sixty-three of Kennicott's and seventy-one of De Rossi's manuscripts read "holy ones." The Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, church of England, Calvin, Jebb, Street and Hengstenberg all use the plural. If we follow these authorities, what holy ones are intended? First, Samuel, 1 Sam. xiii. 13-15; xv. 26-28; xvi. 1, 12; then Nathan, 2 Sam. vii. 12-17. The revelation to Nathan was in vision. Compare 1 Chron. xvii. 15. From the fact that Gad is twice called David's seer, 2 Sam. xxiv. 11; 1 Chron. xxi. 9, some have thought he was also one to whom Jehovah gave an oracle on this matter. It may be so, but we find no record of it. Yet from Acts iii. 24, we are warranted in giving a very wide extension to the declaration: "All the prophets from Samuel, and those that follow after, as many as have spoken, have likewise foretold of these days." Compare Luke xxiv. 27; Acts x. 43; xxvi. 22; Rom. i. 2; iii. 21; Heb. i. 1; 1 Pet. i. 10; Rev. xix. 10. Pool says part of the message was delivered to Samuel, and part to Nathan. By holy ones some understand the church at large. See 2 Sam. vii. 10; 1 Chron. xvii. 9. If we take holy one in the singular, it refers to Samuel, to whom the first revelation respecting David's throne was made, or to Nathan, to whom a fuller revelation on that subject was granted, or to David, addressed through these prophets. But from the fact that in many editions Holy One is printed in capitals, it is evident that editors have thought that it refers to Christ himself, perhaps under the type of David. Respectable commentators so expound the place. That God spoke to his Son many glorious things before his incarnation we certainly know, Ps. ii. 7; xlv. 6; Heb. i. 8; Ps. cx. 1; Isa. xlix. 5-12. Compare Pr. viii. 22-31. That after his birth Christ found the visions of the prophets full of him, we also know. For then Calvin has long since, or in old time. These modes of explanation do not so conflict as to make any real contrariety of doctrine. And saidst, I have laid help upon one that is mighty; I have exalted one chosen out of the people. Mighty, valiant, strong; applied to Nimrod as a hunter, Gen. x. 9; to great warriors, as Josh. i. 14; vi. 2; to rich men, 2 Kings xv. 20; to chief men high in authority, Ezra vii. 28; to God himself, Deut. x. 17; Jer. xxxii. 18; to Christ, Ps. xxiv. 8; xlv. 3; Isa. ix. 6; to David, 2 Sam. xvii. 10. Here it refers to David as the type of Christ, or to Christ himself as a deliverer. Perhaps it is best to apply it to David himself as the first in the throne with promise of perpetual succession. This mighty one was chosen. See v. 3. Compare Deut. xxxii. 25; Ecc. xi. 9, where it is rendered young man. Alexander: "Chosen has here its strict sense, but not without allusion to its specific use as signifying a young warrior." Both David and Christ are called the chosen of God.

20. I have found David my servant; with my holy oil have I anointed him. This gives us the true exposition of the mighty and chosen one of v. 19, but it does not deny the typical character of David. When God rejected Saul, he found David, whom Samuel anointed. The history of that affair is given in 1 Sam. xvi. 1-13, where we are told too of God's Spirit resting on David. David was thrice anointed, 1 Sam. xvi. 13; 2 Sam. ii. 7; v. 3. On anointing with oil, see on Ps. ii. 2; xlv. 7. Compare Isa. lxi. 3; Luke iv. 16-22; Heb. i. 9; 1 John ii. 20, 27.

21. With whom my hand shall be established: mine arm also shall strengthen him. Help and assistance are commonly afforded by the arm or hand. The figure is very old, Gen. xlix. 24. The meaning is, God will permanently aid him. How manifestly God was with David is matter of history, 1 Sam. xviii. 12, 14; 2 Sam. v. 10.

22. The enemy shall not exact upon him. Many render it: The enemy shall not prevail against him, q. d., He may have enemies, but they shall effect nothing. For exact Edwards and Hengstenberg have oppress; Jebb, do violence; Alexander, ver. Nor the son of wickedness afflict him. To David Saul was the son of wickedness, who got no decisive advantage and finally failed, 2 Sam. iii. 1. There is an evident allusion in the verse to 2 Sam. vii. 10; 1 Chron. xvii. 9. Referring to the antitype, see Matt. iv. 1-10; John xiv. 30; xvii. 12.

23. I will beat down his foes before his face, and plague them that hate him. The passage most nearly parallel is 2 Sam. xxii. 40-44. Beat down, stamp, break in pieces, crush, smite, discomfit, destroy. Plague, as he did Egypt, Josh. xxiv. 5; smite, as he did Nabal, 1 Sam. xxv. 38; strike, as he did David's child, 2 Sam. xii. 15; in all which places we have the same verb. "David was never overthrown." Neither was Christ.

24. But my faithfulness and my mercy shall be with him. Faithfulness and mercy as in v. 1. Compare vv. 1-5, 28, 33-35. And in my name shall his horn be exalted. In my name, by my authority and to my glory. On exalting the horn, see on Ps. lxxv. 4, 5. How God exalted both David and Christ is fully declared, 1 Chron. xvii. 7; Rom. i. 4; Phil. ii. 9-11.

25. I will set his hand also in the sea, and his right hand in the rivers; i. e., I will give him power in distant lands. Patrick: "On one hand he shall conquer the Philistines and those that live upon the coast of the sea (2 Sam. viii. 1), and on the other hand the Syrians as far as Tigris and Euphrates, 2 Sam. viii. 9; x. 16, 19." Compare 1 Chron. xiv. 17; 1 Kings iv. 21. So far as the reference is to the spiritual David, compare Ps. lxxii. 8-11; lxxx. 11. Alexander: "The watery parts of the earth are put for the whole."

26. He shall cry unto me, Thou art my Father, my God, and the Rock of my salvation. I find no case in which David ever called God Father, but in John's Gospel alone there are recorded more than sixty instances in which Christ did it. True, to claim God as father is to ask his care and protection. This David did often, but not in the language of this verse. So far as the word Father is concerned, no doubt the fundamental passage in 2 Sam. vii. 14, is referred to. See also 1 Chron. xxii. 10. Both David and Christ used the language, My God. On the use of the title, My Rock, see on Ps. xviii. 2, 31. The Rock of my salvation is the Rock that saves me.

27. Also I will make him my firstborn, higher than the kings of the earth. The first-born had peculiar privileges. Ordinarily he had his father's chief blessing, and succeeded to the office and honors of the father, 2 Chron. xxi. 3. He had also a double portion of the inheritance, Deut. xxi. 15-17. Hence the use of the term firstborn as chief, preëminent. Thus the firstborn of the poor (Isa. xiv. 30) are those who are very poor and wretched; Cresswell: "The poorest of the poor." And the firstborn of death, Job xviii. 13, is the most terrible kind of death. Although God gave David power and excellent majesty, even over surrounding nations, see 2 Sam. v. 11, 12; 1 Chron. xiv. 17; yet surely this prophecy never had its complete fulfilment in him, but only in Christ, who, Rom. viii. 29; Col. i. 15, 18; Heb. i. 6; xii. 23; Rev. i. 5, is no less than six times declared to be the firstborn or the firstbegotten (for the Greek word is the same.) The fulness of the Godhead dwells in him bodily. He is the first and only one who ever rose from the dead by his own power. He is Prophet, Priest and King. He is sole Mediator, the firstborn among many brethren. In all things he has the preëminence. He is fitly worshipped by all creatures. The church is his by purchase. By covenant He has perfect dominion over all the kings of the earth, and over all angels holy and fallen, Pr. viii. 15, 16; Dan. ii. 21; Mark i. 27; Eph. i. 20, 21; Col. ii. 10, 15; Phil. ii. 9-11. In a sense was this verse fulfilled in David, but very gloriously in Christ.

28. My mercy will I keep for him for evermore. Compare 2 Sam. vii. 15; Isa. lv. 3. God is well pleased in Christ and has done the most amazing things to prove it. He twice said so in a majestic voice from heaven; he raised him from the dead; he set him at his own right hand. And my covenant shall stand fast with him. In no case has God ever broken covenant. He cannot deceive. He cannot lie, Ps. cxi. 5, 9. With David as king and as type of Christ the assurance of his keeping covenant is very strong, vv. 3, 34; 2 Sam. xxiii. 5; Jer. xxxiii. 20, 21.

29. His seed will I make to endure for ever, and his throne as the days of heaven. Seed, as in vv. 4, 36. It may mean posterity generally, David's successors, Christ, or the long line of his people. Throne, as in vv. 4, 14, 36, 44. See 2 Sam. vii. 12. Alexander: "The throne of David and the throne of his descendants are identical." For ever, to everlasting, as in Ps. ix. 5; x. 16. Days of heaven, first met with in Deut. xi. 21, meaning, in perpetuity. The stability of nature often illustrates the permanency of spiritual things; see on v. 2; Ps. lxxii. 5, 7, 17. Compare Ps. cxix. 89-91. One of Dr. Chalmers' best discourses is founded on that passage.

30. If his children forsake my law, and walk not in my judgments;

31. If they break my statutes, and keep not my commandments;

32. Then will I visit their transgressions with the rod, and their iniquity with stripes. Children, literally sons. What is here said was true of David's seed. It is true of Christ's children. In Isa. liii. 10, believers are called Christ's seed. In John xxi. 5, he calls them children. Law, as in Ps. i. 2; xix. 7. Judgments, as in Ps. x. 5; xix. 9. Statutes, as in Ps. xviii. 22. Commandments, as in Ps. xix. 8; lxxviii. 7. Transgressions, as in Ps. v. 10; xix. 13. Iniquity, as in Ps. xviii. 23; xxv. 11. Rod, as in Pr. x. 13; xxii. 15; xxiii. 13, 14. When we read of a rod of iron in Ps. ii. 9, we are reminded of an instrument of destruction. But this rod is for correction. Stripes, strokes from the rod; see 2 Sam. vii. 14. How sorely God punished the sinning descendants of David, history tells. How sorely he chastises the erring seed of his Son, Christian experience declares.

33. Nevertheless my lovingkindness will I not utterly take from him, nor suffer my faithfulness to fail. Him, not them, David as possessor of the throne, and type of Christ. If the Lord was true to David, surely to his own Son he would not be unfaithful. The nouns are the same as in v. 1. Utterly take, margin, make void.

34. My covenant I will not break, nor alter the thing that is gone out of my lips. Break, as in v. 31; there in the margin rendered profane. In v. 39, in another form it is rendered has profaned. The word means to violate, or prostitute.

35. Once have I sworn by my holiness that I will not lie unto David. Sworn, the same verb is found in vv. 3, 49, on the same subject. Compare Heb. vi. 16; see on v. 3. God's holiness is his infinite purity, which controls all his perfections. Lie, the same verb so rendered in Num. xxiii. 19.

36. His seed shall endure for ever. Seed, as in vv. 4, 29. For ever, as in vv. 1, 2, 4, 28, 37, 52. It expresses unfailling perpetuity. And his throne as the sun before me. Here and in v. 37, the stability of the course of nature again illustrates and confirms the unfailling promise of God; see on vv. 2, 29. Calvin: "If we set Christ aside, where will we find that everlasting duration of the royal throne of which mention is here made?"

37. It shall be established for ever as the moon, and as a faithful witness in heaven. David's personal power is gone from the earth. If he has living descendants, their genealogy cannot be proven; and none of them have ruled any kingdom on earth for thousands of years. But the throne here spoken of is established. The face of nature on earth is much changed; but the sun and moon remain as of old. The moon is the faithful witness in heaven. There is no reference to the bow in the clouds. That was a sign to Noah, not to David. Cresswell: "The whole passage beginning with 'I have laid help' in verse 19, to the end of verse 37, may be considered as a paraphrase of what God had said unto David (2 Sam. vii. 8, etc.) through the mouth of Nathan." If we do not so regard these verses, there is no satisfactory method of interpreting this portion of Scripture, q. d., "Thy people have long been supported by thy promises, which they have understood to mean as much as is here stated. They cannot be mistaken in following the prophets, who have said these things, which have for ages nourished the faith of thy people. Yet our difficulty is in reconciling these glorious promises with the present low and afflicted state of the kingdom." This is the common, and doubtless the correct mode of exposition. The Psalm was designed to furnish suitable thoughts to the pious when at any time the state of affairs in Israel should be such as to tempt God's people to discouragement. Alexander: "There is no need of confining this description (in v. 38 and on) to the last days of the kingdom of Judah, or to any other period of its history exclusively. If the Psalm was really composed by Ethan, as we have no sufficient ground for doubting that it was, he may have designedly so framed it as to suit any season of distress and danger, in which the theocratic sovereign seemed to be forsaken of Jehovah." Calvin says a Rabbi maintained that it was unlawful to recite this Psalm; but all Scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable.

38. But thou hast cast off and abhorred, thou hast been wroth with thine anointed. Cast off, as in Ps. xliii. 2; lxxxviii. 14; see 1 Chron. xxviii. 9. Abhorred, refused, rejected, despised, disdained, contemned. In Jer. vi. 30, the participle is reprobate; see Deut. xxxii. 19. Calvin regards the first verb as even stronger than the second. The reason of the dreadful rejection is that God had been wroth with his anointed, the actual incumbent of the throne at the time contemplated. Pool: "Thine anointed; that person and family which thou hast invested with the kingdom." Wroth, as in Ps. lxxviii. 21, 59.

39. Thou hast made void the covenant of thy servant. Made void, found only here and in Lam. ii. 7, where it is rendered abhorred. It expresses strong aversion. The covenant of thy servant is the covenant made with thy servant. Thou hast profaned his crown by casting it to the ground. Profaned, see on vv. 31, 34, where the same word is rendered break. We profane a covenant when we hold it no longer sacred. In some way God had brought the royal family and the kingdom into a very low state.

40. Thou hast broken down all his hedges: thou hast brought his strong holds to ruin. The clauses are parallel. Hedges, fences, walls. The word describes either the protection furnished to a vineyard or to a flock. The latter clause changes not the idea but the figure. Strong holds, fortresses, fortifications. It does not refer to places naturally strong, but by the art of man fenced, defenced, made strong. Both nouns may be used figuratively to represent the institutions of the country and the safeguards of the kingdom. The destruction may refer to the desolation made by an invasion of the land. Broken down, broken in, scattered. Ruin, destruction, dismay, terror. Hengstenberg: "Thou causest his fortifications to be terrified before the enemy, and to be removed."

41. All that pass by the way spoil him. Spoil, rifle, meaning rob, plunder, devastate. He is a reproach to his neighbors. Reproach, shame, rebuke, commonly as here; see on Ps. xv. 3. Passers by and neighbors cried, "Is this the anointed of the Lord? Is this the everlasting family and kingdom? Is this that king whose throne was to continue as long as the sun and moon shall endure?"

42. Thou hast set up the right hand of his adversaries; thou hast made all his enemies to rejoice. Adversaries, in Ps. iii. 1, they that trouble me; in v. 23, foes. Enemies, uniformly rendered as in vv. 10, 22, 51. To set up the right hand is to exalt the power. The perplexity of the Psalmist is in reconciling this state of things with what was promised in 2 Sam. vii.

43. Thou hast also turned the edge of his sword. Turned, turned away, withdrawn. The meaning is, Thou hast rendered powerless the sword, the usual means both of attack and of defence. Compare 2 Sam. i. 22. Hengstenberg: "The sword returns back ashamed, when it does not pierce." And hast not made him to stand in the battle. Several old versions: Hast not assisted him in battle. See Ps. xviii. 34, 39. The verb is in the future. God had been against Israel and it was feared he would continue to be so.

44. Thou hast made his glory to cease, and cast his throne down to the ground. Glory, margin brightness, meaning royal majesty, the splendor of a king. Cast down; it describes an act of sudden violence, which inspired alarm.

45. The days of his youth hast thou shortened. Some think they find the fulfilment of this clause in the case of Jehoiachin, 2 Kings xxiv. 8; some in the case of Ahaz, 2 Chron. xxviii. 1; and some, in the case of other kings, whose life and reign were short. But the language would rather indicate premature decay and loss of vigor, than early death. The Psalmist is probably not speaking so much of any particular man, as of the kingdom represented by the throne. Pool: "The youthful and flourishing state of David's kingdom was very short, and reached not beyond his next successor." Calvin: "His complaint then amounts to this, That God caused the kingdom to wax old, and finally to decay, before it reached a state of complete maturity." Thou hast covered him with shame. Shame, uniformly rendered; it describes the deep mortification arising from a public and disastrous failure in building up the throne of David. Covered him, literally covered upon him, we would say, covered him all over.

46. How long LORD? Literally, Until when? See on Ps. iv. 2; vi. 3; xiii. 1. Wilt thou hide thyself forever? The reference doubtless is to Deut. xxxi. 18; xxxii. 20. See on Ps. xiii. 1. Shall thy wrath burn like fire? Wrath, as in Ps. vi. 1; lxxxviii. 7. Burn, in Ps. ii. 12, is kindled. There may be an allusion to Num. xi. 1, 3, where the same word is found. The displeasure of God is a consuming fire.

47. Remember how short my time is. Chaldee: Remember that I was made of dust; Arabic: Remember what my state is; Ainsworth: O call thou to remembrance how transitory I am; Edwards: Remember of what short duration I am; margin: Remember how transitory I am. Hengstenberg calls Ps. xxxix. 5, the fundamental passage. See Ps. cxix. 84; Job vii. 7; x. 9; xiv. 1; 1 Cor. vii. 29-31. Wherefore hast thou made all men in vain? Many die before they have lived a year. The longest life is a vapor. The pursuits of men are low. Their work terribly lacks stability. Even the greatest men are not able to perform their enterprises. They die just as they begin to live. To the eye of sense and reason, without light from heaven, it looks very much as if even the greatest families, yea, and all the sons of Adam were made for nothing, for vanity.

48. What man is he that liveth, and shall not see death? Not one. For special reasons Enoch and Elijah were translated; but till the end of the world no other case shall occur. The form of interrogation is the strongest negation. Shall he deliver his soul from the hand of the grave? Soul, here it means life. But if one cannot save his life, surely he cannot save his soul. Hand, here and often used for power. Grave, pit, hell, see on Ps. vi. 5; ix. 17; xviii. 5.

49. LORD, where are thy former lovingkindnesses, which thou swearest unto David in thy truth? Lovingkindnesses, see on v. 1. Swearest, see on v. 35. Truth, rendered faithfulness six times in this Psalm.

50. Remember, LORD, the reproach of thy servants; how I do bear in my bosom the reproach of all the mighty people. The above is a better rendering of the verse than any modern author has suggested. It gives the whole sense. Reproach, as in v. 41. Compare Ps. lxix. 9, with this and the next verse. Mighty, or many. People, plural, nations.

51. Wherewith thine enemies have reproached, O LORD; wherewith they have reproached the footsteps of thine anointed. Anointed, as in v. 38. Footsteps, in Ps. xlix. 5, and elsewhere heels. They dogged his footsteps with reproaches. The Chaldee reads: "Thy enemies have reproached the slowness of the footsteps of the feet of thy Messiah, O Lord." That is, men cried out, Where is the promise of his coming?

52. Blessed be the LORD for evermore. Blessed, praised, not the word in Ps. i. 1, but that in Ps. v. 12; xviii. 46. Amen, and amen. See on Ps. xli. 13; lxxii. 19. Those, who divide the Psalter into five books, end the third book here.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Wisdom and piety do not exempt us from sore trials. The author of the preceding Psalm was filled with grief about his personal affairs. His brother, who wrote this Psalm, is sore amazed with the public calamities of his times. So we all have our own burdens. Blessed is he, who has kind friends to sympathize with him in his calamities. But there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother. His name in the church has long been The Beloved.

2. Whatever our own state, or that of public affairs may be, let us sing of God's glorious attributes. No darkness in our sky can excuse us from making known his perfections, vv. 1, 2, 14, 24, 28, 33, 49. We greatly wrong our own souls when we decline the religious use of song; because, "1. This is the fittest way to express joy for anything. 2. It will be best inculcated in this way. 3. It will be more easily remembered. 4. It will be more easily delivered to others, in order to be remembered." Many a sorrowing child of God has had his gloom, like the evil spirit of Saul, quite removed by the harp of David.

3. Mercy's work, though to us sometimes apparently slow, is very sure and glorious, vv. 2-4. God's plans reach from an eternity past to an eternity to come. Let him take his own time.

4. The doctrine of election is taught in the Old Testament as well as in the New, v. 3. God chose David not for his stature. Saul was much taller. David's own brother's had a better appearance. God chose him because he would. If the chosen here is Christ, then above all others is he God's elect, Isa. xlii. 1; 1 Pet. ii. 6.

5. Whatever delays and hindrances the cause of God may seem to meet withal, the final issue and consummation of all things thereto pertaining shall be very glorious, v. 4.

6. If God had gone on governing the world in wisdom and goodness, this would have been love and condescension demanding lively gratitude. But how shall we sufficiently praise him for his amazing grace in giving us his word, in entering into covenant with us, and in confirming that engagement with an oath? vv. 3, 28, 34, 35, 49. Arnd: "O blessed people, for whose sake God swears! O miserable people, who will not believe God even when he swears!"

7. Whatever unbelief and self-will may suggest to men but partially sanctified on earth respecting God's ways and wonders, saints and angels in the heavens are well pleased with all his plans and all his proceedings, v. 5. Whatever jealousies and murmurings are found in remote parts of God's dominions respecting his course and ways, in his own immediate family and among his constant attendants all is praise and adoration. "God's chief praise from all holy beings in heaven and earth arises from the covenant of grace."

8. We greatly sin against God, we fly in the face of Scripture, and we bring great affliction on ourselves by forming even in our minds any likeness of God, or by comparing him to anything we ever saw or conceived. He is as incomparable as he is immutable, v. 6. He is infinitely farther above the tallest archangel than that archangel is above a worm.

9. If God is greatly to be feared even by saints and angels in glory, surely all irreverence in his worship on earth must be infinitely offensive to him, v. 7. That under the Gospel as truly as under the law we must exercise godly fear is clear from Heb. xii. 28. Henry: "A holy awe of God must fall upon us, and fill us, in all our approaches to God, even in secret, to which something may very well be added by the solemnity of public assemblies."

10. Neither in our theology, nor in our devotions can we get on pleasantly without a constant recurrence to the might, the strength, the almightiness of God, vv. 8-13. "The incomparable excellence of God shines out in his efficiency in creation and providence." The breaking of Rahab in pieces shows what he can and will do, when necessary to preserve his people. Omnipotence can do any desirable thing. It raises and it calms the sea; it covers whole nations with mourning; it crushes the most powerful armies; it grasps creation; it balances the universe; it doeth all things.

11. How futile are all attempts to subvert the government of God. Its pillars are as firm as the pillars of heaven, v. 14. Yea, heaven and earth may pass away, but God's throne shall stand. It is built on four principles, which cannot fail because they are founded in the divine nature, viz:

- "1. Justice, which defends his subjects, and does every one right.
- "2. Judgment, which restrains rebels, and keeps off injuries.
- "3. Mercy, which shows compassion, pardons, supports the weak.
- "4. Truth, that performs whatsoever he promiseth."

How can such a government be subverted? The universe of creatures cannot even weaken it. Calvin: "The ornaments with which God is invested, instead of being a robe of purple, a diadem, or a sceptre, are, that he is the righteous and impartial Judge of the world, a merciful Father, and a faithful protector of his people."

12. It is an unspeakable blessing to be a living member of the church of God under any dispensation and under any afflictions, vv. 15-18. Even the old Jewish feasts introduced by blowing trumpets were full of significancy, somewhat even then understood by the pious. That dispensation was glorious, Rom. iii. 2; 2 Cor. iii. 10. But what was the joyful sound of those days compared with the clarion trumpet of a Gospel fully revealed? The completeness of that righteousness, in which believers are exalted is itself matter of wonder, love and praise in heaven and in earth. We ever have 'just and solid causes of joy, yet in God alone,' in his righteousness alone, in his grace and wisdom and power alone. Luther: "A heavenly righteousness is preached by the Gospel, which is not placed in us, or in any worthiness or merit of ours; but is out of us, and is the righteousness of Christ, and is imputed, for Christ's sake, unto all that believe in him." How guilty must those be who despise such grace!

13. Though God chooses whom he will, he yet chooses fit instruments and agents to carry on his work; or he makes them fit before he assigns to them their office, vv. 19, 20. David was no fool, nor was he a chicken-hearted man. David was chosen, not because he deserved the post; but because he was fit for it, 1 Sam. xvi. 7.

14. If we would be kings and priests unto God, we must seek the anointing of the Holy Ghost, v. 20.

15. If God will establish his hand with any man, and strengthen him, why should he despair of accomplishing any work, to which he can possibly be called? v. 21. Omnipotence, girding weakness itself, will make it irresistible.

16. If God will take our enemies in hand, we need not give ourselves much trouble about them, vv. 22, 23. He can manage them without our aid.

17. However depressed in spirits, or in worldly condition believers may be, God can lift them up above all their enemies and adversities, and, when the right time comes, he will surely do it, vv. 24-27. Of this he has given much assurance in the history of David, and yet more in the exaltation of our Redeemer.

18. We need entertain no fears respecting the perpetuity and glory of Christ's kingdom. It shall stand. It shall shine, vv. 29, 33, 36, 37. O yes! it shall stand forever. That the great burden of this Psalm is Messiah, all sound expositors admit. Luther: "This is a remarkable prophecy concerning Christ and his kingdom;" Horne: "The promise, covenant, and oath of God, which he declareth shall never fail. . . They relate to Christ;" Morison: "It was never intended that the literal seed of David should hold a perpetual empire; and it was undoubtedly of Messiah, as David's Lord, that the Spirit witnessed, when he spoke of his seed being established forever, and of his throne being perpetuated to the days of eternity;" Nicolson: "David in type, but Christ in the anti-type."

19. God loves his people too well and too wisely not to make them smart for their sins, vv. 30-32. The covenant as much secures needful chastisement as timely victory. Calvin: "As it is profitable for men to be subjected to divine correction, God does not promise that he will allow them to escape unpunished, which would be to encourage them in their sins;" Henry: "Afflictions are not only consistent with covenant-love, but to the people of God they flow from it;" Dickson: "The Lord alloweth not sin in his own children more than in others."

20. It is natural, perhaps it is unavoidable and undesirable, that we should be wholly unaffected with the appearances of things around us, vv. 38-50. This inspired Psalmist was himself deeply distressed by the seeming failure of the covenant with David. Nor is it wicked to tell God our perplexities, and plead for speedy relief. It is only when grief becomes inordinate, when pride arrogantly determines what is the right time and method of deliverance, or when unbelief charges God with unfaithfulness, that we sin against him in lamenting our afflictions. Men are not angels. The spirits of just men are not in this life made perfect in knowledge or anything else. Let us plead for a better insight into the nature of the covenant, and the ends of the discipline we are made to undergo. Let us plead the unchangeableness of divine grace and of the divine faithfulness.

21. Considering how weak the faith of most converted men is, and how strong their temptations are, it is a marvel that they do not oftener fall into deep dejection, and very much give up hope, v. 39. Because the government of the world is God's, and because the mind of man is feeble, it results of necessity that nearly the whole course of providence should be dark. This greatly tempts our faith, which would utterly fail, if it were not for the intercession of Christ, Luke xxii. 31, 32. It is sad indeed when we see not how God's dealings are consistent with his promise. Yet in their saddest moments the saints would not take a thousand worlds for the hope which remains to them. Henry: "Thrones and crowns are tottering things, and are often laid in the dust, but there is a crown of glory reserved for Christ's spiritual seed, which fadeth not away." The hope of that maketh not ashamed.

22. It is appalling to live in a time of general desolation of church or state, vv. 40-45. Till a good man knows by experience, history gives him almost no conception of the misery and crime which then appear on every hand. The badges and insignia of authority are despised, the fastnesses of society loosened, malice with her minions and myrmidons slandering and beleaguering all good men, the laws of property set aside, the throne of iniquity framing mischief by a law, the meanest men laughing at the miseries of the most honorable, the finger of scorn pointed at all who do not join in noisy clamor for blood and persecution, vile men exalted to power, fools being counsellors and wise men pronounced to be behind the times, fundamental laws swept away in a moment, strangers and enemies laughing to scorn, wise plans of adjustment and pacification wholly despised, the glory of order and of religion utterly obscured, men fasting to smite with the fist of wickedness, and giving thanks for events which fill a thousand dwellings with howling. It is not strange that such scenes should make men old before they have reached their prime, or send them for shame to premature graves. But when, as Ethan, they can bring their case before the Lord, they may, like him, conclude their meditation with a doxology.

23. Success in war depends on the Almighty, v. 43. Yet mere success does not prove that we have God's approbation. He may let the wrong prosper for a considerable time, Ecc. v. 8; Isa. x. 5-15.

24. What poor creatures we are, when for a little suffering, perhaps, not running through half a lifetime, we cry out, O Lord, how long? v. 46. But blessed be God, our very feebleness will furnish an occasion to his grace in enabling us to forget our woes when they shall all be over, and we ourselves be made happy in God to all eternity.

25. If God's wrath burns so terribly, how careful we ought to be to flee from it, v. 46. Arnd: "Is it not an odd thing that when we see a fire break out we are terrified and run, and every man looks after what is his own, yet no man will be terrified at the wrath of God?"

26. It is well when the greater our straits, the stronger our cries to God for help. That is a blessed anguish, and those are good crosses, which make us the more fervent in our prayers, v. 47.

27. When we ask God to remember how short our time is, let us be careful not to forget it ourselves, v. 47. He knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust. We should not consume our days in complaint or mirth, but in glorifying God that we may enjoy him forever.

28. There must be something terribly wrong in man, else his pursuits, the brevity of his life and the manner of his departure out of it would not be as they are. Man is a little lower than the angels in his natural endowments, yet how many spend their days in factories with confined air, how many in mines hundreds of feet under ground, how many in sweeping streets, how many in sweeping chimneys, how many in prisons or in galleys. The millions toil. Every year thousands faint and fall dead through exhaustion and excessive exposure to heat and cold. Man's days are as an hand-breadth. His death is never pleasant except in the case of the believer and to the eye of faith. Verily, if there is no life beyond the present, God has made all men in vain, v. 47.

29. Death reigns, v. 48. For that no adequate cause can be found, till we search the Scriptures. They make all plain, Gen. iii. 3; Ezek. xviii. 4; Rom. v. 12-19.

30. If men are allowed to pass their lives in quiet, though it be without human applause, let them be thankful for so great a benefit. Noisy clamor, even if it be in our favor, can do us no good; but if it be against us, it may embitter our existence. Men, who affect to despise the deserved censures of their cotemporaries, are bad men. Even where reproach is foul and wicked, it has a sting, vv. 50, 51. It broke the heart of Jesus Christ, Ps. lxi. 20. It is better to be unjustly than justly blamed; and yet there is a peculiar poignancy in our grief when wantonness holds to our lips the cup of opprobrium. The most trying form of reproach is perhaps that which assails us because of our religion. The reason is that the honor of our God and Saviour is involved in such contumely, Isa. xxxvii. 23. The day is coming, when the curse shall no longer be heard by the righteous, Jude 14, 15.

31. Whatever our case may be, let us not fail in the winding up of all our meditations and conflicts to pronounce our solemn blessing on the name of Jehovah, v.

52; Job i. 21. It is as wise as it is right to "take God's part against all doubts, and disappearances of the performances of his promises," and to praise and bless him for what he is and for what he has already done for us. Let doxology abound in our worship, public and secret.

32. This Psalm was written for our learning. Let us hope in God. Tholuck: "Devout people in great affliction are neither so callous and insensible, that the stroke of the proving hand of God makes no impression upon them, nor so soft and indolent that they at once lose all their confidence. Their eyes shed tears, while joy sits enthroned on their brow."

PSALM XC.

A Prayer of Moses the man of God.

- 1 LORD, thou hast been our dwellingplace in all generations.
- 2 Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God.
- 3 Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men.
- 4 For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past, and as a watch in the night.
- 5 Thou carriest them away as with a flood; they are as a sleep: in the morning they are like grass which groweth up.
- 6 In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth.
- 7 For we are consumed by thine anger, and by thy wrath are we troubled.
- 8 Thou hast set our iniquities before thee, our secret sins in the light of thy countenance.
- 9 For all our days are passed away in thy wrath: we spend our years as a tale that is told.
- 10 The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labour and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away.
- 11 Who knoweth the power of thine anger? even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath.
- 12 So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom.
- 13 Return, O LORD, how long? and let it repent thee concerning thy servants.
- 14 O satisfy us early with thy mercy; that we may rejoice and be glad all our days.
- 15 Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, and the years wherein we have seen evil.
- 16 Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children.
- 17 And let the beauty of the LORD our God be upon us: and establish thou the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms xvii. lxxxvi. That Moses is the author of this ode is admitted by all the ancient versions, by Luther, Calvin, Fabritius, Piscator, Amesius, Venema, Diodati, Pool, Henry, Gill, Hammond, Jebb, Fry, Peters, Morison, Dickson, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander. Moses is called The man of God, first in Deut. xxxiii. 1, B. C. 1451; then six years later, Josh. xiv. 6; then more than nine hundred years later, Ezra iii. 2. The phrase Man of God is found in Scripture more than forty times; is often applied to Elijah and Elisha; in the pastoral epistles it designates a minister of the Gospel. Kennicott, Edwards, Clarke and several German Commentators urge that this ode could not have been written by that Moses, who was buried in Horeb. Against its Mosaic authorship, Clarke urges the longevity of Moses, Aaron, Miriam and Caleb. But himself gives us a long list of moderns, who attained a great age. The Pentateuch itself shows that the above cases were exceptions to the general rule; and it is idle to claim that the composition is of a later date than the passage through the wilderness. Moses wrote two other songs remarkable for sublimity. One is found in Ex. xv. 1-19. That is emphatically The song of Moses. It is the oldest piece of poetry extant. He also wrote that contained in Deut. xxxii. 1-43. It abounds both in the beautiful and the sublime. It is forty years later than the former. He pronounced it in the presence of Israel, and followed it by a short exhortation. It was his farewell to his people. This Psalm differs from both his other compositions. It is not certain when he wrote it. Some think it was written at the time of the painful events recorded in Num. xiv. That would give its date after Israel came out of Egypt. Others suppose it was written about thirty-eight years later, near the close of Moses' life, when he had seen the dreadful sentence in Nu. xiv. 22, 23, carried into execution on nearly all his cotemporaries, and was himself about to leave the world. This is perhaps the more probable. This is a very mournful composition. The church of England has incorporated it into her funeral service. Many pastors read it at burials. Tholuck styles it, "A beautiful song, replete with solemnity and sadness, as hearty as it is solemn." Morison: "In all ages of the church this Psalm must be regarded as a sublime meditation of the Spirit upon man's misery, mortality, and sinfulness." Scott: "The sentiments of this Psalm are never unsuitable to our situation in this world." Luther thinks that Moses here "teaches what is the origin and cause of death, to which the whole human race is subject, and the reason why so horrible a punishment was inflicted on the whole race of mortals." Scott dates it B. C. 1460; Clarke: "This Psalm was doubtless composed during or after the captivity." The names of the Almighty found in it are Elohim God, Jehovah LORD and El God, on which respectively see on Ps. iii. 3; i. 2; v. 4.

1. LORD, thou hast been our dwellingplace in all generations. The rendering of this verse is excellent. Instead of dwellingplace the Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Deway, church of England and Edwards have refuge. But this requires the change of a letter in the Hebrew. The word in the received text never signifies refuge, but abode, as of Gôd, Deut. xxvi. 15; of man, 1 Chron. iv. 41; of beasts, Jer. ix. 11. As all pious men confess themselves strangers and pilgrims, they might fitly use this language; but to the Israelites in the wilderness it was very appropriate. From the day that Abram, at the age of seventy-five years, left Haran till his death, he had no fixed dwelling. Isaac and Jacob were no less unsettled. Even when in Canaan, they and the patriarchs were mere sojourners. In Egypt their descendants were strangers in a land that was not theirs, and were afflicted four hundred years, Gen. xv. 13. At the writing of this Psalm they had been wanderers in the desert, and their journey was not yet ended. Yet all this time Jehovah himself had been their habitation. Only one of his perfections is distinctly mentioned. But one divine attribute implies all the rest. To his servants God has been a home in all generations, literally, in generation and generation; see on Ps. x. 6; lxxxv. 5; lxxxix. 1, 4. Though his people had sinned against him, he had not cast them out.

2. Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, thou art God. Though inspired men speak of nothing in creation as having more antiquity or permanency than the mountains, Gen. xlix. 26; Hab. iii. 6, yet we are here informed that our world dates not from eternity, but had a birth, an origin. Both the verbs, brought forth and formed, so teach. The earth, in Gen. i. 1, and often, put in contrast to heaven. World, in Pr. viii. 31, habitable part of his earth; commonly world; it always means either the habitable part of the earth, or its inhabitants. Compare Ps. ix. 8; xix. 4; xevi. 13; xcviii. 9. In the Psalter God's eternity is first taught in Ps. ix. 7. Here we are told that he has a past eternity and an eternity to come. All attempts at explanation have been failures. Clarke: "This is the highest description of the eternity of God to which human language can reach." From everlasting to everlasting is a phrase found in Ps. xli. 13. God's lifetime had no beginning and can have no end. His eternity is not measured. It is without the succession of moments, hours, days, years, ages or cycles. The special design in speaking of it here is to contrast it with the brevity of man's earthly existence.

3. Thou turnest man to destruction; and sayest, Return, ye children of men. Turnest and return are different forms of the same verb. It first and twice occurs in Gen. iii. 19, "In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken: for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return." Destruction, cognate to the verb rendered has broken in Ps. lxxxix. 10. Edwards: Thou bringest weak mortals down to the dust, if thou dost but say, Return ye sons of men. There is no good reason for doubting that this is the sense of the verse. Yet four other interpretations claim some respectful notice. 1. That of Tholuck: "The generations of men change before God, as if there were but a moment between their coming and going: now he suffers one generation to pass and now another to arise." The objection to this is that in this verse the prophet is speaking not of successive generations, as in v. 1, but of man as a race. 2. Another is that God brings man very near to destruction, and then restores him to wonted health. The objection to this is that the prophet is not speaking of alternate sickness and recovery, but of man's mortality. 3. Bucer, Cocceius, Gejerus and Clarke make the latter clause teach the resurrection. But clearly the whole passage shows that Moses is not exulting in hope of the resurrection, but is mourning over the ravages of death. 4. The Doway Bible reads: Turn not man away to be brought low: and thou hast said: Be converted, O ye sons of men. To this a paraphrase is given in a note: "Suffer him not quite to perish from thee, since thou art pleased to call him to be converted to thee." By bringing man low Bellarmine understands turning him away from the light of God's countenance, and giving him over to vileness and extreme dejection: and by the latter clause he thinks it is taught that by preaching God gives the external and by his Spirit the internal call to conversion. This interpretation makes the prayer, as Bellarmine admits, to begin at v. 3, whereas there is clearly no other petition till we reach v. 12. Nor does the prophet seem to be discoursing on conversion at all, but on the brevity of human life, especially as compared with the eternity of God. Compare Ps. cxlvi. 4; Ecc. xii. 7.

4. For a thousand years in thy sight are but as yesterday when it is past. Adam and many of his descendants till the time of Noah lived nearly a thousand years; but in God's sight this was but as a day, and that not a day in the future, which sometimes seems considerable, but as yesterday when it is past. Nay, it is not only in God's sight not as much as a day seems to us, when it is past; but it is not more than a part of a night: And as a watch in the night. In the time of Moses and for more than a thousand years after, the Jews divided the night into three watches. Compare Ex. xiv. 24; Judges vii. 19. But during our Saviour's life on earth they had after the manner of the Romans, four watches, Matt. xiv. 25; Mark vi. 48. A watch in the night, and that spent in sleep, what is it, when it is past? So is human life compared to God's eternity.

5. Thou carriest them away as with a flood; they are as a sleep. The first truth here brought to light is that men are taken out of life in great numbers and with great rapidity. Several scholars notice the force of the first verb in this clause, to carry away as with a violent storm followed by a torrent. The verb is found only here, and in another form in Psalm lxxvii. 17, "The clouds poured out water." Luther: "It is a fine full figure, by which is illustrated how the whole human family is driven away, as when a sweeping torrent of rain carries everything before it, one race or generation after another is hurried away like a roaring flood;" Calvin: "I do not limit the expression to calamities of a more grievous kind, but consider that death is simply compared in general to a flood." There is some uncertainty as to the design of Moses in saying they are as a sleep. Does it relate to men living? or to men dead? to life? or to death? If to men living, then the meaning of the prophet is that life itself is like a sleep. Thus many explain it. Morison: "It is as a sleep which is soon disturbed, and from which when we awake we seem unconscious of the period of time which has elapsed;" Clarke: "The whole of life is like a sleep or a dream. The eternal world is real; all here is either shadowy or representative." Although human life is in Scripture compared to a dream, (Job xx. 8; Ps. lxxiii. 20; Isa. xxix. 7,) yet where is it compared to a sleep? except in the case of the sluggard, Pr. vi. 9, 10; xxiv. 33; xix. 15. But in the sacred writings death is often compared to sleep, 1 Kings i. 21; Ps. xiii. 3; Jer. li. 39, 57; Dan. xii. 2; John xi. 11; 1 Cor. xi. 30. If this is the correct view, then the meaning is that the dead are as effectually removed from the affairs of life as if they were sunk in sleep. They have no business on earth. This exposition is suggested with much diffidence. It has little or no support from authority. If, as some assert, the word rendered sleep also means dream, then indeed there would be a good foundation for the common interpretation. But in the English version the word is never so rendered. That rendered dream is wholly different. In the morning they are like grass, which groweth up.

6. In the morning it flourisheth, and groweth up; in the evening it is cut down, and withereth. Grass, as in Ps. xxxvii. 2; ciii. 15; civ. 14; cxxix. 6; cxlvii. 8. In Ps. xxxvii. 2, grass is applied to the wicked; here and elsewhere to all men, Ps. ciii. 15, 16; Isa. xl. 6, 7, 8. Calvin: "It makes little difference as to the sense of the text, whether we make grass or each man the nominative to the verbs." Accordingly Hengstenberg translates: In the morning he blooms and—perishes, in the evening he is cut down and withers. Flourisheth, in Isa. xxvii. 6, blossom; in Num. xvii. 8, bloomed; in the Psalms always rendered as here. Cut down, expressing violent excision. In Ps. lviii. 7, one form of it is rendered cut in pieces.

7. For we are consumed by thine anger, and by thy wrath are we troubled. Consumed, in another form in v. 9, spend; often as here; in the active form made an end. Troubled, commonly so; also amazed, affrighted, sore vexed; see on Ps. vi. 2, 3, 10. Anger, in Ps. ii. 5, 12, wrath. Wrath, in Ps. vi. 1, hot displeasure; often as here, and frequently fury. This verse reveals the awful secret, not before announced in this prayer, that death is penal. Great numbers of the Israelites in the wilderness perished by God's wrath breaking forth in the most terrible manner and in extraordinary judgments. Wrath is felt in consequence of man's guilt:

8. Thou hast set our iniquities before thee, our secret sins in the light of thy countenance. The clauses are closely parallel. Set, put, appointed, marked, Ps. viii. 6; lxxxviii. 8; Gen. iv. 25. Iniquity, uniformly rendered. Secret; sins are secret only to man, never to God. He knows them all. Verse 7 said death was penal. This tells us why God is displeased. It is for sin. The whole story is told in Gen. ii. 17; Ps. li. 5; Ezek. xviii. 4; Rom. v. 12–19. We deserve our sufferings. We deserve worse than ever befalls us in this world. We may not deserve ill of man; but we all deserve wrath from God, and God has a right to use man as his sword.

9. For all our days are passed away in thy wrath. Wrath, once rendered anger, twice rage; see on Ps. vii. 6; found also in v. 11. Every day has its pang expressive of God's displeasure, not the less terrible because just. We spend our years as a tale that is told. Spend, literally, have consumed, see on v. 7. Tale, margin, meditation. In Ezek. ii. 10, the same word is rendered mourning. Calvin: We have spent our years as it were a thought. Many substantially agree with him; others, as swift as thought; others, as a phantasm; church of England, Piscator, Jebb, Horsley, Fry and Green concur in the English version; most of the ancient versions, like a spider, or like the spider's web. Clarke differs from all: We consume our years like a groan. He explains. "We live a dying, whining, complaining life; and at last a groan is its termination! How amazingly expressive!" This reminds one of Thomas Watson's saying: "We come into the world with a cry, and we go out of it with a groan." All agree that the comparison is intended to suggest the shortness and vanity of our present life. Some give the additional idea of misery.

10. The days of our years are threescore years and ten; and if by reason of strength they be fourscore years, yet is their strength labor and sorrow; for it is soon cut off, and we fly away. This verse has an affecting illustration in the case of Barzillai, 2 Sam. xix. 34, 35. In Eccle. xii. 1-7, we find a highly poetical description of the infirmities of old age, forming a striking comment on this verse. There is force in uniting days and years in the same sentence. It reminds us that years are but as days, and that our lifetime may be counted by days as well as by years. See Gen. xxv. 7; xlvii. 9, 28. In this verse are two words rendered strength. The former strictly signifies might, the latter, pride and is found only here. Here it seems to mean that of which we are proud, viz., our vigor. Labor and sorrow, says Calvin, are here put for inconveniences and afflictions. Many read toil and vanity; Hengstenberg, suffering and wickedness; Alexander, trouble and mischief. Labor, in Ps. vii. 14, mischief; in Ps. xxv. 18, pain; in Ps. lxxiii. 5, trouble; in Prov. xxxi. 7, misery; in Job iii. 10, sorrow; in Isa. x. 1, grievousness; in Isa. liii. 11, travail. Sorrow, vanity, affliction, mischief. Each of these words signifies evil, natural or moral, according to the connection, in which it is used. Here the prophet is speaking of the miseries of old age. But even ten years added to the seventy are soon cut off, and we fly away or faint, or become weary of existence itself. Compare 1 Sam. xiv. 28, 31; 2 Sam. xxi. 15. Perhaps the common version is best. Compare Ps. xviii. 10; Isa. vi. 2; Prov. xxiii. 5, where the same verb is rendered fly, or fly away.

11. Who knoweth the power of thine anger? Power, often rendered strength, see on Ps. viii. 2. Anger, as in v. 7. Who knoweth? who is duly sensible of its dreadfulness? who thinks, and feels, and acts, as he should in view of it? Even according to thy fear, so is thy wrath. Wrath, as in v. 9; Ps. lxxxv. 3. Several interpretations are suggested: 1. Men are chastened and made to feel God's judgments in proportion to their piety or holy fear. Judgment begins at the house of God, 1 Pet. iv. 17. That is a truth, but there is no fitness in introducing it here. 2. A proper fear of God is necessary to make us duly feel his wrath. The wicked resist and rebel against its inflictions, because they do not fear God aright. But the righteous tremble before him. This is a truth, whether it is taught here or not. 3. Who is there that fears thy wrath in such measure as it ought reasonably to be dreaded? q. d., No man has an adequate sense of thy terrible displeasure. 4. Who has such a habitual apprehension and memory of thy wrath as true piety would certainly produce? 5. Dreadful as are the effects of God's displeasure in this life, and much as we fear them, they are still more terrible in the world to come. The difficulty is in getting, by the laws of grammatical construction, such a sense from any correct rendering of the clause. 6. Others make the whole verse a lamentation over human insensibility with a prayer that it may be different with us. Leaving the rendering as it is in the common version, the best interpretation is the most obvious: viz., That God's wrath is as terrible as any man apprehends it to be. God's wrath is according to the terror, which fills men's hearts. Pool: "These fears of the deity are not vain bugbears, and the effects of ignorance and folly or superstition . . . but are just and built upon solid grounds, and justified by the terrible effects of thy wrath upon mankind." Henry: "God's wrath is equal to the apprehensions, which the most thoughtful, serious people have of it."

12. So teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Various attempts have been made at a better rendering of this verse, but they do not claim particular notice. The common version gives the sense and is substantially supported by the best authorities. Dimock correctly shows that on an average not less than fifteen thousand adults must have died annually in the wilderness. One would think such fearful mortality would have impressed the whole nation, but it did not. God's Spirit alone can give a heart of wisdom. Calvin: "Even he, who is most skilful in arithmetic, and who can precisely and accurately understand and investigate millions of millions, is nevertheless unable to count fourscore years in his own life. It is surely a monstrous thing that men can measure all distances without themselves, that they know how many feet the moon is distant from the centre of the earth, what space there is between the different planets; and, in short, that they can measure all the dimensions both of heaven and earth; while yet they cannot number threescore and ten years in their own case. It is therefore evident that Moses had good reason to beseech God for ability to perform what requires a wisdom which is very rare among mankind." Tholuck: "How touching is this humble prayer for true wisdom in the mouth of the much-tried lawgiver." It is a clear confession that without divine grace we are utterly foolish concerning the plainest things.

13. Return, O LORD, how long? Return, as in v. 3 and Ps. lxxx. 14. How long? See on Ps. vi. 3. And let it repent thee concerning thy servants. Chaldee: Turn thyself from the evil, which thou hast spoken of thy servants. Syriac: Wilt thou not be propitious to thy servants? Calvin: Be pacified towards thy servants; Green: Be reconciled to thy servants. The common version is sustained by Piscator, Junius and Tremellius, Fabritius and Hengstenberg. Patrick's paraphrase is: "Be pleased to turn thy severity into kindness towards us." Clarke: "Be glorified rather in our salvation than in our destruction." Moses entreats the Most High to change his course of dealing with Israel, who had now wandered nearly forty years, having long felt the power of the dreadful curse recorded against them in Num. xiv. 23, 29.

14. O satisfy us early with thy mercy. Calvin: Satisfy us early with thy goodness; Edwards: Satisfy us speedily with thy goodness; Fry: Satisfy us early with thy tender love. The common version is sustained by the Septuagint, Piscator, Junius and Tremellius and Fabritius. Ainsworth thinks early is equivalent to soon "after the dark night of afflictions." Diodati thinks there is "an allusion to manna, which fell every morning in the wilderness." The petition is not carnal; but spiritual and holy, for a good end; That we may rejoice and be glad all our days. It is our duty to be glad in the Lord and rejoice in him always. The words rejoice and be glad express the highest kinds of delight and exultation. Clarke: "Let us have thy mercy soon. Let it now shine upon us, and it shall seem as the morning of our days; and we shall exult in thee all the days of our life." Moses did not expect a revocation of the oath against his generation; but he and other pious men implored the divine benignity that their hearts might not be crushed, nor their spirits fail them while suffering under God's rebukes.

15. Make us glad according to the days wherein thou hast afflicted us, and the years wherein we have seen evil. The common version is fully sustained by the Chaldee, Calvin, Junius and Tremellius, Fabritius, Hengstenberg and Alexander. Church of England: Comfort us again now after the time that thou hast plagued us; Piscator and Amesius: Make us glad, even as thou hast afflicted us many days; many years we have found evil; Edwards: Exhilarate us according to the days thou hast afflicted us; according to the years we have suffered adversity. Some of the most precious homilies and comforting discourses addressed to God's people by great and good men have been framed on the common English translation. If we are to follow that, the literal sense is, Let us have a joyful and prosperous time that shall last as long as our days and years of adversity have continued. But as God's mercy superabounds and so triumphs over judgment, the meaning is, As we have been sore and long distressed, let thy dealings with us hereafter, according to the abundance of thy love, be marked by great and long-continued mercy. The prayer was answered. The generation that grew up under those great displays of wrath and mercy in the wilderness was the best generation of Jews that ever lived. So God himself testifies, Jer. ii. 2, 3. Its influence for good was long felt among the tribes. If the Israelites had trials in the wilderness for forty years, these were followed by long centuries of amazing blessings in their own land.

16. Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children. This rendering is sustained by Calvin, Piscator, Junius and Tremellius and Fabritius. Edwards: Let thy noble works appear to thy servants; and thy glory to their children. The work God was desired to do was such as would show forth his glory. By glory Diodati understands "thy glorious power, deliverance and providence, for which thou art also praised and glorified." Calvin: "God maintains his glory by judging the world; but as nothing is more natural to him than to show himself gracious, his glory on that account is said to shine forth chiefly in his benefits." The verbs of the verse are in the future, thus expressing strong confidence and a prediction that the prayer shall be answered.

17. And let the beauty of the LORD our God be upon us. Some think the reference is to the beautiful sanctuary. But there is a beauty springing from God's blessing. It appears in a thousand ways. It made the young men at Babylon appear "fairer and fatter in flesh than all the children which did eat the portion of the king's meat," Dan. i. 15. The word beauty is found in the Psalms only here and in Ps. xxvii. 4. Calvin: "From the words glory and beauty we learn that the love of God towards us is unparalleled." It is the glory and beauty of Jehovah. And establish the work of our hands upon us; yea, the work of our hands establish thou it. Work, commonly and well so rendered. The word here seems to include much, even the whole labor of a good man's life, with its scope and aim, or the great enterprise of the life of Moses and his cotemporaries. Establish, approved by many; Venema, Confirm; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Calvin, Fry, Direct. The best men need guidance at every step. If our works are done in God's strength, according to his will and by the aid of his Spirit, they will be stable and be found unto glory and honor at the appearing of Jesus Christ. Otherwise they will be nugatory, and will be found unto shame and contempt.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. How safe and happy are the people of God! They dwell in God and God dwells in them, v. 1. All this is rendered sure and delightful by their union with Christ, John xvii. 23. The Lord is himself a tabernacle for a shadow in the day-time from the heat, and for a place of refuge, and for a covert from the storm and from rain, Isa. iv. 6. The soul needs no rest nor comfort that is not found in God through Jesus Christ. Our great error is that we do not lay fast hold on the grace and power of God. Though we be strangers and pilgrims on the earth and have no certain dwelling-place, yet in the Lord have we a habitation. Fuller: "The Israelites forbidden to enter the promised land are directed to make up their loss in God."

2. What a blessed doctrine is that of the communion of saints, v. 1. In all gene- rations God is their God, Christ their Saviour, the Spirit their Comforter. What God has done for one of his children is a pledge that he will do the same for the rest in all coming time, if it be for their good and his glory. The covenant which saves them is the same in all its provisions from the beginning to the end of the world.

3. An intelligent Christian will not be offended at mysteries in religion, but will rather adore God for them, yea, and be comforted by them, v. 2. Who can measure God's eternity, past or future? Waterland: "An eternity past puzzles all human comprehension." The Lord is the first and he is the last, Isa. xlv. 6. Henry: "Against all the grievances that arise from our own mortality, and the mortality of our friends, we may take comfort from God's immortality; we are dying creatures, and all our comforts in the world are dying comforts, but God is an ever-living God, and they shall find him so who have him for theirs." There is no higher mystery than God's eternity. Let the skeptic solve that, and he can solve anything. Luther: "Moses exhorts us to rise above time, and to look upon our life with the eyes of God, so shall we assuredly say, that all the life of man is scarcely one hour long, even though it last the longest."

4. From God's eternity we unmistakably infer his immutability. Tholuck: "It is our great consolation to know that God changes not, and that the God of our fathers is our God."

5. He who would have religion without theology would build a house without a foundation. The nature of God is the sole, solid ground on which to base our hopes for eternity, or our systems of morality. Let us not curiously pry into the inscrutable things of God. They are high as heaven, what can we know? deeper than hell, what can we do? But we must believe in God.

6. We need not waste our time in finding out the immediate causes of death. The will of God is cause enough. Nor is it difficult for him to bring it to pass. He 'turns man to destruction' by a word, v. 3. He says, "I kill and I make alive," Deut. xxxii. 39. The righteous would not put the keys of death and of hell into other hands. Horne: "How apt are we to forget both our original and our end."

7. If these things are so, one might readily overlook in a fellow-creature a greediness of time, a desire to improve every day and every hour. Where is the man that has a just sense of the shortness and uncertainty of life?

8. As we cannot comprehend the nature of God, so neither can we understand his thoughts, v. 4. Compare Isa. lv. 8, 9. Bengel thinks the amazing truth in v. 4, finds some illustration in the great wealth of some men: "As to a very rich man a thousand sovereigns are as one penny; so, to the eternal God, a thousand years are as one day." This is striking, but is it a solution? Horne supposes he casts some light upon it by saying: "All time is equal, when it is past; a thousand years, when gone, are forgotten as yesterday; and the longest life of man, to a person who looks back upon it, may appear only as three hours, or one quarter of the night." But neither is this a solution, for a thousand years to come are to God but as yesterday when it is past. Neither man nor angel fully comprehends the import of one phrase concerning God: "He inhabiteth eternity," Isa. lvii. 15.

9. As this doctrine is used by the Apostle to check the arrogant reasonings of scoffers, who proudly said, God would not bring them to any account, because the judgment was so long delayed, (2 Pet. iii. 8); so God's people may employ it to hush the risings of impatience in their own bosoms. Give God his own time, Hab. ii. 3.

10. Let us cherish rather than reject solemn reflections on the mortality of man, the vanity of his course and the shortness of his life, vv. 5, 6, 9. They may make us sad, but by the sadness of the countenance, the heart may be made better, Ecc. vii. 3. Arnd: "When thou seest a garden in blossom, it is as if God took a flower in his hand and said, Behold, this is what thou art, and thy whole life." The awful truth remains, and let us never forget it, that DEATH REIGNS. Like a flood it sweeps all before it. Our life itself is as a sleep; comparatively few awake till they enter eternity.

11. God is the author of all the woes of life and of death itself. Nor can we sufficiently account for them but by referring to his wrath, v. 7. Compare Amos iii. 6. Trouble does not spring up out of the ground. Clarke: "Death had not entered into the world, if men had not fallen from God." Luther: "It is impossible that a man be moved to fear God unless the wrath of God be revealed to him, which cannot be except through the revelation of sin."

12. In our sins and iniquities, God has full justification for all the ills he sends upon us, v. 8. A terrible secret is revealed in a few words—death by sin. No other explanation is required. No darkness can conceal our iniquities from God. His presence is all-pervading light. He never punishes without full proof. The single sin of unbelief would itself justify all the severity of God towards men.

13. Let us be anxious rather to live well than to live long. Some die old at thirty; some, young at eighty. Let us not waste our lives in idle regrets or vain wishes, vv. 9, 10.

14. Let us exceedingly fear before the Lord, v. 11. The roaring of a lion spreads alarm; the wrath of a king is as messengers of death; but the anger of God burns to the lowest hell. Compare Jer. xii. 5. What can more firmly establish the amazing insensibility and unbelief of men than the fact that they live with so little disturbance of mind, under the expressions of the wrath of God in this life, and the threatenings of his anger in the world to come?

15. Let all men labor to obtain a right estimate of human life, v. 12. Let them pray for it. Let them meditate upon it. Let them not cast away reflection, because it is painful. Especially let them waste no time in folly or in idleness.

16. True wisdom is true religion. Such wisdom is very rare. It requires the heart, v. 12. Man naturally inclines to all folly, but never to that which is good. Calvin: "What can be a greater proof of madness than to ramble about without proposing to one's self any end?" Yet this is the habit of countless multitudes.

17. It is not wicked to feel our trials, to groan under them, and to cry for deliverance from them, v. 13. We may not be impatient, nor charge God foolishly, nor use sinful measures to be rid of our distresses. But we may without any offence against God humbly ask to be rescued. It is not comely for us to form the habit of sighing and groaning when nothing is the matter. But those are foolish people, who go about chiding the sad and suffering for giving natural expression to their anguish of mind or body.

18. In our afflictions we should be specially and chiefly concerned to secure the forgiveness of sin, and plead that God may be pacified towards us, v. 13. If he is propitious, all is well.

19. But let us not be satisfied with cold or feeble desires for mercy. Let our affections be stirred within us. Let us cry mightily. The language of strong emotion is not wordy. It often is abrupt crying, How long? v. 13. There is no stronger desire than that of a pious soul for God's blessing.

20. The reason is, God's favor makes us happy, so as nothing else does. It only and it alone makes us truly blessed, v. 14. Dickson: "A poor hungry soul lying under a sense of wrath will promise to itself happiness for ever, if it can but once again find what it hath sometimes felt; that is, one sweet fill of God's sensible mercy towards it."

21. If we see dark times ourselves, yet let us in prayer commit our ways to the Lord, v. 15. "Blessed are all they that hope in his mercy." If we can do nothing else, we can pray. Perhaps God has cut us off from doing anything else, that we may the more attend to that slighted duty.

22. Sad as things often are, and confused as they often seem to be in this life, yet "it is usual with God, in dealing with his people, to balance evil with good and good with evil," v. 15. God sets the day of prosperity over against the day of adversity, Ecc. vii. 14. Fuller: "The alternate changes of night and day, winter and summer, are not more fixed in the course of nature, than the mixture of judgment and mercy in the present state."

23. However afflicted, then, our lot may be, let us hold fast the covenant, and plead with God, v. 15. To break with God is to give up all as lost.

24. It is an admirable arrangement on the part of God that ordinarily evil precedes good, and humiliation goes before honor, v. 15. It is good that a man bear the yoke in his youth, and not in his riper years. It would be sad to see our old men and women learning the lessons of childhood, when they ought to be teaching lessons of piety and patience. Our light affliction worketh glory. When days of trial are to be followed by an eternity of joy, the prospect may well sustain and cheer us.

25. Whatever betides us, let us not forget to pray that the cause of God and his truth may live and flourish, v. 16. If all goes well with Zion, we may well be glad. It greatly revived the heart of good old Joseph to be able confidently to say to his brethren: "I die, and God shall surely visit you," Gen. l. 24. "Pray for the peace of Jerusalem." Some have suggested that the prayer of dying Stephen led to the conversion of Paul. The measure of success now given to the truth may be owing, in no small degree, to the prayers offered by the martyrs of ages long gone by, Rev. v. 8; vi. 9, 10; viii. 3, 4. O Christians, pray on.

26. Still it is delightful to the pious to see displays of God's love and mercy in their own day; and so they do all plead that he would make bare his arm and "let his work appear" to them.

27. Holiness is the beauty of God's character, as it shines out in his word and providence, v. 17. We cannot, therefore, too earnestly implore God to let the tenor of his proceedings be for us, and not against us.

28. If we err not, it is because God guides us; if we fail not, it is because he upholds us; if we beat not the air, it is because he makes the worm Jacob to thresh the mountain, v. 17.

PSALM XCI.

1 He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty.

2 I will say of the LORD, He is my refuge and my fortress: my God; in him will I trust.

3 Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence.

4 He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust: his truth shall be thy shield and buckler.

5 Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day;

6 Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noon-day.

7 A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee.

- 8 Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked.
 9 Because thou hast made the LORD, which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation;
 10 There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling.
 11 For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.
 12 They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone.
 13 Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet.
 14 Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him: I will set him on high, because he hath known my name.
 15 He shall call upon me, and I will answer him: I will be with him in trouble; I will deliver him, and honour him.
 16. With long life will I satisfy him, and shew him my salvation.

IN the Hebrew this Psalm is without title. From competent critics it has received the highest praise. Luther: "This is the most distinguished jewel among all the Psalms of consolation." Clarke and Anderson: "It is allowed to be one of the finest Psalms in the whole collection." Morison: "The general style and allusions of the Psalm are remarkably sublime." Walford: "The poem is so clear and intelligible, that nothing in it can be mistaken or misunderstood." Muis: "Could the Latin or any modern language express thoroughly all the beauties and elegancies as well of the words as of the sentences, it would not be difficult to persuade the reader that we have no poem, either in Greek or Latin, comparable to this Hebrew ode." Concerning its author there is quite a diversity of opinion. Clarke: "It cannot be determined on what occasion or by whom it was composed. It is most likely by the author of the preceding." Alexander styles it, "An amplification of the theme, that God is the dwelling-place and refuge of his people. This and other points of contact with the prayer of Moses seem to mark it as an imitation of that Psalm, and thereby account for its position in the Psalter." Pool: "The penman of this Psalm is uncertain;" Patrick: "The author of this Psalm is unknown." Jarchi, Venema, Peters and others ascribe it to Moses. But the Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Vitringa ascribe it to David. Henry and Scott incline to this view. Even if we should admit that Moses wrote it, it could not be on the ground taken by some that when an author is given to a Psalm, he is to be regarded as the penman of all succeeding till another author is announced. This would make Moses the writer of this and the next nine Psalms; but from Heb. iv. 7, we know that David wrote Ps. xcv. Of course we know not the occasion on which this Psalm was written. Yet from the fact that the pestilence is twice mentioned, many have supposed that it was written on the occasion of some wasting disease appearing in the camp of Israel, or among the tribes after their settlement in Canaan. Respecting the scope of the Psalm there is less diversity. Tholuck: "A joyous psalm, full of the assurance of faith;" Berleberg Bible: "The whole object is to bring to a right trust in God;" Luther: "The Psalmist highly exalts faith in God, and shows that it is an invincible strength against all evils, and against all the gates of hell." It sets forth the safety of one under Divine protection. It is rightly regarded as Messianic, not because Satan so applied vv. 11, 12, in Matt. iv. 6; Luke iv. 10, 11; but because its contents are best so explained. The ancient Jews applied it to Messiah. So do the Syriac, Henry, Horne, Scott, etc. If with some we regard it as a prophecy respecting Joshua, or with others as a prophecy respecting Solomon, none will deny that both of them were types of Christ, and so the chief fulfilment may still be in him. Nor can it without many qualifications be said to receive entire fulfilment in any but Christ; while every clause may be unqualifiedly applied to him. It was not possible that he should die by accident, by the assassin or by disease. Michaelis thinks it was to be recited in alternate parts by two sets of singers, addressing each other, and that the last three verses are spoken by God himself. Tholuck would have vv. 1, 3-8, 10-12, sung or recited by a precentor, v. 2 and part of v. 9, by a choir, and vv. 14-16, by precentor and choir. But moderns do not know enough of the mode of conducting the temple worship to decide such a point. Scott dates it B. C. 1017. In it we have four names of God: Gel-yohn Most High, Shaddai Almighty, Elohim God and Jehovah LORD, on which respectively see on Ps. vii. 17; introductory remarks to Ps. lxxviii.; on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2.

1. He that dwelleth in the secret place of the Most High shall abide under the shadow of the Almighty. There is no need of any change in the translation, nor of making the two clauses descriptive of a character, of whom nothing is affirmed till we reach the second verse. The grammar does not require such a reading; although it is sanctioned by Lowth and others. Some think that as the verse stands in the English text, it but expresses a truism. But to careless readers and hearers many scriptural truths have that appearance. See Gal. v. 15; vi. 3. Both the verbs express stability. Dwell, so rendered in Gen. xiii. 12; Deut. ii. 10 and often; in Jud. v. 17, continued. Abide, commonly lodge or tarry, as in Ruth i. 16, where thou lodgest I will lodge; in Job xvii. 2, continue; xix. 4, remaineth. It often includes the idea of shelter. Secret place, as in Ps. xviii. 11; lxxxi. 7; in Ps. xxvii. 5, secret; in Ps. lxi. 4; Isa. xxxii. 2, covert; in Ps. xxxii. 7; cxix. 114, hiding-place. The figure may be drawn from the tabernacle. The word is often rendered secretly. Shadow, as in Ps. xvii. 8; xxxvi. 7; lvii. 1; lxiii. 7. Most High and Almighty, two words happily introduced here to give confidence to believing expectations. The sense is, He who truly relies on God shall assuredly have his protection. Arnd: "If a man can conceal a friend in a secret hidden place in the time of trouble, much more can God;" Hengstenberg: "He whom God has taken under his care is perfectly safe under his protection." This construction is grammatical and natural and gives the best sense. The man Christ Jesus dwelt in the secret place of the Most High and enjoyed the protection of the Almighty, so as none else ever did. In him and under him his people are all safe. He is their hiding-place. The first verse may be regarded as a sort of text for the whole Psalm.

2. I will say of the Lord, He is my refuge and my fortress. Refuge, as in Ps. xiv. 6; xlv. 1; in Ps. lxi. 3, shelter; Jer. xvii. 17, hope. Fortress, so often; see on Ps. xviii. 2; in 1 Sam. xxii. 4, a hold; in 2 Sam. v. 7, strong-hold; in 1 Chron. xi. 5, castle; in 2 Sam. v. 9, fort. My God; mine by covenant, as well as by choice, endeared to me by a thousand precious memories and marked deliverances. In him will I trust or confide, as in Ps. iv. 5; ix. 10. Confidence is one of the highest acts of friendship as well as of worship. None except God is entitled to our unqualified and undivided confidence to all the ends of conservation, government and salvation. Hengstenberg: "What can do any real injury to the man who stands under the protection of Omnipotence, as it exists in a personal God?" Such are willing witnesses of the love and truth and grace and power of God. "Others speculate, but they believe and enjoy." The knowledge gained by experience is to God's people invaluable. The verse has its perfect fulfilment in Christ. None ever trusted in God as did the incarnate Mediator. His confidence never wavered.

3. Surely he shall deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, and from the noisome pestilence. Alexander: "A change of pronoun is the characteristic of this Psalm." In v. 1, the pronoun is he; in v. 2, I; in v. 3, thee. This change from the third to the first and then to the second person occasions the chief difficulty with interpreters. Various solutions are suggested. One is that there are different speakers. This is admissible. It is generally agreed that v. 1 contains a general truth. Some make David the speaker in v. 2, and Solomon in v. 3. Others suppose v. 3 is uttered by a voice from heaven; others think that the prophet in v. 3, is addressing his own soul. Pool thinks v. 3 contains an address to a pious, believing soul. Perhaps it is as well to make it an address to his own soul, as in Ps. xlii. 5. By the snare of the fowler, we may understand any mischief plotted by Satan or his servants. On snares, see on Ps. xi. 6. For noisome pestilence, the Chaldee has death and tumult; Arabic, speech of the persecutor; Luther, destructive pestilence; Calvin, noxious pestilence; Edwards, loathsome pestilence; Geddes, mischievous design; Fry, evil design. In Hebrew the same consonants are used for word and pestilence; hence the variation. Pestilence is the best rendering here and in v. 6. We met it in Ps. lxxviii. 50.

4. He shall cover thee with his feathers, and under his wings shalt thou trust. Feathers, in Job xxxix. 13, wings. Wings, skirt, border, overspreading, 1 Sam. xxiv. 4; Num. xv. 38; Dan. ix. 27. On the figure here used, see on Ps. xvii. 8. Compare Ps. xxxvi. 7; lvii. 1; lxi. 4; lxiii. 7. In loving condescension God compares himself to the female bird sheltering her young. His truth shall be thy shield and buckler. Truth, veracity, faithfulness. Diodati: "Thou shalt be defended and safe by virtue of his most true and infallible promises." Shield, as in Ps. v. 12. Buckler, here only, literally surrounding. This clause is fulfilled in all believers; its most glorious accomplishment was in Christ.

5. Thou shalt not be afraid for the terror by night; nor for the arrow that flieth by day. For terror by night, the Chaldee has fear of demons who roam about at night; many: nocturnal dread; John Rogers' translation: Thou shalt not need to be afayed for any bugges by nyght. The terror of the night points to any evil that may come on men at that time. Commonly the darkness adds to the consternation. The arrow is an instrument of deadly hostility.

6. Nor for the pestilence that walketh in darkness; nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday. Pestilence, as in v. 3. Destruction, in Isa. xxviii. 2, connected with a storm. Scaliger correctly regards all possible evils as designated by the four terms terror by night, arrow flying by day, pestilence walking in darkness, and destruction wasting at noonday. If any evil was not under God's control, it might defeat his most glorious purposes. Tholuck: "Whatever species of weapon the tempter may use against the children of God, whenever and wherever he may come, the protection of the Lord is all-sufficient, and you need not seek for any other." Bythner: "The man, who has made God his refuge, is always safe, day and night, at every hour, from every danger." Compare Pr. iii. 23-26. These promises are so fulfilled in believers that they cannot die till the Lord permits. In the case of the Mediator it was in every way certain that no form of casualty, disease, or assault could terminate his life, but that he should lay it down himself.

7. A thousand shall fall at thy side, and ten thousand at thy right hand; but it shall not come nigh thee. We see good men cut down by many of the diseases and events, which hurry the wicked into eternity, although it is true that when a good man is taken away, it is from the evil to come, Isa. lvii. 1. Nor do the righteous die except at the intercession of Christ, John xvii. 24. Nor is there any room for doubt that at death believers enter into glory. But all this is a meager fulfilment of what is so clearly promised in this verse. The text needs neither criticism nor labored exposition. The common version clearly gives the sense. The promise is of an absolute exemption from all that could endanger life. This was true of none but Jesus.

8. Only with thine eyes shalt thou behold and see the reward of the wicked. No man knoweth love or hatred by all that he sees befalling his neighbors; for all things come alike to all, Ecc. ix. 1, 2. The reason is, that all mere men are sinners, are sick, suffer and die, if of nothing else, of old age. Death is by sin. While the good man watches his dying neighbor, he himself sickens and dies. He falls in battle like others. He may die at any moment. So that it is but in a limited sense that to the believer we can at all apply this verse, which like the last is very well translated, and is clear in its meaning, if prophetic of Christ. Yet God exercises a kind and special providence over his people. Universal tradition represents that not a Christian perished in the destruction of Jerusalem. The temperance, faith and courage of Christians are friendly to longevity. Yet in the Mediator has this verse its glorious fulfilment.

9. Because thou hast made the LORD, which is my refuge, even the Most High, thy habitation. Refuge, as in v. 2. Habitation, as in Ps. xc. 1.

10. There shall no evil befall thee, neither shall any plague come nigh thy dwelling. Evil, either natural or moral as the sense requires; see on Ps. v. 4: vii. 4. Plague, sometimes rendered a wound, a stroke, plural stripes, Pr. vi. 33; Deut. xvii. 18; Isa. liii. 5. In Leviticus it occurs more than fifty times and is there uniformly rendered plague. Here it does not materially differ in signification from pestilence in vv. 3, 6. Horne: "The sentiment in vv. 9, 10, is evidently the same with that in vv. 5, 6."

11. For he shall give his angels charge over thee, to keep thee in all thy ways.

12. They shall bear thee up in their hands, lest thou dash thy foot against a stone. The translation cannot be improved. Keep, guard, protect. Even if this Psalm is a prophecy of the Redeemer, Satan's use of these words was tempting him to act presumptuously and so to sin. Compare Num. xv. 30; Matt. iv. 7. Hengstenberg: "The language does not apply to dangers which one seeks, but only to such as meet the righteous man unsought." Christ was as impeccable as he was imperishable. Angels showed a special sympathy with our Lord and lively concern in his birth, work, sufferings and glory. Nor can any believer in this life know from how many evils these ministering spirits have kept him. Protected by them Elisha had no fear of a great army, 2 Kings vi. 16. It is sometimes asked, Why do we not thank angels for their services? The reason is, they are our fellow-servants, Rev. xxii. 9. For the same and other reasons we do not pray to them, but to God. It is a blessed fact revealed in Scripture that angels and men constitute through Christ one family. He is not the Saviour of angels, but he is their Lord, Ephes. i. 10; Heb. i. 6. See on Psalm xxxiv. 7.

13. Thou shalt tread upon the lion and adder: the young lion and the dragon shalt thou trample under feet. Lion, found nowhere else in the Psalms; in Job thrice rendered fierce lion. Adder, see on Ps. lviii. 4; except in the Psalms, always asp. Young lion, the strong lion, see on Ps. xxxiv. 10. Dragon, often so rendered, also whale, serpent, sea-monster, Gen. i. 21; Ex. vii. 9; Lam. iv. 3. In many eastern countries the dragon seems to be a favorite emblem of huge, terrific evils. To tread upon is to have the mastery over; Calvin: To walk over. It is applied to treading grapes and olives, which offer no resistance, but are crushed. Often in Scripture are spiritual adversaries compared to fierce and venomous creatures. Satan is called a lion, a dragon, a serpent. Wicked men are the children of the devil. Over all spiritual and natural adversaries our Lord had absolute sovereignty. He never was in any way subject to them but by his own free consent. Under him his people have the victory over all their foes, and are more than conquerors through him that loved them; see Luke x. 17-20; 1 John iv. 4. All experienced Christians admit God's providence over them to be kind and constant. The review of it shall forever fill them with wonder. In vv. 14-16, Jehovah speaks:

14. Because he hath set his love upon me, therefore will I deliver him. Luther: "By the cluster of promises at the end of the Psalm, the Holy Spirit quickens and refreshes our hearts with consolation." Instead of set his love on me, Calvin reads trusted in me; Hengstenberg, cleaves to me. Our version is the best, and is well supported by authority. Deliver, commonly so rendered, also cause to escape, see on Ps. xvii. 13. I will set him on high, because he hath known my name. Set on high, exalt, especially for safety; in Ps. xx. 1; lix. 1, defend. It also means to exult for honor, Ps. cvii. 41; Isa. xxxiii. 5. To know God's name is to be truly and intelligently pious, a friend of God.

15. He shall call upon me, and I will answer him. All blessings come by prayer. Even the Mediator was victorious by prayer, Heb. v. 7. We must follow his example. Then in our sorest trials we shall have his gracious and cheering presence. I will be with him in trouble. Clarke: "As soon as the trouble comes, I am there." Yea, more: I will deliver him. Deliver, as in Ps. vii. 4; xviii. 19. It implies very effectual deliverance, especially by imparting all needed strength. He will rescue him and honor him. To the Mediator he has given a name that is above every name. He has been made higher than the heavens. The Father has crowned him with glory and honor. So in their measure shall Jehovah glorify all who in true faith call on his name. Clarke: "I will load him with honor." Compare 1 Sam. ii. 30; John xii. 26.

16. With long life will I satisfy him. On the general tenor of such promises, see on Ps. i. 3; xxxiv. 12; xxxvii. 3. Compare Ex. xx. 12; Deut. v. 16. Hengstenberg: "Expositors are too ready with the obvious remark, that the promise of long life is specially an Old Testament one." That life is long, which answers all life's great ends. Calvin: "Long life would be bestowed by God on all his children, were it not for their advantage that they should be taken early out of the world." Christ himself did not leave the world until he had done everything that it was necessary or desirable for him to do. It would not be kindness to keep God's people in this world, after their work was all done. But eternal life is begun on earth, as many Scriptures teach, John vi. 54; x. 28; xvii. 3. Tholuck: "The Psalmist may, at the time when he was composing this sublime Psalm, have had the presentiment of something more than the extension of temporal existence in speaking of long life. So the apostles employed the terms death and life, light and darkness, peace and righteousness, and others which they found in the Old Testament, in a far more profound sense." This view is strengthened by the parallelism of the last clause: And shew him my salvation. From the earliest use of the term salvation to the writing of the Apocalypse its import becomes more and more glorious, till all the redeemed are seen with crowns on their heads and palms in their hands around the throne of God and the Lamb. Calvin: "The salvation of God extends far beyond the narrow boundary of earthly existence;" Clarke: "He shall have an eternity of blessedness in the world to come;" Scott: "In heaven he will show them his complete salvation;" Nicolson: "That the prophet speaks of eternal felicity is more than probable;" Diodati: "The accomplishment of salvation is in the life everlasting."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The saints are at home in God, v. 1.

2 In God they have safety and protection, vv. 1, 2. Tholuck: "Though there is nothing more common than for men to profess that they are under the protection of the Most High, yet are there but few, who really believe what that profession involves."

3. The whole nature of God, including his holiness, justice, goodness, truth, power, wisdom, presence and all his perfections form a covering for the soul, against which all assaults are vain. The shadow is perfect, v. 1.

4. If we would find shelter and all needed help, we must accept the grace that is offered us in the promises. The name of the Lord is a strong tower. But if men do not run into it, they are not safe, vv. 2, 9. There is no pleasing God, or resting the soul without faith. This faith should be strong, growing and openly professed.

5. As in all Christ's undertaking thus far there has been no failure, and no possibility of failure; so shall it be to the end, vv. 3, 13. Should whole nations and generations reject him, he shall still be glorious, and have his reward, Isa. xlix. 5; liii. 10.

6. The cunning and craft of our adversaries might well alarm us, it is so deep and devilish; were it not that the wisdom of God is set over against it, v. 3. As the fowler has more shrewdness than the bird, so has Satan more craft than the saints; but their safety is that Jehovah takes the wise in their own craftiness.

7. Although God has not promised that his people shall not leave the world by casualty or malady, as he did respecting their Lord, vv. 3, 6; yet this is their rejoicing that the manner of their departure is settled not by caprice or luck, but by infinite wisdom; not by malice, but by unfailing love. Epidemics have no power but as they have a commission from God, v. 3.

8. How could we get on without the promises and doctrines of Scripture? The former have all their force from the latter. If we are not clad in the panoply of God's truth, we must fall, v. 4. Dickson: "That which we must oppose to all perils is the word of God; so long as we keep that, and ward off darts and swords by that means, we shall not be overcome."

9. Blessed is he that has a calm and fearless trust in God, v. 5. It is one of God's best gifts in this world. It is a wondrous protection. Nothing is so prudent as genuine courage. It looks far into the past and the future. "Confidence in God will divest the mind of that dread and anxiety, which threatening events are fitted to inspire."

10. No Christian knows what plots against himself and Christ's cause are laid and ready to be executed; but in this he may rejoice, that they are all powerless, unless God has some great and good end to answer by allowing them to be partly or wholly carried out, v. 5.

11. The same is true of open war and destruction attempted against the righteous, v. 6. Luther: "This is the work of open persecution; whereby these holy Cains in their unheard-of cruelty and tyranny, shed the blood of the Abels, drive into exile the godly, plunder their substance, and slaughter them by every cruelty of torture."

11. In times of divine judgments when overflowing calamities are hurrying many to the grave, and death stalks abroad in terrible forms, let us not forget that there is mercy with God, and safety in him, v. 6. In him we may defy all dangers.

12. It might well form a part of the pious occupation of God's people to note and celebrate their remarkable deliverances in times of public calamity. When men are cut down all around us, and we escape, what less can we do than speak forth the praises of him, who did not allow the evil to come nigh us? v. 7.

13. We should tremble and adore when we are made witnesses of the terrible destruction of the wicked, vv. 7, 8. "Be not high-minded but fear" is a fit and salutary lesson, especially when we are called to contemplate the doom of sinners.

14. Dickson: "The only persons, who are hurt by judgments and temptations, are such unfenced souls as believe not in God, are not reconciled with him, and stand at a distance opposite to him as the objects of his wrath."

15. In times of public calamity, as a general rule we should stand in our lot, and do and suffer the Lord's will there. We may indeed flee from pestilence, if we neglect no duty in so doing. This may sometimes be done, especially where a whole community may retire to a healthy spot. Where this cannot be done, let physicians, ministers of the Gospel, public officers and those who may be useful as nurses stand their ground, and commit their case to God. When moved by a right spirit such are in far less danger than many suppose. Their temperance and their courage are blessed as preservatives. It is the hireling that seeth the wolf coming and fleeth. Blessed be God, our great Shepherd did not so. Let us follow his example, and, if we fall, fall at the post of duty.

16. There is a God that judgeth in the earth. Sadly as saints may sometimes be perplexed, let them wait, and they shall see the reward of the wicked, v. 8. It will surely come with a vengeance so dreadful as to silence all cavillings of bad men, and all doubts of good men.

17. The connection of good men with the Lord is not transient and temporary, but settled and permanent. God is their habitation, v. 9. So that genuine believers go to him continually. Dickson: "The nature of true faith is to make use of God in all conditions; in peace and war, in prosperity and adversity."

18. All real evil is averted from the people of God, or is so controlled as in the end to do them good, v. 10. Compare Rom. viii. 28. Morison: "How blessed are they who feel themselves sheltered in the sanctuary which Jehovah has thrown around them in the day of trouble; and how comfortless must be that abode from which the cheering smile of the divine presence is withheld."

20. Amidst all the apparent confusion in the affairs of men, God does discriminate, and honest and careful observers may discern between the righteous and the wicked, v. 10. Did not the Lord smite the first-born of Egypt, both man and beast, and did he not spare all Israel? Does he not still do many like things?

21. God is at no loss for means, instruments or agents. Heaven and earth, sea and land, mind and matter are full of them. If there be need, he will send an angel, or a multitude of the heavenly host, and they shall do his work, vv. 11, 12. Jacob saw a ladder reaching from earth to heaven, and the angels ascending and descending on it, Gen. xxviii. 12. That ladder has never been removed. It might be seen at any time, if God would but open our eyes.

22. If we would have God's special care and the guardianship of his angels, let us remember that we must be found in the path of duty, v. 11. Dickson: "Promises are not made to foster men in their turning after folly, but to encourage them in the course of obedience in their several callings."

23. However huge and terrific the evils that threaten or assail us, they are all in the grasp of the Almighty. See Job v. 23; Isa. xi. 6-9; lxxv. 25; Ezek. xxxiv. 25; Hos. ii. 18. Whether we regard these passages as literal or figurative does not destroy their power to support and cheer the child of God. Compare Rom. xvi. 20.

24. How clear and easily understood are the marks of true piety laid down in Scripture. Here they are few and decisive. A truly pious man, 1, sets his love on God; 2, he knows God's name; 3, he is a man of prayer, vv. 14, 15. Who has these marks is sure to have the rest. He will certainly be saved. There is no getting on without prayer, and prayer without love is hypocrisy, and prayer and love without knowledge are at best superstition, and that is a great offence to God. Calvin: "We are not at liberty in calling upon God to follow the suggestions of our own mind and will, but must seek God only in so far as he has invited us to approach him."

25. For all deliverances we must wait and give God his time. His interpositions and rewards are sure, but they are not to be hastened by fretting and impatience.

26. Let all the saints be joyful in God. Their inheritance is sure. Their gratitude should be warm and their obedience cheerful and universal. The protection and consolation promised to them and administered in their behalf will be matter of praise and wonder forever.

27. Nor let sinners forget that all these things deeply concern them. Indeed the answer to the question whether they shall be fiends or saints depends upon the state of their hearts towards such great and glorious truths as are revealed in this sacred poem.

PSALM XCII.

A Psalm or Song for the sabbath day.

1 It is a good thing to give thanks unto the LORD, and to sing praises unto thy name, O Most High:

2 To shew forth thy lovingkindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night,

3 Upon an instrument of ten strings, and upon the psaltery; upon the harp with a solemn sound.

4 For thou, LORD, hast made me glad through thy work: I will triumph in the works of thy hands.

5 O LORD, how great are thy works! and thy thoughts are very deep.

6 A brutish man knoweth not; neither doth a fool understand this.

7 When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish; it is that they shall be destroyed for ever:

8 But thou, LORD, art most high for evermore.

9 For, lo, thine enemies, O LORD, for, lo, thine enemies shall perish; all the workers of iniquity shall be scattered.

10 But my horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of a unicorn: I shall be anointed with fresh oil.

11 Mine eye also shall see my desire on mine enemies, and mine ears shall hear my desire of the wicked that rise up against me.

12 The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree: he shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon.

13 Those that be planted in the house of the LORD shall flourish in the courts of our God.

14 They shall still bring forth fruit in old age; they shall be fat and flourishing;

15 To shew that the LORD is upright: he is my rock, and there is no unrighteousness in him.

ON Psalm or Song in the title see on title of Psalm xxx. For the Sabbath day is a part of the title uniformly preserved in the best Hebrew copies, also by the Chaldee, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate. The ode is very suitable for the Sabbath. Calvin: "There is no reason to doubt that the Jews were in the habit of singing this Psalm upon the Sabbath-day." Hengstenberg: "According to its contents, it is manifestly well adapted for such a use." Alexander: "As one main design of the Sabbath was to afford an opportunity for the admiring contemplation of God's works or doings, the Psalm before us was peculiarly appropriate at such a time." The authorship of the Psalm is unknown. The Chaldee ascribes it to the first man, Adam. So do many Jewish writers, and a few Christians. It does not militate against this view that this Psalm is not placed first in the collection. The Psalms are not arranged according to date. Those, who take Adam to be the author, hold that it was written by him either in innocence before the fall, or very soon after he left paradise. Either of these views of the time of writing is fatal to the idea of Adamic authorship. For in verse three, musical instruments are mentioned; and there were none such till long after the ejection from Eden, Gen. iv. 21. Nor were there in any portion of the early part of Adam's life numerous wicked men such as the author of this poem intimates in vv. 7, 9, 11. We may, therefore, safely conclude that Adam did not write it. That Moses was not its author is generally agreed, though some have ascribed it to him. They rely on the supposition that as he is confessedly the author of Psalm xc. he wrote all that came after it till another Psalmist is named. But on Psalm xci. this reasoning has been shown to be unsound. The more probable opinion is that it was written by David. So the Arabic, Henry, Dodd and others. Scott: "In all probability David composed it." Nor can we assign to it any historic occasion. It is probable it had none. Patrick thinks it was probably written when God gave David Rest from his enemies. Others suggest other times; but all of them are mere conjectures, some more probable than others, but none of them reliable. Scott dates it B. C. 1045. Calmet thinks it was written during the captivity. The names of the Almighty here found are Jehovah LORD; Gel-yohn Most High and Elohim God; on which respectively see on Ps. i. 2; vii. 17; iii. 2. The scope of the ode is apparent. It is a song of praise, praise for God's works, especially works of creation, providence and redemption, though providence is prominent. Tholuck: "This song celebrates the righteousness of the divine government of the world." Calvin: "This Psalm contains an exhortation to praise God, and shows how much ground we have for this exercise from the works of God, insisting, especially, upon his justice, displayed in the protection of his people, and the destruction of the wicked." Gill: "It was made for the Sabbath-day, and to be used upon it; and directs to the work and worship of it; praising of God and celebrating his works, attending his house and ordinances." Alexander: "The immediate subject of the praise is the exhibition of God's power and wisdom in his providential dealings both with the wicked and the righteous."

1. It is a good thing to give thanks unto the LORD, and to sing praises unto thy name, O Most High. The rendering is quite uniform. Give thanks, see on Ps. vi. 5. Sing praises, see on Ps. ix. 2. There is no reason to fear that our service will be too elevated or too absorbing. The great truth of the verse is the excellence of gratefully worshipping God. In every sense it is a good thing. 1. God commends it in many places. 2. Good men of every age have set us the example. 3. Our relations to God loudly call for it. 4. This part of worship is very delightful, cheering and animating. 5. Praise and thanksgiving will be retained in heaven. Yea, it is good

2. To shew forth thy lovingkindness in the morning, and thy faithfulness every night. Lovingkindness, see on Ps. v. 7, where it is rendered mercy. Faithfulness, from the root of Amen. See on Ps. xxxiii. 4; xxxvi. 5. There is no stronger word for either of the conceptions here expressed. God's nature and ways are fit matters for public as well as private celebration both night and morning, that is, continually and earnestly. Calvin: "He means that beginning to praise the Lord from earliest dawn, we should continue his praises to the latest hour of the night, this being no more than his goodness and faithfulness deserve." Patrick: "This is the sweetest employment in the morning; and no entertainment can be equal to it at night: to commemorate and declare to all, how bountiful thou art; and how faithful in performing thy promises to those who depend on thy almighty goodness." Hengstenberg: "The mercy and faithfulness of God are those properties, which guarantee help to his people, and which are manifested in their deliverance." And the Psalmist would have this worship conducted in the most joyous and solemn manner, even

3. Upon an instrument of ten strings, and upon the psaltery; upon the harp with a solemn sound. On the instruments here named, see on Ps. xxxiii. 2. Instead of solemn sound some read a meditation; the Hebrew is Higgaion, on which see on Ps. ix. 16. In Ps. xix. 14, the same word is rendered meditation. It occurs but a few times. Either a solemn sound, or musings gives a good sense. The old French has melody of the voice. There was a special call for grateful worship:

4. For thou, LORD, hast made me glad through thy work: I will triumph in the works of thy hands. Made me glad, made me joyful, rejoiced me. Triumph, often rendered sing, cry, cry out, sing for joy, shout. It imports an expression of strong and exultant emotion. Work and works (different words) cover the whole field of divine operations in creation, providence and redemption. The Sabbath was at first instituted in commemoration of God's works of creation. These are very glorious. Had not man sinned, much of his time would have been spent in studying their wonders. The works of providence are not less striking and unsearchable. But the work of redemption eclipses them all. Well is the Christian Sabbath kept in honor of the completion of this work by the resurrection of the Son of God from the dead. The pious soul can never be without grand themes of praise and thanksgiving.

5. O LORD, how great are thy works! For great Calvin suggests magnificent. Nothing could be more natural than such an exclamation. By our unaided senses we may study contiguous objects till our minds feel exhausted. By powerful telescopes we may explore the heavens till we are overwhelmed with amazement, and fear we are too insignificant to attract the divine regard. We may then turn the microscope upon the vast world that eludes our unaided senses, and there we shall find innumerable tribes of creatures all well cared for and displaying the skill and kindness of infinite perfections. When we become students of providence we find ourselves no less amazed. And when we contemplate redemption, the best we can do is to wonder and adore, Ps. xl. 5; Rom. xi. 33. And thy thoughts are very deep. Alexander: "Deep, not mysterious, but vast, immense, and inexhaustible, corresponding to great in the other clause." In Hos. v. 2, the same word is rendered profound. God's thoughts and works are his counsels and operations, his plans and his doings. They are so vast that they must be mysterious to us worms.

6. A brutish man knoweth not; neither doth a fool understand this. Every man is altogether brutish and foolish, as long as he is left to himself and is not taught of God, Jer. x. 8, 14; li. 17. Good men often and deeply lament their dreadful blindness and want of discernment, Pr. xxx. 2. But carnal men see nothing aright. For brutish man Alexander reads "man-brute, meaning a man who is no better than a brute." The blindness and insensibility of men to spiritual things are appalling, Isa. i. 3; 1 Cor. ii. 14. This refers either to some particular work of God specially celebrated in this Psalm, or to the fact that God's thoughts are very deep.

7. When the wicked spring as the grass, and when all the workers of iniquity do flourish; it is that they shall be destroyed for ever. Pool: "Their present worldly prosperity is a presage and occasion of their utter and eternal ruin." See on Ps. xxxvii. 2. When a cedar of Lebanon flourishes, it is that it may become strong and useful. But the course of the grass is very short, not half a summer. "Their end is destruction." The contrast is two-fold, first between flourishing and destruction, and then between the time of grass-growing and for ever.

8. But thou, LORD, art most high for evermore. Most high, in 2 Kings xix. 23, a height; in Mic. vi. 6, high God; in Ps. lvi. 2, as here most high. In every sense God is gloriously exalted—above want, above casualty, above the power of enemies, above the necessity of human expedients, above all possibility of suffering—and all this to eternity.

9. For, lo, thine enemies, O LORD, for, lo, thine enemies shall perish. Enemies, as in Ps. iii. 7; vi. 10. Perish, often so rendered; sometimes be lost, be destroyed. All the workers of iniquity shall be scattered, sundered, parted, divided, separated, dispersed. Compare Ps. i. 5; lxxviii. 1; Matt. xxv. 32. The combinations of the wicked have in themselves the elements of weakness and of dissolution. Were they ever so strong, the Almighty would dissolve them with a breath. See Job xiv. 11, 12.

10. But my horn shalt thou exalt like the horn of a unicorn. Unicorn, see on Ps. xxii. 21. On exalting the horn see on Ps. xviii. 2; lxxv. 4. The general import is,

Thou shalt deliver me from depressing influences, and give me enlargement so that I may go forth in strength, freedom and joy. I shall be anointed with fresh oil. Anointing was either for consecration to office, 1 Sam. xv. 1; Ps. ii. 2; or, as an expression of personal cheerfulness, 2 Sam. xii. 20; or, as a token of special regard. In this last sense we here take the phrase; see on Ps. xxiii. 6. But this anointing was at a time of gladness. Fresh, the opposite of stale; applied to a bed newly made, Cant. i. 16. This is quite the meaning here. Calvin: "By fresh oil is meant, such as has not become corrupted, or unfit for use by age."

11. Mine eye also shall see my desire on mine enemies, and mine ears shall hear my desire of the wicked that rise up against me. My desire were better omitted. His enemies were evil-doers; and the end of all such is not doubtful. Scott: "The passage might better be read, 'Mine eyes shall look upon mine enemies, and mine ears shall hear of the wicked that rise up against me.'" Enemies, the Hebrew word is found nowhere else. It denotes those who marked him with an evil eye.

12. The righteous shall flourish like the palm tree. The palm is a tall and beautiful evergreen. It bears fruit and furnishes a fine shade. It is very flourishing. It cannot be so depressed as to grow crooked. It grows erect or not at all. It is the "emblem of constancy, patience, fruitfulness, and victory." It most abounds near springs and water-courses. No tree is put to so many uses by eastern nations. Nor has the righteous merely the things set forth by the emblem of the palm. He shall grow like a cedar in Lebanon. This tree was lofty, strong, living more than a thousand years, furnishing a grateful shade for many, and yielding a very valuable timber for architecture. To one familiar with eastern scenery, the palm and the cedar furnish striking emblems of the righteous.

13. Those that be planted in the house of the LORD shall flourish in the courts of our God. Planted, as in a good soil, so as to take root and have a permanent connection with the divinely appointed worship of God, and to draw nourishment from divine ordinances. Such shall flourish, elsewhere, bud, grow, spring, break forth, blossom.

14. They shall still bring forth fruit in old age. The fruit borne by the good man is the fruit of the Spirit. We know what it is, Gal. v. 22, 23; 2 Pet. i. 5-7, compared with Matt. v. 3-12. It would be sad indeed if God forsook his aged servants and left them to wither in spirit as they fail in bodily vigor. A young tree covered with blossoms is a pleasant and promising sight; but an old tree laden with choice fruit is still more delightful to behold. Fruit-bearing alone can prove a tree good. They shall be fat and flourishing. Fat, found also in Ps. xxii. 29; Isa. xxx. 23. A tree is fat when it is full of nourishing sap. Flourishing, in v. 10, fresh, commonly green. It does not please us to see "a green young man;" but we rejoice in saying of a venerable man that he has "a green old age." And all this

15. To shew that the LORD is upright, is as good as his word, is faithful to his promise, is loving to his friends, and remembers his covenant. Having loved his own, he loves them to the end. He is my rock, in Ps. xviii. 2, my strength. And there is no unrighteousness in him. Unrighteousness, elsewhere iniquity, wickedness, Job v. 16; Ps. lviii. 2. This clause may include not only God's treatment of the righteous, as noticed in vv. 10-14, but also his very different treatment of the wicked, as stated in vv. 7, 9, 11. The whole course of providence to saints and sinners, when finished, will show that with God are found equity, and plenty of justice.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Greatly has God honored the Sabbath day. At the end of creation he set us the example of hallowing it; see title. On Mount Sinai he gave the fourth commandment more full than any other. Under every subsequent state of the church he commanded its observance. Calvin: "The right observance of the Sabbath does not consist in idleness, as some absurdly imagine, but in the celebration of the divine name."

2. Let God's people abound in praise and thanksgiving. Pool: "It is a good work, and a just debt to God;" Luther: "Oh what is sweeter than to know God aright by his word, and by true faith; to acknowledge his infinite mercies; to give thanks unto him joyfully and adoringly, with every chord and string of our hearts; to proclaim and praise him unceasingly with a full heart and a full mouth." We have nothing but sin and its consequent misery, except as the fruit of his bounty and compassion.

3. This is not the only part of Scripture that mentions morning and night as seasons specially calling us to the devout worship of God, v. 2. We may add other times; but surely it is not unreasonable for us twice in twenty-four hours to make it a special duty to draw nigh to God.

4. Though the enjoyments of God's people are in this life far from being what they long for, they are yet worth more than all the joys of the wicked and they are blessed pledges of better things hereafter. Even now they are glad; but in due time they shall mightily triumph, v. 4. They have victories now; but their career shall be brighter and brighter forever.

5. Though some men may not be able to acquire much worldly learning, yet all ought to be students of God's works, v. 5. Every leaf, and seed and insect, every planet and every star, every act and course of providence, every display of mercy in saving a sinner by the grace of Christ, demand and will richly repay our adoring wonder, Ps. iii. 2. Every one of his works is in its way great. All angels and all men united could not make one grasshopper.

6. And yet men are so besotted by sin, so sunk down in spiritual ignorance, that left to themselves they will study science and read history like atheists; they will avow infidelity with an open Bible before them, and perish in full view of the cross; unless God sends his Holy Spirit to teach and guide them, so brutish and foolish are they when left to themselves, v. 6. Is not he a fool, who prefers time to eternity, earth to heaven, the world to its Maker, sin to holiness, death to life? Is not he brutish who like the ox feeds greedily, and grows fat, and knows not that it is for the slaughter? Is not he brutish who cares more for his appetite than for his immortal soul?

7. It is therefore a great weakness in any one to envy the wicked, however grand and prosperous they may be; for dark times are before them, vv. 7, 9, 11. All they value so highly is both vain and fleeting. Arnd: "Nothing, except it be of God, can stand, whether it be skill, or riches, or honor, or power. It rises and flourishes to appearance, but in the end it is only a thistle bush and a noxious weed, good for nothing but the fire." The higher one rises in pride and prosperity, the more dreadful will be his doom at last. The ruin of ungodly men rests on their own unfitness for communion with God and on his infinite abhorrence of all sin.

8. The certainty of the final triumph of the righteous and of the final downfall of the wicked is confirmed by the complete sovereignty and absolute independence of God himself. He is most high for evermore, v. 8. Were it possible in any way to subject him to the will of another all hope for the order of the universe would be gone.

9. Let the righteous cheer up; good days are coming, when their horn shall be exalted and they shall be anointed with fresh oil, v. 10.

10. As in the growth of trees much depends upon the soil in which they are planted; so is it with the trees of righteousness. They would never flourish as they do were they not planted in the courts of our God, v. 13. The Lord well knew this, and so he made his church a garden walled around. And he waters it as a garden of herbs. Compare Cant. iv. 12. Oh that the Beloved would come amongst us; for his presence makes the desert like the garden of God.

11. Although God's real children have a deep and abiding sense of their own unworthiness and imperfections; yet they are not hypocrites, vv. 12-14. The palm and the cedar are but feeble emblems of their excellence. When all the amazing growth of centuries shall have passed away or been burned up, the righteous will but have fairly commenced their career of glory and usefulness.

12. It is not true that as nature fails, grace also decays. It is true that the novelty of Christian experience ceases. But the real child of God is so much the more in earnest as he sees his redemption draw nigh. Owen: "There are two things, which those who after a long profession of the gospel are entering into the confines of eternity, do long for and desire. The one is, that all their breaches may be repaired, their decays recovered, their backslidings healed: for unto these things they have been less or more obnoxious in the course of their walking before God. The other is that they may have fresh springs of spiritual life, and vigorous actings of all divine graces, in spiritual-mindedness, holiness, and fruitfulness, unto the praise of God, the honor of the gospel, and their own peace and joy. These things they value more than all the world, and all that is in it; about these things are their thoughts and contrivances exercised night and day." Scott: "Let us learn to detest the sentiment of many, who profess much zeal for the peculiar doctrines of the gospel, yet would persuade us that believers generally grow less zealous as they grow older." God's aged servants are a wonder unto many, Ps. lxxi. 7. Indeed they are a wonder to themselves. But the secret of their growth and success is that their life is hid with Christ in God. Tholuck: "Experience instructs us that pious old men are the most powerful and efficient witnesses and preachers to younger generations; in whom piety bears the sweetest fruit the nearer they are to their grave." Dickson: "True believers shall still persevere, and the decay of the outward man shall not hinder the renewing of their inward man day by day, and their last works shall be better than their first." These remarks are the more extended and these testimonies are the more multiplied, because the error they oppose is very widely diffused, and the truth they establish is of great importance to the honor of God and the comfort of religious people. Blessed be God, his children are born of incorruptible seed. Grace does not die out in the soul. "The longer it acts on the human spirit, the more vigorous does it become in its operation."

13. Let us cleave to God alone. He is a Rock, v. 15. He is our strength. He is our all. His character is spotless and adorable.

PSALM XCIII.

1 The LORD reigneth, he is clothed with majesty; the LORD is clothed with strength, wherewith he hath girded himself: the world also is stablished, that it cannot be moved.

2 Thy throne is established of old: thou art from everlasting.

3 The floods have lifted up, O LORD, the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves.

4 The LORD on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea.

5 Thy testimonies are very sure: holiness becometh thine house, O LORD, for ever.

THE Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate ascribe this Psalm to David as its author. Gill also thinks it was probably written by David. Clarke takes a different view. He says: "It was probably written at the close of the captivity by the Levites, descendants of Moses." The whole question of authorship is involved in uncertainty; but David is more likely to be its author than any one else. If it had a historic occasion we cannot ascertain what it was. For a long time the Jews used it in public worship on the sixth day of the week. Horsley styles it "A hymn for the Sabbath day." The opinion of Mudge seems to have a slender foundation. He thought the Psalm was written on occasion of some violent inundation. But floods and waters are favorite emblems of tumults and commotions in kingdoms and nations. Hengstenberg thinks the Psalm "presupposes a powerful pressure from the might of the world against the kingdom of God, and, consequently, cannot be dated earlier than the Assyrian catastrophe." He thinks it has an apparent dependence on Psalm xlv. Perhaps none of these views will be regarded as satisfactory. The scope of this poem is given with confidence by many. It is clearly an assertion of the supreme and universal government of Jehovah over all things; from which doctrine the strongest consolations are drawn in times of public danger. Is this Psalm Messianic? The old Jewish doctors say it is. Luther: "This is a prophecy concerning the spread of the kingdom of Christ, as far and wide as the earth is extended, and its establishment forever;" Gill: "The subject of the Psalm is the kingdom of God; not of nature and providence, but of grace; the kingdom of the Messiah;" Henry: "It relates both to the kingdom of providence, by which he upholds and governs the world, and especially to the kingdom of his grace, by which he secures the church, sanctifies and preserves it. The administration of both these kingdoms is put into the hands of the Messiah, and to him, doubtless, the prophet here bears witness." Such is the view taken by the best commentators generally. Scott dates it B. C. 1045; Clarke, B. C. 536. The only name of the Most High in this poem is Jehovah LORD; on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. The LORD reigneth, he is clothed with majesty. For majesty, several read glory; others, excellency, and some, magnificence. Church of England: The LORD is king, and hath put on glorious apparel. Reigned, in the preterite has reigned. There never was another universal king. God always reigned above and supreme, over all creatures and all causes. Majesty, as in Isa. xxvi. 10; God is possessed of all the glory and excellency which fit him to be governor and king. Not only is Jehovah clothed with majesty, but, The LORD is clothed with strength, wherewith he hath girded himself. Clothed, arrayed. The English cannot be improved. Strength, as in Ps. viii. 2; xxi. 1, 13; first found in Ex. xv. 2. Jehovah is fully able to do all he has undertaken. This is abundantly proved; for the world is stablished, that it cannot be moved. The best machinery for measuring time requires constant repairs and regulation; but Jehovah rolls the solar system along with amazing regularity. Nothing is firmer than the order of nature, and yet God hangs the earth upon nothing. All things depend on Jehovah Jesus, Isa. ix. 6; Col. i. 17.

2. Thy throne is established of old: thou art from everlasting. Jehovah's kingdom is not new, but from the beginning; not variable, but stable, and like himself from eternity. This is much like Ps. xlv. 6, which we know refers to Christ. See also Pr. viii. 22-31. The manifestation of the kingly authority of heaven has not always been the same; but the power has been the same. Horne: "The throne of Christ is eternal and unchangeable," Rev. xix. 16.

3. The floods have lifted up, O LORD, the floods have lifted up their voice; the floods lift up their waves.

4. The LORD on high is mightier than the noise of many waters, yea, than the mighty waves of the sea. These verses are united in all the ancient versions but the Chaldee. Many modern commentators connect them. It is not easy to consider them apart. Floods, the same word thrice repeated in Hebrew. For waves Edwards has crashing waves; Alexander, crash; Hengstenberg, roaring noise*. There is great diversity in rendering verse 4. Chaldee: By the voices of many waters, by the praises of the waves of the sea the Lord is praised in the higher heavens; Calvin: The waves of the sea are terrible, by reason of the noise of great waters, Jehovah is terrible above; Tremellius and Junius: Than the sound of many waters, than the magnificent waves of the sea breaking in, is Jehovah on high more grand; church of England: The waves of the sea are mighty, and rage horribly; but yet the Lord, who dwelleth on high, is mightier; Hengstenberg: Than the voices of many waters, than the glorious waves of the sea, more glorious in the height is the Lord. Perhaps both the learned and the plain reader will conclude that the common version gives the sense fully as well as any other. The senses gathered from these verses are such as these: 1. By the voice of the floods, etc., some understand the apostles and early preachers of the Gospel, whose ministrations were like floods irresistible, and who were sustained by the power of God, who is yet mightier than the mighty waters. 2. Others think that the prophet means that terribly as nature and nations may be convulsed, we need not fear, for God can control them, being greater than they. 3. Some think the Psalmist would contrast the power of furious waters with the strength of God, and so would teach us that if troubled and mighty waters were alarming, the majesty and power of Jehovah were much more so, and therefore we should greatly fear before him. 4. Others think that the Psalmist is celebrating the power of God as illustrated in the floods of water, and especially in the agitated sea, and would teach us how great must be the power of that being, who can so mightily move the waters and command them. 5. A yet larger number by floods and waters understand cruel and wicked enemies, who come with a great show of power. They cite Ps. xviii. 4, "The floods of ungodly men made me afraid;" also Isa. viii. 7, 8; xvii. 12-14; Jer. xlv. 7-10. This view is well supported by the figurative language of Scripture. By floods and waters these think we are to understand mighty foes; but they say God is mightier than they, and so we need not fear. Perhaps this is the mind of the Spirit.

5. Thy testimonies are very sure. Every perfection of God, his omnipotence included, renders certain the fulfilment of all he has spoken. See on Ps. xix. 7. Scott: "Revealed truth and the promises grounded on it are 'the testimonies' of God, which 'are very sure,' and can never fail." Some think that in this place testimonies specially refer to promises. But all divine truth is connected. The promises will no more surely be fulfilled than the threatenings, and are no more true than the doctrines. All that God has spoken are his true sayings, Rev. xix. 9. If in one thing he could fail, he might in the rest. The preceding verse taught that God was able to defend his people. This says he will keep his word. Holiness becometh thine house, O Lord forever. The Chaldee applies the whole verse to God's word: Thy testimonies are very true; they will befit the house of thy sanctuary: they are holy, O Lord, unto length of days. But the great body of scholars favor a rendering not dissimilar to that in our version. What then is the meaning of the clause? Four views have been taken. 1. By somewhat varying the rendering some get this sense: The adorning of thy house is precious. The objections to this are that the grammatical construction will not warrant it, and that there is nothing in the connection to call for such a remark. 2. Others think the meaning is this: God's holiness as displayed in his appointed worship is the pledge of his truth and the guaranty of the right exercise of his power and of all his perfections. This proposition contains a great truth; but is it taught here? 3. By holiness others understand sacredness, freedom from profaneness, and from unhallowed intrusion.

Hengstenberg: "It is becoming in God that he take care that his house be not desecrated by impious hands." Compare Ps. lxxix. 1. 4. Holiness becomes the worshippers and all the arrangements of God's house. This is the common view and the best. It is eminently practical, and a fitting conclusion of the poem. Morison: "Let all them, who name his name, depart from iniquity; let everything about his sanctuary be pure."
Horne: "Sacred and inviolable is the word of our King; sacred and inviolable should be the loyalty of his subjects." Henry: "Nothing better becomes the saints than conformity to God's image, and an entire devotedness to his honor."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Let us firmly believe the great doctrine of the divine government over the world,
v. 1. It is clearly revealed in Scripture. It is the pillar of hope that stands firm, when all around us is falling to pieces. Luther: "The kingdoms and peoples of the world will roar against the Lord and against his Anointed; and will rage against the godly with sword and fire; but they shall not prevail: for as Daniel saith, 'this kingdom shall break in pieces all other kingdoms beneath it, and shall stand for ever.'"

2. Let us also strive to know something of the vigor and force of God's government of the world, v. 1. It is not feeble, contemptible, liable to be subverted at any time.
Dickson: "How strong soever the adverse powers of the world seem, it must not terrify the believer in following the Lord's cause, but his strength must be opposed thereunto, and that so much the more comfortably, as God's strength is not borrowed from any, as the strength of the creature is."

3. If such is the government of God, let us exceedingly fear to offend him, v. 1.
His majesty and power make the worship of heaven itself awful.

4. But let us not be frightened away from him; but rather draw near to him confidingly, and hide in the chambers of his omnipotence, v. 1.

5. The God of nature is the God of providence and the God of grace. He that made the world rules it, and, if it is ever saved, its salvation must be of the Lord,
v. 1. Indeed the scheme of mercy through a Mediator is a chief and glorious part in God's administration of human affairs.

6. It is matter of joy to all the pious that God's government of the world is not something new, but is established of old, v. 2. Had God at any time permitted the world to be governed by another, we might well fear that he would do so again.
Thus all our hopes would be blasted. Dickson: "The Lord's kingdom in his church is not like the new upstarts in this world, which are of short standing and unstable.
If any king be kind to his church, his people have reason to thank God, but they must not lean to such a king, his reign shall be short: and if any king be froward, and oppose himself to the church, we must not be too much afraid of him, because his kingdom is but lately begun, and is of short continuance."

7. It is no new thing for God's church and people to have enemies, numerous as violent, v. 3. It has been so ever since the days of Cain. Mightily have evil men combined against God's cause. Terribly did Roman emperors and governors rage against Christ and his people. Christians, no strange thing happens to you, when the wicked bend the bow against you. Because the kingdom of Christ is divine, it has withstood all the shocks, and shall continue to survive all the assaults made upon it.

8. When foes and fears prevail, carry the matter to the Lord, and tell him all about it, v. 3. When John Baptist was beheaded, his disciples came, and took up the body, and buried it, and WENT AND TOLD JESUS.

9. Let persecutors remember that there is no possibility of their stopping communications between God and his chosen, v. 3. The cries of the abused and wronged are always going up to heaven, and God's grace is ever granted to the humble, who call upon him.

10. However much men may boast themselves, and however puissant the potentates of earth may be; yet over all human affairs there is a presiding deity, who is mightier than all, v. 4. "Pharaoh, king of Egypt, is but a noise," Jer. xlv. 17. A nod of the Almighty can bring any fabric of human greatness tumbling about the ears of its possessors.

11. Let pious men never lose sight of God's veracity, nor doubt the fulfilment of all he has spoken, v. 5. His word is truth. All that is opposed to it is a lie. Up to this day Jehovah has not failed to perform all that he engaged.

12. Let us strive after holiness, v. 5. It is essential to salvation. Without it an angel is but a devil, and a professor of religion but a loathsome hypocrite. Henry: "Fashions change, and what is becoming at one time is not at another; but holiness always becomes God's house and family, and those who belong to it; it is perpetually decent; and nothing so ill becomes the worshippers of God as unholiness."

13. How many wonderful things are presented to the mind of the devout and contemplative, even in this one short Psalm. If any do not think, it cannot be for want of a theme. God, his providence, Christ, his kingdom, his love, his faithfulness and heaven itself we may dwell upon, until our souls are filled with satisfaction and ravished with delight.

14. Let us not fail to give to Christ whatever place is assigned to him in prophecy, in history, in the promises, and in the government and salvation of the world.

PSALM XCIV.

1. O LORD God, to whom vengeance belongeth; O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, shew thyself.

2 Lift up thyself, thou Judge of the earth: render a reward to the proud.

3 LORD, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph?

4 How long shall they utter and speak hard things? and all the workers of iniquity boast themselves?

5 They break in pieces thy people, O LORD, and afflict thine heritage.

6 They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless.

7 Yet they say, The LORD shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it.

8 Understand, ye brutish among the people: and ye fools, when will ye be wise?

9 He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see?

10 He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? he that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know?

11 The LORD knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity.

12 Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O LORD, and teachest him out of thy law;

13 That thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity, until the pit be digged for the wicked.

14 For the LORD will not cast off his people, neither will he forsake his inheritance.

15 But judgment shall return unto righteousness: and all the upright in heart shall follow it.

16 Who will rise up for me against the evil doers? or who will stand up for me against the workers of iniquity?

17 Unless the LORD had been my help, my soul had almost dwelt in silence.

18 When I said, My foot slippeth; thy mercy, O LORD, held me up.

19 In the multitude of my thoughts within me thy comforts delight my soul.

20 Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee, which frameth mischief by a law?

21 They gather themselves together against the soul of the righteous, and condemn the innocent blood.

22 But the LORD is my defence; and my God is the rock of my refuge.

23 And he shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and shall cut them off in their own wickedness; yea, the LORD our God shall cut them off.

THE Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate give David as the author of this Psalm. Some Jewish doctors ascribe it to Moses. The authorship cannot be known, though David may have written it. See on Ps. xci.-xciii. All attempts to give it a historic occasion have been failures. Scott dates it B. C. 1060. Several ancient versions say it was designed to be sung on the fourth day of the week. Some Jews say it was used on that day. The names of the Almighty found in it are El God, Jehovah LORD, Jah LORD and Elohim God, on which respectively see on Ps. v. 4; i. 2; introduction to Ps. lxviii.; and on Ps. iii. 2.

1. O LORD God, to whom vengeance belongeth; O God, to whom vengeance belongeth, shew thyself. Vengeance, in the plural, vengeances; so many render it. With God is plenty of justice. The fundamental passage is Deut. xxxii. 35. Compare Rom. xii. 19. To the modern English reader, vengeance sometimes conveys the idea of spite or excitement of malicious feeling. But the older Dictionaries do not even hint at this sense of the term. Vengeance is penal retribution, condign punishment. Its parallel is recompense. God alone is strong enough, wise enough or pure enough to make full awards to his creatures. Luther: "He puts down God of vengeance twice, as those are wont to do who speak vehemently, and with great earnestness." Shew thyself; in Ps. lxxx. 1, shine forth. The meaning is explained in verse

2. Lift up thyself, thou Judge of the earth: render a reward to the proud. A reward is a fit return. This prayer is a prophecy. If it were not, it consists with pure benevolence. Desperate would be the case of the meek and injured, if they could not ask God to undertake their cause, and not give them over to the reign of wicked men and devils. Calvin: "O Lord! it is thine to take vengeance upon sinners and judge the earth—see how they take advantage of the impunity which is extended to their guilt, and triumph audaciously in their wickedness." Judge, a participle often and properly rendered as a noun. Lift up thyself; Hengstenberg, rise up thou. He pleads, Do not seem longer to be indifferent to the enormities of thy foes.

3. LORD, how long shall the wicked, how long shall the wicked triumph? Pleasant days pass swiftly; but hours of misery are tedious. When our sorrow arises from the success of wicked men and their triumph over the righteous, our weariness is very great. Then even good men are often perplexed with doubts respecting the existence and the righteousness of providence. Faith and love themselves cry out importunately and imploringly. How long? as in Ps. vi. 3. Wicked, in Ps. i. ungodly. Triumph, in Ps. xxviii. 7, greatly rejoice; in Ps. lxviii. 4, rejoice; it expresses exultant emotion. The repetition of How long shows great urgency.

4. How long shall they utter and speak hard things! and all the workers of iniquity boast themselves? How long is borrowed from the preceding verse. It is retained by the church of England and others. Edwards marks the verse with a note of exclamation. Calvin, Jebb and others drop the interrogative form. Fabritius: They prate rashly, they speak hardly, all the workers of iniquity boast themselves; Hengstenberg: They sputter, speak impudent things, they brag, all the evil-doers. Utter, as in Ps. xix. 2; in a bad sense in Ps. lix. 7, belch out. Hard things, in Ps. xxxi. 18, grievous things; in 1 Sam. ii. 3, arrogancy. Boast themselves, literally, talk of themselves, as boasters do without any necessity.

5. They break in pieces thy people, O LORD, and afflict thine heritage. Disdain and scorn lead to persecution. Break in pieces, elsewhere rendered humble, smite, bruise, crush, destroy, oppress, beat to pieces, Jer. xli. 10; Ps. cxliii. 3; Isa. liii. 10; Lam. iii. 34; Job vi. 9; Pr. xxii. 22; Isa. iii. 15. Thy people, meaning either the chosen nation of the Jews, or God's chosen people in that nation, as hated by the sons of Belial. The latter seems most consistent with the scope of the context. Afflict, often so rendered, also humble, weaken, compel submission in acts of degradation. God's people are his heritage. Wars and tumults animated with the spirit of persecution have been truly hideous and frightful. The haters of the Lord have no compassion:

6. They slay the widow and the stranger, and murder the fatherless. These nouns have no other rendering; and the verb is well given. The acts complained of were in the teeth of the best laws, Ex. xxii. 21-24; Deut. x. 18; xiv. 29. By the persons named some understand the sad and helpless people of God. Taken literally or figuratively the language is forcible.

7. Yet they say, The LORD shall not see, neither shall the God of Jacob regard it. Instead of Jehovah, we have here the poetic form Jah. From hatred to God's people, from temporary success and from impunity in crime, the wicked come to deny providence. Calvin: "He intends to express the lowest and most abandoned stage of depravity, in which the sinner casts off the fear of God, and rushes into every excess. Such infatuated conduct would have been inexcusable even in heathens, who had never heard of a divine revelation; but it was monstrous in men who had been brought up from infancy in the knowledge of the word, to show such mockery and contempt of God." Compare Ps. x. 11, 13.

8. Understand, ye brutish among the people: and ye fools, when will ye be wise? Brutish, not the word so rendered in Ps. xlix. 10; xcii. 6; rendered foolish in Ps. lxxiii. 22; but a participle, denoting habitual violence, as of brutes, that have no sense. Fools, the same as in Ps. xlix. 10; xcii. 6; often rendered fool in Proverbs. Understand, give 'intelligent attention.' Be wise, in Isa. lii. 13, deal prudently; in Job xxxiv. 27, consider. What wicked men and persecutors need is not a better administration of human affairs by the Almighty, but discernment and understanding enabling them to see God's hand in all things, and to understand his moral government. Why will not men reason?

9. He that planted the ear, shall he not hear? he that formed the eye, shall he not see? He that planted, and he that formed, both participles expressing continued action. Those who come into the world by ordinary generation, are no less the creatures of God than was Adam. The argument is very powerful. Shall he who imparts powers of perception have no powers of perception himself? Can the effect be greater than the cause? If the creature has such faculties, must not the Creator have glorious perfections? Shall the source of all intelligence be without infinite understanding?

10. He that chastiseth the heathen, shall not he correct? he that teacheth man knowledge, shall not he know? Chaldee: Is it possible that he should have given a law to his people, and when they have sinned, that they should not be reprov'd? Did not the Lord teach the first man knowledge? Amesius, Tremellius and Junius fully support the common version. Piscator: Does the chastiser of the nations not reprove? he who teaches man knowledge, is he ignorant? Fabritius: He who reprov's the heathen and teaches man knowledge, shall not he chastise? Hammond: He that instructs the nations, and teaches man knowledge, shall he not rebuke, or punish? These diversities do not materially affect the nature of the argument. Calvin: "He would have them argue from the greater to the less, that if God did not spare even whole nations, but visits their iniquity with punishment, they could not imagine that he would suffer a mere handful of individuals to escape with impunity." Alexander: "The full sense seems to be, Is he who teaches all mankind not competent to teach them individually?"

11. The LORD knoweth the thoughts of man, that they are vanity. Man, Adam, as in v. 10. If it means the race of man, then the reference is to the vain thoughts, which naturally lodge within men, who have not the grace of God. Thoughts, as in Gen. vi. 5; in Ps. xxxiii. 10; Jer. xviii. 18, devices; in Lam. iii. 60, 61, imaginations; sometimes inventions, purposes, 2 Chron. xxvi. 15; Jer. xlix. 20; l. 45. Thoughts and purposes, which lead men to utter such wickedness as is expressed in vv. 4, 7, and to do such deeds as are recorded in vv. 5, 6 of this Psalm, mark any character as vile. The chief difficulty in interpreting the passage relates to the word they in the latter clause. Does it refer to thoughts? The English conveys that idea. Such is the interpretation given by many. Calvin: "Some read—They (that is, men themselves) are vanity; but this is a forced rendering, and the form of expression is one which, both in the Greek and Hebrew, may be translated, God knows that the thoughts of men are vain." Yet the Syriac so reads as to make men to be the vanity. Hengstenberg and Alexander both argue for this interpretation. The difficulty is in the grammar. It is not common to give a plural pronoun to the word man, even when taken for the race. On the other hand, thoughts is feminine, and they masculine. By deciding either way we do not fall into any doctrinal or practical error; for the Bible often declares man himself to be vanity, Ps. xxxix. 5, 11; and his thoughts also to be vain and wicked, Ps. x. 4; Pr. xv. 26; Isa. lv. 7; lix. 7; Jer. iv. 14. The nature of one's thoughts determines his character, Pr. xxiii. 7.

12. Blessed is the man whom thou chastenest, O LORD, and teachest him out of thy law. Blessed, O the blessednesses, as in Ps. i. 1. Chastenest, in another form in v. 10, chastiseth; in the future, implying that the blessings are on the man whom God instructs, disciplines and chastens to the end of his life, or till the work of his purification is complete. But mere suffering does not sanctify. The Lord adds teaching out of his law, out of the Scriptures. Calvin: "The Psalmist exclaims, that those are truly blessed whom God has habituated through his word to the endurance of the cross, and prevented from sinking under adversity by the secret supports and consolations of his own Spirit."

13. That thou mayest give him rest from the days of adversity, until the pit be digged for the wicked. That thou mayest give him rest, or quiet, literally make still for him. Compare Jud. xviii. 27; Job xxxiv. 29; Ps. lxxvi. 8; lxxxiii. 1. Some think it is a promise of exemption from adversity; but this is contrary to the experience of God's people and to the teaching of v. 12 and of many Scriptures. The church of England instead of rest reads patience; The Syriac: That thou mayest make him tranquil; Arabic: That thou mayest give him gentleness in the days of adversity. Some think that it is here taught that the people of God do by faith enter into rest, so that adversity does not fill them with perturbation, even while they suffer. Others think the rest is in the next world. But it says he is to have rest, until the pit be digged. Horsley: While the pit is digging for the impious; Patrick: "When absolute destruction and ruin, meantime, is preparing for the ungodly." The promised blessing is conferred in time. It is better to have deep sorrows and be quiet under them, than to be in prosperity and have a proud, turbulent spirit. The righteous are by God's grace both safe and calm under distresses. Temporal ease is often procured at a price far beyond its value; but we never pay too high a price for spiritual and eternal blessings and comforts.

14. For the Lord will not cast off his people, neither will he forsake his inheritance. People and inheritance, in v. 5, people and heritage. Cast off, often rendered leave, or forsake, Ps. xxvii. 9; lxxviii. 60. Forsake, either leave or forsake, Ps. xvi. 10; xxxvii.

33. The parallelism of the two clauses is perfect. The doctrine is clear. Compare Gen. xxviii. 15; Deut. xxxi. 6, 8; Ps. xxxvii. 5; Heb. xiii. 5.

15. But judgment shall return unto righteousness: and all the upright in heart shall follow it. The first clause teaches: The right will triumph in due time: The course of justice shall ere long be plain: Things shall return to their right channel. Luther renders the clause: Right must remain right. Henry: "The seeming disorders of providence shall be rectified;" Alexander: "The apparent disturbance of the divine administration is to cease, and justice to return to its accustomed channel." All the upright in heart shall follow it, that is, shall be found in the triumphant train of victorious justice. This is the best interpretation.

16. Who will rise up for me against the evil doers? or who will stand up for me against the workers of iniquity? Evil doers, in Ps. xxii. 16; xcii. 11, wicked. Workers of iniquity, as in v. 4. The two phrases describe the same class of cruel foes, who had such power as to be truly formidable, and made the prophet for himself, or in the name of the church earnestly cry out for help. Some men were faithless; others were feeble. Man could not or would not give relief. The cry is to a higher power.

17. Unless the LORD had been my help, my soul had almost dwelt in silence. But for divine interposition he must have been numbered with the dead. Silence; both here and in Ps. cxv. 17, it means the grave. Other interpretations are given but none so good as this. Hengstenberg: "Silence is what reigns in the noiseless kingdom of the dead."

18. When I said, My foot slippeth; thy mercy, O Lord, held me up. The slipping or moving of the foot, see on Ps. lxxvi. 9, indicates great and present danger to the life. But mercy interposes and protects one who seemed ready to perish from the violence, number and craft of enemies.

19. In the multitude of my thoughts within me thy comforts delight my soul. Thoughts, found here only, and in Ps. cxxxix. 23. The Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, church of England and Jebb read sorrows; Alexander, cares; Edwards, anxious thoughts; Patrick, perplexed thoughts and anxious cares; Pool, various and perplexing thoughts. Clarke's paraphrase is: "According to the multitude of my trials and distresses have been the consolations which thou hast afforded me." The word rendered delight very strongly expresses refreshment and gratification.

20. Shall the throne of iniquity have fellowship with thee, which frameth mischief by a law? The throne of iniquity is a corrupt political or civil power. The question is, Shall wicked combinations be in alliance with God? By the last clause Kennicott and Horsley understand, Framing oppression under pretence of law; Jebb: Which frameth mischief by a statute; Fry: Decreeing wrong against me by law. Malice is never more devilish than when it practises its refined arts under color of law, either making a statute for the purpose, or cruelly misinterpreting some good law to that end. Witness the case of the great prophet of the captivity, Dan. vi. 4-17. The same course was pursued towards our Saviour, John xix. 7. The most horrid cruelties are practised in the name of law, justice, liberty and religion.

21. They gather themselves together against the soul of the righteous, and condemn the innocent blood. Edwards: They gather in parties; Fry: They assemble in crowds. There is entire unity of evil purpose subsisting among these enraged men. Clarke: "The devil, his angels, and his children all join and draw together when they have for object the destruction of the works of the Lord." This combination is often against the most innocent, and makes the considerate stand aghast.

22. But the LORD is my defence; and my God is the rock of my refuge. Defence, in Ps. ix. 9, and elsewhere, refuge; in Ps. xviii. 2, and elsewhere, high tower. The defence was perfect. Rock, in Ps. xviii. 2, strength; in Ps. xviii. 31, 46, rock. Re- fuge, always rendered as here, shelter, hope or trust. What could the abused and injured do, if Jehovah were not their friend? One of the most important matters brought to notice by this verse is that we must look to God alone, and not mingle our trust in the Lord with reliance on worms.

23. And he shall bring upon them their own iniquity, and shall cut them off in their own wickedness; yea, the LORD our God shall cut them off. Genuine confidence in God's veracity, believes that he will assuredly fulfil both promises and threatenings. The prophet was persuaded of the divine protection to the righteous; and did not doubt the certainty of dire retribution to the wicked. To bring iniquity is an alarming mode of declaring that one shall reap the fruit of his evil deeds. Cut off, in Ps. xviii. 40, destroy; in Ps. cxix. 139, consume. The doom of the incorrigibly wicked is fixed. Luther: "He who believes this, and is taught of God, can be patient, can let the ungodly rage, and look forward to the end, and wait the time." Calvin: "The mere defeating, and frustrating the attempts of the enemies of his people would afford no inconsiderable display of divine justice; but the judgment of God is far more marvellously manifested when they fall into the pit which they themselves had prepared." Pool: "They said of the God of Jacob that he did not see nor regard, but now they find the contrary proved to their cost."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Let us remember, consider and properly use all God's names and titles. By them as well as by formal teachings we may learn how God is the patron of the righteous, the enemy of wickedness, and a fit governor of the world.

2. If God is mild and merciful, so that by his gentleness the meek are made great; so also is he just and righteous altogether, v. 1. If he were not an avenger, 1 Thess. iv. 6, how could he be a protector of his people? Scott: "Those who imagine that the exuberant goodness and mercy of God are inconsistent with the exercise of rigorous justice, and with the infliction of vengeance on the wicked, must certainly have formed very erroneous conceptions of his character." Who could either love, or fear, or trust a being, who would treat the just and the unjust alike?

3. God's nature and his covenant lead him to act in the line of the prayers of his people; and in the very nick of time he will show himself and render a reward to the proud, vv. 1, 2. See Ps. xxxi. 23.

4. It is not the humble, but the proud, that torment the righteous, v. 2. Those, who have a due sense of their own frailties, have something better to do than to vex their fellow-servants.

5. While our natures remain what they are, time spent in sharp sufferings of any kind, and especially such as are inflicted by the hand of cruel men, must seem long, vv. 3, 4. In his inscrutable wisdom God sometimes permits the haughty to have a long career of high-handed dealing with his people. The patience of God with the wicked is so great, that even the martyrs in heaven seem greatly to wonder at its continuance, Rev. vi. 9, 10.

6. There is a great variety of ways, in which the enemies of God's people display their vileness. They are arrogant and insolent; they indulge in malignant exultations; they say all manner of hard and cutting things; they indulge in vain and wicked boastings; they have no pity; they are virtually atheists, vv. 2-7. Men have sought out many inventions; but in nothing have they shown themselves more ingenious than in their cruelty towards the meek and afflicted.

7. Therefore, let not God's people of any generation be surprised at an outbreak of the spirit of persecution, fierce and bloody, breaking them in pieces, v. 5. No man and no church knows what conspiracies may at any time burst out. These acts of hostility are commonly more imbittered, when they proceed from hypocrites and apostates than from heathen and infidels.

8. A knowledge and profession of the true religion is no guaranty against our becoming fearfully wicked and bloody. These persecutors had excellent laws, Deut. iv. 7, 8; but they were incarnate fiends. They made earth like hell, as the wicked often do, v. 6. They defied all the obligations of charity and humanity. Calvin notices the fact that the helplessness and tender age of little children will even protect them from being attacked by dogs and wild beasts. And yet persecutors care not for them. Nor do they care for gray hairs, nor the sorrows of widowhood. One must either bring his life up to his principles or his principles down to his life. This last is much the easiest, and is commonly done by the wicked; and so when necessary to their peace,

9. The wicked deny providence, v. 7. Than this there is no greater error. Morison: "When men bring themselves to think that Jehovah is too great a being to interfere in the affairs of this lower world, they are prepared, by this infidel sentiment, to adopt any evil course which may suggest itself to the depraved inclinations of the human heart."

10. The obvious and usual arguments for the great truths of natural religion are fair and unanswerable, vv. 8-10. Grotius: "This is a very excellent way of arguing; for whatever perfection there is in created beings, it is derived from God; and therefore it must be in him in the most eminent manner;" Arnd: "Learn to know God from the powers of your own body and soul. He who has made an understanding heart, should he not himself understand? he who has created a righteous heart, should he not himself be righteous? he who has made a compassionate heart, should he not himself have a father-heart?" Henry: "The atheistical, though they set up for wits, and philosophers, and politicians, yet are really the brutish among the people; if they would but understand, they would believe."

11. How futile are the plans and purposes of worldly men, v. 11. Nothing is of less value. Of all the works of the mightiest ancient monarchs not one remains to tell the glory of its author.

12. It is no novelty, but a truth long known in the church of God, that it is good to be afflicted, v. 12. The blessings connected with sanctified afflictions are many, temporal and eternal. Even in this life the righteous gathers no more delicious fruit than that from chastisement. His sorest punishments are but fatherly corrections. They lead him to an understanding of God's word which otherwise he could never acquire. Compare Ps. cxix. 67, 71.

13. Let there be a revival of the passive virtues, v. 13. Mr. Hume calls them the 'monkish virtues.' Many speak of them slightly, especially as compared with the dashing qualities so highly esteemed in the world. But quietness of mind and of spirit, like a broken heart, is of great price in the sight of God. Some seem to have forgotten that silence and meekness are graces.

14. How different is the end of the wicked from that of the righteous, and yet not more diverse than are their aims and preferences. God's people find rest even in sorrow, and have a sure pledge of an eternal home; but the wicked are getting all their good things here, while the pit is digging for them. Sad is their state even in the height of their prosperity. Dickson: "As condemned men are suffered to live till their gallows and grave be made ready, that, after their execution they may be thrust into it, so are wicked men suffered to live till they fill the cup of their iniquity, and till God have filled up the cup of his wrath for them."

15. Sad and suffering as the saints may be, yet this is their joy and their glory, that in the darkest hour of life they are still the people and the heritage of God, vv. 5, 14. They may be cast down, yea, they may be cast out, but they shall not be cast off, nor cast away. They may be broken in pieces, but God will heal all their breaches and speak comfortably to them.

16. It is easy for God to bring order out of the most terrific confusion, v. 15. Justice may be slow, but it is sure. Arnd: "Lebanus, a sophist, asked a Christian: What is your carpenter's son doing? The Christian replied: He is making a coffin for Julian the tyrant. Very soon Julian was killed in battle and brought home in a coffin."

17. To all right-minded creatures it will be a glad day when the righteous shall triumph. It is surely coming, v. 15.

18. In time of sore trial how natural it is to cry out for some one to stand up for us. But how seldom does a true friend appear. David had his Jonathan; Jeremiah had his Ebedmelech; but the great mass of men are arrant cowards when danger presses. At Paul's first answer all men forsook him. Our Saviour fared no better.

19. The more spiritual wisdom any one has, the less confidence has he in man, and the more confidence has he in God alone, v. 17.

20. The life of every good man, who has had any considerable experience, is full of wonders of some kind; among them narrow and marvellous escapes, perhaps from natural, and certainly from spiritual dangers. At all times let us look to God alone, v. 18. Spring: "It is no longer matter of sovereignty whether or not God will hear the prayers of his people; he has condescended to bind himself by promise; it is matter of rectitude."

21. God's consolations are enough to satisfy and refresh any soul that will lay hold on them, v. 19. We are not straitened in him, but only in our own compassions. Cobbin: "In the worst of times the church of God has its consolations." Let us embrace them.

22. Pious people living in countries that have long been exempt from open and legal persecution are in danger of undervaluing their great mercies, and of supposing that their exemption is owing to something else than the great kindness of God. At any moment they may find the very laws a gin, a trap and a snare to their souls, their consciences and their lives. Among the miscreants let loose on society as scourges to good men, none are more to be abhorred than those, who have a "wrong-headedness of conscience." "There is no impulse to evil-doing more to be dreaded than the impetuosity of a blind and obstinate conscience." Rulers who believe that their very office is given them that they may lord it over men's persons, consciences, estates and liberties, are never at a loss for pretexts of law. Sufficient appearances are never wanting to those who have a mind to wrong others. Compare v. 8; Ecc. iv. 1, 2. Calvin: "The case becomes doubly vexatious, when the innocent victims of oppression are not only injured, but have a stigma fixed upon their character." Wrong a man and hate him is the law of a depraved heart. Nicolson: "The first pretext of wicked men to color their proceedings against innocent men is their throne; the second is the law; and the third is their council. What tyrant could ask more? But God has prepared an awful hell for impenitent tyrants, and they will be in it long before they now expect to leave the world."

23. It should closely unite in bonds of holy affection all the people of God to see the strength and hearty consent of their enemies among themselves, v. 21. Burke: "When bad men combine, the good must associate." Horne: "Righteousness and innocence are most atrocious crimes, in the eyes of wickedness and guilt. For these crimes Cain slew his brother Abel, the Jews crucified Christ, the Pagans tortured and murdered his disciples, and bad men in all ages have persecuted the good," 1 John iii. 13.

24. The prevailing temper of Christians towards the wicked should be that of pity. They have no defence, no God, no rock, no refuge, v. 22. O pray for the ungodly, that they may turn and live.

25. The wicked are the authors of their own eternal undoing. Iniquity will be their ruin, v. 23. Henry: "A man cannot be more miserable than his own wickedness will make him, if God visit it upon him: it will cut him in the remembrance of it; it will cut him off in the recompense of it." Morison: "How often has God overtaken persecutors in the very act of oppression! They have been permitted to carry their cruel designs to their utmost height, and then judgment has come upon them to the uttermost."

Sometimes the question is asked with deep concern, Shall formal and legal persecution ever again stalk abroad on the earth? Why not? The wicked hate the righteous as much as ever they did. They are always struggling for power. Cobbin: "The church has in all ages had to complain of oppressors." Many sober and judicious commentators believe that prophecy tells of bloody scenes yet before the church. Calvin: "We should account it no strange thing to see the church suffering still under miserable misgovernment, or positive oppression."

PSALM XCV.

- 1 O come, let us sing unto the LORD: let us make a joyful noise to the Rock of our salvation.
- 2 Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving, and make a joyful noise unto him with psalms.
- 3 For the LORD is a great God, and a great King above all gods.
- 4 In his hand are the deep places of the earth: the strength of the hills is his also.
- 5 The sea is his, and he made it: and his hands formed the dry land.
- 6 O come, let us worship and bow down: let us kneel before the LORD our maker.
- 7 For he is our God; and we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand. To day if ye will hear his voice,
- 8 Harden not your heart, as in the provocation, and as in the day of temptation in the wilderness:
- 9 When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my work.
- 10 Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, and said, It is a people that do err in their heart, and they have not known my ways:
- 11 Unto whom I sware in my wrath that they should not enter into my rest.

THE Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Vulgate, Ethiopic, Theodoret, Diodati, Piscator, Fabritius, Amesius, Pool, Gill, Henry, Morison, Anderson and Scott agree that David was the author of this Psalm. Paul clearly settled this point in Heb. iv. 7. But Calmet thinks that the apostle there merely followed the common opinion in giving David as the author, because in general the Psalter was said to be written by him. But if Paul was mistaken in this, he had not plenary inspiration, and he may have erred in all he said. Paul did not give heed to fables and popular delusions either in his preaching or in his writings. Patrick also does not regard the argument from Heb. iv. 7, as conclusive of David's authorship, "because it is usual to call the whole five books by the name of the Psalms of David, when it is certain he did not make them all, but only the greater part." This reasoning would be conclusive, provided it was usual with inspired writers to speak of David as the author of all the Psalms. But they never do. What sound critic would not have been perplexed and even appalled if he had found a book of the New Testament ascribing Psalms xc. cxxxvii. to David? Inspired men do not speak so loosely. If inspiration does not infallibly preserve from error in every thing, it is no ground of authority in any thing. Although in the New Testament Moses is more than once put for the five books of Moses, (Luke xvi. 31; Acts xv. 21); yet no one pretends that he has found an instance in either Testament, where David is put for the Psalter. There is nothing in the terms or phrases of the Psalm to indicate that it had a historic occasion. It is suitable to all times. Scott dates it B. C. 1045. The names of the Most High in it are Jehovah LORD, El God and Elohim God; on which see on Ps. i. 2; vii. 4; iii. 2. Is this Psalm Messianic? Kimchi admits that it relates to the days of Messiah. Luther: "The whole of this Psalm is to be referred to Christ." Gill: "It belongs to the times of Messiah." Pool: "It hath a special reference to the days of Messiah." Morison: "There can be no doubt that this psalm has a special reference to the times of the gospel." Fry: "Certainly, the subject is the Messiah's exaltation and kingdom." Henry: "It appears to have been calculated for the days of Messiah." This view is abundantly confirmed by Paul in the Epistle to the Hebrews, especially in Chapters iii. iv. While therefore it has special reference to Messiah and his times, it was yet full of weighty and practical truth in all the days of the Jewish church in Canaan. Hengstenberg: "The Psalm has a peculiar significance for our times, in which there is so much to call up the thought that we are on the eve of some great catastrophe, and are about to meet the coming of the Lord with steps of majesty." No doubt each day is to its generation a critical time; for the messenger to call each one away comes as a thief in the night; nor can any one give too solemn heed to the call to repentance here made; but we have no evidence of any great and general catastrophe at hand.

1. O COME, let us sing unto the LORD. Come, a word of earnest invitation, rendered either come or go according to the connection. Sing, in Ps. v. 11, shout for joy; in Ps. xx. 5, rejoice; in Ps. li. 14, sing aloud; in Ps. xcii. 4, triumph. Let us make a joyful noise to the Rock of our salvation. Make a joyful noise, in Ps. xlvii. 1, shout; in Ps. xli. 11, triumph. Sometimes it is rendered sound an alarm, Num. x. 7; blow an alarm, Num. x. 9. But here and often elsewhere it simply expresses solemn and joyful acclamations of worship. Alexander: "The two verbs in this verse are those commonly applied to the vocal expression of joy and triumph." But see Ps. lxv. 13; lxvi. 1; lxxxi. 1; xcvi. 4, 6. Rock, as in Ps. xciv. 22. Rock of salvation in the Psalms here only and in Ps. lxxxix. 26. Hengstenberg well regards it as equivalent to "the unchangeable foundation and faithful author of salvation." The verse calls for a service that cannot be rendered without godly sincerity.

2. Let us come before his presence with thanksgiving. Come, the verb often rendered prevent, used twice in Mic. vi. 6. Calvin thinks it has the force of "Make haste. He calls upon them to speed into the presence of God." Presence, literally face. Praise, sometimes confession, Josh. vii. 19, oftener praise, and yet oftener thanksgiving; first found in the Psalter in Ps. xxvi. 7. And make a joyful noise unto him with psalms. The verb is the same as in verse 1. With psalms, that is with songs, with melody. See on title of Ps. iii. Patrick's paraphrase is: "Let us approach into his presence with thankful hearts, to acknowledge the benefits we have received from him: and devoutly proclaim with triumphant hymns, what a joy it is to us, that we may address ourselves unto him." Pool well observes that in a singular manner we have the presence of God in his Son the Messiah. Compare Gen. xxxii. 30. Such worship is not vain:

3. For the LORD is a great God, and a great King above all gods. The worship may fitly be of the most elevated kind to correspond with the character of the being worshipped. In Scripture God often claims greatness as belonging to his whole nature,

Ps. cxlv. 3. A great King, see on Ps. xlvii. 2. The superiority and sovereignty claimed by Jehovah are universal, the word rendered gods being applied to false gods, magistrates and angels. All authority in the universe is in the power of Jehovah.

4. In his hand are the deep places of the earth. Deep places, found only here, meaning abysses, innermost depths; Arabic, foundations; Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate, bounds. The centre of the earth is as much under the view and control of Jehovah as its surface. The strength of the hills is his also. Strength, the Hebrew word is in the plural. Several read tops, heights, summits; Horsley, inaccessible summits. The contrast is between the lowest and the highest parts of the world.

5. The sea is his, and he made it. The ocean has a father as well as a governor. God's right to rule all things rests primarily on his being Creator. And his hands formed the dry land. All earth has a maker, to whom it owes allegiance. Sea and dry land are in opposition, as were abysses and heights in v. 4.

6. O come, let us worship and bow down. Come, the same word used to Noah: Come thou and all thy house into the ark. It has the kindness of a call and the authority of a command. Worship; the same verb in the second commandment is bow down, Ex. xx. 5; Deut. v. 9. It always expresses worship civil or religious. Bow down, rendered kneel, sink down. Fry says it describes an act of bowing so as to touch the floor with the forehead, while the worshipper is on his hands and knees. Jebb gives it fall down; Alexander, bend. Compare 2 Chron. vii. 3, where it is rendered bowed themselves. Let us kneel before the LORD our maker. Here again we are fitly reminded of the right God has over us by creation. The creature cannot be too reverential to the Creator. Kneel, that is bend the knees, as those used to do, who profoundly adore. Our humility before God should not be stinted. And there is good reason not only for humbling ourselves before him, but also for confiding in him.

7. For he is our God, he sustains to us a covenant relation, and has done us all the good we ever received. And we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand. The inspired writers delight in allusions to the office of shepherd and the relations of his flock to him, Ps. xxiii. 1-4; lxxix. 13; lxxx. 1. The clause is a mere allusion to pastoral life. The figure is soon dropped, and there is a return to plain terms. Meantime this clause strongly and tenderly enforces the obligation of obedience arising from God's kind care. Sheep, often flock, also cattle; commonly sheep, in distinction from other cattle, Gen. xii. 16; xxi. 27; Deut. xiv. 26; 2 Chron. xiv. 15; Job i. 3. From this to the close of the Psalm God is speaker. To-day if ye will hear his voice. To hear his voice is to obey him and follow him. Some would make this clause complete in itself, giving if the sense of Oh that, as in the Greek, Luke xix. 42. In support, Ex. xxxii. 32; 1 Chron. iv. 10, may be cited as like cases. Another explanation is this; the particle rendered if has several times the sense of surely, doubtless, as in Num. xiv. 23, 30. And so we might gather this sense: As I have been a good shepherd to this people, surely they will to-day hear my voice. This gives a good sense, but is not without difficulties. A third explanation is that which would read the verse thus: For he is our God; and we are the people of his pasture, and the sheep of his hand, if ye will hear his voice to-day, thus making it a conditional promise. To all this it is objected that there are grammatical difficulties, and that the apostle follows the Septuagint; and that connects the latter clause of v. 7 with what comes after. On the subject of quotations from the Septuagint, see on Ps. iv. 4. To the end the apostle had in view the text of the Septuagint was sufficient, and as that version was well known, he may have quoted it without endorsing it as perfectly correct in all points. Yet there is no better sense than that gathered from the common version, reading, To-day if ye will hear his voice,

8. Harden not your heart, as in the provocation, and as in the day of temptation in the wilderness. In the provocation. literally, at Meribah. Temptation, Massah. Numbers of scholars prefer not to translate these words here. Nor is it necessary that we should; though in so doing we follow all the ancient versions and many modern translations. The allusions in Meribah and Massah are clearly to historic events of great prominence. See Ex. xvii. 7; Num. xx. 13, 24; xxvii. 14; Deut. xxxii. 51; xxxiii. 8, and on Ps. lxxxi. 7. Meribah signifies strife, contention; then, provocation. Massah signifies trial, temptation. The intelligent reader gets the same idea whether we translate or transfer these words, with the advantage of an impressive historic allusion, if we simply transfer them. He adds of those times,

9. When your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my work. Tempted, see on Ps. xxvi. 2, where it is prove; and on Ps. lxxviii. 18; xli. 56, where it is tempted. Proved, in Ps. xxvi. 2, rendered examine; more commonly try, as in Ps. xi. 4, 5. Each of these words is here used in a bad sense, because they describe acts of unbelief and rebellion. God should be taken at his word, and neither distrusted nor murmured against. Saw my work, that is, my special work in miraculously supplying their wants at Meribah and Massah; or my whole work in delivering their nation.

10. Forty years long was I grieved with this generation, and said, It is a people that do err in their heart, and they have not known my ways. Was grieved, as in Ps. cxix. 158; cxxxix. 21. When it expresses the state of mind towards one's self, it is rendered loathe. To err in the heart is to have a radical defect in character. For those who have God's word not to know his ways is proof of wilful ignorance, and that is perverseness.

11. Unto whom I swear in my wrath that they should not enter into my rest. For unto whom, some prefer wherefore, or on account of which wickedness and perverseness. Swear, see the oath in Num. xiii. 21–23; 28–30; Deut. i. 34, 35. Rest; in the epistle to the Hebrews Paul shows the scriptural import of this word to be fourfold: 1. The rest of the Sabbath as kept by God at the end of the creation; 2. The rest of Israel in Canaan; 3. The rest of the gospel dispensation; 4. The rest of heavenly glory. Here it has primary reference to the rest of the promised land.

It cannot be doubted that in the epistle to the Hebrews Paul has cast more light on the last four or five verses than all other expositors have done. Read him. Some have spoken of abruptness in the ending of this ode. But surely none can complain of a want of awful solemnity.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. If those, who reject audible singing in God's worship were consistent, they would reject audible prayer. The latter is not more clearly enjoined than the former, vv. 1, 2.

2. Into this work we should enter with gladness and holy mirth, making a joyful noise unto God, vv. 1, 2.

3. The worship of God's people should be specially hearty and earnest, when their theme is salvation and its author, v. 2. The Rock that has ever followed the church is Christ, 1 Cor. x. 4. Nor should we expect to raise the devotions of men to any height of spiritual comfort till we bring them to contemplate Christ Jesus.

4. If we would be strong and happy servants of Christ, let us meditate much on God's greatness, v. 3. He is the infinite God, unmeasurable in all his glorious attributes. There is no limit to any of his perfections, and there is no perfection of God, in which his people may not find matter of exultation.

5. A great test of character is presented to us in the sovereign authority of God, and especially in the kingly office of Christ, v. 3. It is in vain for us to pretend love to the teaching or atonement of Christ, if we reject his laws and statutes. If we will not let him reign over us, it proves that he has not been formed in us the hope of glory. What say you to the yoke of Christ?

6. It is a blessed truth that all nature is under the control of God, and especially that all things are put under Christ to the glory of God, and the establishment of the reign of grace, vv. 4, 5. If an atom or an agent, if life or death, if Satan or Gabriel, the sea or the dry land, the mountain tops or the deep abysses were beyond divine control, then a good man might suffer too much for his good, be tried beyond the power of endurance, or die before his time. But now such things are not possible.

7. In all approaches to God we should see that our hearts and behaviour be humble. In God's worship we cannot make too prostrate obeisance of our faculties of soul or body. If we regard any posture in prayer or praise more lowly and reverent than another, let us assume it. All the forms of expression in v. 7, teach us humility not only of mind but of body also. Pool: "By these expressions he teacheth us that even in gospel times God is to be glorified and worshipped, as well with the members of our bodies, as with the faculties of our souls." Gill: "Let us kneel before the Lord our Maker; both in a natural and spiritual sense." Nicolson: "Adoration, humble adoration; outward worship, that of the body, as well as inward, that of the soul, is his due." Let all our worship be solemn, not frivolous, awful not familiar, humble not arrogant. Yet acceptable worship has been offered to God in every posture. David sat before the LORD and offered an acceptable prayer, 1 Chron. xvii. 16-27. The ancients often stood with the hands lifted up towards heaven and their service was acceptable, Ps. cxli. 2. The publican stood, and lifted neither his hands nor his eyes to heaven, and yet he was heard. Hezekiah turned his face to the wall, as he lay on his bed, and prayed, and God heard him.

8. Let us exhort and encourage ourselves to all right worship, by often thinking of the covenant relation of God to all his people. If we indeed adore him, he is our God, v. 7.

9. Especially should we cherish right thoughts of the divinity of our Saviour, who is our Maker and our God, John i. 1, 3; xx. 28; Col. i. 16.

10. In the Scriptures amazing urgency is manifest that men should pay immediate attention to the concerns of their souls, and that they should to-day hear God's voice, v. 7. Compare 2 Cor. vi. 1, 2; Heb. iii. 13. Nor is such urgency uncalled for. Many are so much like Pharaoh that even when they are suffering and in great distress, and the proposal is to pray for the removal of the plague, and they are called on to name a time, they say "to-morrow," Ex. viii. 10. Jehovah now calls tenderly; to-morrow you may be in the land of silence. THE NIGHT COMETH WHEN NO MAN CAN WORK.

11. The voice of God, which it most behoves us all to hear, is the glorious gospel of the blessed God, v. 7. In it the Father, Son and Holy Ghost send us messages of mercy, which it chiefly concerns us to know and embrace and which none can defer even for a moment, but at extreme peril and with great guilt. Compare v. 11; Heb. x. 28, 29.

12. Many rest quite satisfied with themselves, because they are not revilers, blasphemers, drunkards, or otherwise openly profane and immoral, and think themselves in little danger. They forget that the very core of depravity is a hard heart, v. 8. It is of itself just cause of everlasting banishment from God.

13. If men persist in sin, it must be in the face of many and awful examples of vengeance. Sometimes God points us to a Cain or a Lamech, permitted to live enduring the horrors of a guilty conscience. Sometimes he points us to Absalom hanging by the hair, or to Haman on his gallows seventy-five feet high. Sometimes he tells us of the old world destroyed by a flood, or of the cities of the plain suffering the vengeance of eternal fire. Here we are told of nearly a whole generation who set out from Egypt and never reached the promised land. Their carcasses fell in the wilderness. Oh that men would be warned.

14. The best and most solemn instruction from this Scripture is given by Paul. Read and ponder Heb. iii. 12-19; iv. 1-11. Language could not be more solemn. Tholuck: "Since God addressed the same admonition to later generations, the apostle concludes that the rest which God had prepared for the people in the earthly Canaan was not the right one; and that there was another rest, from which men might exclude themselves through unbelief." Let no man slight the mercy of the Lord. It was bought with blood. Now, sinner, now is your time.

PSALM XCVI.

- 1 O sing unto the LORD a new song: sing unto the LORD, all the earth.
- 2 Sing unto the LORD, bless his name; shew forth his salvation from day to day.
- 3 Declare his glory among the heathen, his wonders among all people.
- 4 For the LORD is great, and greatly to be praised: he is to be feared above all gods.
- 5 For all the gods of the nations are idols: but the LORD made the heavens.
- 6 Honour and majesty are before him: strength and beauty are in his sanctuary.
- 7 Give unto the LORD, O ye kindreds of the people, give unto the LORD glory and strength.
- 8 Give unto the LORD the glory due unto his name: bring an offering, and come into his courts.
- 9 O worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness: fear before him, all the earth.
- 10 Say among the heathen that the LORD reigneth: the world also shall be established that it shall not be moved: he shall judge the people righteously.
- 11 Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad: let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof.
- 12 Let the field be joyful, and all that is therein: then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice
- 13 Before the LORD: for he cometh, for he cometh to judge the earth: he shall judge the world with righteousness, and the people with his truth.

THE authorship of this Psalm is ascribed to David by the Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Luther, Fabritius, Amesius, Gill, Pool, Henry, Horne, Scott, Morison and Edwards. To the same conclusion one is fairly led by the history of removing the ark from the house of Obed-edom, see 1 Chron. xvi. "Then on that day David delivered first this psalm, to thank the Lord, into the hand of Asaph and his brethren." That Psalm contains twenty-nine verses and this but thirteen. Yet all of this (with small exceptions) is found in that. Nor are the variations between this and that so great as between Psalm xviii. and 2 Sam. xxii. There is no ground for reasonable doubt that David wrote this Psalm. The plea for objecting to the Davidic authorship is first that four of the ancient versions say that it was used on the occasion of the completion of the second temple and after the captivity. Yet these very versions give David as its author. It is very probable that it was so used, as indeed it would be very suitable. But that does not conflict with the idea that David wrote it. The other ground of objection is that there is a striking resemblance between parts of this poem and portions of the prophecies of Isaiah. If such argument proves anything, it is that Isaiah was familiar with this and incorporated, under divine guidance, some of its truths and predictions into his own inspired utterances. David was as truly a prophet as Isaiah, and lived before him several hundred years. The historic occasion of the original composition is given in 1 Chron. xvi. Scott dates this Psalm B. C. 1045; Clarke, B. C. 515. Is it Messianic? On this subject there is hardly any doubt. The Syriac calls it "a prophecy concerning the advent of Christ and the calling of the Gentiles who should believe in him." Luther: "This is a prophecy concerning the kingdom of Christ, and the spreading of the gospel over the whole world and before every creature; which gospel will be a word of joy and thanksgiving, of peace, of rejoicing, and of a continued sacrifice of praise." To the same effect we might cite Calvin, Venema, Gill, Morison, Horne, Scott, Fry and Tholuck. The only name of God here found is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Psalm i. 2. This Psalm in several respects resembles Ps. xcv., but widely differs from it in others.

1. O sing unto the LORD a new song. Sing, cognate to the noun song. On a new song see on Ps. xxxiii. 3; xl. 3. Gill and Fry quote Jarchi as saying that "wherever a new song is mentioned, it is to be understood of future time, or the times of the Messiah." This would make Psalms xxxiii. xl. xevi. cxliv. and cxlix. Messianic. Anderson: "It may be called new, from its having been adapted to a new purpose—from its having been intended to celebrate new mercies conferred upon the Jews, and to lead the mind forward to the glorious era of the coming of Messiah, and the establishment of his kingdom." Tholuck: "Songs of praise shall be addressed unto the Lord with renewed faith and renewed love." Clarke thinks a new song is "a song of peculiar excellence." Scott: "'A new song,' this perhaps implies that it was altered by some prophet, as adapted to a new occasion." The phrase a new song is found in Isa. xlii. 10; Rev. v. 9; xiv. 3. Sing unto the LORD all the earth. This clause shows that the mercy, for which a new song was demanded related to all nations.

2. Sing unto the LORD, bless his name; shew forth his salvation from day to day. Sing and bless, very uniformly rendered. Shew forth, in Ps. xl. 9, preached; in Isa. lxi. 1, preach good tidings; in 2 Sam. i. 20; Ps. lxviii. 11, publish; in Isa. xl. 9, bringest good tidings. It is confined to good news and glad messages. We might render it, Publish good tidings of salvation. The Chaldee: Announce his redemption; Syriac and Arabic: Preach his salvation. Salvation, as in Ps. iii. 8; lxxxix. 26; xci. 16. This work must be done from day to day, continually.

3. Declare his glory among the heathen, his wonders among all people. Declare, the corresponding noun is a book; and the participle is often rendered a scribe, a writer, Ps. xlv. 1. The verb is rendered, tell, shew forth, declare. The variety of verbs used in vv. 1-3, proves that we are to employ all proper means for making known the Saviour. One of these methods is by writing. His glory and his wonders are the same, John ii. 11. His divinity, incarnation, birth, life, miracles, teachings, example, death, resurrection, ascension, session at God's right hand and coming to judgment, are his wonders and his glory too. Heathen, as in Ps. ii. 1, often Gentiles, oftener nations. Nations, as in Ps. iii. 6; commonly rendered people. It occurs again in vv. 5, 7, 10, 13, is in the plural throughout the Psalm. We have very ancient authority for making known the gospel to the Gentiles, Rom. xvi. 25, 26. Nor have preachers a poor theme;

4. For the LORD is great, and greatly to be praised: he is to be feared above all gods. See on Ps. xcv. 3. The next verse limits the meaning of gods.

5. For all the gods of the nations are idols. Though Jehovah warns magistrates that they shall die like men, Ps. lxxxii. 7; and charges his angels with folly, Job iv. 18; yet he never calls either of them idols, vanities, nothings, things of nought, things of no value. On the contrary he calls magistrates gods, and children of the Most High, Ps. lxxxvi. 6; and he has clothed the angels with such glory that when a good man saw one of them, he thought it was God himself and fell down to worship him, Rev. xxii. 8, 9. Idols have made nothing, done nothing, preserved nothing. But the Lord made the heavens. As in Ps. xcv. 5, so here God's supremacy is based upon his being Creator. The idol was a mere dumb senseless thing. Not so with Jehovah.

6. Honour and majesty are before him: strength and beauty are in his sanctuary. On the first of these nouns see on Ps. viii. 1; on the second, on Ps. viii. 5; on the third, on Ps. viii. 2; on the fourth, on Ps. lxxi. 8. In Ps. xxi. 5, the first and second are united as here. Their rendering varies considerably; unitedly they express all excellence and glory.

7. Give unto the LORD, O ye kindreds of the people, give unto the LORD glory and strength. To give here is to ascribe, as in Ps. xxix. 1. For kindreds of the people, Calvin has assemblies of peoples; Edwards, Pool and Fry, families of the nations; Alexander, families of nations. If we vary from our version, the best rendering is families. The idea of close relationship is expressed in the original. God has made of one blood all nations. Glory, as in Ps. iii. 3. Strength, as in v. 6. Hammond: "The same word signifies power, dominion, empire."

8. Give unto the Lord the glory due unto his name. Give glory, as in v. 7. Bring an offering. Offering, gift, oblation, sacrifice; i. e., says Horsley, an offering of bread and flour, not of flesh. Alexander: "The word offering is the one used to denote the bloodless or vegetable oblation of the Mosaic ritual." This is commonly so; but it is the very word applied to Abel's offering, Gen. iv. 4. It may denote all kinds of ordained offerings. See on Ps. xx. 3. Compare Ps. cxli. 2. Calvin: "It is here taken to denote the whole worship of God." And come into his courts. Courts, as in Ps. lxxv. 4; lxxxiv. 2, 10; xcii. 13.

9. O worship the LORD in the beauty of holiness. Worship, in Ps. xcv. 6, bow down; in Ps. xxix. 2; xlv. 11; xcvi. 7; xcix. 5, 9, worship. In Ps. xxix. 2, we have the whole clause. Fear before him, all the earth. Fear, in Ps. xcvi. 4, tremble. It is a very strong word. All the earth, as in v. 1.

10. Say among the heathen that the LORD reigneth. Heathen, as in v. 3. Reigneth, as in Ps. xlvii. 8; xciii. 1; xcvi. 1; xcix. 1. The verb is in the preterite. God has reigned from the beginning and reigns now. Or, the prophet is so sure that he will everywhere set up his kingdom, that he speaks of it as something past. The world also shall be established that it shall not be moved. The stability of the order of nature is found in the unchangeable dominion of God. Nor to that end is anything more required. Compare Ps. xciii. 1; cxix. 90, 91. He shall judge the people righteously; literally in righteousnesses, in perfect equity and uprightness. People, plural throughout the Psalm. Judge, that is, rule the nations, and execute righteousness among them, and plead the cause of the poor and afflicted. Such a prospect is very animating:

11. Let the heavens rejoice, and let the earth be glad; let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof.

12. Let the field be joyful, and all that is therein: then shall all the trees of the wood rejoice. Tholuck: "It will not be a reign of terror, but to all who obey his laws a reign of joy, of joy so great, that inanimate nature herself shall participate in 'the glorious liberty of the children of God,' and give loud utterance to her rejoicing." Verses 11, 12 are best regarded as prophecies. The verbs are in the future. All creation shall rejoice

13. Before the LORD: for he cometh, for he cometh to judge the earth: he shall judge the world with righteousness, and the people with his truth. The terms of this verse have their usual signification. Although the final judgment of the world shall bring unspeakable joy to all right-minded people, and although the administration of Christ over the world would not be complete without the decisions and revelations of the last day; yet the primary reference of this passage is not to a "retributive, but a gracious judging," when the law of love shall universally prevail, when men shall copy the divine equity, candor, and fidelity; when the arts of peace shall entirely supersede those of destruction, and men shall do to others as they would have others do to them.

Patrick: "Let them welcome that day; and meet the Lord with forward affection, who is coming to them: For he comes to reform the earth, and will govern mankind by righteous and merciful laws; and faithfully keep his word with all those that truly observe them."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Let us abound in singing God's praises as long as we live, vv. 1, 2. Thrice we are here called on to sing, sing, sing. It is a blessed privilege to us poor creatures, who are so borne down with sorrow and grief, to be allowed, yea, often summoned to perform this delightful work, which forms so great a part of the worship offered in the temple not made with hands.

2. Let us never lose sight of the Redeemer and his salvation, v. 2. Cobbin: "The salvations of former ages were celebrated; but they only faintly shadowed forth the 'great salvation' that is in Christ."

3. Wonders will never cease while there is a God in existence, a Saviour on the throne, and a Holy Spirit fitting men's souls for glory, v. 3. Luther: "Each believer is a new creature and a marvellous work of God; and all believers daily do marvellous works and are marvellous monuments, in that they continue in spiritual life, and are finally conquerors over the mighty powers of sin and the devil." Heaven is and ever will be full of wonders. A religion without wonders is false. A theology without wonders is heretical.

4. Let us spread far and wide the glorious knowledge of God in Christ. Especially let us send it to the heathen, vv. 3, 10. We have no duty more obvious or more pressing. If a redeemed sinner should keep silence on redemption, he would be a monster. Hengstenberg: "This is a missionary hymn for all ages of the church; and it becomes more and more appropriate to our times in proportion as the heathen begin to respond to the call." The enemies of missions ought to come to a solemn pause, and well consider that alarming text, 1 Thess. ii. 16.

5. The opposition to the truth of the gospel arising from any power in the false gods was nothing; for they were nothing themselves, v. 5. No! it was not the poor dumb idol that did the mischief. You might have kicked him, or spit upon him, or broken him in pieces, or burnt him, and he never would have resented it. It was the power of Satan and sin in the heart supporting a system of idolatry, that did all the harm. It was superstition, the madness and debasement flowing from an old system of idolatry, and the natural depravity of the heart that made the blood of the martyrs flow like water. Idolaters had on their side prescription, the natural heart, political power and vast majorities. Calvin: "The inference is plain, that we must not conclude that to be necessarily the true religion which meets with the approbation of the multitude."

6. We may safely and heartily rejoice in all the arrangements and supports of the divine government, v. 6. (Whatever may seem wrong, all is right and glorious at the throne of God.) encouraging thought—

7. We should be very careful not to separate ourselves from the ordinances of divine worship, lest like withered branches we become unfruitful and die. Strength and beauty are in his sanctuary, v. 6. The best men need the best means and God's blessing on them to keep them from failing in the great work of life.

8. Let not any man or people fail to ascribe unto God the glory and honor, which are his due, vv. 7, 8.

9. God has a right to prescribe and ordain the entire rites and modes of his own worship, and it is our wisdom to submit to all his appointments. Under the gospel the sacrifices God requires of us are prayer, praise, alms, a broken heart and a total consecration of ourselves to his service, 1 Pet. ii. 5; Ps. cxli. 2; Heb. xiii. 15, 16;

Ps. li. 17; Rom. xii. 1. Let us offer them with a willing mind. In the ordinances of worship, let us not teach or receive for doctrines the commandments of men.

10. Even if public worship is so conducted that owing to the feebleness of the minister a ripe Christian may find himself but little edified, yet public worship is a divine ordinance, and we are bound on several accounts to come into the courts of the Lord, v. 8. Much is due to example; more, to the express command of God.

11. The more we are instructed in the nature of true religion, the more clear will be our conviction that all attempts to serve God without fear will prove disastrous to our souls, vv. 4, 8.

12. Nor will God under any dispensation ever dispense with sincerity, integrity, uprightness, rectitude. Any service not rendered in the beauty of holiness will surely be rejected by him, who is a consuming fire, v. 8.

13. Our King is not only King of peace, but he is King of righteousness, v. 10. Blessed be God for all that is pure, and glorious, and infinite, and excellent in the character and conduct of our Lord Jesus Christ.

14. Let us joyfully receive the gospel and its Author. Let none be reluctant or linger. Christ's work is a work of redemption from sin, from wrath, and from wretchedness. He is light, and life, and salvation. His reign is like a morning without clouds. Let joy seize the highest notes of exultation as it proclaims to the world the glorious mysteries revealed in the gospel.

PSALM XCVII.

- 1 The LORD reigneth; let the earth rejoice; let the multitude of isles be glad thereof.
- 2 Clouds and darkness are round about him: righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne.
- 3 A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about.
- 4 His lightnings enlightened the world: the earth saw, and trembled.
- 5 The hills melted like wax at the presence of the LORD, at the presence of the Lord of the whole earth.
- 6 The heavens declare his righteousness, and all the people see his glory.
- 7 Confounded be all they that serve graven images, that boast themselves of idols: worship him, all ye gods.
- 8 Zion heard, and was glad; and the daughters of Judah rejoiced because of thy judgments, O LORD.
- 9 For thou, LORD, art high above all the earth: thou art exalted far above all gods.
- 10 Ye that love the LORD, hate evil: he preserveth the souls of his saints; he delivereth them out of the hand of the wicked.
- 11 Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart.
- 12 Rejoice in the LORD, ye righteous; and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness.

DAVID is given as the author of this Psalm by the Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Pool, Patrick and others. It seems nearly certain that it was written by the author of Psalm xcvi. Some Jews think Moses wrote it; but the weight of authority and evidence would ascribe it to the son of Jesse. Clarke: "Who the author was is uncertain: it is much in the spirit of David's finest compositions: and yet many learned men suppose it was written to celebrate the Lord's power and goodness in the restoration of the Jews from Babylonish captivity." Those, who seek a historic origin, vary much in their conjectures; some referring it to David's obtaining possession of the entire kingdom of Judah and Israel, 2 Sam. v.; some to his possession of certain countries not before held by Israel, 1 Chron. xviii.; some to the suppression of Absalom's rebellion; some to the removal of the ark. Scott dates it B. C. 1045; Clarke, B. C. 515. This Psalm is certainly Messianic. The Syriac says it is "a Psalm of David, in which he foretells the advent of Christ. He also insinuates in it his last coming." Luther: "Like the preceding, this also is a prophecy concerning Christ and his kingdom;" Calvin: "The description which we have of the kingdom of God in this Psalm does not apply to the state of it under the law. We may infer, accordingly, that it contains a prediction of that kingdom of Christ, which was erected upon the introduction of the gospel;" Tholuck: "We, who behold in history the partial manifestation at least of the Psalmist's vision, are entitled to the assertion that 'the theme of this Psalm is the triumph of Christ over an unbelieving world in its present partial fulfilment and ultimate completion.'" We might cite Fabritius, Piscator, Venema, Amesius, Patrick, Gill, Henry, Horne, Morison, Scott and others. By quoting v. 7, in Heb. i. 6, Paul has settled this matter. The names of the Almighty here found are Jehovah LORD, Adonai Lord and Gel-yohn, here rendered High, but commonly Most High, on which see on Psalms i. 2; ii. 4; vii. 17.

1. The LORD reigneth, literally the LORD has reigned. See on Ps. xciii. 1; xcvi. 10. If we take it as prophecy, the thing is so certain that we may speak of it as an accomplished fact. If we take it as a declaration of what now exists, it is an assertion of providence, made sure by the fact that God has always governed the world. Let the earth rejoice, or the earth shall rejoice. See on Ps. xcvi. 11. Let the multitude of isles be glad thereof. The verb is still in the future. Isles, always so rendered except in Jer. xlvii. 4, country; but if as is supposed Crete is intended, it should there be island. It seems clearly to have the simple meaning of dry land in Isa. xlii. 15. So also it means coast or sea-coast, for it is understood to be applied to the Peloponnesus or Greece under the name of Isles of Elishah, Ezek. xxvii. 7. For multitude of isles Horsley reads various settlements of man; and Fry, extended shores. A Hebrew in Judea would thus have designated all lands reached by ships. The phrase embraces the remotest Gentiles. Compare Isa. xlii. 4; Matt. xii. 21.

2. Clouds and darkness are round about him. Clouds, see on Ps. lxxviii. 14; in the singular, but often fitly rendered in the plural. Darkness, see on Ps. xviii. 9. Four explanations are offered. 1. Some regard Joel ii. 2; Zeph. i. 15, as parallel, and understand times of alarm and gloominess, wasting and desolation. This cannot be the meaning here, for the world is called to be joyful, not sad nor alarmed. 2. Others refer it to the pillar of cloud, which was light to Israel and darkness to their foes. It was long an emblem of light and comfort, Isa. iv. 5. If this is the true explanation the meaning is that God guides, enlightens and protects his people, while he sends terror, confusion and disaster to their enemies. 3. Some refer the clause to the awful scenes of Sinai, Deut. iv. 11; v. 22, where we have the same words; one rendered clouds; the other, thick darkness. If this Psalm is Messianic, this view is excluded by Heb. xii. 18-24. 4. By clouds and darkness others think the prophet points to the inscrutableness of God's nature and ways even under the gospel. Clouds and darkness produce obscurity. What is obscure is unsearchable, though the mysteriousness may arise from the glory of the object, and may inspire great joy. What is so mysterious as the providence of God over the world, and especially the display of his love in the gift of his dear Son? Rom. xi. 33. Yet both in providence and in redemption all holy creatures in heaven and earth rejoice. It has been shown that in the gospel we are come to Mount Sion and not to mount Sinai. So that, if our Psalm refers to gospel times, we are rather confined by the words clouds and darkness to the simple idea of mysteriousness. In Lam. iii. 44, the prophet seems to use cloud as expressive of impenetrable mysteriousness. In Job xxxviii. 9, we have both clouds and darkness in the sense of causes of obscurity. But this mysteriousness does not justify any doubt or suspicion respecting the perfect rectitude of Jehovah's dealings with men, for Righteousness and judgment are the habitation of his throne. Righteousness, as in Ps. iv. 1, 5; in Ps. ix. 4, right; in Ps. lxxxix. 14, justice. Judgment, see on Ps. i. 5; vii. 6; in Ps. ix. 4, right. The two words cover the whole ground of equity and justice. For habitation some have place; others, seat, basis, support; others, establishment. Compare Pr. xxv. 5; xxix. 14. Patrick: "He supports his government by doing exact and equal justice." Henry: "A golden thread of justice runs through the whole web of his government." In all his acts of government, God makes such decisions and arrangements as are perfectly consistent with right, justice, holiness. Were perfect justice between man and man surely and promptly administered, human society would be most happy. But if there were no delays on the part of God in inflicting vengeance on those, who sin against him, the memory of his long-suffering would perish from among men, and the earth itself would soon be depopulated. Mysterious as are some of God's delays, yet he is doing right all the while, and in the end he will show that in all cases he has been righteous.

3. A fire goeth before him, and burneth up his enemies round about. The most terrible judgments of God on transgressors, as in the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, were but expressions of his righteous displeasure. But sometimes fire is an emblem of God's awful purity. Thus John Owen and others, by devouring fire in Isa. xxxiii. 14, understand the intense and awful holiness of God. Compare Mal. iii. 2, 3; Matt. xxi. 12, 13, 23-27; Luke ii. 34; John ii. 13-17; vi. 66. This gives a good sense; but is not insisted on. It is rather probable that by fire here we are to understand the display of God's terrible majesty; see on Ps. l. 3. Alexander: "The future form is used because the verb describes not what the wrath of God is doing or has actually done, but what it will do when provoked by obstinate resistance." Enemies, troublers, adversaries.

4. His lightnings enlightened the world. Lightnings, united with thunders, in Ex. xix. 16; with rain in Ps. cxxxv. 7. In application to a sword or spear the same word is rendered glittering, Deut. xxxii. 41; Hab. iii. 11. But see on Ps. xviii. 14; lxxvii. 18, where the same word occurs. Enlightened, in the preterite. World, as in Ps. ix. 8; xviii. 15; xvi. 10, 13. The earth saw and trembled. On the effect of God's majestic and terrible presence on all nature, see on Ps. xxix. 8, 9. Trembled, elsewhere travailed, was in anguish, was sore pained.

5. The hills melted like wax at the presence of the LORD, at the presence of the Lord of the whole earth. Hills, any elevations great or small. Often by hills or mountains we are to understand political powers, or states. Perhaps that is the true interpretation here. Compare Ps. xlvi. 2; Mic. i. 4. The Berleberg Bible gives even a more extended sense: "Even the mountains of human height and pride, the heights of human intellect and vanity, and also the kingdoms of the world." Compare 2 Cor. x. 5. Nothing can stand in opposition to God.

6. The heavens declare his righteousness. See on Ps. l. 6. In a gracious no less than in a retributive judgment God proceeds so as in no way to infringe on justice or equity. Mercy triumphs over judgment, not by trampling on it, but by meeting all its demands, and yet saving the sinner. The more God's ways are understood, the clearer will it be that he has done right. The heavens, either the angels, or God himself acting conspicuously. And all the people see his glory. The verb is in the past tense, expressive of entire certainty that the thing shall come to pass. Some have thought these predictions based on what was said by prophets who lived several hundred years later; but David foretold the glory of Christ's kingdom as clearly as Isaiah, Zechariah, or Malachi. The glory is his honor and renown arising from the conduct of his great kingdom on principles of eternal rectitude.

7. Confounded be all they that serve graven images, that boast themselves of idols. The verb is in the future and is best so rendered, see on Ps. vi. 10. Serve, applied to serving the Lord, or the king, or idols, Ex. x. 11; Jer. xl. 9; Ps. ii. 11. All worship of images graven, carved, molten, painted, or imagined is idolatry; and all idols in temples or in our hearts are vanities, Ps. xvi. 5. In the day of wrath idols will not save. Worship him, all ye gods. This rendering is approved by Fabritius, Piscator, Venema, church of England, Edwards, Jebb and Fry. Instead of gods we have angels in the Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Amesius, Tremellius and Junius, Waterland, etc. What settles the question with the great mass of commentators is that Paul quotes in Heb. i. 6, the Septuagint version of these words: Let all the angels of God worship him. Calvin says this "properly applies to the angels." Patrick says: "Let all that are called gods, whether princes on earth, or angels in heaven, bow down to him, as the only Saviour." Henry says that, Hebrews i. 6 "helps us to a key to this whole Psalm, and shows us that it must be applied to the exalted Redeemer." Clarke: "The words are most certainly applied to the Saviour of the world by the author of the epistle to the Hebrews;" Horne: "The clause declares the supremacy of Christ over all that are called gods, in heaven and in earth;" Scott: "Christ as Emmanuel is peculiarly intended." The term elohim is applied to angels, Ps. viii. 5. Nor would there be any fitness in calling on dumb idols to worship the Firstbegotten. Some think that idols here are put for those who worship them. But in the early part of the epistle to the Hebrews Paul is conducting a close argument with people, who had all their lives known the Old Testament Scriptures; and the whole power of his reasoning would have been lost if he had quoted irrelevant proofs. If his argument is that Christ is superior to angels, because they are required to worship him, all is plain; otherwise, nugatory. Moreover, it is admitted that other quotations from Ps. ii. 7; viii. 5; xlv. 6, 7; cii. 25, 26; civ. 4, 5; cx. 1, found in the early part of the same epistle are very pertinent and conclusive proofs. What right have we to make this an exception, a mere allusion and accommodation?

8. Zion heard, and was glad; and the daughters of Judah rejoiced because of thy judgments, O LORD. Zion, the church of God, the whole family named in heaven and earth. The Jews as a people have never hailed with gladness the birth, ascension or doctrine of Christ; but only God's true people. The true Israel heard and was heartily glad. By the daughters of Judah, some understand the smaller towns or villages of the Holy Land. But as on public occasions of mirth or mourning, Jewish women took a prominent part, the allusion is probably to that custom. See on Ps. xlviii. 11. Judgments, see on Ps. x. 5; xix. 9; xxxvi. 6.

9. For thou, LORD, art high above all the earth. See on Ps. lxxxiii. 18. High, with very few exceptions in the Psalms rendered Highest, Most High. Thou art exalted far above all gods. See on Ps. xlvii. 9; xcv. 3. Calvin: "There is a comparison drawn between God and the angels, and whatever has any claim to eminence. The Psalmist limits all other excellency in such a manner as to leave no room for questioning that all majesty is comprehended in God only. This was the case more eminently when God manifested himself in his only-begotten Son, who is the express image of himself."

10. Ye that love the LORD, hate evil. This clause is parallel to Ps. xxxiv. 14. There cannot be excessive hatred to sin. We may well abhor it and ourselves on account of it, Rom. xii. 9; Job xlii. 6. The special warning here seems to be against doing evil that good may come, against using unlawful means for obtaining victory. Well may we do our duty and leave results with God; for he preserveth the souls of his saints

See on Ps. xxxi. 23; xxxvii. 28. Souls, either lives or souls. Saints, merciful, godly. Yea, he delivereth them out of the hand of the wicked. Delivereth, in the future, he does it now and will do it forever. Wicked, in Ps. i. 1, ungodly; all wicked men and fallen angels.

11. Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart. Darkness is often an emblem of all evil, natural and moral; so light represents all good, temporal and spiritual. Here it is put for comfort and happiness, interpreted in the last clause as gladness. Dark days may come to good men, but they shall not last always. Light is sown for them, that is, it is scattered far and wide, and may spring up in a gourd as to Jonah, in a lion's den as to Daniel, in a dungeon as to Paul and Silas, from a raven as to Elijah, from a long-lost son as to Jacob, from a crucified Redeemer as to all Christians. The light that is sown will bring a great harvest, a rich return. In this verse the word righteous is singular, and upright plural. If this variation in number means anything, it is that God's people shall both individually and collectively be cared for and blessed.

12. Rejoice in the LORD, ye righteous; and give thanks at the remembrance of his holiness. The first clause is found in Ps. xxxii. 11; the latter, in Ps. xxx. 4. Joy is provided, let the righteous not make themselves sad, but walk in the light.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Let us hold fast the doctrines of providence, and of the Mediatorial reign of Christ, v. 1. They are happily blended. Henry: "The providential kingdom is twisted in with the mediatorial, and the administration of both is in the hand of Christ." Both are universal, supreme, glorious. "Tremendous is the destiny of those who dare set their face against the throne of Messiah."

2. There is hope for the heathen. It is found in the gospel of the kingdom of Christ, v. 1. The day is fast approaching when all nations shall flow unto it.

3. America is one of the lands that is spoken of as isles, v. 1. Greatly has God blessed us, as he has other lands unknown to ancient Israel. How long mercy will be extended to this ungrateful and gainsaying people is known to no man. Oh that the Lord would make us a penitent people.

4. It cannot be denied that impenetrable mystery hangs about the ways of God to men, v. 2. This is no cause of offence to an humble, pious soul. How could it be otherwise? A scheme of infinite love, and wisdom, and holiness, comprehending eternity in its results, must be beyond the measure of mortals. Clarke: "God is infinite; he acts from his own counsels, which are infinite, in reference to ends, which are also infinite; therefore the reasons of his government cannot be comprehended by the feeble limited powers of man," Ecc. vii. 24.

5. But if a good man is often so astonished at events around him as to make him dumb with silence, he yet can rejoice and ought to rejoice in the glorious and abundant justice of God, which, as it is now real, so shall it be conspicuous at last, vv. 2, 6. Ultimately it shall be confessed in heaven and earth that the righteousness of Christ's kingdom is not impaired, but rather magnified by the amazing display of his mercy and grace in the gospel.

6. There must be something desperately wicked and malignant in the very nature of sin, to leave men enemies to God under such an economy as that made known in the kingdom of God, v. 3.

7. When the cup of men's iniquities is full, or whenever Jehovah would inspire salutary fear, he can easily make terrible displays of his majesty and wrath, vv. 3, 4, 5. Clarke: "The fire is his pioneer, which destroys all the hindrances in his way, and makes him a plain passage." No might nor majesty in the creature contending with God is more than briars and stubble before the devastating flame.

8. In absurdity and criminality it seems hard to conceive anything more offensive to God or destructive to the soul than idolatry, v. 7. Yet men are mad upon their idols. Nothing but true religion has ever been found sufficient to pull down the strong holds of idolatry and the superstition of worshipping images. It requires the ark of God to bring down the image of Dagon. The worship of God by images is wholly idolatrous, Deut. iv. 12, 15, 16. Fearful is the guilt of all, who corrupt God's worship by human devices.

9. Nor is abhorrence of images in God's worship unusual among God's people, nor are they offended at the condemnation of all such corruptions. Zion heard and was glad, v. 8.

10. The Old Testament, quoted and explained in the New, amply teaches and establishes the supreme divinity of Jesus Christ, and shows that he is to be adored. If angels worship him and at the bidding of the Father, it cannot be wrong for us to do it, v. 7. No book so opposes and denounces all false worship as the Bible; yet even when so doing, it calls on us to honor the Son as we honor the Father. This doctrine makes God's people, and all the daughters of Zion glad, v. 8.

11. None can withstand or overreach the Almighty Redeemer. He is above all and over all, v. 9. He is the blessed and only Potentate. He is full of power and glory.

12. True piety has always had in it the love of God, v. 10. By this his servants are pleased with all he says and does, with all they know of him, and of his Son.

13. Genuine love to God makes one hate sin in every form and shape, v. 10. To a lover of God as to God himself, nothing is so abominable as iniquity.

14. The preservations and deliverances of holy men are worthy of constant and everlasting celebration in sacred songs, v. 10. Let Jehovah have all the glory, which is his due. Let not the saints, therefore, undertake to avenge their own wrongs, nor effect their own victories; but quietly leave all in the hands of him, who reigns forever. Let them wait patiently for the Lord.

15. For bright days are coming, v. 11. Light will arise. Diodati: "Even in this world eternal happiness is prepared for the righteous; who have the seed thereof within themselves through God's promise, and by the gift of the Holy Ghost." Clarke: "As surely as the grain that is sown in the earth shall vegetate and bring forth its proper fruit in its season; so surely shall light, prosperity and gladness, comfort and peace, be communicated to God's people."

16. But let us not forget that all piety not based in integrity and an upright heart falls short of the divine requirement, and must end in shame, v. 11. God cares not for names, or forms, or appearances, if our hearts are not with him. The feet may not be swift to shed blood, the hands may refuse a bribe, the tongue may be as smooth as butter; but if the heart is wrong, all is wrong.

17. Let not the righteous be cast down but rejoice in conflicts and trials; only let them not glory in themselves at all but in the Lord, v. 12. He is the fountain of all blessedness and perfection. He never fails those who look to him.

18. Let Christ's people learn greatly to love, and thank, and praise their Lord and Redeemer, especially for his holiness; the remembrance of which makes all heaven glad, v. 12. Nothing in his character would be adorable, were it not for the infinite rectitude of his nature, Heb. vii. 26, 27.

PSALM XCVIII.

A Psalm.

1 O sing unto the LORD a new song; for he hath done marvellous things: his right hand, and his holy arm, hath gotten him the victory.

2 The LORD hath made known his salvation: his righteousness hath he openly shewed in the sight of the heathen.

3 He hath remembered his mercy and his truth toward the house of Israel: all the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.

4 Make a joyful noise unto the LORD, all the earth: make a loud noise, and rejoice, and sing praise.

5 Sing unto the LORD with the harp; with the harp, and the voice of a psalm.

6 With trumpets and sound of cornet make a joyful noise before the LORD, the King.

7 Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof; the world, and they that dwell therein.

8 Let the floods clap their hands: let the hills be joyful together

9 Before the LORD; for he cometh to judge the earth: with righteousness shall he judge the world, and the people with equity.

ON the title see on title of Psalm iii. The authorship of this is probably the same as that of several Psalms immediately preceding. The Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway and many others ascribe it to David. There is no evidence that it had a historic occasion, though the Syriac says it relates to the "Restoration of the Israelites from Egypt;" and Clarke says, "It was probably written to celebrate the deliverance from the Babylonish captivity." Yet even he adds: "But it is to be understood prophetically of the redemption of the world by Jesus Christ;" and the Syriac says: "It is to be understood spiritually of the advent of the Messiah, and the calling of the Gentiles to the Christian faith." The Chaldee styles it "a prophetic Psalm." Scott dates it B. C. 1045; Clarke, B. C. 515. Many notice a strong resemblance between this and Ps. xvi. Doubtless this is Messianic. Such is the judgment of many. Luther: "This again is a prophecy concerning the preaching of Christ and the spread of his kingdom." Horne styles it an "evangelical hymn," in which "the prophet extols the miracles, the victory, the salvation, the righteousness, the mercy, and truth of the Redeemer." Pool: "This Psalm is an evident prediction of the coming of the Messiah, and of the blessed effects thereof." Hengstenberg: "Like the preceding it sets forth the appearance of the Lord in his kingdom." Calvin, Scott and many others speak in the same strain. We have here two names of the Most High, Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

1. O sing unto the LORD a new song. This clause is precisely the same as in Ps. xcvi. 1, on which see. It is a call to extraordinary praise and thanksgiving. For he hath done marvellous things. We have had the same word rendered marvellous works, wondrous works, wonders, in Ps. ix. 1; xxvi. 7; xcvi. 3. Has done; the thing though future is so certain, that it is spoken of as already done. What God proposes he surely effects. The reason is that he is in no sense dependent on the will, skill, or power of any other. His right hand, and his holy arm hath gotten him the victory. Right hand seems here to unite in it the idea of dexterity and power. Compare Ps. xvii. 7; xviii. 35; cxxxvii. 5. His holy arm, literally his arm of holiness. Isaiah uses the same phrase, probably taken from David. His language well expounds this verse and the next. Read and ponder Isa. lii. 10; lix. 16; lxiii. 5. Some have suggested that the Psalmist took from Isaiah. It is much more probable that Isaiah under the guidance of the Spirit used the words of the Psalmist. Calvin thinks that both here and in Isa. lix. 16, "the arm of the Lord stands opposed to ordinary means, which although when employed they derogate nothing from the glory of God, yet prevent us from so fully discovering his presence as we might otherwise do." Hammond thinks that the whole clause "most literally belongs to the prophetic sense, accomplished in the resurrection of Christ." No doubt that event was full of wonders; but so is the whole scheme and work of redemption.

2. The LORD hath made known his salvation; his righteousness hath he openly shewed in the sight of the heathen. Salvation and righteousness, the words usually so rendered. See on Ps. xii. 5; xviii. 2; xcv. 1; and Ps. v. 8; xi. 7; lxxxix. 16. Heathen, Gentiles, nations, as in Ps. ii. 1, 8; xevi. 3, 10. The whole scheme of salvation is by righteousness, and from early ages was promised to the Gentiles.

3. He hath remembered his mercy and his truth to the house of Israel. To the Jews first was the full message and offer of life communicated, and that with amazing tenderness and astonishing miracles. But the divine compassion overflowed all narrow and national bounds: All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God. Compare Luke i. 72-79; ii. 30-33; Rom. x. 18. The verbs are in the past tense, because the prophet sees that these things will surely be done. The whole scheme and power of salvation spring from gratuity. Salvation is in no sense of man, nor for any worthiness in man. The work of Christ in the world could not be wrought, and his salvation could not be made known, and heaven and earth be silent:

4. Make a joyful noise unto the LORD, all the earth. Make a joyful noise; shout, triumph. See on Ps. xlvii. 1; xcv. 1, 2. In this work all the earth shall in the fulness of time unite. Make a loud noise, literally break forth as into singing, break forth into joy, nowhere else in the Psalms. See Isa. xlv. 23; lii. 9. And rejoice, often rendered sing, sing aloud, shout, shout for joy, triumph, see Ps. v. 11; xevi. 12. In v. 8 of this Psalm it is rendered be joyful. Sing psalms, a verb also rendered sing, sing praises, give praise, see Ps. vii. 17; ix. 2, 11. The annals of the universe mention nothing so suited to arouse creation, as the salvation wrought out by Christ. If rational creatures should all keep silence, the stones would cry out. Luke xix. 40.

5. Sing unto the LORD with the harp; with the harp, and the voice of a psalm. Harp, as in Ps. xxxiii. 2; xcii. 3, uniformly rendered. The voice of a psalm is the use of a Psalm in song or chant. The first verb is in v. 4, rendered sing praise. Horsley: Chant unto Jehovah to the harp. To the harp, and the sound of the zimrah, taking the zimrah here and in Ps. lxxxi. 2, as the name of some musical instrument. Clarke thinks zimrah is either a musical instrument, or a species of ode modulated by different voices. In Isa. li. 3; Am. v. 23, the word is rendered melody.

6. With trumpets, and sound of cornet, make a joyful noise before the LORD, the King. Trumpets, always so rendered, not elsewhere in the Psalms. Cornet, more commonly rendered trumpet. See on Ps. xlvii. 5; lxxxi. 3. Make a joyful noise, as in v. 4. Jehovah Jesus here appears as King, and must be gladly received.

7. Let the sea roar, and the fulness thereof. The same words occur in Ps. xevi. 11, on which see. Fulness, all contained in it. The world and they that dwell therein. See Ps. xxiv. 1. In this verse the antithesis is between the sea and the land or world. Roar, in the future, shall roar. Fabritius, Amesius, Piscator, Tremellius and Junius read, Make a great noise. This verse and the next contain the boldest personification, investing all nature with intelligent faculties and vocal powers.

8. Let the floods clap their hands; let the hills be joyful together. The verbs are in the future. Floods, often rendered rivers, strong moving currents of water. Here it represents all water, and is in antithesis to hills or mountains. The sea, the land, the floods and the hills comprehend all nature. On clapping hands see on Ps. xlvii. 1.

Isaiah uses the same phrase, Isa. lv. 12. This great and universal thanksgiving and gladness shall be

9. Before the LORD, not only in his presence, from which nothing is hid, but as in his gracious presence and to the glory of his name. Nor is this call upon all creation idle. There is good cause for it; For he cometh to judge the earth. The verb is in the preterite, indicating that the thing is as good as done. Judge the earth, see on Ps. xvi. 13. This judging, or ruling is most benign; With righteousness shall he judge the world, and the people with equity. Righteousness, both moral and evangelical; it is the same word as in Ps. iv. 1, 5; xcvi. 2, 6. Equity, uprightness, as in Ps. ix. 8. Here it is plural, equities. People, plural, nations.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The righteous will never be done singing the praises of their God and Redeemer, v. 1. "The joy which Christ bringeth can never wax old." Where the benefits received are infinite, the praises cannot be extravagant.

2. Nor will God's people ever cease to admire the wonders of his love and counsels, v. 1. Salvation excels all the miracles ever wrought. It is a wonder of wisdom, power, grace, faithfulness and righteousness. Take from natural religion all that is supernatural and incomprehensible, and it is both inane and jejune. Take from revealed religion its stupendous wonders, and what have we left? Our life comes by Christ's death; our healing, by his stripes; our joys, by his sorrows; our exaltation, by his humiliation. By his fall he conquered; by shedding his blood he gained the victory.

3. What a blessed thing that the middle wall of partition is broken down, and that the ends of the earth are invited to Immanuel, vv. 2, 3. In him there is "neither Jew nor Greek, Barbarian, Scythian, bond nor free, but Christ is all and in all."

4. Salvation is all of God, and not at all of the creature, by grace, not by works, vv. 2, 3. Compare Ps. xlv. 2-4. Were it otherwise boasting would not be excluded, Rom. iii. 27. The author of redemption is heavenly, not human.

5. It is right that all nations should see this salvation, v. 3. So great a redemption as that wrought out by Christ cannot be sufficiently lauded by a few, nor rewarded by the faith and love of one tribe or people. Compare Isa. xlix. 4-7.

6. It is therefore not without good and sufficient cause that the Gentiles, who partake of such inestimable blessings, are called upon to be exceedingly joyful and thankful, v. 4.

7. Indeed to all people in all ages the true and saving knowledge of the Redeemer is justly felt to be matter of intense and perpetual thanksgiving and adoration, vv. 4-6. Even the predictions of such glorious things filled the ancient church with the exultation of a blessed hope. Much more then may the gospel in its full revelation spread joy and gladness, Isa. xii. 2-6; xxxv. 1-10.

8. Respecting instrumental music see REMARKS on Ps. xxxiii. 2. But let us never forget that Jehovah demands our warm affections. Without the heart all is nugatory.

9. Indeed if all creation animate and inanimate should unite in this work, eternity would not be too long to express the gladness diffused by the work and triumphs of the Redeemer, vv. 7, 8.

10. If on earth and to all who receive the salvation of the gospel, Christ brings so inestimable blessings as are sung by poets, celebrated by prophets, and confessed by martyrs, what must not the glory be in heaven above? There every voice and every harp is attuned to resound the praises of the Redeemer for new evolutions of his everlasting love.

11. All our acts, in particular all our religious professions and worship are in the presence of Christ, v. 9; and therefore sincerity, purity, holiness, reverence and godly fear at all times become us. "Carnal mirth is an enemy to holy joy."

12. He, who now rules the world, and who will finally judge it, must be divine, v. 9. None else could well or safely do either. Our Jesus upholds all things by the word of his power, and to him has been committed all judgment, Heb. i. 3; John v. 22.

13. It is pleasing to see how wondrously the Old and New Testaments correspond, like a complicated lock and a curious key. Clarke has given us a paragraph headed "David is the Voice, and Mary is the Echo."

"1. DAVID. O sing unto the Lord a new song.

"MARY. My soul doth magnify the Lord.

"2. DAVID. He hath done marvellous things.

"MARY. He that is mighty hath done great things.

"3. DAVID. With his own right hand and holy arm hath he gotten himself the victory.

"MARY. He hath shewed strength with his arm, and scattered the proud in the imagination of their hearts.

"4. DAVID. The Lord hath made known his salvation; his righteousness hath he openly shewed.

"MARY. His mercy is on them that fear him, from generation to generation.

"5. DAVID. He hath remembered his mercy and his truth toward the house of Israel.

"MARY. He hath holpen his servant Israel in remembrance of his mercy."

We can hardly engage in a more profitable business than in comparing the two Testaments. Like the cherubim over the mercy-seat they look towards each other, and cast light on each other.

14. Everything in Scripture, rightly interpreted, leads to holiness. Christ's reign on earth is to that end, Luke i. 74, 75. His final coming to judge the world calls us to purity. Compare 2 Pet. iii. 10-15.

PSALM XCIX.

1 The LORD reigneth; let the people tremble: he sitteth between the cherubim; let the earth be moved.

2 The LORD is great in Zion; and he is high above all the people.

3 Let them praise thy great and terrible name; for it is holy.

4 The king's strength also loveth judgment; thou dost establish equity, thou executest judgment and righteousness in Jacob.

5 Exalt ye the LORD our God, and worship at his footstool; for he is holy.

6 Moses and Aaron among his priests, and Samuel among them that call upon his name; they called upon the LORD, and he answered them.

7 He spake unto them in the cloudy pillar: they kept his testimonies, and the ordinance that he gave them.

8 Thou answeredst them, O LORD our God: thou wast a God that forgavest them, though thou tookest vengeance of their inventions.

9 Exalt the LORD our God, and worship at his holy hill: for the LORD our God is holy.

THE Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Fabritius, Patrick, Pool and Gill regard David as the author of this Psalm. Jarchi gives Moses as its author.

But this cannot be so, for Samuel, who is mentioned in v. 6, was not born until several hundred years after the death of Moses. Nor could it have been written after the beginning of the Babylonish captivity; for in v. 1, God is represented as sitting between the cherubim, and the Chaldeans destroyed the first temple, and from that time we read no more of the ark. It is certain that it and all its furniture were wanting in the second temple. The probability is that David wrote it after he was somewhat settled in his kingdom. Scott dates it B. C. 1040; Clarke, B. C. 515. The Syriac styles it "a prophecy concerning the glory of the kingdom of Christ." With this agree Luther and others. The names of the Almighty in it are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and El God, on which respectively see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; v. 4.

1. The LORD reigneth, in all respects as in Ps. xciii. 1; xcvi. 10; xcvi. 1. Let the people tremble. People, plural, peoples, nations. Tremble, elsewhere shake, be disquieted, be moved, quake, be afraid, be troubled, stand in awe, see on Ps. iv. 4. There is no reason for supposing that the trembling here demanded is different from that required in Ps. ii. 11, or that it is inconsistent with the rejoicing commended in Ps. xcvi. 1. Amyrald says the clause "may concern believing as well as unbelieving nations." Calvin: "The people, who were formerly called upon to rejoice, are now commanded to tremble." This is a good sense, and results from a natural construction. But there is another, expressed in some of the versions, The Lord reigneth, the people are angry. This makes the effect of his reigning to be the enraging of the nations. The original will bear this. In Pr. xxix. 9, the same word is rendered rage. Even the birth of Christ troubled Herod and all Jerusalem with him, Matt. ii. 3. This idea is somewhat modified by the church of England: The Lord reigneth, be the people never so impatient. Hammond favors some such construction. But the first view is the most natural and best corresponds with the prophetic character of this Psalm, and with the scope of several Psalms preceding it. Tremble, in the future, shall tremble. He sitteth between the cherubim. How the ark of the covenant was constructed, covered, and surmounted, and how important it was to Israel may be seen in Exodus xxv. 10-22. Between the cherubim, see on Ps. lxxx. 1. Sitteth, dwelleth, maketh his abode, as God did for centuries. Such language teaches that the Most High deals familiarly with man. It is parallel to John xiv. 21, 23. Let the earth be moved, in the future, shall be moved; parallel to tremble in the first clause; the verb is found here only. The kind of moving must be determined by the context. Hengstenberg: "The trembling of the people and the moving of the earth are expressions of fear and reverence before the Lord appearing in his kingdom."

2. The LORD is great in Zion; and he is high above all the people. Great, see on Ps. xc. 3; xcvi. 4. High, a participle, lifted up, exalted. In v. 5 the verb from the same root is rendered exalt. People, plural, nations, as in v. 1. Zion and the people comprehend all the world, Jews and Gentiles. God's kingdom shall be universally set up. Venema: "He is the exalted and most powerful King and avenger of his people in Jerusalem, and superior to and set over all the nations of the earth."

3. Let them praise thy great and terrible name; for it is holy. Them, all the nations, and not as Calvin thinks, the faithful in distinction from the nations. Three things are said of God's name. 1. It is great, first so called in Joshua vii. 9; see on Psalm lxxvi. 1. It resounds through the universe. God makes himself known in all worlds. 2. It is terrible; in Gen. xxviii. 17, dreadful; in Ex. xv. 11, fearful; in Ps. lxxxix. 7, to be had in reverence; in Ps. cxi. 9, reverend. Compare Deut. x. 17; see on Ps. xlv. 4. Commonly in heathen countries are told many ridiculous stories respecting their idols. They laugh at them, and at will banish them. 3. God's name is holy. This is not true of any of the false gods. They were revengeful, proud, and in many ways abominable, according to the belief of their worshippers.

Praise, elsewhere confess, give thanks, 1 Kings viii. 33, 35; Pr. xxviii. 13; Ps. vi. 5; lxxxix. 5.

4. The king's strength also loveth judgment. There is considerable difficulty in this clause. Strength, as in Ps. viii. 2. Merrick: "The king's strength seems here put for the king himself." Edwards renders it: "Though the king be powerful, he loveth judgment." Probably Edwards gives the sense, although his translation is free. Diodati paraphrases it thus: "This king tempereth his power with justice, contrary to the custom of tyrants of the world; see Job xxxvi. 5." Alexander: "The meaning of the clause seems to be, that God's power is controlled in its exercise by his love of justice." The same view is taken by Patrick, Horne and others. But who is the king here mentioned? 1. Some think he is Jehovah as the head of the theocracy. 2. Others suppose David as acting under God in the kingdom is intended. Neither of these views regards the ode as prophetic. 3. The remaining interpretation makes the king to be Jesus the Mediator. This is to be preferred. The king is here spoken of. He is next addressed: Thou dost establish equity, thou executest judgment and righteousness in Jacob. The verbs are in the preterite, having the force of a future; or, God has always done these things, and we may infallibly conclude that he will continue to do them to the end of the world. In Jacob, in v. 2, in Zion, see on Ps. lix. 13. See Ps. lxxvi. 1.

5. Exalt ye the LORD our God, and worship at his footstool; for he is holy. Exalt, as in v. 9. In v. 1, the preterite is rendered is high. Worship, bow down, the same as in Ps. xxix. 2; xcvi. 9; xcvi. 7. He is holy, also terminates v. 9; and some so render the same words in v. 3. God's infinite rectitude is a sufficient ground for all the honor he demands. This Psalm is a prophecy respecting Christ, yet its language is fitly borrowed from the dispensation under which it was uttered. This is common in the prophets, Isa. lxvi. 23; Mal. iii. 3.

6. Moses and Aaron among his priests, and Samuel among them that call upon his name. Priests, commonly so rendered; it also signifies princes, principal persons, or chief rulers. Moses and Aaron were of the tribe of Levi, as was also Samuel, who was a descendant of Korah in the sixteenth generation. So that by the law of the priesthood they might all properly fill that office. That Aaron was a priest none will deny. That Moses and Samuel at least occasionally exercised the functions of the sacerdotal office seems sufficiently clear from Ex. xvii. 15; xxiv. 7, 8; Lev. viii. 15-30; 1 Sam. ix. 13; xvi. 3, 5. It is true that Moses had other functions, as law-giver, Ex. xviii. 19-21; and that Samuel was also a judge, 1 Sam. vii. 6, 15, 17. But they also offered sacrifices and prayer. All these men were intercessors: They called upon the Lord, and he answered them, Nu. xi. 2; xxi. 7; Deut. ix. 26; Ex. xxviii. 12; 1 Sam. vii. 9; Ps. cvi. 23.

7. He spake unto them in the cloudy pillar. This is true of Moses and Aaron, see Ex. xvi. 10, 11; xvii. 6; xix. 9, 18, 19, 24; xx. 21, 22. How he spoke to Samuel may be learned from 1 Sam. iii. 10; vii. 9, 10. The general declaration is that in an extraordinary manner God made known his will to these men, and this was often if not commonly done in the pillar of cloud. When God thundered on the Philistines, there was doubtless a cloud present, 1 Sam. vii. 10. And yet God was not confined to the pillar of cloud, but "at sundry times and in divers manners spake in time past unto the fathers," Heb. i. 1. Nor was his speaking in vain. They obeyed his voice. They kept his testimonies, and the ordinance that he gave them. On testimonies see on Ps. xix. 7. Ordinance, in Ps. ii. 7, decree, sometimes law and often statute. On keeping testimonies see on Ps. xxv. 10. Obedience under all dispensations is necessary and is pleasing to God, 1 Sam. xv. 22; John xiv. 21.

8. Thou answeredst them, O LORD our God. Either God answered Moses, Aaron and Samuel praying for the people, or he answered the requests of the people at the intercession of these men. The general sense is the same; but evidently the import of the word them is changed in this verse, if not in this clause. Thou wast a God that forgavest them, though thou tookest vengeance of their inventions. Although Moses and Aaron and Samuel were sinners, yet clearly the reference is to the people. This is the view of Venema, Clarke, Horne, Hengstenberg and many others. God punished the Israelites for their wickedness, but he did not root them out as a nation. Examine Ex. xxxii. 1-35; Num. xvi. 46-50; 1 Sam. vii. 9. Compare 2 Sam. vii. 14, 15.

9. Exalt the LORD our God, and worship at his holy hill; for the LORD our God is holy. Much the same as in v. 5. God is holy, therefore he must be exalted and adored.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Whatever else is doubtful, it is certain that the Lord reigns, that the Scriptures lay great stress on this truth, and that both the fact and the truth have vast bearings on the joys and sorrows, hopes and fears of both good and bad men, v. 1. However surrounded and beset by foes human and Satanic, let us fear God and nothing else. His kingdom ruleth over all. Amesius: "The reign of God terrible to the world, if rightly viewed and considered, is with believers a powerful argument to stir them up every way to glorify his name."

2. All this is heightened by the consideration that Christ is King. The God-man reigns.

3. Dickson: "The Lord's people do not worship an unknown God, they know who he is and where to find him, to wit, in his ordinances, on the throne of grace, reconciling the world to himself in Christ: he sitteth between the cherubim, v. 1.

4. The supremacy of Christ in the church and in all the world is a cardinal doctrine in the writings of the prophets and apostles, v. 2. Horne: "The power and preëminence of the Redeemer, whom no creature is able to resist, are reasons why all should save themselves, by yielding in time to his sceptre and by taking the benefit of his protection, instead of incurring his displeasure."

5. God is greatly to be praised, v. 3. Especially is God in Christ the wonder of wonders, before whom all the angels of heaven and all the spirits of just men made perfect bow and adore.

6. Amesius: "The rectitude of the administration of his kingdom in the church supplies abundant matter for glorifying God," v. 4. Could men or angels by searching find out one case of error, wrong, or want of equity in the divine administration, the happiness of holy creatures would be at an end. Calvin: "There is nothing that more animates and encourages the faithful to render obedience to God, or inspires them with greater zeal to observe his law, than to find in this course of action that they are the objects of his paternal care, and that the righteousness which he requires from his own people in words, is on his part reciprocated by kind deeds."

7. God's holiness cannot be too often mentioned to the honor of his name, vv. 3, 5, 9. The rectitude of his nature and ways is an element in the worship of the temple not made with hands, Isa. vi. 3; Rev. xv. 3. The more we know of God, the humbler shall we be. The worship of heaven is more profound than that on earth ever is. And the more God's holiness appears, the more vile and abominable must sin appear to be; and the more dreadful our ruin, the more glorious and amazing is salvation by Christ—a salvation which in nothing impinges upon justice or holiness. Therefore let us not measure the service we render, or the humility we exhibit to God. Let us bow down at his footstool.

8. What a glorious company that of the redeemed must be, v. 6. Here we have mentioned by name Moses, and Aaron, and Samuel. Another prophet speaks of Noah, Daniel and Job, Ezek. xiv. 14. When Jesus was transfigured, Moses and Elias appeared. There around the throne, besides the angels in their shining ranks, are the martyrs and confessors, the apostles and prophets, the kings and righteous men of all ages, who have truly loved the Saviour. Every choice spirit that ever left the world is worshipping before the throne. Glory to God, who takes the beggar and sets him among princes; yea, makes all his people kings and priests unto God and the Lamb forever and ever.

9. Let no professed follower of Christ regard it as safe to live without prayer, v. 6. Calling upon the name of the Lord embraces indeed all acts of worship. But prayer is a prominent and an essential part of the worship of a sinner on earth. Preaching Christ's gospel and praying are the two greatest things done in this world, Acts vi. 4.

10. Especially should God's people abound in intercession. The example of Abram pleading for the cities of the plain is a memorable instance of God's approbation of such intercessions, Gen. xviii. 23-32. Compare Job xlii. 10; Joel ii. 17; Matt. xxiv. 22; Jas. v. 16.

11. But it is in vain to cry to God for ourselves or others, unless we have the spirit of hearty and universal obedience, v. 7. Compare Isa. i. 15-17; Jer. xiv. 12; Mic. iii. 4.

12. How vast the superiority of the Christian over all others. True, he has not the propitiatory that was in the tabernacle, but he has the true mercy-seat; he has not the cherubim standing over the propitiatory, but he has living and mighty angels to guard, uphold, and minister unto him; he has not the ark of shittim-wood overlaid with pure gold; but he has Christ, of whom that ark was but a faint emblem; he has not the pot of manna; but he has the true bread that came from heaven; he has not the Urim and Thummim; but he has the lively oracles; he has not the altar of burnt offering; but he has an altar, whereof they have no right to eat who serve the tabernacle; he has not the pillar of cloud to go before him; but he has a wonderful providence to direct his whole course; he has no Canaan filled with heathen enemies to conquer; but he has a promised land, full of all felicities.

13. Let us never forget the mercy of God expressed to sinners in the long-suffering, forbearance and forgiveness manifested to them, v. 8. He who has any just sense of sin, wonders not at the misery he sees on earth so much as at the display of God's kindness in his allotments, and especially in the pardoning mercy offered to sinners and granted to believers.

14. It is a fair test of all worship and doctrine, if we can ascertain whether it exalts God, vv. 5, 9. Whatever puts up the creature and human inventions is false and foolish. Whatever puts Jehovah on the throne, and makes him Lawgiver, King, Judge, Redeemer and All, is right.

PSALM C.

A Psalm of praise.

1 Make a joyful noise unto the LORD, all ye lands.

2 Serve the LORD with gladness: come before his presence with singing.

3 Know ye that the LORD he is God: it is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves; we are his people, and the sheep of his pasture.

4 Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise: be thankful unto him, and bless his name.

5 For the LORD is good; his mercy is everlasting; and his truth endureth to all generations.

IN versifying this Psalm Christian poets have been remarkably successful. It seems to be easy for the pious heart to enter into its spirit. The ode is short and very animated. If anything could stir the soul of a devout man, it would be the sentiments here so happily expressed. Hengstenberg thinks that Psalms xci.-c. form a decalogue of odes; that they belong to the same time and the same author; that they are remarkably free from expressions of sadness; that they are marked by a confident expectation of a glorious revelation of the Lord; and that they all bear the character of mild sublimity. Whether all the positions here taken are correct, good commentators are not agreed. Hengstenberg also thinks this Psalm specially related to Ps. xcix. But if it had been the first or the last poem in the Psalter, it is not probable that any one would have thought it misplaced. Jebb thinks it bears a special relation to Ps. xcv. Some have thought it was a special call on believers, but it is evident from v. 1, that it summons all lands to praise God. The Arabic gives David as author. This is probably but not certainly correct. There is nothing in it forbidding us to regard the sweet singer of Israel as the composer. Scott dates it B. C. 1038; Clarke, B. C. 515. The scope of the Psalm is not doubtful. Luther: "This Psalm is a prophecy concerning Christ. It calls upon all to rejoice, to triumph, and to give thanks; to enter his gates with thanksgiving, and his courts and sanctuary with praise: because, by the gospel and the preaching of the remission of sins, that kingdom of Christ is established and strengthened, which shall remain and stand forever." Calvin: "Since he invites the whole of the inhabitants of the earth indiscriminately to praise Jehovah, he seems, in the spirit of prophecy, to refer to the period when the Church would be gathered out of different nations." Henry: "Its beginning with a call to all lands to praise God plainly extends it to the gospel-church." Pool and others take like views. Some have said this Psalm was composed for the occasion of making thank-offerings, as ordained in Lev. vii. 12. It might be very fitly used at such times, and very probably was so employed as some of the Jews say. But it is suitable for the opening of worship on almost any conceivable occasion. It needs no historic occasion for its origin. Henry: "It is with good reason that many sing this psalm very frequently in their religious assemblies." The names of the Almighty here found are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2. On a Psalm in the title see on title of Ps. iii. In our version the word rendered praise is elsewhere twice rendered praise, once sacrifice of praise, twice confession, about twenty times thanksgiving, once in the plural sacrifices of praise, thrice thanks, thrice thank offerings. The English version does not nicely discriminate between praise and thanksgiving. It is doubtful whether the Hebrew does, though some think differently. In v. 4 of this Psalm the word, rendered Praise in the title, is rendered thanksgiving. Many notice that no other Psalm has the same title as this.

1. Make a joyful noise unto the LORD, all ye lands. This clause is identical with the first clause of Ps. xeviii. 4, on which see. All ye lands, the same as all the earth. Hengstenberg: "The exhortation presupposes the arrival of those mighty events in which occasion is given to the nations of the earth to shout for joy to the Lord, and to salute him joyfully as their king."

2. Serve the LORD with gladness. Serve, embraces all the service one pays to God. That which pleases Jehovah is something required by him, either in worship or in holy living. Here it has a principal reference to worship. We have the same form of the same verb in Ps. ii. 11. Gladness, elsewhere joy, joyfulness, mirth, pleasure.

We had it in Ps. iv. 7; xcvii. 11. This gladness is not inconsistent with solemnity and godly fear. Indeed the greater the fear the greater the joy. Come before his presence with singing. God's presence or face was in all places where he recorded his name, Ex. xx. 24. The singing required must be with joyful lips, with a joyful voice, with triumphing as the word is rendered in Ps. lxiii. 5; Job iii. 7; xx. 5. Nothing is more offensive to God than that we bow the head like a bulrush and give way to sadness and gloom, when we are called to joyful thanksgiving.

3. Know ye that the LORD he is God. Of all for whom divine honors have ever been claimed, there is but One who has proven himself worthy of them. He is Jehovah. He is known by the wonders he has performed in all ages, by the judgment which he executeth and by making himself a refuge to his saints, Ps. ix. 16; xlviii. 3. To know is not only to learn and understand, but to consider and acknowledge, as the word is elsewhere rendered, Isa. xxix. 12; Ps. lxxxi. 5; Deut. viii. 5; Ps. li. 3; Pr. iii. 6; Isa. xxxiii. 13. It is he that hath made us, and not we ourselves. For not we ourselves, the marginal reading in the Hebrew is, his we are. So also the Chaldee. But the mass of scholars adhere to the rendering approved in the English text, though the other teaches no error, but a great truth, and requires the change of but a single Hebrew letter. There is no more perfect right than that based in creation, Ps. xcv. 5; cxix. 73; cxxxix. 13-16. We are his people, and the sheep of his pasture. See on Ps. xcv. 7.

4. Enter into his gates with thanksgiving, and into his courts with praise. It is a call to public worship. Thanksgiving, in the title praise. Fry has it Psalmody. Horsley says it denotes generally fit acts of homage and devotion. Praise, never rendered otherwise, the word from which the Psalter takes its name—Book of Praises. Be thankful unto him, confess unto him, 1 Kings viii. 33, 35; give thanks unto him, Ps. vi. 5; praise, Ps. xcix. 3. And bless his name. Bless, very uniformly rendered. See on Ps. v. 12. The scope and intent of this verse are the same as those of vv. 1, 2. It contains a renewed and earnest call to joyful, grateful, public worship.

5. For the Lord is good. Good, kind, precious, goodness itself. As in English good is either a noun or an adjective, so in the Hebrew. The word is often rendered goodness, Ps. xvi. 2; xxi. 3. His mercy is everlasting. Mercy, in Gen. xx. 13, kindness; in Job vi. 14, pity; in Job x. 12, favor; in Ps. li. 1, loving-kindness; in Ps. v. 7 and often, mercy. Clarke suggests an old English word—mildheartedness. God's loving-kindness is as enduring as his existence, his kingdom, or his counsel, to each of which the Psalmist applies the same word here rendered everlasting, Ps. ix. 7; x. 16; xxxiii. 11. And his truth endureth to all generations. Truth, faithfulness, as in Ps. xxxiii. 4; xxxvi. 5; xcviii. 3. Tholuck: "The refreshing words of this verse seem to have been frequently repeated in their songs." In proof he cites 1 Chron. xvi. 34; Ezra iii. 11; Psalms cvi. cvii. cviii. cxxxvi.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. God's worship ought to be, and shall be universal. All lands shall participate in it. It must be hearty and joyful. At fit times it should be audible—with a noise, v. 1. The whole heart, mind, strength and soul may well be brought into it. "God's praise is his worship."

2. Reluctance in God's service is not essentially different from refusal to engage in it. Where there is no gladness in us, there is no acceptance with God, v. 2. Henry: "We must take it as a favor to be admitted into his service, and give him thanks that we have liberty of access to him, that we have ordinances instituted, and opportunity continued of waiting upon God in those ordinances."

3. Our powers of music should be cultivated. If we are to sing, we must learn to sing, v. 2. Otherwise we will make discord, and disturb the devotions of our fellow-worshippers. The greatest preachers and scholars have given their attention to this matter. Cobbin: "Luther would have immortalized his name had he done no more than written the majestic air and harmony to which we are accustomed to sing this Psalm, and which, when the mind is in a truly worshipping frame, seems to bring heaven down to earth, and to raise earth to heaven, giving us anticipations of the pure and sublime delights of that noble and general assembly in which saints and angels shall forever celebrate the praises of God." Church music should be solemn; for it is an awful thing to worship God. It should be simple, that the mass of the people may join in it. It should be in good taste, that we may not dishonor God with hideous sounds. Of sacred music Chrysostom says: "Nothing so lifteth up the soul, so looseth it from the chains of the body, and giveth it a contempt for all earthly things." Augustine: "How freely was I made to weep by these hymns and spiritual songs, transported by the voice of the congregation sweetly singing;—the melody of their voices filled my ear, and divine truth was poured into my heart. Then burned the flame of sacred devotion in my soul, and gushing tears flowed from my eyes, as well they might." In a letter dated March 6, 1560, Bishop Jewell says: "A change now appears among the people, which nothing promotes more than to sing Psalms. Sometimes at Paul's Cross there will be six thousand people singing together." Burnet says that "the Psalms translated into metre were much sung by all who loved the Reformation, and it was a sign, by which men's affections to that work were measured, whether they used to sing these or not." Let sacred music be cultivated and abundantly employed.

4. We must know and acknowledge God, v. 3: 1, that he is; 2, that he is God; 3, that he alone is God; 4, that he is over all God blessed forever; 5, we must take him as our God. To doubt the first of these points is to annihilate God's promises, Heb. xi. 6. To doubt the second is to be guilty of atheism, Ps. xiv. 1. To doubt the third is to be a polytheist. To doubt the fourth is to hold the Most High in contempt. To believe in a God and not take him for our God is to hold the truth in unrighteousness. Practical atheism is terribly prevalent.

5. The obligations under which we all lie to worship, love and obey God are many, indissoluble and stronger than any mortal has ever felt them to be. 1. He is God. 2. He made us. 3. We are by him preserved, v. 3. 4. He is our Ruler. 5. He is our Benefactor, v. 3. 6. The worship of God is delightful, v. 4. 7. He is possessed of infinite and everlasting perfections, v. 5. We owe him all. He is all we need. Life with its blessings, eternal life and all that leads to it flow from his fulness. Creation, redemption, regeneration and glorification are all from him.

6. God prescribes and has a right to prescribe whatever he pleases respecting his worship, v. 4. When he chose to fix a place for certain acts of worship, that ordinance was binding. When he abolished all distinction of places, it became sinful for men to make any ordinance on the subject, John iv. 21.

7. The true worship of Jehovah is founded in the divine nature, and therefore will be substantially the same forever and ever, v. 5. Blessed be God, that he grants to his people so near approaches to himself, and communes with his chosen in a way best suited to fill them with joy unspeakable and full of glory. The highest worship is imitation. The Lord is good; let us be good. He is merciful; let us be merciful. He is true; let us be faithful.

PSALM CI.

A Psalm of David.

- 1 I will sing of mercy and judgment: unto thee, O LORD, will I sing.
- 2 I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way. O when wilt thou come unto me? I will walk within my house with a perfect heart.
- 3 I will set no wicked thing before mine eyes: I hate the work of them that turn aside; it shall not cleave to me.
- 4 A froward heart shall depart from me: I will not know a wicked person.
5. Whoso privily slandereth his neighbour, him will I cut off: him that hath a high look and a proud heart will not I suffer.
- 6 Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful of the land, that they may dwell with me: he that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve me.
- 7 He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within my house: he that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight.
- 8 I will early destroy all the wicked of the land; that I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the LORD.

ON the title see on title of Psalm iii. The title determines the authorship. The Chaldee, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate, with nearly all modern writers of note, agree in this decision. Scott dates it B. C. 1046; and Clarke, B. C. 1055. It is not agreed whether David wrote it in early life, before his accession to power; after he had been partly acknowledged as king; or after all the tribes had given in their adhesion. The Psalm has in it a tone of authority, indicating that David was already invested with regal functions. It expresses his solemn purpose. Some old writers call this The Householder's Psalm. In the seventeenth century and perhaps earlier, it was customary among pious people to have a sermon preached at the setting up of each new family, or at the occupation of a new domicile. Old books give us accounts of these discourses. Some of them are expositions of this Psalm. Nor is this perverting Scripture. A good king in his dominions ought to be like a good father and head of a family in his house. We have here the principles on which David would rule the nation.

1. I will sing of mercy and judgment. These words are all plain and of frequent occurrence. And yet this clause is not of easy interpretation. 1. Hengstenberg, followed by Alexander, thinks that they express the purpose of David; that said purpose is not carried out in this Psalm; that he sings of mercy and judgment in Ps. ciii.; that Ps. cii., contains the expansion of a clause found in v. 2: "When wilt thou come to me?" and that Psalms ci. cii. ciii. compose a series each aiding to interpret the other. This view is novel, perhaps startling. It surely would be a strange thing for the first lines of an ode to contain the subject matter, not of itself, but of two other independent compositions, each confessedly complete in itself. It is not claimed that any parallel can be found. 2. None will deny that the words mercy and judgment often relate to God. So the Chaldee here interprets them: "If thou grant any mercy to me, or if thou bring any judgment upon me, for all these things, O Lord, will I sing hymns before thee." Augustine's view differs but slightly from this. He, who giveth songs in the night, deserves to be praised in our adversities, as well as in our prosperity. This makes David say that he was resolved to maintain a thankful frame of mind all his days, and that nothing should hinder his uttering God's praises. Grateful devotions are pleasing to God. Nor is such praise ever unreasonable. 3. Another view suggests that the judgment of God, which the prophet proposes to celebrate, refers to Jehovah's awful dealings in putting down David's enemies; and his mercy, to his acts in raising the son of Jesse to the throne. This is substantially the view of Piscator and Patrick. The difficulty is that this Psalm is not in fact thus employed. Read it over and see. 4. Often the word here rendered mercy expresses the kindness of human beings. See Gen. xx. 13; xxi. 23; xxiv. 49; xl. 14; Ps. cix. 12, 16. Likewise the word judgment refers to the act or course of man. It has that application where it first occurs, Gen. xviii. 19. It is frequently rendered right, Ps. ix. 4; Isa. xxxii. 7. So that this first clause of the Psalm may express David's intended kindness to the upright, and his just severity to the wicked, both of which he would manifest in the administration of his kingdom. Calvin: "To sing of mercy and of judgment is equivalent to declaring in solemn terms, that he would be a just and an upright king." Diodati: "I will in this Psalm make a vow to God, and a public protestation to all the church, of the good will which I will show to good men; and the severe justice which I will exercise against wicked men, whensoever I shall attain unto the kingdom which the Lord has promised me." This view is maintained by Fabritius, Dodd and others. Morison thinks David here gives us "an ode on the right administration of clemency and justice in filling the throne of Israel." Tholuck: "Mercy and judgment, the chief qualities of a king's government, form the theme of this song." 5. Others think that the mercy and judgment may be either, 1, of God towards David and his enemies; 2, or of David towards Israel under his reign, but seem unwilling to express a preference to either of these. This is true of Horne, Henry, Gill and Clarke. 6. Speaking of the two views just given, Pool says: "Possibly both may be joined together, and the sense may be this, I will praise thee, O Lord, as for all thy excellencies, so particularly for those two royal perfections of mercy and justice, or judgment, which thou hast so eminently discovered in the government of the world, and of thy people Israel; and I will make it my care and business to imitate and follow thee, as in other things, so especially in those virtues which are so necessary for the discharge of my trust and the good government of thy and my people." Scott fully adopts this suggestion: "The mercy of God shown towards him, and his righteous judgments upon his persecutors, were not only the subjects of David's grateful praise, but the pattern which he proposed to imitate in his administration." Interpretation No. 4 is the simplest and most natural; No. 6 is admissible and makes the passage very pregnant. Unto thee, O LORD will I sing. For sing Edwards and Alexander have play; Calvin, sing Psalms; Jebb, make a Psalm; Fry, chant; Hengstenberg, sing praise. He would employ psalmody with the usual accompaniments.

2. I will behave myself wisely in a perfect way. Chaldee: I will cause thee to understand a perfect way; Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate: I will walk in a way unspotted; Calvin: I will behave myself prudently in a perfect way; Hengstenberg: I will walk wisely in a blameless way. The verb rendered will behave myself wisely is in Ps. ii. 10, rendered, Be wise; in Ps. xiv. 2, understand. Maschil, in title of Ps. xxxii. is the participle from it. Regarding this word as the key to the clause, Edwards renders it: I will give instruction upon the right conduct of life; Mudge: I will compose a Maschil to teach the true conduct of life; Diodati quotes the Italian: I will compose a skilful song concerning the perfect way. He says: "The Hebrew term hath a relation to a certain kind of sacred song, called Maschil, in the titles of the Psalms, which is as much as to say, a song of great skill. Others translate it, I will give instruction concerning the perfect way." No other mode of explaining the clause seems to have so much to support it. O when wilt thou come unto me? This is best rendered as a question. But what does he design thereby to express? 1. Some refer it to the time of his becoming king. Thus Diodati: "When wilt thou fulfil thy promise towards me, making me king over thy people?" So Patrick and Scott also. 2. Hammond, Dathe and Tholuck refer the words of inquiry 'to the ark, the object of David's longing, which he brought up with rejoicing, and before which he danced.'

See 2 Sam. vi. 3. A better explanation than either of these makes David longingly ask for the visits of God's grace and Spirit to enable him to keep the engagements he is now making. Clarke: "I can neither walk in this way, nor grow wise unto salvation unless thou come unto me by thy grace and Spirit; for without thee I can do nothing." This is also the view of Morison. Alexander: "This interrogative ejaculation implies a sense of his dependence on divine aid for the execution of his purpose." I will walk within my house with a perfect heart. The walk of a man is the tenor of his life. A perfect heart is an upright, undefiled, sincere, whole heart. Compare Josh. xxiv. 14; Ps. cxix. 1; Ezek. xv. 5. Within my house, in my own family. David was a public person, and besides his private family had his ministers and attendants, and in his own house arranged and managed public affairs.

3. I will set no wicked thing before my eyes. The Syriac and Arabic improperly put the verb in the past tense—have set. Septuagint: "I will not set before my eyes anything against law;" Ethiopic and Vulgate: I will not set before my eyes anything unjust; church of England: I will take no wicked thing in hand; Hengstenberg: I will place no wicked action before my eyes. For wicked Tremellius and Junius read nefarious; Venema, flagitious. The Hebrew word is Belial, on which see on Ps. xviii. 4; xli. 8. Thing, often word, also matter, purpose, act. David intends to say that he would neither desire nor devise any sinful thing. He gives his reason: I hate the work of them that turn aside. Edwards: I detest the practice of apostates; Green: I hate impiety; church of England: I hate the sins of unfaithfulness. Patrick: "I abhor the practices of those who decline the law as a rule, to pursue their own private desires." Clarke: "I shall particularly abominate the conduct of those who apostatize from the true religion, and those who deny its divine authority, and who live without having their conduct governed by its influence." Any allowed deviations from right seem to be intended. All apostasy is sin; but all departure from God's law is not apostasy, though it naturally leads to it. Of the work of evil men he adds: It shall not cleave to me. Corrupt men, encouraged to hang about a house or the seat of a government, are sure to beget degeneracy.

4. A froward heart shall depart from me. Froward, crooked, perverse. We met the word in Ps. xviii. 26. Edwards thinks it is equivalent to perverse and stubborn; Clarke, to rash and headstrong. The leading idea perhaps is conveyed by the word crooked, implying deceitfulness and unscrupulousness about both ends and means. I will not know a wicked person. Wicked, in Ps. x. 15, evil; it means worthless, hurtful, injurious. Fry has it malicious. Know has here the sense of approve, favor, encourage, treat as a friend; see on Ps. i. 6. Patrick: "I will have no familiarity with him, much less take him for my favorite." Hengstenberg and Alexander prefer to read evil, without adding the word person, meaning any wrong or wickedness. This is authorized by the Chaldee, Syriac and Fabritius. The chief objection to such rendering is that in v. 3, the prophet had virtually said that very thing.

5. Whoso privily slandereth his neighbour, him will I cut off. The Chaldee reads: He who speaks with a triple tongue. This is in accordance with a Jewish idea that a slanderer injures three persons at once; himself, his hearer, and the man who is slandered. The Greeks had the same conception, perhaps obtained by commerce with the Hebrews. Herodotus says: "Calumny is most terrible; for in it two commit and one receives injury." The English is true to the original, and is generally sustained. Cut off; many adhere to this rendering; in v. 8, destroy; several prefer pursue, meaning, with severity; Hengstenberg has extirpate; Chaldee, Arabic, Calvin, church of England, Edwards, Jebb and Alexander, destroy; Venema, confound. We had the same word in Ps. xviii. 40; lxix. 4; lxxiii. 27; in Ps. lxxxviii. 16; cxliii. 12, cut off; in Ps. cxix. 139, consumed; it is evident that the kind of excision spoken of is to be learned from the context. Here the evil threatened seems to be cutting off from the family and friendship of David. Clarke: "All flatterers and time-servers, and those who by insinuations and false accusations endeavor to supplant the upright, that they may obtain their offices for themselves or their dependents, will I consider as enemies to the state, abominate, and expel from my court." Patrick well agrees with Clarke: Him that hath a high look and a proud heart will not I suffer. A high look, literally, proud of eyes. No doubt it describes an insolent and arbitrary person. Some make the next phrase express the same idea—a proud heart, literally, wide of heart. Wide, never rendered proud except here and in Pr. xxi. 4; xxviii. 25, though it occurs more than twenty times. It is commonly rendered large, wide, broad. But in English to be large of heart is to be generous and noble. But here it means proud or ambitious. Dodd thinks it denotes "one, whose heart dilates and swells with pride, upon account of the largeness of his fortune, or the eminence of his station." The church of England renders the phrase, a high stomach, using stomach in the old sense of ambition. Of one Shakspeare says: "He was a man of an unbounded stomach, ever ranking himself with princes." The Arabic has a greedy heart; Edwards, an ambitious heart; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway and Hammond, an insatiable heart. Clarke thinks this clause describes "one who is seeking preferment; who sticks at nothing to gain it; who behaves himself haughtily and insolently in office." In Pr. xxi. 4; xxviii. 25, the translation may be fitly altered as in this place. The proud, insolent, covetous and ambitious are probably all comprehended in the two phrases here used. Will not I suffer, or endure; in Isa. i. 13, away with. The Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: I will not (or would not) eat with him; Fabritius: I could not bear him.

6. Mine eyes shall be upon the faithful of the land, that they may dwell with me. Faithful, in Job xii. 20, trusty; often applied to faithful men, as to Moses, Num. xii. 7; to Abraham, Neh. ix. 8; to Hanan, Neh. xiii. 13; to a messenger, Pr. xxv. 13; a participle sometimes rendered sure, steadfast, established; here well rendered faithful. Dwell with me, as a member of my family, be in attendance at my court, and have my countenance. He that walketh in a perfect way, he shall serve me. A perfect way, as in v. 2. To walk in any way denotes the habitual conduct. Serve, minister. This clause embraces not only familiars, but all who fill office or exercise authority under the king.

7. He that worketh deceit shall not dwell within my house. Worketh, dealeth with, committeth. Deceit, see on Ps. xxxii. 2, where the same word is rendered guile. Dwell, abide, tarry, as in v. 6. He that telleth lies shall not tarry in my sight. Tarry, better and oftener rendered be established, Ps. lxxxix. 21; xciii. 1; fixed, Ps. lvii. 7; cviii. 1. A liar might find his way into David's house, but he should very soon find his way out.

8. I will early destroy all the wicked of the land; that I may cut off all wicked doers from the city of the LORD. Early, in Ps. v. 3; xxx. 5; xc. 5, 6, and often in the morning; in Ps. xli. 5; xc. 14, early. When one would do a full day's work, he commonly begins early. David purposed to make thorough work of ridding the land of those, who by their crimes were pests. The word is in the plural, in the mornings, i. e., every morning. Compare Jer. xxi. 12. David first speaks of all the wicked. The word is commonly so rendered, sometimes ungodly, as in Ps. i. Here it points out such as are openly and mischievously wicked. It is explained by the parallel phrase in the latter clause, wicked doers, malefactors, literally, doers of iniquity. It comprehends all who practise injustice, violence, cruelty, wrong. For the meaning of destroy see on v. 5, where it is rendered cut off. Cut off, also rendered destroy, Ex. viii. 9; Judges iv. 24; it here only implies extirpation.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. We fitly express our vows and solemn purposes, as well as our views of God and his government in singing and with music, v. 1. It is a narrow view that limits song to mere praise.

2. Experience is a good school, and trials prepare men to fill useful stations, 1 Sam. xviii. 14, 15. David was prepared to be a good king by the ill-treatment he received at the court of Saul. Had it not been for the discipline thus received, he might have been intoxicated with power, and never formed the good resolutions contained in this Psalm. Even with all the bitter lessons taught him, how far he forgot himself in a few cases is faithfully recorded in history. Tholuck: "During his residence at the court of Saul, he had learned how greatly kings are plagued with sycophants, slanderers, and proud men, like Doeg and Cush, who driving the faithful away seek only their own gain, and to become the lords of their lords."

3. It is obligatory on all rulers to have before them a perfect standard, v. 2. One may not live up to his rules, but he will surely not do right if his standard is below the code of righteousness. The constitution of the Jewish commonwealth required that every king of that people should write for his own use a copy of the whole law, Deut. xvii. 18.

4. Whoever would do right must resolve to do right, vv. 2-8. A thoughtless man may possibly do a thing in itself right, but he will habitually err.

5. All, who have spiritual wisdom, feel their dependence on the aid of divine grace, v. 2; James i. 17; iii. 15. Scott: "David found it much easier to resolve and purpose, though sincerely, and in the sight of God, than to accomplish his purposes: as many things in his subsequent administration prove; especially his sparing Joab, and continuing him in authority, after his murder of Abner; and also his conduct respecting Absalom; not to speak of his more awful transgressions." Compare Rom. vii. 16, 19.

6. One of the excellencies of really good principles is the ease with which we apply them to new circumstances. This is peculiarly the case respecting our avoidance of sin. He, who as a man hates lying, slander, pride or ambition, will not as a householder, a ruler, or a judge love or practise these vices. Dickson: "He, that purposeth to carry a public charge well, must discharge the duty of a private man well."

7. It is of vast importance that heads of families, controlling children and servants, should have good rules for the government of their own conduct. Henry: "It is not enough to put on our religion, when we go abroad, and appear before men; but we must govern ourselves by it in our families." No public functions can exempt us from the obligation to rule well our own families, 1 Tim. iii. 4. Clarke: "It is easier for most men to walk with a perfect heart in the church, or even in the world, than in their own families;" Dickson: "A man's holiness, righteousness and wisdom are put to the proof by his behaviour to his domestics, with whom he most frequently and entirely converseth." Many a man, who stands well in the church, is known by his wife, children, or servants to be a devil.

8. Let us untiringly labor and pray to keep our aims and designs pure. If they are corrupt, all is rotten. Plans for overreaching others are vile. Great foresight is the name often given to swindling and iniquity in private, pecuniary and political schemes. He, who by subtilty undermines others, is digging a pit for himself.

9. If any man would maintain the elevated standard set forth in this Psalm and in the Scriptures generally, he must in his soul hate sin, v. 3. He must utterly detest and abhor iniquity. We cannot love and practise that which is holy without loathing that which is sinful.

10. No wise man was ever stubborn, perverse, or deceitful; nor is it safe to cultivate the friendship of such, v. 4. Dickson: "Among the vices of the heart, frowardness, perverseness and wickedness are most of all to be eschewed and abhorred, because those evils harden the heart against admonition, and make it incorrigible in an evil course."

11. Let every man beware how he chooses his associates. Bad companions will corrupt the purest man, who can endure their society, vv. 4, 5.

12. No earthly potentate is so poor as not to have his flatterers. Upon a turn these easily become slanderers of the absent, and especially of the virtuous, Pr. xx.

19. No human beings are more pestilent or dangerous, v. 5. Calvin: "To detract from the reputation of another privily, and by stealth, is a plague exceedingly destructive. It is as if a man killed a fellow-creature from a place of ambush." Of all the wild beasts on earth the calumniator is the most to be dreaded, especially when he is so hardened as to pray over his schemes. His impending doom is fearful, Ps. cxx. 3, 4. It is greatly to be regretted that in most places neither the legal, nor the social penalty for slander is duly severe or faithfully executed.

13. As nothing is more offensive to God than pride and high looks, so nothing ought to be more odious in the eyes of men, especially men in authority, v. 5.

14. Closely allied to pride is ambition, which knows no bounds, and which is filling the world with horrible groans. Let all men set their faces against it, v. 5. None can tell how great a scourge one or two ambitious men may prove to millions.

15. Wicked as men are, all men are not liars. There are still some that are faithful, v. 6. It is an unspeakable blessing to any family, city, church, or nation to have such for servants. Mercies came pouring in on the house of Potiphar, when Joseph belonged to it. But for his timely death what woes would wicked Haman have brought on a whole nation! Calvin: "Servants are the hands of a prince, and whatever he determines for the good of his subjects, they will wickedly overthrow, provided they are avaricious, fraudulent, or rapacious. Even good and well-disposed princes often manifest so much indolence and irresolution as to suffer themselves to be governed by the worst counsellors, and inconsiderately prostitute the offices of state by conferring them on the unworthy."

16. Guile is an inherent element in all depravity, v. 7. It works mischief everywhere. In courts and cabinets it engenders horrible corruptions. It unfurls the banner of wickedness. Where candor and truth are wanting, all iniquity abounds.

17. Ethical writers have undertaken to classify the different kinds of falsehood; but the Scripture denounces the wrath of heaven against lies of every kind, v. 7. Rev. xxii. 15. Falsehood utterly subverts all the principles of government, and all the foundations of morals. No man ever hated lies or loved truth excessively.

18. It is impossible for a man to tell which of two rulers is the greater curse, he who bears the sword in vain, or he who wantons with the lives of his people, v. 8. Rulers, who are a terror to evil-doers and a praise to them who do well, are blessings inconceivable. See 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4. Those of opposite character are among the most terrible of heaven's scourges. Pray for rulers, 1 Tim. ii. 1-3. Their temptations are great, their trials fearful. Luther: "It is with God alone that a kingdom and commonwealth can be rightly governed: for where God is not, there all things are scattered and in confusion, and neither families are subject to their heads, nor citizens to their rulers."

19. David was a type of Christ, and in setting up his own kingdom, he prefigured that of the Redeemer. If David determined to have none but true and faithful men about him and to frown indignantly upon the wicked, how much more will Christ exclude sinners from the city of God over which he presides. Therefore, "let each individual be zealous and diligent to reform his own heart and ways, ever mindful of that future most awful morning, when the King of Righteousness shall cut off with the sword of eternal judgment all wicked doers from the new and heavenly Jerusalem." Rev. xxii. 14, 15.

PSALM CII.

A Prayer of the afflicted, when he is overwhelmed, and poureth out his complaint before the LORD.

- 1 Hear my prayer, O LORD, and let my cry come unto thee.
- 2 Hide not thy face from me in the day when I am in trouble; incline thine ear unto me: in the day when I call answer me speedily.
- 3 For my days are consumed like smoke, and my bones are burned as a hearth.
- 4 My heart is smitten, and withered like grass; so that I forget to eat my bread.
- 5 By reason of the voice of my groaning my bones cleave to my skin.
- 6 I am like a pelican of the wilderness: I am like an owl of the desert.
- 7 I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the housetops.
- 8 Mine enemies reproach me all the day; and they that are mad against me are sworn against me.
- 9 For I have eaten ashes like bread, and mingled my drink with weeping,
- 10 Because of thine indignation and thy wrath: for thou hast lifted me up, and cast me down.
- 11 My days are like a shadow that declineth; and I am withered like grass.
- 12 But thou, O LORD, shalt endure for ever; and thy remembrance unto all generations.
- 13 Thou shalt arise, and have mercy upon Zion: for the time to favour her, yea, the set time, is come.
- 14 For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favour the dust thereof.
- 15 So the heathen shall fear the name of the LORD, and all the kings of the earth thy glory.
- 16 When the LORD shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory.
- 17 He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer.
- 18 This shall be written for the generation to come: and the people which shall be created shall praise the LORD.
- 19 For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary; from heaven did the LORD behold the earth;
- 20 To hear the groaning of the prisoner; to loose those that are appointed to death;
- 21 To declare the name of the LORD in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem;
- 22 When the people are gathered together, and the kingdoms, to serve the LORD.
- 23 He weakened my strength in the way; he shortened my days.
- 24 I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days: thy years are throughout all generations.
- 25 Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens are the work of thy hands.
- 26 They shall perish, but thou shalt endure: yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment; as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed:
- 27 But thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end.
- 28 The children of thy servants shall continue, and their seed shall be established before thee.

THREE opinions somewhat prevail, respecting the time when this Prayer was composed. 1. Some think it was written after the return of Ezra with a commission to rebuild the temple, and in the state of things mentioned in Neh. i. 3-11. This is the view of Hammond, Morison and Dodd, regarded as admissible by Henry and Scott. In this case the author is probably Nehemiah, Ezra, or some cotemporary. 2. Others think it was written during the captivity, but near its close. Calvin: "This prayer seems to have been dictated to the faithful when they were languishing in captivity in Babylon." Diodati: "It is apparent that this Psalm was penned towards the end of the Babylonish captivity to be a form of prayer for the restauration of God's people according to his promise." Walford: "This plaintive poem was written by some pious exile towards the expiration of the seventy years of captivity during which the people of Israel were detained in Babylon." Patrick, Mudge, Edwards, Tholuck, Scott and others are of the same mind. If written during the captivity, Jeremiah or Daniel may have been the author. 3. Some think it was written by David. Hengstenberg and Alexander decidedly favor this view. If David was the author, the Psalm probably had no historic occasion, but is purely prophetic. Scott dates it B. C. 1040. Some call this the fifth of the penitential Psalms. But there is not in it any confession of sin, or any mention of sin as the cause of suffering. Symson excludes it from the number of penitential Psalms. There is some diversity of view as to the scope of this ode. Theodoret: "This Psalm may serve for the use of any man, who wrestles with any great calamity, and earnestly seeks the divine favor for his help and deliverance." Luther: "This Psalm is a prayer of an afflicted and tempted heart, miserably sighing and praying for deliverance and the coming of the kingdom of God. And indeed the whole sum and substance of this Psalm is, 'Thy kingdom come.'" Calvin: "Whoever of the prophets composed this Psalm, it is certain that he dictated it to the faithful as a form of prayer for the re-establishment of the temple and the city." Hengstenberg: "The suppliant prays and hopes sometimes for himself and sometimes for Sion. The obvious explanation of this is, that the king is the personified aggregate of the people, and especially that the prosperity and sufferings of Israel were at all times bound up with the fate of the family of David." But David typified Messiah; and his kingdom in his family represented the true church of God. And so this Psalm is regarded as Messianic. Henry: "It is clear, from the application of vv. 25, 26, to Christ, that the Psalm has reference to the days of the Messiah, and speaks either of his affliction, or of the afflictions of the church for his sake." Morison: "As the literal Jerusalem was a type of the spiritual, and the rebuilding of the former was a type of the revival and glory of the latter, we may regard the Psalm as bearing a special reference to the times of the gospel, and to the universal establishment of the faith of Christ, when the eternal kingdom of Messiah shall be set up from the rising to the setting sun." That this ode is Messianic is determined by inspiration itself. In Hebrews i. 10-12, Paul directly applies to Christ verses 25-27, substantially as they are rendered in the Septuagint, and all this for the very purpose of proving that the Son is above the angels. Sampson: "Since the Apostle so clearly applies the words to Christ, we must suppose the Psalm Messianic, or run into infidelity. . . . The Spirit speaking by the apostles has a right to be his own interpreter of what he has said by the prophets." A long line of expositors from Augustine down to this day might be cited as taking this view. The names of the Most High found in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD, El God and Jah LORD; on which respectively see on Ps. i. 2; v. 4, and preliminary remarks on Ps. lxxviii. The title is worthy of notice. The Hebrew and all the ancient versions except the Syriac give it substantially as we have it. Prayer, the same word so rendered in Ps. iv. 1, and in title of Psalm xc., on which see. Afflicted, in Ps. ix. 12, humble; in Ps. ix. 18, poor; here in the singular. Alexander renders it a sufferer. Is overwhelmed; Calvin, shall be shut up; Doway, was anxious; Alexander, is troubled. Complaint; Calvin, meditation; Doway, supplication; many render it prayer. We may read either a prayer of the afflicted, or, a prayer for the afflicted. Calvin and some others prefer the latter.

1. Hear my prayer, O LORD, and let my cry come unto thee. Prayer, as in the title.

It is an earnest prayer, a cry. See on Ps. xviii. 6. The two words explain each other, and express great earnestness and urgency. None but a deeply distressed soul can fitly use them. The cry implies the audible and strong use of the vocal organs.

2. Hide not thy face from me in the day when I am in trouble. On hiding the face see on Ps. xiii. 1. Compare also Ps. xxvii. 9; xlv. 24; lxix. 17; lxxxviii. 14. Trouble, elsewhere distress, tribulation, affliction, adversity. It specially refers to distress caused by an enemy. See on Ps. iii. 1; iv. 1. The suppliant feels that his case is very pressing. He urges his plea: Incline thine ear unto me. We have just the same in Ps. xvii. 6; xxxi. 2, in the latter case rendered Bow down, etc. The petition occurs frequently, Ps. xlv. 10; lxxi. 2; lxxxvi. 1; lxxxviii. 2. His urgency is intense: In the day when I call answer me speedily. The calling is praying. The answer is the granting of needed succor. Speedily, as in Ps. lxix. 17; lxxix. 8. The meaning of the word is uniform, quickly, hastily, suddenly, or speedily. Alexander: "We find here accumulated nearly all the phrases used by David to express the same ideas elsewhere."

3. For my days are consumed like smoke, which passes away swiftly, uselessly, obscurely, irrecoverably. There is nothing left of them. They are spent, or ended. This is a good sense, and is allowable. But the Syriac, Hammond, Dodd and Alexander prefer to read in smoke. This also is allowable. If we adopt it, then the sense is either that his days pass vainly and utterly away, (see Ps. xxxvii. 20;) or, that his afflictions have deformed and defiled him, as smoke does things held in it, Ps. cxix. 83. And my bones are burned as a hearth. Instead of hearth, John Rogers' translation, the Bishop's Bible, the church of England, Fabritius, Diodati, Jebb, Fry and Hengstenberg have fire-brand. The Doway reads: My bones are grown dry like fuel for the fire. This is supported by the Septuagint, and is followed by Hammond. The word rendered hearth is found only here, and in the plural in Isa. xxxiii. 14, where it is rendered burnings. The bones are the strongest and most solid parts of the body. When these are gone the strength has perished. Tholuck: "Flames rage within;" Hengstenberg: "The burning is not that of fever, but that of pain."

4. My heart is smitten, and withered like grass. Clarke: "The metaphor here is taken from grass cut down in the meadow. It is first smitten with the scythe, and then withered by the sun." Smitten, applied to men, rendered killed or slain. Calvin: "His heart is withered, and wholly dried up like mown grass." So that I forget to eat my bread. Calvin: "My sorrow has been so great, that I have neglected my ordinary food;" Hengstenberg: "All pleasure in eating has left me." The effect of deep and anxious distress in taking away the appetite is matter of common experience, and is often noticed in Scripture, 1 Sam. i. 7; xx. 34; xxviii. 20; 1 Kings xxi. 4; Ps. cvii. 18; Dan. x. 3.

5. By reason of the voice of my groaning my bones cleave to my skin. Weary and haggard had he become by his groaning. Plumpness had left him. His strength was perishing. His bones (literally bone) seemed to be covered with no muscle, but only skin. The language of this and the two preceding verses is highly figurative.

6. I am like a pelican of the wilderness. Some have thought that the bird here intended is the bittern, which utters a harsh cry before and after its evening flight. It seeks deserted places. But it is pretty certain that the pelican is the bird designated. The Hebrew word rendered pelican comes from a verb that signifies to vomit. The female of this species has under her bill a large pouch in which she carries large quantities of food and drink for her young. When she wishes to give them nourishment she presses this pouch, and so throws up what is needful for them. Hence the Hebrew name. The ancient versions all have pelican. The noise made by this bird is harsh and unpleasant. At some seasons of the year pelicans are found in flocks on the water; but when rearing their young they are very solitary, living in dry and desert places. This change of habit has made some assert that there are two kinds of pelican; but this is not now credited. In Isa. xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14, the same word is erroneously rendered cormorant. See Lev. xi. 18; Deut. xiv. 7. This clause teaches that grief drove him into solitude and forced from him dismal cries. Thus he was like the pelican. I am like an owl of the desert. The owl is never gregarious. It always seeks solitude, and utters only doleful sounds. Most of the ancient versions and the great mass of modern translations have owl. The word rendered desert is plural, and means desolations, wastes, waste places, desolate places, Ezra ix. 9; Isa. li. 3; Ezek. xxxiii. 24; xxxviii. 12.

7. I watch, and am as a sparrow alone upon the housetop. The first and second clauses have no particular connection. The first simply means, I keep a vigil, as persons are accustomed to do who are in great distress, and are anxiously looking for some relief. Sparrow, see on Ps. lxxxiv. 3. "Bochart thinks that the screech-owl is intended." For sparrow, Edwards and Hengstenberg read solitary bird.

8. Mine enemies reproach me all the day. Enemies, the word usually so rendered; see on Ps. iii. 7; vi. 10. Reproach, also rendered defy, rail. It implies great insolence. And they that are mad against me are sworn against me. Are mad, are under a violent and dangerous excitement. It is not uncommon for malignant men to bind themselves by oaths to deeds of wickedness, Acts xxiii. 21. But Horsley's translation is, The profligate make me the standard of execration. Rosenmüller and Alexander render it, They swear by me. Diodati: Make curses of me; meaning, Let others be cursed as I am cursed. This gives a sense which might be accepted; but it seems not to have occurred to ancient expositors.

9. For I have eaten ashes like bread, and mingled my drink with weeping. Ashes are pungent and increase thirst. The ancients resorted to them much in times of grief, when they also used fasting and sackcloth; but put them not into their mouths. The first clause is therefore purely figurative, unless indeed we suppose the sufferer so covered with ashes that some of them fell on his food; or that his bread was thrown on the ashes where he lay. This idea gains probability from the fact that the better rendering literally is, in bread, as Calvin notes, and from the latter clause where his tears are represented as mingling with his drink. The next verse discloses the cause:

10. Because of thine indignation and thy wrath. Indignation; in Ps. xxxviii. 3, anger. Wrath, almost uniformly rendered. It expresses great displeasure. The manner in which this wrath was manifested is next described: For thou hast lifted me up, and cast me down. This lifting up seems to have been only that the casting down might be the more violent. Burke: "The sentiments awakened by descending are wholly different from those awakened by ascending." Calvin: "It is a great aggravation of our calamity to have fallen from an elevated position."

11. My days are like a shadow that declineth. Declineth, stretches out, inclines, extends. As the sun goes down, shadows lengthen till at last unitedly they form the twilight, and finally are lost in the darkness of night. And I am withered like grass. The clause is identical with that in v. 4. Grass is any herb.

12. But thou, O LORD, shalt endure for ever; and thy remembrance unto all generations. It seems most natural for the devout mind to contrast the brevity of human life with the eternity of God. Compare Ps. xc. 1-10. Where is the living man that cares the least for the memory of Alexander, Cæsar, or Hannibal, for Pharaoh, Nebuchadnezzar, or Philip of Macedon? But the memory of God both is and deserves to be forever precious in heaven and in earth. When Jehovah shall cease to be here loved and feared, the world will come to an end.

13. Thou shalt arise and have mercy upon Zion. Arise, of frequent use; it here indicates that God would earnestly address himself to the business in hand. God's pity and compassion to his people are infinite, eternal and unchangeable. The manifestations of his love to Zion are most seasonable. For the time to favour her, yea, the set time, is come. If this Psalm relates to the church in the Babylonish captivity, and was written by Daniel, we have an explanation of this clause in the writings of that prophet, Dan. ix. 2. If it relates to the church in all her future, then we are to learn that the set time is to be inferred from what immediately follows. For the set time, Hengstenberg reads, the point of time.

14. For thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favour the dust thereof. More than most verses of this ode, this would seem to point to the rebuilding of Jerusalem, Neh. iv. 2, 10. But the general idea of desolations is often applied to the church in a low condition; and never had the tabernacle of David fallen so low as just before the birth of Christ, when the truly pious, such as Simeon and Anna, had an intense zeal for the glory of God and the building up of Zion. But the true church has often been very low. Alexander suggests this paraphrase: "Thou wilt have mercy upon Zion, FOR thy servants already look with interest and strong desire on her ruins, a sure sign of the approaching restoration." Such zeal on the part of the pious would affect others:

15. So the heathen shall fear the name of the Lord. Heathen, Gentiles, nations. The effect of all God's stupendous deliverances wrought for his people at any time has been happy either in stilling the adversary or in converting sinners. And all the kings of the earth [shall fear] thy glory. We have a like expression in Isa. lix. 19. God's majesty inspires dread.

16. When the Lord shall build up Zion, he shall appear in his glory. The verbs of this verse and of the next are in the preterite. The prophet foresees these things as certainly as if already accomplished. There has never been a time of great favor to the church, which did not gloriously display the divine perfections. The great revival of true piety in the days of Ezra was more marvellous than the rebuilding of the holy city.

17. He will regard the prayer of the destitute, and not despise their prayer. Prayer, as in the title and in v. 1. The destitute; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway and Fabritius, humble; Houbigant, afflicted; Calvin, solitary; Fry, the mourner. Clarke explains it "of him who is laid in utter ruin, who is entirely wasted." The lower the state of his people, if they cry in faith, the more gloriously will Jehovah deliver them. The second clause of this verse by a happy figure of speech asserts less than we are fairly warranted in believing.

18. This shall be written for the generation to come. Written; Calvin, registered, having a place in the public records. Compare Rom. iv. 23, 24; xv. 4; 1 Cor. x. 11. And the people which shall be created shall praise the LORD. The generation to come, being created anew by the Holy Spirit, and by these things confirmed in truth and holiness, shall celebrate the praises of Jah. There is no reason for limiting the idea to a political organization yet to be raised up; for although the word rendered people, means a nation, yet the body of believers is such a nation, 1 Pet. ii. 9.

19. For he hath looked down from the height of his sanctuary; from heaven did the LORD behold the earth. Looked down, as in Ps. xiv. 2; liii. 2. It implies earnest and thorough inquisition. Did behold, in Ps. xiii. 3 and elsewhere, consider; in Ps. lxxiv. 20, have respect. Compare Isa. lxvi. 2. Both these shades of meaning may belong to the word here, although the general sense of it is to look, Gen. xix. 17, 26; Ps. xxii. 17. If in any sense the temple at Jerusalem was a sanctuary, or holy place, much more is heaven itself, the temple not made with hands. The Lord looked down for purposes of mercy:

20. To hear the groaning of the prisoner. Groaning, sighing, crying out. See Ps.

xii. 5; lxxix. 11; Mal. ii. 13. To hear is to regard in compassion. Prisoner, one that is bound. We have the same word applied to them that are bound in affliction and iron, Ps. cvii. 10. We have another word for captive. The prisoner is the most afflicted of men, unable to help himself, or obtain aid from his friends; cut off from the charities of life, and wholly in the power of enemies. If any case calls for commiseration, surely it is his. The deplorable condition of men involved in sin, and sunk in guilt is fitly represented by that of prisoners, Isa. xlii. 7; xlix. 9; lxi. 1; Zech. ix. 11, 12. This clause indicates something beyond release from political captivity. So in the next clause the Lord is said to loose those that are appointed to death, literally the children of death, those doomed to death, a Hebraism like children of sorrow in English. It occurs nowhere else but in Ps. lxxix. 11, both clauses of which correspond to those of this verse. That spiritual blessings are spoken of seems more certain the farther we proceed:

21. To declare the name of the LORD in Zion, and his praise in Jerusalem. Surely such language points to the preaching of the Gospel not only at first in Jerusalem but in the church universal, the whole Zion of God. The LORD is the Lord Christ, Jehovah Jesus. Alexander: "To recount God's name is to recount the mighty deeds which constitute it, and the celebration of which constitutes his praise." Compare Isa. ii. 3; Micah iv. 2.

22. When the people are gathered together, and the kingdoms, to serve the LORD. People, plural, nations. Are gathered, a verb often used respecting the conversion of the world to Christ, Isa. xliii. 5; xlix. 18; liv. 7; lx. 4, 7; lxvi. 18. Calvin refers to the prophecy of Jacob, Gen. xlix. 10, as shedding light on this. "In celebrating the deliverance from the Babylonish captivity, the prophets are wont to extend it to the coming of Christ." On serving the Lord, see on Ps. ii. 11. Such were the blessed visions which the prophet had of the future glory of the church. But hope deferred makes the heart sick:

23. He weakened my strength in the way; he shortened my days. My strength, literally his strength, but evidently pointing to the same person, or as the strength of God's people is entirely derived from him, it may be spoken of as his strength. The sufferer speaking in his own name probably expresses the fear that he shall not live to see the accomplishment of these glorious predictions. Weakened, humbled, afflicted, Ps. xxxv. 13; lxxxviii. 7. Shortened, see on Ps. lxxxix. 45. The verb means to reap, or cut down as a mower. Holy men before the coming of Christ had a great longing for the latter day glory, Matt. xiii. 17; Luke ii. 29-32.

24. I said, O my God, take me not away in the midst of my days. If the prophet is speaking for himself, this clause deplores the prospect of not living to witness what he had foretold. If he speaks in the name of the church, then she deplores her sad prospect of extermination under the cruel bondage of the heathen and the malice of the devil. She prays that she may survive until Messiah comes in his glory. Individual prophets and believers may die; the outward state of the church may be depressed or distressed; but she is safe because her head lives and reigns forever. Thy years are throughout all generations.

25. Of old hast thou laid the foundation of the earth: and the heavens are the work of thy hands.

26. They shall perish, but thou shalt endure: yea, all of them shall wax old like a garment, as a vesture shalt thou change them, and they shall be changed:

27. But thou art the same, and thy years shall have no end. We cannot be mistaken in applying this language to Jesus. We have the authority of heaven itself for so doing, Heb. i. 10-12. 'Messianic ideas' were very familiar to the prophets; and we are in more danger of not referring to the Redeemer all the passages in which he is spoken of, than we are of applying to him those which do not belong to him, Acts iii. 24. The English version here gives the complete sense as well as any. The three things ascribed to Christ are creative energy, eternity and immutability. In Christ his people to the end of the world have all their stability and certainty of triumph.

28. The children of thy servants shall continue, and their seed shall be established before thee. Calvin: "By these words the prophet intimates that he does not ask the preservation of the church, because it is a part of the human race, but because God has raised it above the revolutions of the world." The seed of God's servants are those, who have like precious faith and love, Ps. lxxxix. 36; Gal. iii. 7. Such shall continue and be established, have an everlasting inheritance.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Affliction is the lot of God's people. Sometimes it is overwhelming and their hearts are ready to faint, as the title says. Deep sorrow is no new thing to the saints.

2. In the strict sense of the term, praise is not the sole object of psalmody, for this psalm is and is called a prayer. Other psalms are Maschils. Any truth of Scripture may properly be rehearsed in song.

3. There must be sin personal or imputed when there is so much sorrow as is here expressed.

4. The greater our distress the more fervent should be our calling upon the Almighty, vv. 1, 2.

5. While our secret devotions are not to be uttered in the hearing of men, yet it is often well so to pray that we may hear our own voices, vv. 1, 2. Calvin: "I admit that the heart ought to move and direct the tongue to prayer; but, as it often flags or performs its duty in a slow and sluggish manner, it requires to be aided by the tongue."

6. We may plead and urge our case as much as we choose provided we sweetly submit all to God, vv. 1, 2. Indeed intensity and fervor ought to be manifested in all our prayers for things known to be agreeable to God's will. Calvin: "To pour out our complaints before him after the manner of little children would certainly be to treat his majesty with very little reverence, were it not that he has been pleased to allow us such freedom." Dickson: "The Lord suffereth his babbling children to speak to him in their own form of speech."

7. Considering the number, variety and depth of their sorrows, it is a wonder that good men live as long as they do, vv. 3-11. They endure the hidings of God's face, the delays of his providence, the loss of comfort, bodily infirmity, mental dejection, nights of weeping and days of howling, poverty and persecution. Yet by the help of faith and prayer, they live on. To them consuming grief is no novelty. They have all sorts of troubles. Seldom do their afflictions come alone. Horne: "The scoffs and reproaches of men are generally added to the chastisements of God; or rather, perhaps, are a part, and sometimes the bitterest part of them."

8. It is not wicked to give strong, outward expression to our anguish, even by crying and groaning, and seeking the most perfect solitude, vv. 1, 5-7.

9. If God's people now have enemies, even bitter ones, no new thing has happened to them, v. 8. Many rave like madmen and are fierce and cruel. The vilest men are often sworn friends to each other even when they have considerable diversity of interest. But against God's people the wicked are implacable and full of reproaches.

10. The saints would find it no hard task to bear the reproaches of men, if they could always have the sensible, gracious presence of the Lord; but when his indignation and wrath are manifested, the best of men cry out in their anguish. Calvin:

"Surely there is nothing which ought to wound our hearts more deeply, than when we feel that God is angry with us." Jesus himself complained of nothing but the hidings of his Father's face. Without a word he endured the cross, despising the shame. Dickson: "When God is seen to be angry, the comforts of this life are tasteless and can yield no pleasure."

11. By dwelling on the eternity and unchangeableness of God, we may heighten our sense of the vanity and shortness of our own lives, and this may be profitable to us, and may sober us; but if rightly evinced, it will not produce dejection, vv. 11, 12.

12. Ever since the first gospel promise in Eden up to this day a better time has been coming to the church, v. 13. If even the best men believed that their trials and those of the church would last forever, their courage would utterly fail.

13. Whatever the outward state of the church may be, however trodden down of the wicked, and but feebly sustained by many professed friends, yet God's people never have a greater love to her than when apparently in ruins, v. 14. When this interest in religion is animated by a proper hope and becomes lively, it is a great token for good. Calvin: "The more sad the desolation of the church is, the less ought we to be alienated from its love."

14. One of the greatest means of reviving true religion is hearty prayer, v. 17. Nor need churches wait till the rich and the gifted among their members are greatly stirred up in the work of the Lord; for he hears the prayer of the destitute, the poor, the solitary, the afflicted. God cares not at all for the worldly consideration in which men are held. O no! He takes the beggar from the dunghill and sets him among princes.

15. Past favors bestowed upon ourselves or others should mightily encourage us in our applications to a throne of grace, v. 18. The reasoning of faith is: What God has done he may do again; and if it be for his glory and my good he will not deny my earnest petition.

16. The work of God's Spirit in building up Zion by the conversion of souls greatly begets and fosters the spirit of praise, v. 18. Where the work is truly the Lord's, his people will not deny to him the glory that is his due, 1 Cor. iii. 7.

17. We need not fear that God will overlook the afflicted state of his church and people; vv. 19, 20. He hears every sigh and every groan that is uttered. He knows the pious grief of his chosen. He will not be unmindful of their tears or of their labor of love.

18. Tholuck: "The history of the Lord's people is a sermon," vv. 19-23. This is true of each portion of that history. In each individual believer as in that of every associated company of believers, God works out the greatest and most glorious truths of the covenant of his peace.

19. In all our addresses to the Almighty, even in our short ejaculations, let us not forget that he is in heaven and we upon earth; and that awful reverence towards him and profound humility respecting ourselves altogether become us, v. 19.

20. The church of God is the depository and guardian of the truth and of the best interests of religion in the world, v. 21. Whatever of piety or sound doctrine is found among men is owing to the sanctifying power of God's Spirit on the hearts of his people.

21. The real unity of the church does not consist in name, form, or place, but in her taking the Lord Christ for her Master and Saviour, v. 22.

22. The delays of the Almighty, by reason of our unbelief, weaken our strength and beget despondency, v. 23. But it ought not to be so. We should encourage ourselves in the Lord our God.

23. Instead of being depressed and dejected at the remembrance of the shortness of our own lives, we should be aroused to exert the greater zeal, inasmuch as the day draweth near, v. 23. That life is long enough which fully glorifies God and secures salvation.

24. And yet it is lawful for us in certain cases to pray for the continuance of life and the lengthening of our days, v. 24. See REMARKS on Ps. xxxix. 13.

25. What would the church do without Christ? To her he is everything. In her deepest distress and sorest affliction a sight of the Redeemer cheers her up. But without him she can do nothing. Luther: "For out of and without Christ there is nothing but the kingdom of sin and death: that is, a continual misery and distress in this life by various and hard temptations of the devil and the world." So this sufferer found it, and turns away from all other hope to Jehovah-Jesus, whose perfections are celebrated in vv. 24-27. The exceeding excellence of the Saviour arises from the constitution of his person. In modern times none deny that he had a human nature. It is marvellous that any should be so bold as to question his divinity. If he who laid the foundation of the earth and made the heavens is not divine, what conception can we form of divinity? If he who shall fold up the heavens like a vesture is not God, who is God? If he who inhabited an eternity past and shall inhabit an eternity to come is not truly divine, then all our reasoning is unsatisfactory. If he who is the same yesterday, to-day and forever is not God, then we know not who is God. Yet these works and properties are by inspiration itself (Heb. i. 10-12) ascribed to the Son of God.

26. Great is the grace which God bestows on his people and their offspring, v. 28. If he visits the iniquities of the fathers upon the children to the third and fourth generation, he shows mercy to thousands of generations of them that love him and keep his commandments, Deut. v. 9, 10.

27. God has already done so much for his people in the redemption from Egypt, in the restoration from Babylonish captivity, in the advent of Messiah, and in the calling of the Gentiles, that Zion may be fairly summoned to stronger faith and bolder enterprise respecting the great things promised of old and yet to be fulfilled in the church on earth. Dickson: "The church shall never be barren, but from age to age bring forth children unto God." The gates of hell shall not prevail against her.

PSALM CIII.

A Psalm of David.

- 1 Bless the LORD, O my soul: and all that is within me, *ble*ss his holy name.
- 2 Bless the LORD, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits:
- 3 Who forgiveth all thine iniquities; who healeth all thy diseases,
- 4 Who redeemeth thy life from destruction; who crowneth thee with lovingkindness and tender mercies;
- 5 Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things; so that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's.
- 6 The LORD executeth righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed.
- 7 He made known his ways unto Moses, his acts unto the children of Israel.
- 8 The LORD is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy.
- 9 He will not always chide: neither will he keep his anger for ever.
- 10 He hath not dealt with us after our sins; nor rewarded us according to our iniquities.
- 11 For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear him.
- 12 As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us.
- 13 Like as a father pitieth his children, so the LORD pitieth them that fear him.

- 14 For he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust.
 15 As for man, his days are as grass: as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth.
 16 For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more.
 17 But the mercy of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him, and his righteousness unto children's children;
 18 To such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them.
 19 The LORD hath prepared his throne in the heavens; and his kingdom ruleth over all.
 20 Bless the LORD, ye his angels, that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearken-ing unto the voice of his word.
 21 Bless ye the LORD, all ye his hosts; ye ministers of his, that do his pleasure.
 22 Bless the LORD, all his works in all places of his dominion: bless the LORD, O my soul.

ON the title see on title of Psalm xi. Henry's first remark on this ode is: "This Psalm calls more for devotion than exposition." He, who with a warm heart and ordinary good sense, enters into its spirit in any version of it extant, is more enriched by it, and has a better understanding of it, than he, who with a cold heart can critically weigh every word in the original, and in each of the many translations given us by ripe scholars. The Hebrew and all the ancient versions give David as author. This is doubtless correct, although Clarke thinks it "refers to the times of the captivity, or rather to its conclusion." He dates it B. C. 536; Scott, B. C. 1030. Delaney, Patrick, Morison and Scott think David wrote it on occasion of delivery from dangerous sickness. Yet I have never heard it repeated with more ardor or more appropriateness than by God's people enduring great bodily distress. Dodd: "We read of no illness David had." It may be a grateful meditation upon a long series of mercies. Dickson says it contains "seventeen reasons or arguments of praise: some of them taken from mercies shown to the Psalmist himself, some from mercies to all believers, and some taken from God's sovereign dominion over all." Others suggest that it was written when David received assurance of forgiveness in the matter of Uriah and Bathsheba. Walford: "If this be correct, then we have two (this and Psalm li.) of the most instructive examples of enlightened and fervent piety, which are contained in the holy Scriptures, occasioned by one failure in the conduct of a good man, who was habitually remarkable for his steadfast obedience to the law of God." The Chaldee says this Psalm was written "by prophecy." Fry also thinks it "anticipates a future period of the history of the redemption of man." The Syriac says it was written by David in his old age. All these are conjectures. The ode suits many a condition of believers in every age. All agree that this is a poem of rare and edifying excellence. Luther: "This is a glorious Psalm, and full of the most ardent feelings and exercises of faith, and of a believing heart, a heart acknowledging the infinite mercies of God, both temporal and spiritual;" Morison: "This richly poetic Psalm . . . abounds in ardent and lofty sentiments of gratitude to God for his unnumbered mercies;" Dodd: "It may properly be said to describe the wonders of grace;" Alexander: "It is a favorite vehicle of thankful praise among the pious of all ages;" Stevenson: "It is an exquisite song of thanksgiving. It is the out-pouring of a heaven-taught gratitude. It is the 'spiritual hymn' of a redeemed sinner, 'singing and making melody in his heart to the Lord.' . . It is an universal song. It is suited for all ages, appropriate to all persons, and applicable to all conditions. Every nation under heaven may equally adopt its language." Although it is so devotional, yet "it is observable that no petition occurs throughout the entire compass of these twenty-two verses." The only name of God found in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. Bless the LORD, O my soul: and all that is within me, bless his holy name. This is a noble beginning. Bless, see on Ps. v. 12; it occurs six or seven times in this hymn of thankfulness. David calls on his soul, his immortal nature, and all that is within him, his inward part, or inward thought, meaning all his senses and faculties; see Ps. v. 9; xlix. 11. God's holy name is put for himself, or that by which he is known. Truly devout men wish their hearts more and more engaged in God's service.

2. Bless the LORD, O my soul, and forget not all his benefits. For benefits Fry has bounties; Alexander, dealings; Venema and Hengstenberg, gifts. Most English scholars prefer our version. The mercies God bestows, no less than his own infinite nature, are the foundations of our obligations to him. No man ever yet made a complete catalogue of the benefits he had received. Here we have an excellent beginning:

3. Who forgiveth all thine iniquities. Forgiveth, see on Ps. xxv. 11. It implies pardon with full pacification. Iniquities, commonly so rendered, always implying wrong, perverseness. All human blessedness either permanent or important, must be based in forgiveness of sin. This is the first gift of God to the penitent. But it is not the last. It is merely the opening of the house of mercy. Who healeth all thy diseases. Diseases, elsewhere sicknesses, Deut. xxix. 22. It might apply to maladies of the body, 2 Chron. xxi. 18, 19. But it doubtless has a chief reference to diseases of the soul, Ps. xli. 4; Isa. i. 6; vi. 10; liii. 5. God never bestows pardon without granting with it renewal, by which the corruptions of our hearts are cured. Horne: "What is pride, but lunacy; what is anger, but a fever; what is avarice, but a dropsy; what is lust, but a leprosy; what is sloth, but a dead palsy?" Scott: "Sinful passions are the diseases of the soul." Did God's blessing stop at the forgiveness of sins and not go on to cure the madness in our hearts, we should be both vile and miserable forever. Some think that the word diseases has a special reference to bodily miseries sent as the penal consequences of transgression. There is no objection to admitting this additional idea. Compare Ex. xv. 26; Ps. cvii. 17-19. But the catalogue of mercies is only begun:

4. Who redeemeth thy life from destruction. Alexander: "Redeeming means delivering, but with a strong implication of cost and risk." Clarke says the Hebrew word properly signifies redemption of life by a kinsman; possibly looking forward, in the spirit of prophecy, to him who became Partaker of our flesh and blood that he might have the right to redeem our souls from death by dying in our stead." Destruction, elsewhere ditch, pit, corruption, grave, Ps. vii. 15; ix. 15; xvi. 10; Job xxxiii. 22. Tholuck: "In naming destruction his reference is to the punishment due to sin, which the grace and mercy of God averts." Redemption is either of the body from the destroying power of disease, or chiefly of both soul and body from the pit of woe. Diodati explains it as redemption "from many mortal dangers in this life, and from everlasting death and hell." Other mercies follow: Who crowneth thee with loving-kindness and tender mercies. Crowneth, in Ps. v. 12, compass; in Ps. viii. 5; lxv. 11, as here. Lovingkindness, as in Ps. li. 1. Tender mercies, as in Ps. xxv. 6, often so rendered. In verse 13, the cognate verb is pitieth. No believer has ever yet been able to think of any real blessing which is not secured to the child of God. Henry: "What greater dignity is a poor soul capable of than to be advanced into the love and favor of God? This honor have all his saints. What is the crown of glory but God's favor?"

5. Who satisfieth thy mouth with good things. Satisfieth, filleth, i. e., giveth all that is required. See on Ps. xvii. 14, 15. Creatures may afford us that which 'surfeits but never satisfies,' Eccle. vi. 7; Isa. lv. 2. Mouth, as in Ps. xxxii. 9; elsewhere ornament, excellent ornament. When sanctified it is a chief instrument of glorifying God. Good, often goodness, Ps. xvi. 2; xxi. 3. See on Ps. iv. 6: The blessing spoken of in this clause goes beyond the satisfying of the sensitive appetite. It embraces all the good that we receive for our nourishment, sustentation and comfort. The English version gives a better sense than any other yet suggested. Kimchi supposes that by this clause David describes the blessing of health. No doubt this and all that leads to it are included, and a great deal more also. So that thy youth is renewed like the eagle's. We may either, with our translators, supply so that or we may omit it, and read literally, Thou wilt renew like the eagle thy youth. Many marvellous stories have been told respecting the eagle renewing his youth. The whole truth seems to be that like other birds, he annually sheds his feathers and quills and gets a new set of them; that he attains to a greater age than any other fowl of the air; that his vision is wonderful, seeing small objects at a great distance; that his flight is majestic; that even his old age does not seem to be attended by such signs of weakness and decay as are often discovered in other creatures; and that he is the monarch of the air. See Ex. xix. 4; Deut. xxviii. 49; Prov. xxx. 19; Isa. xl. 31; Jer. iv. 13; Hab. i. 8. Alexander says, "The only point of comparison is its strength and vigor, as in 2 Sam. i. 23; Isa. xl. 31; and the whole verse may be paraphrased as follows: 'So completely does his bounty feed thy strength that even in old age thou growest young again, and soarest like an eagle.'" If this is the sense, this clause is in import parallel to Ps. xcii. 14.

6. The LORD executeth righteousness and judgment for all that are oppressed. For executeth we may read is working. The thing is going on, even now. Righteousness and judgment, as in Ps. xcix. 4, in reverse order. Here both words are plural, indicating the amplitude of the blessings received. To the close of verse 5, the Psalmist had mentioned his personal blessings. Now he says that God's dealings with all his suffering people are unimpeachably excellent. Oppressed, literally oppressions. There are many of them as well as many subject to them. Calvin: "As the faithful, while in this world, are always living among wolves, by using the plural number, he celebrates a variety of deliverances, to teach us that it is God's ordinary work to succor his servants whenever he sees them injuriously treated."

7. He made known his ways unto Moses, his acts unto the children of Israel. This is the only verse in the Psalm which might not have been sung by the first penitent that ever lived. The ways of the Lord here spoken of are all the statutes, ordinances, decisions and laws contained in the Pentateuch, together with the course of God's Providence; and his acts are all the wonders wrought in effecting the deliverance of Israel from Egypt and establishing his people in Canaan. In Ps. ix. 11; lxxvii. 12, the same word is rendered doings; in Ps. lxxviii. 11, works. Calvin's idea is somewhat different: "The ways, and the doings of God are his rising up with wonderful power to deliver the people, his leading them through the Red sea, and his manifesting his presence with them by many signs and miracles." Alexander: "The ways of God are his mode of dealing with his people."

8. The Lord is merciful and gracious, slow to anger, and plenteous in mercy. The benefits enumerated in preceding verses did not flow from the merits of men, but solely from the compassions of God, who is merciful; in Ps. lxxviii. 38, and elsewhere, full of compassion; we might read, tenderly pitiful. Gracious, uniformly rendered, cognate to the noun grace or favor. Slow to anger, in Ps. lxxxvi. 15, longsuffering. The Lord is also plenteous, great, abundant, or rich in mercy. Compare Ex. xxxiv. 6; Joel ii. 13; Nah. i. 3. The four terms employed are very nearly synonymous.

9. He will not always chide, strive, contend, debate or plead; Ex. xxi. 18; Job x. 2; Pr. xxv. 9; Hos. ii. 2. He may contend with his erring people till they are humbled; but Jehovah is not implacable, or irreconcilable. No being is so ready to pass by transgression. He is not strict to mark iniquity. Neither will he keep his anger for ever. Our translators supply the words his anger. In Lev. xix. 18, the verb here rendered keep is rendered bear any grudge. Wicked men and devils carry grudges;

God, and good men, imitating his example, do not. To keep anger is to reserve anger, or to retain it, Jer. iii. 5. It is only to incorrigible enemies that Jehovah reserveth wrath, Nah. i. 2.

10. He hath not dealt with us after our sins. Our sins have been many; his judgments have been few. Our sins have been heavy as the sand of the sea; his corrections have been so light that, weak as we are, they have not crushed, but only humbled us. Our sins have been long continued and persistent; his strokes have been but occasional and of short duration. Our sins have been daily and very provoking; his patience has been every way amazing. Nor rewarded us according to our iniquities. We have requited evil for good; he has returned good for evil. Calvin: "He not only forbears to punish us, but bountifully maintains those whom he might justly destroy."

11. For as the heaven is high above the earth, so great is his mercy toward them that fear him. This is a favorite and striking method of representing the greatness of the divine compassion, Ps. xxxvi. 5; lvii. 10; cviii. 4; Isa. lv. 7-9. The heaven for height is the best image we have in any language, Pr. xxv. 3. Hengstenberg: "The point of comparison is infinity." Toward them that fear him God's lovingkindness knows no bounds. Instead of toward, some prefer above or over, to which there is no objection. The verb, here rendered great is, is, in Ps. xii. 4; lxxv. 3, rendered prevail. God's mercy is mighty (Job xxi. 7) to save, raising the souls sunk in spiritual death to the life everlasting.

12. As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us. When God forgives he forgives like a God, and not like a creature. The ingratitude and stubbornness of iniquity are such as would exhaust any but infinite patience. The distance from the east, [rising] to the west [evening] is as great as we can well express. So far does God remove the transgressions of his people. No one puts away sin as God does.

13. Like as a father pitieth his children, so the LORD pitieth them that fear him. Both the languages in which the Scriptures were originally written contain a pleasing variety of words to express the divine compassion; and yet inspired writers have selected the grandest and noblest objects in nature to represent it. Then again they draw illustrations from human friendships, Pr. xviii. 24; from the maternal relation, Isa. xlix. 15; and here from the relation of father. Our Saviour took up the same figure, Matt. vii. 9-11; Luke xi. 11-13. The peculiar force of the word pitieth has been explained on v. 4. Fear, as in vv. 11, 17.

14. For he knoweth our frame; he remembereth that we are dust. Church of England; For he knoweth whereof we are made; he remembereth that we are but dust. This knowledge of God embraces our constitutional temperament, the feebleness of our understanding, the strength of our fears, the shattered state of our nerves, the violence of temptations, our readiness to sink into melancholy, and everything calling for tender compassions. Compare 1 Cor. x. 13; Heb. ii. 18; iv. 15.

15. As for man, his days are as grass: as a flower of the field, so he flourisheth.

16. For the wind passeth over it, and it is gone; and the place thereof shall know it no more. Comparing men to grass is common with the inspired writers, Ps. xxxvii. 2; xc. 5. Compare Isa. xl. 6-8; James i. 10, 11; 1 Pet. i. 24. This is a very apt representation. The wind spoken of in v. 16, is by some supposed to be the Simoon, or one of those desolating winds known in Asia. The phrase it is gone is very strong. Alexander paraphrases it: "There is none of him, no such thing or person." The last clause is a quotation from Job vii. 10.

17. But the mercy of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting upon them that fear him, and his righteousness unto children's children;

18. To such as keep his covenant, and to those that remember his commandments to do them. We cannot trace back the divine nature or perfections to their origin, nor can we follow them to their termination, for they sweep "from everlasting to everlasting." The only infallible proof of the genuine fear of God is here given. It consists in keeping covenant with God and remembering his commandments to do them. On keeping covenant see on Ps. xxv. 10. Commandments, in Ps. xix. 8. Statutes; in Ps. cxix. precepts. Remembering to do indicates a mind and heart steadfastly engaged. To all thus obedient and to their latest posterity, walking in their footsteps, shall be granted mercy and righteousness, lovingkindness, protection, justifying and sanctifying grace, Deut. vii. 9.

19. The LORD hath prepared his throne in the heavens. Prepared, established, fixed, as in Ps. xl. 2; lvii. 7. Throne, uniformly rendered. In the heavens, far above the confusion and perturbations of earth, far beyond the reach of human and diabolical malice, not liable to changes in a region of ineffable purity and glory. And his kingdom ruleth over all. There is none above it, none with it, none like it, none helping it, none hindering it, none without it, Job ix. 4; Isa. xlv. 28; xlv. 10; Eph. i. 5; Phil. ii. 13.

20. Bless the LORD ye his angels, that excel in strength, that do his commandments, hearkening unto the voice of his word. See on Ps. xxxiv. 7; xci. 11. Four things are here said of angels; 1, they are the Lord's; 2, they excel in strength; in the universe are no creatures equal to them in power; 3, they are holy, doing God's commandments with unspeakable pleasure and promptness; 4, they wait upon the Lord and minister unto him. Like willing and dutiful servants, they hearken unto the voice of his word.

21. Bless ye the LORD, all ye his hosts; ye ministers of his that do his pleasure. Either this is an urgent renewal of the summons to the angels to engage in blessing Jehovah; or it is an animated appeal to the sun, moon and stars to join the chorus of the universe.

22. Bless the LORD, all his works in all places of his dominion: that is, whoever and whatever can in any sense utter blessings on the name of the Most High, let them come forth and speak his praises. The hymn ends as it began: Bless the LORD, O my soul.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The highest acts of thankful and adoring worship are neither vain nor idle, but are called for by the very nature of the relations existing between God and his creatures, vv. 1, 2, 20-22.

2. In all acts of worship let us summon our whole nature to the work, v. 1; let our intellects know God, our wills choose him, our hearts go out after him, our confidence lean on him, our love delight in him, our tongues praise him, and our hands clap for joy of him. Let us worship him neither ignorantly, nor superstitiously, nor hypocritically, nor irreverently.

3. One of the saddest proofs of our fallen condition, is our propensity to forget God's benefits, especially his unspeakable gift, Jesus Christ, v. 2. Nothing but the basest ingratitude could chill our hearts or shut our lips. Cobbin: "Our memories are too often like leaky vessels in retaining things that are good." Stevenson: "Our lips are closed because our hearts are dead in spiritual insensibility. . . Ingratitude is Satanic. The first foul spirit that rebelled was the first ingrate in creation." Among all the absurdities and monstrosities among men, there has never arisen a poet to sing, or a philosopher to commend ingratitude, Isa. i. 2, 3.

4. Both from its own nature, and from the frequent recurrence of inspired writers to the subject, it is evident that no matter has stronger claims upon our study and our thankfulness than the forgiveness of sins, v. 3. Neh. ix. 17; Ps. xxv. 11; Isa. lv. 7; Micah vii. 18, 19; Matt. vi. 12; Acts xiii. 38; Eph. i. 7. Without it life were a burden, Ps. xl. 12. "Pardon is not a state to which the believer raises himself by a long and holy course,—it is an act of God's free mercy and grace in Christ Jesus."

5. Nor is sanctification a blessing to be less esteemed. In it God heals our spiritual diseases, v. 3. Stevenson: "By pardon the God-man imparts health to the conscience of the sinner, and by sanctification he infuses health into his affections. Pardon and purity are the medicines of the Gospel." Unless we be made like Christ, we shall never be with Christ.

6. A good man can never be at a loss for a theme of thankful meditation, even if he looks no further than to the marked providences of God in rescuing him from danger and prolonging his life, v. 4. In a marked way is every man a child of providence.

7. Of all deliverances, redemption by Jesus Christ is far the greatest. If we understood our real condition as lost men, we should never weary in magnifying the grace that brings to us the sincere and consistent offer of eternal life.

8. Not only are God's mercies very tender, and his kindness very loving, but they are also exceedingly abundant. They crown us, v. 4. They are our adorning. They are our life. And they are all undeserved. Oftentimes the absence of the least fills us with distress. Let our sharpest trials not silence the voice of our thanksgiving.

9. If in the least degree temporal blessings satisfy, how much more do the good things of the Spirit? By him we have faith, love, hope, joy, peace, rest, patience, strong confidence, increase of grace and final victory; and all through Jesus Christ. Phil. iv. 11–13. Stevenson: "Real contentment is only to be derived from a knowledge of God in Christ, and of all things centred in him, issuing from him and distributed by him."

10. One of the paradoxes of the Christian's life is, that when he is weak, then he is strong. Like the eagle he may become old, but even then he renews his strength, v. 5. It would be sad indeed, were it otherwise. Tholuck: "The glory of the old age of the godly consists in this, that while the faculties for sensuous, no less than mental enjoyment, gradually decline, and the hearth of life gets thus deprived of its fuel, the blessings of godliness not only continue to refresh the soul in old age, but are not until then most thoroughly enjoyed. The sun of piety rises the warmer in proportion as the sun of life declines," 2 Cor. iv. 16.

11. Are you oppressed by the world, the flesh, or the devil? Let your resort be to God. He and he alone can effectually deliver, v. 6. Be not much distressed at your distresses, nor afflicted at your afflictions. God is the patron of no wrong; but he is the patron of all the wronged.

12. The church of modern times is not released from an obligation to celebrate God's mercies and mighty deeds to his people of old, v. 7. His counsels are of old faithfulness and truth. The principles of his government are as unchanging as his nature, and .

13. That nature is most gentle, gracious and loving. No man can conceive of anything desirable or excellent in the character of a friend, teacher, governor or Redeemer, but that it is found in God, v. 8. Two things vastly exalt the divine kindness; it is bestowed upon those who justly feel themselves to be most unworthy; it is continued even when our sins might justly provoke the Most High utterly to withdraw his compassions.

14. How few, light and mercifully ordered are the chastisements which God's people receive at his hands, vv. 9, 10. Compare Isa. liv. 7, 8. Morison: "The Lord is not like some thoughtless and cruel, earthly parents, who are constantly chiding their offspring; and who either break their spirits or deprave their characters. He afflicteth not willingly nor grieveth the children of men."

15. All names, emblems and representations of God's mercy fail adequately to set it forth. It is high as heaven, v. 11. It knows no bounds. It is the mercy of God. Its heights have never been scaled, nor its depths sounded.

16. Sin forgiven is wholly forgiven, v. 12. Isaiah says it is abundantly forgiven, chap. lv. 7. God gives his people double for all their sins, Isa. xl. 2; Zech. ix. 12. One part of the universe is not more completely removed from another than is guilt from a believer. 'Remission of sin is a gift full and complete, unspeakable and irrevocable.' The Almighty forgets as well as forgives, Jer. xxxi. 34; Heb. viii. 12; x. 17.

17. How wise and merciful it is in God to teach us to reason from all that is known as tender, pitiful or generous among men, to the infinite kindness of the heart of our Creator and our Redeemer, v. 13.

18. To a right-minded man even in his deepest distress, it is a source of unspeakable joy that the Most High is omniscient, and knows all about us, v. 14. Being assured that God knows all his case the penitent may cry even in broken sentences and gain his purpose.

19. We ought not to be startled at anything reminding us of our own frailty and mortality, vv. 15, 16. All Scripture and all history teach us that though man flourish as a flower for a moment, still he must soon wither like the grass. Blessed is he who habitually needs not to be reminded that he must die; and yet so far from being dejected thereby betakes himself to the Almighty, and in him finds friend, refuge, husband, Redeemer.

20. If we would be truly and forever blessed, we must have the genuine fear of God, vv. 11, 13, 17, 18. For this there is no substitute. Nor can we ever, but by holy living, prove to ourselves or to our fellow-men that we have this or any grace. Henry: "Those only shall have the benefit of God's promises that make conscience of his precepts."

21. God's government will never fail in any part of the world, in any event of life, or in any tumult of the nations, v. 19.

22. As the Almighty is never at a loss for means, agents or instruments to accomplish his holy will and effect his blessed purposes, so neither shall he ever be at a loss for those who shall pour benedictions on his name, vv. 20-22. There is the innumerable company of angels. Their voices are never silent. But if they should be struck dumb, redeemed men would praise him. And if all intelligent creation should keep silence, the very stones would cry out, and the planets and fixed stars would become vocal and fill the azure vault above us with unspeakable melody.

23. Bless the LORD, O my soul, v. 22. "Whatever others do, let me do service to my God. Whatever others love, let me love my Redeemer. Whatever others glory in, let me glory in the Lord." This is my first, my greatest business. BLESS THE LORD, O MY SOUL.

PSALM CIV.

1 Bless the LORD, O my soul. O LORD my God, thou art very great; thou art clothed with honour and majesty:

2 Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment: who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain:

3 Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters: who maketh the clouds his chariot: who walketh upon the wings of the wind:

4 Who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire:

5 Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed for ever.

6 Thou coveredst it with the deep as with a garment: the waters stood above the mountains.

7 At thy rebuke they fled; at the voice of thy thunder they hasted away.

8 They go up by the mountains; they go down by the valleys unto the place which thou hast founded for them.

9 Thou hast set a bound that they may not pass over; that they turn not again to cover the earth.

10 He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills.

11 They give drink to every beast of the field: the wild asses quench their thirst.

12 By them shall the fowls of the heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches.

13 He watereth the hills from his chambers: the earth is satisfied with the fruit of thy works.

14 He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man: that he may bring forth food out of the earth;

15 And wine that maketh glad the heart of man, and oil to make his face to shine, and bread which strengtheneth man's heart.

16 The trees of the LORD are full of sap; the cedars of Lebanon, which he hath planted;

17 Where the birds make their nests: as for the stork, the fir trees are her house.

18 The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats; and the rocks for the conies.

19 He appointed the moon for seasons: the sun knoweth his going down.

20 Thou makest darkness, and it is night: wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth.

21 The young lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God.

22 The sun ariseth, they gather themselves together, and lay them down in their dens.

23 Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labour until the evening.

24 O LORD, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all: the earth is full of thy riches.

25 So is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts.

26 There go the ships: there is that leviathan, whom thou hast made to play therein.

27 These wait all upon thee; that thou mayest give them their meat in due season.

28 That thou givest them they gather: thou openest thine hand, they are filled with good.

29 Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled: thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust.

30 Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created: and thou renewest the face of the earth.

31 The glory of the LORD shall endure for ever: the LORD shall rejoice in his works.

32 He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth: he toucheth the hills, and they smoke.

33 I will sing unto the LORD as long as I live: I will sing praise to my God while I have my being.

34 My meditation of him shall be sweet: I will be glad in the LORD.

35 Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more. Bless thou the LORD, O my soul. Praise ye the LORD.

NEITHER the Hebrew nor Chaldee have any title for this Psalm. The Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Edwards, Morison, Henry and Scott ascribe it to David. Hengstenberg thinks otherwise. In a number of manuscripts, it is put as a continuation of Psalm ciii. which David certainly wrote. It is not possible intelligently to assign any particular occasion for it. Its design is to celebrate the works of creation and providence. Some others begin somewhat in the same strain, as Ps. viii. which soon passes to the work of redemption; and Ps. xix. which soon turns to the celebration of the excellencies of revelation. Luther: "This is a most spiritual song, and a psalm of glory to God;" Horne: "This is an eucharistic hymn, full of majesty and sweetness, addressed to Jehovah, as Creator of the world;" Tholuck: "This is a glorious Psalm of nature;" Clarke: "It is properly a poem on the works of God in the creation and government of the world." On all hands it is confessed that this is a Psalm of uncommon excellence. Horsley: "For regularity of composition, richness of imagery, sublimity of sentiment, and elegance and perspicuity of diction, it is perhaps the principal poem in the whole collection of these inspired songs." There appears no good reason to doubt that this Psalm was placed where it is, on account of the relation of its tone to that of Ps. ciii.; and yet were it placed anywhere else in the Psalter, devout men would not think it out of place. As the Son of God created the world, and governs it (John i. 3; Heb. i. 2, 3;) so it is most natural to apply this Psalm to the praise of Jehovah Jesus, not excluding the Father, or the Spirit, but including them both. Scott dates it B. C. 1030; Clarke B. C. 536. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God, El God and Jah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; v. 4; and introductory remarks to Ps. lxxviii.

1. Bless the LORD, O my soul; as in Ps. ciii. 1. O LORD my God, thou art very great. Art great, a verb in the preterite. It implies not so much what God is in himself as what he has manifested himself to be. God is greater than any of his creatures conceive him to be. Thou art clothed with honour and majesty. Chaldee, praise and beauty; Arabic, splendor and glory; Calvin, praise and glory; Doway, praise and beauty; church of England, majesty and honor; Fabritius, glory and splendor; Tremellius and Junius, splendor and majesty; Piscator, majesty and magnificence; Venema, majesty and glory; Edwards, majesty and dignity; Jebb and Alexander, honor and majesty. Not one of these renderings is bad. Inspired men have chosen the best terms wherewith to exalt God; and yet they are all inadequate. Clothed, apparelled, in the preterite.

2. Who coverest thyself with light as with a garment. Coverest, clothest, arrayest, sometimes in the margin, veilest, Isa. lix. 17; Jer. xliii. 12; Cant. i. 7. This clause contains an assertion remarkably illustrated in the history of God's manifestations. Clarke: "Light and fire are generally the accompaniments of the Supreme Being, when he manifests his presence to his creatures," Gen. xv. 17; Ex. iii. 2; xix. 18; Matt. xvii. 2. Yea, God is himself a consuming fire, Deut. iv. 24; Isa. xxx. 33; Jer. xxi. 12, 14. He is also the light of his people, Ps. xxvii. 1; Isa. x. 17; lx. 19. Compare 1 Tim. vi. 16; 1 John i. 5. He 'irradiates the whole world with his splendor,' Jas. i. 17. Who stretchest out the heavens like a curtain. The preceding clause celebrates the work of the first day of creation, Gen. i. 3-5; this, that of the second, Gen. i. 6-8. The firmament of Moses is the expanse, stretched out like a curtain. For curtain some have pavilion, canopy, veil, tent, tapestry. Compare Job ix. 8; xxxvii. 18; xxxviii. 9; Isa. xl. 22; xlii. 5; xlv. 24; li. 13.

3. Who layeth the beams of his chambers in the waters. Layeth the beams, a participle. In 2 Chron. xxxiv. 11, the verb in the same conjugation is rendered to floor. Geddes has, Flooring his chambers with waters; Horsley, Laying the floors of his chambers with waters; Edwards, He flooreth his chambers with waters. When men build houses, they lay their floors on something solid; but the Almighty lays the floors of his chambers on the mist which is held in the air. Chambers, in Judges iii. 20, 23-25, parlor; in 1 Chron. xxviii. 11; 2 Chron. iii. 9, upper chambers. Who maketh the clouds his chariot. As a charioteer directs his horses whithersoever he will, so the Almighty drives the clouds wherever he pleases. They wholly obey his will.

Who walketh upon the wings of the wind. Walketh; in this Psalm the same verb is rendered run and go, vv. 10, 26. In Job xiv. 20, it is rendered passeth; in Job xx. 25, cometh; in Pr. vi. 11, travelleth; in Hab. i. 6, march. Wings of the wind, see on Ps. xviii. 10.

4. Who maketh his angels spirits; his ministers a flaming fire. Chaldee: Who makes his messengers swift like spirits, his ministers strong like flaming fire. The other ancient versions, also the Bishops' Bible and Fabritius, agree with the authorized English. John Rogers' translation: Thou makest thine angels spreites, and thy ministers flames of fire; Piscator, Amesius, Tremellius and Junius: He makes his angels winds, his ministers flaming fire. There is no better rendering than that of the common version. Some object to the introduction of angels in this place, because the psalmist up to this time has spoken only of inanimate and not at all of spiritual creatures. This objection has no force. Good poetry makes progress, not dwelling tediously on anything. In Ps. xviii. 10; cxlviii. 2, angels are introduced in like manner among creatures of no intelligence. Whenever Jehovah makes unusual manifestations of himself, the presence of angels is rather to be expected. No doubt they beheld the wonderful process of creation, Job xxxviii. 7. They are fitly introduced here. Paul very appositely cites this verse in Heb. i. 7, 8. He there shows that angels are mere servants; Christ has supreme authority. To prove that Christ was superior to winds and fire would not establish anything to the apostle's purpose; but to prove that he was a Sovereign, while angels were only ministers, is very germane to his object. Horne: "Intellectual beings of the highest order in the realms above are as ready to fulfil the words of Jehovah, as are the elements of this lower world."

5. Who laid the foundations of the earth, that it should not be removed for ever. Foundations, places, dwellings, settlements, bases. The order and stability of the earth and its motions are most admirable. God "stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangeth the earth upon nothing," Job xxvi. 7. Nothing is more exact than the movements of the earth from the creation to this day. There is no jostle or disturbance here. John Rogers' translation: Thou hast laid the earth upon her foundacyons, that it never moveth at any tyme.

6. Thou coveredst it with the deep as with a garment. Three explanations are suggested: 1, that this clause relates to the state of things in chaos. The objection to this is that the covering of the earth before the work of the third day of creation was rather that of a pall or winding sheet than of a garment. All our ideas represent the state of things when without form and void as dismal, whereas the covering with a garment seems to be intended to represent something ornamental and useful; see v. 2. Clarke, Morison, Tholuck, Scott, Bishop Hall and others support this view; others think it admissible. 2. Some think the clause refers to the waters of the deluge. So Diodati and Alexander, both of whom refer to the language of Gen. vii. especially vv. 18, 19. Diodati says that "it is not probable that in the mass of the first creation there were hills and valleys ready framed." Of this we know nothing, and can base no argument on entire ignorance. 3. Others say the clause relates to the change in form which the earth underwent at creation, and which it has ever since retained; see Gen. i. 9. Calvin: "The passage may very properly be understood thus,—that the sea, although a mighty deep, which strikes terror by its vastness, is yet as a beautiful garment to the earth." This is perhaps to be preferred. The deluge was a curse, and the thing here spoken of is a blessing. Much the larger part of the surface of the earth is and always has been clad in a beautiful robe of water, greatly conducing to health and to intercourse between nations widely separated. The waters stood above the mountains. The verb is in the future, shall stand. This rendering is preferred by Calvin and others. The sense thus gathered is that God holds back the waters from deluging the earth. Calvin: "Were God to give loose reins to the sea, the waters would suddenly cover the mountains;" Tholuck: "Omnipotence has set a bound to the waters, though they are above and lighter than the earth, and seem to overflow it;" see on Ps. xxiv. 2. Were the earth to stand still, much more, if its course should be changed from west to east, the dry land would be at once submerged. Mountains, so rendered, also in v. 8; in vv. 10, 13, 18, 32, hills.

7. At thy rebuke they fled. As in the preceding clause, the verb is in the future. So some render it. Hengstenberg and Alexander put it in the present. The certainty arises from what has been the uniform course of providence. Majestic as the waters of the ocean often are, they obey the mandate of the Almighty. At the voice of thy thunder they hasted away. Literally, shall hasten away. The clause is parallel to the preceding. God's rebuke and the voice of his thunder are his irresistible command by which he controls the ocean as a master does his humble servant. The verb rendered hasted away is in Deut. xx. 3, rendered do tremble. The flight is from fright.

8. They go up by the mountains; they go down by the valleys unto the place which thou hast founded for them. The first verbs are in the future. The prophet is still speaking of the waters; though Calvin translates it, The mountains shall ascend and the valleys shall descend. And Hammond admits that it is not certain but that mountains and valleys are to be read as in the nominative. If such be the case, he suggests the following rendering: "The waters once stood above the mountains—those places which now are such—but at the uttering God's voice they fled and hasted away—the mountains ascending, and the valleys descending—unto the place which thou hast prepared for them." If we follow the English translation, then the meaning is either, 1. That the ocean dashes against the sides of mountains, but invariably falls back into its channels; 2. That by some process invisible to the eye, but indicated by Artesian wells and by mountain lakes, the water is forced high up on elevated places, whence it gushes out and descends; or 3. That the waters are carried to the tops of mountains in vapors and clouds, and thence descend again to the valleys.

9. Thou hast set a bound that they may not pass over; that they turn not again to cover the earth. Bound, seldom thus rendered, commonly border or coast. When the waves of the sea are greatly agitated, they seem as if they were irresistible; but each successive awful billow is soon laid prostrate and returns to the bosom of the sea whence it came. Horne: "The experience of 4000 years hath taught us, that where the Creator hath laid his commands, plain sand is a sufficient barrier." Compare Job xxxviii. 8–11. If the deluge is even alluded to in these verses, all agree that that awful visitation shall not be repeated.

10. He sendeth the springs into the valleys, which run among the hills. Some regard verses 6–9 as parenthetical; and so account for the use of the second person thou and thy in those verses; and of the third person who and he in vv. 5, 10. This is not necessary to explain the alternate use of Hebrew pronouns. We often see such changes where there is no parenthesis; see v. 13. Springs, commonly rendered wells, fountains, Ps. lxxiv. 15; lxxxiv. 6. Alexander justly thinks that here as in Joel iii. 18, the word comprehends both the source and the stream. Which run among the hills. That is the springs or streams run. Run, see on walketh, v. 3. In many a part of the world can be found a Sault, a dancing water, and a Minne-ha-ha, a laughing water. The mountain streams walk, and run, and leap, and praise the Lord.

11. They [the springs or streams] give drink to every beast of the field. Beast of the field, all beasts wild and domesticated; see on Ps. viii. 7. The wild asses quench their thirst. Anderson: "The wild ass differs from the tame only by being stronger and nimbler, more courageous and lively. . . They are remarkable for their instinct in discovering in the arid desert the way to rivers, brooks, or fountains of water, so that the thirsty traveller has only to observe and follow their steps, in order to his being led to the cooling stream."

12. By them shall the fowls of heaven have their habitation, which sing among the branches. Fowls, in the singular but having the force of a plural, or collective noun, as in Gen. i. 20, 22, 26, 28; ii. 20, and often. We had it in the same form in Ps. l. 11; lxxix. 2. One class of songsters, that never fail to give their voice to the praise of the Creator, consists of the birds of the air, who have warbled their carols ever since the fifth day of creation; some of the sweetest note, singing during the dead hours of the night, as the American mocking-bird, [Turdus Polyglottus], and the European nightingale, [Philomela Motacilla].

13. He watereth the hills from his chambers. Hills, including all elevations of the earth. Chambers, as in v. 3. Even where God makes the mountains hoary, smiting them with perpetual sterility, they overwhelm us with their grandeur. But commonly he covers them with verdure and crowns their grandeur with beauty, and often with fruitfulness. The earth is satisfied with the fruit of thy works. Here we have a sudden change of pronoun from the third person, he, to the second, thy. But this is not unusual in Hebrew poetry, and often adds vivacity. Satisfied, in v. 16, are full; in v. 28, are filled. The earth has enough of the product of God's operations. Some confine the fruit of God's works to the rain falling from his chambers. No doubt that blessing is included; but there is no reason for thus limiting the meaning. God's works are in number and variety innumerable. Here are some of them:

14. He causeth the grass to grow for the cattle, and herb for the service of man. Grass, as in Ps. xxxvii. 2; ciii. 15. Herb, as in Gen. i. 11, 12, 29, 30. Scott: "Under the word herb, all kinds of corn, pulse, and vegetable food are comprised; and likewise the produce of the vineyards and oliveyards." The terms, grass and herb embrace all food of vegetable growth fit for the support of animal life. Cattle, so rendered in Gen. i. 24-26; ii. 20; Ps. l. 10, etc., more frequently beasts. It embraces all kinds of beasts that walk the earth. Service, in v. 23, rendered labor. Hengstenberg has cultivation; Alexander, culture. It points to the labor of man in cultivating the soil, whence his food is principally obtained. That he may bring forth food out of the earth. He refers to man.

15. And wine that maketh glad the heart of man. Wine, the word usually so rendered. How honorable and excellent are the vine and its fruit may be seen from many Scriptures, Judges ix. 12, 13; Num. xv. 5, 7; Pr. xxxi. 6, 7. It is a strong proof of the fallen state of man that he so strangely perverts such a blessing as wine to stupor or drunkenness. And oil to make his face to shine. Various explanations are given. 1. Some think the reference is to oil for lamps to light up the darkness, and so to illuminate the face. 2. Some suppose that wine and oil taken into the stomach make men's faces shine with gladness. 3. Some read and understand thus: Wine gladdens the heart of man so as to make his face shine more than oil. 4. Some, Wine gladdens the heart of man to make his face shine with oil. Oil was chiefly for food and for anointing. For the latter use of oil see on Ps. xxiii. 5. To this no doubt the prophet here mainly refers. How excellent olive oil is appears from Judges ix. 8, 9; Ex. xxix. 2, 7; xxx. 23-25, etc. And bread which strengtheneth man's heart. See Gen. xiv. 18; xviii. 5; xxi. 14; xlvii. 12; Ps. xiv. 4. In Ps. xlii. 3, and elsewhere the same word is rendered meat. Wine, and oil, and bread were great staples of Palestine.

16. The trees of the Lord are full of sap; the cedars of Lebanon, which he hath planted. On the cedars of Lebanon see on Ps. xxix. 6; lxxx. 10; xcii. 12. The trees of the Lord, are the great trees, see on Ps. xxxvi. 6; or they are goodly trees, see on Ps. lxxx. 10. Our translators well supply the words of sap.

17. Where the birds make their nests. Birds, the plural of the word rendered sparrow in Ps. lxxxiv. 3; cii. 7. Alexander has it small birds. As for the stork, the fir trees are her house. The stork, the word is uniformly thus rendered in the English Bible. Some have thought that the heron was meant; but our English Bible gives heron as the rendering of another word, Lev. xi. 19; Deut. xiv. 18. By some the heron is said to be a species of the stork. The Hebrew name of stork signifies mercy or kindness, and the Greek, natural affection. This bird is wonderful for its care, not merely of its young, but of its parents and the infirm of its species. In countries where the roofs of the houses are frequented she builds her nests in trees; though in Europe she often puts her nest on the tops of high houses. This species of bird greatly abounds in Palestine. The fir of Palestine was lofty and noble, almost rivalling the cedar. It was an evergreen.

18. The high hills are a refuge for the wild goats. Hills, see on vv. 6, 8. Wild goats, one word always so rendered, 1 Sam. xxiv. 2; Job xxxix. 1. Some are confident that the animal here referred to is the Ibex of Asia, nearly or quite the same as the Chamois of Europe. It is an animal of prodigious vigor and amazing agility. And the rocks [are a refuge] for the conies. Rocks, uniformly rendered. Conies, always as here; not the hare of Deut. xiv. 7. Some think it a species of rabbit. Bochart supposed the jumping-mouse was meant. Hengstenberg has it spring-mouse. The animal intended is probably that which is now in Syria called the Ashkoko, a species of rabbit. Alexander thinks the drift of this verse and "of the whole Psalm is to show that all parts of the inanimate creation contribute something to the comfort of the living sentient creature."

19. He appointed the moon for seasons. Seasons, elsewhere, congregations, assemblies, set times, appointed times, feasts, solemn feasts, solemn days, solemnities. Calvin: "Interpreters agree that this is to be understood of the ordinary and appointed feasts" of the Jews. Dinock: "The greatest part of the Jewish feasts, as the New Moon, the Passover, the Pentecost, etc., were governed by the moon." Hengstenberg renders this clause: He made the moon to divide the time. The sun knoweth his going down. Vast as are the body and the orbit of the sun, his motions are as exact, and he is as obedient to the will of God, as if he were the humblest mite of a creature; and he acts with as much certainty as if he were intelligent, and, like the angels, received the commands of God. Knoweth, the same word so rendered in Isa. i. 3, "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib." Hengstenberg: "God makes provision for the different portions of his creatures, the beasts of the forest to whom the night belongs, and man whose is the day."

20. Thou makest darkness, and it is night. Here again we have a sudden change of the person of the pronoun; but it is of no particular significance. God makes the night and darkness, Isa. xlv. 7. Nature would rush headlong and be dissolved but for infinite and unchangeable wisdom, goodness and power. Darkness and night are often emblems of evil; but here they are spoken of as blessings, as they really are to all plants and animals, some of the latter then seeking repose, and others going abroad to seek food and drink in the night: Wherein all the beasts of the forest do creep forth. Creep, in verse 25 the cognate noun is rendered creeping things.

21. The young lions roar after their prey, and seek their meat from God. Young lions are strong lions. See on Ps. xvii. 12. They are as dependent on God as the feeblest creatures.

22. The sun ariseth, they gather themselves together, and lay them down in their dens. By his fall, man lost somewhat, yet not all of his dominion over the other inhabitants of the earth. God uses even the beams of the sun as cages, with which to lock up the beasts that would otherwise destroy man's life when he goes forth. Gather themselves, no fire in the forest could more effectually drive wild beasts to their lairs, than does the rising sun. Dens, always and properly so rendered when it refers to the abode of beasts, Job xxxviii. 40; Cant. iv. 8; Amos iii. 4; Nah. ii. 12. Lay them down, in Gen. xlix. 9, couched.

23. Man goeth forth unto his work, and to his labour, until the evening. Alexander: "This verse presents the day-scene corresponding to the night-scene of the two preceding verses."

24. O LORD, how manifold are thy works! in wisdom hast thou made them all: the earth is full of thy riches. Works, as in vv. 13, 31. Manifold, many, great; in Ps. ciii. 8, plenteous. Wisdom, always so rendered. Riches, substance, goods, meaning possessions, Gen. xxxiv. 23; Ezek. xxxviii. 12. All creatures on earth are the possessions of God, and are so claimed by him, Ps. l. 10-12. By works, Hengstenberg thinks we are not to "understand God's creatures, but the arrangements made for them." But why not understand both animals and their modes of subsistence.

25. So is this great and wide sea, wherein are things creeping innumerable, both small and great beasts. In every sense the sea is vast. Creeping things, see on v. 20. Innumerable, literally, 'there is not a number;' they have never been counted; they cannot be counted. Beasts, as in vv. 11, 20. It means living things. So is, better There is.

26. There go the ships. Ships, uniformly rendered. A ship is itself a wonderful object. Naval architecture was first taught by God himself, Gen. vi. 14-16. By the navigation of different seas, commerce with distant nations is principally conducted. There is that leviathan, whom thou hast made to play therein. Leviathan, see on Ps. lxxiv. 14. An extended description of this animal is found in Job xli. 1-34. How great is the work of God to provide an element suitable for such a creature, and for myriads on myriads of others, of which this is the chief.

27. These wait all upon thee; that thou mayest give them their meat in due season. Wait, in the future, shall wait, or hope. If God does not supply the wants of these creatures, they must perish. The wants of a millionth part of them are not even known to the most intelligent man or angel. Season, well rendered.

28. That thou givest them they gather. The Hebrew is very brief. Both the verbs in the future. Calvin: Thou shalt give it [food] to them, and they shall gather it; Fry: Thou givest food, they gather it. Alexander: "The point of the significant antithesis is this, that God as easily bestows as they receive. He has only to give, they have only to gather." Thou openest thine hand, they are filled with good. The passage in Gen. i. 3, "Let there be light: and there was light," so much admired by Longinus and other critics, is hardly more sublime than this. The great result is surely effected with infinite ease. Filled, satisfied, see v. 13. Good, that which is suitable to their natures.

29. Thou hidest thy face, they are troubled: thou takest away their breath, they die, and return to their dust. All life is received from God and is dependent. He who makes alive also kills, Deut. xxxii. 39. The strongest creature, no longer protected by God, is troubled, in Ex. xv. 15, amazed; in Jer. li. 32, affrighted; in Ps. vi. 2, 10, vexed. Withdrawal of divine care and power is all that is necessary to produce dissolution in any part of creation. Their dust, i. e., the dust, which is their own, as they come from it and are a part of it.

30. Thou sendest forth thy spirit, they are created: and thou renewest the face of the earth. Animal and spiritual existences are from God. None of them are self-originated. His Spirit from first to last has made air, earth and water to teem with life,

Gen. i. 2; ii. 7; Num. xvi. 22; xxvii. 16; Ecc. xii. 7; Heb. xii. 9. From year to year Jehovah renovates all nature.

31. The glory of the LORD shall endure for ever. This rendering is supported by the church of England, Edwards, Jebb and Fry; but all the ancient versions, the Doway, Calvin, Fabritius, Amesius, Tremellius and Junius, Piscator, Hengstenberg and Alexander prefer the optative or imperative form. The LORD shall rejoice in his works. Works, as in vv. 13, 24. From the first completion of creation Jehovah has had pleasure in the things he has made, except as sin has marred them, Gen. i. 31; vi. 6. The form of the verb here agrees with that in the last clause.

32. He looketh on the earth, and it trembleth. Looketh, the word generally expresses a benevolent regard. Hengstenberg: "Should the earth presume to depart from the course of its destination, a single look of the Almighty is sufficient to bring it back to trembling obedience." God's frown shakes the globe. He toucheth the hills, and they smoke. This is because he is a consuming fire, Deut. iv. 24. Hills, in vv. 6, 8, mountains. Smoke, compare Deut. xxix. 20; Ps. cxliv. 5. It is a poor meaning that some get from the prophet that he refers to volcanos.

33. I will sing unto the LORD as long as I live; I will sing praises to my God while I have my being. Alexander: "The two verbs are those continually joined to denote vocal and instrumental music." They are united in Ps. xxi. 13; xxvii. 6; lvii. 7; lxviii. 4. Blessed is the man, who spends his life on earth in holy praise, and bids the world farewell in the same happy frame.

34. My meditation of him shall be sweet. Meditation, in Ps. lv. 2, the same word is rendered complaint; in 2 Kings ix. 11, communication; in Ps. lxiv. 1, prayer. Here it seems to denote a meditation conveyed in song to others. Shall be sweet, see Ezek. xvi. 37; Hos. ix. 4. Shall be pleasant to God, to good men, to myself. It should be specially pleasant to the worshipper himself. I will be glad in the LORD, meaning, I will fitly make known my joy in this work.

35. Let the sinners be consumed out of the earth, and let the wicked be no more. The verbs are in the future, and it would be better so to render them. They contain the language of prophecy; nor can they fail. In due time all the incorrigibly wicked shall have gone to their own place. Bless thou the LORD, O my soul. Bless, as in Ps. ciii. 1. Praise ye the LORD, literally, Hallelujah, Praise ye Jah.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Benedictions may fitly open and close every act of worship, vv. 1, 35. This is true not only of seasons of prosperity, and while dwelling on God's excellent works, but also in times of deepest distress, Job i. 21.

2. Poor thoughts of God greatly corrupt his worship, and make it contemptible, causing men thoughtlessly to rush into his presence. Therefore it is always incumbent on us to keep in mind that he is clothed with honor and majesty, v. 1.

3. God is light and in him is no darkness at all, v. 2. He dwells in light, and is the author of it, and robes himself with it. Morison: "The phenomena of light are among the sublimest exhibitions of the Creator's skill in the material universe; they furnish some of the most awful and pleasing displays of his eternal power and God-head." Light was the first thing ever made, Gen. i. 3. Light moves even more swiftly than the electric fluid.

4. All attempts to comprehend God must ever be vain. They are so now; they will be so forever, v. 3. The description of his glory by such imagery as is here employed ought to make us still, silent and awfully reverent.

5. Respecting angels, mentioned in v. 4, see REMARKS on Ps. xxxiv. 7; xci. 11.

If they are God's ministers, it is as much idolatry to worship them as any other of his creatures. So they think, Rev. xxii. 8, 9.

6. It is in vain to seek for stability aside from the will of God; nor do we need another or a better cause for it, v. 5. He hangs the earth upon nothing, and it is as firm and unshaken as anything we know. Hammond: "God has fixed so strange a place for the earth, that, being a heavy body, one would think it should fall every minute; and yet, which way soever we would imagine it to stir, it must, contrary to the nature of such a body, fall upwards, and so can have no possible ruin but by tumbling into heaven."

7. If we would know what a blessing any one of the great works of God is, we must study it and consider it. For example, take the sea. It abounds with wonders of every kind. Men have devoted their lives to the study of even one class of its wonders, and yet have felt that they were but beginners in Algæology or Conchology.

8. We need no higher proof of the supremacy of Jehovah than this, that all nature obeys his will, §v. 7-9. Calvin: "Were God to give loose reins to the sea, the waters would suddenly cover the mountains. But now, fleeing at God's rebuke, they retire to a different quarter."

9. Much has been well written and spoken in admiration of the great water-works of antiquity and of modern times. But how much more admirable are the water-works of the Almighty, distributing drink and moisture to all parts of the world, vv. 10, 11, 13. See some beautiful thoughts on this subject in Job xxxviii. 26, 27; Jer. x. 13; xiv. 22.

10. Were men not amazingly blind and hardened in sin, they would feel themselves justly and terribly reproved by all the creatures of God. Stupid as are the ox and the ass, they know their owner. Insignificant as is the ant, she teaches her lessons of foresight and industry. Without intellect or heart, the birds of the air were the first and have been the most constant to sing the praises of Jehovah, v. 12. Yet man has a sweeter voice than they. He has ten thousand mercies to their one, and one mercy, redemption itself, outweighing all the blessings ever conferred by God on the irrational creation. Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

11. Surely it should humble man to know that all human power united cannot make anything, not even the grass to grow, v. 14. By diligently submitting to the will of God as manifested in Providence, and availing himself of the amazing principles established by heaven, he may accomplish something. But without God he can do nothing.

12. The Almighty has not dealt with man in any parsimonious way. On the contrary, he has been very bountiful, giving him not only bread and things absolutely necessary for existence, but also many comforts and luxuries, as oil and wine, v. 15. Tholuck: "The truly pious need not restrict themselves to the barest necessities of life, but they who have the means may enjoy the gifts of God," 1 Tim. iv. 3, 4. We must be content with necessary food, and not indulge in the luxuries of life; 1, when we cannot afford them, Rom. xiii. 8; 2, when the use of them is injurious to our bodily health, Prov. xxiii. 2; 3, when they overcharge our hearts with surfeiting and lead us from God, Luke xxi. 34; 4, when indulgence in them is injurious to our fellow-men, Rom. xiv. 15; 5, when our indulgence leads to irreligion, and not to proper thoughts of the Most High; 6, when we seek to make provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof, Rom. xiii. 14; 7, when self-denial is irksome, and discontent claims the mastery over us if we lack these things, Phil. iv. 12.

13. What amazing results are produced by the providence of God in the growth of majestic trees, v. 16. Every continent has its fine specimens. Many a long journey has been taken to see a sight not half so goodly as the fall of one of these monarchs of the forest.

14. A stork and every bird of the air, the wild goat and the conies and every creature of God may teach us some lesson, vv. 17, 18. And every part of creation has its living creatures. Tholuck: "A lone butterfly may be seen on the heights of Chimborazo." Dr. Kane found red worms in the eternal snows of the Arctic regions.

15. Although ignorant people have many foolish stories about the influence of the heavenly bodies, and the effect of their several positions, yet inspiration itself has taught us to contemplate the sun and moon as among the chief works of God and excellent in their nature, v. 19. Compare Ps. xix. 1-6; Deut. xxxiii. 13-16.

16. If the alternations of day and night in nature are such blessings as they are universally acknowledged to be, and as such are celebrated by inspired poets, (v. 20;) who can prove that the alternations of day and night, or of light and darkness in our temporal and spiritual affairs may not in the end be alike good?

17. If the strongest creatures that God has made cannot supply their own wants, or relieve their own distresses, nor even continue in existence except as God sustains them, (v. 21,) it is vain for man, who is crushed before the moth, to suppose that he can be his own keeper, or administer effectually to his own necessities.

18. Bad as things are on earth, and miserable as sin has made large portions of the world, yet things are not as bad as they might be.

19. It is a great mercy that, when for his sins, God sentenced man to hard labor for life, Gen. iii. 19, he yet allowed him to carry on his chief labors in the open air and in the light of heaven, v. 23.

20. It is a proof of the amazing atheism of the natural heart that every few years we hear of cavils, professedly drawn from science, against some doctrine of natural or revealed religion. Yet a little candor and skill would soon bring us greatly to admire the proofs of God's existence and perfections found in all his works, v. 24. Henry: "The works of art, the more closely they are looked upon with the help of microscopes, the more rough they appear; the works of nature through these glasses appear more fine and exact."

21. If men believed in proportion to the wonders they see, how pious would mariners all be, vv. 25, 26.

22. Of whatever doctrine we may be ignorant, both providence and revelation teach us the dependence of all things upon God, vv. 27, 28. Creatures in multitude greater than the stars are every day fed out of the treasure-house of God's bounty, requiring an almost countless variety and even diversity of food. Yet they are all cared for.

23. In its methods and results providence is not less amazing than creation itself, v.

30. Providence is as productive as creation, though its processes are commonly more slow.

24. It is a blessed thing that God is glorious, and shall be so esteemed, come what will, v. 31.

25. Our safety and the perpetuity of our well-being depend upon the good pleasure of God, and the continuance of his delight in his works, v. 31.

26. If an averted look or a frown from the Almighty makes the earth itself to tremble, how terrible it must be for a worm of the dust like man to fall under the wrath of God, v. 32.

27. As singing God's praises is to be the work of the pious forever, let them while on earth train themselves to this noble employment.

28. If our hearts were right, our meditation of God would be frequent, because it would be pleasant. The last words ever written by Henry Martyn, dying among

Mohammedans in Persia was: "I sat in the orchard and thought with sweet comfort and peace of my God, in solitude my company, my friend and Comforter."

29. The certainty of the final overthrow of the wicked could not be greater than it is. The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it, v. 35. Combinations will not avail, Pr. xi. 21.

30. This Psalm teaches and illustrates the great doctrine of providence. The Lord will provide. If God cares for storks and conies and all the myriads of living things in the air, earth and water, which yet are of comparatively little value, surely he will not forget his people.

31. If the human mind were not besotted in guilt and enveloped in darkness, there never would be a doubt respecting the truths of natural religion; so abundantly are they declared and published in all the works of God.

32. No doubt this Psalm is fitly applied to the mediatorial reign of Christ, not only by the Apostle in Heb. i., but by pious men ever since. He made the world and it is his. He made the angels and they are his. He made all nature and all nature obeys him. When on earth, the winds and the waves heard his voice and were hushed. He is Lord of all.

PSALM CV.

1 O give thanks unto the LORD; call upon his name: make known his deeds among the people.

2 Sing unto him, sing psalms unto him: talk ye of all his wondrous works.

3 Glory ye in his holy name: let the heart of them rejoice that seek the LORD.

4 Seek the LORD, and his strength: seek his face evermore.

5 Remember his marvellous works that he hath done; his wonders, and the judgments of his mouth;

6 O ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen.

7 He is the LORD our God: his judgments are in all the earth.

8 He hath remembered his covenant for ever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations.

9 Which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac;

10 And confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant:

11 Saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance:

12 When they were but a few men in number; yea, very few, and strangers in it.

13 When they went from one nation to another, from one kingdom to another people;

14 He suffered no man to do them wrong: yea, he reproveth kings for their sakes;

15 Saying, Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm.

16 Moreover he called for a famine upon the land: he brake the whole staff of bread.

17 He sent a man before them, even Joseph, who was sold for a servant:

18 Whose feet they hurt with fetters: he was laid in iron:

19 Until the time that his word came: the word of the LORD tried him.

20 The king sent and loosed him; even the ruler of the people, and let him go free.

21 He made him lord of his house, and ruler of all his substance:

22 To bind his princes at his pleasure; and teach his senators wisdom.

23 Israel also came into Egypt; and Jacob sojourned in the land of Ham.

24 And he increased his people greatly: and made them stronger than their enemies.

25 He turned their heart to hate his people, to deal subtilly with his servants.

26 He sent Moses his servant; and Aaron whom he had chosen.

27 They shewed his signs among them, and wonders in the land of Ham.

28 He sent darkness, and made it dark; and they rebelled not against his word.

- 29 He turned their waters into blood, and slew their fish.
 30 Their land brought forth frogs in abundance, in the chambers of their kings.
 31 He spake, and there came divers sorts of flies, and lice in all their coasts.
 32 He gave them hail for rain, and flaming fire in their land.
 33 He smote their vines also and their fig trees; and brake the trees of their coasts.
 34 He spake, and the locusts came, and caterpillars, and that without number,
 35 And did eat up all the herbs in their land, and devoured the fruit of their ground.
 36 He smote also all the firstborn in their land, the chief of all their strength.
 37 He brought them forth also with silver and gold: and there was not one feeble person among their tribes.
 38 Egypt was glad when they departed: for the fear of them fell upon them.
 39 He spread a cloud for a covering; and fire to give light in the night.
 40 The people asked, and he brought quails, and satisfied them with the bread of heaven.
 41 He opened the rock, and the waters gushed out; they ran in the dry places like a river.
 42 For he remembered his holy promise, and Abraham his servant.
 43 And he brought forth his people with joy, and his chosen with gladness:
 44 And gave them the lands of the heathen: and they inherited the labour of the people;
 45 That they might observe his statutes, and keep his laws. Praise ye the LORD.

NEITHER the Hebrew nor Chaldee prefix any title; other ancient versions take the last word of Ps. civ. and prefix Hallelujah as a title. No ancient version names any author. The Syriac says it is anonymous. Most moderns express some opinion respecting the author. Quite a number think it was not composed till the end of the Babylonish captivity. Clarke dates it B. C. 536. Others make it more ancient. Pool: "The penman of this Psalm was David." This opinion is favored by Patrick, Henry, Dodd, Gill, Horne, Edwards, Anderson, etc. Scott dates it B. C. 1045. These remarks are just: 1. Verses 1-15 were written by David on occasion of bringing the ark to the holy city, 1 Chron. xvi. 8-22. 2. It has been shown that David probably wrote Ps. civ. The author of that, it is commonly thought, wrote this. 3. There is not a word, allusion or expression in it that opposes the Davidic authorship. 4. It is not likely that any one would have felt free to alter David's compositions. Yet candor requires the admission that this bears a strong resemblance to Ps. lxxviii. which was probably written by Asaph. Several notice the fact that in Ps. civ. God's people are comforted by truths drawn from creation and providence; in this, by the truths of history. The same events have various uses. In Ps. lxxviii. history is used to teach; here, to comfort and awaken gratitude. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and Jah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2, and introduction to Ps. lxxviii. Fry: "This Psalm needs no other comment than a comparison with the history of the exodus." But there are some other matters claiming a brief notice. If Israel had good cause to celebrate redemption from Egypt, much more have Christians to sing of redemption by the blood of Christ.

1. O give thanks unto the LORD. Give thanks, one word often so rendered; in Ps. vii. 17, praise; in Ps. xxxii. 5, confess; see on Ps. vi. 5. Call upon his name. There is no better rendering; in Ps. iii. 4, the verb is cried. Make known his deeds among the people. Deeds, in Ps. ix. 11, doings; in Ps. xiv. 1, works; in Ps. xcix. 8, inventions; in Ps. ciii. 7, acts. People, in the plural, peoples, nations. Compare Ps. ix. 11.

2. Sing unto him, sing psalms unto him. On these verbs see on Ps. vii. 17; ix. 11; xiii. 6; xxi. 13. Talk ye of all his wondrous works. Talk, muse, meditate, speak; see on Ps. civ. 34. On wondrous works, see on Ps. ix. 1. The people of v. 1, are included in the address.

3. Glory ye in his holy name. Glory, boast, praise, the word from which the Psalter takes its name. We have it thrice, in Jer. ix. 23. Diodati: "Let all your honor and glory be in him, who is, and calleth himself your God, and honoreth you with the title of his people." Alexander: "Congratulate yourselves that you possess a right and interest in the favor of so glorious a Being." Let the heart of THEM rejoice that seek the LORD. Seek, commonly so; elsewhere inquire, make request, beseech. By synecdoche it describes a pious man, see on Ps. xxvii. 8. God's real servants should seek him gladly.

4. Seek the LORD, and his strength: seek his face evermore. Seek, in the first instance, not the same word as in v. 3; yet of the same general import, but stronger, implying searching; see on Ps. ix. 10, 12. Seek in the second instance as in v. 3. Seek his strength; Strength, as in Ps. viii. 2; xxi. 1, 13. Face, elsewhere countenance; gracious presence equivalent to blessing; see Ps. iv. 6; xlii. 5. Do these things evermore, always, continually.

5. Remember his marvellous works that he hath done; his wonders, and the judgments of his mouth. Marvellous works, as in v. 2. Wonders; the Syriac has Miracles; Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Arabic, Prodigies. It embraces all the amazing things done by God in the history of his people. Judgments; see on Ps. xix. 9; it may mean, 1, the divine laws; 2, any divine decisions favorable or unfavorable; 3, condemning sentences against the wicked. We have the same word below in v. 7.

6. O ye seed of Abraham his servant, ye children of Jacob his chosen. Abraham and Jacob are mentioned, because to them early promises concerning the nation of Israel were made. Abraham was God's servant, never hesitating to obey him; and Jacob was his chosen, Mal. i. 2; Rom. ix. 13.

7. He is the LORD our God. This expresses his covenant relation to the Jewish nation. His judgments are in all the earth. Judgments, as in v. 5. In no part of the world has God left himself without witness, Acts xiv. 17.

8. He hath remembered his covenant for ever, the word which he commanded to a thousand generations. If God requires us to remember his works, he faithfully remembers his engagements. Never does he forget them. His covenant is ordered in all things and sure. The word of the Lord endureth forever. There were but forty-two generations from Abraham to Christ, Matt. i. 17, and yet this covenant is to run a thousand generations. Compare Ex. xx. 6; Deut. v. 10; vii. 9. A large definite number is put for perpetuity. God's faithfulness is unto all generations, Ps. cxix. 90.

9. Which covenant he made with Abraham, and his oath unto Isaac. God's covenant transactions with Abraham are recorded in Gen. xv. 17, 18; xvii. 1-8; xxii. 15-18. The renewal of that covenant with Isaac is recorded in Gen. xxvi. 2-5. Made, literally cut, meaning ratified, Gal. iii. 15. All covenant transactions with God have the solemnity of an oath, Ps. cxix. 106. But the transaction with Isaac assumed literally the form of an oath, Gen. xxvi. 3. Compare Heb. vi. 18.

10. And confirmed the same unto Jacob for a law, and to Israel for an everlasting covenant. Confirmed, appointed, ordained, established. The history of God's covenant transactions with Jacob is found in Genesis xxviii. 10-15; xxxv. 9-15. On the latter occasion, he changed his name to Israel. A law; the word primarily means a portion, or lot, afterwards a determinate arrangement; frequently translated statute; in Ps. ii. 7, decree. Covenant, as in v. 8; see on Ps. xxv. 10, 14. Everlasting, the blessings promised to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were partly temporal, but chiefly and eminently spiritual, and so eternal, Gal. iii. 17. The gifts and calling of God are without repentance. Venema: "That it might retain perpetual force, like some solemnly proclaimed decree."

11. Saying, Unto thee will I give the land of Canaan, the lot of your inheritance. This promise was made and fulfilled to Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. Hence the plural your. On the lot or line of inheritance, see on Ps. xvi. 6; lxxviii. 55. God made all these promises before Israel had become at all powerful, even

12. When they were but a few men in number; yea, very few, and strangers in it. Even in the family of Jacob, there were at most, including himself, but thirteen males to whom pertained the promise, until he had grandchildren; and when he went down to Egypt all his descendants were but sixty-six, Gen. xlv. 26; and when he reached Egypt he had but seventy descendants, including those of Joseph's family, Ex. i. 5. The Hebrew is striking—Men of a number—i. e., men easily counted; and strangers, not the acknowledged proprietors of the country, nor having it in actual possession, Gen. xxxiv. 30. Strangers, a participle, from a verb in v. 23, rendered sojourned.

13. When they went from one nation to another, from one kingdom to another people. The migrations of the three patriarchs before named, and of their families were frequent and apparently attended with much peril; yet

14. He suffered no man to do them wrong: yea, he reprov'd kings for their sakes; see Gen. xii. 14–20; xx. 1–9; xxvi. 7–11, 26–33; xxxv. 5. Calvin: "Since their life everywhere hung only by a thread, and the changing of their place of sojourn exposed them from time to time to fresh injuries, it is evident that it was the divine power alone which preserved them in safety." Reprov'd, elsewhere corrected, chastened; Hengstenberg has punished; Calvin, rebuked, see Gen. xii. xx.

15. Saying, Touch not mine anointed, and do my prophets no harm. None of the patriarchs, whose case we have been considering, were ever anointed with spiced oil to any office; but a succession of them were anointed by the Holy Ghost. All good men are made holy by God's Spirit; and all the understanding men have is derived from the same blessed agent, Job xxxii. 8; Gen. xli. 38, 39; Num. xxvii. 18. Abraham was a prophet, Gen. xx. 7. "Isaac had a prophetic dream at Beersheba; Jacob, at Bethel." Jacob and Joseph uttered predictions that were fulfilled, Gen. xv. 1–18; xxxvii. 5–11; xli. 25–36; xlviii. 4–21; xlix. 3–27; l. 24, 25.

16. Moreover he called for a famine upon the land: he brake the whole staff of bread. The reference is to the seven years' famine, Gen. xli. 54–57; xlii. 5, 6. With great beauty, here and elsewhere, bread, i. e., food is spoken off as a staff or rod, with which life is supported, see Lev. xxvi. 6; Ezek. iv. 16. Compare Ps. civ. 15. The figure has been transferred into many languages. Horne: "Famine is here finely represented as a servant, ready to come and go at the call and command of God; for calamities, whether public or private, are the messengers of divine justice."

17. He sent a man before them, even Joseph, who was sold for a servant. Joseph gave the same account of God's providence in sending him to Egypt, Gen. xlv. 5; l. 20. How he was sold into bondage, see Gen. xxxvii. 28.

18. Whose feet they hurt with fetters: he was laid in iron. Moses records that Joseph was bound, Gen. xxxix. 20; xl. 3. The literal rendering of the second clause is, His soul came into iron. The Chaldee, church of England, Calvin and Jebb read: The iron entered into his soul; the Doway, following some ancient versions: The iron pierced his soul; Edwards: His person was laid in irons; Fry: He was secured with iron. Either his soul is here put for his person, as is often done; or, such is the union between the soul and the body, that when his body was bound, he had a deep, heart-felt sense of the painful confinement. This trial lasted

19. Until the time that his word came. The time, perhaps predicted by Joseph. Some think the word means that by which he interpreted the dreams of his fellow-prisoners, Gen. xli. 12, 13. From the time he left Canaan till he saw his father again was probably about twenty-four years. The word of the Lord tried him. It is most probable that the Psalmist here refers to Joseph's being called on to interpret Pharaoh's dream, which was God's word to that wicked monarch, the explanation of which was a severe test, proof or trial of Joseph, Gen. xli. 25-36. Or it may be that he refers to the long delay of God in fulfilling his word. Alexander: "During the two years which intervened between his explanation of the prisoners' dreams and the favorable issue to which it ultimately led, his faith in the divine promise, both to himself and to his people, was severely but favorably tried."

20. The king sent and loosed him; even the ruler of the people, and let him go free. The history of this deliverance is given in Gen. xli. 14. Alexander: "Both verbs strictly apply to the removal of his fetters, the first meaning properly, to knock off, (Isa. lviii. 6,) the other to open for the purpose of removing."

21. He made him lord of his house, and ruler of all his substance. See the record in Gen. xli. 40-45; xlv. 8. Substance, in Ps. civ. 24, riches.

22. To bind his princes at his pleasure; and teach his senators wisdom. Bind, the Syriac has chastise; Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway, instruct; church of England, John Rogers' Translation and Bishops' Bible, inform; Edwards, curb; Jebb, restrain; Fry, correct. Phillips: "To bind his princes is to exercise control over the greatest men in the kingdom," Gen. xli. 40, 43, 44. Joseph could compel obedience or punish any subject of the realm. Senators, elsewhere ancients, elders, ancient men, Ps. cvii. 32; cxix. 100; Ezra iii. 12.

23. Israel also came into Egypt; and Jacob sojourned in the land of Ham. The two names of the father of Joseph here signify not only himself, but also his posterity. Egypt and the land of Ham are convertible terms; see on Ps. lxxviii. 51. The Egyptians descended from Ham through his son Mizraim.

24. And he increased his people greatly, and made them stronger than their enemies. The increase of the Israelites in Egypt is one of the wonders in the history of population. Cavillers have objected to the Scriptural record of their numbers; but learned men have amply shown that under the divine blessing without any miracle all the increase might have occurred. The expression stronger than their enemies may include the fact of their outnumbering them and the further fact that God's blessing was manifestly upon them.

25. He turned their heart to hate his people, to deal subtilly with his servants. Scott: "At first the Egyptians were friends to Jacob's family, for Joseph's sake: but after the death of Joseph and his patron, and the succession of another 'king who knew not Joseph,' the Egyptians became enemies to Israel. Their rapid increase, from a single family to a powerful people, excited envy, jealousy, dread and hatred; which prompted both the king and his subjects to devise politic and detestable measures for diminishing their numbers and strength, and for retaining them in bondage." All our enemies are sure to hate us whenever God removes his restraints from their hearts.

26. He sent Moses his servant; and Aaron whom he had chosen. The call of Moses was clear and full, Ex. iii. 7-14; iv. 10-17. The call of Aaron was no less distinct and well authenticated, Num. xvi. xvii. 5. Calvin: "What is attributed to each of these men in particular, applies equally to both, and therefore the sentence ought to be explained thus: God sent Moses and Aaron, his servants, not because of their own intrinsic fitness, or because they spontaneously offered to him their service, but because he chose them."

27. They shewed his signs among them, and wonders in the land of Ham. The land of Ham, Egypt, as in v. 23. Signs, in Ps. lxxv. 8, tokens; in Ps. lxxiv. 4, ensigns. Wonders, as in v. 5. Signs and wonders are often designations of the same events; because they are both significant and marvellous—they instruct and astonish. The Hebrew is literally words of signs; see on Ps. lxxix. 9; ci. 3. Cresswell thinks we are to understand "Declarations, which were afterwards confirmed by miracles." Hammond and Pool favor the same interpretation.

28. He sent darkness and made it dark. Two explanations are given; 1, that the Psalmist, disregarding the order of the plagues as they occurred in Egypt first mentions the ninth of them, as recorded in Ex. x. 21-23. From a comparison of the history in Exodus with the enumeration here given it is clear that the Psalmist felt quite at liberty to introduce things in any order he pleased. 2. Another explanation is that by darkness here we are to understand affliction. Darkness often means calamity. But the prophet is here speaking of dreadful plagues, which are matters of history. And they rebelled not against his word. Who rebelled not? Calvin and others understand Moses and Aaron. They promptly and cheerfully obeyed God's command, and boldly executed their commission, not fearing the proud monarch, and his threats, Ex. x. 10, 28. Others make it a question, thinking the Egyptians are here spoken of: "Did they not rebel against his word?" This would make good sense, but is not particularly suitable here. Others think that the meaning is that for a time the Egyptians seemed to yield. Tholuck: "Pharaoh and the Egyptians were always obedient for the moment." Others suggest a change of one letter in the Hebrew text, so as to read: And they were not obedient to his word. It is evident that the Egyptians rebelled against his word to the last, although at times they seemed to be ready to yield.

29. He turned their waters into blood, and slew their fish. The historic record is full and simple, Ex. vii. 19-25. Compare Ps. lxxviii. 44. Not a running stream in all Egypt contained water that could be drunk, or that did not destroy the life of its inhabitants. This was the first plague.

30. Their land brought forth frogs in abundance, in the chambers of their kings. Frogs, uniformly rendered, literally, marsh-leapers. The narrative is in Ex. viii. 2-13. See on Ps. lxxviii. 45, where it is said the frogs destroyed the Egyptians. This was done by their dead bodies poisoning the air. This was the second plague. The verb is well rendered brought forth in abundance. Edwards: The land swarmed with frogs; Alexander: Their land teemed with frogs. Chambers, often found and well rendered; not elsewhere in the Psalms.

31. He spake and there came divers sorts of flies, and lice in all their coasts. Here we have the third and fourth plagues in reverse order. Divers sorts, so in Ps. lxxviii. 45; but in Ex. viii. 21, 22, 24, 29, 31, rendered swarms. Compare Ex. viii. 16-18. There is some doubt as to the kind of insect here spoken of. The Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Fabritius, Piscator, Amesius, Venema, Tremellius and Junius, Calvin, church of England, Edwards and Jebb have lice. Josephus also thinks lice are intended. The Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Hengstenberg and Alexander all think flying insects are intended, gnats, midges. The word in the Septuagint, transferred to some other versions, is sciniphs. Philo, Origen, Jerome, Gesenius and Boothroyd all think gnats were intended. Bochart argues at length that gnats could not be intended; but a part of his reasoning is certainly unsound, as where he says gnats do not sting both men and cattle. When God chooses to work miracles, he is not restrained by any law, but only by his own will. Coasts, in Ps. lxxviii. 54, border; in Ps. civ. 9, bound. To the Egyptians the plague of vermin on their persons was exceedingly dreadful, as that people affected great personal cleanliness, bathing very often, and thinking it an offence to their deities to enter their temples with vile insects in their clothing.

32. He gave them hail for rain, and flaming fire in their land. This was the seventh plague. It is recorded at length in Ex. ix. 22-32; see on Ps. lxxviii. 48. By hail for rain some understand hail instead of rain; but Egypt seems not to have depended on the clouds, but on the overflowing of the Nile for irrigation. The meaning probably is that the hail came thick and fast from above as rain, accompanied by terrible thunder and lightning, in Ps. lxxviii. called hot thunderbolts. This terrible tempest not only beat upon man and beast, the fire running along upon the ground, and smiting every herb of the field, but also every tree of the field;

33. He smote their vines also and their fig trees; and brake the trees of their coasts. A more wasted and ruined appearance no country probably ever had. The garden of the world became at once utterly desolate. See on Ps. lxxviii. 47. Coasts, as in v. 31.

34. He spake and the locusts came, and caterpillars, and that without number,

35. And did eat up all the herbs in their land, and devoured the fruit of their ground. This was the eighth plague. Its history is in Ex. x. 12–15. See on Ps. lxxviii. 46. Locusts, the same as in Ex. x. 4, 12, 13, 14, 19; Ps. lxxviii. 46. But in Exodus we have no word corresponding to caterpillars, thrice so rendered, and six times canker-worm. But both these words denote insects without wings; whereas the plague consisted entirely of creatures brought in great numbers through the air. The word rendered caterpillar, no less than the first, denotes a species of locust or grasshopper, of which there is quite a variety. Without number, see on Ps. civ. 25.

36. He smote also all the firstborn in their land, the chief of all their strength. This was the tenth and last plague. The king, the captive and the cattle all lost their first-born. The record is in Ex. xii. 29, 30. The judgment was rendered still more terrible because it came upon the land in the darkness of midnight. See on Ps. lxxviii. 51. The latter clause evidently refers to Gen. xlix. 3. This awful event was decisive. The dismissal of Israel was promptly granted.

37. He brought them forth also with silver and gold. For a little while the malice and grasping dispositions of the Egyptians were changed into a feeling of kindness: "And the Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they lent [gave upon being asked] unto them such things as they required: and they spoiled the Egyptians," Ex. xii. 36. They borrowed [that is, obtained by asking, not as loans, but as gifts] many costly jewels. And there was not one feeble person among their tribes. Feeble, the word is often so rendered; also falling, Job iv. 4; stumbling, Ps. xxvii. 2; decaying, Neh. iv. 10. Phillips: "No one was prevented by disease or infirmity from accomplishing the journey."

38. Egypt was glad when they departed: for the fear of them fell upon them. See Ex. xii. 33.

39. He spread a cloud for a covering; and fire to give light in the night. The historic record is in Ex. xiii. 21, and is often alluded to in Scripture, Num. ix. 16; x. 34; Neh. ix. 12; Isa. iv. 5, 6. See on Ps. lxxviii. 14; xcvii. 2; xcix. 7.

40. The people asked, and he brought quails, and satisfied them with the bread of heaven. The record of these events is in Ex. xvi. 4–35. In Ps. lxxvii. 22–29, they are introduced apparently for another purpose. The reference here is not to the subsequent lusting after flesh recorded in Num. xi. 4–33. The people were satisfied, i. e., filled with flesh and food.

41. He opened the rock, and the waters gushed out; they ran in the dry places like a river. The facts here alluded to are recorded in Ex. xvii. 6; Num. xx. 11. See on Ps. lxxviii. 15, 16, 20. Dry places; in Job xxx. 3, wilderness; in Isa. xxxv. 1, solitary place. If in the days of Moses the region through which Israel was passing at the time of smiting the rock, bore the same marks of sterility and dryness as in modern times, it is not strange that these unbelieving Jews staggered. The significance of this gushing fountain is declared by Paul, 1 Cor. x. 4.

42. For he remembered his holy promise, and Abraham his servant. The allusion is to such promises as we find in Gen. xv. 13-15; Ex. ii. 24. Compare Luke i. 54, 55. See on vv. 8-10.

43. And he brought forth his people with joy, and his chosen with gladness. The parallelism of this verse is double, first, between joy and gladness, secondly, between people and chosen. Compare v. 6. God often reminded the Israelites that they were brought into covenant relation with him by no means on account of their own merits, but solely by his own, free, sovereign choice and abounding grace, Deut. vii. 6-8; ix. 4-6; Ezek. xxxvi. 22, 32.

44. And gave them the lands of the heathen; and they inherited the labour of the people. Heathen, nations, Gentiles. People, nations. The reason why the Israelites had not possession of these lands sooner was that the iniquities of their possessors were not full, Gen. xv. 16. God bore with those ancient enemies a long time before he deprived them of their lands and the fruit of their labor. On the whole verse see Ps. lxxviii. 55. Anderson fitly explains labor as signifying "the products of their labor; their buildings, vineyards, cultivated fields," etc. See Deut. vi. 10, 11; Josh. xxiv. 13.

45. That they might observe his statutes, and keep his laws. Keep, as in Ps. xvii. 4; xix. 11. Observe, as in Ps. xii. 7; xxxiv. 13. Here the words are parallel. So also are statutes and laws. Statutes, as in v. 10. Laws, uniformly rendered as in Ps. i. 2, and often in Ps. xix. cxix. The Israelites were not chosen and blessed for their piety, but that they might become the servants of the Most High. See on Ps. lxxviii. 7. Praise ye the Lord. Hallelujah, literally, Praise ye Jah.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. There is no contrariety in the various acts of religious worship to which we are called in the first five verses of this Psalm. Thanksgiving, supplications, prayers, intercessions, confessions, songs of praise, pious conversation, open expressions of exulting joy and a recital of the divine mercies, all harmonize with each other, and may well be performed the same day. We should be specially careful that our glorying in the Lord should be reverent, solemn and profoundly humble; yet free from servility and a despairing tendency.

2. True religion is very much a matter between God and the souls of his people, vv. 3, 4. It principally consists in seeking the Lord—seeking to know him, to secure his favor, his image, his service, his fellowship and an abode with him at last. No good man is ever satisfied with what he knows or enjoys of God in this life, but he hopes, and longs, and prays with groanings that cannot be uttered for a fuller and more ravishing sight and enjoyment of God in glory. Seek his strength and seek his face. Dickson: "As seeking communion with God is a mark of a child of God, so it is also a reason of gladness and joy, because it both declares that we are of the number of converts and true worshippers of God, and also that joy is reserved for us."

3. If miracles and prodigies could have converted the world, it would have been done long ago, vv. 5-27. The history of creation, of providence and of redemption abounds with them; and sometimes for a season cavillers have thus been silenced. It is not by being startled, or terrified, or confounded, but by receiving the love of the truth and by embracing Jesus Christ, who is the way, the truth and the life, that men are turned to God, Luke xvi. 27-31.

4. We should be greatly affected by a review and recollection of God's mercies to our ancestors, v. 6. It is a great privilege to be able to plead his covenant with our forefathers. No doubt the weak, the vain, the self-righteous often pervert so great a blessing to mischievous ends; still our estimate of the blessing itself can hardly be too high.

5. Let believers never forget and always plead their covenant relation with God, vv. 7, 8, 42. And if the old covenant brought so great blessings to the posterity of the patriarchs for God's love to them, how much more shall the new covenant bring inestimable blessings to all believers through God's unspeakable love to Jesus Christ, whom he has given as a covenant to the people, a Captain of salvation to all humble souls?

6. We are but miserable drivellers in Scripture when we fail to see somewhat of the fulness of spiritual blessings contained in Old Testament history, doctrines and promises, such as we find in vv. 8-11 of this Psalm. Before the coming of Christ at least some pious men had better canons of interpreting Scripture. Zacharias construed God's word far otherwise, when he looked at this Psalm, Luke i. 67, 68, 72-75.

7. If Canaan of old was an object of so much, and so pious interest to the true Israel of God, it was not merely or chiefly because of the temporal blessings therewith connected, great as they were; but because it was a type of the heavenly inheritance, v. 11. All the old dispensation had a shadow of good things to come, Heb. x. 1.

8. It is well for us often to look to the hole of the pit whence we were digged, v. 12. The greatest families and kingdoms had but a small beginning. An humble origin is no just cause of shame to a good man, but surely it should cut the comb of our pride to remember that we are of nothing, are nothing, deserve nothing and can do nothing as of ourselves. There walks not this earth a man who is too humble in the sight of God.

9. Let no man despise the day of small things, v. 12; Luke xii. 32. It is better to stand in our lot feeble and despised, cast down and persecuted, without friends and without earthly resources, yet humbly trusting in God, than to be ever so great according to the judgment of this world and not have hope in the Almighty.

10. If God's people are strangers and pilgrims on the earth, let them remember it has always been so with the chosen seed, v. 13. Why should the saints of this day think to fare better in temporals than their fathers before them? The Saviour has dealt both kindly and candidly with us in telling us what to expect, John xvi. 33. No good man knows what snares may be spreading for his feet. Scott: "That which ungodly counsellors think a wise, political measure, often proves, on examination, to be a most detestable project of the devil against the church of Christ."

11. To cheerful, yet sober views of things, the saints should be the more inclined because of their complete and absolute safety, vv. 13-15. God has all hands and all hearts in his power. He can quiet adversaries, Pr. xvi. 7. But should he choose to let loose for a time the rage of men and devils, yet in the end he will bring all right. If God protected his chosen of old, he will not forsake his elect now. Dickson: "The person of every believer walking in God's way is sacred, sanctified, and set apart for God's peculiar service." If Jehovah punished Belshazzar for defiling the vessels of the temple at Jerusalem, has he no wrath or judgments in reserve for those who abuse the vessels of mercy?

12. In particular has God always shown a special displeasure at wicked and cruel assaults on his prophets and ministers, v. 15. Henry: "They that offer to touch God's prophets, with design to harm them may expect to hear of it one way or other. . . God's anointed prophets are dearer to him than anointed kings themselves. Jeroboam's hand was withered when it was stretched out against a prophet."

13. How fearfully hazardous it is to go on in sin against God, when he commands famine, war, pestilence, all the storms and plagues of nature, and can hurl them against us at any moment, v. 16. Our dependence is perfect and absolute, yet many act as if their independence was perfect and absolute. Dickson: "No food can be had except God furnish it, and no food, when it is given, can feed, except God give a powerful blessing with it," Deut. viii. 3.

14. God's foresight is perfect and he provides for every possible contingency, and for every coming event, v. 17. If a universal famine is to afflict the world, a Joseph shall be raised up, by whose sagacity the starvation of the righteous seed shall be prevented. God's ways are indeed very strange, but they are all holy and infallibly wise. God reveals the future to Joseph in a dream; he tells his dream; his brethren envy him; they doom him to death; God touches their hearts; they rather sell him than kill him; to Egypt he goes in the hands of the Midianites; soon he is locked up in prison, loaded with chains; there he lies long, long years; and yet every step is towards deliverance and exaltation. Why are we so slow to trust an infinite God?

15. Although in the New Testament Joseph is nowhere said to be a type of Christ, yet surely we carry our canons of interpretation too far, when we exclude such types as the oldest son of Rachel.

16. Let all God's people expect trials. They will surely come; and in due time deliverance will as surely follow; and deliverance shall be followed by glory and honor, vv. 18-22. Scott: "We greatly mistake if we do not rank afflictions among our mercies."

17. Past experiences, however rich and wonderful, are no proofs that we shall not be called to great and sore trials in the future. Jacob, who had seen God at Bethel and in wrestling had prevailed with the angel, must in his old age go down to Egypt, and end his days in the land of Ham, v. 23. And yet he now saw in his old age fully explained the darkest riddle that for near a quarter of a century had filled his life with sorrow.

18. When we remember how God multiplied the Israelites in Egypt, v. 24; it is easy to conceive how in the latter day he can make the earth swarm with a holy population, Ezek. xxxvi. 37; Zech. viii. 12.

19. If men hate us, it is because God has bidden them, v. 25. So wise men have always reasoned, 2 Sam. xvi. 11, 12. So let us reason. God turns men to hate us, not by infusing malice into their hearts. It is already there in dreadful force. All that is necessary for him to do is to take his almighty hand off their hearts and out bursts their wickedness. Henry: "Every creature is that to us that God makes it to be."

20. God is at no loss for fit servants and messengers; for if he has them not already, he can easily raise them up and send them on his errands, v. 26. Moses and Aaron themselves were what God made them to be, no more and no less.

21. How atrocious and foolish is human wickedness to array itself against the power of him, who can make the sun as black as midnight, and open vast magazines of plagues to scourge and waste and desolate a land, and torment its inhabitants, until life is a burden, vv. 28-36. If one judgment will not effect God's purposes, he will send ten. When he chooses all nature makes war upon man. Isa. xxvii. 4.

22. Whenever God puts to his hand, any work goes on with a prosperity surpassing all our conceptions, v. 37.

23. In any case or in any matter God can make the most reluctant perfectly willing, v. 38. Dickson: "The Lord can make bloody persecutors of his people to cease from their persecutions and to contribute to their delivery."

24. Let God's people be abundantly assured of his kind protection and guidance in all their pilgrimage, v. 39.

25. Let us not be over anxious about the kind or quality of our food, v. 40. Our heavenly Father knows what is best for us. Let us simply pray: "Feed me with food convenient for me."

26. As it was a great heightening of the divine beneficence to feed Israel with the bread of heaven, v. 40, so it was a great aggravation of their rebellion against God that they were dissatisfied with 'angels' food' and distrusted a providence which was every day working a miracle before them.

27. Their wickedness was heightened by their unbelief and ingratitude when they saw the goodness of God in smiting the flinty rock in the desolate wilderness of Horeb, and bringing out streams of water for their refreshment, v. 41.

28. However dark the state of God's people may be, let them rest assured that brighter days are coming, v. 43. He who has undertaken their cause is sovereign by right and sovereign in fact.

29. God is the rightful disposer of all lands, v. 44. The people of every nation have by their sins entirely forfeited all right to even their temporal possessions, and it is of God's mercies that any nation lives in the quiet enjoyment of its own territories.

30. The great end of all God's gifts is that we may be led to holiness, v. 45. Unless this be the result, the chief good is not attained.

PSALM CVI.

1 Praise ye the LORD. O give thanks unto the LORD; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.

2 Who can utter the mighty acts of the LORD? who can shew forth all his praise?

3 Blessed are they that keep judgment, and he that doeth righteousness at all times.

4 Remember me, O LORD, with the favour that thou bearest unto thy people: O visit me with thy salvation;

5 That I may see the good of thy chosen, that I may rejoice in the gladness of thy nation, that I may glory with thine inheritance.

6 We have sinned with our fathers, we have committed iniquity, we have done wickedly.

7 Our fathers understood not thy wonders in Egypt; they remembered not the multitude of thy mercies; but provoked him at the sea, even at the Red sea.

8 Nevertheless he saved them for his name's sake, that he might make his mighty power to be known.

9 He rebuked the Red sea also, and it was dried up: so he led them through the depths, as through the wilderness.

10 And he saved them from the hand of him that hated them, and redeemed them from the hand of the enemy.

11 And the waters covered their enemies: there was not one of them left.

12 Then believed they his words; they sang his praise.

13 They soon forgot his works; they waited not for his counsel:

14 But lusted exceedingly in the wilderness, and tempted God in the desert.

15 And he gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul.

16 They envied Moses also in the camp, and Aaron the saint of the LORD.

17 The earth opened and swallowed up Dathan, and covered the company of Abiram.

18 And a fire was kindled in their company; the flame burned up the wicked.

19 They made a calf in Horeb, and worshipped the molten image.

20 Thus they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass.

21 They forgot God their saviour, which had done great things in Egypt;

22 Wondrous works in the land of Ham, and terrible things by the Red sea.

23 Therefore he said that he would destroy them, had not Moses his chosen stood before him in the breach, to turn away his wrath, lest he should destroy them.

24 Yea, they despised the pleasant land, they believed not his word:

25 But murmured in their tents, and hearkened not unto the voice of the LORD.

26 Therefore he lifted up his hand against them, to overthrow them in the wilderness:

27 To overthrow their seed also among the nations, and to scatter them in the lands.

- 28 They joined themselves also unto Baal-peor, and ate the sacrifices of the dead.
 29 Thus they provoked him to anger with their inventions: and the plague brake in upon them.
 30 Then stood up Phinehas, and executed judgment: and so the plague was stayed.
 31 And that was counted unto him for righteousness unto all generations for evermore.
 32 They angered him also at the waters of strife, so that it went ill with Moses for their sakes:
 33 Because they provoked his spirit, so that he spake unadvisedly with his lips.
 34 They did not destroy the nations, concerning whom the LORD commanded them:
 35 But were mingled among the heathen, and learned their works.
 36 And they served their idols: which were a snare unto them.
 37 Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils,
 38 And shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan: and the land was polluted with blood.
 39 Thus were they defiled with their own works, and went a whoring with their own inventions.
 40 Therefore was the wrath of the LORD kindled against his people, insomuch that he abhorred his own inheritance.
 41 And he gave them into the hand of the heathen; and they that hated them ruled over them.
 42 Their enemies also oppressed them, and they were brought into subjection under their hand.
 43 Many times did he deliver them; but they provoked him with their counsel, and were brought low for their iniquity.
 44 Nevertheless he regarded their affliction, when he heard their cry:
 45 And he remembered for them his covenant, and repented according to the multitude of his mercies.
 46 He made them also to be pitied of all those that carried them captives.
 47 Save us, O LORD our God, and gather us from among the heathen, to give thanks unto thy holy name, and to triumph in thy praise.
 48 Blessed be the LORD God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting: and let all the people say, Amen. Praise ye the LORD.

THIS Psalm has no title, though some make the first word an inscription. Of the authorship we are uncertain; but these remarks seem to be just: 1. Whoever wrote Psalms civ. cv. probably wrote this. 2. Many ascribe this to David. 3. The first verse, except Hallelujah, and the last two verses except Hallelujah are taken from an ode certainly composed by David, 1 Chron. xvi. 34-36. 4. Although Pool, Horsley, Mudge and others are confident that it was composed in the time of the dispersion and captivity, arguing from the language of v. 47, yet it is a fact that David actually wrote that verse, 1 Chron. xvi. 35. Scott dates it B. C. 1045; Clarke gives no date, but thinks it was composed in Babylon. In Ps. cv. we have a lively account of God's mercies to ancient Israel. In this much notice is taken of the sins of the same people. That greatly praises God; this justly deplores departures from God. Yet it does not abandon the chosen people to despair and ruin; but bids them hope in the divine mercy. Hengstenberg calls this a "lyrical echo" to Dan. ix. Alexander: "It would not be absurd to regard this Psalm as a lyrical paraphrase of that confession." Nothing makes men think and feel and speak alike more than a just and deep sense of personal ill-desert. All ingenuous and general confessions of sin closely resemble each other. The names of the Most High found in this Psalm are Jah LORD, Jehovah LORD and El God, on which see introduction to Ps. lxxviii.; on Ps. i. 2; v. 4. If the great mercies bestowed on the Jews made their sins so odious and abominable; how aggravated must be the offences of men, who live in sin under the full blaze of gospel light!

1. Praise ye the LORD, literally, hallelujah. The Syriac wants this word, and so do some manuscripts; but no doubt it ought to be retained. "Even sorrow for sin must not put us out of tune for praising God." O give thanks unto the LORD, as in Ps. cv. 1. The reasons assigned for thanksgiving are 1, For he is good, or goodness itself, as the same word is often rendered. Compare Matt. xix. 17. 2. For his mercy endureth for ever. Mercy, often lovingkindness; see on Ps. li. 1. This clause is repeated twenty-six times in Ps. cxxxvi. Man never had a fitter theme for praise, nor a fitter work than praise.

2. Who can utter the mighty acts of the LORD? who can shew forth all his praise? Mighty acts, elsewhere in the singular rendered strength, power, might, mastery, Ps. xx. 6; xxi. 13; Isa. xi. 2; Ex. xxxii. 18; twice in Ps. cxlv., and once in Ps. cl., mighty acts. The rendering of the verbs, though not literal in form, gives the true meaning. Two senses have been gathered from this verse. 1. Some make it coincident with that of Ps. l. 16; a reproof to the wicked for attempting or pretending to praise God. 2. There is a more obvious sense, viz., that no one can praise God as he deserves. Though not inspired the son of Sirach well presents this thought, Ecclus. xliii. 28-31.

3. Blessed are they that keep judgment, and he that doeth righteousness at all times. Blessed, as in Ps. i. 1, literally O the blessednesses. To keep judgment is the same as to do righteousness, i. e., to observe justice and maintain rectitude in the sight of God and man; see on Ps. xv. 2. At all times, or, in every season. Fits of religious emotion are not enough. The change of the plural to the singular is not unusual.

4. Remember me, O LORD, with the favour that thou bearest unto thy people. Remember, a word of great force and beauty. It embraces much. The penitent thief cried, Remember me. Favor, as in Ps. v. 12; xxx. 5; in Ps. li. 18, it is rendered good pleasure; in Ps. cxliii. 10, will. Whatever good comes to any mere man is referable to God's sovereign will and grace alone. O visit me with thy salvation. Visit, as in Ps. viii. 4. Like remember, it embraces all the good desired. Salvation, elsewhere help, deliverance; see on Ps. iii. 2; xviii. 50. This verse contains a petition either uttered by the author as an ejaculation in his own behalf; or in the name of the body of believers of his time. The transition from the singular in vv. 4, 5, to the plural in vv. 6, 7, is not unusual.

5. That I may see the good of thy chosen, that I may rejoice in the gladness of thy nation, that I may glory with thine inheritance. Chosen, nation and inheritance all designate the true church of God. To see good is to possess and enjoy it. The effect is rejoicing and glorying. This verse teaches that God's free choice of Israel was the cause of their becoming his people and his inheritance. Compare Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2. Yet notwithstanding their distinguished privileges they acted badly.

6. We have sinned with our fathers, we have committed iniquity, we have done wickedly. Sinned, offended, trespassed. With our fathers, it is easy to follow the evil example of ancestors, because the heart is inclined to evil. Committed iniquities; in Esther i. 16, done wrong; in 2 Chron. vi. 37, done amiss; in 2 Sam. xix. 19, did perversely. Perversion or perverseness expresses the radical idea. Done wickedly; the cognate adjective is in Ps. i. rendered ungodly. Inspired writers have exhausted the powers of language on the love of God, and on the wickedness of man. Alexander: "The terms of this verse are borrowed, here as well as in Dan. ix. 5, from that great model of ecclesiastical and national devotion furnished by Solomon in his prayer at the dedication of the temple," 1 Kings viii. 47. All the miseries that come on persons, families and nations, may be accounted for on the principle of divine righteousness.

7. Our fathers understood not thy wonders in Egypt. They even refused Moses himself, Acts vii. 27, 35. They misinterpreted all the manifestations of divine power against their enemies, and of divine kindness towards themselves. In reading their history even carnal men are amazed, and foolishly think that in like circumstances they would have acted otherwise. They remembered not the multitude of thy mercies. Forgetfulness of God and of his kindness enters into the very nature of iniquity in all stages. On the other hand true piety hides the memory of divine things in its heart. God remembered them, but they remembered not him. The verb is the same as in v. 4. Multitude, as in Ps. li. 1. Mercies, elsewhere, lovingkindnesses. But provoked him at the sea, even at the Red sea. The history of this misconduct is in Ex. xiv. 10-12. Their language was that of unbelief, worldliness and ingratitude. There is no significance in the repetition of the word sea, beyond a probable allusion to Ex. xv. 4. Red sea, literally sea of weeds, or flags, as the word is rendered in Ex. ii. 3, 5. Red sea is the Greek name, derived some think from the little insects on the surface, others, from the tint of the mountains on a part of its coast, and yet others, from the land of Edom, (which means red,) lying between the Red sea and Palestine. The Red sea is a bay of the Indian ocean. It is commonly called the Arabian gulf.

8. Nevertheless he saved them for his name's sake, see on Ps. cv. 43. Having undertaken a work, God's counsel must stand, not because of Israel's merits, but for the glory of his perfections; that he might make his mighty power to be known. Mighty power, in v. 2, mighty acts. The passage of the Red sea has been celebrated ever since it occurred, not only on earth, but in heaven, Rev. xv. 3.

9. He rebuked the Red sea also, and it was dried up. Nothing is more marked in real miracles than their perfection. The Israelites did not wade through shallow water, nor was there an unusual ebbing of the tide; but the waters gathered and stood upright, on both sides, Ex. xv. 8; see on Ps. xxxiii. 7; lxxviii. 13. So he led them through the depths, as through the wilderness. Depths, deeps, not shallow places. The wilderness, a desert. The waters of the Arabian gulf were to the Israelites no more hindrance than if the place had always been dry ground. Compare Isa. lxiii. 13.

10. And he saved them from the hand of him that hated them, and redeemed them from the hand of the enemy. Him that hated and enemy, both participles, strictly parallel; both in the singular, perhaps because Pharaoh is alluded to as the leader of the Egyptians. Not only he, but all his legions perished; so in the next verse we have the plural form.

11. And the waters covered their enemies; there was not one of them left. Enemies, adversaries, literally distressers, troublers, afflictors, Ex. xiv. 27, 28; xv. 5. The only trace of them was found in their carcasses that floated ashore and became a prey for the jackals of the wilderness, Ps. lxxiv. 14.

12. Then believed they his words; they sang his praise. On the first clause see Ex. xiv. 31; on the second, the song of Moses and his countrymen given at length in Ex. xv. This verse is not spoken to their praise, but to show how slow they were to believe and worship God. Calvin: "Overpowered by the grandeur of God's works, they were, in spite of themselves, compelled to believe in God, and to give glory to him, and thus the criminality of their rebellion was increased; because, although their stubbornness was overcome, yet they immediately relapsed into their former state of unbelief." Their faith was temporary, Mark iv. 17.

13. They soon forgot his works; literally, They hasted, they forgot his works. It was but three days after this stupendous miracle that they came to the waters of Marah, where their wickedness broke out afresh; see on Ps. lxxviii. 11. Compare Ex. xv. 24. They waited not for his counsel. Their ingratitude for mercies already received made them impatient at any delay. Because they believed not, they made haste, Isa. xxviii. 16. True piety waits upon God. Counsel, as in Ps. i. 1; xxxiii. 11. They refused to practise any self-denial.

14. But lusted exceedingly in the wilderness, and tempted God in the desert. See on Ps. lxxviii. 18. Compare Num. xi. 4-33; 1 Cor. x. 6. Wilderness and desert, as in Ps. lxxviii. 40. Lusted, sometimes in a good sense, desired or greatly desired, Ps. xlv. 11; cxxxii. 13. It is also rendered coveted, longed, Deut. xii. 20; Prov. xxi. 26. Here it expresses unlawful desires. On tempting God see on Ps. lxxviii. 18. The fountain of all their sin was their unbelief. This made them turbulent, impatient, murmurers and complainers.

15. And he gave them their request, i. e., the thing which they wickedly desired. Compare 1 Sam. xii. 17, 19; Hos. xiii. 11. But sent leanness into their soul. They got what they craved, and with it a curse. Compare Num. xi. 18-20. What was the evil sent? French and Skinner: He sent a wasting disease among them. From the description given in Num. xi. 20, Hammond and Anderson think a form of cholera broke out among them. Whatever its form, it was "a very great plague," and killed many, Num. xi. 33, 34. Soul may mean person, or animal life, Nu. xi. 6. Some think the evil sent was spiritual. Alexander: "The phrase into their soul is really a qualifying phrase, designed to show that the emaciation or decay which was sent upon them was not bodily but spiritual." Why may we not include both ideas, a failure of bodily strength accompanied with emaciation, and spiritual poverty and wretchedness? Both these evils were suffered, whether they are here mentioned or not. Henry: "He filled them with uneasiness of mind, and terror of conscience, and a self-reproach, occasioned by their bodies being sick with the surfeit." Morison: "He sent leanness into their persons; so that multitudes of them were speedily wasted and consumed: and this state, alas! of bodily health, the result of animal indulgence, was but the sad emblem of that spiritual emaciation which had seized upon all the powers of their immortal spirits." Clarke: "God gave flesh, as they desired: but gave no blessing with it; and in consequence they did not fatten, but grew lean upon it. Their souls also suffered want." Scott: "Their sensual request was granted as a punishment, and proved injurious both to their health, and to their souls."

16. They envied Moses also in the camp, and Aaron the saint of the LORD.

17. The earth opened and swallowed up Dathan, and covered the company of Abiram.

18. And a fire was kindled in their company; the flame burned up the wicked. The events here alluded to are graphically described in Num. xvi. The designation of saint applied to Aaron includes both him and Moses; for they were both holy unto the Lord in office, and were at heart true and eminent servants of God. They are honorably mentioned long after their death, Ps. lxxvii. 20; xcix. 6. Compare Num. xvi. 5. Moses and Aaron were both modest and unassuming men, Num. xvi. 11. The object of introducing this history here seems to be to remind the Israelites that their nation might have easily perished by the just curse of God in the wilderness: that others were involved in murmuring against Moses and Aaron, besides those who fell, and that the nation did not now profit as it should by the manifestation of God's wrath against those that were smitten, or of his mercy towards them that were spared. There seem to be recorded in Num. xvi. three distinct judgments: 1, the earth opened and swallowed up Korah and his company; 2, a fire burst forth and consumed two hundred and fifty men that offered incense; 3, a plague broke out and destroyed fourteen thousand seven hundred souls.

19. They made a calf in Horeb, and worshipped the molten image.

20. Thus they changed their glory into the similitude of an ox that eateth grass. All attempts to worship God by images or by likenesses, were strictly forbidden to the Jews and through them to all people, Ex. xx. 4, 5; Deut. v. 8, 9. The Israelites could not have been ignorant of these prohibitions, and yet they fell into idolatry. Cresswell: "The modern Jews assert, that their ancestors were in that matter misled by certain Egyptian proselytes, who had accompanied the Israelites when they were delivered from their bondage." But the history of that people for a long time subsequent to their settlement in Canaan shows their strong propensity to gross idolatry. Nor is the guilt of their idolatry taken away because it was a professed attempt to honor the God of heaven. Israel could hardly have sunk so low as to think that a calf, not made till they reached Horeb, had delivered them. But they attempted to worship Jehovah under the figure of an ox, which was the sacred sign of the Egyptians. Thus they corrupted themselves, Ex. xxxii. 7; sinned a great sin, Ex. xxxii. 31; and became idolaters, 1 Cor. x. 7. Compare Acts vii. 41. The Egyptian word, Apis, or Serapis signifies the head of an ox. Those ancient idolaters made that animal their principal deity. Glory; Jehovah is the glory of his people. See like use of the word, Jer. ii. 11. An ox that eateth grass, i. e., is in the habit of eating grass. Compare Deut. ix. 21. Some think that the name calf is here and elsewhere applied in contempt to the small image set up. The same word is used for ox, bull and bullock.

21. They forgot God their saviour, which had done great things in Egypt;

22. Wondrous works in the land of Ham, and terrible things by the Red sea. Egypt and land of Ham as in Ps. cv. 23. Forgot; compare v. 7. Saviour, a participle, in Ps. vii. 10; rendered which saveth. Great things, as in Ps. lxxi. 19. Wondrous works, in Ps. ix. 1, marvellous works. Terrible things, as in Ps. xlv. 4; lxv. 5; a participle, expressive of the fear that ought to have been awakened by the miracles of Egypt and at the Red sea. Great things, wondrous works and terrible things all refer to the stupendous events preceding and attending the deliverance from the house of bondage. They inspired neither salutary dread, nor pious confidence, nor any right sentiment whatever:

23. Therefore he said that he would destroy them, had not Moses his chosen stood before him in the breach, to turn away his wrath lest he should destroy them, Ex. xxxii. 10, 11, 14, 32; Deut. ix. 19, 25; x. 10; Ezek. xx. 13. Hengstenberg: "The length of this verse harmonizes with its important position." Moses was God's chosen to be lawgiver of Israel and also to eternal life. Destroy, two words, different in Hebrew, but well rendered. As intercessor Moses stood in the breach, and so was mediator, Gal. iii. 19.

24. Yea, they despised the pleasant land. Margin, land of desire; Edwards, desirable land; Jebb, land of pleasantness; Hengstenberg, land of beauty. In 2 Chron. xxxvi. 10, we have goodly instead of pleasant. It is a noun, in Hag. ii. 7, desire. Compare Deut. viii. 7-9. Some of the Israelites wished that they were back in Egypt. Even in sight of the promised land, their unbelief was prevalent. But two adults of all the host that came out of Egypt ever entered the promised land, Heb. iii. 18; Num. xiv. 20-37; Deut. i. 34-36; Ps. lxxviii. 22, 32. The same reason for not entering the promised land is assigned in this verse: They believed not his word:

25. But murmured in their tents, and hearkened not unto the voice of the LORD, Num. xiv. 2, 27. Here as elsewhere the poet does not follow the exact chronological order of events. On the two clauses of this verse see Deut. i. 27; Num. xiv. 22.

26. Therefore he lifted up his hand against them, to overthrow them in the wilderness. In most Bibles this verse is not separated from that which immediately follows it, nor is it necessary it should be. And yet as Morison says: "It is obvious that those interpreters are mistaken who refer the allusions of v. 27, to the same history as those of v. 26. The people overthrown in the wilderness were to be destroyed by pestilence; but the overthrow threatened in v. 27, was by banishment and captivity." Yet in poetry, eloquence and descriptive history, events relating to the same person or people in general are often closely crowded together. See a remarkable instance in Matt. xxvii. 50-53. The whole forty years of Israel's journeying was marked by rebellion and punishments, Ps. xcv. 10, 11. The lifting up of the hand is not to strike but to swear, Num. xiv. 21-23, 28; Heb. iii. 18; vi. 13. Chaldee: "He lifted up his hand with an oath." Not only was the curse upon that generation for their own sins, but upon their posterity for the like transgressions; for he sware

27. To overthrow their seed also among the nations, and to scatter them in the lands. Overthrow, as in v. 26; literally, cause them to fall. The reference is to the curse denounced in Lev. xxvi. 32, 33, 38. Compare Ps. xlv. 11. In almost all their wars the Jews lost some prisoners, who if not killed were held in slavery.

28. They joined themselves also unto Baal-peor, and ate the sacrifices of the dead. Anderson: "Baal was a very common name for the principal male god of the nations of the East, as Ashtaroth was a common one for their chief female deity. The Moabites, Phenicians, Assyrians, Babylonians, and often the Hebrews worshipped this idol. Among the Babylonians he was called Bel or Belus." To the name of the idol an appendix was often made from the place where his image stood, as Baal-peor, from the hill Peor. On this hill Balaam offered seven bullocks and seven rams on as many altars, Num. xxiii. 28-30. The particular transgression here noticed is recorded in Num. xxv. 1-3; see also Num. xxxi. 16; Deut. iv. 3; xxxii. 17; Hos. ix. 10; Rev. ii. 14. Dead, the gods of the heathen are not real existences, as is Jehovah, who alone is the living God.

29. Thus they provoked him to anger with their inventions. Inventions, in v. 39 also; elsewhere, endeavors, works, doings, Ps. xxviii. 4; lxxviii. 7; Prov. xx. 11. Provoked; Alexander: "It means to excite both grief and indignation." And the plague brake in upon them. The historic narrative is in Num. xxv. 3-5. Plague, sometimes rendered stroke, also slaughter; generally as here, Ezek. xxiv. 16; 1 Sam. iv. 17. Alexander: "It has the meaning of a divine infliction in general, and that of a pestilential disease in particular."

30. Then stood up Phinehas, and executed judgment: and so the plague was stayed. The narrative of the conduct of Phinehas on this occasion is found in Num. xxv. 6-9. The numbers destroyed were twenty-four thousand. The blessing of God that came upon Phinehas for his intrepid fidelity is also recorded in Num. xxv. 11-13.

31. And that was counted unto him for righteousness unto all generations for evermore. Calvin: "In thus praising one individual the prophet heaps reproach upon the whole body of the people." What Phinehas did, was doubtless under the immediate direction of the Spirit of God. Had it not been so, it would certainly have been condemned as it was quite beside his office, and in all ordinary cases unbecoming a priest to employ the sword. The act can be no guide to uninspired men. The statement that his conduct was counted to him for righteousness is to be explained like the same phrase applied to Abraham. Compare Gen. xv. 6; Rom. iv. 3; iii. 20. The righteousness of Phinehas in this case is not the ground of his justification before God, but an act which God approved and commended. The reward promised him was that of a lasting priesthood among his posterity. Though it is not mentioned here, it is fully stated in Num. xxv. 13.

32. They angered him also at the waters of strife. That is, they offended God by sinning against him. Their conduct was so outrageous against God, that even Moses lost his temper. Angered, caused him to be wroth; not the same as provoked to anger in v. 29; but a stronger word. At the waters of strife, or of Meribah. The historic record is in Num. xx. 2-13. See on Ps. lxxxi. 7. They dealt wickedly with the Lord, So that it went ill with Moses for their sakes. How ill it went with Moses may be seen in Num. xx. 12; Deut. i. 37; iii. 26. Neither he nor Aaron was permitted to enter Canaan.

33. Because they provoked his spirit. Provoked, not as in v. 29, but as in vv. 7, 43. We met it in Ps. lxxviii. 17, 40. Other forms of the verb mean to rebel, as in Ps. v. 10; cv. 28. Some would read here, They made his spirit to rebel, meaning the spirit of Moses. This seems to have been by far the most usual interpretation. It is adopted by Calvin, Hammond, Patrick, Gill, Henry, Horne, Scott and others. Indeed some think that Moses (and not God at all) is spoken of throughout vv. 32, 33. But the Chaldee, followed by Fabritius and others, by spirit understand the Holy Ghost. Hengstenberg: "His spirit, not the spirit of Moses, but the Spirit of God." Some make Isa. lxiii. 10, parallel. A good sense may thus be had without violating the laws of grammatical construction. But the first interpretation is altogether natural, is apparently consistent with the known facts in the case, is more obvious than any other, and is most commonly accepted. It best agrees with the connection: So that he spake unadvisedly with his lips. The verb rendered spake unadvisedly is found twice in Lev. v. 4; once in Pr. xii. 18; and is rendered speak, pronounce. No where else does it bear the sense here but upon it; literally, he uttered, spoke, or pronounced with his lips. Clarke proposes to read: "He stuttered, or stammered with his lips, indicating that he was transported with anger." Some think that he spake with his lips only, but in his heart did not believe: saying, Shall we fetch you water out of this rock? This derives apparent support from what God said: "Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me," Num. xx. 12. This may teach either that Moses believed not in God's power and willingness to give them water at that time; or that in some other respect, as in a sinful display of temper, he manifested unbelief. The common explanation is perhaps the best, viz: that they exacerbated the temper of Moses, so that he spoke with his lips in a manner unbecoming a servant of God; not in a manner to glorify God, but to betray petulance. Gill: "Though Moses was a very meek man, meeker than any upon the face of the earth, Num. xii. 3, yet, being greatly provoked, he let fall some passionate and undue expressions." Horne: "The wrath of man found admission, and that worketh not the righteousness of God." Calvin: "Such was the indignation which Moses felt burning within him, that he could not calmly wait for the commandment of God to smite the rock." No doubt there was unadvised speech. Gesenius thinks the verb itself means to babble, to talk idly, and so to speak unadvisedly. If this is correct, there is no difficulty in the case. The sin of provoking Moses was great. Thrice it is stated that for their sakes God would not allow him to enter the promised land. Deut. i. 37; iii. 26.

34. They did not destroy the nations, concerning whom the LORD commanded them. The command to expel those, who had long inhabited Canaan, was clear and unconditional, Deut. vii. 1-5, 16; Judges ii. 2. In this they miserably failed. They rashly entered into a covenant which having been made could not be broken, Josh. ix. 3-15. When there was no such covenant in the way, timidity, irresolution and the want of a proper fear of God made them hesitate, Judges i. 21, 27-36. This conduct as God had forewarned them (Deut. vii. 3, 4; Num. xxxiii. 55,) led to innumerable mischiefs.

35. But were mingled among the heathen, and learned their works.

36. And they served their idols: which were a snare unto them. The record of the ill effects of thus willingly mingling with abominable idolaters is found in many places, and is full of sadness, Judg. iii. 5-8; Isa. ii. 6. Men sometimes express wonder at the warnings given to Israel on this subject, and to all men against bad company. But the reason is very good, Josh. xxiii. 12, 13. As given by Paul it is: "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump," 1 Cor. v. 6; by a heathen poet quoted by Paul: "Evil communications corrupt good manners," 1 Cor. xv. 33. The reason why bad company is so much more potential than good is that the heart of man is sinful, and tow and tinder are not more inflammable than is our evil nature. The corrupting power of idolatry would be incredible were it not exhibited to the world from age to age. The works of the heathen are abominable; specially does the worship of idols grossly and strongly alienate the heart from God, Judg. ii. 11-13, 17, 19. How seductive the worship of images is, and how it leads from one excess to another is evident from all history, and from verse

37. Yea, they sacrificed their sons and their daughters unto devils. Calvin, church of England, Doway and Jebb have devils as here. But all the ancient versions, also Fabritius, Piscator, Amesius, Tremellius and Junius, Alexander and Fry read demons. Edwards has evil spirits. Clarke: "Devil is never in Scripture used in the plural; there is but ONE devil, though there are MANY demons." Yet the English version does not keep up this distinction. Demons are the angels of the devil, Matt. xxv. 41. The word here rendered devils is found in but one other place, Deut. xxxii. 17. It seems to signify destroyers, and is so rendered by Venema, though Michaelis derives it from an Arabic word signifying to be black, and Hengstenberg from an Arabic word signifying to rule, equivalent to the lords many, in 1 Cor. viii. 5. That the Jews in imitation of the heathen did sacrifice their offspring to devils is evident*from many places in Scripture, although they were carefully warned against so horrible a sin, Lev. xviii. 21; xx. 23; Deut. xii. 31; xviii. 10; 2 Kings xvi. 3; xvii. 17; xxi. 6; 2 Chron. xxviii. 3; xxxiii. 6.

38. And shed innocent blood, even the blood of their sons and of their daughters, whom they sacrificed unto the idols of Canaan: and the land was polluted with blood. Alexander: "The first verb means to pour out, and here implies a copious or abundant bloodshed." Blood, at the end of the verse plural; see on Ps. v. 6.

39. Thus were they defiled with their own works. The entire tendency of heathenism and idolatry is to sink into still lower and lower depths of wickedness and wretchedness. The effect of a false religion compared with that of the true is just what might be expected from the difference between Moloch and Jehovah. Compare Ezek. xx. 18, 30. And went a whoring with their own inventions. As harlotry is one of the most abominable sins that can be committed by a daughter or a wife; so often in the Scriptures turning from God and especially the practice of idolatry is called whoredom and fornication, Ps. lxxiii. 27; Ex. xxxiv. 15, 16. Inventions, works, doings, endeavors. Cobbin has delusions; Alexander, crimes.

40. Therefore was the wrath of the Lord kindled against his people, insomuch that he abhorred his own inheritance. On the whole verse see on Ps. lxxviii. 59, 62. Compare Judges ii. 14. Wrath, as in Ps. ii. 5, 12. Abhorred; see on Ps. v. 6; it expresses detestation.

41. And he gave them into the hand of the heathen; and they that hated them ruled over them, Judg. ii. 14; iii. 8, 12; vi. 1-6; x. 7; Neh. ix. 27. Never has such malice been shown as against the Lord, against his anointed Son and against his people. And never have such curses come on persons or nations as through the forsaking of the Most High, and lightly esteeming the Rock of salvation.

42. Their enemies also oppressed them, and they were brought into subjection under their hand. Enemies, commonly so rendered, Ps. iii. 7; vi. 10. Oppressed, as in Ps. lvi. 1; it expresses cruelty and tyranny. There were no depths of degradation to which the enemies of Israel did not reduce them when in their power, Judg. iv. 3.

43. Many times did he deliver them; but they provoked him with their counsel, and were brought low for their iniquity. On the first clause see Judg. ii. 16-18; Neh. ix. 27. Provoked, as in v. 7. Brought low, margin, impoverished, or weakened, in Job xxiv. 24, as here; in Ecc. x. 18, decayeth, not found elsewhere. Forsaken of God, the mightiest is soon utterly powerless. And when God lets loose the passions of the wicked against any man, the suffering is commonly frightful. Some think that the prophet in this verse refers to the final catastrophe of the nation. But compare v. 44, and Lev. xxvi. 14-44.

44. Nevertheless he regarded their affliction, when he heard their cry: Judges iii. 9; iv. 3; vi. 7, 8; x. 10. He regarded their affliction, he favorably considered it and graciously saved them from it.

45. And he remembered for them his covenant, and repented according to the multitude of his mercies. On the first clause see Ps. cv. 8. On the second, Ps. xc. 13. Multitude of mercies, a phrase indicating that great benevolence was required from God and was actually showed by him, Ps. li. 1.

46. He made them also to be pitied of all those that carried them captives. We have a few samples of such kindness; Ez. ix. 9; Jer. xlii. 12. Esther vi. 13 shows that the heathen had been greatly impressed with God's kindness to his captive people. Compare 1 Kings viii. 50.

47. Save us, O LORD our God, and gather us from among the heathen. A fit and suitable prayer for the ancient church in any of her captivities. But the deliverance sought is not for mere selfish ends. All divine interpositions ought to be to give thanks unto thy holy name, and to triumph in thy praise.

48. Blessed be the LORD God of Israel from everlasting to everlasting. The translation is very literal and cannot be improved. On blessing God see on Ps. ciii. 1. And let all the people say, Amen. People, in the singular, nation, meaning the Jewish nation. Amen, see on Ps. xli. 13. Praise ye the LORD, literally, Hallelujah! Here ends what some called the fourth book of Psalms; but see Introduction, § 11.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Even when we are called to mourn for sin we may very well begin our worship with adoration, praise and thanksgiving, v. 1. No trial, no sense of ill-desert can release us from the obligation to love and praise the Most High. In fact our very sinfulness helps to display the amazing long-suffering and loving-kindness of God.

2. A sense of weakness and of short-coming in any duty, particularly in worship, does not release us from the obligation to do our utmost, v. 2. God's glory is not designed to dishearten us in our approaches to him. The simple fact of our coming short of perfection is a reason why we should stir up our souls and all that is within us. To make our weakness or unworthiness a plea for neglecting a duty is an attempt to excuse one sin by another.

3. None can over estimate the value of a good conscience arising from a heart willing to do justice and judgment, and to live honestly in the sight of God and man, v. 3. Those, who have this mercy are blessed in all things. Calvin: "There is nothing but the mere shadow of righteousness, unless a man cordially devote himself to the practice of honesty."

4. A great lack in the principles and practice of many is found in their want of stability, v. 3. At some times they seem upright, devout and earnest; anon they are loose, vain and worldly.

5. Every blessing that comes to man on earth is by God's favor, v. 4. Man deserves nothing good at the hand of his Maker. By ties of nature, of duty, and of gratitude, his fellow-creatures may be fully bound to pay him much love, much service, much respect. But God is bound to no man to do him good, further than his own gracious and blessed promise has engaged him.

6. But then it shall be for a perpetual joy that the favor of the Lord is very bountiful, and his grace has unsearchable riches, v. 4. Where God has set his love, his mercies are absolutely infinite.

7. Hard as is the lot and heavy as are the afflictions of God's people, yet through the amazing mercy of the Most High, they have great deliverances, great consolations, great victories, of which to be made a partaker will be immortal honor, and bliss, v. 5.

8. It is sad, indeed when instead of being reformed by a review of the sins and sufferings of our ancestors, we sin with them, and are neither the wiser nor the better for a knowledge of God's dealings towards them, v. 6. But it is a blessed truth that if we hate the evil ways of those who have gone before us, and turn from transgression ourselves, we shall not be shut out from the kingdom of heaven.

9. Though the writers of the Scriptures were by divine inspiration infallibly preserved from extravagance; yet they use every appropriate variety of strong and condemnatory language against sin, v. 6. Surely moral evil cannot be a trifle. Yet it breaks forth on all occasions and on all hands. Sometimes it is in the form of forgetfulness of God, vv. 1, 3, 21; sometimes, of rash impetuosity towards evil, v. 13; sometimes, of strong, imperious lusts, v. 14; sometimes, of tempting God, v. 14; sometimes, of despising his very best gifts, v. 24; sometimes, of vile unbelief, vv. 12, 24, and so of the whole catalogue of offences against God and man. O how vile we are! Dickson: "Confession of sins must not be slighted, but seriously gone about and aggravated duly."

10. It is suited greatly to humble us when we remember that whatever kindness we receive at the hands of God, is not at all on account of anything in us, present or prospective, but solely for his own sake, and to make known his glorious perfections, v. 8.

11. It is a profitable exercise devoutly to number the mercies of God and the wonders of his providence, vv. 7-11. Often has he brought good out of evil, light out of darkness, and joy out of sorrow. Often has he made a wheel move within a wheel to the confounding of the wicked and to the joy of the pious.

12. God has often shown an inflexible determination to save his people, who trust his grace, and glorify his salvation, even at the cost of the destruction of countless multitudes of the wicked who dare to rise up against them, v. 11. If the safety and final victory of a believer could not be secured but by the ruin, temporal and eternal, of millions of wicked men, the Almighty would at once send his blighting curse upon them. It is of mere mercy that the day of grace is prolonged.

13. After the many examples of a faith that has in it no saving power, but is the result of the common operations of God's Spirit, and of striking providences, it well becomes each of us to ask, Is my faith saving? is it merely temporary? is it merely historical? is it the faith of devils? v. 12. An acknowledgment of the truth wrung from us by the terrible inflictions of divine wrath is not saving in any case, even though we may rejoice and sing God's praises.

14. How little we know of ourselves! What sudden transitions our emotions and even our purposes undergo! We behold stupendous wonders and think we never shall lose the salutary impression received from them; but without special grace we soon forget all, and sin with greediness, and rush with madness towards destruction, v. 13.

15. Sometimes the question is asked, Why is man so averse to waiting God's counsel? v. 13. The answer is easy: To tarry demands the subjection of our passions, requires of us humility, and calls for trust. To the natural heart all these are foreign. Of course impatience, which has a consanguinity with all the evil principles of our nature, obtains the mastery, and drives us impetuously to ruin.

16. The recent reception of great and astonishing mercies, which have profoundly moved our affections, is no proof that we will not soon fall into gross sin, vv. 13, 14.

17. Success in obtaining our desires, even though we may have prayed to God in the matter, is not of itself proof that we have either the divine approbation, or the divine blessing. The thing thus sought and obtained may soon prove a curse, vv. 14, 15. Henry: "What is asked in passion, is often given in wrath;" Dickson: "As lawful means are attended with God's blessing, so unlawful means are followed by God's curse."

18. A state of perfection in social, political, or ecclesiastical affairs in this life is absolutely impossible, so long as envy has its place in the human heart. In antiquity there is nothing so venerable; in law there is nothing so majestic; in eminent services there is nothing so praiseworthy; in sanctity of person and office there is nothing so sacred, as to form a shield against the shafts of envy, v. 16. Let the envious expect a terrible overthrow. Henry: "They are preparing ruin for themselves, who envy those whom God has put honor upon, and usurp the dignities they were never designed for."

19. No man can do a more dangerous thing than maliciously to slight one of God's own servants, vv. 16-18. The doctrine of strange and terrible judgments against the malicious contemners of God's chosen is as old as the days of Moses, Num. xvi. 29. Church history tells us it has its examples in all ages.

20. If there were no other evidence of the horrible nature of sin, than is found in the existence of idolatry, a right-minded man could not fail to see its gross and malignant character, vv. 19, 20, 28, 29, 36, 37, 38, 39. No man can commune with idolaters in their worship and be guiltless. Well do the Scriptures speak of abominable idolatries.

21. Whatever tends to strip God of his glory, or to bring the divine majesty into disesteem, should be most carefully eschewed, v. 20. We can never raise the sordid apprehensions of carnal men to spiritual truths by mechanical or artistic designs and works. Dickson: "Making images to represent God, or any of the persons of the holy trinity, is but a vilifying of the glory of God, and giving it to the image of a creature."

22. If Christians could be brought to entertain a just sense of the value and power of intercessory prayer, surely it would abound, v. 23. It is a terrible reproof against the lying prophets of Ezekiel's time: "Ye have not gone up into the gaps, neither made up the hedge for the house of Israel to stand in the battle in the day of the Lord," Ezek. xiii. 5. Compare Ex. xxxii. 9-14.

23. The distance of heavenly objects hinders them from making a due impression on us. Then too the evidence of their existence can be apprehended only by faith; and our faith is weak. On the very borders of Canaan and in sight of it, Israel despised that pleasant land, v. 24. The want of a spiritual relish for heavenly objects has immense power in repressing heavenly-mindedness.

24. If there were no other sin chargeable to mankind but that of murmuring against God, the whole world might justly be destroyed. Neither God nor his servants are able so to act as to silence complainers, v. 25.

25. It is a great mercy that God warns before he strikes, vv. 26, 27. Sin is very provoking; but God is very long-suffering.

26. Let men, who have no divine call duly attested from heaven, beware how they step out of one office into another, and especially how they seize the sword to execute wrath, vv. 30, 31. Horne: "The case of Phinehas is no precedent for uncommissioned zealots."

27. The best of men are but men at the best, vv. 32, 33. On this occasion Moses' character was weakest in the point where it was habitually strongest.

28. This case of Moses, (vv. 32, 33,) clearly shows that the strength of the temptation by no means excuses for the sin of yielding. The reason is that God always provides a way for escape, and that nothing whatever can possibly justify our sinning against him.

29. The same verses show that "we must answer not only for our own passions, but for the provocation which, by them, we give to the passions of others, especially of those, who, if not greatly provoked, would be meek and quiet."

30. On whatever errand God sends us, we must remember that to obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of lambs, v. 34.

31. It is impossible for men to be too careful in choosing their boon companions, their habitual associates, v. 35. Descent to a lower level of morals or moral sentiments is easy. Ascent to a higher level is difficult. Calvin: "Nothing is more dangerous than associating with the ungodly."

32. When we read of the heathen sacrificing their offspring to Moloch or Baalim, we are apt to think we never would have done so; "but how little is it considered that children brought up in the ways of ignorance, error, vanity, folly, and vice, are more effectually sacrificed to the great adversary of mankind?"

33. While eternity endures, good men will not be done celebrating the love and mercy of the Most High, vv. 43-46. Because he is full of kindness, he forgets not his counsel or his covenant, he restrains his anger and often opens the storehouse of his benignity.

34. If we are saved from any trouble, and especially from the power and guilt of sin, it is wholly by the Lord, v. 47.

35. Wherever we are, whatever we do or suffer, let us glorify God, v. 48. He is all and in all. Besides him there is no God and no Saviour.

36. Let us stir up ourselves and all our brethren as we have opportunity to praise and magnify the Most High.

PSALM CVII.

1 O give thanks unto the LORD, for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.

2 Let the redeemed of the LORD say so, whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy;

3 And gathered them out of the lands, from the east, and from the west, from the north, and from the south.

4 They wandered in the wilderness in a solitary way; they found no city to dwell in.

5 Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them.

6 Then they cried unto the LORD in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses.

7 And he led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation.

8 Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

9 For he satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness.

10 Such as sit in darkness and in the shadow of death being bound in affliction and iron;

11 Because they rebelled against the words of God, and contemned the counsel of the Most High:

12 Therefore he brought down their heart with labour; they fell down, and there was none to help.

13 Then they cried unto the LORD in their trouble, and he saved them out of their distresses.

14 He brought them out of darkness and the shadow of death, and brake their bands in sunder.

15 Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

16 For he hath broken the gates of brass, and cut the bars of iron in sunder.

17 Fools, because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted.

18 Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat; and they draw near unto the gates of death.

19 Then they cry unto the LORD in their trouble, and he saveth them out of their distresses.

20 He sent his word, and healed them, and delivered them from their destructions.

21 Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

- 22 And let them sacrifice the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and declare his works with rejoicing.
 23 They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters;
 24 These see the works of the LORD, and his wonders in the deep.
 25 For he commandeth, and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves thereof.
 26 They mount up to the heaven, they go down again to the depths: their soul is melted because of trouble.
 27 They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man, and are at their wits' end.
 28 Then they cry unto the LORD in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distresses.
 29 He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still.
 30 Then are they glad because they be quiet; so he bringeth them unto their desired haven.
 31 Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!
 32 Let them exalt him also in the congregation of the people, and praise him in the assembly of the elders.
 33 He turneth rivers into a wilderness, and the watersprings into dry ground;
 34 A fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein.
 35 He turneth the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into watersprings.
 36 And there he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habitation;
 37 And sow the fields, and plant vineyards, which may yield fruits of increase.
 38 He blesseth them also, so that they are multiplied greatly; and suffereth not their cattle to decrease.
 39 Again, they are minished and brought low through oppression, affliction, and sorrow.
 40 He poureth contempt upon princes, and causeth them to wander in the wilderness, where there is no way.
 41 Yet setteth he the poor on high from affliction, and maketh him families like a flock.
 42 The righteous shall see it, and rejoice: and all iniquity shall stop her mouth.
 43 Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the lovingkindness of the LORD.

THIS Psalm has no title. David has been generally esteemed its author, though Lowth, Clarke and others do not so hold. Scott dates it B. C. 1045; Clarke affixes no date, though he thinks it much later. Many regard it as specially related to Psalms ci.-cvi. As a composition this Psalm has very high merit. Dodd: "Some of the descriptions in this Psalm are remarkably elegant and sublime." Lowth: "It may undoubtedly be enumerated among the most elegant monuments of antiquity; and it is chiefly indebted for its elegance to the general plan and conduct of the poem." Clarke: "Had such an Idyl appeared in Theocritus or Virgil—or had it been found as a scene in any of the Greek Tragedians, even in Æschylus himself, it would have been praised up to the heavens, and probably been produced as their masterpiece." Concerning its scope and design there is considerable diversity. A careful perusal of the poem will satisfy the reader that this is not surprising. The Psalm is so rich, and embraces so great a variety of topics that it has something for almost every one. It embraces "travellers in the desert, who have lost their way, prisoners, sick people, mariners, husbandmen, even whole countries." This poem, like some of the wine-presses of which we read, bursts out with fatness. What experienced Christian has not found refreshment and encouragement from its teachings! In explaining this portion of Scripture, some propose very much to spiritualize it. It opens a wide field for such exercise of the imagination. The names of the Almighty here found are Jehovah LORD, El God and Gel Yohn Most High, on which see on Ps. i. 2; v. 4; vii. 17.

1. O give thanks unto the LORD, for he is good: for his mercy endureth forever. See on Ps. cvi. 1.

2. Let the redeemed of the Lord say so, i. e., let them say that his mercy endureth forever. We have the same in Ps. cxviii. 1. Everywhere the Scriptures discountenance noisy and vain religious talk. But they as distinctly commend and enjoin frank, open, heartfelt declarations of right views and sentiments concerning God. We must make proclamation of God's mercy. This is obligatory upon all, and especially upon them, Whom he hath redeemed from the hand of the enemy. On the two words rendered redeemed in this verse, see on Ps. xix. 14. Probably the prophet had in mind no particular temporal deliverance, but all such as might set forth the redemption of the soul. It varies not the sense whether we read enemy, or distress. See on Ps. iii. 1. The same word occurs in vv. 6, 13, 19, 28, and is rendered trouble. Alexander: "The redeemed of the Lord is a favorite expression of Isaiah (xxxv. 9, 10; lxii. 12; lxiii. 4)." Many great and striking deliverances from pressing and grievous dangers and troubles has God wrought for men, particularly for the descendants of Abraham.

3. And gathered them out of the lands, from the east, and from the west, from the north, and from the south. This cannot refer exclusively to redemption from Egypt or Babylon, but must allude to the many kind interpositions of God in saving the Israelites and perhaps others, in their extensive journeys and dispersions running through centuries. Or, it may refer to the spiritual redemption. Compare Isa. xlix. 12; Luke xiii. 29. Gathered, see on Ps. cvi. 47. The words designating the points of the compass in this verse are those usually employed for that purpose except the last, which is, literally from the sea. This must mean the Red sea, not the Mediterranean.

4. They wandered in the wilderness in a solitary way; they found no city to dwell in.

5. Hungry and thirsty, their soul fainted in them. This may have been partly fulfilled in the march from Egypt and from Babylon; but it probably has a chief reference to the long and wearisome journeys to which misfortune or trade led men. The wilderness may mean any wilderness, though there is no objection to making it include the great wilderness of Arabia. Solitary way, literally desert of way, signifying a desert that must be traversed. In that wilderness they found no city for an abode. Travellers in eastern deserts were liable to great sufferings for the want of both food and drink. Often has the famishing traveller felt himself ready to perish, when God has supplied his wants in a manner truly providential; perhaps in answer to special prayer:

6. Then they cried unto the LORD in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses. Cried, very earnestly called. Trouble, in v. 2, enemy. Delivered, as in Ps. vii. 1. Distresses, found also in vv. 13, 19, 28. In Job xv. 24, in the singular it is anguish. The distresses of long and perilous journeys must have been great. Those of the forty years' march have been elsewhere considered. But the exhaustion and suffering attending the progress of Eastern caravans were often frightful. If we give to these verses a spiritual sense borrowed from their literal meaning, we are at no loss for texts strikingly parallel. Compare Ps. lxxviii. 9, 10; lxxii. 12, 13; Isa. xli. 17; lxi. 1-3.

7. And he led them forth by the right way, that they might go to a city of habitation. Right way; Edwards, straight way; Alexander, straight course. The word rendered right is elsewhere rendered meet, upright, righteous, straight. It seems impossible to give it the sense of straight in this place, if there is anything more than a mere allusion to the march from Egypt, for the course of that journey was exceedingly circuitous. What we know of the march from Babylon inclines us to think that that course was not straight, Ezra viii. 21. But that God's dealings with his people in those and all other cases are righteous and in the end right in all respects cannot be doubted. The Syriac however spiritualizes the whole and says: "He led them in the way of truth." The city of habitation of which Israelites thought so much was Jerusalem, a type of the city that hath foundations. If we give it a spiritual sense then a reference to Isa. xxx. 21; xxxv. 8-10; xlviii. 17; lxiii. 12-14, would elucidate the meaning.

8. Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men! Would praise, the verb is in the future. It is the same rendered give thanks in v. 1. Calvin renders the verse: Let them praise the mercy of Jehovah in his presence, and his marvellous works in the presence of the sons of men; Hengstenberg: These should praise to the Lord his mercy, and his wonders to the children of men; Alexander: Let (such) give thanks to Jehovah (for) his mercy, and his wonderful works to the sons of men. The optative form is best. Goodness, mercy, kindness, favor, lovingkindness, v. 43. See on Ps. v. 7; li. 1. Wonderous works, see on Ps. ix. 1; xxvi. 7. These words occur again at vv. 15, 21, 31, and make what is fitly called the burden of the Psalm. Reasons have already been assigned in several preceding verses for grateful acknowledgment of God's goodness. They are thus summed up:

9. For he satisfieth the longing soul, and filleth the hungry soul with goodness. Satisfieth, the verb is in the preterite, has filled, i. e., the Lord has long and often supplied the wants of poor suffering travellers, and particularly of the Israelites in their journeys. The language of this verse goes far to indicate the allegorical and spiritual interpretation of the poem, Ps. xxxvi. 8; lxiii. 5; lxxv. 4; Jer. xxxi. 14.

10. Such as sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, being bound in affliction and iron. Here we have a new theme. We have been considering the case of travellers and pilgrims. Now the prophet says, Let us consider the case of captives and prisoners. It is full of distress. Darkness, uniformly rendered, used both literally and figuratively. See on Ps. xviii. 11, 28. On the shadow of death, see on Ps. xxiii. 4. We have the same phrase in v. 14. It designates a dismal condition. Such is the case of the prisoners of affliction and iron. Iron was the substance of which fetters, chains, bars and bolts were commonly made. The same word occurs in v. 16. How tenderly God cares for prisoners is often declared. See Ps. lxxix. 33; lxxix. 11; cii. 20; cxlvi. 7. Nor are God's compassions confined to such prisoners as are innocent of crime or free from sin, but extends to those who became prisoners,

11. Because they rebelled against the words of God, and contemned the counsel of the Most High. The verbs are well rendered. They express the highest kind of resistance and of despite. The names of the Almighty in this verse heighten our conceptions of the wickedness committed. They are El and Gel-yohn, the former expressive of infinite strength, the latter of infinite majesty. Because God is great, there is no little sin. These prisoners have sinned against the word and the counsel of God. They have either violated laws against the peace and well-being of society, and are criminals; or they have sinned against God's law of love, and he has let loose the malice of man upon them. In some way these men had highly offended God:

12. Therefore he brought down their heart with labour; they fell down, and there was none to help. Brought down, in Ps. lxxxix. 14, subdued; in Ps. cvi. 42, brought into subjection; in 1 Kings xxi. 29, humbled. Labour, elsewhere sorrow, misery, grievousness, travail, Ps. lv. 10; Job xi. 16; Isa. x. 1; liii. 11. The process of humiliation is often painful. The fruit of true humiliation is most delightful. The proud cannot enter into rest. Fell down, in Ps. xxvii. 2 and often, stumbled; in Ps. xxxi. 10, faileth; in Ps. cv. 37 and elsewhere, the participle is rendered feeble. Thorough humiliation prostrates men, and cuts off all hope of relief but from God only.

13. Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he saved them out of their distresses. Cried, as in Ps. xxii. 5. It occurs also in v. 19. Here and there it is in the future; but is fitly rendered in the preterite or present. In a more ancient form we had it in v. 6, and shall meet it in v. 28.

14. He brought them out of darkness and the shadow of death. Darkness and shadow of death, as in v. 10. Brought, the Hebrew is in the future, will bring. Alexander has brings. The verb expresses an act often performed by Jehovah. It occurs again in v. 28, and is rendered bringeth out. And brake their bands in sunder. Brake, like brought in the future, but narrating what God had done or commonly does. Bands, a noun of the same derivation as the word bound in v. 10. This too expresses the habitual conduct of God. Whoever is relieved from captivity or prison is indebted to the Almighty for his freedom.

15. Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men. See on v. 8.

16. For he hath broken the gates of brass, and cut the bars of iron in sunder. It was by God's power that Samson carried away the gates of Gaza, Judg. xvi. 3. It was Jehovah that rendered useless the brazen gates of Babylon, Isa. xlv. 2. The Lord, even Jehovah is the great Breaker of gates for his people to pass through, Micah ii. 13. Sometimes cities had two or three pairs of gates, and well secured by bars and bolts. But these are no defence against the Almighty, when he chooses to send his ministers on errands of either wrath or mercy. This verse excludes no class of captives or prisoners, whether they were such for crimes, or by cruelty, rapacity or false accusation. This part may have a beautiful allegorical interpretation, Isa. xlii. 7; lxi. 1; Zech. ix. 11, 12. Another subject is now introduced:

17. Fools, because of their transgression, and because of their iniquities, are afflicted. Fools, the word occurs nowhere else in the Psalms, though often elsewhere. Sinners act entirely without wisdom and contrary to it. Some have specified particular classes of transgressors supposed to be referred to in this place. But God may punish any transgression or iniquity with bodily disease, Num. xi. 33, 34; xii. 11-13; xxxviii. 1-8; 1 Cor. xi. 30-32. Transgressions, as in Ps. v. 10; sins, in Prov. x. 12; trespass, in 1 Sam. xxv. 28. The corresponding verb is rendered rebelled, revolted. Iniquities, as in Ps. xviii. 23, uniformly rendered. Are afflicted, better rendered afflict themselves. Alexander: "The reflexive meaning of the verb is essential and cannot be diluted into a mere passive, without weakening the whole sentence, the very point of which consists in making them the guilty authors of their own distresses."

18. Their soul abhorreth all manner of meat. Compare Job xxxiii. 20. "When the stomach is gone, the life is as good as gone." As in a moment the Almighty can make the most dainty food utterly loathsome, by simply withdrawing his hand which gives us health. The want of nourishment from food soon produces emaciation and faintness in men; and they draw near unto the gates of death. Gates of death, see on Ps. ix. 13; equivalent to drawing nigh unto the grave in Ps. lxxxviii. 3; Job xxxiii. 22. Sometimes such distress brings men to the throne of grace.

19. Then they cry unto the LORD in their trouble, and he saveth them out of their distresses. See on vv. 6, 13, where we have the same words without important variations. Compare Ps. xxx. 2, 10.

20. He sent his word and healed them. Compare Ps. iii. 3, 4; xxx. 3. A very small amount of intelligence would satisfy a good man that a recovery from any of the sore distempers which afflict our bodies must be attributed to the power and mercy of God. It is as easy for the Most High to remove as to bring on a disease. In either case he does it by a word, Ps. xxxiii. 9. His healing was effectual, and [he] delivered them from their destructions. Any disease would soon bring death but for the infinite skill of the Great Physician. There is therefore great beauty in the plural, destructions. Like Paul's phrase, "In deaths oft," it shows how imminent and numerous our perils are. Destructions, in Lam. iv. 20, pits, as if pits were yawning for us on every side.

21. Oh that men would praise the LORD for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men. See on v. 8.

22. And let them sacrifice the sacrifices of thanksgiving, and declare his works with rejoicing. Alexander: "They must not only utter thanks, but offer them in sacrifice. They must not only offer them in sacrifice, but sing them." On the first clause see on Ps. l. 14. Rejoicing, in Ps. xvii. 1, cry; in Ps. xxx. 5, joy; in Ps. xlvii. 1, triumph; in Isa. xiv. 7, singing. It expresses glad and exultant joy. God's works are his deeds, operations; so also in v. 24. This closes the third picture. It may be used allegorically, as sin is often spoken of as a sickness, and God as the Physician.

23. They that go down to the sea in ships, that do business in great waters.

24. These see the works of the LORD, and his wonders in the deep. Sea, great waters, deep, usually so rendered, and all meaning navigable waters larger than rivers or estuaries. Ships, as in Ps. civ. 26, always so rendered. Business, so in many places, Gen. xxxix. 11; 1 Chron. xxvi. 29, 30; 2 Chron. xvii. 13; Neh. xiii. 30; Est. iii. 9; Pr. xxii. 29; Dan. viii. 27. Works of the LORD, as in v. 22. Wonders, in vv. 8, 15, 21, 31, rendered wonderful works; in Ps. ix. 1, marvellous works. Pool: "Wonderful works, either, 1. Of creation, fishes of various kinds and shapes, and some of prodigious greatness, which are unknown to other men. Or, 2. Of providence in raising and laying storms, of which he speaks in the following verses." The latter is probably the leading idea:

25. For he commandeth, and raiseth the stormy wind, which lifteth up the waves thereof. How mighty is Jehovah. He commandeth, literally says, and at once comes the stormy wind, literally the wind of tempest. The air is far thinner and lighter than water; yet it has, at God's will, power to lash the ocean into a fury, and lift up its waves to a fearful height.

26. They mount up to the heaven, they go down again to the depths: their soul is melted because of trouble. Kimchi: "The men of the ship go up to heaven, i. e., rise high in the air when the wave lifteth up the ship, and afterwards, because of the wave they descend to the deep; and from thus ascending and descending, the soul of the men of the ship melteth within them on account of the danger in which they are placed." Calvin: Their soul breaketh by reason of trouble; Edwards: Their souls melt with fear; Alexander: Their soul with evil dissolves itself. The word rendered trouble is not the same as that in vv. 6, 13, 19, 28, but that rendered evil in Ps. v. 4; vii. 4; in v. 39, affliction.

27. They reel to and fro, and stagger like a drunken man. The words and the imagery are both just and plain. And are at their wit's end. Calvin: And all their senses are overwhelmed; Horsley: And all their skill is drowned; Alexander: And all their wisdom is confounded; margin and Jebb: And all their wisdom is swallowed up; Phillips: "Their alarm is so great, that their knowledge deserts them; they lose all self-possession, and become entirely unfit for managing a ship."

28. Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble, and he bringeth them out of their distresses. Trouble, as in vv. 6, 13, 19. Bringeth out, in v. 14, brought out.

29. He maketh the storm a calm, so that the waves thereof are still. Terrific as is the sea in a tempest, there is a God presiding over it. He can at will calm its agitations. The whole verse is well rendered, and in idiomatic English.

30. Then are they glad because they be quiet; so he bringeth them unto their desired haven. Be quiet, in Jonah i. 11, 12, shall be calm. We are never so glad of a calm as just after a terrific storm. Haven, here only. Desired haven, literally haven of delight. In Ps. i. 2; xvi. 3, the same word is rendered delight.

31. Oh that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works to the children of men!

32. Let them exalt him also in the congregation of the people, and praise him in the assembly of the elders. Exalt, praise; the word from which the Psalter gets its name. Congregation, see on Ps. xxii. 22. Assembly, in Ps. i. 1, seat; in vv. 7, 36, habitation. The verb from which it is derived occurs in vv. 10, 34, sit and dwell. Elders, commonly so rendered; sometimes ancients, old men; in Ps. cv. 22, senators. Some have thought that in the language of this verse there was an allusion to the synagogue service. Possibly there may be. This part of the Psalm also may have a spiritual meaning of great force and beauty. Often in Scripture are troubles of mind compared to agitated waters, Ps. lxxix. 1. See Henry Kirke White's hymn beginning:

"Once on the raging seas I rode."

33. He turneth rivers into a wilderness, and the watersprings into dry ground. God is the father of the rain. If he withholds that refreshment for a long time, all nature droops, and every green thing dies. The imagery is drawn from Palestine, where there were but two annual rainy seasons, and if either of them was long deferred, the effect was frightful. The channels of considerable rivers were dried up. Wilderness, or desert, as in vv. 4, 35. Some have supposed that in these verses we are to understand a great revolution of some kind, and refer to Isa. xlv. 27; Jer. l. 38; li. 36. But in each of those places a literal interpretation is best.

34. A fruitful land into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein. Such an evil as a consuming drought does not come without the ordering of God, Amos iii. 6. Nor do such evils ever come but on account of God's displeasure for men's sins. Fruitful land, literally, the land of fruit. Barrenness is better than saltiness, because to all it gives the sense, though a salt land is sterile; see Jer. xvii. 6; Job xxxix. 6, where we read salt land and barren land. Pliny: "Every place, where salt is found, is sterile, and produces nothing." There may be an allusion to the destruction of the cities of the plain, and to the threatened curse. Compare Gen. xiii. 10; xix. 25; Deut. xxix. 23. But goodness triumphs over severity; and lands, which had become sterile, are by God's bounty again made productive:

35. He turneth the wilderness into a standing water, and dry ground into watersprings. We have the same words and phrases in v. 33, but in reverse order, only here we have a standing water, pond, or pool, (see Ex. vii. 19; viii. 5; Isa. xiv. 23,) instead of rivers in v. 33. This verse had a literal fulfilment, when at proper seasons Jehovah filled the ponds and pools of Judea with rain for drink, for irrigation, and for fish, Isa. xix. 10. But it seems impossible to avoid the belief that it had a higher import, a spiritual meaning, if we read the parallel passages, Ps. cxiv. 8; Isa. xxxv. 7; xli. 18; xliii. 20; xlv. 3, 4, 5. As the plain of Sodom has remained sterile ever since the overthrow of its cities, it is evident that in the preceding verse, there could have been no more than an allusion to its destruction. For this verse speaks of returning fruitfulness.

36. And there he maketh the hungry to dwell, that they may prepare a city for habitation. Hungry, or hungerbitten, (Job xviii. 12,) describes "poor people, who could not provide for themselves, or were banished from their own land by potent oppressors, and were driven into wildernesses," see Job xxx. 3. A city for habitation, the same as city to dwell in, v. 4; any city. In the east, walled towns for protection against wild beasts and predatory bands were first built; afterwards the people went forth to cultivate the soil:

37. And sow the fields, and plant vineyards, which may yield fruits of increase. Fruits, the plural of the word rendered fruitful, in v. 34. Increase, often rendered fruit, and in the plural, fruits, revenues. The form of expression is strictly Hebraistic, but expressive of the value and productiveness of fields which the Lord had blessed.

38. He blesseth them also, so that they are multiplied greatly. We have already seen in Psalm cv. how easy it is for God to multiply a people, and out of a few to make a strong nation. The laws of increase under his abundant blessing bring about prodigious results. Compare Gen. xii. 2; xvii. 16, 20; Deut. xxviii. 4, 11; Jer. xxx. 19; Ezek. xxxvii. 26. The increase is of all that can make a people powerful. And suffereth not their cattle to decrease. Cattle, all useful domestic animals. Under the divine blessing the laws of increase are as applicable to one kind of growth as another. Perhaps no more animating prospect is ever presented to the eye than when one passes through a fertile region under high culture, where formerly all was sterility or a wilderness. But a prosperous people often provoke God with their sins; and their prosperity is cut short:

39. Again, they are minished and brought low through oppression, affliction and sorrow. Minished, an old form of diminished. Brought low, elsewhere bowed down, humbled, cast down, Ps. x. 10; xxxv. 14; xlii. 5. The meaning is their prosperity all vanishes, and their hearts sink within them through oppression; in Isa. liii. 8, rendered prison; from a verb that signifies to shut up, Deut. xi. 17, to detain, Judges xiii. 15. To this is added affliction, in v. 26, rendered trouble. It expresses general wretchedness, Num. xi. 15. Such things crush the heart with sorrow, a word uniformly rendered. Nor are such calamities confined to the abject poor, but reach the head men:

40. He poureth contempt upon princes, and causeth them to wander in the wilderness, where there is no way. The language is probably taken from Job xii. 21, 24. The mightiest men are not beyond the reach of divine judgments, Acts xii. 23; Rev. xix. 18. The Most High ruleth in the kingdoms of men, Dan. iv. 17, 25, 32. God does not hate princes as such, for he blesses them greatly. He afflicts them only because they provoke him by their sins. Behold David himself a fugitive, going out of Jerusalem, he knew not whither, and one of the meanest people cursing him, and all for his sins against God, 2 Sam. xvi. 5-13.

41. Yet setteth he the poor on high from affliction, and maketh him families like a flock. Poor, see on Ps. ix. 18, where it is rendered needy. It describes such as have no earthly helper or resources. Instead of from affliction, the margin reads after affliction. God is continually teaching lessons of humility to the proud, and of encouragement to the lowly; oftentimes giving to the humble large families of children, who are a defence, and raising them from an ignoble to a respectable condition. Such changes often beget despondency in some and envy in others. Every generation has its invidious terms for those whom God has raised up. The haughty Roman said, Novus homo; the haughty Frenchman says, parvenu; the haughty American, upstart. But good men will learn lessons from all these changes.

42. The righteous shall see it and rejoice. Compare Job xxii. 19; Ps. lii. 6; lviii. 10. And all iniquity shall stop her mouth. Compare Job v. 16, from which the phrase is perhaps taken, Ps. lxiii. 11; Rom. iii. 19. It is a great thing when Divine Providence so orders human affairs as to silence the boastings, revilings and blasphemies of ungodly men. It is not certain whether the prophet intends here to describe the effect of things stated in vv. 40, 41, and no more, or of the wonderful providences delineated in the great body of the Psalm. The latter is probable:

43. Whoso is wise, and will observe these things, even they shall understand the loving-kindness of the LORD. Compare Ps. lxiv. 9; Isa. v. 12; Jer. ix. 12; Hos. xiv. 9. He that will not open his eyes cannot see. He that will not think cannot become wise. Every thing in nature, in providence, and in Scripture has its lessons, but they are lost upon the unobservant. Lovingkindness, in the plural, rendered mercy in v. 1, and goodness in vv. 8, 15, 21, 31. The change of the singular into the plural is not uncommon.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. If we may judge of the importance of a duty, or of the reluctance of the human heart to perform it, by the frequency with which it is enjoined, then praise and thanksgiving are of this class, vv. 1, 8, 15, 21, 31. Every class and condition of men are daily called to this work, Ps. cxlv. 9.

2. But while this duty is obligatory upon all it is specially incumbent upon "the redeemed of the Lord," v. 2. One spiritual mercy is worth more than all temporal blessings. If the redeemed remain silent, surely God will fail of his chief glory from earth.

3. The mercies of God to strangers are truly great, and if all the world would honestly tell what God has done for them as travellers and exiles, the earth would resound with his praise, vv. 3-7. Every prosperous journey is by the will of God, Rom. i. 10. Henry: "We ought to take notice of the good hand of God's providence over us in our journeys, going out, and coming in, directing us in our way, and providing for us places, both to bait in, and rest in."

4. Prayer is necessary to every class of men. The marvel is that any attempt to live without it, vv. 6, 13, 19, 28. Travellers, prisoners, the sick, sailors, all classes at home and abroad are encouraged to pour the tale of their grief into the ear of the Almighty. Though God is not bound by covenant to hear prayers not offered in faith, yet he has never said that he would not hear the cry of distress. He hears the young ravens; and are not men of more value than many ravens? He has many a time heard the call of wretchedness, even when misery was the fruit of guilt.

5. The providence of God over every people in their early settlement has been marked with striking and amazing mercies, v. 7. If the annals of any people had been written by the pen of inspiration, they would have been as marvellous as any tradition represents them.

6. If home, even in prospect, is sweet to the weary traveller, how much more sweet ought the prospect of heaven to be to pilgrims on their Zion way, v. 7. Blessed be God, there is a home for the saints, just such as they long for, Rev. vii. 16, 17. They look for a city that hath foundations, whose Maker and Builder is God. It is a continuing city, the New Jerusalem.

7. If God is so good and so bountiful, as Scripture and providence declare him to be, (vv. 8, 9); why do not all men come to him, and put their trust in him? His works are mighty, marvellous, merciful. All have abundant evidence of the divine goodness. The withholding of affectionate confidence from God is an act of superlative wickedness, the offspring of hateful unbelief.

8. Would you be godlike? Care for travellers and strangers, vv. 6-9. Use hospitality without grudging. In entertaining strangers some have entertained angels unawares, 1 Tim. iii. 2; Titus i. 8; Heb. xiii. 2; 1 Pet. iv. 9.

9. No man has ever gauged the depth of human misery found among captives and prisoners. Poor things! they sit in darkness, and in the shadow of death, bound in affliction and iron, v. 10. Human wickedness has an awful habit of expressing its malice towards prisoners. Yet among such are some wholly innocent of crime. For such there ought to be some intercessor. The trials of prisoners ought not to be needlessly deferred. It was a part of the dreadful character of one whom God abhorred that he opened not the house of his prisoners, Isa. xiv. 17. Delays in judicial trials are sometimes necessary in order to reach the ends of justice. But one day's needless delay is cruelty. All the world praises Howard; why then has he so few imitators? Pity captives and be kind to prisoners.

10. It is an idle plea which some in Christian countries have set up for the heathen, that they do not intelligently sin against God, v. 11. For 1, they have the law of nature written upon their hearts, Rom. ii. 15; 2, God has often sent them teachers, and sometimes even prophets, Jonah iii. 2-5; 3, the fame of the word of God among his people has often spread far and wide, Rom. x. 18; so that beyond a doubt they are without excuse, Rom. i. 20.

11. Sin must be very provoking and very hard to cure, when the Almighty sees it necessary to bring down the hearts of men with so sore travail as comes upon vast numbers, v. 12.

12. If in his kind providence the Lord has granted us freedom from prison and captivity, and allowed us to go at large in pursuit of an honest calling, to him be all the praise. He alone saves us from darkness and the shadow of death, and breaks our bands asunder, v. 14.

13. Have you been a prisoner? Have you looked through the horrid grating, or over the prison fence, and has God set you at large? then give him the glory. Many a good man has been loaded with chains, and God has afterwards raised him to honor and power, v. 16. Who would not be willing, upon due reflection, to endure all that Paul, Alleine, or Bunyan suffered in prison, if he might have the blessed experience, which in their writings they reveal?

14. Sinners are fools, v. 17. There is a marvellous infatuation in all wrong-doing. Dickson: "Sin blindeth sinners, and bereaveth them of the right use of their reason, and maketh them choose trifles, with the loss of what should be most precious."

15. If, even in this world, sin is so terribly punished as we sometimes see it is (vv. 17, 18); what must it not be to fall into the hands of the living God? What pangs, what terrors, what sighs and cries: and still worse, what awful forebodings do men often experience in this life? But this is a dispensation of mercy, and not of wrath. And yet, so 'great is the stupidity of a sleeping conscience' that even then it is not awakened; and it seems sometimes as if nothing would awake men but the flames of the fire that is never quenched, Luke xvi. 23.

16. If we would duly consider our sins and dangers, instead of wondering that men die so soon, we should marvel that they live so long; for there are destructions at every step. By even one rash act, a man brings upon himself and entails upon his posterity wretchedness, which makes life a burden. Wherefore then should a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sins? All this is not hell.

17. Would you be like God? Care for the sick, v. 20. Relieve their wants. Soothe their sorrows. Remember that you may be sick yourself and need the help which you now deny to others.

18. Let us in all things follow the worship which God prescribes, and never make our large liberty a cloak for irreligion; and especially, let us not forget that 'moral and spiritual service is more acceptable to God than any ceremonial performance; the sacrifice of thanks is more than the sacrifice of an ox,' v. 22.

19. Every department of life has its lessons, trials and mercies. To this remark the mariner is no exception, for he sees God's wonders in the deep, vv. 23-30.

20. If the sailor can do nothing so wise, and oftentimes indeed can do nothing else than trust in the Lord, so is it with us in the storms of life, v. 29. Like the mariner, we must use lawful means for our protection; but what are means without the divine blessing?

21. If the desired haven is so pleasant to the tempest-tossed mariner, how sweet will heaven itself be to the poor soul, over which all God's waves and billows have passed!

22. It is not an unmeaning or an uncalled for custom to give thanks in public assemblies for a safe deliverance from the perils of the sea, v. 32. We have a few good hymns for such occasions. That of Addison beginning:

"Think, O my soul! devoutly think,"

has long been admired.

23. When we consider how many parts of the earth which once were famous for fertility, thrift and civilization, are now smitten with sterility, we ought to be deeply impressed with the terribleness of the divine displeasure, vv. 33, 34. Surely God must have a controversy with men. Henry: "If the land be bad, it is because the inhabitants are so."

24. The goodness of God in giving food and drink to such vast numbers of men and other living creatures as are found on the earth is worthy of perpetual celebration, vv. 35, 36. If the Lord provides, is it not as little as we should do to make humble and thankful acknowledgment of his kindness?

25. It is a great mercy that so large a portion of mankind are allowed to be employed in the cheerful and healthful pursuits of agriculture, vv. 37, 38. And it is another proof of the deep depravity of men engaged in such pursuits that they so often neglect to give God the praise which is his due. There is not a grain that grows, or a fruit that ripens, but it declares the divine goodness in a manner that has more than once convinced an atheist and confounded a skeptic. Where is God's honor? Where is his praise? Answer, O ye husbandmen!

26. God's blessing makes rich, and adds no sorrow. God's anger makes poor and strips us of comfort, vv. 38, 39. "The fertility of land is not to be attributed to men's industry, but to God." God hates pride and will bring down arrogance.

27. Oppression of every kind, affliction in every form, and sorrows of every degree, are no new things upon earth, v. 39. Because of sins, the wrath of God cometh on the children of disobedience.

28. Let not the mighty man glory in his might, v. 40. Dickson: "Kings and rulers keep not their place, power and estimation among men, but by God's investing them with dignity. . . It is God who giveth wisdom and prudence to men for ruling states; and when their wit is employed for their own earthly interest, he can take their wisdom from them, and give them a cup of giddy wine."

29. Let not the poor despair. God is their friend, v. 41. Compare 1 Sam. ii. 8. Blessed be God, he pursueth not his creatures that he may destroy them, but that he may humble them.

30. Like many other Scriptures, this Psalm calls us to the study of providence. It is God that gives peace, wholesome air, a good climate, seasonable showers; and that for their sins sends on men sore calamities. His kingdom ruleth over all. Not chance, but the Almighty governs the world. Blessed is he who sees God in history and in nature as well as in revelation. Let us hold fast the truth on this doctrine so fundamental to right thinking, sound theology, solid peace, a holy life and a happy death.

31. All true joy must have its rise in the lovingkindness of Jehovah, v. 43. It needs no other source. It has no other.

PSALM CVIII.

A Song or Psalm of David.

- 1 O God, my heart is fixed; I will sing and give praise, even with my glory.
- 2 Awake, psaltery and harp: I myself will awake early.
- 3 I will praise thee, O LORD, among the people: and I will sing praises unto thee among the nations.
- 4 For thy mercy is great above the heavens: and thy truth reacheth unto the clouds.
- 5 Be thou exalted, O God, above the heavens: and thy glory above all the earth;
- 6 That thy beloved may be delivered: save with thy right hand, and answer me.
- 7 God hath spoken in his holiness; I will rejoice, I will divide Shechem, and mete out the valley of Succoth.
- 8 Gilead is mine; Manasseh is mine; Ephraim also is the strength of mine head; Judah is my lawgiver;
- 9 Moab is my washpot; over Edom will I cast out my shoe; over Philistia will I triumph.
- 10 Who will bring me into the strong city? who will lead me into Edom?
- 11 Wilt not thou, O God, who hast cast us off? and wilt not thou, O God, go forth with our hosts?
- 12 Give us help from trouble: for vain is the help of man.
- 13 Through God we shall do valiantly: for he it is that shall tread down our enemies.

ON the title see on title of Psalms iii. xxx. David certainly wrote this Psalm. The first five verses are taken from Ps. lvii.; the last eight, from Ps. lx. In this the variations from the originals are slight, and have perhaps been sufficiently noticed. The chief difference between this Psalm and the two, from which it is taken, is that this omits their sad and despondent parts, and contains such selections from them as express gratitude, hope and confidence. Luther is persuaded that portions of this Psalm refer to the setting up of the kingdom of Christ in all nations. David's throne has perpetuity in no other way. The example of David in making one Psalm out of two suggests the propriety of our combining different portions of God's word for our own use and edification, according to the circumstances, in which we may be placed. Such an exercise would make us familiar with Scripture, and show us the variety of excellent uses to which it may be applied.

PSALM CIX.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

- 1 Hold not thy peace, O God of my praise;
- 2 For the mouth of the wicked and the mouth of the deceitful are opened against me: they have spoken against me with a lying tongue.
- 3 They compassed me about also with words of hatred; and fought against me without a cause.
- 4 For my love they are my adversaries: but I give myself unto prayer.
- 5 And they have rewarded me evil for good, and hatred for my love.
- 6 Set thou a wicked man over him: and let Satan stand at his right hand.
- 7 When he shall be judged, let him be condemned: and let his prayer become sin.
- 8 Let his days be few; and let another take his office.
- 9 Let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow.
- 10 Let his children be continually vagabonds, and beg: let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places.

11 Let the extortioner catch all that he hath; let the strangers spoil his labour.

12 Let there be none to extend mercy unto him: neither let there be any to favour his fatherless children.

13 Let his posterity be cut off; and in the generation following let their name be blotted out.

14 Let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered with the LORD; and let not the sin of his mother be blotted out.

15 Let them be before the LORD continually, that he may cut off the memory of them from the earth.

16 Because that he remembered not to shew mercy, but persecuted the poor and needy man, that he might even slay the broken in heart.

17 As he loved cursing, so let it come unto him: as he delighted not in blessing, so let it be far from him.

18 As he clothed himself with cursing like as with his garment, so let it come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones.

19 Let it be unto him as the garment which covereth him, and for a girdle wherewith he is girded continually.

20 Let this be the reward of mine adversaries from the LORD, and of them that speak evil against my soul.

21 But do thou for me, O GOD the Lord, for thy name's sake: because thy mercy is good, deliver thou me.

22 For I am poor and needy, and my heart is wounded within me.

23 I am gone like the shadow when it declineth: I am tossed up and down as the locust.

24 My knees are weak through fasting; and my flesh faileth of fatness.

25 I became also a reproach unto them: when they looked upon me they shook their heads.

26 Help me, O LORD my God: O save me according to thy mercy:

27 That they may know that this is thy hand; that thou, LORD, hast done it.

28 Let them curse, but bless thou: when they arise, let them be ashamed; but let thy servant rejoice.

29 Let mine adversaries be clothed with shame; and let them cover themselves with their own confusion, as with a mantle.

30 I will greatly praise the LORD with my mouth; yea, I will praise him among the multitude.

31 For he shall stand at the right hand of the poor, to save him from those that condemn his soul.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. The title, general consent and inspiration (Acts i. 16) ascribe this ode to David. If it had any historic occasion it is not certain what it was. Some find its origin in the persecutions of Saul urged on by Doeg. Others think it has special reference to the rebellion of Absalom, and the treachery of Ahithophel. Saul's treatment of David was very wicked, and much evil, like that here denounced, came upon him. Nor can it be denied that David received base injuries from Ahithophel, and that the end of that wily statesman was not unlike that of Judas Iscariot. If it should be conceded that the primary reference of this poem is to be sought in one of these historic events, that would not forbid us to seek its secondary and complete fulfilment in Christ, of whom David was an acknowledged type, and in Judas, whose crime was so heinous, and his end so dreadful. But why may we not regard it as wholly prophetic, borrowing perhaps its imagery from the history of David and of his enemies? This mode of explanation is simple, natural, free from unanswerable objections, and has been formally adopted in whole or in part by many. The Syriac: "This is a Psalm of David, when without his knowledge the people made Absalom king; and on that account he was slain. But to us he expounds the sufferings of the Christ of God." Some, indeed, apply parts of the Psalm to others than Judas, and include the enemies and murderers of our Lord generally, as representing the Jewish nation. Chrysostom, Jerome, Theodoret and Augustine think it was fulfilled in Christ and in Judas and his associates. Luther: "This Psalm may be very properly considered as used in the person of Christ, deeply complaining against his betrayers the Jews." Calvin: "Although David here complains of the injuries which he sustained, yet, as he was a typical character, everything that is expressed in the Psalm must properly be applied to Christ the head of the church, and to all the faithful, inasmuch as they are his members." Henry: "It is certain that in penning this Psalm David had an eye to Christ, his sufferings, and his persecutors." This view is supported by Gill, Pool, Horne, Hengstenberg and others. Nor are such guided by fancy. We have the authority of an inspired apostle: "In those days Peter stood up in the midst of the disciples, and said, (the number of the names together were about an hundred and twenty,) Men and brethren, this scripture must needs have been fulfilled, which the Holy Ghost by the mouth of David spake concerning Judas, which was guide to them that took Jesus. For he was numbered with us, and had obtained part of this ministry. Now this man purchased a field with the reward of iniquity; and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out. And it was known to all the dwellers at Jerusalem; insomuch as that field is called in their proper tongue, Aceldama, that is to say, The field of blood. For it is written in the book of Psalms, Let his habitation be desolate, and let no man dwell therein; and his bishoprick let another take," Acts i. 15-20. This testimony of the inspired apostle settles three points: 1. David wrote this Psalm; 2. This Psalm is not the expression of private pique or of personal dislike; but its author is the Holy Ghost, who merely used David as an instrument of sending it forth; 3. It is a prophecy respecting Judas and has its fulfilment in him. And as we know nothing of Judas except in connection with our Lord, this prophecy necessarily includes our Saviour. If these views are sound, it is not necessary to consider at length several suggestions made by different writers quite at variance with what has been stated. One of the strong features of this poem is the variety and terribleness of curses it denounces. See Introduction, § 6. These curses, says Dodd, "in reality are mere prophetic denunciations." Scott dates the Psalm B. C. 1021; Clarke, B. C. 1023. The names of the Most High here found are Elohim God, Jehovah LORD and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2; ii. 4.

1. Hold not thy peace, O God of my praise. Hold peace, elsewhere be silent, keep silence, be still, or be deaf. See on Ps. xxviii. 1; xxxv. 22. Compare Isa. xlii. 14; Mic. vii. 16. The meaning is, Do not slight me, nor neglect me; pity me, hear me, deliver me. God of my praise. Some have proposed to read, Be not silent of my praise, O God. Calvin gathers from it, that the suppliant calls on God to set forth the innocence of the sufferer. But this is implied without altering the English translation. God of my praise means God, whom I am bound to praise, who deserves my praise, who is the author and object and substance of my praise, God whom I love to praise, and whom I am in the habit of praising.

2. For the mouth of the wicked and the mouth of the deceitful are opened against me. they have spoken against me with a lying tongue. As the word rendered are opened is active, some propose to supply my enemies have opened. The margin suggests a better solution and reads have opened themselves. Mouth of the deceitful, literally mouth of deceit. How fearfully this whole verse was fulfilled in the history of our Lord is shown by each of the evangelists. But as the Psalm chiefly relates to events occurring about the time of his death, its awful import is historically recorded in Matt. xxvi. 59-61; Mark xiv. 55-59. So illegal and unreliable was the testimony against Jesus, that the judge, who sat on his trial, repeatedly pronounced him innocent, and finally washed his hands saying, "I am innocent of the blood of this just person."

3. They compassed me about also with words of hatred. Compassed about, elsewhere besieged, Ecc. ix. 14; walk about, Ps. xlviii. 12; environ, Josh. vii. 9. See on Ps. vii. 7; xxvi. 6. Hatred, uniformly rendered. It expresses malice. This was expressed by more than mere words. And fought against me without a cause. Fought, as in

Ps. xxxv. 1; lvi. 1, elsewhere warred, 1 Kings xiv. 19; xxii. 45. It expresses acts of deadly hostility. Christ's enemies never rested till they got his blood. All such treatment of him was injurious, without cause, elsewhere rendered for nothing.

4. For my love they are my adversaries. How amazingly this was fulfilled in Christ. "Christ's love to man was daily manifested by his miraculously healing all the infirmities of the body, which was returned by man's hatred of him, as displayed in his general conduct." Never was exhibited such beneficence on the one side, and such malignity on the other. But I give myself unto prayer. The Hebrew is very elliptical; but the common rendering gives the sense. His enemies blasphemed; he prayed. They hunted him; he fled to the throne of grace. Such was our Saviour's distress, that the weariness of the day was yet followed by the watchfulness of the night spent in prayer.

5. And they have rewarded me evil for good, and hatred for my love. Hatred, as in v. 3. Love, as in v. 4. It expresses sincere and pure friendship. To render evil for evil is vindictive. To render evil for good is fiendish. To Christ men had no opportunity of doing the former; in the latter they abounded.

6. Set thou a wicked man over him: and let Satan stand at his right hand. In no one does there seem to be so fearful an accomplishment of this and the fourteen following verses as in Judas. Instead of wicked man, we may read the wicked One. In the Hebrew there is nothing for man. Thus we make the two clauses parallel. Before Judas offered to betray his master he was a devil, (diabolos) John vi. 70. For a long time he had much to do with the father of lies. About the time of the betrayal in an awful manner "Satan entered into him," John xiii. 27. The word Satan means an accuser, or adversary. He is the arch enemy of God and of man. He opposes all goodness. To Old Testament writers he was well known, Gen. iii. 1; 1 Chron. xxi. 1; Job i. 6; ii. 1; Zech. iii. 1, 2. Satan was over Judas as a tyrant hurrying him on to ruin, making him bold in sin, and desperate after it. Though the first verb of this verse is in the imperative, yet the second is in the future, as are also nearly all the verbs in vv. 7-20. Whatever the form, the words are clearly prophetic, and not at all expressive of personal malice.

7. When he shall be judged, let him be condemned. After his great sin Judas was tried at the bar of his own conscience, and found guilty. He submitted his case to the chief priests and elders; and they coolly admitted his guilt. Men have arisen, denying the existence of God, the divinity of Christ, and the truth of the Scriptures; yet earth has never seen the man who ventured a formal defence of Judas Iscariot. Nor can we doubt the judgment of God in his case. Heaven and earth, his own conscience and even Satan himself condemn him. And let his prayer become sin. See on Ps. lxvi. 18. Compare Pr. i. 28; xxviii. 9; Isa. i. 15. All the prayers of Judas but made him the more guilty, because they were all hypocritical.

8. Let his days be few. We do not know how long Judas lived after Christ was condemned. He may have died on the day of the crucifixion, or he may have lived a few days. But all agree that his course was short, as this clause predicts it should be. And let another take his office. Office, sometimes rendered charge, Ezek. ix. 1; xlv. 11; oftener, office. The Septuagint and the versions which follow it, for office have bishoprick, or superintendence. Peter quotes that version in Acts i. How is it possible to explain this verse and some that follow it unless we admit that the prophet is speaking of a real person? Ideal people do not hold offices, nor have they wives or children.

9. Let his children be fatherless, and his wife a widow. Scott: "Probably he left a widow and fatherless children, on whom infamy and distress were entailed, in the righteous providence of God, till the family was extinct; and thus the sins of his progenitors, which he imitated, but far exceeded, were visited upon him and his descendants, in a remarkable manner." The verb of this verse is also in the future. But the family of Judas did not at once become extinct.

10. Let his children be continually vagabonds, and beg: let them seek their bread also out of their desolate places. Vagabonds; in Ps. lix. 15, wander up and down; in Gen. iv. 12, 14, a fugitive; literally, wandering let his children wander. One form of the verb has the force of continually. This terrible vagrancy was to lead them to desolate places, desolations, deserts or wastes, Ezra ix. 9; Ps. cii. 6; Isa. lxi. 4. The history of the family of Judas Iscariot has never been written. Its annals would doubtless be appalling. The strong presumption is that he trained his offspring to deceit and theft. Compare Ex. xx. 5; Deut. v. 9. Ill gotten gains do not stay by us, neither do they bless us or our children.

11. Let the extortioner catch all that he hath. Extortioner, in Ex. xxii. 25, usurer; in 2 Kings iv. 1, creditor. The word describes a hard exacting wretch, whose cupidity has driven all tenderness from his bosom, and made him crafty, so that he catches, takes with a snare all he can get. The same word is rendered snared in Ps. ix. 16. And let the strangers spoil his labor. Strangers, not his own family. Spoil, gather, take for a prey, as the word is elsewhere rendered. Labor, i. e., the fruit of labor.

12. Let there be none to extend mercy unto him. Mercy, kindness, lovingkindness. There was no person to pity him. His accomplices cast him off. They despised his baseness. They showed him no sympathy: "What is that to us? see thou to that." Neither let there be any to favor his fatherless children. He showed no mercy; and he received none. And his children loved his evil ways, and none was gracious to them.

13. Let his posterity be cut off; and in the generation following let their name be blotted out. Posterity, so rendered also in Dan. xi. 4; Am. iv. 2; in Ezek. xxiii. 25, remnant and residue. That these terrible predictions were fulfilled, who can doubt?

14. Let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered with the LORD; and let not the sin of his mother be blotted out. This may be a prediction that the guilt of original sin shall not be forgiven to this betrayer. Compare Ps. li. 5. But it probably has a more definite bearing. It may be that the parents of Judas were themselves thieves. If so, they doubtless taught him the arts of pilfering. Or they may have known and approved his vile treason, and been witnesses of his miserable end, surviving him for a season. Alexander: "This is perhaps the most fearful imprecation in the Psalm. . . It is not to be forgotten, however, that in all such cases, the personal guilt of the implicated parties is presupposed, and not inferred from their connection with the principals."

15. Let them be before the LORD continually, that he may cut off the memory of them from the earth. Like language is found in Neh. iv. 4, 5. The meaning is that their name shall be esteemed vile and be forgotten. In using them and their, he refers to all that had been spoken of as in anywise connected with the betrayer. See on Ps. ix. 5, 6.

16. Because that he remembered not to shew mercy, but persecuted the poor and needy man, that he might even slay the broken in heart. He shall have judgment without mercy, that hath showed no mercy. The malice of the heart against God manifest in the flesh has always been deadly and desperate. In Judas it had full time and fair opportunity to mature itself, and be fairly developed. The poor and needy man, broken in heart, is the blessed Saviour, who wept over the very city that was about to shed his blood; see v. 22. Jesus had mercy for all his enemies; but none of his enemies had mercy for him.

17. As he loved cursing, so let it come unto him: as he delighted not in blessing, so let it be far from him. Here we have a new declaration of the awful law of retribution in kind. He blessed not others and he got no blessing himself. He cursed others and was cursed himself. Alexander is confident that the verbs should all be read in the preterite. Let the Israelitish people remember what their fathers said, "His blood be upon us and upon our children," and repent, and seek a blessing.

18. As he clothed himself with cursing like as with his garment, so let it come into his bowels like water, and like oil into his bones. There are three modes of interpreting this verse: 1. Some think the cursing is that which comes from the Lord upon the guilty. 2. Others regard the construction and teaching of the verse like that of Prov. viii. 36, "All they that hate me love death," i. e., they love and persistently pursue such a course as leads to death, and so are said to love death itself. 3. Others think that the cursing which he put on like a garment consisted of his malevolent wishes, speeches, and deeds; while the cursing which came into his very bones was the wrath of an angry God. At least part of the form of expression here used is taken from the law respecting the water of jealousy, Num. v. 18, 22, 24, 27. Parkhurst thinks the garment of this verse denotes a robe covering the whole body.

19. Let it be unto him as the garment which covereth him. The curse given fell, did its work, and passed away; but the curse received was permanent. It was worn like a garment; and for a girdle wherewith he is girded continually. It fits tight and is bound fast. He never gets rid of it. The blood of Christ rejected, as Judas rejected it, there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin. Thenceforward the wrath of God abides.

20. Let this be the reward of mine adversaries from the Lord, and of them that speak evil against my soul. Reward, in Lev. xix. 13, wages; in the margin in Isa. xl. 10, recompense. "The wages of sin is death." Adversaries, as in v. 4. All the woes denounced in vv. 6-19, are summed up in the word this. The prophet has not been delivering his own private sentiments; but has been speaking by the Holy Ghost. Both the denunciation and the things denounced are from the Lord. Alexander: "The description in the last clause includes insult, slander, and malicious plotting."

21. But do thou for me, O God the Lord, for thy name's sake. Do, elsewhere work, execute, deal. Calvin: Undertake for me; Edwards: Do thou take my part. The petitioner draws his arguments from God's nature and glory, for thy name's sake, John xii. 28. Because thy mercy is good, deliver thou me. The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel, Pr. xii. 10. The more you have of them, the more sad is your state. But God's mercy is good in all respects and at all times. It works no ill. If David as a type appears in this verse (and perhaps he does,) we give a deeper shade of meaning to the phrase for thy name's sake, Jer. xiv. 7, and to the word mercy, Ps. li. 1. Compare Ps. lxix. 16. Calvin: "All our prayers will vanish in smoke, unless they are grounded upon the mercy of God."

22. For I am poor and needy, as in v. 16, sometimes true of the type David, but until the end of his life always true of the antitype Christ. And my heart is wounded within me, equivalent to broken in heart in v. 16. Compare Ps. xl. 17. David had crushing griefs; but above all others David's Lord was a "man of sorrows," Isa. liii. 3. None was ever wounded as he was. The sword of Jehovah was buried in his soul, Zech. xiii. 7.

23. I am gone like the shadow when it declineth. See on Ps. cii. 11. Anderson: "As a shadow, when it is extended by the sun's setting, is approaching to evanescence, so, saith the speaker in this Psalm, I am fast disappearing; that is, I am approaching the end of mortal life." I am tossed up and down as the locust. The locust has no house, no home, no resting-place. So was David a wanderer for a while; and David's Master had not where to lay his head, Matt. viii. 20. Locusts in the east are carried hither and thither by the winds, till at last they perish in the sea, or in some sandy desert. Compare Ex. x. 13, 19; Isa. xxxiii. 4; Nah. iii. 15, 17. The verb might be rendered am shaken or am overthrown, Neh. v. 13; Isa. xxxiii. 9; Ex. xiv. 27; Ps. cxxxvi. 15.

24. My knees are weak through fasting. The word fasting used here expresses abstinence from food through grief, or for humiliation, 2 Sam. xii. 16; Est. iv. 3; Dan. ix. 3. Before our Lord was crucified, he was so exhausted that he could not carry his own cross, and he was often an hungered. And my flesh faileth of fatness. His moisture was turned into the drought of summer. Fatness, in v. 18, the same word is rendered oil. It points to the refreshing, invigorating, lubricating substance of a healthful animal body. Clearly the oil is that which inheres in the frame and especially in the bones. "A broken spirit drieth the bones," Pr. xvii. 22.

25. I became also a reproach unto them. Reproach, almost uniformly so rendered. See on Ps. xv. 3. Never were such reproaches heaped on any as on the Saviour. When they looked upon me they shook their heads. The whole verse finds its parallel in Ps. xxii. 7. Compare Matt. xxvii. 39; Mark xv. 29; Luke xxiii. 35.

26. Help me, O LORD my God: O save me according to thy mercy. Help, as in Ps. xxii. 19. Save, as in Ps. xxii. 21. The word rendered mercy is indeed used to express God's loving-kindness to sinners; but it expresses also his kindness and goodness shown to any of his creatures. It is by his loving-kindness that the angels live in bliss. God's help was sought:

27. That they may know that this is thy hand; that thou, LORD, hast done it. No thoughtful man can read the history of David without seeing that his deliverances were from the Lord. Man could not have saved him. Much more illustriously are the wisdom and power of God manifested in raising Christ Jesus from the dead to glory and honor supreme, eternal, ineffable. Thy hand, the working of thy providence, the energy of thy power.

28. Let them curse, but bless thou. Calvin and others: They shall curse, but thou shalt bless; Fry: They may curse, but thou wilt bless; Hengstenberg: They curse, bless thou. Perhaps Fry expresses the exact shade of idea. Compare 2 Sam. xvi. 11, 12. When they arise, let them be ashamed. Literally, They arose, and shall be ashamed: Calvin: When they arise, they shall be ashamed; Edwards: Let those be put to shame that rise up against me; Alexander: They have arisen, and shall be shamed. Narrative, prayer and prophecy are so mingled in the last eleven verses of this Psalm that it is not easy to draw a certain line between them. But the reader may be satisfied to know that prayer and prophecy here are quite coincident, and that the whole history will show that the prayers were answered and the predictions fulfilled. But let thy servant rejoice. Literally, And thy servant shall be glad. David was God's servant, Ps. xix. 11, 13; xxxi. 16; cxvi. 16. In a much more glorious sense was Jesus the servant of God, Isa. xlii. 1; xlix. 5; lii. 13. The prospect of great joy sustained the Redeemer in his agony on the cross, Heb. xii. 2. He has had that joy for a long time, and it shall never end.

29. Let mine adversaries be clothed with shame; and let them cover themselves with their own confusion, as with a mantle. Adversaries, as in vv. 4, 20. The general figure is the same as in vv. 18, 19. Mantle, in Exodus, robe; in 1 Sam. ii. 19, coat; in Ezra and Job, mantle. It is the garment which covers the other apparel and the whole person. Compare Ps. lxxi. 13.

30. I will greatly praise the Lord with my mouth; yea, I will praise him among the multitude. The first verb is often rendered give thanks, Ps. vi. 5; xviii. 49. The second is from a cognate of that from which the Psalter takes its name. If David as a type here speaks, no one will find difficulty. But if any object to such vows as coming from Christ, let them compare Ps. xxii. 22. Who on earth or in heaven has ever so honored the Father as the incarnate Son?

31. For he shall stand at the right hand of the poor, to save him from those that condemn his soul. At the right hand of his Son and Servant, the Redeemer, God has stood, and will ever stand as an advocate and protector. Compare v. 6. He has amply vindicated all his claims and doctrines, Rom. i. 4. He will vindicate and reward him for ever, Isa. lii. 13, 15; liii. 10-12. Soul or life, as in v. 20. Christ's enemies condemned both his life and his soul. He was the poor beyond all others, though David his type was poor also. And what Jehovah was to his Son, he will in and through him be to each of his servants, even the humblest. The Lord will plead his cause. He will not accuse him, nor condemn him when he is judged.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is no wonder that the afflicted wish to secure the ear, aid and hand of God, and therefore cry to him, vv. 1, 4. A thousandth part of the opposition made to Christ and his people would long since have exterminated the church, but for the constant and amazing interposition of God in answer to the prayers of his people and the intercession of his Son.

2. Those who have never had experience of it, know nothing of the terrors of deceitful, violent, malignant words, vv. 2, 3. See Pr. xii. 18. The innocent may be accused, reviled and threatened until they are terrified, not out of their virtue, but out of all self-possession. Men may be abused till they cease to have self-reliance. Calumnies, accompanied with professions of friendship, are Iseariot-like. Often silence is the only reply we can make, because "when calumny is rampant, innocence is duly and properly estimated by none but God only." Calvin: No man can, with sincerity of heart, surrender himself entirely into the hand of God, except he has first formed a resolution of treating with contempt the reproaches of the world, and is also fully persuaded that he has God as the defender of his cause."

3. Have such calumnies and falsehoods been uttered concerning you, that you are compassed about with them, and cannot find any way to clear yourself before wicked and unreasonable men; remember that the Lord Jesus Christ and his servant David experienced the same, vv. 2, 3.

4. Whatever you do or suffer, maintain a good conscience. Sin not against the Lord in one way to defend yourself in another. If wicked men will assail you, so behave that at the end and to the end you may say they fought against me without a cause, v. 3.

5. So far is want of evidence from being a shield against calumny, that ordinarily malignant men are spiteful and violent in proportion to their lack of evidence, v. 3. A spotless life, uniform tenderness of conscience, deeds of charity and hearty prayers for enemies oftentimes but enrage them the more.

6. The unreasonableness of the opposition made to Christ and his followers always has been atrocious, vv. 4, 5.

7. There is no bondage like the slavery of sin; and there is no tyrant so cruel as Satan, v. 6. To be delivered over to him is to be in hell.

8. Let no good man, however calumniated, regard himself as at liberty to invoke curses on his foes. What David spoke prophetically, in vv. 6-20, can be no guide to the personal wishes of injured Christians. Jesus Christ prayed for his murderers. Yet all true Christians and faithful ministers ought to warn the impenitent of their coming doom.

9. The wicked, if they were but honest with themselves, might easily know what would be their doom at the last day, v. 7. They have monitions in the state of their own consciences sufficient to alarm any but the stupid, 1 John iii. 20.

10. It is idle for men to think that they are on the way to heaven, when both their lives and hearts are such as to make their very prayers an abomination to God, v. 7.

11. Death is by sin; and the abbreviation of human life to threescore and ten was made for the same reason; and yet the wicked by special enormities make life still shorter, v. 8. Compare Ps. lv. 23.

12. Of all who shall at last lie down in sorrow, none will have a more fearful doom than some, who have been high in office on earth, and filled the world with the fame of their deeds, vv. 7, 8. This will no doubt be true to an appalling extent of the ministers of religion, who have been faithless to their charge, and hypocritical in their professions. • What a frightful conception it is that the carnal minister, who dies without repentance, will be eternally united to a company at the head of which will stand Judas Iscariot.

13. If men object to the terrible sweep that criminality takes over a man's posterity, vv. 9, 10, 12, 13; let him first examine how the Scriptures teach that doctrine; and then let him consider what the state of things would be if God should act on a contrary principle. Suppose every wrong-doer was fully persuaded that his evil conduct would have no unhappy bearing on any one but himself, would not some of the most powerful restraints on mankind be taken away?

14. One great reason for leading a temperate, frugal, industrious and honest life, is that we may be kept out of the power of the extortioner, the usurer, the hard-hearted creditor, the unrelenting exactor, v. 11.

15. When we remember how great are the blessings of lasting and genuine friendships, and how feeble and dependent we all are, we ought earnestly to beseech God not to leave us in this dark world without those, who will extend kindness to us, and transmit their favor to our offspring, v. 12.

16. Parents may live to see the ruin of the children, whom they have trained in the principles and practice of iniquity, v. 14.

17. A good name is worth more than all the ease, wealth, pleasures and flatteries of the world, v. 15.

18. While God is very long-suffering and patiently waits for the return of the wayward; yet when his hand takes hold on vengeance, retribution is as terrible as it is just, vv. 16-20, 28, 29. Surely men have no right to complain of injustice, if they get what they give. We are not at liberty to suppress scriptural denunciations against sin, Deut. xxvii. 15-26; xxviii. 15-68. Jesus, full of all tenderness, was yet faithful in warning men of coming wrath, Luke vi. 24-26; Mark ix. 43-48.

19. Whatever we do, let us labor to be on God's side, vv. 21, 26. Having him, we do absolutely need no other helper, protector or portion. No man has ever made the Almighty too prominent in his thoughts, plans or hopes.

20. Are you poor and needy? So was Jesus Christ. Is your heart wounded within you? So was his. Are you tossed up and down like a locust, having no certain dwelling-place? Such was the Master's lot, vv. 22-24. Look to Jesus, Heb. xii. 2, 3.

21. It is well for us often to take solemn and salutary views of our latter end, v. 23. It is a great mercy which God grants to most of his servants, to give them in some way timely notice of their departure from this world.

22. Let us not be greatly moved by taunts and mockings from ungodly men, v. 25. They were heaped upon our Saviour. Nor can they do us real harm, if grace be given us to possess our souls in patience. But let no man attempt to bear such a burden in his own strength.

23. Come what will, let us labor and pray that God may be honored in all our sufferings; and that men may be brought to know his hand, v. 27. It is natural to shrink from pain, but if the Lord be thereby glorified, let us sweetly say, "The cup which my Father giveth me to drink, shall I not drink it?"

24. Scott: "We need not regard the malicious imprecations of ungodly men: though they curse, the Lord will bless those who trust in him, and they will rejoice when their enemies shall be covered with confusion: for God will plead the cause of those who honor him by their animated praises; he will rebuke Satan, and every accuser, and save them from those who would condemn their souls," v. 28.

25. Whether joy or sorrow seems most to abound, yet it is not doubtful whether judgment or mercy most prevails in the case of all God's people; and therefore each of his saints should greatly praise the Lord; and that in the most public and solemn manner, v. 30.

26. Is your lot hard? Is your cup bitter? Is your cross heavy? Then believe in God, and in his Son Jesus Christ, who stands at the right hand of the poor, their Advocate and Friend, v. 31. Compare John xiv. 1.

27. Are you a sufferer from the violence, injuries or persecutions of men? Remember that the Master endured the same, and cheerfully fill up that which is behind of the afflictions of Christ in your flesh, for the sake of his body, which is his church, Col. i. 24. Dickson: "It matters not what the enemy speak against the godly so long as God approveth them."

28. Is it a part of your business and your pleasure to afflict and torment the innocent, the helpless or the godly? Beware! God is the avenger of all such.

29. Is your religion of the bitter, cursing kind? If so, it will not stand the test, Luke ix. 55; Rom. xii. 9-19.

PSALM CX.

A Psalm of David.

1 The LORD said unto my Lord, Sit thou at my right hand, until I make thine enemies thy footstool.

2 The LORD shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion: rule thou in the midst of thine enemies.

3 Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning: thou hast the dew of thy youth.

4 The LORD hath sworn, and will not repent, Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek.

5 The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath.

6 He shall judge among the heathen, he shall fill the places with the dead bodies; he shall wound the heads over many countries.

7 He shall drink of the brook in the way: therefore shall he lift up the head.

ON the title see on title of Psalm iii. In the New Testament this Psalm is often quoted, Matt. xxii. 42-45; Mark xii. 36, 37; Luke xx. 41-44; Acts ii. 34-36; 1 Cor. xv. 25; Heb. i. 13; v. 6; vii. 17; x. 12, 13. These quotations prove, 1. David is the author of this Psalm. So clearly is this matter settled that no respectable commentator doubts it. The title, Christ, Peter all testify to this fact. 2. This Psalm is in the highest sense Messianic. All the citations of it in the New Testament are more or less decisive of this matter. Horne: "It appertaineth literally and solely to King Messiah." 3. Jesus Christ is both Lord and Christ, Acts ii. 36. In him are fulfilled all the glorious things here spoken. Nor has there ever appeared any one but Jesus Christ, to whom with any show of consistency, we can apply it. Some of the Jews have said it was fulfilled in Eliezer, the servant of Abraham; some, in Hezekiah; and some, in Zerubbabel; but neither of these was a priest, much less was either of them both a priest and a king; and neither of them was Lord to David. None but Jesus ever had so glorious a kingdom as that here described. Luther: "This is a peculiar and glorious prophecy concerning the kingdom of Christ. . . There is not a Psalm like it in the whole Scripture; and it ought to be very dear unto the church; seeing that it confirms that great article of faith—Christ sitting at the right hand of God the Father Almighty." Calvin: "Beyond all controversy the Psalm is a very clear prediction of the divinity, priesthood, victories, and triumph of the Messiah." Alexander: "This is the counterpart of the Second Psalm, completing the prophetic picture of the conquering Messiah. . . Any other application is ridiculous." Scott dates it B. C. 1038; Clarke, B. C. 1015. The names of the Most High in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. i. 2; ii. 4.

1. The LORD said unto my Lord. The LORD, Jehovah. Lord, Adonai; a title of respect applied to any potentate, even God himself. Here it is applied to one who was higher than David, for David calls him my Lord. Nor was there any to whom David could in this connection fitly give this title, except Christ. The ancient Jews admitted that Messiah should be the Son of David, that this Psalm related to him, and that he should be greater than David, having the authority of a master over him. See Matt. xxii. 42–45. It was chiefly as king that David was a type of Messiah, and yet he was as truly his inferior in that respect as Moses was in the prophetic office, or Aaron in the priesthood. This language of David clearly implies that his Lord, as to his divine nature, was already in existence, as the eternal Son of God. Sit thou at my right hand. The first step in Christ's exaltation was his resurrection; the second, his ascension into heaven; the third, his sitting at the right hand of God. What is the meaning of his sitting? It does not relate to the posture of his body. Peter and Paul each once say he "is at the right hand of God;" and Stephen saw him "standing on the right hand of God." In Scripture phrase sitting expresses quiet, repose. Jesus has entered into his rest. Compare Mic. iv. 4; Rev. iii. 21. Christ has ceased from his works and sufferings, Heb. iv. 10. Sitting also denotes permanency of possession. "Asher continued (literally sat) on the sea-shore," Judg. v. 17. He took and held that country as his portion. Sitting denotes majesty and authority. The king sits on his throne, and does not stand in the presence of even his nobles. Compare 1 Cor. xv. 25. Sitting is also the posture of a judge. Compare Pr. xx. 8; Isa. xvi. 5. He is sitting at God's right hand. The right hand is an emblem of strength, Ex. xv. 6; Ps. lxxx. 17. With the right hand the best blessings were commonly bestowed, Gen. xlviii. 13, 14. With the right hand gifts were commonly both received and bestowed, Eph. iv. 8. The right hand of royal power is represented as the chief place of enjoyment in a kingdom, Ps. xvi. 11. It is also the post of honor, 1 Kings ii. 19; Eph. i. 20; Heb. ii. 9. To a higher degree of rest, rule, joy, favor, power and majesty Christ could not be raised. Nor shall he lose his power, or lay aside his glory. His throne is forever and ever. His Father says to him, sit here, Until I make thine enemies thy footstool. "He must reign till he hath put all enemies under his feet," 1 Cor. xv. 25. Footstool, as in Ps. xcix. 5; cxxxii. 7, uniformly rendered. The meaning of such language is historically explained in Josh. x. 24. It denotes complete subjection. Until, in Ex. xxxiii. 22, rendered while; and in Josh. xvii. 14, forasmuch. It does not teach that Jesus shall cease to be at God's right hand, so soon as he shall have subdued his foes. It rather implies just the reverse. If he sits there until his enemies are brought into subjection, much more shall he hold that place of honor forever. We have the same word rendered in the same way and having the same force in Ps. cxxiii. 2. Christ will not lay aside his crown, nor become a private person after he shall have conquered all his enemies. This clause, indeed the whole verse may be regarded as fully expounded in 1 Cor. xv. 24-28. Compare Matt. xix. 28; 2 Tim. ii. 12; Rev. iii. 21. Christ has all power in heaven and in earth, Matt. xxviii. 18. Patrick's paraphrase of the whole verse is: "This is the decree of the eternal LORD, that the great person whom we expect, and whom I honor as my Lord and Master, shall be advanced (after his sufferings) to the highest dignity in the heavens; and reign with him as the King of all the world, till he have perfectly subdued the most powerful opposers of his kingdom; and overcome death itself, by whom all mankind are conquered."

2. The LORD shall send the rod of thy strength out of Zion. Phillips: "The rod of thy strength or the sceptre of thy strength, i. e., thy powerful sceptre, the sceptre with which thou rulest thy powerful kingdom." Instead of send, perhaps it would give the meaning better to read stretch out or stretch forth, as in Gen. xlviii. 14; 1 Sam. xxiv. 6; xxvi. 11. The sceptre of Christ is made mighty by the power of Jehovah. That the word here rendered rod may mean sceptre is clear from Isa. ix. 4; xiv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 17; Ezek. xix. 11. The foregoing explanation is well supported by authority and by the parallel clause. Rule thou in the midst of thine enemies. Rule, in Gen. i. 26, 28; Ps. lxxii. 8, have dominion. David did indeed subdue some surrounding nations. But he, of whom David was a type, must have dominion over all the earth. The imperative form of the verb has the force of a future. See Introduction, § 6. Christ rules all his enemies. The incorrigible are crushed. The rest are saved.

3. Thy people shall be willing in the day of thy power, in the beauties of holiness from the womb of the morning: thou hast the dew of thy youth. The original is concise and obscure. Of course there is diversity in the renderings. Among them these are the best: John Rogers' Translation: In the daye of thy power shall thy people offre the fre wyll offerings with a holy worshipec; the dewe of thy byrth is of the wombe of the mornynge; Edwards: A voluntary multitude of people will be with thee upon the holy mountains in the day of thy armament; thy young converts will be as numerous as the drops of morning dew. Willing, a noun, sometimes rendered freely, Ps. liv. 5; Hos. xiv. 4; willingly, 2 Chron. xxxv. 8; in Ps. lxviii. 9, plentiful; in most cases free will offerings. It is plural here and is literally, willingnesses, freenesses, liberalities. The meaning is that God's people should with perfect willingness offer themselves at his call, and this because it was the day of his power, might, strength. This is the best sense; though the word also means wealth, substance, host, army, because in these there is might. And they shall render their free and hearty service not in the deformity of sin but in the beauties of holiness. The sense of the residue of the verse is given by Edwards; Thy young converts shall be as numerous as the drops of morning dew; margin: More than the womb of the morning thou shalt have the dew of thy youth. Compare 2 Sam. xvii. 12. Lowth: "More than the dew from the womb of the morning is the dew of thy progeny." This is the common view. Alexander prefers the idea of perpetual succession, as the dew falls fresh daily from the womb of the morning. This is not inconsistent with the foregoing. Calvin: "In this verse the Psalmist sets forth the honors of Christ's kingdom in relation to the number of his subjects, and their prompt and cheerful obedience to his commands."

4. The LORD hath sworn, and will not repent. In Ps. ii. 7, Jehovah publishes his decree. Here he says he has bound himself by an oath to the same effect. Nor will he change his mind. Compare Num. xxiii. 19; 1 Sam. xv. 29. It is evident that God's oath here is for confirmation of his promise engaging to reward and honor his own Son. Thou art a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek. The office of priest embraced these functions, the offering of sacrifices, intercession and benediction. How perfectly qualified for these Christ was is set forth in all the epistle to the Hebrews, which is an inspired treatise on the subject. But Christ was not only a priest, but a priest after a particular order. Paul notices several particulars in which Christ was of the order of Melchizedek. 1. He united in his own person, as did Melchizedek, the offices of king and priest, Heb. vii. 1. God always forbade such blending of offices in Israel. When king Uzziah assumed the functions of the priesthood, he was smitten with leprosy, 2 Chron. xxvi. 18-21. 2. Like Melchizedek, Christ was much greater in dignity than Aaron and his successors, yea, greater than Abraham himself, for Abraham paid tithes to the king of Salem and the priest of the Most High God, and received a blessing from him, Heb. vii. 2, 4, 7, 9. 3. Neither Melchizedek nor Christ is found in the genealogical tables of the Jewish priesthood, Heb. vii. 3. Neither of them had predecessor or successor in office. 4. As we have no account of the end of Melchizedek's priesthood, so there is absolutely no end to that of Christ, Heb. vii. 3, 16, 17, 24, 25. He is a priest forever.

5. The Lord at thy right hand shall strike through kings in the day of his wrath. Some think that after hand we should add, O Jehovah. No doubt the Father is here addressed. The Lord is at his right hand. Strike through; in v. 6; Ps. xviii. 38; lxviii. 21, wound; in Num. xxiv. 17, smite; in Job xxvi. 12, smite through. The meaning is that he will subdue all opposers, however mighty. The verb is in the preterite. Things foretold by God are as certain as if they were already accomplished.

6. He shall judge among the heathen. Judge by no means necessarily implies severity, but in many cases expresses an act of divine beneficence. See on Ps. vii. 8; ix. 8; liv. 1; lxxii. 2. Messiah delights in showing mercy to the penitent, even among sinners of the heathen or Gentiles; but he will as a conqueror destroy all, who continue to resist his authority. He shall fill the places with the dead bodies. The verb is in the preterite. Instead of places some supply nations. The sense is the same. How terribly nations and potentates have perished in resisting the reign of Messiah is matter of history. Every age affords new and appalling examples. He shall wound the heads over many countries. Calvin: He shall break the head over a great country; Doway: He shall crush the heads in the land of many; Edwards: He will crush the heads of his enemies in great numbers against the earth. Much time might be spent in ingenious remarks on the words and import of this clause. But all would at last bring us substantially to this general idea, that Messiah will surely overcome all opposition, even in high places. None can resist the Son of God but to his own eternal undoing.

7. He shall drink of the brook in the way. Various and recondite meanings have been claimed as found here. To enumerate them all would be tedious and unprofitable. The true explanation is that as a conqueror in a great contest overcomes all opposition, and refreshes himself at the brook in his victorious march, and thus goes on conquering and to conquer, so shall it be with Messiah. This is a good sense, entirely consistent with the figurative language of the Psalm, wholly natural, and even suggested by the history of one of the Judges of Israel. After his great slaughter of his enemies Samson "was sore athirst, and called on the Lord, and said, Thou hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant: and now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hand of the uncircumcised? But God clave an hollow place that was in the jaw, and there came water thereout; and when he had drunk, his spirit came again, and he revived," Jud. xv. 18, 19. This agrees with the last clause: Therefore shall he lift up the head, i. e., he shall not go drooping or faint to his work as a conqueror, but shall gloriously proceed in his conquest of the nations. Without a figure we have the same predictions in Isa. xlii. 3, 4; liii. 10-12. A thousand devices of man may fail; God's word and oath make sure the glories of the Redeemer's kingdom.

Note. This Psalm is so rich in doctrinal suggestions that a system of divinity, almost entire, might be made out of it. Henry says: "Some have called this Psalm David's creed, almost all the articles of the Christian faith being found in it." It also suggests many practical truths. But the REMARKS about to be made cannot be very protracted without interfering with the plan of this work.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. What a dreadful enemy to truth is prejudice. It bars the door against the entrance of all sound views. Before the coming of Christ, Jewish commentators admitted that this Psalm related to Messiah. It has been wondrously fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. Now some Jews wholly deny its Messianic character, and all deny its fulfilment in the man of sorrows.

2. Christ is truly divine. David called him my Lord, v. 1. We never can explain either the prophetic or historical, the didactic or the practical parts of Scripture without admitting the supreme divinity of the Son.

3. Christ is a King, v. 1. He is a great King, King of kings and Lord of lords. He shall put down all that rise up against him. Cobbin: "What though whole nations are among his bitter enemies, and the hearts of men are as iron and steel to bar every access to their souls, yet when he stretches out his sceptre, and sends forth his law, the most rebellious must obey." The Mediator reigns supreme over all things.

4. It is a blessed truth that Christ the head of the church is far beyond the reach of all human and diabolical malice, and is sitting at the right hand of God, v. 1. Well may the saints in heaven and earth rejoice that men can no longer offer to him personal insults, can spit upon him no more, crown him with thorns no more, crucify him no more.

5. The wickedness of sin is fearful and desperate, inasmuch as it makes men enemies to Christ, v. 1. No man with a good heart could oppose him. Henry: "Even Christ himself has enemies that fight against his kingdom and subjects, his honor and interest in the world: there are those who will not have him to reign over them, and thereby they join themselves to Satan, who will not have him to reign at all."

6. All foes of the Mediator shall finally lie prostrate, v. 1. In some way their subjection shall be complete. Many have hardened themselves against him, but none such have ever prospered. Scott: "Many persecuting tyrants have already felt the weight of his vengeance; many more will yet be made sensible of the madness of provoking his indignation." It is no task to him to bring down high looks. He is girded with omnipotence.

7. But the most glorious conquests of Christ are by his word and Spirit. His willing converts are his jewels. By the gospel the Son eminently glorifies the Father. He has the power and the will to subdue the world to himself, v. 2. Out of Zion goes forth his law, Isa. ii. 3. From him his ministers and people receive power by the Holy Ghost. His word is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword. Compare 2 Cor. iv. 5. So that his followers stand and sing: "Now thanks be unto God, which always causeth us to triumph in Christ, and maketh manifest the savour of his knowledge by us in every place," 2 Cor. ii. 14.

8. The glory of Christ's kingdom is immense, v. 3. 1. It is composed of persons peculiarly his own. They are his by a free, eternal choice, John vi. 37. They are his even before they are called to a knowledge of himself, Acts xviii. 10. All who shall finally rise to his enjoyment are choice spirits. They are the very élite of the universe. 2. They are a willing people. So hearty are they in his service that they are willingness itself. The "conversion of a soul consists in its being willing to be Christ's, coming under his yoke, and into his interests, with an entire compliancy and satisfaction." 3. They are a pure people. They worship and serve him in the beauties of holiness. All of them hate sin. They live and die fighting against it. Sin has not dominion over them. 4. They are very numerous, like the drops of the dew from the womb of the morning. Horsley: "The dew of thy progeny is more than the womb of the morning." French and Skinner: "Thy youths shall come forward for thee as the dew-drops from the womb of the morning." 5. There is everlasting stability to Christ's kingdom, vv. 1-3. Calvin: "What time our minds are agitated by various commotions, let us learn confidently to repose on this support, that however much the world may rage against Christ, it will never be able to hurl him from the right hand of the Father."

9. If believers in their conflicts and perturbations need an everlasting Rock on which to rest, they have it in the unchangeableness of God, his word, his promise, his purpose and his oath, v. 4. The world may be turned upside down; all human institutions may be subverted; all human friendships sundered, and all hell seem to be let loose against the saints; but God and his Christ with their infinite plans and glorious purposes are the same from age to age.

10. Christ is also a Priest, the best Priest that ever was; the only one that ever made full and adequate atonement for sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness; whose intercessions are always prevalent; whose oblation gives effectual ease to the conscience by securing the remission of sins and entire reconciliation with God. Compare Rom. viii. 31-34. Verily such an High Priest became us, Heb. vii. 26. If we would fully understand the riches of divine grace displayed in the priesthood of Christ, let us devoutly study the Epistle to the Hebrews.

11. No power, personal or political, earthly or infernal, separate or combined, can effectually resist Christ in his triumphant march, v. 5. The reason why his adversaries do not all perish at once, is not because he is unable to execute wrath, but because his long-suffering is great, and because many of them shall yet be made willing in the day of his power, and become monuments of his glorious grace. Many a time he wounds to heal. He strikes through the heart with salutary convictions that he may bring men to repentance. Yet when mild measures fail, his wrath is terrible.

12. Gloriously does Christ advance his cause and kingdom among the heathen, the Gentiles. The little leaven shall yet leaven the whole lump. The grain of mustard seed shall yet be a tree, in which the fowls of heaven shall lodge. Compare Isa. liv. 1-3; Rev. xix. 6. Christ's reward has not been half measured out to him. The brightest prospects are before him. And he has merited all that was promised him, and all that shall ever be given him.

13. If any should be offended at the tone of this Psalm, let them remember that much of its imagery is taken from war, and that yet it is to be interpreted according to the principles of mercy and grace revealed in the gospel. Calvin: "Should any one be disposed to ask, Where is that spirit of meekness and gentleness with which the Scripture elsewhere informs us he shall be endued? Isa. xlii. 2, 3; lxi. 1, 2; I answer, that, as a shepherd is gentle towards his flock, but fierce and formidable towards wolves and thieves; in like manner, Christ is kind and gentle towards those who commit themselves to his care, while they who wilfully and obstinately reject his yoke, shall feel with what awful and terrible power he is armed."

14. Before honor is humility. It was so with the Redeemer. He first sank, then rose. See Phil. ii. 5-11.

15. We have need of patience that like our Master we may inherit the fulness of the blessings provided for us. Thousands of years ago the Father promised him a glorious kingdom. Long centuries ago Jesus did all and endured all that was necessary to entitle him to the highest glory. Since that he has been expecting until his enemies be made his footstool. Nor has he waited in vain. But he has not yet received his full reward. For "we see not yet all things put under him," Heb. ii. 8. He is not yet satisfied. He shall receive higher and yet higher honors. Christ waits with ineffable joy and infinite patience for the complete fulfilment of all that the Father has promised to him. Let us imitate Christ and give God his time. Everything is most beautiful in its season.

PSALM CXI.

1 Praise ye the LORD. I will praise the LORD with my whole heart, in the assembly of the upright, and in the congregation.

2 The works of the LORD are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein.

3 His work is honourable and glorious: and his righteousness endureth for ever.

4 He hath made his wonderful works to be remembered: the LORD is gracious and full of compassion.

5 He hath given meat unto them that fear him: he will ever be mindful of his covenant.

6 He hath shewed his people the power of his works, that he may give them the heritage of the heathen.

7 The works of his hands are verity and judgment; all his commandments are sure.

8 They stand fast for ever and ever, and are done in truth and uprightness.

9 He sent redemption unto his people: he hath commanded his covenant for ever: holy and reverend is his name.

10 The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom: a good understanding have all they that do his commandments: his praise endureth for ever.

THIS is an alphabetical Psalm. See Introduction, § 13. Each sentence begins with a letter of the Hebrew alphabet in order. Some make Hallelujah the title. But this is not necessary; though it is doubtless a key-note to the ode. Both the author and date are uncertain. The most probable conjecture is that David wrote it. But on this matter we have no reliable information. Some have maintained, but none have proved, that all Psalms beginning with Hallelujah were written after the captivity. Alexander: "There is nothing in the Psalm itself to determine its date, or its historical occasion." Scott dates it B. C. 1037; Clarke, B. C. 535. Some have thought that this and several succeeding Psalms were used in the celebration of the Passover. Perhaps they were; but this would not prove that they were composed for that feast and for no other time. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD and Jah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2, and introductory observations on Ps. lxxviii.

1. Praise ye the LORD. Hallelujah, as in Ps. civ. 35; cv. 45; cvi. 1. I will praise the LORD with my whole heart. Praise, often give thanks, sometimes confess, also thank. Whole heart, as in Ps. ix. 1, or more exactly in Ps. lxxxvi. 12. In the assembly of the upright. Assembly, in Ps. xxv. 14, secret; in Ps. lv. 14, counsel; and in Ps. lxiv. 2, secret counsel; but in Jer. vi. 11; xv. 17; Ezek. xiii. 9, assembly. Strictly speaking, it designates a company sitting with closed doors. Upright, a very ancient designation of God's people; in Num. xxiii. 10, rendered righteous. It is the opposite of crooked, or tortuous. It is often rendered right, straight. See on Ps. vii. 10. And in the con- gregation. Congregation, as in Ps. i. 5; vii. 7; in Ps. cvi. 17, 10, company. Assembly and congregation are strictly parallel. Abenezra: "I will praise the Lord with all my heart, both privately and publicly." The church of England retains that shade of thought, "secretly among the faithful, and in the congregation." Luther probably gives the precise idea: "I thank the Lord here in this public assembly, where we are in a peculiar manner by ourselves, as it were in secret counsel, and no heathen or stranger must be beside us."

2. The works of the LORD are great, sought out of all them that have pleasure therein. Works, as in Ps. viii. 3, 6, and often in Ps. civ. cvi. cvii.; also rendered deeds, labors, doings. It embraces works of creation, providence and grace. Sought out, inquired into, searched for. Have pleasure, desires, delights or likings. The studies of good men in all ages and in all parts of the world have been diligently turned to the wonders of what God hath wrought.

3. His work is honorable and glorious. Work, not the singular of works as in v. 2, but a word of the same import also rendered act, deed. Honorable and glorious, two nouns both rendered according to the taste of the translator honor, glory, majesty, and as adjectives goodly. When God makes or does the least thing, he acts like a God, and his workmanship is worthy of him. And his righteousness endureth for ever. There appears no good reason for limiting the word righteousness to any particular exercise of it. God's rectitude lasts for ever, stands to eternity.

4. He hath made his wonderful works to be remembered. Wonderful works, wonders, marvels, miracles, marvellous works, Ex. iii. 20; xxxiv. 10; Jud. vi. 13; Ps. ix. 1. Even where men most desire it, they are not able to banish from the world the memory of much that God has done. Everything done by the Almighty is marvellous; but some of his works are so striking as to amaze and confound, if they do not convince and persuade. This remark is peculiarly applicable to the benignant acts of God. The LORD is gracious and full of compassion. Gracious, always has that meaning. See on Ps. lxxxvi. 3, 15. Full of compassion, one word, often merciful. See on Ps. lxxviii. 38. Edwards: He instituted a memorial of his wonderful works; gracious and merciful is Jehovah; church of England: The merciful and gracious Lord hath so done his marvellous works, that they ought to be had in remembrance.

5. He hath given meat unto them that fear him. Luther thinks this Psalm was designed to be sung at the Passover, and that this verse has special respect to the food then eaten. This may be so; but it as well suits many another time. Every wholesome meal demands gratitude. The paschal supper, the manna, bread and water are often used as figures of spiritual good things. So meat in this verse may include spiritual food. Meat, commonly prey. The generic idea seems to be that of food obtained without toil or culture. Thus the manna was prey or food obtained without culture. He will ever be mindful of his covenant. This may refer to God's covenant with Noah, Gen. viii. 21, 22; to his covenant with Abraham, Gen. xvii. 4-8; to the covenant of Sinai, Deut. iv. 13, 23; to God's covenant with David, 2 Sam. vii. 12-17; or to the covenant of grace made with our first parents in Eden, Gen. iii. 15, and often confirmed. To a pious Israelite all these covenants were sources of wisdom, and encouragement. The promises of this verse, whatever their import, are limited to such as fear God.

6. He hath shewed his people the power of his works, that he may give them the heritage of the heathen. People, nation. Works, as in v. 2. Heritage, that which had descended to them from their fathers. For their sins God drove out the idolatrous Canaanites. In his sovereignty he gave their country to the descendants of his friend Abraham.

7. The works of his hands are verity and judgment. Works, as in vv. 2, 6, meaning all that he has done. Verity, truth, faithfulness. His works agree with his promises and engagements. Judgment, as in Ps. i. 5; cvi. 3. The best rendering here is right. God never does wrong to effect his plans. All his commandments are sure. Commandments, in Ps. xix. 8, statutes; in Ps. cxix. invariably precepts. It embraces all the will of God made known to us to direct our actions. Sure, a participle, faithful, established, trustworthy. This clause may be taken as parallel to that which immediately precedes it, or as an inference from it. God never enjoins anything inconsistent with the most perfect rectitude.

8. They stand fast for ever and ever. Human codes are many, long, intricate, often contradictory. But God's law is one, brief, harmonious and unrepealable. The sum of the ten commandments is the rule of heaven itself and will be for ever and ever. The Lord is of one mind and changes not. And [his works] are done in truth and uprightness. Truth, in v. 7, verity. Uprightness, in v. 1, upright, an adjective, but so rendered as to give the sense in good English.

9. He sent redemption unto his people. Redemption, cognate to the word so rendered in Ps. xlix. 8. It embraces deliverance by any means, with or without a ransom price. In Ps. lv. 18 and elsewhere, the kindred verb is rendered hast delivered. The reference in this clause is no doubt to the redemption from Egypt; but that event in many ways shadowed forth eternal redemption by the Lamb of God. He hath commanded his covenant forever. Covenant, as in v. 5. Commanded, commonly so rendered, also appointed, charged. There seems to be here a special reference to the Sinaic covenant. But it is not left optional with us whether we will accept God's covenant however or whenever proposed to us. We may not take it up and lay it down again. The reason is found in God's excellent and glorious nature: Holy and reverend is his name. Reverend, in Ps. xlv. 4 and often, terrible; in Hab. i. 7, dreadful; a participle, literally to be feared. Clarke: Holy and tremendous is his name. Holy reverence becomes us whenever we speak or think of God's names, titles, attributes, word or ordinances.

10. The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom. On the nature of the holy fear of God, see on Ps. ii. 11. Beginning, the same as the first word in the book of Genesis, also rendered first, first fruits, chief, chiefest. There is no wisdom in men till they fear God. When they do fear God, that is the wisest thing they do. No man ever attains to any wisdom higher than this. Compare Job xxviii. 28; Pr. i. 7; ix. 10. "Wisdom is the principal thing; therefore get wisdom." Pr. iv. 7. It is a great thing to be wise unto salvation. Without this all skill is but cunning, and all knowledge vain. A good understanding have all they that do his commandments. This clause is parallel to the preceding. The word rendered understanding is also rendered wisdom, Pr. xii. 8; xxiii. 9. To keep God's law is to fear him. His praise endureth for ever. Praise, a cognate of the verb in the word Hallelujah at the beginning. Endureth forever, as in v. 3. Hallelujahs shall never cease.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. In our meditations and writings on religion there is scope for the exercise of all our ingenuity. Nor is it unlawful for us curiously to arrange in poetical or alphabetical order divine truths as the Psalmist has here done. Only we should avoid silly conceits and puerilities.

2. If we would teach the duties and exercises of religion most effectually, we must do it practically. I will praise the Lord, immediately follows, Praise ye the Lord, v. 1. "Words teach, example sways."

3. In all acts of worship, in particular in praising God, we should be very careful not only to avoid gross hypocrisy, but to be entirely hearty in the work, v. 1. It is no easy matter to avoid cold affections.

4. While we ought privately to engage in the duties of religion, this cannot exempt us from the obligation to confess God before men, even in the congregation and assembly, v. 1. Tholuck: "The concealment of praise is tantamount to depriving the Lord of half his glory." Dickson: "Solemn meetings of God's children for his public worship and furthering one another therein, are ordinances of God appointed for that end." They have public worship in heaven, Rev. vii. 9-12; xi. 16, 17; xix. 1-7.

5. There is nothing in true religion which discourages science truly so called, v. 2. We have had no better students of nature or of history than those who have been students of providence and redemption. It is truly a bad sign for one to have no heart for diligently considering any of the works of God. It greatly commends this duty that a devout mind can never be at a loss for matter of praise. Above, beneath, within, and around us, in nature, providence and grace we behold unspeakable wonders. And it is a mark of the amazing stupidity, blindness and perversity of the unregenerate heart that it is reluctant devoutly to dwell on such themes.

6. In all God's works there is nothing low, or wrong, or degrading, v. 3. Everything is very good. Gill: "There is nothing mean and trifling done by him; nothing unworthy of him in nature, providence and grace. Every work of his serves to display his glory, and set off the greatness of his majesty." This is most true in the wondrous scheme of salvation, 2 Cor. iii. 7-11.

7. The most amazing perverseness in man is proven by the fact that he does not remember what God has so arranged as that it would seem impossible that it should be forgotten, v. 4. No small part of piety consists in cherishing and treasuring up the memory of his beneficent acts.

8. Let us study with care and admire with heartiness the grace and compassion of God, v. 4. There is not a day of our lives that does not demand of us some pious notice of the divine kindness, 'in sparing, and pardoning, and restoring, and preserving us when we have deserved to be utterly destroyed.'

9. It is delightful to contemplate the amplitude of the provisions God has made for supplying all the wants of those that fear him, v. 5. Thus in nature what floods of light, what billions of tons of atmospheric air, what immeasurable reservoirs of water are found for our refreshment and support. Who ever fears that all the water will be drunk up, or the air be poisoned by respiration, or the light quenched by the darkness of earth? God's resources are illimitable. Compare Isa. xxxiii. 16.

10. God will never break covenant with any of his creatures, vv. 5, 9. For the human race he made a covenant with Noah, and although since that time men have atrociously sinned against him, he has faithfully kept his word, Isa. xl. 6-8.

11. Although miracles, in the strict sense of that term, have ceased to be wrought among men, yet great, supernatural works illustrating the power of God are continually manifest in nature and grace, and the righteous see them, vv. 6, 7. Every conversion from sin to holiness is an illustrious display of the power, wisdom and grace of God.

12. While all human governments are liable to decay, and their rulers to change, so that both fundamental and statute laws may be set aside, yet God's ways are constant and unchangeable, v. 8. With him the immutable rules of justice never swerve.

13. If God's laws are so pure and infinitely excellent, our obedience ought to be prompt, universal and most hearty, vv. 7, 8. Every word of God is pure. Man never so well consults his own temporal and eternal good as when he most exactly conforms his heart and life to Scripture principles.

14. Nothing is more fitting than praise to God for all deliverances vouchsafed to us, especially for the greatest of all deliverances, redemption from sin and wrath and hell, v. 9. Compare Gal. iii. 13.

15. Is God's name holy and reverend? then let us be vigilant, lest at any time we should use it in vain, v. 9. Henry: "Truly it is shocking when men mingle the name of the Most High and of the Saviour of lost men with their vain and idle jibes and angry conversation."

16. Let us never forget that the true, holy fear of God is an essential element of genuine piety, v. 10. He who has no such fear has no grace. Tholuck: "The fear of the Lord is the starting point of all true wisdom: any inquiry respecting things celestial or things terrestrial, if conducted in the fear of the Lord, is sure to lead to the right way: but it is no less the true source of the real wisdom of life," 1 Tim. iv. 8. Yet, alas! how few show that they are taught from above. Calvin: "All who are ignorant of the purpose for which they live are fools and madmen. But to serve God is the purpose for which we have been born, and for which we are preserved in life. There is, therefore, no worse blindness, no insensibility so grovelling, as when we condemn God and place our affections elsewhere."

17. There is such a thing as true religion. It is attainable. It is heavenly wisdom, v. 10. It is not of an unintelligible nature. It consists in loving, fearing and obeying God. He, who now submits his heart to the teachings and guidance of divine grace, may be poor, or sick, or feeble-minded, or uneducated, or cast off by the world; but he is safe and God will be his portion forever. Calvin: "They are usually deemed wise who look well to their own interests, who can pursue a temporizing policy, who have the acuteness and artifice of preserving the favorable opinion of the world, and who even practise deception upon others. But even were I to grant that this character belongs to them, yet is their wisdom unprofitable and perverse, because true wisdom manifests itself in the observance of the law."

18. As the work of praise is to last always, let us gladly prepare ourselves by practice for so heavenly an employment. "Religion is the perfection of wisdom, practice the best instructor, and thanksgiving the sweetest recreation."

PSALM CXII.

1 Praise ye the LORD. Blessed is the man that feareth the LORD, that delighteth greatly in his commandments.

2 His seed shall be mighty upon earth: the generation of the upright shall be blessed.

3 Wealth and riches shall be in his house: and his righteousness endureth for ever.

4 Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness: he is gracious, and full of compassion, and righteous.

5 A good man sheweth favour, and lendeth: he will guide his affairs with discretion.

6 Surely he shall not be moved for ever: the righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance.

7 He shall not be afraid of evil tidings: his heart is fixed, trusting in the LORD.

8 His heart is established, he shall not be afraid, until he see his desire upon his enemies.

9 He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor; his righteousness endureth for ever; his horn shall be exalted with honour.

10 The wicked shall see it, and be grieved; he shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away: the desire of the wicked shall perish.

THIS Psalm very strikingly corresponds to Psalm cxi. Like it, it is alphabetical, has ten verses, each of the first eight verses has two clauses, each of the last two verses has three clauses. From these facts Muis and others not unreasonably infer that these two odes were probably written by the same author. The scope of this Psalm is to commend true piety, and to show that God is not unmindful of the services and sufferings of his saints. This seems to be an expansion of the last verse of Psalm cxi. Tholuck calls it "a Psalm of instruction, similar to Psalms i. xxxvii." Pool says it "is a declaration of God's powerful 'and universal providence towards all men, and especially towards his afflicted people.'" Scott dates it B. C. 1040; Clarke, B. C. 535. He treats with respect the statement of the Vulgate that it was written by Haggai and Zechariah. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD and Jah LORD, on which see on Psalm i. 2 and introductory remarks to Psalm lxviii.

1. Praise ye the LORD, literally, hallelujah; see on Ps. civ. 35; cv. 45; cvi. 1. Blessed is the man that feareth the LORD, that delighteth greatly in his commandments. Blessed, as in Psalm i. 1, literally, O the blessednesses. He is blessed in many particulars, some of which are noticed in subsequent parts of the poem. But who is thus richly blessed? The man that feareth the LORD, has true godly reverence; and as a proper fruit of such piety greatly delights in the commandments of God. Commandments, as in Psalm xix. 8 and often in Ps. cxix. A little love to God's commandments is not enough. We must greatly delight in them; else our imperious lusts will carry us away. Alexander: "As in the preceding Psalm the fear of the Lord is declared to be the principle of all true wisdom, so here it is declared to be the source of all true happiness."

2. His seed shall be mighty upon earth. Mighty, also strong, valiant, champions; see on Psalm xix. 5. The purpose of God is to secure on the earth a godly seed, Mal. ii. 15. We hardly know how terribly the seed of evil-doers is cut off, and how wonderfully God preserves and multiplies the descendants of good men. Where are the acknowledged seed of the authors of the Smithfield fires? Yet the descendants of John Rogers, one of their martyr victims, are numbered, even in the United States of America; by the thousand, perhaps by the ten thousand. And the seed of the godly are valiant for the truth, for righteousness, for the glory of the Redeemer. Their influence is felt far and wide. The generation of the upright shall be blessed. Generation, the race, corresponding to seed in the preceding clause. Upright, as in Psalm iii. 1. It occurs again in v. 4; see on Ps. vii. 10. Blessed, not the same word as in v. 1, but a word of benediction; see on Ps. v. 12.

3. Wealth and riches shall be in his house. The translation cannot be improved. True piety has God's blessing in all things; see on Ps. i. 3. If any choose to refer the terms of this clause to the true riches, and make them designate the infinite blessings of salvation, the sense is good, and the doctrine true. This view is favored by the next clause: And his righteousness endureth for ever. The same words are found in v. 9. In Psalm cxi. 3, the very same is applied to God. We may take it as expressing either the stability of the good man's principles and character, or his justification before God. Both are in fact secured to him, Job xvii. 9; Phil. i. 6; Rom. viii. 30-34. All God's people have integrity of heart, righteousness of principle and of life, and righteousness of person; see on Ps. xxiv. 5.

4. Unto the upright there ariseth light in the darkness. Upright, as in v. 2. Light is the emblem and sum of all good, as darkness is of all evil. In the midst of all that befalls the good man in the shape of distress, perplexity and calamity, there remains to him the sum of all blessedness, the favor of God, the smile of heaven, the light of God's countenance; see on Ps. xcvii. 11. He is gracious, and full of compassion, and righteous. Both God and his people are righteous. Those, who fear God, in their measure resemble him. They have not omnipotence, omniscience, omnipresence, self-existence, independence, eternity, unchangeableness; nor any perfections in infinitude; but in their measure they are like him in holiness, justice, goodness, mercy, truth and faithfulness. The fact that upright is plural and the other adjectives singular is of no significance. Every upright man is gracious, full of compassion, and righteous. Calvin and some others think that the light of his people is Jehovah, and that the epithets gracious, etc., here apply to God.

5. A good man sheweth favour, and lendeth. Good, commonly so rendered, sometimes glad, cheerful, merry, beautiful, kindly, pleasant. The Chaldee and Hengstenberg have blessed; the Syriac, honest; Secker and Alexander, happy. The term is very comprehensive. Some prefer to read, Good or blessed is the man, who sheweth favor. This does not essentially change the sense. Sheweth favour, a participle the cognate of the word rendered gracious in v. 4. We might read dealeth graciously, sheweth mercy, hath pity, Gen. xxxiii. 11; Ps. xxxvii. 21; Pr. xix. 17. Lendeth, not for usury, but out of mercy. The Jewish law strictly forbade any increase to be received from a distressed brother, Lev. xxv. 35-37. Calvin: "He puts lending as if it were the fruit of mercy; for the usurer also lends, but it is that, under the false pretence of assisting the distressed, he may plunder them." The man, who practises self-denial that he may be able to help the necessitous, will be just and prudent in his worldly business: He will guide his affairs with discretion. Affairs, more commonly rendered words, but also matters, things, Ps. xxxv. 20; ci. 3. Discretion, see Isa. xxviii. 26, most commonly judgment, justice, right. Alexander: "He shall best secure his own interests by treating those of others justly and generously." Calvin: "The righteous will manage their affairs with prudence and discernment; so that, in their domestic affairs, they will neither be too lavish nor sordidly parsimonious; but in every thing they will study to combine frugality with economy, without giving way to luxury."

6. Surely he shall not be moved for ever. Surely, perhaps for; see on Ps. ix. 18. Compare Gen. ii. 3; xxix. 32; Ex. iii. 12. Be moved, see on Ps. xv. 5. Alexander: "He shall not be moved from his prosperous condition, or from his position as a righteous man." Morison: "He shall not perish with ungodly men, nor shall he be deprived of the favor of his God." The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance. All these words are to be taken in their usual signification. The promise here made is so far fulfilled in this life that a just man in the general is allowed to have a good name; but even if in life he is slandered, the children of his revilers build and whiten his sepulchre. Every prophet, whom the Jews slew, was subsequently acknowledged to have been a good man sent of God. But most of the records of earth have been already burned up, and the rest soon will be. It is a small thing to be judged of man's judgment. The only permanent and infallible record is on high. A good name among the saints in glory and their solid friendship will be invaluable and immortal. Above all, the righteous shall be held in everlasting remembrance by God himself, Mal. iii. 16, 17; Rev. iii. 5.

7. He shall not be afraid of evil tidings. The upright may hear bad news in abundance; but by nothing shall he be "frightened from his propriety." Nay, more, he shall not be tormented with constant apprehensions of bad news. He has good cause for calmness and self-possession: His heart is fixed, trusting in the LORD. Fixed, in Psalm lvii. 7, as here; in Psalm li. 10, right. He reposes confidence in Jehovah. He is a Rock, and trust in him gives stability and quiet when nothing else will.

8. His heart is established, he shall not be afraid. Established, in Psalm cxi. 8, stands fast; we might read, is sustained, Gen. xxvii. 37; Isa. lix. 16; Ps. iii. 5; upheld, or stayed, Ps. xxxvii. 17, 24; Cant. ii. 5. The good man's calmness and courage shall not fail Until he see his desire upon his enemies. His desire, better omitted; see on Psalm liv. 7; xcii. 11. As in Psalm cx. 1, until does not limit the sense to the time mentioned, but even until then. Calvin: "Genuine stability is that which the prophet here describes, and which consists in reposing with unshaken confidence in God."

9. He hath dispersed, he hath given to the poor. Dispersed, everywhere else rendered scattered. It expresses liberal and habitual bountifulness. Given, not lent, but bestowed, expecting nothing. His righteousness endureth for ever; see on v. 3. Pool thinks by righteousness here we are to understand liberality, and cites Pr. x. 2; xi. 4; Dan. iv. 27; 2 Cor. ix. 9, 10, in proof. His horn shall be exalted with honour; see on Ps. lxxv. 4, 5. Such blessings as God bestows on the upright, and such graces as he enables him to manifest are not without their effect upon the ungodly.

10. The wicked shall see it, and be grieved. The wicked, in Psalm i., ungodly. He shall see how immeasurably the good man excels the sinner, and shall be grieved, have sorrow, or be provoked to anger. The passions of the wicked make all the mercies of God to his people sources of torment to themselves. He shall gnash with his teeth, and melt away. On the first phrase see on Ps. xxxv. 16. Compare Ps. xxxvii. 12; Lam. ii. 16; Acts vii. 54. The phrase denotes violent rage. Sometimes it denotes impotent rage, Matt. viii. 12; xiii. 42, 50; xxiv. 51; xxv. 30; Luke xiii. 28. This latter is the shade of idea here conveyed. Malignant passions, not permitted to be vented on their victims, turn with fearful power on those, who indulge them. Melt away, elsewhere, faint, be discouraged. The term expresses the death of hope, the extinction of all heart. This is even more fully brought out by the final clause: The desire of the wicked shall perish. Desire; the word is used either in a good or bad sense. In the Psalter it occurs first in Psalm x. 3, 17, on which see. It is sometimes rendered lust, Ps. lxxviii. 30. Here the special desire of the wicked seems to be for the overthrow of the righteous. He shall at last give up all such hope as utterly vain. Compare Job viii. 13; Pr. x. 28; xi. 7; Luke xvi. 24-26. If more terrible conceptions ever enter the human mind than those suggested by this verse, what are they?

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. If in the work of praise we are truly hearty, we shall not be forgotten of God, v. 1.

2. Although the substance of our songs may not treat directly of God, but chiefly of things connected with true piety, yet it is proper to use them in his worship, v. 1. We do praise him whenever we celebrate in a right manner the blessings he bestows on his servants.

3. The greatest want in the world is the want of more piety, v. 1. If to do and to suffer the will of God were our meat and drink, our piety would afford us unspeakable consolations. If we made more of our religion, our religion would do more for us. Calvin: "A man cannot be regarded as a genuine observer of the law, until he has attained to this—that the delight which he takes in the law of God renders obedience agreeable to him."

4. As false religions entail innumerable evils on the posterity of those who embrace them; so it is the glory of the gospel that it carries countless blessings to the children of God's sincere worshippers, v. 2. Morison: "The prayers, the instructions, the examples, and especially the faith of a good man, are a rich inheritance to his children."

5. Miracles are not necessary to secure to the righteous and their offspring comfort and competency in worldly affairs, v. 3. Godliness introduces economy both in time and money. The habits of reflection and order connected with true religion tend to the same result. "Where due care is taken to train up our families in the fear of God, our children will be blessed, and piety will create industry, and industry honest prosperity." Blessed is the man who learns the rules of frugality, and, at the same time, of enlarged liberality. It will be true to the end of the world that "it is more blessed to give than to receive," Acts xx. 35.

6. Although justification is not from everlasting, yet it is to everlasting, vv. 3, 9. There is no condemnation to them who are in Christ Jesus. They are not under wrath; they are under grace.

7. In like manner the riches of divine grace in the heart are through the divine mercy and the indwelling of the Holy Spirit, imperishable, v. 3. To these nothing can compare. They are durable and unsearchable. Floods cannot drown them. Tempests cannot bear them away. Even the last conflagration shall not consume them.

8. The Scripture does not deny that God's people have many and sore trials. It warns them that in this life they are to expect tribulation. But then their supports are many and mighty, v. 4. If the whole portion of God's people were in this life, their case would be sad indeed, 1 Cor. xv. 19. But even here they are not deserted as the wicked are. Cobbin: "If the dark clouds of life pass over the God-fearing man, the light of heaven will break through those clouds, and cheer his heart." No man's estate can grow, if the Almighty blow upon it, Hag. i. 9.

9. A cold, harsh, severe, untender character is no part of the product of Christianity, vv. 4, 5. Godliness is God-likeness. If we would be God's children, we must be merciful, gracious, tender, pitiful. He, who is harsh to the unfortunate, and cruel to the needy, who never forgives the wayward, nor seeks to recover the prodigal, is not like God. Horne: "Ill-nature and avarice are their own tormentors; but love and liberality do good to themselves by doing it to others, and enjoy all the happiness which they cause."

10. To such it shall be well in time and in eternity. God's perfections are their protection. God's providence shall shield them, guide them, supply them. Nothing can harm them, v. 5. Calvin: "It shall be well with those who are gracious and communicative." Green thus renders the first clause of v. 5: The man who is liberal and lendeth shall prosper; Mudge: A man that sheweth favor and lendeth shall do well; Horsley: Happy is the man who is gracious and lendeth.

11. But let us not forget that all solid excellence of personal character is based in essential justice or righteousness, v. 4. Nothing can redeem from infamy a character essentially destitute of the element of justice. It is possible to live in peace and in considerable comfort with one who sacredly regards our rights and faithfully performs the obligations of sheer justice. But no community or family can be quiet when the foundations of equity are subverted.

12. One of the happy fruits of genuine piety, manifested in persons, families and communities, is the prudence engendered in worldly affairs, v. 5. Christian principle alike opposes greed and prodigality. It moderates our desires. It begets salutary caution. Godliness has promise of the life that now is and of that which is to come. Dickson: "Grace and godliness, sound and fruitful faith, do not make men fools without discretion, but consist well with prudence and foresight, in ordering their affairs wisely, and teach them to give, when, what, and to whom they should give, as the circumstances of time, place, and person, need of the party, and their own ability require."

13. Whatever may befall the children of God, their final salvation is certain, v. 6. That is enough and more than enough eternally to overbalance any evils, trials, or disadvantages to which they may be subject in time.

14. Let the reviled, slandered and injured wait till God fully takes up their case. He is mindful of them now and he will hold them in everlasting remembrance, v. 6. Dickson: "Albeit the world may disregard the believer, and traduce him while he liveth, and calumniate him when he is dead, yet his memory shall remain fresh and fragrant before God, angels, and good men who know him."

15. There is a strange power in piety to beget calmness, self-possession and firmness of character, even in the midst of fierce assaults and of dire conflicts with every kind of adversity and adversary, vv. 7, 8. Luther: "Unless there were in us divine strength communicated by Christ, it would be impossible that we could stand against such numerous and mighty assaults of temptation." The righteous will not be dismayed when all nature is dissolving. Arnd: "Look at examples,—how Moses says at the Red sea, Stand still and see the salvation of God. How does Jehosaph stand firm as a wall when a hundred thousand men invade the land, and he slays them all with one song of praise! How firmly does David stand when hunted by Saul! How overwhelmed is Saul with despair when his land is invaded by the Philistines, and he seeks advice from a witch! What firmness is in Daniel when in the lions' den! What joy in Stephen! How did the holy Basilius say when Cæsar Valens threatened him so dreadfully: 'Such bugbears should be set before children!' Athanasius, when Julian persecuted him: 'He is a mist and will soon disappear.'" There is indeed a fascinating power in the world to make its devotees dream of happiness as long as their prosperity lasts. But it is only the child of God who can in triumph repeat Hab. iii. 17, 18.

16. The righteous law of requital, established by God in the world, will in the end bring all things right. As the good man has dispersed and given to the poor, so shall it finally come to him, v. 9, not indeed of merit, but through the abounding grace of the Lord.

17. Let every pious sufferer under the wrongs, slanders and misdeeds of others patiently wait for the day when God will exalt his horn, v. 9. Horne: "At the last day when the thrones of the mighty shall be cast down, and the sceptres of tyrants broken in pieces, then shall he lift up his head, and be exalted to partake of the glory of his Redeemer." Dickson: "Albeit the righteous may have their reputation blasted among men, yet God, in due time, shall make them honorable."

18. Surely Christians ought to pity sinners, v. 10. Their case is sad indeed. They are under strong delusions. They are subject to many trials. Their resources in themselves are very limited. At any moment they may lose their earthly all, and be forever ruined. In this life too, they are very unhappy. They have not benevolence enough to rejoice in the well-being of the righteous. They are often filled with envy. Their prospects are dismal. O Christian, pity and pray for your ungodly neighbor.

19. Let sinners beware. Their day is coming. Already have they tokens in themselves of what is yet to be. Horne: "The sight of Christ in glory with his saints will, in an inexpressible manner, torment the crucifiers of the One, and the persecutors of the others." Wicked men may cast God's cords asunder, they may deny his existence, his attributes and his government; but, poor souls! they will yet find their sins crushing them to the lowest hell. "They shall not have their desire, either of good things for themselves, here or hereafter, or of evil things for the righteous." All, all will end in disappointment and despair. "Lord, form us by thy grace to the character of thy redeemed people, that we may possess their unspeakable felicity."

PSALM CXIII.

- 1 Praise ye the LORD. Praise, O ye servants of the LORD, praise the name of the LORD.
- 2 Blessed be the name of the LORD from this time forth and for evermore.
- 3 From the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same the LORD's name is to be praised.
- 4 The LORD is high above all nations, and his glory above the heavens.
- 5 Who is like unto the LORD our God, who dwelleth on high,
- 6 Who humbleth himself to behold the things that are in heaven, and in the earth?
- 7 He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill;
- 8 That he may set him with princes, even with the princes of his people.
- 9 He maketh the barren woman to keep house, and to be a joyful mother of children. Praise ye the LORD.

THIS Psalm is without title. Some have ascribed it to Samuel; more, to David. The authorship is uncertain. Verses 7, 8, are evidently taken from the song of Hannah, 1 Sam. ii. 8. It is probable too that verse 9 alludes to the mother of Samuel. Anderson well observes that this little ode "is alike elegant in its structure, and devotional in its sentiment." Tradition, perhaps history, may be said to teach us that this and the five Psalms immediately succeeding were sung both at the Passover and at the feast of tabernacles. The scope of this ode has considerable breadth. Luther: "This is a most conspicuous and most blessed prophecy of the kingdom of Christ, and of its extension from the rising unto the setting of the sun throughout all the kingdoms of the earth." Morison: "This beautiful ode may be regarded as a celebration of the omniscient and all-disposing providence of the Most High, more particularly in reference to his afflicted church." Scott dates it B. C. 1040; Clarke, B. C. 535. The names of the Almighty in it are Jehovah LORD and Jah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2, and introductory remarks on Ps. lxviii.

1. Praise ye the LORD. Praise, O ye servants of the LORD, praise the name of the LORD. The word rendered praise is in each case the same; and Jah, the first word rendered LORD, is a poetic abbreviation of Jehovah LORD. "By this often repetition, he stirreth up our cold dulness to praise God." He thus also shows how weighty and urgent is the duty of praising the Most High. In Scripture eminent and pious men are first called God's servants; afterwards all his people. The address here is perhaps indiscriminate.

2. Blessed be the name of the LORD from this time forth and for evermore. One of the ways of praising God is by blessing him, heaping benedictions upon his worthy name. See on Ps. v. 12.

3. From the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same the LORD's name is to be praised. On the first clause see on Ps. l. 1. The Chaldee, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Fabritius have is worthy to be praised; Arabic, let his name be blessed; Venema, Amesius, Piscator, Junius and Tremellius, let his name be praised; Edwards and Jebb, praised be his name; Alexander, be the name of Jehovah blessed; Calvin agrees with the common version. In 2 Sam. xxii. 4; Ps. xviii. 3, the same participle is rendered worthy to be praised. The clause contains a prediction that God's name shall be praised the world over.

4. The LORD is high above all nations. His authority over all nations is sovereign and complete. He disposes of them as he pleases. Clarke: "He governs all, he provides for all; therefore let all give him praise." And his glory [is] above the heavens. Glory, honor, see on Ps. iii. 3. In Ps. vii. 5, it is glory; in Ps. cxii. 9, honor. By the heavens we may possibly understand the angels, Job xv. 15. But it is safer to explain the clause here as in Ps. viii. 1. Compare also Ps. xxxvi. 5; lvii. 5, 10, 11.

5. Who is like unto the LORD our God, who dwelleth on high,

6. Who humbleth himself to behold the things that are in heaven, and in the earth. Who dares to take up this awful challenge? Who dares to compare himself or any creature with the Most High? The rendering of v. 5 cannot be improved. That of v. 6 doubtless gives the sense, though by supplying several words. Edwards throws the two verses into one: Who is like Jehovah our God, that dwelleth on high in the heavens, and yet condescends to behold the things that are upon the earth? Lowth's version is very brief:

Who is like Jehovah our God?
Who dwelleth high,
Who looketh low,
In heaven and on earth.

Some think that the phrase in heaven should follow dwelleth on high, and on earth should follow humbleth himself to behold. Passages are often to be thus construed. See Cant. i. 5; Matt. vii. 6. But this arrangement is not best here; for God truly and infinitely humbles himself to look at things in heaven, Job xv. 15. If it is condescension in Jehovah to care for and commune with angels, how much more to dwell with men and revive the heart of the contrite ones!

7 He raiseth up the poor out of the dust, and lifteth the needy out of the dunghill. The terms of this verse are well rendered, and are to be taken in their usual import. Poor is parallel to needy, and dust to dunghill. On poor see on Ps. xli. 1. On needy see on Ps. ix. 18. Alexander: "Dust and dunghill are common figures in all languages for a degraded social state." Compare Ps. vii. 5; Lam. iv. 5. No doubt the Psalmist here quotes from 1 Sam. ii. 8, as also in verse

8. That he may set him with princes, even with the princes of his people. Princes, sometimes rendered nobles, and when descriptive of character free, willing, liberal. See on Ps. xlvii. 9. His people, his nation. The changes made in the social and political standing of men are to many sources of disgust and uneasiness. But when we learn that they come not by chance, but by the Lord, we may well be quiet. "Shall I not do as I please with mine own?"

9. He maketh the barren woman to keep house, and to be a joyful mother of children. Though not literal, the rendering gives the sense in good English. What is here said was strikingly illustrated in the case of Hannah, Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, the mother of Samson, and of thousands of mothers in Israel. Ages after this Psalm was written John the Baptist was born of a woman childless until she was advanced in life. Those, who spiritualize this passage, refer this clause to the Gentile church. Such a use of the general conception here presented is just, Isa. liv. 1-3; though the prophet probably intended no such use of this particular passage. Praise ye the LORD, or Hallelujah. The closing language of a Psalm is often like that at the beginning.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Let no man be offended at any urgency in reminding him of the great and solemn duties of religion. We must sometimes double and even treble our earnest calls to duty, v. 1. Excellent as is the work of praise, the heart of sinful man reluctates at it.

2. While it is the duty of all men to make known the honor of God, it is especially the duty of those who are his servants by office and by profession not to keep silence on this glorious theme, v. 1.

3. Are we at heart God's willing servants? v. 1. Or does our entire religion consist in profession? Are we swift, diligent and earnest in our own cause, and slow, negligent and heartless in our Master's work?

4. It is an excellence of praise and thanksgiving that we shall never be through with it, v. 2. We should praise him in life, we should praise him in death, we should praise him in joy, we should praise him in sorrow. If saved, we shall praise him for evermore. Calvin: "Can there be anything more base, than for us to magnify God's name but seldom and tardily, considering it ought to fill our thoughts with enrapturing admiration?"

5. He who wants a great theme for meditation, conversation or adoration has it in God. He is so high that there is none above him, and none with him. He is so exultant that none can excessively laud him. Morison: "His glorious works of creation, providence and redemption, shall ere long be celebrated among all nations; for in them all his name is to be praised."

6. One of the enormities connected with any kind of idol worship is that it ignores the glory of God manifested not only in redemption and in providence, but in creation itself. God has sometimes given to mortals great state and majesty. He has beautifully garnished the heavens above us. He has made some men and some angels to be in their measure very excellent. But he is infinitely above them all. He has no equals. He will endure no rivals.

7. Jehovah reigns supreme over heaven and earth, vv. 4, 5. Morison: "He, who made the universe, and who sustains it in being, with all its innumerable tribes, is entitled to govern it, and claims this prerogative as his exclusive and inalienable right. He made all, he provides for all, he upholds all, he governs all; and therefore, let all unite in celebrating his glorious praise."

8. Though in condescension to our weakness, God uses titles expressive of his care and mercy towards us, yet in strictness of speech Jehovah is absolutely incomparable, v. 5. Of all the potentates of earth and the bright spirits of paradise none can compare with him.

9. Of course nothing is more fitting in us than high admiration of his amazing condescension, v. 6. Calvin: "In saying that God is exalted above the heavens, the prophet magnifies his mercy towards men, whose condition is mean and despicable, and informs us that he might righteously hold even angels in contempt, were it not that, moved by paternal regard, he condescends to take them under his care." Compare Ps. viii. 3, 4. Clarke: "Those who are highly exalted are generally unapproachable; they are proud and overbearing, or so surrounded with magnificence and flatterers, that to them the poor have no access: but God though infinitely exalted, humbleth himself to behold even heaven itself; and much more does he humble himself when he condescends to behold earth and her inhabitants. But so does he love his creatures, that he rejoices over even the meanest of them, to do them good." He loves like a God. He condescends like a God.

10. There are changes continually going on in the social and civil positions of men, against which it is idle for us to set ourselves, vv. 7, 8. Scott: "In his providence, the Lord sometimes raises men from the most abject to the most honorable stations in society; and it is well when they acquit themselves properly in their new dignities." It is well when their cotemporaries have discretion and grace enough neither to despise nor to envy them. Henry: "Gideon is fetched from threshing, Saul from seeking the asses, and David from seeking sheep; the apostles are sent from fishing to be fishers of men." Blessed is the man who is not through arrogance above his business, or through negligency and incompetency is not beneath it.

11. These things may well surprise us; but the salvation of every sinner is something far more wonderful still. Horne: "What is the exaltation of the meanest beggar from a dunghill to an earthly diadem, when compared with that of human nature from the grave to the throne of God! Here is honor worthy our ambition: honor after which all are alike invited to aspire; which all may obtain, who strive worthily and lawfully; and of which, when once obtained, nothing can ever deprive the possessors."

12. If God greatly favors and honors us by giving us children, we ought to make frequent and honorable mention of his mercy, and especially give ourselves to the duties arising from so great blessings. Henry: "They that have the comfort of a family, must take the care of it."

13. Luther: "The peculiar and express office of Christ, and the work of the kingdom of Christ, is to bring down the proud, to put to shame the wise, and to condemn hypocrites and false saints: and, on the other side, to raise up and exalt the humble, to enlighten and instruct fools, to sanctify unclean sinners, to make fruitful the barren, and to comfort the fatherless."

PSALM CXIV.

- 1 When Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a people of strange language;
- 2 Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion.
- 3 The sea saw it, and fled: Jordan was driven back.
- 4 The mountains skipped like rams; and the little hills like lambs.
- 5 What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back?
- 6 Ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams: and ye little hills, like lambs?
- 7 Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the God of Jacob;
- 8 Which turned the rock into a standing water, the flint into a fountain of waters.

SCOTT gives no opinion respecting the authorship of this Psalm, but dates it B. C. 1491, which was the year of the Exodus from Egypt. Clarke: "As to the author of this Psalm, there have been various opinions: some have given the honor of it to Shadrach, Meshach, and Abed-nego; others, to Esther; and others, to Mordecai." He dates it B. C. 535. It has been long and justly admired for its poetic beauty. Clarke: "It is elegantly and energetically composed;" Drake: "The exodus of Israel from Egypt, with some of its most remarkable accompanying and consequent miracles, are, in this brief Psalm, commemorated in the boldest style of poetry, with personifications, indeed, of inanimate nature of the utmost daring and sublimity." The names of the Most High here found are Elohim God and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; ii. 4.

1. When Israel went out of Egypt, the house of Jacob from a people of strange language. Went out, literally in the going out. Israel and the house of Jacob are parallel. So are Egypt and a people of strange language. The last phrase expresses the idea that the Egyptians did not speak the language of the Hebrews. The language was strange to Israel, and by a bold figure strange to Jehovah, Ps. lxxxi. 5. Compare Gen. xlii. 23. There is nothing in the Hebrew to justify the rendering of Horsley "a tyrannical people." When God thus brought up his people, and afterwards,

2. Judah was his sanctuary, and Israel his dominion. Judah and Israel are strictly parallel. Israel for a long time denoted all the tribes, and Judah as the head included them all, according to Gen. xlix. 8-12. After the withdrawal of the ten tribes Judah embraced Judah and Benjamin only; Israel, the ten tribes only. But our Psalm relates to a time before the days of Rehoboam; and Judah and Israel here are the same. Judah was his sanctuary, his holy place, or holy thing, a thing consecrated, or devoted. Calvin has it, "for his holiness." The people of the Jews had for a long time the true religion, when surrounding nations served idols. Dominion, several times so rendered, 1 Kings ix. 19; Ps. ciii. 22; Mic. iv. 8; in Isa. xxii. 21, government. Here the word is in the plural, rulings, dominions. Hammond: "And Israel his power," i. e., an instance of his power. The theocracy was in Israel only. In this verse we have twice the pronoun his, though God has not yet been named. We have something like it in Ps. lxxxvii. 1. This is not a fault of style. The author of No. 461 of the Spectator says: "I perceived a beauty in this Psalm which was new to me. The poet utterly conceals the presence of God in the beginning of it, and rather lets a possessive pronoun go without a substantive, than he will so much as mention anything of divinity there. . . If God had appeared before, there could be no wonder why the mountains should leap, and the sea retire; therefore, that this convulsion of nature may be brought in with due surprise, his name is not mentioned till afterwards, and then, with a very agreeable turn of thought, God is introduced at once with all his majesty." This is the best explanation:

3. The sea saw it, and fled; Jordan was driven back. It would be better to omit it. It is not in the Hebrew, nor in the ancient versions. The Syriac supplies him. This is not necessary, but is better than it; for first we have his in the preceding verse, and then we have a like phrase on the same subject, Ps. lxxvii. 16, "The waters saw thee, O God, the waters saw thee; they were afraid." The historic allusion is first to the passage of the Red sea, Ex. xiv. 21, 22, and to the passage of the Jordan, Josh. iii. 14-17.

4. The mountains skipped like rams, and the little hills like lambs. If this is to be taken literally, it has its historic explanation in Ex. xix. 18; Judg. v. 4, 5, alluded to in Ps. xxix. 6; lxviii. 16. This view makes the language of this verse consistent with that of v. 3. Nor does it hinder us from employing the language for figurative purposes, showing how easily God subverts states and kingdoms, as in Jer. iv. 23, 24; Mic. i. 3, 4; Zech. iv. 7. A later prophet has wrought the whole conception into the highest strain of sublime poetry, Hab. iii. 3-10. Calvin: "The description does not exceed the facts of the case. The sea, in rendering obedience to its Creator, sanctified his name; and Jordan, by its submission, put honor upon his power; and the mountains, by their quaking, proclaimed how they were overawed at the presence of his dreadful majesty."

5. What ailed thee, O thou sea, that thou fleddest? thou Jordan, that thou wast driven back?

6. Ye mountains, that ye skipped like rams; and ye little hills, like lambs? In English the sense cannot be better conveyed than by supplying the word ailed. In vv. 3-6, there is an unusual commingling of the preterite and future; but the common version is as good as any. The terms of vv. 3, 4, are carefully transferred to vv. 5, 6. The personification is of the boldest kind. In modern poets no imagery is more admired than some very much like this.

7. Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the Lord, at the presence of the God of Jacob. Tremble, elsewhere be in anguish, travail, fear, travail with pain, Deut. ii. 25; Isa. xxiii. 5; Ps. xcvi. 9; Job xv. 20. It expresses terrible consternation. Several ancient versions use the preterite, but the Chaldee retains the imperative form, which Alexander regards as "peculiarly significant, including both a recollection and prediction; as if he had said the earth might well tremble at the presence of the Lord, and may well tremble at it still." Calvin: "It must be that the earth quake at the presence of her king." That we may not be led astray or be at any loss, as to the Being, who is the Master of the earth, the prophet expressly says, he is Jehovah the God of Jacob. He can do anything; for it is he,

8. Which turned the rock into a standing water, the flint into a fountain of waters.

The history is found in Ex. xvii. 6, 7; Num. xx. 11; Deut. viii. 15. See on Ps. cvii. 35. The spiritual import of this work of God in supplying water is well expressed by the evangelical prophet, Isa. xxxv. 6, 7; xli. 18; xliii. 19; and still better by Paul, in 1 Cor. x. 4. Instead of flint, Street has marble; Clarke, granite. Clarke says: "For such is the rock of Horeb, a piece of which now lies before me." In Job xxviii. 9, the same word is rendered rock, everywhere else flint or flinty, as in Deut. xxxii. 13; Isa. l. 7. It is the hardness and not the scientific name of the rock that is here taught us. Walford: "The divine poet represents the very substance of the rock as being converted into water, not literally, but poetically—thus ornamenting his sketch of the wondrous power displayed on this occasion."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Some events in the lives of men and of nations are of so vast importance in their history that they should never be forgotten, but often and carefully commemorated. Such was the redemption from Egypt, v. 1. Such is the redemption of every believer from the power and dominion of sin. Such are many marked deliverances experienced at the good hand of God.

2. Sometimes it is well for us to take a minute survey of each of our great mercies, and sometimes it is best to take a rapid and general view of them, v. 3. The passage of the Red sea and of the Jordan were separated by nearly forty years; yet they are here brought into close connection.

3. Whenever God begins in earnest to do good to a man or a people, he will continue to do them good unless by their unbelief and rebellion they wickedly reject his mercies, vv. 1-4. When God brings his people out of darkness into light, he is bound by covenant and oath to do them good all their days. Nor will his engagement fail.

4. It is great condescension in God to care for nations, and supply their wants, v. 2. He marvellously provides for them and does them good. He keeps them under his protection. He continues their supplies. He is in every sense their father. They are under his moral government and are accountable to him.

5. When we consider how glorious is the nature of God and how amazing are his perfections, we need not be surprised at the stupendous results produced by his manifested presence, vv. 3, 4. Dickson: "When God will deliver his people, no oppression can hinder; and when he will possess them of what he promised, no impediment can withstand him."

6. If the Lord made the waters of the Jordan to stand still that his people might safely enter the promised land, v. 3; no doubt he will so abate the cold waters of death that his people shall not be swept away by them. The great wonders wrought at their conversion are a pledge that "he will surely divide Jordan to open them a safe passage to their heavenly inheritance." 1 Cor. iii. 21-23.

7. If we exclude God from our philosophy, we will find many things wholly unaccountable, vv. 5, 6. If we ignore his attributes and government, we cannot explain a thousand phenomena of nature, or a thousand events in the history of persons and communities. In that case we should be continually crying, not with poetic beauty as the prophet does here, but in the depths of despondency, What aileth thee, O sea, O river, O mountains, O hills, O everything?

8. Horne: "If the divine presence hath such an effect upon inanimate matter, how ought it to operate on rational and accountable kings? Let us be afraid, with an holy fear, at the presence of God, in the world by his providence, and by his Spirit in our consciences; so that we may have hope and courage in the day when he shall arise to shake terribly the earth," vv. 5-7.

9. It is no idle thing to call upon the earth to tremble at the presence of its Maker. A frown from him makes the globe reel and stagger like a drunken man. When the cup of the wine of the fierceness of his wrath is given to the earth, every island flees away, and the mountains are not found, Rev. xvi. 19, 20.

10. Dickson: "Whomsoever the Lord redeemeth, and setteth on their way to heaven, he will provide whatsoever is necessary for their sustentation and comfort in their journey, as his providing of drink for the camp of Israel giveth proof," v. 8.

11. Luther: "We use this Psalm to give thanks unto Christ, who delivered us from the kingdom of darkness, and translated us into the kingdom of light, even into his own kingdom, the kingdom of God's dear Son, and led us forth into eternal life."

PSALM CXV.

1 Not unto us, O LORD, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake.

2 Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is now their God?

3 But our God is in the heavens; he hath done whatsoever he hath pleased.

4 Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands.

5 They have mouths, but they speak not: eyes have they, but they see not:

6 They have ears, but they hear not: noses have they, but they smell not:

7 They have hands, but they handle not: feet have they, but they walk not: neither speak they through their throat.

8 They that make them are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them.

9 O Israel, trust thou in the LORD: he is their help and their shield.

10 O house of Aaron, trust in the LORD: he is their help and their shield.

11 Ye that fear the LORD, trust in the LORD: he is their help and their shield.

12 The LORD hath been mindful of us: he will bless us; he will bless the house of Israel; he will bless the house of Aaron.

13 He will bless them that fear the LORD, both small and great.

14 The LORD shall increase you more and more, you and your children.

15 Ye are blessed of the LORD which made heaven and earth.

16 The heaven, even the heavens, are the LORD's: but the earth hath he given to the children of men.

17 The dead praise not the LORD, neither any that go down into silence.

18 But we will bless the LORD from this time forth and for evermore. Praise the LORD.

BOTH the date and authorship of this Psalm are uncertain. It has been ascribed to Moses at the Red sea, to David at the beginning of his reign, to Mordecai and Esther, to Shadrach, Meshach and Abed-nego, and to Hezekiah. The discussions on this subject have failed to produce conviction in the mind of others than their authors. This ode suits many times in the history of Israel. The prevailing impression is that it was composed during a time of great trial. Calvin: "It is obvious that this Psalm was penned when the church was deeply afflicted;" Tholuck: "A Psalm of prayer and praise, composed in a time of Pagan oppression;" Pool: "The occasion of this Psalm was to manifest some eminent danger or distress of the people of Israel from some idolatrous nations." Yet it is not a despondent song. Indeed it expresses strong confidence in God. This is so true that Clarke speaks of it as "a triumphal song, in which the victory gained is entirely ascribed to Jehovah." Scott, who thinks it was perhaps written during Sennacherib's invasion, dates it B. C. 710; Clarke, B. C. 535. Hengstenberg says that it is without and against all reason that this Psalm is by some joined to the preceding one, so that the two together form one whole. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and Jah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2, and introductory remarks on Ps. lxxviii.

1. Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto thy name give glory, for thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake. The rendering of this verse is very nearly literal, and yet gives the sense in pure English. We have here a full and complete renunciation of all merit, of all claim to honor for anything that had ever been done, or that might yet be done for the preservation or elevation of Israel, as a nation, or as a church. Some would confine the disclaimer of merit to the receipt of future benefits; but it would display a monstrous state of self-righteousness to flatter ourselves that we had deserved past benefits, and were merely unworthy of future blessings. He who does not acknowledge that all the good he has received was of pure grace, knows nothing of genuine humility. Nor is it for their own honor, but for the glory of God's name, that he is asked to interpose. We may well ask him to defend and protect the honor of his throne. Calvin: "Suffused with shame by reason of their calamity, which in itself amounts to a kind of rejection, they durst not openly crave, at God's hand, what they wished, but made their appeal indirectly, that, from a regard to his own glory, he would prove a father to sinners, who had no claim upon him whatever." Nor do the truly pious merely intimate their own unworthiness; but they declare it over and over again—Not unto us, not unto us. All the prevailing causes of the divine procedure in any case are found in God himself, in his mercy, his truth or faithfulness, his justice, his power, his unchangeableness. Compare Num. xiv. 15–18; Isa. xliii. 7, 25; xlviii. 11; Ezek. xxxvi. 32; Dan. ix. 18, 19; Eph. i. 6; Rev. iv. 8–11.

2. Wherefore should the heathen say, Where is now their God? Things had come to a sad state, when the presence, the providence, and even the being of Jehovah were thus insolently questioned, and when none but Jehovah could vindicate himself from the vilest reproaches. It was time for him to work, Ps. cxix. 126. The insulting and exultant form of question is the same as in Ps. lxxix. 10, with the addition of now, "which (says Alexander) is not a particle of time, but of entreaty, or, in this connection, of triumphant demand." In Gen. xii. 13; xviii. 4; Jud. ix. 38, it is rendered I pray, or I pray thee; in Ex. xxxiii. 18, I beseech thee.

3. But our God is in the heavens. But, commonly rendered and; by Calvin here, surely; by Edwards, whereas. It may here be rendered, at the same time, in response to the now of the preceding verse. Our God is in the heavens, where your gods are not, never were, and never will be; where he rules all heavenly and earthly powers; where your malice and rage can never reach. Compare Ps. ii. 4; lxviii. 4; cxxxv. 6. The fact that our God is invisible and not perceptible by our senses is a part of our rejoicing in him. Venting spleen against him is as idle as throwing stones at the stars, or like a dog baying the moon. He hath done whatsoever he hath pleased. The trials which have befallen his people were not contrary to his will. The short and vain triumph of his foes was not without his permission. Compare Isa. xlvi. 10; Dan. iv. 35.

4. Their idols are silver and gold, the work of men's hands. Their, referring to the heathen, in v. 2. Idols, not the vanities of Ps. xevi. 5, but a word meaning images, found in 1 Sam. xxxi. 9; 2 Sam. v. 21; Ps. cvi. 36, 38. It occurs in Ps. cxxxv. 15. These images are silver and gold, of no more value as gods than the mire of the streets. Instead of being self-existent like the true God, instead of being alive like angels or men deriving their natures from heaven, instead of making men or anything else, they are themselves the work of men's hands. A man might as well expect help and salvation from an old shoe or from a tattered garment as from an image made of anything, however costly the material or curious the workmanship. Calvin: "The passage may be translated adversatively, thus, Though they are of gold and silver, yet they are not gods, because they are the work of men's hands."

5. They [the idols] have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not. Street: There is a mouth to them, but they cannot speak; there are eyes to them, but they cannot see. If there could be any desirable variation from this, it would be to put will not for cannot; for speak and see are both in the future. These idols are both dumb and blind, and will be so forever.

6. They have ears, but they hear not; noses have they, but they smell not. Street: There are ears to them, but they cannot hear; there is a nose to them, but they cannot breathe. Smell is better than breathe, used both by Waterland and Street; and better than murmur, used by Pool and Hammond. Both hear and smell are in the future. They do not these things now, and they never will do them.

7. They have hands, but they handle not; feet have they, but they walk not; neither speak they through their throat. Handle, walk and speak in the future, as in vv. 5, 6. Instead of handle, we might better read feel. Verses 5-7 contain a very remarkable instance of ridicule without unfairness. Every sentence is just and candid. There is no exaggeration, no coloring. The parallel is found in Isa. xl. 18-25; xli. 7; xliv. 9-20; xlv. 5-7; Jer. ii. 27, 28; x. 3-16. How vain must be the help of gods, who can neither speak, nor see, nor hear, nor smell, nor feel, nor walk, nor resent the greatest insult offered to them, nor avenge the greatest wrong done to their devotees. How very different it is with the true God is often declared in Scripture, Ex. iv. 11; Ps. xi. 4; xvii. 3; xlv. 21; xciv. 9; cxxxix. 1-12; Jer. xxiii. 23, 24. Not only is idolatry absurd and ridiculous, but its effect on those who practise its rites is degrading.

8. They that make them [the idols] are like unto them; so is every one that trusteth in them. This doubtless means that like the images, these false worshippers shall be as powerless and as contemptible as the idols they worship. But does it not mean also, that they shall become degraded and debased by their very religion? A man is like the object he really worships. Tholuck: "It is the curse of every false religion that man becomes like his God: the worshippers of a soulless god get soulless themselves." Scott: "The makers and worshippers of idols renounce their reason and understanding, and willingly become as stupid, as the very objects of their worship."

9. O Israel, trust thou in the LORD. Trust, here and in vv. 10, 11, in the imperative. It expresses reliance, confidence, Mic. vii. 5. In Ps. xxii. 9, one form of the verb is rendered didst make me hope. As the heathen confide in images, much more let the people of Jehovah rely upon him. He is their help and their shield. See on Ps. xxxiii. 20. Idols are no help and no protection, or shield. But Jehovah is almighty, all-wise and most merciful. None ever trusted in him and was confounded. The address of this verse is to all, high and low, rich and poor, young and old, all Israel. But as God had given peculiar honor to the tribe of Levi, and as they were eminently his ministers, his ambassadors, his witnesses, he fitly makes a solemn call on them:

10. O house of Aaron, trust in the LORD: he is their help and their shield. Nor does he stop with the priests; but makes a direct and solemn appeal to the truly godly:

11. Ye that fear the LORD, trust in the LORD; he is their help and their shield. This verse is the same as the two preceding in all respects, except in the persons addressed, who are those fearing Jehovah. On the fear of God see on Ps. ii. 11. That the truly godly are designated in this verse seems very clear. Clarke: "All real penitents, and sincere believers."

12. The LORD hath been mindful of us. How refreshing is this assurance. It implies all that we shall ever need. Past mercies sent in covenant love are pledges of all needed blessings in time to come. See on precisely the same Hebrew phrase in Ps. ix. 12. Compare Ps. viii. 4. Remember, in a good sense. He will bless us; he will bless the house of Israel, he will bless the house of Aaron.

13. He will bless them that fear the LORD, both small and great. Bless, as in Ps. v. 12. The descriptions of persons are the same as those given in vv. 9–11, with this addition to the last, that none of those, who really fear the Lord, shall be neglected however humble or elevated their condition, but each one shall have a blessing. There is nothing gained by reading the verb bless in the past tense. The Hebrew is future; and the future gives the best sense.

14. The LORD shall yet increase you more and more, you and your children. The rendering cannot be improved. In a sense all predictions of good to the people of God are so far prayers on the part of the prophets that the righteous desire their fulfilment. This is strictly a prediction—in the future. Calvin: “God’s liberality is an inexhaustible fountain, which will never cease to flow so long as its progress is not impeded by the ingratitude of men. And hence it will be continued to their posterity, because God manifests the grace and the fruit of his adoption even to a thousand generations.” It is a meager interpretation that confines the promise of this verse to a mere multiplying of the Jews after the Babylonish captivity.

15. Ye are blessed of the LORD, which made heaven and earth. Blessed, the passive form of the word bless, so frequently occurring in this Psalm. The resources of God are infinite, as is proven by his having made all things. Were it necessary he could bring into existence innumerable worlds to enrich and multiply his people. Hengstenberg and Alexander think that in this verse there is a special reference to the blessing pronounced by Melchizedek on Abraham, Gen. xiv. 19. In both places, creative power is the foundation of the confidence that the blessing will neither be small nor of short continuance.

“My heart is awed within me, when I think Of the great miracle that still goes on,
In silence, round me—the perpetual work
Of thy creation, finished, yet renewed Forever.”

16. The heaven, even the heavens, are the LORD’s. In the Hebrew the word for heavens is in both cases plural. How much may be included by it can be seen on Psalm viii. 1. Here it seems specially to refer to the third heavens, in which God preëminently reveals his glory, and which is his house, the temple not made with hands. It is put in contrast with the abode of mortals: But the earth hath he given to the children of men. That is, earth is man’s abode during his natural life, and in a sense he is lord of it, having dominion over its other inhabitants.

17. The dead praise not the LORD, neither any that go down into silence. God’s praise on earth is not heard from the lips of those who have died, or gone into silence, or the grave; see on Ps. vi. 5; ix. 17; xxxi. 12, 17, 18; xciv. 17. The true Israel cannot become extinct upon earth, for then the true praises of Jehovah would fail from among men; and Jehovah has determined that this shall never be. Calvin: “Lord, if thou shouldst allow us to perish, what would be the result, but that thy name would become extinct, and would be entombed with us?” Compare Isaiah xxxviii. 19.

18. But we will bless the LORD from this time forth and for evermore. Bless, as in Ps. v. 12, in the future. We may read shall bless, expressing prophetic certainty drawn from the fact that God will so richly bless us; or we may take it as the expression of a purpose—we will—a purpose formed in view of favors received and confidently expected. The thing is certain and the saints have a will for it, and a purpose to engage in it. Praise the LORD, hallelujah; see on Ps. civ. 35; cv. 45. Scott: “There is a peculiar animation in the concluding part of this Psalm, when considered not so much as praise for benefits received, as the language of faith and hope in regard to difficulties."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Because God is the one, only, true, living, almighty God, the Preserver of men and of angels, he in whom our breath is, and whose are all our ways; we should imitate the Psalmist, and abound in praise and thanksgiving to the Most High, v. 1.

2. Although God is so good, yet the sins of his people are so many and so hateful, that we should not be surprised at finding them in great straits and for a time under the power of wicked men, even persecuting idolaters, vv. 1, 2.

3. Because self-righteousness is exceedingly abominable to God, and very offensive to right-minded men, we ought most sedulously to guard against it. It is very insidious. Here the church enters disclaimer upon disclaimer, v. 1. It has a mighty effect in humbling us, in making us quiet under affliction, and patient under denial of our petitions to know that we deserve all the evil, and none of the good that befalls us.

4. In all our prayers for deliverance and victory, we ought to be careful that we do not ask God's blessings that we may consume them upon our lusts, but that his name may be glorified, v. 1.

5. Dickson: "When we have brought ourselves into misery, and our religion into danger of disgrace; we ought to be more careful to have the Lord restored to his honor, and true religion to its own beauty, than to be freed from misery," v. 2.

6. Insults from heathen and infidel men, amounting to taunts and mockery of all the sentiments of the godly are no new thing, v. 2. It has always been so. It will be so to the end of the world.

7. To the right-minded and pious it is a source of unspeakable consolation that Jehovah is entirely beyond the reach of the malice of all his foes. He is in the heavens, v. 3. And not only is he exalted, but he is sovereign. Clarke: "Jehovah is absolute master of the universe." Gill: "He hath done whatsoever he pleased; in creation, in providence, and in grace: he hath made what creatures he pleased, and for his pleasure; and he does according to his will, and after the counsel of it, in heaven and in earth; and is gracious to whom he will be gracious; and saves and calls men, not according to their works, but according to his own purpose and will."

8. No Scriptural representation of the absurd, shocking, ruinous or degrading nature of idolatry is excessive, vv. 4-8. It is bad from beginning to end. Cobbin: "It is an awful proof of the degraded state of human nature, that men of intelligent understandings in other things should abase themselves to bow the knee to carved pieces of gold, or silver, or wood, or stone." Nor can any people be too grateful for the mercy of being saved from the horrors of idolatry. The true God is so glorious that there never was but one good image of him upon earth, and that was found in the person of his dear Son.

9. There can in no case be a substitute for faith in God; leading us to believe whatever he has spoken, to rely upon his grace, to confide in him fully and unfalteringly, vv. 9-11. This is true in the case of every class and condition of believers, the high and low, the rich and the poor, the priest and the people. Men are never truly blessed till they set their hope in God. "Here they find help in time of need, and protection in seasons of danger."

10. God's past care of his people is an ample pledge that in the future he will not desert them, v. 12. This doctrine is founded upon the unchangeableness of the divine nature and plan.

11. The provisions of divine grace are admirably adapted to the wants of all, v.

13. The friends of the great often withdraw from them, sometimes through humility, perhaps often through pride and envy. But God does not forsake a man merely because he has become great in the world. More frequently the friends of the poor or afflicted forsake him because he is distressed; but the Lord doth not so. Henry: "The greatest need his blessing, and it shall not be denied to the meanest that fear him."

12. It is no wonder that God's blessing greatly enriches those on whom it falls, and makes them to abound more and more, vv. 12-15. Calvin thinks the frequent repetition of the word bless is intended to mark the uninterrupted stream of God's loving-kindness.

13. How exceedingly excellent and glorious heaven must be. It is the abode of God himself, v. 16. It is our Father's house. There is the throne of his majesty. There is every choice spirit that has ever passed away from earth. There the angels minister. There the saints reign. There God is wondrously manifested in the flesh.

14. If in this world abounding with sin, God is still so bountiful to his creatures, how inexhaustibly full of grace and goodness his nature must be, v. 15. We cannot easily fall into excess in extolling the bounty of God, in having so richly supplied the wants of all his creatures, and particularly the wants of man.

15. Let us work while it is day; the night cometh when no man can work, vv. 17, 18. Let us not be weary in well doing; but steadfast, unmoveable, always abounding in the work of the Lord. Let us do with our might what our hands find to do. Scott: "As death will terminate our opportunities of praising God on earth, let us now redeem the time, that we may glorify him with our lips and in our lives. Then we shall shortly join the company before the throne, and assist them in blessing our God; and our bodies will be raised from the silent grave to join in this delightful work to all eternity."

16. It is easy to pervert Scripture, which is so written that they who wish to cavil may find fault. This is remarkably illustrated in vv. 16, 17. From the former some would teach that God has abandoned the world and its inhabitants to take care of themselves; and from the latter that the Bible teaches that there is no conscious existence beyond this life. But all this is gross perversion. Let carnal men beware how they wrest the Scriptures.

17. God shall have a church on earth to the end of the world, v. 18. None others truly praise or glorify him. Nor can the church be so sunk down and sadly depressed in her condition as that her joys shall not break forth in loud and blessed songs.

18. However sad our outward state, let us be cheered by the prospect, and settled in the purpose of praising God eternally, v. 18. In the darkest days let us look for the Star of hope. In the saddest hours, let us joy in God.

PSALM CXVI.

1 I love the LORD, because he hath heard my voice and my supplications.

2 Because he hath inclined his ear unto me, therefore will I call upon him as long as I live.

3 The sorrows of death compassed me, and the pains of hell gat hold upon me: I found trouble and sorrow.

4 Then called I upon the name of the LORD; O LORD, I beseech thee, deliver my soul.

- 5 Gracious is the LORD, and righteous; yea, our God is merciful.
 6 The LORD preserveth the simple: I was brought low, and he helped me.
 7 Return unto thy rest, O my soul; for the LORD hath dealt bountifully with thee.
 8 For thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling.
 9 I will walk before the LORD in the land of the living.
 10 I believed, therefore have I spoken: I was greatly afflicted:
 11 I said in my haste, All men are liars.
 12 What shall I render unto the LORD for all his benefits toward me?
 13 I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the LORD.
 14 I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people.
 15 Precious in the sight of the LORD is the death of his saints.
 16 O LORD, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant, and the son of thine handmaid: thou hast loosed my bonds.
 17 I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the LORD.
 18 I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people,
 19. In the courts of the LORD's house, in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem. Praise ye the LORD.

THE division of this Psalm into two by the Septuagint, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway, is without authority or reason. The date and authorship are both uncertain. The Syriac, Calvin, Patrick, Henry, Scott and others regard David as its author. Clarke, Tholuck, Hengstenberg, Alexander and others suppose it was written after the captivity. Morison: "It is by no means unsuitable to the circumstances which attended the miraculous recovery of Hezekiah." Those, who regard David as author are divided in opinion as to the occasion of its composition; whether the pursuit of David by Saul to the cave, the rebellion of Absalom, or some other occasion. The character of the ode defies all attempts to fix it to any one occasion. But the fact that in it we find several marks of the Chaldee Dialect goes far to strengthen doubts as to the Davidic authorship. Clarke: "Many think it relates wholly to the passion, death, and triumph of Christ. Most of the Fathers were of this opinion." Fry adopts this view and argues for it from 2 Cor. iv. 10-14, where v. 10 is quoted. Bellarmine says: "With the holy Fathers, Basil, Chrysostom, Jerome and Augustine, we judge this Psalm is to be understood of the spiritual man, earnestly desiring eternal life, and groaning on account of temptations and dangers." The church of England has appointed this Psalm for the thanksgiving of women after child-birth. Many pastors use it privately on such occasions. Some churches uniformly use a metrical version of a part of it in celebrating the Lord's Supper. The student of the Psalter has already learned that such uncertainties, as have been just stated, detract nothing from the instruction or consoling power of a Psalm. Portions of it are evidently taken wholly or in part from previous Psalms. Compare v. 3, with Ps. xviii. 4-6; v. 5, with Ps. ciii. 8; v. 11, with Ps. xxxi. 22. Scott dates it B. C. 1020; Clarke, B. C. 515. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and Jah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2, and introduction to Ps. lxviii. Luther: "This is a Psalm of thanksgiving, in which the Psalmist renders thanks, after coming out of a most heavy trial, and again rejoices in God." Pool: "This Psalm contains a solemn thanksgiving to God for a glorious deliverance from grievous and dangerous calamities; as also from great perplexities and terrors of mind arising from the sense of God's displeasure." Tholuck calls it "a delightful Psalm of thanksgiving." The more this Psalm is studied, the more will the pious mind refer it to spiritual conflicts and victories.

1. I love the LORD, because he hath heard my voice and my supplications. Literally, I love, because Jehovah hath heard. It is a beauty in composition to name no person, when the very occasion shows who is the dear one alluded to. See John xx. 15. The first verb is in the preterite; the second, in the future. Calvin so renders them. But Edwards, Hengstenberg and Alexander put both verbs in the present tense. See Introduction, § 6. Love is better than rejoice, am pleased, or have desired; often applied to the matter of loving God, Deut. vi. 5; xi. 1; xxx. 20; Josh. xxii. 5; xxiii. 11. It is the verb used to express Jacob's love of Joseph, Gen. xxxvii. 34; Jonathan's affection for David, 1 Sam. xx. 17; the warm heart of a pious man to God's word, Ps. cxix. 97, 119, 127, 159. Voice, usually so rendered. Here it means the voice of prayer. Supplications, as in Ps. lv. 1. It denotes petitions for which gracious answer is sought. In Josh. xi. 20, the word is rendered favor.

2. Because he hath inclined his ear unto me, therefore I will call upon him as long as I live. On inclining the ear see on Ps. xvii. 6; xxxi. 2; xl. 1; lxxviii. 1. On calling upon God see on Ps. iii. 4, where it is rendered cried. To call upon God is in general to worship him, Gen. iv. 26; in particular any act of worship as prayer. We have the same word in the same form in vv. 4, 13, 17. In vv. 13, 17, it seems to denote thanksgiving. Some answers to prayer are so seasonable, and so memorable that the pious never forget them. Such are answers to prayers offered in times of peculiar peril and dejection.

3. The sorrows of death encompassed me. See on Ps. xviii. 4, where we have precisely the same words both in Hebrew and English. The pains of hell gat hold upon me. Pains, elsewhere straits, distresses. Hell, sheol; see on Ps. vi. 5; ix. 17; xvi. 10; xviii. 5. Gat hold, in the next clause found. I found trouble and sorrow. Trouble, cognate to the word rendered pains in this verse. Sorrow, always so, or grief. See Ps. xiii. 2; xxxi. 10; cvii. 39. All the terms and phrases of this verse evince a sad plight, a case distressing in the extreme.

4. Then called I upon the name of the LORD; O LORD, I beseech thee, deliver my soul. Called, literally will call. See on v. 2. I beseech, in Hebrew an interjection, full of urgent entreaty. Alexander renders it Ah here and in v. 16; in Ex. xxxii. 31, it is rendered Oh; in v. 16, simply O. Deliver, usually so rendered. Soul, it may mean life, as in Gen. ix. 5; xix. 17; Ps. xxxi. 13; xxxviii. 12; or soul, as in Ps. iii. 2; vi. 3, 4. If this Psalm records a case of deep spiritual distress, we must read soul. The whole verse and context show that he sought help from God alone.

5. Gracious is the LORD, and righteous; yea, our God is merciful. Gracious, as in Ps. lxxxvi. 15; ciii. 8; cxi. 4; cxii. 4. Righteous, the epithet applied to the godly in Ps. i. 5, 6, and to Jehovah in Ps. xi. 7. It here expresses the essential rectitude of God's nature, whereby he is infallibly preserved from doing or countenancing wrong. Merciful, a participle from the verb twice rendered pity in Ps. ciii. 13, elsewhere have mercy, have compassion, Isa. xxx. 18; xlix. 15.

6. The LORD preserveth the simple. Preserveth, often keepeth, observeth, regardeth, taketh heed to, implying watchful guardianship. The simple; the word occurs only in the Psalms thrice, in Proverbs thirteen times, and in Ezekiel once. It is uniformly rendered simple except in Pr. ix. 6, where it is foolish. Here it is plural and denotes the feeble-minded, or as Calvin says, "such as, being undesigning, do not possess the requisite prudence for managing their own affairs." Fry has weak. Simple has the same meaning here as in Ps. xix. 7. The simple are those who cannot keep or preserve themselves. The Psalmist spoke with feeling and with confidence. I was brought low, and he helped me. The rendering of this clause gives the sense and is in pure English. Helped, almost invariably rendered saved. The account suits a case of sickness, of poverty, of persecution, of temptation, of melancholy, spiritual darkness or desertion. If the Psalm is spoken in the name of the church, as a body, this and other clauses suit any state of trial in which she can possibly be placed.

7. Return unto thy rest, O my soul. Rest, in the plural rests; in Num. x. 33, resting-place; in Ps. xxiii. 2, still. What is the rest of the pious soul? Not the promised land, as some say, but God himself, his word, his covenant, his perfections, his providence, his worship, confidence in him, reliance on him. If rest is taken in the abstract, then it signifies the quietness of the soul. The encouragement to return to repose in God is stated: For the LORD hath dealt bountifully with thee. On this verb see on Ps. xiii. 6; in Ps. vii. 7; ciii. 10, rewarded. Calvin: For Jehovah hath recompensed unto thee; church of England and Jebb: For the Lord hath rewarded thee; Edwards: For Jehovah has been gracious to thee; Street: Since Jehovah hath been kind to thee.

8. For thou hast delivered my soul from death, mine eyes from tears, and my feet from falling. Delivered, as in Ps. vii. 4; xviii. 19; xci. 15. 'It implies effectual deliverance. On some of the phrases here used see on Ps. lvi. 13. Compare Ps. lxxxvi. 13; Isa. xxv. 8; xxxviii. 5; Jer. xxxi. 16; Rev. vii. 17; xxi. 4. Whatever the evil, the rescue had been timely and complete.

9. I will walk before the LORD in the land of the living. Past experience of God's mercy and kindness satisfied him that he should still be shielded and protected. Land, in Hebrew plural lands. Land of the living, see on Ps. xxvii. 3. I will may express confident expectation, or a solemn purpose; more probably the latter. If so, then before the Lord means, as in his presence, or with his fear before him. Horne: "'I will walk before the Lord,' as one under his inspection, 'in the land of the living,' or amongst the redeemed in the church; until the time come for me to depart hence, and to be numbered with the saints in glory everlasting."

10. I believed, therefore have I spoken. That these words are to be taken in their obvious sense is proven by Paul, 2 Cor. iv. 13. What he had said or should say should not be heartless or insincere; but according to his religious belief. Alexander: "His speaking was a proof of his faith." There is nothing to warrant the rendering of Street: I believed that I was lost, although he cites Kennicott's note to support him. I was greatly afflicted. Many read, I have greatly humbled myself. A still better rendering is: I was greatly exercised. See Ecc. i. 13; iii. 10. The very depths of his soul were moved.

11. I said in my haste, All men are liars. In my haste, in Hebrew a verb in the infinitive. See on Ps. xxxi. 22, where we have the same. The Syriac has, With trembling; Calvin, In my fear; Edwards, In my consternation; Street, In mine affright; Hengstenberg, In my alarm; Chaldee and Green, In my flight; Alexander, In my terror. So that we may understand the Psalmist as saying that in his distressing experience he discovered the utter vanity of man as a resource, or even as a friend. See how all forsook Christ himself in his trying hour. Liars, a participle of a verb in Job xli. 9, rendered is in vain, and in Isa. lviii. 11, fail. Yet the word is usually rendered liar. Compare Ps. lxii. 9, where the cognate noun is rendered a lie, and all men pronounced lighter than vanity. Well may it make one tremble to arrive at so appalling a discovery, and be so convinced of it as to feel bound to utter it as solemn truth. Alexander: "The proposition, all mankind are false, i. e., not to be trusted or relied upon, implies as its complement or converse, therefore God alone is to be trusted." Hengstenberg: "All men disappoint the trust placed in them, leave in the lurch those who hope in them." Other interpretations are given by serious and learned men. One is that David is here the speaker, and says in his affliction that Samuel and Nathan and all, who had told him how he should be king, had deceived him. This makes David slander God's prophets and express unbelief in a manner and to a degree that we can hardly impute to him. Another explanation is that the author of this Psalm is chiding himself, "What am I doing? Dare I doubt or distrust God? I will rather give up confidence in all men, than withdraw my trust in God." The difficulty is in getting this sense from the grammatical construction of the verse. Another interpretation, perhaps the popular one, is that the Psalmist here as in Ps. xxxi. 22, admits that he spoke rashly and unadvisedly, and that he erred in charging universal faithlessness on the race, because many had been found heartless sycophants and hypocrites. The great objection is the want of an occasion for such a statement. It is quite contrary to the preceding verse, which declares that he was uttering his firm religious belief. The only way to dispose of this difficulty would be to change the punctuation of verse 10, and make its declaration refer to something previously said. Whatever the darkness had been, light had at length arisen and gratitude had taken the place of despondency:

12. What shall I render unto the LORD for all his benefits toward me? Render, elsewhere return, bring back, deliver, recompense. For benefits Jebb has rewards; Street, kindness; Hengstenberg, gifts; Alexander, bestowments. God grants gracious rewards both here and hereafter. The word benefits excludes all danger of misapprehending the true idea of the prophet and covers the whole ground. What, so rendered in Gen. xx. 10, how in Num. xxiii. 8, and what thing in Lam. ii. 13. Calvin: "The question is emphatic, What shall I render? and imports, that it was not the desire, but the means, of which he was destitute, to enable him to render thanks to God." An adequate return was impossible; yet he resolves on doing the best he can:

13. I will take the cup of salvation, and call upon the name of the Lord. Very seldom is a translation more perfect in every respect. Will take, may mean I will take from the table before me; or I will elevate towards heaven. Street has it, I will lift up, signifying an act of grateful devotion. By the cup of salvation (Hebrew salvations) Joseph Mede understands "the drink-offering annexed to and poured upon the sacrifice." There seems to be no good reason for doubting that such a custom prevailed. Jewish literature abounds with allusions to it. The law itself prescribes a drink-offering accompanying the continual burnt-offering, Num. xxviii. 7. From this divine ordinance, and from the frequent use of wine in feasts, the custom of using the cup of thanksgiving was probably adopted in other religious services. No wine was divinely appointed for the Passover, neither was any hymn. Yet in celebrating that feast Christ and his apostles used both, Matt. xxvi. 26-30; Luke xxii. 17-20. Many think Paul alludes to this well-known usage when he speaks of "the cup of blessing," 1 Cor. x. 16. This interpretation is generally received. Hengstenberg, followed by Alexander, rejects it. They suggest that "the cup is a frequent figurative representation of what is allotted to each man," "the portion God allots one." In proof they cite Ps. xi. 6; xvi. 5; lx. 3; lxxv. 8. Our Lord used the term in the same sense, John xviii. 11. If this explanation is correct, the meaning is, "I will thankfully accept the deliverances God works for me, and by suitable acts of devotion, especially of praise (Ps. l. 23), I will testify my love."

14. I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people. On vows and their payment see on Ps. xxii. 25; l. 14. So great benefits as the Psalmist had received deserved not only private praise, but the most public thanksgiving. So he desired that it might be in the presence of all God's people. The word rendered now is in Gen. xii. 11 rendered as here; but commonly I pray, I beseech, or by the optative oh, Gen. xviii. 4, 30; Ex. xxxiii. 18, so that we may read the verse: I will pay my vows unto the Lord, (oh that I may do so) in the presence of all his people, i. e., of assembled Israel, or in the most public manner possible.

15. Precious in the sight of the LORD is the death of his saints. Saints, in Ps. iv. 3, godly; in Ps. xviii. 25, merciful. God takes such care of the lives of his people, and "rates them at so high a price, that he will not easily grant them to those that most desire them." The life of one good man is in God's esteem more precious than the lives of whole cities and tribes of the ungodly, Gen. xix. 15-22; yet Jehovah does not lightly esteem, much less wanton with the lives of even the heathen, Jonah iv. 10, 11.

Precious, as in Ps. xlix. 8; lxxii. 14. Alexander: "God counts the death of his people too costly to be lightly or gratuitously suffered;" Henry: "Though no man lays it to heart, when the righteous perish, God will make it to appear that he lays it to heart."

16. O LORD, truly I am thy servant; I am thy servant, and the son of thy handmaid. Truly, in v. 4, I beseech thee. In the second clause is a suppressed surely. The servant was one quite at the disposal of his master. The prophet doubles the assertion of his belonging wholly to God, and then adds that the tie, which bound him to God, was of the strongest nature, was hereditary. Alexander: "The additional phrase, son of thy handmaid, is much stronger than thy servant, and describes him as a home-born slave." See on Ps. lxxxvi. 16. Thou hast loosed my bonds. The bonds are those of affliction and correction noticed in the early part of this Psalm.

17. I will offer to thee the sacrifice of thanksgiving, and will call upon the name of the LORD. The first clause of this verse and the first clause of verse 13 explain each other. The second clause of this verse is identical with that of v. 13.

18. I will pay my vows unto the LORD now in the presence of all his people. To a jot and a tittle the same as in v. 14. The last clause is explained somewhat in the next verse:

19. In the courts of the LORD's house, in the midst of thee, O Jerusalem. This confirms the exposition given of v. 14. Praise ye the LORD, literally Hallelujah, as in Ps. civ. 35.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Gratitude is not a sordid affection, but is one of the essential exercises of a renewed mind, v. 1. True love to God consists in a genuine delight in the divine character, in a sincere good-will towards God and his cause, and in heartfelt gratitude for his mercies. The doctrine here taught is confirmed in other Scriptures, 1 John iv. 19; Luke vii. 47. When we review the desperate state of guilt and misery out of which God has delivered us, our gratitude cannot be excessive.

2. If God's children are brought into straits and made to suffer sharply, such trials cannot be unprofitable to them so long as they lead them to a throne of grace, and in the end serve to quicken their attachment to him and his cause, v. 1.

3. Tholuck: "It is a great thing to know from our own experience that we have a reconciled Father in heaven, who cares for us, and, though infinitely exalted, hears the cry of poor, troubled mortals," v. 1.

4. We shall never be done praying until we enter Paradise, v. 2. Henry: "As long as we continue living, we must continue praying: this breath we must breathe till we breathe our last, because then we shall take our leave of it, and till then we have continual occasion for it."

5. One answer from the throne of grace mightily encourages prayer in all believers, v. 2. Clarke: "He that prays much will be emboldened to pray more, because none can supplicate the throne of grace in vain." Dickson: "One proof of God's hearing our prayer may, and should stir us up to believe in worship, and have our recourse by prayer to him all the rest of our life."

6. Those are miserable comforters, who go about telling mankind that there is no such thing as pain. Such do but mock the miseries of their race. The living have griefs like the sorrows of death. The sick sometimes have anguish like the pains of hell. And all of us have trouble and sorrow, vv. 3, 4. Among all the afflictions to which we are subject, soul troubles are the worst. Terrors in the soul are worse than any bodily pains. Still even these are useful if they lead us "with holy vehemence to the throne of Jehovah's mercy."

7. True religious experience has its ups and downs, vv. 3, 4. The child of God is not always on the mount, nor always in the valley of the shadow of death. "It is no strange thing to see a godly person in fear of death, bodily and spiritual, temporal and everlasting."

8. A modest, truthful, yet minute statement of God's dealings with us, especially in the troubles of our souls, is sometimes called for, and may often be useful, vv. 3, 4.

9. However great our trials may be, when God interposes the relief is effectual. We find him not only just, but gracious and merciful, v. 5. In the divine character is every pledge called for by the extremities of God's people.

10. In one sense all men are too simple to take care of themselves; but the righteous are so sincere and free from craft and artifice that they can never cope with the wiles of men and of the great adversary. They specially need the preserving care of God. And they shall surely have it, v. 6. Divine wisdom is more than a match for all the devices of the adversary. Dickson: "The Lord's children commonly are not the most worldly-wise people, but for the most part are of mean worldly wit, and whosoever of them have any measure of prudence, are, for the course which they keep in trials and troubles, accounted foolish; yea, and in their own estimation they are very witless, and dare not lean to their own understanding, but seek to be directed by God." This very renunciation of their own wisdom is the great means of their preservation, Deut. xxxii. 36.

11. How blessed is the rest which God has provided for the soul, v. 7. Every mercy we receive should lead us more and more to trust in him. Calvin: "To wait calmly and silently for those indications of God's favor which he conceals from us is the undoubted evidence of faith." No man enters into rest except by faith.

12. God's people shall experience every sort of deliverance which their circumstances require, v. 8. Death, tears and falling are three terrible things to the saints, against which God alone can protect them. His grace is all-sufficient. They need never look beyond him.

13. All God's mercies ought to lead us not only to hope in him for all coming time, but to form pious resolutions, from which we will not swerve, v. 9. It is right that we should bind ourselves by solemn engagements to be the Lord's, his only and his forever.

14. However afflicted we may be, let us bear solemn testimony to all the truth we believe, v. 10. Calvin: "Faith cannot remain inoperative in the heart; but it must of necessity manifest itself."

15. Let us cease from man. Often when he would help us, he cannot; and often when he could help us, he will not, v. 11. An old man once said: "My acquaintance would fill a cathedral; my friends could all be put into a pulpit." "At my first answer," says Paul, "all men forsook me." Yet he tells us of one who was not ashamed of his chain. Although happily the sword of persecution is now seldom drawn in Christian countries, yet the spirit that is in men lusteth to envy. McDuff: "There is a persecution sharper than that of the axe. There is an iron that goes into the heart, deeper than the knife. Cruel sneers, and sarcasms, and pitiless and unjust judgments, and cold-hearted calumnies—these are persecution."

16. Though we can never pay the debt we owe to God, yet we should diligently remember our obligations, and, as we have opportunity, manifest our gratitude, v. 12. A child can never pay the debt he owes his mother. It shows some right-mindedness for him candidly to say so, and do his best to requite her.

17. A fit mode of expressing our thanks to God is by solemn acts of worship, secret, social and public, vv. 13, 14, 17-19. Morison: "The closet will be the first place where the heart will delight in pouring forth its lively joys; thence the feeling will extend to the family altar; and thence again it will proceed to the sanctuary of the Most High." To every man God has sent a large supply of benefits, and nothing but perverseness can deny to him the praise of our lips.

18. We should be careful to make none but lawful vows, v. 14; but when such are made, we should never turn to the right hand or to the left, but steadfastly perform our engagements. We should avoid anything like the temper of a sordid bargaining with the Almighty. But we may strengthen our hearts many a time by a fit vow to the Lord.

19. Let not the righteous be over-anxious concerning the fact, the time or the manner of their departure out of life, v. 15. This is all arranged by the Lord. Nicolson: "The servants of God trouble themselves in vain, when they distrust him; for in life he is with them, and in death he will not forsake them." He who gives grace to his chosen to live to his glory will not deny them grace to die in his peace.

20. As our responsibilities are very great, our sense of obligation should be deep and lasting, v. 16. We ought promptly and publicly to profess the true religion. We ought to engage to do everything in our power for the glory of God and for the expression of our gratitude to him.

21. Whatever our trials, and however sharp our conflicts, let us seek to come out of them all with a hallelujah on our lips, v. 19.

PSALM CXVII.

1 O praise the LORD, all ye nations: praise him, all ye people.

2 For his merciful kindness is great toward us: and the truth of the LORD endureth for ever. Praise ye the LORD.

SOME deny to this Psalm a completeness in itself, attach it to Psalm cxvi., or to Psalm cxviii., or use it as a doxology to any other Psalm. But is not this taking great liberties? Nothing in the state of the Hebrew text can authorize the annihilation of this as a complete and independent composition. It is indeed a very short ode; but it gives just expression to very lively and devout feelings. Luther: "This is a prophecy concerning Christ; that all peoples, out of all kingdoms and islands, shall know Christ in his kingdom; that is, in his church;" Pool: "This Psalm contains a prophecy of the calling of the Gentiles;" Henry: "This Psalm is short and sweet; I doubt the reason why we sing it so often as we do, is, for the shortness of it; but, if we rightly understood and considered it, we should sing it oftener for the sweetness of it, especially to us sinners of the Gentiles, on whom it casts a favorable eye." Of its authorship we know nothing. Scott dates it B. C. 1040; Clarke, B. C. 515. The names of God found in it are Jehovah LORD and Jah LORD, on which see on Psalm i. 2, and introduction to Psalm lxxviii.

1. O praise the LORD, all ye nations: praise him, all ye people. The first verb rendered praise is that used in the word hallelujah; the second is in 1 Chron. xvi. 35, glory; in Ps. cvi. 47, triumph; in Ps. lxiii. 3, praise. The words rendered nations and people are both plural: the former being the word often rendered Gentiles; the latter, nations. The call is indiscriminate to the whole world to come and give due praise to Jehovah. This verse is explained by the great commission given by Christ to his ministers, Matt. xxviii. 19, 20; Mark xvi. 15, 16. What puts the matter beyond all doubt, and gives to us a most satisfactory exposition of the verse, is the use made of it by Paul in Rom. xv. 11, where he maintains this proposition: "Now, I say, that Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promise made unto the fathers, and that the Gentiles might glorify God for his mercy," Rom. xv. 8, 9. He quotes two other places and then this verse in proof. This call on the people of the earth is to a holy and spiritual service, and so implies the universal spread of the gospel. It is the truth that is to set men free. This call on all peoples and nations to praise Jehovah is not without cause:

2. For his merciful kindness is great toward us. Merciful kindness, in Ps. v. 7, mercy; in Ps. li. 1, lovingkindness; often, kindness. Is great, a verb in the preterite, as in Ps. ciii. 11; in Ps. xii. 4; lxxv. 3, prevail; in Job xxi. 7, are mighty. It denotes the power attending the manifestations of God's kindness to the nations. Nothing has ever moulded the hearts and minds of the nations of the earth like the gospel of Jesus Christ, which is unchangeable in its promises and principles: And the truth of the LORD endureth for ever. Alexander renders the whole verse: For mighty over us has been his mercy, and the truth of Jehovah [is] to eternity. The gospel is the everlasting gospel, Rev. xiv. 6. It brings everlasting consolation to all believers, 2 Thess. ii. 16. To all who embrace it, it secures everlasting life, John iii. 16. The stability of the mediatorial throne rests on the unchangeableness of the covenant of grace. The whole calling of God to his people is without repentance. Never has a promise in Christ failed. Never has it been revoked. Praise ye the LORD, literally, hallelujah; see on Ps. civ. 35.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The brevity of this Psalm naturally suggests the question of the length of devotional exercises. On this subject no rule binding in all cases can be laid down. The Scriptures generally would lead us to greater brevity than is common. Dickson: "In God's worship it is not always necessary to be long; few words sometimes say what is sufficient." The publican's prayer was short and prevalent. That of the pharisee was long, and wordy, and worthless.

2. Prophecy has declared and God's veracity makes it certain that the gospel shall spread far and wide, v. 1. The knowledge of God shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea. The people that are afar off shall be made nigh. Next to the resurrection of Christ, the conversion of the Gentiles was one of the most important and glorious events that has happened in the latter days, Acts xi. 18. Jesus himself promised that his salvation should extend far beyond the pale of the Jewish church, John x. 16.

3. To whomsoever the gospel is sent, it brings a message not only of glad tidings of great joy, but is a loud and solemn call to purity and devotion, v. 1. For who can praise God aright unless he has clean hands and a pure heart?

4. The calling of the Gentiles according to the predictions of the prophets is sufficient evidence of the truth and divine power of Christianity, in causing the most powerful and enlightened nations, among whom it has been generally preached, to renounce their false gods and embrace the truth as it is in Jesus, v. 1. In bestowing the Gospel the Lord grants incalculable treasures of mercy and grace, and all he demands is a grateful acceptance and acknowledgment of his bounty.

5. We shall wait in vain and but deceive ourselves, if we expect any other or more glorious revelation of himself than God has already made for our salvation, v. 2. Nicolson: "There will never be another Messiah: Jesus is the true One; he tasted death for every man; he forgives iniquity, transgression and sin; and his blood cleanses from all unrighteousness."

6. The merciful kindness and truth revealed to us in the Gospel are as great as they have ever been represented to be, as good a foundation for hope and confidence as we can ever need, and are as inviting to honest inquirers and penitent sinners as it is possible for us to conceive, v. 2. No man needs more grace than the Gospel offers. The truth of God has amazing power, and when brought home to the heart by the Holy Ghost is as effectual now as it ever has been.

7. Let us be specially careful how we treat the Gospel, v. 2. It is not a light thing; it is our life. Let not that which was ordained unto life be found to be unto death. The greatest sin ever committed by men in lands where Jesus is preached is the rejection of salvation by the cross.

- 29 O give thanks unto the LORD; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever.

THAT David wrote this Psalm is admitted by Calvin, Piscator, Fabritius, Amesius, Venema, Cobbin, Delaney, Phillips and many others. Patrick: "There is nothing more probable than that David composed it." Pool: "It most probably was composed by David." Edwards: "It is generally supposed to have been penned by David." Henry: "It is probable that David penned it." Scott: "David is thought to have composed it." Clarke: "Most probably David was the author of this Psalm, though many think it was done after the captivity. It partakes of David's spirit, and everywhere shows the hand of a master. The style is grand and noble, the subject majestic." Of those who ascribe it to David the majority regard it as probably written about the time that he was quietly in possession of his kingdom. But the particular occasion of its composition, if it has any, seems to be wholly conjectural. Hengstenberg quite differs from the foregoing views: "That the deliverance for which the Psalm gives thanks is the deliverance from the Babylonish captivity, there can be no doubt." Alexander: "The deliverance celebrated cannot be identified with any one so naturally as with that from the Babylonish exile." It is not possible to apply large portions of the Psalm to any king after the time of David, unless with some we refer it to Hezekiah. But there are serious difficulties in that plan of interpretation. The Scripture most relied on as bearing on the question of authorship is Ezra iii. 10, 11. The reader can examine the place for himself. The first and last words of this Psalm were used on the occasion of laying the foundation of the second temple. Many make this ode prophetic. Calvin: "Let us remember that it was the design of the Spirit, under the figure of this temporal kingdom, to describe the eternal and spiritual kingdom of God's Son, even as David represented Christ." Dodd: "The learned Jews, both ancient and modern, confess it to speak of the Messiah." Morison: "It reaches forth, in the spirit of prophecy to Messiah, and to his spiritual kingdom." Like views are expressed by many. Nor are they unwarranted, as any one may see who will examine Matt. xxi. 42-46; Mark xii. 10-12; Luke xx. 17, 18; Acts iv. 10-12. Scott dates it B. C. 1040; Clarke gives no date. The names of the Almighty in it are Jehovah LORD, Jah LORD, El God and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; introduction to Ps. lxxviii.; on Ps. v. 4; iii. 2.

1. O give thanks unto the LORD; for he is good: because his mercy endureth for ever. On the whole verse see on Ps. cvi. 1; cvii. 1. Give thanks, elsewhere confess, praise, but commonly as here. We have the same word in another form in vv. 19, 21, 28, rendered praise. Good, see on Ps. xxv. 8. Mercy, elsewhere kindness, lovingkindness, merciful kindness. The whole phrase occurs again in vv. 2, 3, 4, 29. Street: Pay homage to Jehovah, for he is good; truly his mercy endureth to eternity. Although the world greatly misunderstands the true doctrine of the divine justice, yet it has a deeper sense of the retributive rectitude of God than it has of his mercy and kindness. The most difficult thing ever undertaken by God's ministers is to persuade sinners heartily to embrace offered mercy. We cannot be better employed than in extolling free grace.

2. Let Israel now say, that his mercy endureth for ever.

3. Let the house of Aaron now say, that his mercy endureth for ever.

4. Let them now that fear the LORD say, that his mercy endureth for ever. This classification of persons is the same as in Ps. cxv. 9-11. The word rendered now in each of these verses is a word of entreaty: I pray thee, I beseech thee. It occurs again in v. 25. Let say, equivalent to Oh that they would say, although the verb is in the future. If the knowledge and belief of the divine mercy fails from among men, they will soon become desperate, and all hope of reformation will forsake them. Verses 2-4; 8, 9; 10-12; 15, 16, abundantly show that all repetitions in devotion are not vain.

5. I called upon the Lord in distress. Green: When I was in straits, I called upon the Lord; Street: From a state of distress I invoked Jehovah; Alexander: Out of anguish I invoked Jah. Either of these renderings is admissible. On calling on God see on Ps. iv. 1. The LORD answered me, and set me in a large place. Large place, in contrast with the straits or distress of the first clause. The words and set me are supplied, but they are not necessary to the sense, though they are to the exact preservation of the idiom. Edwards: He answered me with deliverance; Street: Jehovah answered me, by setting me at large; Green: The Lord answered and set me at liberty. Alexander: "To answer in a wide place is to grant his prayer by bringing him forth into such a place." Calvin: "By his own example David establishes the faithful, showing them that they ought not to faint in the day of adversity."

6. The LORD is on my side: I will not fear: what can man do unto me? On my side, literally for me. Fear, in Ps. iii. 6, be afraid. Compare Ps. xxiii. 4; xxvii. 1, 3. Man, Adam, the whole race or any member of it. Calvin renders the verse: Jehovah is with me: I will not fear what man may do unto me. In this he follows several of the old versions, as does also the Apostle, Heb. xiii. 6. Almost any version gives the essential idea.

7. The LORD taketh my part with them that help me, literally, Jehovah (is) for me amongst those who help me. Street: Jehovah is for me, he is mine aid; Hengstenberg: The Lord is among those who help me. Therefore shall I see my desire upon them that hate me. The words my desire are needlessly supplied. See on Ps. liv. 7; lix. 10; xcii. 11; cxii. 8. Edwards: I shall feast my eyes upon them that hate me; Fry: I shall look in triumph on mine enemies; Hengstenberg: I shall see my pleasure on those that hate me. The following renderings are more literal; Jebb: I myself shall look upon them that hate me; Street: I can look on mine enemies; Green: I shall be able to face those who hate me. Calvin's paraphrase of the whole verse is: "Defended by God's hand I may boldly and safely set at nought all the machinations of men;" Patrick's: "It is sufficient that the Lord, who hath done great things for me by weak instruments, is still aiding to me: therefore I dare look the most malicious enemies in the face, and doubt not to see them turn their backs upon me, 2 Sam. viii."

8. It is better to trust in the LORD than to put confidence in man. [This is the middle verse of the Bible].

9. It is better to trust in the LORD than to put confidence in princes. The word rendered man is Adam. It comprehends the whole race. Verse 8 contains a universal proposition. Verse 9 selects out the chief of men, those on whom we would most naturally rely, and warns us that we can no more safely trust in them than in others. Princes, in Ps. lxxxiii. 11, nobles; the greatest men, the best men, those who are in fact or deservedly head men. Jehovah alone can be safely relied upon at all times, in all straits and to all the ends and purposes of complete succor and deliverance.

10. All nations compassed me about: but in the name of the LORD will I destroy them.

11. They compassed me about; yea, they compassed me about: but in the name of the LORD I will destroy them.

12. They compassed me about like bees; they are quenched as the fire of thorns: for in the name of the LORD I will destroy them. Nations, also heathen, Gentiles. Compassed, as in Ps. xvii. 11; xviii. 5; xxii. 12, 16; in Ps. lxxxviii. 17, came round about, equivalent to surrounded. Destroy, cut down, cut in pieces; in the future. Yet in each case Street has, I did cut them in pieces. In the Hebrew, before the word destroy in each case is found a particle, which is sometimes rendered surely. Alexander: "The point of comparison with bees is their swarming multitude and irritating stings. Compare Deut. i. 44." A fire of thorns is a very brisk fire, and for the time makes quite a crackling noise, but is quickly over. Are quenched, are extinct, are put out, are consumed. The rage and power of the wicked against God's church, however violent and cruel, cannot last long.

13. Thou hast thrust sore at me, that I might fall. Literally, Thrusting thou hast thrust. Thrust is the best rendering here, although the verb is nowhere else so rendered. In Ps. xxxv. 5, it is chase. The thrusting was designed to be deadly, that he might fall. See on Ps. xxvii. 2. Street following some ancient versions has: I stumbled greatly as if I were falling. But this requires an unauthorized change in the Hebrew text. The change of number and person in this verse is not unusual. In v. 7, he spoke of those that hated him, and in vv. 10-12, of the heathen. Here he seems to imagine all his foes united in one, or under one leader, and his address is to that one directly. Some think he means Saul. Dickson supposes Satan is here addressed. This impersonation adds to the liveliness of the composition, and shows that to some extent at least the Psalm is dramatic. Yet nothing can harm those who hope in God: But the LORD helped me.

14. The LORD is my strength and song, and is become my salvation. The whole verse is taken from Ex. xv. 2. Strength, song, salvation, all uniformly rendered. LORD, i. e., Jah. He becomes the song of his people by becoming their strength and salvation.

15. The voice of rejoicing and salvation is in the tabernacles of the righteous. The general idea is the same as in v. 14. For a while the state of God's people may be greatly distressed; but as soon as the Lord appears, their mourning is turned into the voice of melody. Tabernacles were the dwellings of the ancient Jews, here used poetically for any abode of the accepted people of God. The occasion of the holy mirth was the work of God: The right hand of the LORD doeth valiantly. On this truth all holy gladness depends, so it is repeated verbatim in the next verse. The rendering is not uniform. Church of England: The right hand of the Lord bringeth mighty things to pass; Edwards: The right hand of Jehovah did great achievements; Fry: The right hand of Jehovah hath done mightily. The word rendered valiantly is a noun, host, army, company, forces, valor, power, substance, riches, wealth. The meaning of this as of many other words depends on its collocation. As the prophet is here celebrating a great deliverance, the authorized version comes as near to the true sense as either of the others.

16. The right hand of the LORD is exalted. Exalted, lifted up, high over the enemies of his people so as to govern, restrain, or punish them; high in the esteem and praises of his saints; or both ideas may be included, the latter depending on the former. The right hand of the LORD doeth valiantly. Calvin: "To do valiantly is tantamount to a magnificent display of his power, so that there may be a bright manifestation of its effulgence."

17. I shall not die, but live, and declare the works of the LORD. It had often looked as if David would certainly be cut off. To the eye of sense it seemed impossible that he should escape. But when Jehovah works and does valiantly, all perils disappear. Rescued from danger, the righteous delights in publishing the honors of his deliverer. Works, as in Ps. cxi. 2, 6, 7, and often before.

18. The LORD hath chastened me sore. Sore, Street, greatly. The original is idiomatic as in v. 13: Chastening thou hast chastened me. But he hath not given me over unto death. If David had been taken out of the world before he and his seed had obtained full possession of the crown and kingdom, the promise would have failed, and David's typical character have been a myth. But the Scripture cannot be broken.

19. Open to me the gates of righteousness: I will go into them, and I will praise the LORD. By the gates of righteousness we may understand the gates of the temple, into which the righteous often and gratefully entered to praise or give thanks unto Jah. The propriety of such worship is urged and repeated.

20. This gate of the LORD, into which the righteous shall enter. Perhaps with Calvin and others we should read: This is the gate of Jehovah; or with Street: This is the gate that belongeth to Jehovah. Tholuck: "The gates of righteousness are so called, since really none but the righteous were to be admitted." Alexander: "The meaning may be, Since this is the Lord's gate, let the righteous (and no others) enter at it." Calvin gives another view: "It is the gate of Jehovah, and, therefore, he will open it to the just." There is no significancy in the change from gates to gate. Compare Jer. vii. 2.

21. I will praise thee: for thou hast heard me, and art become my salvation. Praise, in v. 1, give thanks. Heard, in v. 5, answered. The last phrase is borrowed from v. 14, with a simple change from the third to the second person singular.

22. The stone which the builders refused is become the head stone of the corner. The interpretations, which refer this to some contest as to which of two or more stones should be the corner stone in the temple, are too puerile for serious Christians to dwell upon; and yet had such a disagreement occurred, it would furnish a foundation of the figure here employed. Nor can we very fully apply it to David. Saul and his adherents can but in a very limited sense be regarded as the builders of the throne of Israel. God himself eminently presided over that matter. Yet there was enough of the human in the affair to admit of an allusion to it. Those, who regard this Psalm as relating to the return from Babylon, and the rebuilding of the second temple and of the holy city very naturally suppose that by the stone is meant the Jewish people, who by surrounding nations had been rejected from all empire, but were after seventy years of captivity again made preëminent, under the special guidance and protection of God. Like either of the foregoing this may furnish a basis for the figure in its full application to the Redeemer. More than this is not necessary or edifying. The Saviour and his apostles have given us the true interpretation, Matt. xxi. 42-46; Mark xii. 10-12; Luke xx. 17, 18; Acts iv. 10-12; Eph. ii. 20; 1 Pet. ii. 4-6. Horne: "That the verses (22, 23,) belong, in a full proper sense, to Messiah, is confessed by the Rabbis, and acknowledged by all. No text in the Old Testament is quoted by the writers of the New, so often as this." Indeed pages might be filled with citations in proof of the belief of the direct and full application of the passage to Messiah. He is the stone refused by the Jewish builders, but raised to the highest honor by his Father. He was denied of men, but approved of God. He sank lower than any innocent being ever did; and has already risen higher than the angels of God, so that he is the first-born of every creature. Head means chief; in Ps. cxix. 160, it is beginning; often top, here it clearly means the chief corner stone. But all this was not of man, or of created wisdom and power:

23. This is the LORD'S doing. Calvin: This was done by Jehovah; Jebb: From the LORD is this; Fry and Street: This is from Jehovah. The whole exaltation of Christ is so wonderful that it is mere folly to ascribe it to any but Jehovah. It is marvellous in our eyes. The very name of Christ is WONDERFUL. See on Ps. ix. 1.

24. This is the day which the LORD hath made; we will rejoice and be glad in it. To the term day several interpretations are given. 1. Some refer it to a Jewish festival day, on which this Psalm was sung. 2. Others by day understand the improved state of things following the rebuilding of the second temple and of the holy city. This falls in with other views of those who believe that the ode relates to the return from Babylon. 3. Others by day understand the Christian Sabbath instituted in honor of the resurrection of Christ, the first step in his exaltation. This view is embraced by Watts, defended by Scott, Dwight and many others. It gives a good sense, and is in no degree inconsistent with the context. 4. By day others understand the Gospel dispensation, the latter day, when under the power and grace of an ascended Saviour his believing people abound in joy and gladness. Compare Acts ii. 45-47;

viii. 8. Either of the latter two views is better than either of the former two; and these two may be made to harmonize. This day the LORD has made, or prepared.

25. Save now, I beseech thee, O LORD: O LORD, I beseech thee, send now prosperity. The views gathered from this verse are, 1. That it contains a formula of seeking the divine blessing on great enterprises. Those who hold this view refer to Neh. i. 11. Perhaps the reader may think the proof insufficient. 2. Others regard it as a special prayer for God's blessing on the great work of rebuilding the holy city. 3. Others make it a prayer for God's favor to David after he had secured full possession of the throne. Regarding him as a type of Christ, this view well agrees with the next. 4. That it is a fervent petition for the building up of Christ's kingdom. For him shall prayer be made continually, Ps. lxxii. 15. 5. Another view, coincident with the last two, is that this verse and the next contain the language which prophecy put into the mouth of the multitude in worshipping the Saviour in his triumphant entry into Jerusalem, and is an expression of the desires of the pious of all ages. Compare Matt. xxi. 8-11; Mark xi. 1-11; Luke xix. 28-40. See also Matt. xxiii. 37-39. This latter is to be preferred, is the most comprehensive and gives the fullest sense. These verses were actually used under the powerful influence of God's Spirit on a great public occasion foretold by the prophets. Moreover, the words bear out this interpretation. Save now, or save, I beseech is the same in signification as Hosanna. Indeed the original is the word Hosanna, with the parts transposed. Scott: "The word rendered 'Save now' is 'Hosanna,' which seems equivalent to our modern congratulatory prayer on the accession of a monarch to the throne, 'God save the king.' It is evident that the Jews had this passage in mind, when they said before Christ, at his entrance into Jerusalem, 'Hosanna to the Son of David; blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest.' They meant to welcome him as the promised Messiah." If this is the correct view it explains a part of the next verse:

26. Blessed be he that cometh in the name of the LORD. He that cometh, as many learned men have shown, was one of the standing titles of Messiah among the Jews. It is often found in the New Testament. The foregoing exposition leaves unexplained a part of v. 25, and a part of v. 26. Send prosperity, one word, a verb found in Ps. i. 3, used both transitively and intransitively. Again, We have blessed you out of the house of the LORD. Perhaps the best view is that which makes the company of priests the speakers, and refers the whole to the benediction used by them in blessing the people, Num. vi. 24-26.

27. God is the LORD, which hath shewed us light. The word rendered God is El, expressive of great power. Calvin, Edwards, Street and Fry read, Jehovah is God; Alexander: Mighty is Jehovah. He, who made the day of v. 24, is here said to have shewed us light. Green: And he hath shone graciously upon us; Street: And he constantly enlighteneth us. As light is a term expressive of all blessings, so is it in particular of the two good things commonly supposed to be referred to in this Psalm; first, a good government among men, 2 Sam. xxiii. 3, 4; secondly, the reign of Messiah, Luke ii. 29-32, compared with many prophecies of the Old Testament, especially Isa. xlii. 6; xlix. 6. Bind the sacrifice with cords, even unto the horns of the altar. We know very well the literal meaning of the phrase horns of the altar. They were protuberances upon each of the four corners of the altar, Ex. xxvii. 2; xxx. 2; xxxvii. 26; xxxviii. 2. On these projections the blood of the sacrifice was put with the finger of the priest, Ex. xxix. 12; Lev. iv. 7, 18, 25, 30, 34; viii. 15; ix. 9; xvi. 19. Thus much is clear. But the rendering of the first part of the clause is quite diverse. Calvin: Bind ye the lamb with cords; Edwards: Bind ye the sacrifices with cords; Doway, following several ancient versions: Appoint a solemn day, with shady boughs; Street: Bind the victim with cords; Tholuck: Decorate the feast with wreaths. The explanations also are quite various. Diodati's paraphrase is: "Make ready the sacrifices of thanksgiving;" Patrick's: "O be not ungrateful to him, but solemnize this day with festival joy; bind your sacrifices with cords;" Horne: "Let us observe the festival which is designed to perpetuate the memory of so great and joyful an event." He applies it to the gospel dispensation. It seems to be best to render the word sacrifice here, in Ex. xxiii. 18; Isa. xxix. 1, although in every other case it is fitly rendered feast, or feast days, and it occurs at least sixty times. Then we have no account whatever of any custom of binding the victim to the horns of the altar. On this matter Hammond and others are decided. So also Cresswell: "Yea, even unto the horns of the altar—before these words must be understood lead it; for the victims were bound to rings fixed in the floor." The Chaldee gives this as the sense: Bind the lamb with bands till ye have sacrificed it, and poured the blood thereof upon the horns of the altar. This is perhaps better than any other explanation.

28. Thou art my God, and I will praise thee. He declares his covenant relation with God. Praise, in v. 1, give thanks. He again claims the covenant relation: Thou art my God. I will exalt thee, in Ps. xxx. 1, I will extol thee. In this verse we have both El and Elohim.

29. O give thanks unto the LORD; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever. A repetition of v. 1. Alexander: "In these words we are brought back to the point from which we started, and the circle of praise returns into itself."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. There is exhaustless excellence in the Scriptures! The Bible is full of new songs, new displays of love, mercy and grace. We have already considered more than a hundred Psalms, yet here is one as fresh and as refreshing as if we had not looked at any other. Luther: "This Psalm, which I so much love and admire, is the one which I, in particular, call the golden Psalm; and is the Psalm which has often revived and comforted me in my temptations." Is it not a proof of the dreadful depravity of man, that it is so difficult to interest his mind in the best poetry in the world, simply because it teaches the true theology?

2. We shall never be done thanking and praising Jehovah, vv. 1, 29. This does not make the righteous sad. The themes furnished them are exhaustless. The new heart given by God's Spirit loves the work. We should delight to stir ourselves up to this blessed employment.

3. While carnal and imaginative men are pleasing themselves with schemes of uniformity, or of outward unity in the church, let us labor to promote that essential unity which consists in bringing all of every rank and condition to accept and celebrate the amazing mercy of God, vv. 1-4. If men feel heart to heart in singing the song of Moses and the Lamb, they will not be disowned by the blessed Saviour.

4. Ample reason for perpetual praise and thanksgiving is found in the exalted nature of God, vv. 1, 2, 3, 4, 29. He is goodness itself. His lovingkindness never fails. Why will not all men worship Jehovah?

5. Affliction is no novelty in the church of God. Distress reaches the heart of all his people, v. 5. David, the type of the Redeemer, the Redeemer himself, and all the true Israel have had their sharp trials. What a strange sort of creature an old Christian would be, if he had never smarted under the rod of heavenly chastisement! Indeed there can be no such character, Heb. xii. 6-8.

6. But however sore our trials, the door is open leading to the mercy-seat, v. 5. "In prayer we have a consolation and an antidote for all our ills." I called upon

God in my distress, and he heard me, is written in the private journal of every Christian. Luther: "Thou must learn to call and not to sit there by thyself, and lie on the bench, hang and shake the head, and bite and devour thyself with thy thoughts, but come on, thou indolent knave, down upon thy knees, up with thy hands and eyes to heaven, take a Psalm or a prayer, and set forth thy distress with tears before God."

7. When we have had blessed experience of the divine mercy, especially in times of great trial, let us modestly and humbly declare it, v. 5. It is a shame, through false humility to keep silence when the very stones are ready to cry out for joy at God's presence.

8. Our theology is never right till in our hearts we invest God with infinite power and perfections, v. 6. Until we can say: "It is enough for me that God is on my side," we are not prepared to fight the battles of life.

9. Reason suggests that thanks ought to be in proportion to mercies received, and that deliverances are great in proportion to the distresses from which they rescue us, vv. 5, 6. If this is so, how impossible it is for the saints ever to exceed the bounds of sobriety in lauding and magnifying the grace which saves them from a fiery and eternal condemnation.

10. If we are delivered from great distress of any kind, the cause of our deliverance is God alone, vv. 5-7. To him is all the glory due.

11. The righteous can well afford to wait for the day of full and final decision of their case, v. 7. Things shall surely come to pass according to their holy desire. My soul, wait thou upon God.

12. Dickson: "Many good uses may a believer make of one benefit, one victory, one experience, as doth the Psalmist here, v. 7. He confirmeth himself in his reconciliation and friendship with God, encourageth himself against dangers to come, exalteth God, and esteemeth as nothing the hatred and favor of man, and resolveth to use means and to expect the blessing from God, with other sundry good uses which follow hereafter."

13. Nothing is more profitable than dwelling on familiar truths, vv. 8, 9. Was there ever a good man who did not believe that it was better to trust in Jehovah than to rely on any created arm? Yet David here repeats this truth that if possible it may sink deep into every mind.

14. The same verses teach us that it is hard, though necessary, to withdraw trust from man. He is a poor, feeble, sinful worm. Though the wicked appear in great numbers, and enter into the most fearful alliances with one another, they are but grasshoppers.

15. The same verses teach us that it is difficult, yet necessary to put our confidence in God. This is insisted on, and with great pertinency.

16. If we are sorely and terribly annoyed and beset with enemies and adversaries, the same has happened to others, vv. 10-12. But all believers thus tried have come off conquerors and more than conquerors through him that loved them.

17. The ground of hostility and opposition to God and his cause is found in the enmity of the natural heart against true religion and Scriptural holiness. Luther: "Men can put up with all other doctrines and all other gods, so that no nation and no country will set itself in hostility against them; but when the word of God comes, then the whole world is up, then tumults and animosities are on all sides."

18. Yet the final victory is certain. In some way, or by some means, or, if necessary, without means, God will destroy all his incorrigible foes, vv. 10, 12. How terrible that destruction will be is declared in Scripture and is believed by all wise men.

19. Considering the unanimity of the wicked in their opposition to Christ and his people, and their readiness to follow the lead of the one great adversary, so that in all cases his will is virtually obeyed, it is for a joy that their combined attack has never been able to destroy one of God's elect, v. 13.

20. The reason is, God is stronger than all his foes, vv. 13, 14.

21. Good songs, good promises, good proverbs, good doctrines are not the worse for age, v. 14. What was sung just after the passage of the Red sea is here sung by the prophet, and shall be sung to the end of the world by the saints of the Most High.

22. If we would avail ourselves of the help of the Lord, we must say that he is our strength and salvation, v. 14. We must renounce all self-reliance; we must feel and confess that we are nothing and less than nothing.

23. The righteous have good cause of joy however they may be situated, v. 15. "Though their dwellings in this world are but tabernacles, mean and moveable, yet they are more comfortable to them than the palaces of the wicked are to them; for where religion rules, there is safety from evil and there are earnest of eternal salvation, and abundant matter for continual joy and rejoicing."

24. Let us remember that Jehovah is over all and let us say so, v. 16. Otherwise we in vain attempt to build up a system of consolation.

25. Let past mercies beget confidence for present and future times, v. 17. He who in covenant love has saved us from fatal disasters will continue his loving-kindness until our work is done. We may be especially assured of this, when like the Psalmist we are fully purposed to use our lives and all our faculties in the service and for the glory of God. Our life is hid with Christ in God, Col. iii. 3.

26. All is not lost that is brought into jeopardy, v. 18. We gain a great advantage in all our trials when we see God's hand in everything; when we are willing to crucify the flesh with its affections and lusts; when we are submissive to the divine appointment, knowing that the Lord doth not afflict willingly, but for our profit, that we may be partakers of his holiness.

27. A prime ingredient in the worship of the saints is thankfulness. The goodness of God leads them to praise him, vv. 19, 21.

28. Even in this world the righteous have an access to God which is denied to all others, v. 20. The secret of the Lord is with them that fear him; much more shall they alone enter into the blissful presence of God in glory. Compare Isa. xxvi. 1-4. Great things are now in possession of the people of God. Still greater things are before them.

29. It is said that prayer is mentioned in the Scriptures about five hundred times. In all cases it is implied and in many asserted that it is efficacious, v. 21. How strange it is that we poor, feeble creatures should ever attempt to get on without prayer.

30. Though by office men may be high in authority in the church of God, yet that does not determine that they shall be saved or that they shall not fall into fatal errors, v. 22. Men full of learning, zeal and authority have rejected the only foundation on which a sinner can safely rest his hope for eternity. Numbers foolishly imagine that if by their logic, or learning or intolerance they can silence the advocates of the truth as it is in Jesus, they have gained the victory; but their triumph is their ruin.

31. Vain are human devices, and vain is human malice, when directed against the counsels of God, v. 22. Whom he will, he exalts; whom he will, he abases.

32. We need have no fear of the church. Her safety is secured by the exaltation of Christ, v. 22. He who raised her Head from the depths of humiliation will not leave his body to perish.

33. God can do anything that does not involve contradiction. To man a thing may be improbable, yea, impossible. And when it is done it may be exceedingly marvellous, v. 23. But what work of God duly considered is not so? Horne: "What can be more truly marvellous, than that a person, put to death as a malefactor, and laid in the grave, should from thence arise immortal, and become the head of an immortal society; should ascend into heaven, be invested with power, and crowned with glory, and should prepare a way for the sons of Adam to follow him into those mansions of eternal bliss?" And yet unless he believes this, how can any one be saved? John iii. 16. Jesus is "the foundation of our hope, the centre of our unity, and the end of our living."

34. If Christ's exaltation, beginning with his resurrection, be so exceedingly glorious, let it be celebrated, not by an anniversary, but by religiously observing one day in seven to commemorate that joyous event, v. 24. That is the day which the Lord has made for this purpose. "Sabbath days must be rejoicing days, and then they are to us as the days of heaven."

35. If such be the design of the Christian Sabbath, how exceedingly glorious must be the Christian dispensation. It also is the day which the Lord hath made. Let us rejoice and be glad in it.

36. When God undertakes the work of salvation, it is infallibly accomplished, v. 25. He has the will and all the resources necessary to that end. Let us each commit our case to him.

37. Let us welcome Christ and give him a cordial reception, not only in our country, but in our hearts, v. 26. Let us beware how we slight the Son of God, Luke xx. 18.

38. What an unspeakable source of joy and comfort is found in God through Jesus Christ. He is a light indeed, v. 27. Though all else is darkness, yet have we light in him.

39. While the rites of religion are not in themselves saving, yet we should cheerfully and humbly submit to any observances which God has enjoined, v. 27. And we should enter with life and spirit into any religious service appointed by heaven. In particular we should abound in thanksgiving.

40. Let us hold fast the covenant of God forever, v. 28. All appearances may be against us. Our enemies may be many, mighty and lively, but if God be for us, who can be against us?

PSALM CXIX.

THIS Psalm is alphabetical. See Introduction, § 13. It is divided into as many parts as there are letters in the Hebrew alphabet. Each part has eight verses. Each verse in any one part begins with the same letter. The respective parts fitly take their name from the letters of the alphabet in their order. Notwithstanding this highly artificial and ingenious character of the ode, it has considerable irregularities. Some of the parts have the name of the Lord not at all, others once, others twice, others thrice. Generally the verses consist of two lines, yet, says Street, "there are evidently as many as nine that have only one line in each; and there are two, which consist of three lines each." Many notice the want of logical connection in this poem. Calvin: "The prophet frequently passes from one topic to another, and prosecutes no one particular subject continuously;" Henry: "This Psalm is a chest of gold rings, not a chain of gold links;" Hengstenberg: "That the Psalm consists of a collection of individual sayings, and that there is no room for attempting to discover any connection, or to trace any consecutive train of thought, is evident à priori from the formal arrangement." Yet it is pervaded by what Tholuck calls a "deep current of feeling." Jebb: "Instances can undoubtedly be shown of passages, which maintain a beautiful sequence and connection between their several members." We should not disparage other Psalms in order to exalt this; though its contents are truly rich. Clarke: "Several of the ancients, particularly the Greek fathers, have considered it as an abridgement of David's life; in which he expresses all the states through which he had passed; the trials, persecutions, succors, and encouragements, he had received. The Latin fathers perceive in it all the morality of the Gospel; and rules for a man's conduct in every situation of life." Luther: "It contains prayers, consolations, doctrines, thanksgivings, and repeats all these with a varied fulness. It is given forth with a deep and blessed intent; namely, that by this repetition and fulness, it may invite and exhort us to hear and diligently to treasure up the word of God;" Tholuck: "It is pervaded by a profound sense of the sublimity of the divine law, in connection with a sense of personal unworthiness;" Barrow: "This Psalm, no less excellent in virtue, than large in bulk, containeth manifold reflections on the nature and properties, the adjuncts and effects of God's law; many sprightly ejaculations about it, conceived in different forms of speech; some in way of petition, some of thanksgiving, some of resolution, some of assertion or aphorism; many useful directions, many zealous exhortations to the observance of it."

Its scope and design are quite apparent. Hammond: "It is wholly spent in consideration of the divine law—the excellency, the necessity, the advantages of it—descanting on the several appellations of it with frequent reflections on ourselves, by way of exhortation to a pious life and constant adherence to God in times of distress;" Pool: "The scope and design of it is manifest, to commend the serious and diligent study, and the steadfast belief and the constant practice of God's word, as incomparably the best counsellor and comforter in the world, and as the only way to true blessedness;" Bridges: "This Psalm may be considered as the journal of one, who was deeply taught in the things of God—long practised in the life and walk of faith. It contains the anatomy of experimental religion—the interior lineaments of the family of God. It is given for the use of believers in all ages, as an excellent touchstone of vital godliness." Many have noticed its peculiar and excellent adaptation to the young. Hengstenberg calls it, 'A children's sermon.' But it suits all classes. From its alphabetical character the Masora entitle it, The great alphabet; but from its peculiar excellence, many style it, The saints' Alphabet. Bishop Cowper calls it "A holy alphabet, so plain that children may understand it—so rich and instructive that the wisest and most experienced may learn something from it." Clarke: "Like all other portions of divine revelation, it is elegant, important, and useful;" Jebb: "It is well known, that upon no portion of holy Scripture have so many practical commentaries been written. . . It has been justly considered in all ages of the church as a storehouse of religious wisdom." One of its highest excellences is its varied instruction on the nature of true, experimental religion. In this Psalm, says Venn, "the whole inner man is delineated, and the several changing frames of our poor hearts, and the several blessed motions and inspirations of the Holy Spirit are touched in a very affecting manner. This is the Psalm I have often had recourse to, when I could find no spirit of prayer in my own heart, and at length the fire was kindled, and I could pray." President Edwards in his work on Religious Affections, says: "I know of no other part of the Holy Scriptures where the nature and evidences of true and sincere godliness are so fully and largely insisted on and delineated." Religious biography abounds in evidences of the same thing. We can hardly open a good volume of that class without meeting proofs of this truth. Some join this Psalm with others. Hengstenberg regards it as "the chief song of the feast, the proper dedication song following the decade which served as it were as an introduction to it." On the other hand, Jebb says, "with the 119th may be considered to begin that collection of Psalms which were composed during the captivity." Perhaps a careful scrutiny will satisfy any one that neither of these views can be sustained. There is as little to support the opinion of Fry, that Christ is the speaker throughout this Psalm. Verses 67, 71, and 75 are fatal to this view. Hengstenberg makes an exceedingly weighty remark: "A characteristic feature of our Psalm is the deep conviction that we have nothing to do with human strength in keeping the commandments of God, but that God alone must create the will and the power to perform." We do not certainly know the author or date of this poem. The Arabic, Theodoret and the great mass of modern commentators ascribe it to David. Patrick seems to have no doubt on the subject. Dodd: "This Psalm is supposed to have been written by David." The same view was taken by Venema, Michaelis and Dickson. Pool: "The author of this Psalm was David; which I know none that deny, and of which there is no just reason to doubt;" Henry: "It seems to be a collection of David's pious and devout ejaculations;" Horne: "David must, undoubtedly, have been the author;" Clarke: "Though the most judicious interpreters assign it to the time of the Babylonish captivity; yet there are so many things in it descriptive of David's state, experience, and affairs, that I am led to think it might have come from his pen; or, if composed at or under the captivity, was formed out of his notes and memoranda;" Scott: "It is generally allowed that David composed this highly instructive Psalm." He dates it B. C. 1017. Notwithstanding this general agreement, and the internal evidence, Jebb says, "A stronger reason appears for assigning this Psalm to one of the prophets of the captivity, either Jeremiah or Daniel, whose circumstances were in many respects similar: I should think, with greater probability to the latter." His reasoning shows some ingenuity, but on full examination will probably not be regarded as conclusive. According to the Masora there is but one verse (the 122d) in which we have not some term pointing to the word of God. It is admitted on all hands that some name of Scripture is found in nearly every verse. This makes it best here to explain several terms; to which we can hereafter refer by No.

1. LAW. This word occurs twenty-five times, between vv. 1-174. We met it in Ps. i. 2; xix. 7. After Ps. cxix. it is not found in the Psalter. Kimchi: "It is the setting down of duties, how they are to be done." Jebb: "It is formed from a verb which means to direct, to guide, to aim, to shoot forwards. Its etymological meaning, then, would be a rule of conduct." Pool: "God's word is called his law, as binding us to obedience." Dickson: "The revealed will of God is called law or doctrine, which signifieth the Lord's will to be taught by God, that all men should learn it." Henry: "The things contained in Scripture are called God's law, because they are enacted by him as their Sovereign." Clarke: "It is called law because it guides, directs and instructs in the way of righteousness—makes our path straight, shows what is even and right, and points us onward to peace, truth and happiness. It is even our schoolmaster to bring us to Christ, that we may be justified through faith; and by it is the knowledge of sin."

2. TESTIMONIES. It is found in two forms, having the same derivation and the same signification, in all twenty-three times. In one form we first met it in the singular in Ps. xix. 7; in the other, in Ps. xxv. 10. Kimchi explains it as meaning precepts that are for a testimony, or federal commemoration. Jebb: "Testimonies are more particularly God's revealed law: the witnesses and confirmation of his promises made to his people, an earnest of his future salvation." Pool: "The Scripture is called God's testimony, as it contains the witnesses of God's mind and will, and of man's duty." Dickson: "Testimonies signify that this revealed will of God testifieth of our duty and our doings, whether conform or not to the rule; and testifieth also what event may be expected by our believing or misbelieving, by our obedience or disobedience thereof." Henry: "The things contained in the Scripture are called God's testimonies, because they are solemnly declared to the world, and attested beyond contradiction." Clarke says, the word is derived from one denoting "beyond, farther, all along, to bear witness or testimony. The rites and ceremonies of the law; because they point out matters beyond themselves, being types and representations of the good things that were to come." Their observance demands spirituality of mind.

3. PRECEPTS. It occurs in this Psalm twenty-one times, and thrice in other places of Scripture. Here it is always rendered precepts, but in Ps. ciii. 18; cxi. 7, commandments; and in Ps. xix. 8, statutes. Kimchi thinks it denotes those precepts which reason teaches, that are, as it were deposited in our nature. Jebb says it comes from a "word which means to place in trust, and means something entrusted to man—appointments of God, which consequently have to do with the conscience, for which man is responsible." Pool: "The precepts declare and direct our duty." Dickson: "Precepts signify that this will of God is imposed by the authority of our sovereign Lawgiver." Henry: "They are called precepts, because prescribed to us, and not left indifferent." Clarke: "They are called precepts from a word signifying to take notice, or care of a thing, to attend, have respect to, to appoint, to visit; because they take notice of our way, have respect to the whole of our life and conversation, superintend, overlook and visit us in all the concerns and duties of life."

4. STATUTES. It is found in this Psalm once in the feminine, v. 16; in the masculine nineteen times, between vv. 5–171; in Ps. cxlvii. 19, statutes; in Ps. ii. 7; cxlviii. 6, in the singular, decree; in Ps. xciv. 20; cv. 10, law; in Ps. xcix. 7, ordinance. Kimchi thinks it points to those precepts whose reason is not known, as not wearing linsey-woolsey, etc. Jebb: "The verb from which this word is formed means to engrave or inscribe, the word means a definite, prescribed, written law." Pool: "God's statutes declare his authority and power of giving us laws." Dickson: "The word statutes signifies that this revealed will of God containeth the duties which God hath appointed and prescribed for our rule." Henry: "They are called his statutes, because they are fixed, and determined, and of perpetual obligation." Clarke: "Statutes, from a word signifying to mark, trace out, describe and ordain; because they mark out our way, describe the line of conduct we are to pursue, and order or ordain what we are to observe." Alexander: "Definite and permanent enactments."

5. COMMANDMENTS. It occurs in this Psalm twenty-two times; in the singular in Ps. xix. 8; in the Psalter uniformly rendered; elsewhere a few times precepts. Jebb: "The commandments are God's laws, not only exhibited, and revealed, and recommended, but positively enjoined." Dickson: "It signifies that this revealed will of God is committed to our trust to be kept." Henry: "God's commandments are so called because given with authority, and (as the word signifies) lodged with us as a trust." Clarke: "They are called commandments because they show us what we should do, and what we should leave undone, and exact our obedience."

6. JUDGMENTS. It is here found twenty-three times; we met it in Ps. xix. 9. Kimchi thinks it had its origin in the judgments that pass betwixt a man and his neighbor. Jebb: "It is derived from a word signifying to govern, to judge or determine. Judgments mean judicial ordinances, and decisions: legal sanctions." Pool: "God's judgments are so called, because they proceed from the great Judge of the world, and are his judicial sentence to which all men must submit." Dickson: "The word judgments signifies the Scripture to be God's judicial decree, ordaining how our words, deeds and thoughts shall be ordered, and what shall be the execution of his will answerable thereto." Henry: "They are called God's judgments, because framed in infinite wisdom, and because by them we must both judge and be judged." Clarke thinks they are so called, "because they judge concerning our words and works; show the rules by which they should be regulated; and cause us to discern what is right and wrong, and decide accordingly."

7. WORD or WORDS. There are two terms, quite distinct in the Hebrew, but both rendered word. To maintain the distinction between these words some translators for one have word, and for the other saying. The first of these occurs in this Psalm twenty-four times between vv. 9-169; in Ps. xix. 3, rendered language. The corresponding verb is rendered talk, speak, say, tell, promise, declare, pronounce, commune. It comprehends every kind of word that is spoken. The other term rendered word in this Psalm occurs nineteen times between vv. 11-172; in Gen. iv. 23; Deut. xxxii. 2; Ps. xvii. 6, speech, in the sense of words uttered. In this Psalm the rendering is uniform, but in Ps. cxlvii. 15, it is rendered commandment. These two words are never found in the same verse of this Psalm. Nor is it possible to define or preserve the distinction between them, though Jebb is confident that "they are not synonymous." They are at least parallel, and are used in the same general sense, and with the same application. Pool: "The Scripture is called God's word, as it proceeds from his mouth, and is revealed by him to us." Dickson: "The word signifieth God's expounding his mind to us, as if he were speaking to us." Henry: "The Scripture is called God's word or saying, because it is the declaration of his mind, and Christ, the essential Eternal Word, is all in all in it." Clarke: "In the revelation God speaks to man; shows him in a clear, concise, intelligible, and rational way, his interest, his duty, his privileges, and, in a word, the reasonable service he requires of him."

8. WAY. It occurs in this Psalm thirteen times. In some cases it clearly refers to the tenor of one's life, as in vv. 5, 26, 29, 59, 168; but in vv. 1, 3, 14, 27, 30, 32, 33, 37, it points to Scripture. The same word in the same sense is found both in preceding and succeeding Psalms, though often it denotes the life one leads, as in Ps. i. 1, 6. Kimchi thinks that the way, as a name for the sacred volume, is the rule upon which the Scriptures are grounded. Jebb says: "Its meaning is so direct and simple as to require no explanation, a plain rule of conduct; in its higher sense, the assisting grace of God, through Christ our Lord, who is the way, the truth, and the life." Pool: "The word of God is called his way, as prescribed by him for us to walk in." Dickson: "The way of God signifieth the Lord's giving direction for our several actions how we should walk, as by so many steps to the kingdom of heaven." Henry: "The Scriptures are called God's way, because they are the rule both of his providence and of our obedience." Clarke: "The revelation which God had given was called a way, because it was the way in which God goes in order to instruct and save man; the way in which man must tread in order to be safe, holy, and happy."

9. TRUTH, or FAITHFULNESS. Both words are given because both are employed by our translators in this Psalm and elsewhere as a fit rendering for a word cognate to Amen. It occurs in this Psalm five times, vv. 30, 75, 86, 90, 138. See on Ps. xxxiii. 4; xxxvi. 5. It expresses the stability and fidelity with which God executes all he speaks. Henry: "The principles upon which the divine law is built are eternal truths." It is once rendered truth, twice faithful, and twice faithfulness. "Thy word is truth."

10. RIGHTEOUSNESS. This word occurs in this Psalm twice in the feminine, and twelve times in the masculine form. In some cases it is rendered right, justice, righteous. In the text or margin it is commonly rendered righteousness. It clearly in several cases refers to God's word, vv. 7, 62, 75, 106, 123, 138, 144, 160, 164, 172. In

v. 142, we have it in both the masculine and feminine. Dickson says that, as applied to Scripture, it "signifieth that the word of God sheweth the way how a man shall be justified, to wit, by faith, and how a justified man should approve himself to God and man, as justified by faith, and that every son of wisdom must and will justify this word of God, as the perfect rule of righteousness." Henry says the Scripture receives this name "because it is all holy, just, and good, and the rule and standard of righteousness." Pool says it is so styled, "as exactly agreeable to God's righteous nature and will."

Some have thought that to this list should be added the word Name. Nor can it be denied that in Ps. cxxxviii. 2, and perhaps in other places God's name includes his word: "Thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name," i. e., above all by which thou makest thyself known. But as name occurs but twice in this Psalm, vv. 55, 132, and as in each of those cases we may understand the Lord himself, no further remarks are here offered on the subject, except that to us God is better known by his word than in all other ways. Though the ten words above explained are used as names of Scripture, and have, at least primarily, distinct significations, which it is not idle to make, and which in some cases seem to be preserved; yet to a considerable extent they are employed in a general sense, and synonymously. Calvin: "In this Psalm almost all these terms are synonymous." Nor are these distinctions of terms useless. Jebb: "It is well to learn from this Psalm to consider God's law as a guide, as a lamp of illumination; as an object of thankfulness, and a source of peace and joy, whether contemplated in the light of an objective truth, of a divine revelation, of an address to the conscience, of a command, of a judicial ordinance, or of a communication from God's own mouth."

The length of this Psalm is in great contrast with that of the cxvii. and many others. It is more than twice as long as any other. While the Scriptures allow of short devotional exercises and by example often commend them, they do not discourage those which are of greater length. Henry: "It is not making long prayers which Christ censures, but making them for a pretence; which intimates that they are in themselves good and commendable."

The three names of the Most High used in this poem are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and Jah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2, and introduction to Ps. lxxviii. Let us consider this Psalm by parts or pauses—eight verses at a time.

PSALM CXIX.

ALEPH.

- 1 Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the LORD.
- 2 Blessed are they that keep his testimonies, and that seek him with the whole heart.
- 3 They also do no iniquity: they walk in his ways.
- 4 Thou hast commanded us to keep thy precepts diligently.
- 5 O that my ways were directed to keep thy statutes!
- 6 Then shall I not be ashamed, when I have respect unto all thy commandments.
- 7 I will praise thee with uprightness of heart, when I shall have learned thy righteous judgments.
- 8 I will keep thy statutes: O forsake me not utterly.

THOUGH the first letter of each of these verses in Hebrew is the same, yet the first words of none but verses 1, 2, are the same.

1. Blessed are the undefiled in the way, who walk in the law of the LORD. Blessed, literally, O the blessednesses, as in Ps. i. 1. Undefiled, in Ps. xviii. 23 and elsewhere, upright; in Ps. xviii. 30, 32, perfect; sometimes complete; in application to sacrifices without blemish, Ex. xii. 5; Lev. i. 3; several times rendered as an adverb, sincerely, or as a noun, sincerity, see on Ps. xv. 2. Way, see No. 8; though some think it here means the way of a man's life. To walk in the law is to keep it.

2. Blessed are they that keep his testimonies, and that seek him with the whole heart. Blessed, as in v. 1. Keep; found ten times and uniformly rendered in this Psalm; elsewhere sometimes preserve, also observe. See on Ps. xii. 7. Testimonies, see No. 2. The words and that are added by the translators. Some prefer to make the latter clause entirely independent and read, With all the heart they will seek him. See on Ps. xiv. 2. The phrase denotes entire sincerity.

3. They also do no iniquity: they walk in his ways. Good men are here described both negatively and positively. 1. They do no iniquity; Calvin: Do not work iniquity; church of England: Do no wickedness; Fry: Have done no ill; Street: Commit no iniquity; Hengstenberg: Do no unrighteousness; Alexander: Do not practise wrong. The clause is parallel to 1 John iii. 9. A wicked life is subversive of all evidence of piety. 2. They walk in his ways, i. e., they habitually behave as the Lord requires in his word.

4. Thou hast commanded us to keep thy precepts diligently. Hast commanded, hast brought the full weight of thy authority in an explicit requirement. Keep; in its various forms this verb occurs more than twenty times in this Psalm and often elsewhere. It is not that so rendered in v. 2, though of the same general import, and of much more frequent use. It is rendered preserve, observe, take heed to, regard, look narrowly to and watch. It implies great circumspection. Precepts, see No. 3. Diligently, elsewhere exceedingly, greatly, utterly, very, mightily. It occurs again in vv. 8, 43, 51, 96, 107, 138, 140, 167. The business of a pious man's life should be thoroughly gone through with.

5. O that my ways were directed to keep thy statutes! Where the optative form is used, it is now common to use Oh, not O. Directed, fashioned, established, prepared; in Ps. lvii. 7, fixed; in Ps. li. 10, right. Keep, as in v. 4. Statutes, see No. 4.

6. Then shall I not be ashamed, when I have respect unto all thy commandments. Ashamed, as in Ps. vi. 10; xxv. 2; elsewhere confounded. Have respect, see, look, behold, consider; found also in vv. 15, 18. Commandments, see No. 5. This verse differs from many others chiefly in calling for universal obedience. Calvin: "Among the snares of Satan, amid such thick darkness and so great insensibility as ours, the utmost vigilance and caution are necessary, if we would aim at being entirely exempted from blame."

7. I will praise thee with uprightness of heart, when I shall have learned thy righteous judgments. Praise, often give thanks. Uprightness, as in Ps. xxv. 21; in Prov. xvii. 26, equity. It occurs nowhere else in this Psalm, but we have the corresponding adjective, upright, in v. 137, and the corresponding verb, I esteem right, in v. 128. So great an attainment as to worship God in spirit and in truth is not made except by learning the judgments of righteousness. Some however think we are here to understand providential judgments. This does not materially vary the lesson taught, for we never understand providence except as we understand Scripture. Calvin: "The prophet very justly here makes the fruit of genuine piety to consist in celebrating the praises of God without hypocrisy."

8. I will keep thy statutes: O forsake me not utterly. Keep statutes, as in v. 4. The first clause is a vow, a covenant engagement to be the Lord's. But conscious of his own weakness, he trembles lest he should fail to fulfil it, and so he utters the ejaculation of the latter clause. Forsake, in Ps. xvi. 10, leave; in Ps. xxvii. 9, forsake. It occurs again in v. 87, in the preterite. Calvin: "The term forsake is susceptible of two interpretations, either that God withdraws his Spirit, or that he permits his people to be brought low by adversity, as if he had forsaken them. The latter interpretation agrees best with the context, and is most in accordance with the phrase immediately subjoined very far," or utterly, in v. 4, rendered diligently. Clarke: "Never leave me to my own strength, nor to my own heart."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Let us hold fast the truth of God, by whatever name called, vv. 1-8. Without it we are undone, having neither strength, nor wisdom, nor righteousness, nor purity. Luther: "Where the true word of God is not taught, there is not any truth of God; there is found a great noise of external holiness, and the form of godliness, and hypocrisy; there, indeed, you may find psalm-singing, prayer, doctrines, consolation, and all thanksgiving and all the varieties of the worship of God, with all interpretations of the Scriptures. I will add, also, that there you may find sufferings and martyrdom. But all is outside show; all is the form of godliness only; all is false; all is feigned and nothing but lies; all is full of the poison of the devil."

2. Although the world does groan in misery, and God's people have their share, yet there is real blessedness secured to all the righteous, vv. 1, 2; see REMARKS on Psalm i. 1. On this point Scripture and experience speak the same language.

3. Scott: "It is the will of God that we should wisely seek our own happiness: our self-love, indeed, should be directed and subordinated; but it cannot and ought not to be extirpated." God often appeals to it, vv. 1, 2.

4. No man has taken the first step towards real, abiding blessedness until he has become a sincere and habitual servant of the Most High God, according to Scripture, vv. 1, 2.

5. A wicked life disproves any profession of piety, v. 3. It is mere presumption for any mortal to say that all is well so long as he allows any sin. Henry: "It will not serve us to make religion the subject of our discourse, but we must make it the rule of our walk;" Dickson: "Albeit there be no man who sinneth not, yet such as flee to God's grace, offered in Christ, for daily pardon, and set themselves to obey God's directions set down in his word, are esteemed to be no workers of iniquity, but men going homeward to God, however clogged with infirmity."

6. There is such a thing as genuine piety, v. 3. There is a class of people over whom sin has no dominion, Rom. vi. 16. Now and then we find a Nathanael in whose spirit there is no guile, and a Zacharias and Elizabeth, who walk in the statutes and ordinances of the Lord blameless. There are manifestations of sterling principle in the lives of good men for which there is no explanation but on the supposition that they are taught from heaven and have imbibed its spirit.

7. In the arrangements of providence and in the teachings of Scripture, everything rightly understood conduces to holiness. If there are warnings and threatenings, they are against sin. If there are promises and encouragements, they are unto holiness. The law and the gospel, Mount Sinai and Mount Calvary cry, Be ye holy.

8. Although good men are far from being what they ought to be and what they hope to be, yet they long for perfect conformity to God's entire will, v. 4. If they could have it their way, they never would sin again. The redeemed man knows that he is not his own, that he is bought with a price, and, if ever fit for heaven, he must in his measure be perfect as his Father in heaven is perfect. Sensible of his own weakness and corruptions, he still hungers and thirsts after righteousness, and will continue to do so, more and more; and never will he be satisfied till he awakes in the divine likeness.

9. True obedience is universal, v. 6. Clarke: "Allow that any of God's commandments may be transgressed, and we shall soon have the whole decalogue set aside." Why should we not tenderly regard all the commandments? They have the same author, the same end, and the same happy influence on the obedient. Morison: "A partial attention to certain of God's commands, which is accompanied by a habitual disregard of others, is a conduct entirely unsuitable to the conditions of one of God's children;" Bridges: "Willingly to dispense with the least of the commandments, proves that we have yet to learn the spirit of acceptable obedience."

10. The Scriptures give no countenance to the notion that piety can exist without sound knowledge, v. 7. The lamp of truth must light up all our path to glory. Henry: "As long as we live, we must be scholars in Christ's school and sit at his feet; but we should aim to be head-scholars, and try to get into the highest form;" Calvin: "None will praise God unfeignedly and cordially, but he who has made such proficiency in his school as to mould his life in subjection to him."

11. Good resolutions are in their place good things, v. 8. We have Scriptural authority for making them, the promise of divine grace in enabling us to keep them, and an assurance of eternal rewards to such as stick to them. Henry: "Those have well learned God's statutes who are come up to a full resolution in the strength of his grace to keep them."

12. Genuine humility will ever pray, Lead me not into temptation, let not my principles be too severely tried, forsake me not too much, v. 8. It is wise for us to cry, Lord, remember that I am dust and ashes; let not my spirit fail before thee. Dickson: "As he who is most upright in his resolution, is most diffident of his own strength to perform his resolution, so he is also most earnest with God in prayer, to enable him to do as he resolveth."

13. These eight verses teach that true piety is sincere, consistent, practical, hearty, intelligent, earnest, active, stirring, diligent, humble, distrustful of itself, symmetrical, guileless, unspotted from the world, self-renouncing, confident in God, delighting in thankfulness, fully purposed to keep the law, and as ready to confess that without divine grace it can do nothing.

14. They also teach us how great is the sin of not believing God's word. As it is a law, the faithless refuse to walk by it; as it is a testimony, they refuse to believe their Maker; as it demands righteousness, they refuse to seek it; as it gives precepts, they will not obey them; as it ordains statutes, they rebel against them; as it has excellent commandments, they stand out in opposition to them; as it abounds with righteous judgments, they refuse to stand by them. They will not pray for grace; they will not praise God for mercies received; they do not feel their dependence or impotence, and they never look to the Father of lights from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift.

PSALM CXIX.

BETH.

9 Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? by taking heed thereto according to thy word.

10 With my whole heart have I sought thee: O let me not wander from thy commandments.

11 Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee.

12 Blessed art thou, O LORD: teach me thy statutes.

13 With my lips have I declared all the judgments of thy mouth.

14 I have rejoiced in the way of thy testimonies, as much as in all riches.

15 I will meditate in thy precepts, and have respect unto thy ways.

16 I will delight myself in thy statutes: I will not forget thy word.

ALL these verses, except v. 12, begin with the same word. On the terms word, commandments, statutes, judgments, testimonies and precepts here found, see introductory remarks Nos. 7, 5, 4, 6, 2, 3, respectively.

9. Wherewithal shall a young man cleanse his way? by taking heed thereto according to thy word. Wherewithal, literally with what, in Nu. xxiii. 8, the same word without any preposition, is rendered how; with the preposition, whereby, Gen. xv. 8; wherewith, Jud. vi. 15; wherein, 1 Sam. xiv. 38. Young man is better than youth; the noun is in the masculine; also rendered lad, boy, child. The perils to young men are even greater than to young women. Cleanse, not that in Ps. xix. 12; but one of like import; in Ps. li. 4, be clear, and in Ps. lxxiii. 13, have cleansed. A sinner is said to be cleansed, 1, when his guilt is pardoned; 2, when his pollution of heart is removed; 3, when he is preserved from falling into iniquity. Each of these is an unspeakable mercy. Way, not the same word so rendered in vv. 1, 4, but one rendered path in Ps. viii. 8; in Ps. xix. 5, race; found in vv. 15, 101, 104, 128. It denotes the course of life. The Chaldee and Syriac, followed by Hammond, Patrick and Waterland do not make the latter part of the verse an answer to the first but continue the question to the end. Wherewith shall a young man cleanse his way, that he may observe thy word? The reason commonly assigned for the change is found in the grammar, the word rendered taking heed being a verb in the infinitive. This rendering leaves the question wholly unanswered. Some think this heightens the impression. On the other hand the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, church of England, Calvin, Fabritius, Piscator, Amesius, Tremellius and Junius, Edwards, Street, Jebb and Hengstenberg divide and render the stanza as in the authorized version. This is best on many accounts. The grammatical difficulty is not insuperable. Taking heed to God's word is the means of leading a holy life. Take heed, in vv. 4, 8, keep.

10. With my whole heart have I sought thee: O let me not wander from thy commandments. Whole heart, as in v. 2. It implies entire sincerity, genuine cordiality. Seeking the Lord is put for the whole of religion. "Do not cause me to wander from thy commandments," is a more literal rendering of the last clause, but it does not so well give the sense. Street: Suffer me not to deviate from thy commandments.

11. Thy word have I hid in mine heart, that I might not sin against thee. Hid, in Ps. xxxi. 20, kept secretly; in Ps. xxxi. 19, laid up; spoken of acquiring and rightly using wisdom and knowledge, Pr. ii. 7; x. 14. Compare Luke ii. 51. He, who accepts, believes, ponders and practises God's word hides it in his heart. Thus received, it warns, reproves and deters from all sin.

12. Blessed art thou, O LORD. A doxology of frequent occurrence; see on Ps. v. 12; xviii. 46. Teach me thy statutes; precisely as in vv. 26, 64, 68, 124, 135. The same verb in the same form occurs in vv. 66, 108. In vv. 7, 71, 73, another form of it is rendered learn. In v. 171, we have it in connection with the same noun. Thou hast taught me thy statutes. We had it in Ps. xxv. 4, 5. Such petitions are a clear confession of great ignorance, darkness and weakness on the part of the petitioner, together with a longing desire for instruction and guidance in the way of truth, duty and safety. Such prayers are never unseasonable. Petitions for the same blessing, in different terms, abound in our Psalm.

13. With my lips have I declared all the judgments of thy mouth. Declared, as in v. 26; in the future in Ps. ii. 7; also rendered speak, tell, show forth; the participle is scribe, writer. He had taught in every fit way the decisions of God's word. His heart was full of the matter. God had spoken to him; and what less could he do than speak to men?

14. I have rejoiced in the way of thy testimonies as much as in all riches. The heart of a renewed man goes out towards the whole word of God, the practical and preceptive no less than the doctrinal and consolatory. Its treasures are rich and highly prized. Calvin: "As wealth attracts to itself the hearts of mankind, so I have taken more exquisite delight in the progress which I make in the doctrine of godliness, than if I abounded in all manner of riches." Green renders it: I take more delight in the way of thy testimonies, than in all my riches.

15. I will meditate in thy precepts, and have respect unto thy ways. Meditate, as in vv. 23, 48, 78, 148; in v. 27 and elsewhere, talk; in Ps. cxliii. 5, muse; in Ps. lv. 17, pray; in Ps. lxix. 12, speak. It implies deep and heartfelt reflection expressed or unexpressed. Have respect, as in v. 6, look, consider, regard. Ways, paths as in v. 9, parallel to precepts.

16. I will delight myself in thy statutes: I will not forget thy word. Ainsworth renders the first clause: I will solace and recreate myself. The pleasure which the renewed heart has in God's word is great, producing delight; habitual, banishing forgetfulness of it; practical, giving life to piety. Calvin: "The commencement of a good life consists in God's law attracting us to him by its sweetness."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The Scriptures would not be perfect, if they did not give proper directions, warnings and encouragements to young men, v. 9. Their case is full of interest. By birth-sin their way is already defiled. And they are inexperienced, self-confident, rash, inconsiderate. The imagination of their heart is evil, Gen. viii. 21. Their passions are strong and their principles weak; their lusts imperious and their self-knowledge very imperfect. Till taught from heaven, man is void of wisdom, his will is stubborn, and he is impatient of restraint. All rules not enforced by divine authority are too feeble to control the strong inclinations. Yet youth is the seed-time both for mature life and for eternity. In such circumstances God's word "is the only antidote by which we can protect ourselves against the corruption of our nature." One wrong step in youth is very apt to lead to another, and yet another, till ruin comes like an armed man. Scott: "Every one ought to contribute all that is in his power to preserve young persons from the fatal effects of their own headstrong passions, of an ensnaring world, and of artful seducers; that they may not early contract bad habits." The excellencies of the Scripture for the young are many: 1. It is plain. 2. It is easily remembered. 3. It contains perfect rules, which need no amendment. 4. It gives good examples. It points to Joseph, Samuel, David, Solomon, and the young Hebrews in Babylon. It furnishes us one perfect example. Horne: "He who became man for our salvation, passed through this state of youth, undefiled, that he might, as it were, reclaim and consecrate it anew to God." 5. It holds up bad examples as warnings. To the end of time Absalom will be a beacon to the wayward. 6. It presents the most powerful motives, drawn from heaven, earth and hell. 7. It encourages us to pray with hope for the influences of the Spirit. Compare 2 Tim. iii. 16.

2. If we would make the word of God truly profitable to us, we must take fast hold of it with our hearts, v. 10. Lightly to esteem is to despise heavenly wisdom.

3. Let us cultivate a deep sense of our dependence on divine grace, relying solely upon God to keep us from going astray, v. 10. Dickson: "The more experience a man hath in the ways of God, the more sensible is he of his own readiness to wander insensibly, by ignorance and inadvertency from the ways of God."

4. It is a good thing to read God's word much. It is also well to commit much of it to memory. The history of the church furnishes many bright examples of great skill in Scripture. Yet not 'wit and memory, but the heart, is the chest to keep it in,' v. 11. Neither hearing, nor reading, nor reciting the holy Scriptures will save us from false ways, unless with the heart we cordially embrace whatever they teach us. To this work we ought to be greatly stimulated.

5. As sure as our hearts are rightly affected we shall never be done blessing God, either in time or in eternity, v. 12.

6. There is an absolute necessity for our praying for divine teaching, v. 12. "God must open the eyes of our understanding, or the light of the shining word itself will be all darkness," 1 Cor. ii. 14. He alone can lift the veil from off the heart or make us wise unto salvation. "The people that doth not understand shall fall."

7. Though hypocrites and fanatics have brought great reproach upon religious conference, yet the children of God should declare the truths of Scripture, v. 13. Horne: "When we make the Scriptures the subject of our conversation, we glorify God, we edify our neighbors, and we improve ourselves." He does not love God, his Son, nor his word, who does not sincerely desire to bring others to do the same. Hengstenberg: "When the word of God is really in the heart, it will also be found on the lips;" Morison: "We are bound by ties of weighty and eternal obligation, to make known to others what God has imparted to ourselves of the knowledge of his revealed will, and of the happiness involved in his pure and heavenly service;" Bridges: "Thus did Andrew bring Peter, and the woman of Samaria, her neighbors, to Jesus. What might we not do for our fellow-sinners, if our intercourse with them was the overflowing of a heart filled with love; guided by a single desire to glorify our Saviour, and to edify his church!"

8. We should settle it in our minds that the truth of God is stable, and never varies in its requirements or encouragements, v. 13. Dickson: "The word of God in Scripture may be looked upon as the sentence of the Supreme Judge, uncontrollable and unalterable by any creature, and whereby men must judge of all truth, and expect to be judged by it."

9. Many extravagant things are said respecting human happiness; but if any would have heaven upon earth, let him rejoice in the word of God, v. 14. Horne: "Truth and holiness afford to the sincere believer a pleasure more exquisite, as well as more solid and enduring, than that which a miser feels at the acquisition of his darling wealth."

10. We should profit more by Scripture if we would meditate more upon it, v. 15. Nicolson: "As food undigested will not nourish the body, so the word of God, not considered with deep meditation and reflection, will not feed the soul." Meditation is an exercise of the mind purely spiritual, and goes entirely cross to our native indolence. But let us persevere, and cry for help, and put a bridle on our vagaries, and God will give us the victory.

11. There is nothing in true religion to produce stupefaction. On the contrary it brings into healthful exercise the highest faculties and emotions of our natures. It awakens delight, v. 16. The word is very strong. Clarke: "I will skip about and jump for joy." Blessed be God, his plan is to repress only sinful emotions. True religion encourages all that are right. Speaking of the time of his conversion, Augustine says: "How sweet was it in a moment to be free from those delightful vanities, to lose which had been my dread; to part with which was now my joy." Dickson: "Spiritual joy in spiritual objects far exceedeth any joy in worldly possessions."

12. We are again taught the propriety of forming good resolutions, vv. 15, 16.

He who has truly begun to serve God will be more and more purposed to let nothing divert him from his pious course.

13. All the fuel to keep the fire of devotion burning on the altar of the heart is the word of God. Let us not forget that, v. 16.

PSALM CXIX.

GIMEL •

17 Deal bountifully with thy servant, that I may live, and keep thy word.

18 Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law.

19 I am a stranger in the earth: hide not thy commandments from me.

20 My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgments at all times.

21 Thou hast rebuked the proud that are cursed, which do err from thy commandments.

22 Remove from me reproach and contempt; for I have kept thy testimonies.

23 Princes also did sit and speak against me: but thy servant did meditate in thy statutes.

24 Thy testimonies also are my delight, and my counsellors.

ALL these verses begin with the third letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Verses 18, 22 begin with the same word, though in different senses. Verses 23, 24 begin with the same word, which we render also. Each of the other verses begins with a different word. On the terms, word, law, commandments, judgments, testimonies and statutes, see Nos. 7, 1, 5, 6, 2, 4, respectively.

17. Deal bountifully with thy servant, that I may live, and keep thy word. Deal bountifully, in Hebrew one short word. See on Ps. xiii. 6. He confesses that continuance of life would be the fruit of divine bounty, and much more so to live as to keep God's word. Keep, as in vv. 4, 8; in v. 9, take heed. Calvin: "The prophet asks as a principal favor, that, while he lives, he may devote himself entirely to God."

18. Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of thy law. Open; margin, reveal; in Ps. xviii. 15, discover; in Isa. xlvii. 2, twice uncover. Bossuet: "Open mine eyes, dispel the shades, take away the veil." Blindness is one of the sad and universal consequences of the fall of our race, Isa. xlii. 7; xvi. 18; John xii. 40; 2 Cor. iii. 14; iv. 4. All saving knowledge of God is by revelation, Matt. xi. 25; xvi. 17. Without divine teaching the Scriptures remain a sealed book. Behold, in v. 15, the same form of the verb is have respect. Under divine illumination the prophet would so see divine things as to have respect to them. Wondrous things; in v. 27, wondrous works. See on Ps. ix. 1, where it is marvellous works, rendered as here in Ps. lxxii. 18; lxxxvi. 10. Walford thinks "the reference here is to the figures and adumbrations of the law." But we have need of divine illumination to enable us to profit by the clearest parts of God's word, the simplest truths of Scripture.

19. I am a stranger in the earth: hide not thy commandments from me. All God's people have been strangers and pilgrims on the earth. They had here no continuing city, but sought one to come. They confessed that earth was a wilderness, through which they were hastily passing. That which guided and cheered them in their journey was the word of God, every part of it, including his whole preceptive will. To hide his word from us is to leave us to our natural blindness without saving knowledge, or spiritual illumination. Luther: "I have no inheritance beyond thy word, therefore forsake me not."

20. My soul breaketh for the longing that it hath unto thy judgments at all times. For breaketh Calvin reads is rent; church of England, meltdeth away; Edwards, is torn in pieces; Street, wasteth away; French and Skinner and Hengstenberg, is broken. The word occurs here only and in Lam. iii. 16. The whole phrase expresses the liveliest and most absorbing concern. Nor was it temporary, but at all times.

21. Thou hast rebuked the proud that are cursed, which do err from thy commandments. Morison proposes to render the verse thus: Thou rebukest the proud; cursed are they who err from thy commandments. He is supported by some respectable scholars of modern times and by the ancient versions. Rebuked, as in Ps. ix. 5, on which see. The rebuke may include both the decisions of Scripture and the inflictions of providence against the proud. The proud, found also in vv. 51, 69, 78, 85, 122; in Ps. xix. 13, presumptuous. Dominant pride will deceive and ruin any one. It is the high road to transgression and to wrath. Cursed, here only in the Psalter, often rendered cursed in Deut. xxvii. xxviii.

22. Remove from me reproach and contempt; for I have kept thy testimonies. Remove, literally, roll, as in Ps. xxii. 8; xxxvii. 5. Hengstenberg well says there is a literal allusion to Josh. v. 9. Reproach, in Dan. xii. 2, shame. See on Ps. xv. 3. Contempt is despite, almost uniformly rendered. It expresses the scorning of the proud. The argument he urges for protection from such suffering is virtually that he was the child and servant of God, and so under his protection; the proof of his piety being found in his holy life. Kept, as in v. 2. It occurs in the same sense ten times in this Psalm.

23. Princes also did sit and speak against me: but thy servant did meditate in thy statutes. This is one of the verses, which has led some to regard Jeremiah or Daniel, especially the latter as the author of this poem. But princes, i. e., chiefs, captains, rulers, principal men did plot against David also, and did say much against him. At such times his resort was to God's word, especially in that aspect of it, which regards it as unchangeable, as statutes, unalterable decrees. Meditate, as in v. 15.

24. Thy testimonies also are my delight, and my counsellors. Delight, in the plural delights, a noun cognate to the verb delight, in v. 16. The same is declared in vv. 77, 92, 143, 174. Counsellors, literally men of my counsel, not found elsewhere. Calvin: "To adhere unflinchingly to our purpose, when the world takes up an unjust opinion of us, and, at the same time, constantly to meditate on God's law, is an example of Christian fortitude seldom to be met with." It is as if he had said: "Although the cruel injustice of men, in charging me falsely, grieves and annoys me, yet the pleasurable delight which I take in thy law is a sufficient recompense for it all."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Let men always come before God as sinners; let all their plea be his free grace and rich bounty, v. 17. We have no merit of our own, no worthiness that we can plead as the ground of a single gift.

2. While it is lawful for us, in submission to the will of God, humbly to ask for a continuance of life, we may do it not to gratify our own will or covetousness, or love of carnal delight; but that we may glorify God by keeping his word, v. 17. Increase of holiness is the great object for which we should desire to live.

3. Afflicted, tempted and tried as God's people may be, he still deals bountifully with them all, v. 17. The humblest and poorest of them have unsearchable riches, and unspeakable blessings. Life is theirs; forgiveness is theirs; acceptance is theirs; renewal is theirs; the world is theirs; God is their Father; Christ is their Brother; the Spirit is their Sanctifier, Comforter and Guide. All the wealth of the world is not worth half as much as one covenant blessing.

4. It is in vain for us to hope for increase of saving knowledge, except as we get light and wisdom from above, v. 18. In this the people of God of all ages are agreed. Clarke: "The holy Scriptures are plain enough: but the heart of man is darkened by sin. The Bible does not so much need a comment, as the soul does the light of the Holy Spirit." Horne: "Pride, prejudice and interest will compose a veil through which a Christian shall see as little of the New Testament as a Jew doth of the old." Morison: "We cannot be conformed to the word of God without understanding its blessed truths; and we cannot understand them aright without divine teaching."

5. There are marvellous, excellent and glorious things in Scripture, and it is worse than folly to deny it. Nor has the coming of Christ removed the mysteriousness of the divine counsels. Indeed he himself is by preëminence the mystery of Godliness. Revelation, which should tell us nothing above, beyond or contrary to our darkened conceptions, could never reveal to us either God, or Christ, or heaven, or the highest and most spiritual motives to a godly life. Dickson: "The word of God is full of wonders, high and heavenly mysteries, and he who seeth them best, wondereth most."

6. Let us not deny but confess that we are strangers on the earth, travellers to a far distant home, where are our kindred, and heart, and treasure, v. 19. Our citizenship is in heaven. Our possessions lie far beyond the reach of rust, and moth, and fire, and thieves, and revolutions. "The pilgrim spirit is the pulse of the soul."

7. The desires of the renewed soul are not only permanent and importunate, but intense, v. 20. Far from being Laodicean, the true Christian spirit follows hard after God. Bridges: "Grace is indeed an insatiable principle. Enjoyment, instead of surfeiting, only serves to sharpen the appetite. Yet if we are content to live at a low rate, there will be no sensible interest in the consolation of the Gospel."

8. Proud and presumptuous as the wicked may be, they do but grossly deceive themselves in thinking their case desirable. They shall suffer awful punishment, even the rebuke of the Most High, v. 21. They may defy heaven now; they may laugh at sacred things; they may put far away the evil day; but they are fearfully cursed. Every perfection of God, every promise to his people, every threatening to his foes, all that he has said, and all that he has done are against them so long as they continue in sin. Their pride may intoxicate them now; they may even question the divine existence, but the day is coming when they would esteem it a mercy to have the mountains heaped upon them to hide them from the presence of God.

9. Whoever has felt the keen edge of the scorning of scornors may naturally and earnestly cry to be delivered from reproach and contempt, v. 22. Against such trials pure benevolence, a heavenly mind and unoffending innocence are no shield, v. 23. Our Master himself endured the contradiction of sinners. But let us not forget that God can wholly shield us from the shafts of malice; that he can bring to us great good out of so severe trial; that if through his grace we can be steadfast with God, we may be sure that all will end well; and that if our fellowship be with the Father and with his Son, all the wrath of man can do us no real harm.

10. It is no new thing for the people of God to be hunted and persecuted, tormented and afflicted, even under the lead of the principal men of their age and country, v. 23. David was thus hated. Our Lord Jesus himself provoked the malice of great men, even in his infancy. The world is in no good humor with holiness or holy people. Nor can such trials be borne by human strength alone. Unless we can flee to the Word of God and to the mercy-seat, our courage must utterly fail.

11. Dickson: "Troubles will try men whether they fear God or men most," v. 23.

12. It is only when we have pleasure in our religion, and delight in Scripture truth that our religion is truly valuable, v. 24. Then Jesus says: "In me ye have peace. In the world ye shall have tribulation, but be of good cheer: I have overcome the world," John xvi. 33.

13. Each of these eight verses, more or less calls upon us to cherish and strengthen our love for every part of Scripture. Let us never lightly esteem the oracles of God.

Let us beware of that fanaticism which is guided by impulses and despises the written word. Let us beware of our own speculations. Let us carefully guard against all delusions of the world, the flesh and the devil. Let us cling to the doctrines, the promises, the precepts and the warnings of Scripture. Let us not lean on human wisdom. He, who has all the prophets and apostles for his counsellors, and a teachable disposition, will walk more safely than without these he could follow the counsels of all the wise men of the earth.

14. To those, for whom God undertakes, nothing is impossible. This is true of the Christian in the work of salvation. He has a natural dulness and blindness in religion. He is a stranger upon earth. Sometimes his heart is ready to break. Sometimes he is tempted to pride. Sometimes his neighbors fill him with contempt and cover him with reproach. Sometimes princes speak against him. But he shall come off a conqueror and more than a conqueror through him that loved him.

PSALM CXIX.

DALETH.

- 25 My soul cleaveth unto the dust: quicken thou me according to thy word.
 26 I have declared my ways, and thou heardest me: teach me thy statutes.
 27 Make me to understand the way of thy precepts: so shall I talk of thy wondrous works.
 28 My soul melteth for heaviness: strengthen thou me according unto thy word.
 29 Remove from me the way of lying: and grant me thy law graciously.
 30 I have chosen the way of truth: thy judgments have I laid before me.
 31 I have stuck unto thy testimonies: O LORD, put me not to shame.
 32 I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart.

ALL these verses begin with the fourth Hebrew letter. Verses 25, 31 begin with the same verb rendered cleaveth, have stuck. All the other verses begin with the word which we render way or ways, as in vv. 1, 3. On the terms word, way or ways, statutes, law, judgments, testimonies and commandments, see Nos. 7, 8, 4, 1, 6, 2, 5, respectively.

25. My soul cleaveth unto the dust. The rendering of this clause is remarkably uniform; yet the interpretations are various. Fry applies it to the humiliation and afflictions of Christ. Dickson applies it to David's trouble of mind, the heavy condition of his heart and spirit. Others think the prophet is speaking of his afflictions, so sensibly felt, that he voluntarily covered himself with dust, and sat in the dust, according to the custom of the orientals. Compare Job i. 20; ii. 12. Diodati: "I am cast down beyond all hope of relief, if thou dost not raise and restore me to life." Henry regards this view as admissible. Scott: "Many regard this verse, merely as a complaint on account of deep affliction and peril of death." Perhaps a larger number regard it as a declaration that his life was in imminent danger. Calvin: "He means that he had no more hope of life than if he had been shut up in the tomb." Pool: "I am in eminent danger of present death, through the rage and power of mine enemies, I am like one laid in the grave, without all hopes of recovery. So this phrase is used in Ps. xxii. 15." Often does dust point to the grave, Job vii. 21; xvii. 16; xx. 11; xxi. 26; xl. 13. For my soul Clarke would read my life; and "then cleaving to the dust may imply an apprehension of approaching death; and this agrees best with the petition." Patrick and Walford give the same interpretation. Alexander thinks the clause intended to "suggest two consistent but distinct ideas, that of deep degradation, as in Ps. xlv. 25, and that of death, as in Ps. xxii. 29."

Yet others suppose that the Psalmist is deploring his own corruptions, his sinfulness before God. Nicolson: "His affections cleaved to things below, instead of being set on things above." Hammond: "I am cast down in a sight either of my unworthiness or my sins." Morison and Scott take the same view; and Henry regards it as probably correct. Horne regards these words as expressive both of affliction and humiliation. Gill interprets them as referring either to the dust of death, or to great dejection and humiliation of mind, or to a proneness in him to sin and the snares of the world. Why may not several of these things be united? What is more common than such a record as this? "I am filled with shame and sorrow for my sins; God is letting loose sore afflictions upon me; my life itself is in danger; without early relief I cannot sustain my sorrows, but must sink into the grave." Quicken thou me according to thy word. Quicken, in this Psalm nine times so rendered; in Hab. iii. 2, revive; in the margin, preserve alive; Edwards, enliven me; Street, revive me; Scott, let me be lively. Thus it may mean, Revive my drooping graces, my drooping spirits and my failing health. According to thy word may refer to the special promise made to David in 2 Sam. vii. 12-17; or, it may refer to the general tenor of God's covenant engagements that nothing should hinder his children from gaining the victory over their sins, that their afflictions should not hinder them from displaying heroism and from doing exploits, and that nothing should prematurely terminate their existence. Arnobius, Augustine and Walford by word understand promise.

26. I have declared my ways, and thou heardest me. Declared, as in v. 13; there the declaration was made to men, here, to God. He had laid his whole case before God. God had heard his complaint and had so far answered him, that his affairs were not in a desperate condition. Hitherto God had helped him. He consequently asks for more grace, more wisdom, more holiness: Teach me thy statutes; see on v. 12.

27. Make me to understand the way of thy precepts. This is a repetition of the prayer in the preceding verse. The same verb occurs in vv. 34, 73, 125, 144, 169, and in the future in vv. 95, 100, 104. True piety wishes to know the whole will of God. The way of this verse is in contrast with the ways of the preceding. So shall I talk of thy wondrous works. Talk; see on v. 15, where it is meditate. Wondrous works, as in v. 18.

28. My soul melteth from heaviness: strengthen thou me according to thy word. Many regard this verse as nearly a repetition of v. 25. It has no doubt the same general tone. Melteth, found only here and in Job xvi. 20, where it is poureth out, and in Ecc. x. 18, droppeth through. The primary idea is that of dropping, falling. Heaviness, in the sense of sorrow; see Pr. xvii. 21, where it is so rendered. Alexander: My soul weeps from sorrow; Street: My soul wasteth away with afflictions. Strengthen me, raise me up, as in Ps. xli. 10; cxiii. 7; make me to stand, confirm me, establish me, v. 38; Ps. i. 5; Ruth iv. 7; Gen. ix. 9.

29. Remove from me the way of lying. Way, as in vv. 1, 26, 27. The way of lying is not only the habit or practice of unfaithfulness to God, but the course of sinful life which is sure to be followed by disappointment. The whole life of sin is a lie from beginning to end. Lying, the word occurs eight times in this Psalm. Here and in v. 163 it is lying; in v. 69, a lie; in v. 118, falsehood; in vv. 104, 128, false; in v. 86, wrongfully; and in v. 78, without a cause, literally, with lying; rendered falsehood in Ps. vii. 14. And grant me thy law graciously. Grant graciously, in vv. 58, 132, be merciful unto me; in Ps. iv. 1 and often, have mercy upon me; in Ps. cii. 13, favour. To be led into a right understanding and practice of God's word is an effect of great grace.

30. I have chosen the way of truth. Chosen, a word uniformly rendered, expressing deliberate and settled preference. Way of truth, in opposition to the way of lying in

v. 29. God's truth points out the right way, supports and comforts those who walk in it, at every step evincing divine faithfulness, and at last bringing the soul to everlasting communion with him, who is truth itself. Thy judgments I have laid before me. The chief diversity respects the verb. In Ps. xxi. 5; lxxxix. 19, it is rendered as here; in Ps. xvi. 8, have set. Another form of it is rendered to avail or profit. Syriac: I am delighted with thy judgments; Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway and Street: I have not forgotten thy judgments. Other translations generally give the same idea as the authorized English. See on Ps. xvi. 8.

31. I have stuck unto thy testimonies. Have stuck, in v. 25, rendered cleaveth. There is no word expressing closer adherence. O LORD, put me not to shame. Put to shame, the same verb in another form as in v. 6; it expresses the confusion and dismay attending an overthrow.

32. I will run the way of thy commandments, when thou shalt enlarge my heart. Way, as in v. 27. Run, the usual verb expressing the act of racers, of hosts, or of dashing warriors, Ps. xix. 5; xviii. 29; Esther iii. 13, 15; Jer. li. 31. It marks great alacrity in the business of serving God. But such delight in God's service is the fruit of God's grace. No man can do it till his heart is enlarged, or opened, as it is in Ps. xxxv. 21. The same language is used of Lydia in Acts xvi. 14. For enlarged we might read set at liberty, as the corresponding adjective is rendered, v. 45.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Troubles never come alone. Sin presses us harder than anything else, v. 25. This is true of the soul-troubles of believers. The very communion, which they once had with God, but deepens their grief, when once it is lost. Nor can they in this state cease to mourn the absence of divine comforts.

2. However great our depression, God can raise us up, and give us liveliness in his service, v. 25; and this quickening of our graces is a pledge that we shall be raised up at the last day. "Then soul and body, perfected together, shall take their final farewell of earth, and ascend to heaven, where the soul shall feel no passion but the love of God, and the body shall have no employment but to express it."

3. Whatever we do, or whatever our state may be, let us deal candidly with God and declare to him our whole case, v. 26. If we are sad, he can cheer us. If we are in the dark, he can enlighten us. If we have no might, he can strengthen us. If our wants are many, he can supply them. If we are shut up and cannot come forth, he can enlarge us. Whatever be our case, let us state it all, even as Hezekiah spread the letter before the Lord, Isa. xxxvii. 14.

4. Past answers to prayer should encourage us to come the more boldly to the throne of grace, v. 26. Jacob never forgot the night he spent at Bethel.

5. Helps there are to the study of God's word, nor are they to be despised; but he, who would become mighty in the Scriptures, must in godly sincerity beg to be taught by the Holy Ghost, vv. 26, 27. All other teaching, without this, will but make us learned infidels, or practical unbelievers. Our sinful vanity easily perverts to some wrong end what we do know, and thus fosters pride, ostentation, or carnal security. No power of persuasion can drive from the soul of man its obstinate resistance of the truth until divine grace mollifies its desperate hardness.

6. There is a close affinity between all the duties of religion. The same word is rendered pray, meditate and talk of, v. 27. We think of God's excellent majesty; we cry to him in humble prayer; we study his word, until our souls are filled with gladness and admiration; and then how can we but talk of his wondrous works? Creation, providence and redemption all furnish amazing illustrations of the perfections and glory of God.

7. Troubles, which threaten to dissolve our nature, are no novelties, v. 28. No doubt many a one has died of a broken heart. Many others would have fallen in the same way, but for the many blessed promises and doctrines of Scripture, especially the assurance of the forgiveness of sins and the certainty that prayer will be answered, Isa. xliii. 25, 26.

8. However pressing the sorrows of the saints, God can hold them up, v. 28. Great as they may be, they are never equal to those of the Master; nor shall they be too long continued, nor shall they ever crush the humble soul. If they do but quicken us in our heavenly course, make the word of God to us increasingly precious, give us a distaste for the things that perish, and make us to grow in heavenly mindedness, we may justly welcome them as blessings.

9. It is impossible for us to be too much afraid of falsehood in morals, in doctrine, in worship, or in anything else, v. 29. We are easily deceived. There is a mystery in iniquity. There is a decevableness in unrighteousness. These will surely work our ruin unless we are mercifully preserved by divine grace.

10. If in his condescending mercy, God shall instruct us in his word, let us acknowledge the grace, v. 29. Without divine teaching we are undone. Such mercy is indeed wholly undeserved, but then it is the mercy of an infinite God. Henry: "We ought to reckon God's law a grant, a gift, an unspeakable gift, to value it, and pray for it, and to give thanks for it accordingly."

11. If we are ever saved, it must be by being made God's willing people, v. 30. Otherwise we will not choose the way of truth. Our hearts must be settled and fixed in that direction. Henry: "The choosing Christian is likely to be the steady Christian." If we cannot choose the good, and refuse the evil, we must perish. He, who willingly follows in the course of transgression, must lie down in sorrow.

12. We never truly set the Lord before us, until we honestly set his word before us, v. 30. And we never truly set his word before us, until we regard it as clothed with sovereign authority, binding the understanding to submission, the will to obedience, and the heart to holiness. We must renounce all laws, rules and influences that are counter thereto.

13. If we would avoid shame, we must cling to Scripture, v. 31. We must hold it fast at all cost and at all hazards. We must render ourselves the servants of righteousness unto holiness; we must delight in all the purity God's word requires; we must cleave to that which is good.

14. But we cannot do all this, indeed we cannot do anything pleasing to God without divine assistance, v. 32. If the believer is sensible of his shortcomings, and deplores his wanderings, let him still go to the Throne of grace. If we make any good speed, it is by receiving strength from above. But if the Lord appear and enlarge our hearts, we will have strength for every duty, and delight in every sacrifice. "Enlightened, evangelical, holy obedience can only spring from the operation of divine grace on the heart. We never begin to act for God, till he begins to 'work in us all his holy will, and the work of faith with power.' Fruitful only in sin, the tree of our corrupt hearts must be made good ere its fruit can be good."

PSALM CXIX.

HE.

33 Teach me, O LORD, the way of thy statutes; and I shall keep it unto the end.

34 Give me understanding, and I shall keep thy law; yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart.

- 35 Make me to go in the path of thy commandments ; for therein do I delight.
 36 Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not to covetousness.
 37 Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity ; and quicken thou me in thy way.
 38 Stablish thy word unto thy servant, who is devoted to thy fear.
 39 Turn away my reproach which I fear : for thy judgments are good.
 40 Behold, I have longed after thy precepts : quicken me in thy righteousness.

THOUGH all these verses begin with the fifth letter of the Hebrew Alphabet ; yet but two of them (vv. 37, 39) begin with the same word. On the terms way, statutes, law, commandments, testimonies, word, judgments and precepts, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 8, 4, 1, 5, 2, 7, 6, 3, respectively.

33. Teach me, O LORD, the way of thy statutes ; and I shall keep it unto the end. Teach, as in Ps. xxv. 8. It occurs in the preterite in v. 102. The clause is a prayer for divine guidance. Such instruction infallibly produces blessed results, even holiness. Keep, as in v. 2. Clarke : "To understand the spiritual reference of all the statutes under the law, required a teaching which could only come from God." The end, the reward, the recompense, the last.

34. Give me understanding, and I shall keep thy law. Give me understanding, as in v. 27, literally, cause me to consider, or discern. Keep, as in v. 33. After divine teaching and heavenly guidance, God's people are truly drawn to the whole law, and each one may add : Yea, I shall observe it with my whole heart. Clarke : "I will not trifle with my God,—I will not divide my affections with the world ; God shall have all." Whole heart, see on v. 2. Calvin : "Mention is made of the whole heart, to tell us how far they are from the righteousness of the law, who obey it only in the letter, doing nothing deserving of blame in the sight of men."

35. Make me to go in the path of thy commandments ; for therein do I delight. Make me to go, in Ps. xxv. 5, lead me ; in Ps. xxv. 9, in the future, will he guide. Path, well rendered, masculine, not before found in the Psalms ; in the feminine in v. 105. It is found in Jer. vi. 16 ; and several times in Isaiah. Delight, in the preterite, have delighted ; it expresses a high degree of habitual pleasure. See Ps. xviii. 19 ; cxii. 1.

36. Incline my heart unto thy testimonies, and not to covetousness. Divine grace and omnipotent power are necessary to bend the will, bow down the heart, and incline the affections to God. The reasons are, 1, the heart is naturally wrong ; 2, many things present themselves to allure us from God. One of these is covetousness, gain, lucre, or profit, as the word is elsewhere rendered, Judg. v. 19 ; 1 Sam. viii. 3 ; Ps. xxx. 9. In what part of the world is the heart of man not intent upon worldly gain ? Money is good, but the love of money is the root of all evil. Nor does the trouble end here, for covetousness is kin to all the vices.

37. Turn away mine eyes from beholding vanity. Vanity, as in Ps. xii. 2 ; xxiv. 4 ; sometimes rendered lying and lies, as in Isa. lix. 4 ; Jonah ii. 8. It includes every kind of deception and delusion. And quicken thou me in thy way. Quicken, as in v. 25, make me lively.

38. Stablish thy word unto thy servant, who is devoted to thy fear. Stablish, elsewhere, perform, or confirm, that is, make good. The same word in v. 28, is rendered strengthen. Instead of unto we may read for, or in behalf of. This verse does not necessarily refer to a promise made to the prophet personally. The rendering of the latter clause is supported by Calvin, Fry, and others. But the church of England reads : O stablish thy word in thy servant, that I may fear thee ; Edwards : Make thy word good unto thy servant ; which will cause thee to be feared ; Street : Establish thy word with thy servant, and I will walk in the fear of thee. The doubt arises from the pronoun which or who. It may refer to thy servant, and in that case our version and the Syriac give the sense; or to thy word, as the Chaldee makes it, and then the sense is that God's word promotes his fear. God's word has so powerful a tendency to promote piety, that it is sometimes called his fear, Ps. xix. 9.

39. Turn away my reproach which I fear. Turn away, literally cause to pass. Reproach, as in v. 22. The senses gathered from the clause are three: 1. Save me from the exposure of my secret sins, which I dread; 2. Save me hereafter from reproach, which has been the bane of my happiness; 3. Save me from the reproach which now rests upon me and deeply afflicts me. Either of the latter two is better than the first. For thy judgments are good. It is not necessary by judgments to understand providential dealings, though they are always coincident with the principles of the divine word, which is here spoken of.

40. Behold, I have longed after thy precepts. Longed, found also in v. 174, cognate to longing, in v. 20. Alexander: "To long for God's precepts is to long for the knowledge of them and for grace to obey them." Quicken me in thy righteousness. Quicken, as in vv. 25, 37. Righteousness, here probably used in the sense explained in the introduction to this Psalm No. 10—a name given to holy Scripture. The petition is for liveliness in the knowledge and practice of holiness, according to the tenor of God's word and by its operation on the heart. If any prefer by righteousness to understand the faithfulness or justice of God, whereby he has bound himself to give grace to those who trust in him, there is no objection to such an interpretation. It is in fact implied in the others. Green renders this last clause: Oh, let me live in thy righteousness.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Most of the verses of this part of the Psalm clearly show that salvation, except by divine grace, is impossible. Man must be taught; an understanding must be given him; God must cause him to go with delight in the right way. The will must be rightly inclined; the purposes must be strengthened, as well as the eyes opened. All this is the work of the Spirit, through Jesus Christ: "We know that the Son of God is come, and hath given us an understanding, that we may know him that is true," 1 John v. 20. The teaching and aid of divine grace are necessary not only at the beginning, but through the entire progress of the spiritual life.

2. Let us keep a strict guard not only upon our motives, but upon the ends we propose to ourselves in everything, and especially in prayer, v. 33. Clarke: "Here is a good thing asked from a good end. He wishes for heavenly teaching; not to make a parade of it, but to enable him to discern his duty, that he might act accordingly." Our prayers are wholly hindered when they are offered that we may gratify our lusts, James iv. 3.

3. The great end of our existence is to establish the best relations between us and Jehovah, v. 33. If he is our Guide, our Teacher, our Lawgiver, our Governor, and so our Saviour, all is well. Otherwise it had been good for us if we had not been born. Blessed is the man who humbly submits his whole will, understanding and life without reserve and without condition to divine guidance and control.

4. The spirit of true piety is one of steadfast obedience, and of perseverance in the ways of God, v. 33. True religion does not manifest itself in fits and starts. Paroxysms belong to superstition, fanaticism and hypocrisy. He that putteth his hands to the plough, and looketh back, is not fit for the kingdom of God.

5. There is no substitute for whole-heartedness in the service of God, v. 34. "That way which the whole heart goes, the whole man goes; and that should be the way of God's commandments, for the keeping of them is the whole of man." Unless God works in us to will, it is certain that we will never do. Unless piety flourish in the heart, the life will never be right. Even if it seemed lovely, it would be but the beauty of a corpse.

6. The tenor of the life determines the character. It is not an occasional crossing of the path of duty, or an occasional survey of it, but a walking in it, that evinces genuine piety, v. 35. Nothing short of this expresses the delight of a child of God in the service of his master. Without such real pleasure in God's ways, a religious profession is a sham. Bridges: "Delight is the marrow of religion."

7. There is in the human heart no greater enemy to God or true piety than covetousness, v. 36. Everywhere God's law flames out against it. The deceitfulness of riches, perhaps more than anything else, chokes the word and makes it unfruitful, Matt. xiii. 22. It was covetousness that made the Pharisees deride the Saviour, Luke xvi. 14. By loving money, myriads have pierced themselves through with the deepest sorrows, 1 Tim. vi. 10. It is especially incumbent on all, who hold office in church or state, to guard against this sin.

8. Let us carefully guard against all that class of temptations, called vanity, v. 37. It embraces whatever deludes us, whether in religious worship, in religious doctrine, in religious experience or in worldly affairs. There is not a faculty of mind or body that may not serve as a medium of temptation. But the eye and the tongue in a special manner are great occasions and instruments of sinning. The Psalmist here specially notices the eyes. Calvin: "Seeing, hearing, walking and feeling are God's precious gifts; our understandings and will with which we are furnished, are a still more valuable gift; and, after all, there is no look of the eye, no motion of the senses, no thought of the mind, unmingled with vice and depravity." Morison: "It is a most dangerous expedient for a child of God to place himself within the sphere of seductive temptations. Every feeling of duty, every recollection of his own weakness, every remembrance of the failure of others should induce him to hasten to the greatest possible distance from the scene of unnecessary conflict and danger." Clarke: "Let me remember Achan:—he saw,—he coveted,—he took,—he hid his theft, and was slain for his sin."

9. By giving us promises God intends to encourage us to plead with him for their fulfilment, v. 38. We are always safe when our prayers agree with the promises. Calvin: "The sole end and the legitimate use of prayer is, that we may reap the fruits of God's promises. Whence it comes to pass, that they commit sin who utter vague and incoherent desires. The prophet allows not himself to wish anything but what God hath condescended to promise."

10. In every sense of the term, reproach is a great foe to religion, v. 39. It makes cowards of many, and unstable souls of more. A just reproach on a servant of God brings dishonor on God himself. But if we know that we are in the path of duty, we need not be much moved by all that man can say or do.

11. In nothing are we more apt to come short in religion than in liveliness and thorough earnestness, vv. 37, 40. Let us plead for the fire of love.

12. Whoever can truly use the language of v. 40, is regenerate. Before renewing grace the law was a dead letter. It was more; it was a hated letter. The carnal mind is not subject to the law of God, neither indeed can be. It would rather serve the world, the flesh, or the devil. A sinner desires no restraint from the divine precepts. "But when," says Charnock, "the law is written within him, he is so pleased with the inscription, that he would not for all the world be without that law, and the love of it: whereas, what obedience he paid to it before was out of fear, now out of affection; not only because of the authority of the Lawgiver, but of the purity of the law itself. He would maintain it with all his might against the power of sin within, and the powers of darkness without him. He loves to view this law; regards every lineament of it, and dwells upon every feature with delightful ravishments."

PSALM CXIX.

VAU.

41 Let thy mercies come also unto me, O LORD, even thy salvation, according to thy word.
 42 So shall I have wherewith to answer him that reproacheth me: for I trust in thy word.
 43 And take not the word of truth utterly out of my mouth; for I have hoped in thy judgments.
 44 So shall I keep thy law continually for ever and ever.
 45 And I will walk at liberty: for I seek thy precepts.
 46 I will speak of thy testimonies also before kings, and will not be ashamed.
 47 And I will delight myself in thy commandments, which I have loved.
 48 My hands also will I lift up unto thy commandments, which I have loved; and I will meditate in thy statutes.

THERE are not twenty Hebrew words beginning with the sixth letter of the alphabet. But that letter is itself a conjunction, and in this sense is found at the beginning of each of these verses. Our translation thrice renders it also, twice so, thrice and. On the terms word, truth, judgments, law, precepts, testimonies, commandments and statutes, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 7, 9, 6, 1, 3, 2, 5, 4, respectively.

41. Let thy mercies come also unto me, O LORD, even thy salvation, according to thy word. Mercies and salvation, the usual terms for these things. To man the highest result of mercy is salvation. These are to be sought according to God's word. On this phrase see on v. 25. Compare vv. 58, 76, 116, 154, 170.

42. So shall I have wherewith to answer him that reproacheth me: for I trust in thy word. If we are able to give any proper answer to the reproaches of our enemies, it is entirely through divine mercy which has restrained us, reformed us, forgiven us, and taught us heavenly wisdom. Even if we cannot argue with cavillers, we may suffer for God's cause. The martyr slave said: "I cannot dispute for Christ, but I can burn for him." A holy life sustained by divine grace is a fair, logical answer to any cavil against religion. That life is always connected with trust in God's word.

43. And take not the word of truth utterly out of my mouth. These senses are gathered from this clause: Diodati: "Do not suffer me to want power, or courage to talk of thy holy promises, by finding myself fallen from those hopes which I had put in them;" Patrick: "Do not so far abandon me as to let me be disheartened in asserting the truth and faithfulness of thy word;" Hammond: "Let me never be forsaken by thee, in any such eminent degree that I may doubt of applying this promise to myself;" Alexander: "Deprive me not of this conclusive answer to my enemies, by withholding that providential vindication of my character and practical attestation of thy favor towards me, which I confidently look for." These views do not conflict, and are all admissible. Utterly, see on vv. 4, 8. For I have hoped in thy judgments. Hoped, also rendered, tarried, waited, trusted. It occurs again in vv. 49, 74, 81, 114, 147. In this Psalm it is uniformly rendered hoped. True hope produces patient waiting. There is no objection to supposing that by judgments we are to understand the decisions of God's word, borne out by the course of his providence. Calvin is confident that the promises are included.

44. So shall I keep thy law continually for ever and ever. Keep, as in v. 8. A true keeper of God's commandments marks them, waits upon them, observes them in their integrity. The result of divine grace in preserving the saints from wilful and habitual sin is entirely coincident with the purposes of a gracious soul. Could the renewed man have things according to his mind, he would be pure always. The true Christian not only draws the sword; he throws away the scabbard. The mariner who would make good the haven of eternal rest, must bid farewell to his native shores, and not attempt to do a coasting business in religion.

45. And I will walk at liberty: for I seek thy precepts. At liberty, see on Ps. ci. 5. In v. 96, the same word is rendered broad. The Hebrew adjective here is cognate to the verb enlarge in v. 32. See on Ps. cxviii. 5, where we have the cognate noun. Sin is slavery. Vice is bondage. Corruption loads us with fetters. Divine grace brings us out of prison, knocks off our chains, and sets us at large. The faculties of mind and heart and body never in so high a sense enjoy liberty as when renewed by God's Spirit. The very intensity of a pious search for truth and righteousness is healthful and conduces to human happiness. Seek, preterite have sought, as in v. 10. It occurs again in vv. 94, 155.

46. I will speak of thy testimonies also before kings, and will not be ashamed. Clarke inclines to refer this to Daniel and others like him, who were witnesses of the truth before Nebuchadnezzar, Belshazzar and Darius. No doubt those worthies deserve such a record. Nor can we with Delaney suppose that David here refers to his instructing Achish, king of Gath, in the true religion; for we have no account of his doing that thing, although we are informed of his general conduct when in the country of that prince, 1 Sam. xxix. 8, 9. Moreover, David in going into the presence of that king resorted to cowardly artifice to preserve his life, 1 Sam. xxi. 10-15. So that these words cannot refer to him on that occasion. It is better therefore to take the language as a general declaration that he would not be ashamed to plead God's cause before the whole world. Calvin: "He selects kings, who are generally more to be dreaded than other men, and haughtily shut the mouths of God's witnesses." Alexander thinks our Lord had this passage in mind when he uttered Matt. x. 18, and that "the words are really expressive only of a readiness to declare the divine testimony against sin, in any presence, even the most august, if it should be necessary." Ashamed, as in v. 6. It occurs also in vv. 78, 80. See on Ps. vi. 10.

47. And I will delight myself in thy commandments, which I have loved. Will delight myself, as in v. 16. In the preterite, it occurs again in v. 70. The verb rendered loved expresses sincere friendship. It is used repeatedly by the Psalmist to declare his attachment to the law of God. It occurs again in vv. 48, 97, 113, 119, 127, 140, 159, 163, and the corresponding participle in vv. 132, 165, and in the future form in v. 167. It cannot be better rendered than here. We have the highest authority for saying that "love is the fulfilling of the law," Rom. xiii. 10.

48. My hands also will I lift up unto thy commandments. Cresswell notices four senses of the phrase, lifting up the hands. 1. Swearing, Gen. xiv. 22; Deut. xxxii. 40; Ps. cvi. 26; Ezek. xxxvi. 7; Rev. x. 5. 2. Blessing, Lev. ix. 22; Ps. cxxxiv. 2. 3. Praying, Ps. xxviii. 2; cxli. 2; Lam. ii. 19; 1 Tim. ii. 8. 4. Setting about any undertaking, Gen. xli. 44; Ps. x. 12; Heb. xii. 12. Here lifting up the hands probably has another meaning, and is expressive of a cordial reception. So Abenezra explains it. Calvin: "It is a sure indication that we eagerly desire a thing when we stretch out the hands to grasp and enjoy it;" Merrick: "I will reach out my hands with eagerness in order to receive thy commandments;" Hengstenberg: "The lifting up of the hands symbolizes the lifting up of the heart." Clarke gives a different explanation: "I will present every victim and sacrifice which the law requires. I will make prayer and supplication before thee, lifting up holy hands without wrath and doubting." Which I have loved, as in v. 47. And I will meditate in thy statutes. Meditate, as in vv. 15, 23, 48, 78; in v. 27, rendered talk of.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The salvation of the righteous is of the Lord, v. 41. Every deliverance from peril, trial or affliction is to be sought from him alone.

2. We never plead amiss when begging for mercy and salvation in the highest sense of those terms, v. 41. We know that it is agreeable to the divine will that we earnestly cry for God's help against our sins and for release from his wrath, 1 Tim. ii. 4.

3. If enemies beset us and persecutions betide us, let them but drive us the more earnestly to the throne of the heavenly grace, vv. 41, 42.

4. We pray in vain for mercy and salvation if we ask for deliverance contrary to Scripture, v. 41. God will not depart from the principles of his word in order to save us from any calamity. Amesius: "The rule for hoping for a divine blessing is the will of God revealed in his word."

5. If we suffer reproach and persecution, nothing new has happened to us, v. 42. Saul hunted David like a partridge upon the mountains. Shimei cursed him as if he had been the vilest of malefactors. Christ's murderers reviled him, and when dying taunted him. Paul: "We both labor and suffer reproach, because we trust in the living God," 1 Tim. iv. 10.

6. We are never so safe as in humbly asking for mercy and salvation, obeying the law, leaving our defence in the hands of the Most High, and simply trusting God's word, vv. 41, 42. All defensive armor fails in the day of trial, until we get the divine panoply. If we cannot by well-doing put to silence the ignorance of foolish men, let them foam out their shame, and pour out their malice against us continually.

7. It is impossible to do well in the Christian life, or to maintain any successful war against sin, unless we have faith, v. 42. The word of God is powerless unless it is believed. Its vast treasures are unlocked by the hand of faith only. Without faith providence is absolutely crushing in many of its dispensations. Faith makes salvation ours. He that will not trust shall not conquer.

8. It is a great thing to be allowed to testify for God, and his truth, v. 43. We should embrace every fit opportunity to bear witness for him. But the Scripture is careful to warn us that it must be done with meekness and fear. Nor should we be discouraged if our witnessing seems to fail of its object, and men become obstinate in sin. It was so with all the prophets and the Master too.

9. Let us hope on and hope ever, v. 43. "Charity will persevere in the path of duty, till, arriving at the gate of heaven, and there taking leave of her companions, Faith and Hope, she shall enter those blissful regions, to perform to eternity that perfect will of God, which the infirmities of fallen nature prevented her from having so fully performed here below." Could our faith and hope be raised to assurance, our troubles would be wondrously diminished.

10. Steadfastness is the greatest commendation of obedience, v. 44.

11. It is lawful, useful and Scriptural to bind our souls by solemn engagements to the service of the Lord, vv. 44-48.

12. It is a great mercy to have the liberty of the sons of God, v. 45. Tried often and terribly they may be, but he who walks at large, the truth having made him free, is far from seeing none but dark days. The humblest saint is an object more worthy of the regard of angels and of God himself than the greatest of ungodly men.

13. It is a part of true piety to seek to know as well as to keep the divine precepts, v. 45. Henry: "All that love God, love his government, and therefore love all his commandments;" Bridges: "To have the whole stream of all our thoughts, actions, motives, desires, affections, carried in one undivided current towards God, is the complete and unrestrained influence of his love upon our hearts."

14. Let us be truly heroic, v. 46. "He who loves his Bible will be a religious man; and religion except in form has never been fashionable. The man who carries the spirit of the Bible about him must expect sneers and reproach." Calvin: "It is most unbecoming that God's glory should be obscured by the empty splendor of kings."

15. The wicked, who so delight in insulting the saints, and deriding the truth of God, ought to remember that the day is coming, when they themselves will be ashamed, v. 46. Of this they have a sure pledge in the fact that God's people are not ashamed even now.

16. The true people of God have more and more pleasure in all his word, vv. 47, 48. They have "a mighty affection to the law. What is in the word a law of precept, is in the heart a law of love: what is in the one a law of command, is in the other a law of liberty." "He who would preach boldly to others, must himself delight in the practice of what he preacheth." "To the unrenewed a single prohibition of the law makes their lusts flame out; but to a child of God no precept is grievous." "Love feels no loads."

17. Surely devout meditation must be a most important duty, essential not only to the well-being, but to the being of a child of God; else it would not so often be insisted upon, v. 48. We never enter God's service aright till the lowest depths of our souls are moved. When our hearts go out after God's word, then our feet run in the ways of his commandments, then our hands love to do what he requires, and the whole work of obedience is delightful.

PSALM CXIX.

ZAIN.

- 49 Remember the word unto thy servant, upon which thou hast caused me to hope.
- 50 This is my comfort in my affliction: for thy word hath quickened me.
- 51 The proud have had me greatly in derision: yet have I not declined from thy law.
- 52 I remembered thy judgments of old, O LORD; and have comforted myself.
- 53 Horror hath taken hold upon me because of the wicked that forsake thy law.
- 54 Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage.
- 55 I have remembered thy name, O LORD, in the night, and have kept thy law.
- 56 This I had, because I kept thy precepts.

ALL these verses begin with the seventh letter of the Hebrew Alphabet; verses 49, 52, 55, with the same verb; verses 50, 56, with the same pronoun; and verses 51, 53, 54, each with a different word. On the terms word, law, judgments, statutes and precepts, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 7, 1, 6, 4, 3, respectively.

49. Remember the word unto thy servant, upon which thou hast caused me to hope. Remember, so remember as to fulfil. Hengstenberg: It "is exactly the same as our phrase to keep one's word." The first clause does not necessarily assert that God had spoken the word unto his servant, but the prophet prays that God would remember to the benefit of his servant the word. Until of late there has been remarkable agreement in rendering the whole verse. The new objections are not sufficient to authorize a change. All agree that the prophet pleads for the fulfilment of God's word in which he had hoped, or because he had hoped in it by the divine command and by divine influence. God will never disappoint expectations authorized and encouraged by his own promises. By the word some understand the special promise to David of establishment and perpetuity in the throne. But it more probably includes the whole promissory engagements of God in his word. For caused me to hope, Street reads made me to depend. Hope, see on v. 43.

50. This is my comfort in my affliction: for thy word hath quickened me. Comfort, here only and in Job vi. 10; but the cognate verb occurs frequently, as in vv. 52, 76, 82, Ps. xxiii. 4. Affliction, found also in vv. 92, 153. The cognate verb is also found in vv. 67, 71, 75, 107. It is also rendered humbled, troubled, exercised. Quickened, the preterite of the verb quicken, in vv. 25, 37, 40. The word of God is quick and has a quickening power. It makes men both alive and lively in God's service.

51. The proud have had me greatly in derision. Calvin: The proud have greatly scorned me; church of England: The proud have had me exceedingly in derision; Edwards: The proud deride me exceedingly; Street: The proud have derided me exceedingly. Proud, see on v. 21. Greatly, in vv. 8, 43, utterly; in v. 4, diligently; in v. 167, exceedingly. The verb in this clause is that whose participle is in Ps. i. 1, rendered scornful. The test to which the prophet's principles were subjected was severe. Calvin: "Many who, in other respects, would be disposed to fear God, yield to this temptation. The earth has always been filled with the impious contemners of God, and at this day it is almost overrun with them. Therefore, if we do not disregard their revilings, there will be no stability in our faith." By divine grace we may rise even above this sore temptation. Yet have I not declined from thy law. Declined, found also in vv. 36, 112, 157. See on Ps. cii. 11. The meaning of the word here is turned aside or fallen away.

52. I remembered thy judgments of old, O LORD; and have comforted myself. God remembers his word to keep it. He remembers his promise to plead it, and rely upon it. Here and in v. 55, the verb is in the preterite. It is not necessary to vary the meaning of the word judgments. The principles of God's government have never varied; they have been of old, of the greatest antiquity. Comforted, the cognate of the noun rendered comfort in v. 50.

53. Horror hath taken hold upon me because of the wicked that forsake thy law. The emotion, which in English we call horror, is one of the strongest. It consists of terror mixed with detestation. The Hebrew is no less strong. It is found only here, in Ps. xi. 6, and in Lam. v. 10. See on Ps. xi. 6. Calvin renders it, Terror seized me; Edwards, Horror seizes me; Michaelis, A deadly east wind seizes me: Cocceius, Horror, as a tempest, has seized me. The fear and detestation which the prophet felt were not only on account of the doom of the ungodly, but chiefly for their wickedness, their forsaking the law of God.

54. Thy statutes have been my songs in the house of my pilgrimage. Songs, often rendered Psalms. See title of Ps. iii. God's people speak and even sing of the statutes of the Lord—his whole word—with joy. Pilgrimage, in the plural, sojournings. It is but a meager sense that some get from the passage, that the prophet refers to the ancient custom of versifying the laws, that the people might learn them by heart, and sing them. God's statutes are the songs of his people in a far higher sense.

55. I have remembered thy name, O LORD, in the night, and have kept thy law. Have remembered, preterite as in v. 52. To remember God's name is to remember him, or his word by which he makes himself known. In the night, when people commonly sleep and give their minds up to dreams, or if awake, to roving, vain thoughts. To the pious the night is a favorite time for meditation, Ps. xvi. 7; xlii. 8. Have kept, the same verb as in vv. 4, 8. Here it is in the future, and perhaps is better so rendered, thus making it the expression of a solemn, deliberate purpose to continue his obedience.

56. This I had, because I kept thy precepts, literally, This was to me. Calvin: This was done to me; Edwards: This is my comfort; Jebb: This was even so to me; Street: Thus it was with me. By this, Calvin understands all God's benefits; not that the prophet claimed to have merited the divine blessing, but that a gracious reward had been given him. The Scripture admits such a doctrine in many places, Deut. vi. 25; Ps. xli. 2; Isa. iii. 10. This is the common view. Nicolson somewhat varies the idea: "This I had; I had this spirit,—this power,—this comfort, because I kept thy precepts. While I suffered for God, I was enabled to rejoice in God. As I made him my portion, so he has been my praise." Diodati: "In my greatest afflictions I have received comfort from thee;" Patrick: "I ascribe this sweet composure of mind, and cheerfulness of spirit, under all my grievous afflictions to my strict observance of thy precepts." There is no better interpretation than that of Calvin, or that suggested by Edwards' translation, which agrees with the spirit of vv. 50, 52.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. True faith appropriates God's word, v. 49. It takes the general offer of the Gospel, and the promises made to all believers, and applies them to itself, and with the happiest effects. So God becomes our God, and the Lord Jesus our Saviour, and all Scripture our solace.

2. We cannot please God better than by pleading his promises, and all the teachings of his word, v. 49. Our very importunity, because it shows confidence in him, pleases him.

3. Hopes built on the stability of human institutions, or anything earthly, may fail and fill us with grief; but hopes built on God's word shall never disappoint us. He who gave the faithful word, who commanded us to believe, and by his grace enabled us to embrace the promises, will not be unto us as waters that fail, though he may for a while leave us to try us and to draw out our desires after him. The hopes of carnal men may puff up their fleshly minds, and prepare them for a sadder fall; but the hopes of the righteous both humble and strengthen them. Amesius: "In every strait the minds of the pious are sustained by a divine hope."

4. Take from the saints the support and comfort which they draw from Scripture, and what could they do? They would even perish in their affliction, v. 50. Compare v. 92. But with the word of God, they can defy all assaults. "The comfort it gives is divine, strong, and lasting." Morison: "How many drooping hearts which have refused to be comforted by mere human consolation, have found an all-sufficient solace in those views of the divine character and government which are furnished by the Spirit of God." Trials do in a remarkable manner sweeten promises. Many a verse has seemed like a dead letter, till by our afflictions we were brought to need its consolations. Then it was life and joy to us.

5. The effect of true piety is not to generate insensibility; but to make us lively and stirring in God's ways. It quickens us, v. 50. Henry: "It made me alive when I was dead in sin; it has many a time made me lively when I was dead in duty." There is no getting on without God's word.

6. If we see proud and presumptuous sinners strutting through the earth, and vamping away, we need not be surprised. There have long been such, v. 51.

7. Scorning is an old weapon, is full of power, and has been tried on the saints in every age, v. 51. Scott: "Infidels, Pharisees, covetous men, libertines, and all the sons of pride and rebellion, will deride as visionaries and enthusiasts, those who speak of communion with God, and joy in him." Trust in the word of God and a holy life are exceedingly provoking to the enemies of righteousness, and bring forth from their unhallowed lips the epithets, precisian, righteous overmuch, and the whole vocabulary of abuse. Compare John xv. 18; 1 John iii. 13. He who by faith rests upon

God's word will not decline from his law on account of the scoffs of silly men, however great their pomp and power. He sees their day is coming.

8. It is a great thing in a soldier to behave well under fire; but it is a greater thing for a soldier of the cross to be unflinching in the day of his trial, v. 51. It does not hurt the Christian pilgrim to have the dogs bark at him. Henry: "Those can bear but little for Christ that cannot bear a hard word for him."

9. The principles of God's government are unchanging and unchangeable. What he has said and done will not be reversed. He governs the world by the same judgments which he had from the beginning, v. 52. God is now as great an enemy of sin as he was when he drowned the old world, and destroyed the cities of the plain. God is now as true to his people, as when he saved Noah by the ark, and sent the angels to rescue Lot.

10. We cannot be too tenderly or deeply concerned for the case of the wicked, v. 53. It is frightful to contemplate. The dishonor they bring on God, the misery and scandal they bring on their fellow-men, the anguish and ruin they bring on themselves, are really more terrible than any has ever conceived them to be. We should deeply compassionate their sad condition. Instead of envying the most prosperous and favored of ungodly men, we may well weep over them, and shudder at their coming doom. In the eyes of every regenerate man iniquity is "a wonderful and a horrible thing." Jer. v. 30; xxiii. 14; Hos. vi. 10.

11. That which makes the case of the wicked the saddest of all is, their forsaking God's word, v. 53. It is the last hope of a lost world. No other law and no other gospel, no other rule of obedience, and no other mode of acceptance with God for sinners will ever be revealed.

12. There must be a strange consoling power in the truth of God to sustain the most solemn and afflicted people on earth, and to make them joyful and of a merry heart in the house of their pilgrimage, v. 54. The prophet was neither the first nor the last who sang songs in the days of his grief and anguish. God has received no nobler praises and benedictions than from many of his servants suffering banishment.

13. There is never a time in which it is not proper to turn to God and think on his name, v. 55. In the darkness of midnight, in the darkness of mental depression, in the darkness of outward providences, God is still a fitting theme. His name, his nature, his attributes, his word, his works, all that pertains to him are well suited for themes of joyous meditation to the devout. Amesius: "Solid, spiritual joy arises from a constant and effectual remembrance of the divine name." Blessed is he whose 'holy thoughts and affections rise on the wings of faith, and draw the soul into sweet and profitable fellowship with' him who made it and gave it a law.

14. It is not wrong for us modestly and humbly to mention our uprightness before God and of course to maintain it before man, v. 55.

15. However trying their circumstances, the saints shall sooner or later meet a full and blessed recompense, v. 56. Henry: "All that have made a business of religion will own that it has turned to a good account, and that they have been unspeakable gainers by it." Let us cling to the path of duty. Great peace have all they that love God's law.

PSALM CXIX.

CHETH.

57 Thou art my portion, O LORD: I have said that I would keep thy words.

58 I entreated thy favour with my whole heart: be merciful unto me according to thy word.

- 59 I thought on my ways, and turned my feet unto thy testimonies.
 60 I made haste, and delayed not to keep thy commandments.
 61 The bands of the wicked have robbed me: but I have not forgotten thy law.
 62 At midnight I will rise to give thanks unto thee because of thy righteous judgments.
 63 I am a companion of all them that fear thee, and of them that keep thy precepts.
 64 The earth, O LORD, is full of thy mercy: teach me thy statutes.

ALL these verses begin with the eighth letter of the Hebrew alphabet; though no two verses begin with the same word. On the terms rendered word or words, testimonies, commandments, law, judgments, precepts and statutes, see introduction to this Psalm; Nos. 7, 2, 5, 1, 6, 3, 4, respectively.

57. Thou art my portion, O LORD. Four times in the Psalms is Jehovah claimed as a portion, Ps. xvi. 5; lxxiii. 26; cxlii. 5. See on Ps. xvi. 5. It is only by a genuine appropriating faith that any poor worm of the dust can fitly use such language. I have said that I would keep thy words. I have said it, and I intend to stick to it. My mind is made up; my purpose fixed and published. Keep, as in vv. 4, 8. Such is the interpretation this verse has commonly received. It is clearly indicated by the rendering of all the ancient versions, except the Syriac, and by the great mass of modern translations. But some have indicated different views. Calvin gives four lections of the verse: 1. Jehovah is my portion, and therefore, I have resolved to observe thy law; 2. O Jehovah! who art my portion, I have resolved to observe thy law; 3. I have said, that Jehovah is my portion, in order to observe his law; 4. I have said, O Lord! that my portion is to observe thy law. He prefers the last. Fry: My portion, Jehovah, I said, is to keep thy ways. So Alexander: My portion, oh Jehovah, I have said (is) to keep thy words. The objections to this reading are not merely such as Hengstenberg states, drawn from the parallel places already cited and from the Hebrew accents, but most of all from the meager sense thus gathered. A life of holy obedience is a duty and has its pleasures, but it is not itself a portion. Virtue is not her own adequate reward. God himself is the portion of his people, the lot of their inheritance, their exceeding great reward. The second lection given by Calvin is better than either of the others, and is favored by Street; but none is so good as that of the authorized version.

58. I entreated thy favor with my whole heart. To entreat God's favor [Hebrew face] is to ask his blessing, especially reconciliation with him. We have in 1 Kings xiii. 6, the same words: Entreat now the face of the Lord. In Pr. xix. 6, we read, Many will entreat the favor of the prince. The italicized verb and noun are in each case the same as in our verse. He had sought God's favor very intensely, with a whole heart, vv. 2, 34. The sum of his earnest prayer was for rich and free grace: Be merciful unto me, as in v. 132; elsewhere, Shew favor, Be favorable, Be gracious. According to thy word; this shows the channel through which mercy flows, the temper in which it must be received, and the amazing riches of the grace, found in God. It is not fancy in the learned Dr. Clarke to suppose that we have here an account of "the progress of the work of grace on the human heart." In very few places is it more clearly delineated in so few words. Verse 57 tells of the present happy state and fixed purpose of God's servant. The remaining verses tell how he was brought to so blessed an experience, how he withstood temptation, how the life of God was maintained in his soul, how happy he was in his confidence in God, and how anxious he was to learn more perfectly the divine will. Having in v. 58, told of his wrestlings in prayer, and his earnest cries for mercy, he proceeds:

59. I thought on my ways. Chaldee: I have thought to make my ways good; clearly wrong. Amesius, Tremellius and Junius: I think and think again on my ways; Edwards: I reflect on my ways; Street: I think on my ways. But the Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Calvin, Piscator, Fabritius, church of England, Jebb, Fry and Alexander use the preterite, have considered, have pondered, have thought, or thought. Thought is very expressive. Pool's paraphrase is: "I seriously considered both my former counsels and courses, that I might be humbled for my past errors, and might now amend them, and my duty in all my future actions." Clarke's; "I deeply pondered them; I turned them upside down: I viewed my conduct on all sides." And turned my feet unto thy testimonies. This was what he had not done before. He had been a wanderer. His conversion followed clear, sober reflection. Nor was his turning from one sin to another, or to some human device, but it was to the word of God.

60. I made haste, and delayed not to keep thy commandments, parallel to Acts ix. 20; Gal. i. 16. Pool: "I presently resolved upon obedience, and immediately put it in execution." Clarke: "He did this with the utmost speed; and did not trifle with his convictions, nor seek to drown the voice of conscience." Hammond: "I immediately set out; I made not one minute's stay in so necessary a pursuit." Men cannot too soon quit wrong courses. The Bible never warns men against speedy or even sudden conversions. Henry: "To what purpose have we thought on our ways, if we do not turn our feet with all speed to God's testimonies?" But such a convert was never allowed to live long unmolested. Trials will come:

61. The bands of the wicked have robbed me. Two views have commonly been given of this clause. The first is that which is naturally gathered from the English version, viz.: that companies of wicked men assailed him, and robbed him and took his goods. In this sense the word rendered bands is taken in 1 Sam. x. 5, 10. The second takes the word bands in the sense of cords, as in Ps. cxl. 5, and instead of robbed reads caught, caught hold of, infolded. The cords of the ungodly have been thrown around me. This is better than the first. Another view is suggested. The verb rendered robbed very commonly means to testify or protest against. Perhaps that would give the best sense here, q. d. Companies of wicked men rose up and opposed me, protesting against my course, and even falsely testifying against me. Yet that did not change my conduct: But I have not forgotten thy law. Through the power of divine grace, the more a good man is opposed in that which is right, the firmer his purpose is. Those who interpret this Psalm of the church in Babylon of course retain the idea suggested by robbed or hunted, as Israel was then made a prey.

62. At midnight I will rise to give thanks unto thee because of thy righteous judgments. At midnight, literally at halves of the night; a time when men are commonly wrapped in slumber; q. d., In season and out of season. I will rise, not merely indulge in pious reflections on my bed, but formally give thanks. The mercies already received had much inclined him to grateful worship. But that which decided him in this course was, that he perceived the truth, righteousness and excellency of the decisions of God's word carried out in his providence.

63. I am a companion of all them that fear thee, and of them that keep thy precepts. It is not possible wholly to avoid civil intercourse with bad men, unless we go out of the world, 1 Cor. v. 9, 10. But civility is a different thing from voluntarily making them our companions, our fellows, as the word is rendered in Ps. xlv. 7. This verse, especially taken in connection with vv. 57-62, seems conclusive of the position that the poem does not relate to the Jewish nation, but to an individual servant of God. The two marks of piety noticed in this verse are holy reverence for God and a holy life.

64. The earth, O LORD, is full of thy mercy. When the heart is duly affected by saving grace, it seems as if all nature were, for good cause, praising the Most High. Proofs of his mercy appear on every hand. The stars sing his praises. The songsters of the forest carol their notes to the glory of their Creator. The finny tribes are resplendent with beauty, which can come from one hand only. Such views beget fervent longings for further knowledge of the same kind: Teach me thy statutes. See on v. 12.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. How blessed is the portion of the saints, v. 57. Jehovah himself with all the plenitude of his perfections is so theirs that each one may say, My Lord and my God. He who has this inheritance has no cause to envy the most prosperous or favored of the sons of earth.

2. Such cannot turn away from the holy commandment. They will keep God's word, v. 57. He, who knows most of God, will most desire to know more of him. He, who loves him most will be most sensible of the deficiencies of his love and most jealous over his own heart. Henry: "Those that take God for their Portion, must take him for their Prince."

3. It is a great thing to be truly in earnest in religion, and importunate in prayer, v. 58. The new creature is not lifeless and senseless, but cries mightily to God. Some deaf mutes have been God's dear children, but there never was a child of God that did not hear his voice and cry to him with the heart.

4. When we pray, let us never forget that we are sinners, and need grace and mercy, v. 58. God sends the full soul empty away, while he gives grace to the humble. Horne: "Mercy is the sole fountain of every good gift for which we ask, and God's promise the only ground upon which we ask it." Angels who never sinned may go to the throne of justice. Let sinners flee to the throne of grace.

5. What a reproach it is to mankind that it can be said of but one here and there, He is thoughtful on religious subjects, v. 59. We do nothing towards our salvation till we begin to think. Calvin: "The commencement of a godly life consists in men awaking from their lethargy, examining their ways, and, at last, wisely considering what it is to regulate their conduct properly." "Because the wicked man considereth and turneth away from all his transgressions that he hath committed, he shall surely live and not die," Ezek. xviii. 28. The prodigal did not come to his Father until he came to himself, Luke xv. 17. How foolish it is to spend much time in thoughts on the ways of others, when we are ready to perish through the error of our own ways.

6. The proper fruit of right thinking is thorough reformation and a holy life, v. 59.

7. It is of the nature of genuine obedience to be prompt, v. 60. To each one the Lord says as to Zaccheus, Make haste. When the Master found Matthew at the receipt of custom, and gave him a divine call, the publican did not invite him to call the next day. The Philippian jailer did not propose to wait till morning before he washed the stripes of Paul and Silas. The disciples generally followed Christ immediately, upon the first call. Calvin: "To make haste and not delay is to run quickly without doubt or tardiness." Why will men halt between two opinions, and stand 'hovering between heaven and hell'?

8. Opposition to vital godliness will never cease, as long as there are wicked men in the world, v. 61. It may assume the form of violence and robbery, or that of snares and seduction. If the former, let not the saints be much moved. We read of some who "took joyfully the spoiling of their goods, knowing that they had in heaven a better and an enduring substance," Heb. x. 34.

9. No perturbations, commotions or opposition can excuse, much less justify apostasy, or a forgetfulness of God, v. 61. Calvin: "To continue to love the law, and to practise righteousness, when we are exposed as a prey to the ungodly, and perceive no help from God, is an evidence of genuine piety." Henry: "We must never think the worse of the ways of God for any trouble we meet with in those ways, nor fear being losers by our religion at last, however we may be losers for it now." Bridges: "The Christian's darkest hour is ten thousand times brighter than the brightest day of the ungodly."

10. Let us accustom ourselves to count up our mercies, and make thankful mention of them at all times, v. 62. 'When a good husband of time cannot lie and sleep, he will rise and pray.'

11. Who are your friends, your associates, the congenial spirits with whom you love to mingle? This is not an idle inquiry, v. 63. If your sympathies are not with the people of God, rest assured that you are not one of them. Such is the power of companions that it has grown into a proverb: "He who walks with the lame will learn to limp." We must not even refuse to become the companions of those good men who are made a gazing stock both by reproaches and afflictions, Heb. x. 33. Compare Ps. xv. 4; James ii. 1. The communion of saints mightily assists communion with God.

12. If our piety does not lead us to fear God, and keep his commandments, we may know that our profession is vain, v. 63.

13. True piety loves to contemplate the riches of God's goodness and mercy in creation and providence, as well as the riches of his grace in redemption, v. 64.

14. Whoever has a zest for spiritual things, and gets a taste of them, will long to know more and more, and enjoy more and more of their fulness and excellence, v. 64. Calvin: "It is an evidence that we have given ourselves up to the most shameful sloth, when, contented with a superficial knowledge of divine truth, we are, in a great measure, indifferent about making further progress."

15. These eight verses clearly show that the experience of God's people is in all ages substantially the same. They all choose God for their portion, all love prayer, all seek for mercy, all think on their ways, all are in good earnest, all endure opposition, all love the excellent of the earth, all think much of the divine mercies, all lead holy lives, and all desire to learn more perfectly the will of God.

PSALM CXIX.

TETH.

65 Thou hast dealt well with thy servant, O LORD, according unto thy word.

66 Teach me good judgment and knowledge: for I have believed thy commandments.

67 Before I was afflicted I went astray: but now have I kept thy word.

68 Thou art good, and doest good: teach me thy statutes.

69 The proud have forged a lie against me: but I will keep thy precepts with my whole heart.

70 Their heart is as fat as grease: but I delight in thy law.

71 It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes.

72 The law of thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold and silver.

ALL these verses begin with the ninth Hebrew letter; verses 65, 66, 68, 71, 72, with the same word; verses 67, 69, 70, each with a different word. On the terms word, commandments, statutes, precepts, law, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 7, 5, 4, 3, 1, respectively.

65. Thou hast dealt well with thy servant, O LORD, according unto thy word. Dealt well, literally, done good; church of England and Edwards, dealt graciously. In all God had done, he had neither exceeded nor fallen short of the limits of his revealed will. All had been done according to his word; see vv. 25, 28, 41, 58.

66. Teach me good judgment and knowledge. Teach, as in v. 12. Knowledge, here only in this Psalm, but of frequent occurrence; in Num. xxiv. 16, "the knowledge of the Most High;" in Mal. ii. 7, "the priest's lips should keep knowledge;" in Ps. xix. 2, "night unto night sheweth knowledge." In English we get precisely the same idea whether we read good judgment or goodness of judgment. The latter is literal. For good judgment, some have good discretion; some, true understanding; some, excellency of reason; some, right judgment; some, goodness of taste; in Ex. xvi. 31; Num. xi. 8 and elsewhere, the noun is rendered taste. Good sense, or a good disposition probably gives the idea. In learning truth, all those moral qualities which go to make up docility are of prime importance. For I have believed thy commandments. He had heartily embraced the law; he did believe God's word to be true, important and necessary, and therefore he asks that he may understand it.

67. Before I was afflicted I went astray. Afflicted, sometimes, humbled; sometimes, troubled; in this Psalm invariably, afflicted; cognate to the noun rendered affliction in vv. 50, 92, 153. Went astray, erred, was ignorant, was deceived. The obstinate depravity of the human heart seems to be incurable, except in the school of sorrow. Often there are external causes of deep affliction; but even where there is worldly prosperity, the whole process of conviction for sin humbles and troubles the soul. The bitterest cry ever heard from the lips of mere men has been caused by a sense of sin, Rom. vii. 24. Calvin: "Experience demonstrates, that so long as God deals gently with us, we are always breaking forth into insolence." But now have I kept thy word. Have kept, as in vv. 4, 8. Alexander: "The salutary fruit of the affliction was already realized and still continued."

68. Thou art good, and doest good. Because God is unchangeably good, he is always doing good. His acts proceed from his nature. Teach me thy statutes, as in v. 12.

69. The proud have forged a lie against me. Proud, as in vv. 21, 51; in Ps. xix. 13, presumptuous. Have forged, in the preterite, in Job xiv. 17, the future is sewest up; in Job xiii. 4, the participle is, forgers of lies. The verb expresses the idea of complete fabrication, and that with ingenuity, as in curious weaving or sewing. Secker renders it, made up. The wickedness of others is no reason why we should depart from God. But I will keep thy precepts with my whole heart. Keep and whole heart, as in v. 2.

70. Their heart is as fat as grease. John Rogers' translation: Their herte is as fat as brawne. Fat, found here only. There seems to be nothing to authorize the rendering of some of the ancient versions, Their heart is curdled like milk. That of Street is better: Their heart is as gross as fat. Anderson: "The fat of the human body, as physiologists inform us, is absolutely insensible; the lean, membranous parts being those only which are sensitive. Accordingly, fatness of heart is used, with much propriety, to express the insensibility, stupidity, or sensuality of those feelings or affections, of which the heart is considered the seat." The language of the prophet may be borrowed from the known effects of obesity, dulness and stupidity. While the proud are thus glorying in their gross carnality, the prophet has a different mind. But I delight in thy law. Delight, the same verb as in vv. 16, 47. The cognate noun is found in vv. 24, 77, 92, 143, 174, and is in each case rendered delight, or in the plural delights.

71. It is good for me that I have been afflicted; that I might learn thy statutes. Afflicted, the same verb as in v. 67. The effect of trouble as there stated was obedience; as here stated, increased knowledge of God's will. If it is good for us to be afflicted, it is good in the Lord so to deal with us as to make us partakers of his holiness.

72. The law of thy mouth is better unto me than thousands of gold and silver. It does me more good. It guides me, it cheers me, it sustains me, it is with me in the most trying hour, and most stands me in stead when my necessities are the greatest, and my afflictions the deepest. When we remember that thousands was the largest word for number in common use among the Hebrews, the expression is as strong as it would be for one of us to say millions. There is force also in the omission of the noun, pieces, shekels, or talents. He means to say that he would not give God's word for all the wealth of the world.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Let us never forget that God is and claims to be the author of all good, v. 65.

2. If we would have the full benefit of God's goodness, we must receive it as his servants, v. 65.

3. Let us compare events with Scripture, and so learn rightly to interpret both the word and providence of God, v. 65. Henry: "God's favors look best when they are compared with the promise, and are seen flowing from that fountain."

4. We should be as ready to acknowledge mercies as to pray for them, v. 65. Were we more prompt and hearty in acknowledging the Lord's kindness, we should see more kindness to acknowledge.

5. Wisdom is justified of her children, and so is the God of wisdom justified of his people, v. 65. From the whole redeemed world comes up one harmonious testimony that God has done all things well.

6. The longing desire of the pious mind is for more sound, saving knowledge of God, vv. 66, 68. Ignorance is not sanctifying.

7. It is a great thing to have a clear mind, a sound judgment, a correct taste and full assurance of understanding, so that we may rightly believe all that God has spoken, and be in a right temper to receive it, v. 66. Henry: "Many have knowledge who have little judgment; they who have both, are well fortified against the snares of Satan, and well furnished for the service of God and their generation." Unless we have a relish for divine truth, learning will come to us very slowly; and unless we have a clear discrimination, we will confound things that are very unlike each other. Hardly anything impairs a good judgment more than a wrong conscience. A blind, ignorant conscience makes men think they are pleasing God, when they are offending him at every step. A scrupulous conscience is no less unsafe. It makes difficulties where God makes none. Taylor: "Scruple is a little stone in the foot. If you set it on the ground, it hurts you. If you hold it up, you cannot go forward. It is a trouble, when trouble is over; a doubt, when doubts are resolved; a little party behind the hedge, when the main army is broken and cleared."

8. Perhaps Christians evince high attainments as much by their conduct under afflictions, and their views of them, as in any other way, vv. 67, 71. There is a strange perversity in men concerning their trials in life, and nothing but grace can cure it. Blessed is he who when the affliction is over can clearly see and calmly say: It is good for me that I have been afflicted. Afflictions teach us lessons we never could otherwise learn, Jer. xxii. 21, 22. Luther: "I never knew the meaning of God's word until I came into affliction." Rivet: "I have learned more divinity in these ten days that thou art come to visit me than I did in fifty years before." Nor is this all. Through divine grace, affliction amends us. It strengthens us to keep God's statutes. If we can say no more, we can at least say, Thy will be done. "When afflictions fail to have due effect, the case is desperate. They are the last remedy which indulgent Providence uses."

9. Let us be willing and strong witnesses for God, testifying to his goodness, v. 68.

Is not the physician good, when he gives needful medicines, though they are distasteful? Is not the surgeon good, when he sets the broken limb and binds it up, although his manipulations give us great pain?

10. Be not surprised at lies respecting yourself and your friends, v. 69. If the truth in regard to your conduct does not answer the purpose of the adversary, look out for falsehood. Many slanders will be 'made out of whole cloth'—forged out and out.

11. But how shall we deal with calumnies? v. 69. Many good answers may be given. Here are some of them. 1. Live so as to prove them lies, v. 69. 2. Be not by them cast down or discouraged in the path of duty, but heroically address yourself to your duty. 3. Bear such trials patiently, and do not render lies for lies, slander for slander, or even reviling for slander. 4. Commit your case to him that judgeth righteously. 5. Be thankful if your enemies have not any further power against you. 6. Expect such things and be prepared for them. "If the Lord does us good, we must expect Satan to do us evil." 7. Honestly inquire whether you are suffering for Christ's sake and with Christ's temper, and are giving no occasion for such treatment. 8. If you have a good conscience, humbly and in the name of God defy the wicked to do their utmost.

12. Grossness and insensibility are as bad signs as can be found in any man, v. 70. The people of God may cheerfully forego all the pleasures of sin when they see their hardening effect upon the ungodly.

13. Very precious is God's word, vv. 71, 72. So the righteous universally judge. It is life from the dead to their souls. It reclaims them when wandering. They buy the truth, cost what it may. But they will not sell it at any price.

PSALM CXIX.

JOD.

73 Thy hands have made me and fashioned me: give me understanding, that I may learn thy commandments.

74 They that fear thee will be glad when they see me; because I have hoped in thy word.

75 I know, O LORD, that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me.

76 Let, I pray thee, thy merciful kindness be for my comfort, according to thy word unto thy servant.

77 Let thy tender mercies come unto me, that I may live: for thy law is my delight.

78 Let the proud be ashamed; for they dealt perversely with me without a cause: but I will meditate in thy precepts.

79 Let those that fear thee turn unto me, and those that have known thy testimonies.

80 Let my heart be sound in thy statutes; that I be not ashamed.

ALL the verses of this part begin with the tenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet; verses 76, 80, only beginning with the same word. On the terms commandments, word, judgments, law, precepts, testimonies and statutes, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 5, 7, 6, 1, 3, 2, 4.

73. Thy hands have made me and fashioned me. Perhaps this rendering conveys the true idea. The first verb is that rendered hast dealt in v. 65, deal in v. 124, and work in v. 126. The second is more frequently rendered established, prepared. See on Ps. li. 10, where the participle is rendered right. In v. 133, in the imperative the verb is rendered order. If the common version is correct, it is an acknowledgment that the prophet had his existence from God. If instead of fashioned we read estab- lished or settled, then the clause acknowledges that not only existence, but all the blessings he enjoyed were from God. See Deut. xxxii. 6. Give me understanding, that I may learn thy commandments; as in vv. 27, 34. See on v. 27. He prays for divine teaching.

74. They that fear thee will be glad when they see me; because I have hoped in thy word. The verbs of this verse are usually translated as here. The last is found in vv. 43, 49. The effect of the divine treatment of one pious man on his brethren is often noticed, Ps. v. 11; xxxiv. 2; xl. 3.

75. I know, O Lord, that thy judgments are right, and that thou in faithfulness hast afflicted me. It is not necessary to take judgments in this place in a sense different from that already explained. The word rendered right is a noun, justice, righteousness; in connection with judgments rendered righteous in v. 7. There is no wrong in them. They are righteousness itself. Faithfulness, the cognate of the word rendered Amen. It implies all truth and fidelity, particularly in covenant engagements. Afflicted, the word so rendered throughout the Psalm; see on v. 67. When a father disowns and banishes a child, he corrects him no more. So God may let one whom he intends to destroy go unchastised; but never one with whom he is in covenant.

76. Let, I pray thee, thy merciful kindness be for my comfort, according to thy word unto thy servant. I pray thee, an adverb, well rendered. Merciful kindness, elsewhere mercy, kindness, lovingkindness, see on Ps. li. 1. For my comfort, a verb in the infinitive, literally to comfort me. We have the corresponding noun in v. 50. There is nothing inconsistent in our acknowledging the righteousness of our sufferings, and at the same time pleading for mercy and comfort, provided we ask for things agreeable to God's word. The last phrase, word unto thy servant, seems to look to some particular promise made to David, and cannot be explained as in v. 38, unless we suppose him by faith to appropriate to himself the promise made to the church generally, and so to denominate it God's word to himself.

77. Let thy tender mercies come unto me, that I may live: for thy law is my delight. Tender mercies, as in Ps. xxv. 6. It occurs also in v. 156. It is also rendered mercies, bowels, compassions. Instead of let come, some render literally shall come. As death is spoken of as the sum of all evil, so is life as the sum of all good. When the prophet says, I shall live, he means to say that he shall so live as to defeat all the purposes of his enemies, and to honor the God of his salvation. He urges as a plea of fitness in his petition that he is no hypocrite, but has real and abundant pleasure in the word of God. Delight, in the plural, delights, corresponding to the verb delight in vv. 16, 47, 70.

78. Let the proud be ashamed. Proud or presumptuous, as in vv. 21, 51, 69. Ashamed, or confounded, the usual word in the future, shall be ashamed, as in vv. 6, 46. See Introduction, § 6. He knew that their defeat was coming because God is just: For they dealt perversely with me without a cause. Compare Ps. xviii. 25, 26. Without a cause, literally with falsehood. The opposition to him was wrongful, based in a lie and prosecuted with lying. He had a right to expect seasonable deliverance. In the meantime he will not waste his hours in railing at his enemies, or dwelling on his own misfortunes. O no! He had something far better to do: But I will meditate in thy precepts. Meditate, as in vv. 15, 23; in v. 27, talk of. Bishops' Bible: Let the proud be confounded, for they goe wickedly about to destroy me; but I will be occupied in thy commandments.

79. Let those that fear thee turn unto me, and those that have known thy testimonies. The pious in this verse are thus described: 1. They fear God. 2. They know his revealed will. The prophet asks that such may turn, or return unto him, i. e., that they may be his friends, his companions, his supporters, and that they may learn from his example to trust in God.

80. Let my heart be sound in thy statutes, that I be not ashamed. Sound, see on v. 1, where it is rendered undefiled, elsewhere sincere, upright, perfect. Ashamed, as in v. 78.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is well for us often to go back to first truths, such as that God is and that he is our Creator, v. 73. It is sad indeed when such truths fade from our minds. They are the foundation of all true religion. Their uses are innumerable.

2. We should often seek light and instruction from heaven, v. 73. In this matter we cannot be too earnest. Even if we are afflicted, our chief concern ought to be more perfectly to understand the divine will. None but God can teach us effectually. Cobbin: "He only who gave life to our bodies, can give light to our minds; and if our minds are enlightened by his Spirit, his word will teach us how to do his will." There is nothing that we need more than eye-salve, Rev. iii. 18. The most knowing among us know but little of the little that may be known of God and of heavenly things. A child of God might plead: "As thou hast raised me above the beasts that perish, in my form and mode of life, teach me, that I may live for a higher and nobler end, loving, serving, and enjoying thee forever! Show me that I was made for heaven, not for earth." If we can reason so powerfully from creation itself, who can justly estimate the force of the argument drawn from redemption? Rom. viii. 32. Such pleas rest upon the basis of that sound reasoning peculiar to the Scriptures, that we may urge one great gift of God as a ground for the bestowment of others.

3. It mightily encourages us to see God's goodness to his saints, v. 74. This is a reason why converts to Christ should go among their afflicted and dying brethren, should read the lives of martyrs and confessors, and if possible form the acquaintance of such as have suffered great losses and trials for Christ's sake. The apostles did not wish to afflict their brethren; yet they often reminded them of what they endured for Jesus' sake, 2 Cor. i. 4-11; vi. 8-12. A martyrdom is an awful sight, yet it has often vastly strengthened and cheered the feeble and the timid. Tillotson thought that catechizing and the Lives of the martyrs had been the two main stays of the Protestant cause.

4. Whatever betides us, let us stick to the promise, v. 74. The mother of Augustine but followed the footsteps of David when she said: "Lord, these promises were made to be made good to some, and why not to me? I hunger; I need; I thirst; I wait. Here is thy hand-writing in thy word; and in the last sacrament, I had thy seal affixed to it." So she pleaded, and prevailed.

5. It is a great thing to know that God's word has decided in all points righteously, v. 75. There is no iniquity in it. Let us hold this fast, however cross providences may run to our plans. A carnal man may sometimes see the justice of God and even admire it, as the Lord applies the judgments of his word to the cases of some of his cotemporaries; but as soon as God directs the course of events towards him, he is quite blind. Not so with the righteous. Under the sorest trials, Aaron held his peace; Eli said, It is the Lord; Job said, Blessed be the name of the Lord.

6. We ought to know and to proclaim the faithfulness of God in afflicting us, v. 75. It is not enough for us that we fly not in his face and charge him foolishly. O no! we must justify him; we must confess that our sins and wanderings called for his correction.

7. Though we may not rebel against God in our trials, yet we may pray for relief from them in his own time and way, and especially for support under them, and comfort in them, v. 76. True, there is nothing in us to merit esteem, but he has bidden us call upon him in the day of trouble.

8. God knows and we ought to know that we need great compassions, tender mercies to sustain us and keep us from failing utterly, v. 77. If God is our enemy, we be dead men. If we have not evidence of his covenant love, our graces must languish. If we have but little faith and little love, we shall be despondent. But 'those that delight in the law of God may depend upon his favor, for it shall certainly make them happy.'

9. But let us not forget that all hope of effectual assistance will fail us as long as we live in sin, and delight not in God's law, v. 77.

10. The humbling of the proud is as necessary to their salvation as to the complete triumph of the righteous, and therefore we may ask for it in the spirit of true benevolence, v. 78.

11. But if the wicked will not turn, their pride, and guile, and unbelief, and obstinacy, and cruelty, and violent dealings, and impenitence, and ungodliness will prove the tokens of dreadful wrath, and they shall be ashamed forever, v. 78.

12. Come what will, labor to keep your thoughts right, v. 78. Out of the heart are the issues of life. Persecution is itself converted into a blessing when by it we are led more intently to muse on God's word.

13. Ever cling to good men. If they err, pray for them. If they repent, forgive them, and turn to them, v. 79. Study their history. They are the excellent of the earth. Philip Henry's resolution was: "In those things in which all the people of God are agreed, I will spend my zeal; and as for other things about which they differ, I will walk according to the light God hath given me, and charitably believe that others do so too." Milner: "It will be one of the felicities of heaven that saints shall no longer misunderstand each other."

14. Let us fervently pray for sincerity in religion, for soundness of heart and of head, of creed and of practice, v. 80. Nicolson: "Though an orthodox creed do not constitute true religion, yet it is the basis of it, and it is a great blessing to have it."

15. If we fundamentally err in doctrine, or are not upright in heart, shame and confusion will certainly overtake us, v. 80. The delay of vengeance will but make it the more dreadful when it comes. Let us be in awful earnest about our salvation. Let us not forget that we have deceitful hearts, a deceitful world, and the father of all deceits against us, and be satisfied with nothing short of a soundness that will bear the examination of God.

PSALM CXIX.

CAPH.

81 My soul fainteth for thy salvation: but I hope in thy word.

82 Mine eyes fail for thy word, saying, When wilt thou comfort me?

83 For I am become like a bottle in the smoke; yet do I not forget thy statutes.

84 How many are the days of thy servant? when wilt thou execute judgment on them that persecute me?

85 The proud have digged pits for me, which are not after thy law.

86 All thy commandments are faithful: they persecute me wrongfully; help thou me.

87 They had almost consumed me upon earth; but I forsook not thy precepts.

88 Quicken me after thy lovingkindness; so shall I keep the testimony of thy mouth.

ALL these verses begin with the eleventh Hebrew letter; 81, 82, with the same verb; 84, 87, 88, with the same particle; 83, 85, 88, each with a different word. On the terms word, statutes, judgment, law, commandments, precepts and testimonies, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 7, 4, 6, 1, 5, 3, 2.

81. My soul fainteth for thy salvation: but I hope in thy word. Fainteth, so rendered here only; in vv. 82, 123 and often, fail; also is consumed, is wasted, is spent. Salvation, as in v. 41. It means help, safety, deliverance. None but God can give effectual relief. He only can give a check to our enemies. Without him man can work no deliverance. We must wait for God's salvation, Lam. iii. 26. So other Scriptures teach. So the verb hope teaches. See on vv. 43, 49, 74. In Job xxix. 21, 23; xxx. 26; Isa. xlii. 4; Mic. v. 7, and elsewhere it is wait or waited. Alexander: "Both verbs are in the preterite, implying that it is so and has been so." Calvin reads hath fainted; church of England, hath longed.

82. Mine eyes fail for thy word, saying, When wilt thou comfort me? Fail, in v. 81, fainteth. For fail Calvin reads have waxed dim; church of England, long sore; Edwards, are consuming; Street, are wasted; Hengstenberg, long. Comfort, the same verb as in v. 76. The whole verse discloses a state of long-continued and severe suffering and depression.

83. For I am become like a bottle in the smoke. Bottle, see on Ps. lvi. 8. Bottles were commonly made of the skins of animals. Long hung up, they became covered with dust and smoke, and were unsightly. This may be the sense here. Grief had worn upon the prophet, until he was haggard. When these bottles were empty they became very dry, and afforded neither refreshment to men, nor pleasure in beholding them. So grief mars the visage, and turns moisture into the drought of summer, Ps. xxxii. 4; Isa. lii. 14. Calvin: "In comparing himself to a bottle, he intimates that he was, as it were, parched by the continual heat of adversities. Whence we learn, that that sorrow must have been intense which reduced him to such a state of wretchedness and emaciation, that like a shrivelled bottle he was almost dried up." But his grief did not lead to apostasy. Yet do I not forget thy precepts, i. e., I both think of them and practise them. Forget, as in v. 16.

84. How many are the days of thy servant? When wilt thou execute judgment on them that persecute me? The usual interpretation of the first clause makes it parallel to those Scriptures which lament the brevity of human life, Ps. xxxix. 4; lxxxix. 47, 48. Some make it an inquiry into the length of his days, or a desire to know their number, as in Ps. xc. 12. But are not the two questions parallel to each other? and is not the prophet inquiring how many are to be the days of his sufferings? If so, we preserve the unity of the discourse. Calvin: "Lord, How long hast thou determined to abandon thy servant to the will of the ungodly? when wilt thou set thyself in opposition to their cruelty and outrage?" Diodati admits the same interpretation as probably correct. So also Hammond. The ground, on which Street changes the Hebrew text so as to render the first clause, Thy servant burneth with desire, O Jehovah, is insufficient. None of the ancient versions support his reading. If the word judgment in this verse is to be taken as in its plural form referring to Scripture, then it relates to some particular decision of God's word respecting persecutors. Otherwise, it refers to the simple administration of justice in the divine government towards the enemies of God's people, as in Ps. ix. 16. In either case the general sense is the same. With the latter clause compare Rev. vi. 9, 10. Calvin: "He only wishes in general to be delivered by the hand of God from the wrongs which were inflicted upon him, without adjudging to perdition his adversaries."

85. The proud have digged pits for me, which are not after thy law. Proud, or presumptuous, as in vv. 21, 51, 69, 78. Calvin: The proud have digged pits for me, which thing is not according to thy law. This is better than the rendering of Edwards: The proud dig pits for me, who act without any regard to thy law. How contrary it is to the law of God to dig pits, spread snares and set traps for the unwary and innocent is abundantly declared in many places. This might not be done literally, even for a harmless brute, Ex. xxi. 33, 34; much less for men, Ps. vii. 15; ix. 15; Prov. xxviii. 10; Eccles. x. 8; Jer. v. 26; xviii. 20, 22. One feature of a good man's character is that he is without guile, Ps. xxxii. 2. He may not practise deceit, even in order to accomplish a good end. What particular snares were laid for David in this case we know not; but the inventions of the wicked are endless.

86. All thy commandments are faithful, literally faithfulness, i. e., altogether faithful, the perfection of faithfulness. They give faithful warning. The blessings connected with obedience to them are faithfully bestowed. There is no deceit in any part of God's word. They persecute me wrongfully without a cause, falsely, see on v. 78. Persecute, the same verb is found in vv. 84, 150, 157, 161. It implies a malignant pursuit, as in Ps. vii. 5. Under such circumstances, what else can he do but betake himself to God? Help thou me.

87. They had almost consumed me upon earth. Consumed, the causative form of the verb rendered fainteth and fail, in vv. 81, 82. Almost, as in Ps. lxxiii. 2; xciv. 17. Yet he was not quite consumed. He did not quite faint; nor did his trials make him an apostate. But I forsook not thy precepts. He held fast the word of God through all his trials, loving it, seeking to know it and to do it, not turning away from the holy commandment. Forsook, the preterite of the verb in v. 8.

88. Quicken me after thy lovingkindness. Quicken, as in vv. 25, 37, 40. Lovingkindness, in v. 41, in the plural mercies; in v. 76, merciful kindness. All he sought, he asked through grace. Being thus sustained it would be easy for him to carry out his purposes of obedience. So shall I keep the testimony of thy mouth. Keep, as in vv. 4, 8. Calvin: "When the law is called the testimony of God's mouth, by this eulogium its authority is very plainly asserted."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is no new thing for a good man to be in great distress, vv. 81-83. Dickson: "It is not strange to see God breaking the heart of his own child with affliction, even when he is suffering persecution, so that his faith may be tried and trained to more strength."

2. It is a great blessing to be greatly afflicted, if the strokes are sent in covenant love, and if they lead us to seek promised help from God alone, v. 81. Cobbin: "We ought not to mistrust God's word, because the execution of his promises is delayed. If our eyes fail, our hearts should not faint; God's time is always the best. Our dangers may increase, but God's promises do not decrease."

3. It is a blessed thing when our trials cure our earnest love for things that perish, and whet our appetites for divine comforts, v. 82.

4. If we find ourselves despised, forsaken, rejected and thrown aside through our own infirmities of mind or body, through the slanders and persecutions of others, let us not forget that other good men also have been like bottles in the smoke, v. 83.

5. Oftentimes the long continuance of our trial is the bitterest ingredient in our cup, v. 84. When our grief threatens to be lifelong, then our vigor departs. But he who gives us grace to bear it one day can give us grace to bear it one lifetime.

6. Meantime let us hold fast God's word and never limit the Almighty, vv. 81, 83, 87. His blessings often receive their greatest excellence from being timely. His word cannot fail. Calvin: "It is a genuine evidence of true godliness, when although plunged into the deepest afflictions, we yet cease not to submit ourselves to God."

Henry: "Though we think the time long, ere the promised salvation and comfort come, yet we must still keep our eye upon it and resolve to take up with nothing short of it." We must also love the precepts of Scripture no less than its promises. The loss of all earthly things cannot excuse rebellion against God.

7. It is not sinful in us humbly to cry out, O Lord, how long shall my afflictions last? v. 84.

8. Nor is it sinful in us to ask God to interpose and judge between us and our tormentors, v. 84. If the righteous cannot do that, they must pine away. Persecutors have no pity. The very wrongs they have done are the causes of continued oppression. Help from them is not to be expected. Bridges: "To complain of God is dishonorable unbelief. To complain to God is the mark of his elect."

9. All God's people ought to look out for snares and pits and traps, v. 85. Satan would cease to be our adversary, and his allies would be powerless against us, if all artifice should cease.

10. Let men beware how they dig pits for others, v. 85. All God's word testifies against such wickedness. How many tests are invented, simply for the purpose of entangling men's consciences and furnishing ground for new persecution!

11. If faithlessness marks our generation, and the history of our race, let us comfort ourselves with this, that all God's word is faithfulness itself, v. 86. It is not only true and just, but most precious and wholly unfailing.

12. If we find ourselves wronged and lied against, we need not be surprised, v. 86. Better men have endured the same. The conduct of our maligners does thus indeed appear flagrantly unjust, and that may awaken our just indignation and detestation. Nor can we justify their wrong-doing. Yet let us guard against malice, even towards the vilest enemies.

13. The unspeakable comfort of committing their cause to God is always left to the saints, v. 86. Henry: "God help me is an excellent, comprehensive prayer; it is pity that it should ever be used lightly and as a by-word."

14. The lives of good men are full of narrow escapes, v. 87. The righteous are scarcely saved. Many a time their feet do almost slip. Yet he, who has redeemed them, will not let them so fall that they can rise no more. One of their greatest perils is, a temptation to use unlawful means for terminating their trials.

15. A very awful doom must await impenitent persecutors, vv. 84, 86. They are the bloodhounds of the bottomless pit, let loose on the church of God. Henry: "There is a day coming, and a great and terrible day it will be, when God will execute judgment on all the proud persecutors of his people; tribulation to them that troubled them." Those who find pleasure in maligning and torturing God's people may think it fine sport now, but they will not think so when they answer for the tears and blood which they have caused to be shed, for the sighs and groans which they have wrung from the anguished hearts of God's loving children.

16. After all, and in the midst of all the sufferings of God's people, their greatest desire is for more grace, the power of the quickening Spirit, v. 8. It is a good evidence of a saving change of heart when we desire more holiness, more liveliness in God's service. "The surest token of God's good will toward us is his good work in us."

PSALM CXIX.

LAMED.

- 89 For ever, O LORD, thy word is settled in heaven.
 90 Thy faithfulness is unto all generations: thou hast established the earth, and it abideth.
 91 They continue this day according to thine ordinances: for all are thy servants.
 92 Unless thy law had been my delights, I should then have perished in mine affliction.
 93 I will never forget thy precepts: for with them thou hast quickened me.
 94 I am thine, save me; for I have sought thy precepts.
 95 The wicked have waited for me to destroy me: but I will consider thy testimonies.
 96 I have seen an end of all perfection: but thy commandment is exceeding broad.

ALL these verses begin with the twelfth letter of the Hebrew alphabet; and all of them except v. 92, with that letter used as a preposition. On the terms word, faithfulness, law, precepts, testimonies and commandment, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 7, 9, 1, 3, 2, 5, respectively.

89. For ever, O LORD, thy word is settled in heaven. Other renderings leave the main idea as here. Syriac: Thou art for ever, O Lord, and thy word continues in heaven; Jebb: Forever, O Lord, is thy word: it endureth in heaven; Walford: O Jehovah! Forever is thy word established in the heavens; Street: Thy word is eternal, O Jehovah; it is more firmly fixed than the heavens; Alexander: To eternity, Jehovah, thy word is settled in heaven. Is settled, stands, stands still, is set, is established; there is no better word to express unchangeable fixedness. In heaven, where God himself is; where his throne is built upon his truth; whence all causes derive their efficiency; whence all his servants receive their commands; "beyond the reach of all disturbing causes." Mohammed claimed that he had been admitted into heaven, and permitted to copy some of the chapters of the Koran from the pillars of the throne of God. All holy Scripture is found in the foundation of God's throne.

90. Thy faithfulness is unto all generations. Faithfulness, fidelity to engagements, or a name for Scripture itself. Instead of is, we may supply endureth. God's truth is his word. It never fails. He has never changed a principle of his moral government. Thou hast established the earth, and it abideth. Established, in Ps. lvii. 7 and elsewhere, fixed. Although many things in earthly affairs are mutable, yet even in this world the thoughtful may discern tokens of stability in the divine arrangements. The revolutions of the earth and the motions of the heavenly bodies may be calculated.

91. They continue this day according to thine ordinances. Ordinances, everywhere else in this Psalm rendered judgments, i. e., settled decisions. Calvin: "In using the term judgments, he makes an allusion to the law, intimating, that the same regard to rectitude which is exhibited in the law is brightly displayed in every part of God's procedure." The best explanation of the pronoun they is that it stands for heaven and earth. There is good cause for the uniformity of nature. For all are thy servants. Heaven and earth with all their elements and motions obey God's will. Important as are the lessons taught by the works of nature, they fall short of meeting our wants, for

92. Unless thy law had been my delights, I should then have perished in mine affliction. Delights, as in vv. 24, 77, though there rendered in the singular. Perished, been lost, or been destroyed. Without the teaching of God's word, the prophet's affliction would have been not only mysterious but crushing. For then Calvin would read long ago; Edwards, long since. Affliction, as in v. 50.

93. I will never forget thy precepts: for with them thou hast quickened me. Forget, as in v. 16. Quickened, as in vv. 25, 37, 40, 50, 88, thou hast made me alive and lively.

94. I am thine, save me; for I have sought thy precepts. The argument in the first clause is drawn from the covenant relation. Inspired men love to resort to that method of reasoning. The proof that he is in covenant with God is found in the fact that he sought to know and to do the will of God. Sought, as in vv. 10, 45; in another form in v. 2, seek.

95. The wicked have waited for me to destroy me. Wicked, in Ps. i. ungodly; in this Psalm uniformly wicked. Waited, i. e., with expectation, looked for. To destroy, the causative form of the verb rendered have perished in v. 92; they have waited for me to cause me to perish. Though their devices are not stated, doubtless they were diabolical. But I will consider thy testimonies, so consider as to understand, as the word is fitly rendered in v. 100.

96. I have seen an end of all perfection. John Rogers' translation: I see that all thynges come to an ende; Street: To every study I see a limit; Clarke: "Of all consummations I have seen the end: as if one should say, everything of human origin has its bounds and limits, and ends, howsoever extensive, noble, and excellent. All arts, and sciences, languages, inventions, have their respective principles, have their limits and end. As they came from man and relate to man, they shall end with man." Perfection, found nowhere else. Henry: "Poor perfection which one sees an end of! Yet such are all those things in this world which pass for perfections. David, in his time, had seen Goliath, the strongest, overcome; Asahel, the swiftest, overtaken; Ahithophel, the wisest, befooled; Absalom, the fairest, deformed." Scott: "He had seen the vanity of all created good; the vexation of that estate which men account the summit of earthly bliss; the imperfection of the most accomplished human character; the wretched close of the most prosperous lives, and the miserable disappointment of those who trusted in men, or idolized earthly possessions or enjoyments." This interpretation agrees with the authorized version, which is supported by the Geneva, Doway, Calvin, Edwards, Jebb, Fry and Hengstenberg. But thy commandment is exceeding broad, i. e., wide, large, comprehensive, including actions, words, thoughts and emotions; the matter, manner and motive of all that man can do, or say, or think. Like the atmosphere which surrounds us, the law of God presses from all quarters. If we take commandment in the wide sense of all Scripture, then the meaning is that God's word covers all cases and meets all wants of the myriads who embrace it. The omission of but would make the connection between the clauses still more close.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. However fleeting, changeable and unsatisfactory are all things merely temporal; yet the word of God is stable, unchangeable and everlasting. It depends upon his truth and faithfulness, and these are so a part of his nature that if he were without them, he would cease to be God, vv. 89, 90, 91. The divine faithfulness has never failed.

2. Although it is comparatively easy to fall into error when reasoning from the analogy of nature; yet fair and sound arguments drawn from that quarter lie at the foundation of all natural theology, and so of all true religion, vv. 90, 91. Bridges: "The very fact of a creation in ruins—a world in rebellion against its Maker, failing of the grand end of existence, and yet still continued in existence—manifests his faithfulness unto all generations."

3. We need never fear any convulsions on earth, in the elements, or among the heavenly bodies; for Jehovah is Lord of all and all are his servants, v. 91. They must obey his will. His omnipotence enforces his behests.

4. The sons of mirth, giddiness and worldly pleasure may speak extravagantly of carnal delights, and put far away the day of affliction; but all God's people know that trials, ordered by the Lord, are often insupportable by mere human strength. As one expresses it, "I could not have outlived one stroke of thine afflicting hand." Nor can any mortal decide which is to be preferred, being kept from affliction, or being kept from perishing in affliction, v. 92.

5. Indeed such is the weight of many earthly sorrows that nothing but Scripture, received in faith and applied by the Holy Ghost, can sustain the sinking heart, v. 92. Clarke: "Had we not had the consolations of religion, we should long ago have died of a broken heart." Bridges: "Each promise is a staff—if we have but faith to lean upon it—able to bear our whole weight of sin, care and trial." Morison: "Such light and consolation are supplied in God's holy law, that no heart can be utterly broken upon whom the full weight of its encouragements is permitted to fall."

6. It is therefore not without cause that the pious love and remember God's word, v. 93. Henry: "The best evidence of our love to the word of God is, never to forget it." How can the renewed soul consent to cast off that word, which at conversion was life from the dead, the voice of the Redeemer summoning men from their spiritual graves, and which has cheered them in a thousand days of darkness?

7. It is sufficient proof that we are in covenant with God, when we seek to know and obey his whole will, v. 94. God will never cast away his jewels, but gather them into his cabinet of the spirits of just men made perfect.

8. The plots and plans of the wicked against the righteous are many, cunning and deadly, v. 95. There is an awful smell of blood about all forms of persecution. Horne: "Spiritual enemies are continually upon the watch to destroy us all."

9. If the Scripture is to do us effectual good, we must understand it, so as to apply it, v. 95. It is not superstitious but intelligent piety that God commands. Luther: "I have covenanted with my Lord, that he should not send me visions, or dreams, or even angels. I am content with this one gift of the Scriptures, which abundantly teaches and supplies all that is necessary both for this life and that which is to come."

10. All merely earthly things are by their very nature vain, unsatisfactory, and, through our depravity, delusory, v. 96. All human attainments are shallow, all human enjoyments transitory, all human virtue marred. Each one may say: "I have observed by experience that the greatest and most perfect accomplishments and enjoyments in this world, the greatest glory, and riches, and wisdom, and power, are too narrow and short-lived to make men happy."

11. "But where is the end or boundary of the word of God? Who can ascend to the height of its excellency? who can fathom the depth of its mysteries? who can find out the comprehension of its precepts or conceive the extent of its promises? who can take the dimensions of that love of God to man which it describeth, or that love of man to God which it teacheth?" Who knows the depth of the iniquity which it unfolds, or the preciousness of the blood which it holds forth for propitiation? It commands every duty to God, our neighbor or ourselves. It forbids all sin. It inculcates and enforces every principle of justice, and of charity. It at once humbles and gives courage, imparts tenderness of conscience and of heart, and also makes men lion-hearted. It abounds in all excellences.

PSALM CXIX.

MEM.

97 O how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day.

98 Thou through thy commandments hast made me wiser than mine enemies: for they are ever with me.

99 I have more understanding than all my teachers: for thy testimonies are my meditation.

100 I understand more than the ancients, because I keep thy precepts.

101 I have refrained my feet from every evil way, that I might keep thy word.

102 I have not departed from thy judgments: for thou hast taught me.

103 How sweet are thy words unto my taste! yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth.

104 Through thy precepts I get understanding: therefore I hate every false way.

ALL these verses begin with the thirteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet; 97, 103, with the same word; 98, 99, 100, 101, 102, 104, with the same word rendered more than, from or through. On the terms law, commandments, testimonies, precepts, word, judgments, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 1, 5, 2, 3, 7, 6.

97. O how love I thy law! it is my meditation all the day. Love, in the preterite. It denotes what has been and is still his habit of mind. We had it in vv. 47, 48. It occurs in the same form in vv. 113, 119, 127, 140, 159, 163; and in the future in v. 167. The participle is found in vv. 132, 165. It expresses sincere and undoubted friendship. Meditation, it has the same variety of signification as the cognate verb, prayer or speech. It occurs also in v. 99. In Job xv. 4, it is rendered prayer, in the margin, speech. Compare Ps. i. 2.

98. Thou through thy commandments hast made me wiser than my enemies: for they are ever with me. Hast made me wiser, a verb in the future. We have it in the same form, Ps. cv. 22. God has already taught and will continue to teach him wisdom above that attained by any of his wicked adversaries. God's word makes men wise, even unto salvation. It requires no labored processes of reasoning to understand its practical truths. For they are ever with me, some read forever they are to me, i. e., they are mine, my right, my portion. This conveys a good sense. But the former explanation has been commonly accepted. Diodati: "They are rooted in my heart, and are not as an outward law to me, to force my will by constraint, but by an internal conformity of all my inward senses and motions, Jer. xxxi. 33; Rom. vi. 17."

99. I have more understanding than all my teachers: for thy testimonies are my meditation. Have understanding, in the preterite, have had it and have it still. The verb is that from which Maschil is derived. The meaning is, I am better instructed and have more spiritual wisdom and heavenly prudence than all my teachers. Teachers, a participle of the verb often rendered teach in this Psalm, vv. 12, 26. Meditation, as in v. 97.

100. I understand more than the ancients, because I keep thy precepts. By the ancients we are not to understand persons who lived and died a long time ago, but persons still living, venerable for their age and opportunities of gaining wisdom; in Ps. cv. 22, it is rendered senators; in cvii. 32, elders; in Ps. cxlviii. 12, old men. The longer a man lives without instruction from God's word, the farther does he go astray. The Psalmist is publishing in proper terms that wisdom consists in keeping the precepts and doing the will of God. Understand, usually so rendered in this Psalm; implying careful consideration. Keep; as in v. 2, implying vigilant attention to duty.

101. I have refrained my feet from every evil way, that I might keep thy word. Refrained, forbid, withheld, restrained, kept back. Evil way, literally path of evil. Keep, as in vv. 4, 8. The verse teaches that we cannot willingly live in sin, when we have a sincere desire to keep the law. We cannot at the same time walk both in crooked and straight paths. Care and circumspection enter into the very nature of true obedience.

102. I have not departed from thy judgments: for thou hast taught me. He who in anything regards his own decisions as comparable to the judgments of God is already a fool. Every departure from God's word is an error, which without the interposition of divine grace will be fatal. But we will be sure to turn aside unless in his mercy God shall teach us.

103. How sweet are thy words unto my taste, yea, sweeter than honey to my mouth. See on Ps. xix. 10. For taste, Calvin, Edwards and others read palate; church of England, throat; often elsewhere mouth. Our version gives the sense. Sweet, here only. The primary idea is that of smoothness, then of pleasantness, and in things tasted sweetness. Calvin: "The prophet does not speak of the dead letter which kills those who read it, but he comprehends the whole doctrine of the law, the chief part of which is the free covenant of salvation." Words or sayings, to be taken in the largest sense.

104. Through thy precepts I get understanding; literally, I shall get understanding as long as I love, study and obey thy word, even as I have already. True wisdom comes from above through God's word. The best proof of wisdom is found in avoiding all sin, delusion, error, vanity and falsehood. Therefore I hate every false way, literally, I have hated every path of falsehood. False, see on v. 29. The clause expresses the habit of his life. This verse in connection with v. 101, shows the reciprocal action of Scripture and of a holy life. God teaches us, and we obey. We obey, and he teaches us more. We learn a little and practise that; thus we are prepared to learn and practise more.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The difference between a saint and a sinner, a false professor and a true child of God, is even greater in fact than in appearance. The former loves the law of God, v. 97; the latter rebels against its requirements. Amesius: "Those who have tasted how good the word of God is adhere to it with incomparable and incredible ardor of affection;" Horne: "Words cannot express the love which a pious mind entertaineth for the Scriptures." It is a grand support in the day of calumny and persecution. How else can we resist the world, the flesh and the devil, but with this sword of the Spirit? God's word interprets nature, providence and grace. It is the best guide to devotion. Its author is divine. Its matter is divine. Its use is to make us partakers of the divine nature.

2. If devout meditation on the word of God is an essential part of true religion, the fashionable piety of modern times falls quite below the Scripture standard, vv. 97, 99. Calvin: "If any person boast that he loves the divine law, and yet neglects the study of it, and applies his mind to other things, he betrays the grossest hypocrisy." "A good man wherever he goes carries his Bible along with him, and if not in his hand, yet in his head and in his heart." Luther: "Pause at every verse of Scripture, and shake, as it were, every bough of it; that, if possible, some fruit at least may drop down."

3. Heavenly wisdom is as much better than worldly wisdom as heaven is better than earth, vv. 98, 99, 100. The greatest wisdom on this earth is holiness. The wisdom taught by Scripture is far reaching and is capable of application to every diversity of case.

4. By law David was required to make a copy of the Scriptures for his own use, Deut. xvii. 18. Some conjecture that beside this he carried with him notes and memoranda of divine things as they occurred to him. But it seems impossible to avoid the conclusion that he committed to memory considerable portions of Scripture, vv. 98, 99. How can the word of God properly exercise our judgment and affections and give us heavenly wisdom, unless it dwell in us richly, and fill our memory, and so be ever with us, and form the theme of our meditations?

5. The reasons of the excellence of Scripture in imparting wisdom are many, vv. 99–102. 1. He who made the soul gave the law, adapting the one to the other. 2. God's word contains the true system of thinking, feeling and acting in all matters of which it treats. 3. The Scripture comes with authority. The human conscience feels that it is God who is speaking. 4. The most important matters are made very plain. Under such teaching it is not wonderful that 'the simplest Christian, who by faith and prayer appropriates the information conveyed to him in the Scriptures of truth, will soon surpass in useful knowledge and practical wisdom the most learned teachers, the most renowned fathers, and the most aged and experienced persons, who, leaning to their own understandings, reject the oracles of God, or are but superficially acquainted with them.' Antiquity is no such guide as are the lively oracles.

6. Practice is the very life of piety, vv. 100, 101: The keeping of the commandments is essential not only to the honor of religion, but to the understanding of the very nature of divine things. Clarke: "Spiritual knowledge increases while we tread in the path of obedience. Obedience is the grand means of growth and instruction. Obedience trades with the talent of grace, and thus grace becomes multiplied."

7. If we would become truly wise, we must quit all sin, turning away from it with abhorrence, v. 101. Horne: "The foundation of all religion must be laid in mortification and self-denial." The reason is that the heart of man is strongly and strangely averse to the will of God.

8. Divine teaching, and that alone, secures holiness and perseverance in the ways of God, v. 102. God only can lift the veil off the heart so as to let us see divine things in their beauty. Blessed is the promise made through the evangelical prophet: "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord, and great shall be the peace of thy children," Isa. liv. 13.

9. There is no substitute for a lively relish of divine things, v. 103. Calvin: "It is possible that a man may be affected with reverence towards the law of God; but no one will cheerfully follow it, save he who has tasted its sweetness." Otherwise the whole service of God will be a drudgery. Bridges: "Warm affections are far more influential than talents, or mere external knowledge."

10. Through divine grace God's people may have a heaven upon earth, v. 103. They have tasted and so know the preciousness of Scripture. Communion with God in his word and ordinances is not equal to communion with God in heaven; but it is like it. Heavenly mindedness is heaven anticipated.

11. Let each one diligently study God's word. It gives a knowledge true and influential. What dying saint ever deplored that he had too assiduously studied it? Hervey: "Were I to renew my studies, I would take my leave of those accomplished triflers—the historians, the orators, the poets of antiquity—and devote my attention to the Scriptures of truth. I would sit with much greater assiduity at my divine Master's feet, and desire to know nothing but Jesus Christ and him crucified." That is speaking like a wise man.

12. Let us never hug delusions, but hate error and sin in every shape, v. 104. Let us assiduously abhor even darling sins. All sin is a lie. By it we attempt to cheat

God. By it we actually cheat our souls, Pr. xiv. 12. There is no delusion like the folly of believing that a course of sin will conduce to our happiness.

13. What an aid to self-examination we have in this part of the Psalm. Do we love God's law? Do we meditate on it? Do we study it? Are we the wiser for it? Are we warned by it? Have we submitted to divine teaching? Do we read with more interest the news of the day, or the letters of a friend, than we feel when perusing the sacred volume? Is our love of holiness increasing? Do we find Christ in all the Scriptures? Is he our life? If we are to lead new lives, it must be by the faith of the Son of God.

PSALM CXIX.

NUN.

105 Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path.

106 I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments.

107 I am afflicted very much: quicken me, O LORD, according unto thy word.

108 Accept, I beseech thee, the freewill offerings of my mouth, O LORD, and teach me thy judgments.

109 My soul is continually in my hand: yet do I not forget thy law.

110 The wicked have laid a snare for me: yet I erred not from thy precepts.

111 Thy testimonies have I taken as a heritage for ever: for they are the rejoicing of my heart.

112 I have inclined mine heart to perform thy statutes always, even unto the end.

ALL these verses begin with the fourteenth letter of the Hebrew Alphabet; but each verse with a different word. On the terms word, judgments, law, precepts, testimonies and statutes, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 7, 6, 1, 3, 2, 4.

105. Thy word is a lamp unto my feet, and a light unto my path. Lamp, often so rendered, also candle, Ps. xviii. 28; cxxxii. 17. Some propose to read lantern, and some torch or flambeau. Either word gives the idea. Lamp or lantern is best. The general sense is clear, as in the second clause of the verse we have the parallel light. The imagery is just and easily understood. A man is benighted. He knows not the way. A light is brought. It shows him the path, where to place his feet. Compare 2 Pet. i. 19. Calvin: "Were there such obscurity in God's word, as the Papists foolishly talk about, the commendation with which the prophet here honors the law would be altogether undeserved."

106. I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgments. A just estimate of a profession of religion, or of even a secret engagement to be the Lord's, will fitly invest it with a solemnity not less than that by which a man binds his soul in an oath. Calvin: "By the word swear, he intimates that he had solemnly pledged himself to God not to alter his determination." Such language is by no means confined to this one case, 2 Chron. xv. 15; Neh. x. 29. Will perform; church of England and Jebb, am steadfastly purposed; Edwards, will not depart from it; Fry and Alexander, confirm it; Street, will continue. Patrick's paraphrase is, "I have solemnly resolved and bound myself by the most sacred ties, which I will never break, but do now confirm." Pool's, "I do not repent of it and by God's grace I will fulfil it." Keep, as in vv. 4, 8. His purpose was settled. His heart was fixed. Thy righteous judgments, see on v. 7.

107. I am afflicted very much: quicken me, O LORD, according unto thy word. Afflicted, humbled, in the preterite. Very much; Calvin, greatly; church of England, above measure; Jebb, exceedingly; Hengstenberg, severely; Alexander, to extremity; in v. 8, utterly. What the particular affliction was, is not stated. Quicken me according unto thy word, see on v. 25.

108. Accept, I beseech thee, the freewill offerings of my mouth, O LORD, and teach me thy judgments. Accept, i. e., graciously accept; Calvin: favor of mere good will. On the noun rendered freewill offerings, see on Ps. cx. 3, where it is rendered willing; often in the law, and elsewhere rendered as here; in Amos iv. 5, free offerings. Here evidently it refers to spiritual sacrifices of vows, prayer and praise, whether offered in solitude or in the midst of the great assembly.

109. My soul is continually in my hand. Hammond: "The meaning of this phrase is obvious, I am in danger of my life." Compare Judges xii. 3; 1 Sam. xix. 5; xxviii. 21; Job xiii. 14. The Chaldee: My soul is in danger. The Hebrew will not allow us to read, My soul is in thy hands. Soul here probably means life. The prophet asserts that he was all the time in peril of death, but that did not change his purpose of obedience. Yet do I not forget thy law, i. e., he cherished the love and memory and practice of it. See on v. 16. Compare vv. 61, 83. Death could not separate him from the love of God. The kind of peril to which he was exposed is perhaps explained in the next clause:

110. The wicked have laid a snare for me. Wicked, in Ps. i. ungodly. Snare, often so rendered, also gin. See on Ps. xi. 6. What the snare was we are not informed. It may have been for his life, or for his reputation, or for his virtue. If the sense of this verse is to be controlled by that next preceding, it was his life they were seeking. At such times the temptation is strong to resort to like stratagems and for like purposes. But that is never wise and always wicked. The only safe course is that of the Psalmist: Yet I erred not from thy precepts. Erred, in v. 176, have gone astray; in Ps. cvii. 4, wandered. How different were the emotions and prospects of David in viewing the end of Saul from what they would have been, if he had devised or compassed the death of that guilty ruler.

111. Thy testimonies have I taken as a heritage for ever: for they are the rejoicing of my heart. Have taken as a heritage, one verb in the preterite; in Prov. xiv. 18, inherit; in Jer. xvi. 19, have inherited. The common version gives the sense. The greatest possession which the prophet had was God's word. He took it in preference to all else. Rejoicing, i. e., matter of rejoicing; in Ps. li. 8, joy; in Jer. xxv. 10, mirth; in Ps. xlv. 7, gladness. The interest of a regenerate man in God's word is lively, stirring, and joyous.

112. I have inclined mine heart to perform thy statutes always, even unto the end. Inclined, as in v. 36. Always qualifies perform. End, as in v. 33, elsewhere reward, Ps. xix. 11; xl. 15; lxx. 3. The meaning is that he would serve God not merely for a reward, but to the time of the reward, the end.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. How sad is the state and how guilty the conduct of those, who reject the light of God's word, v. 105. It alone can solve a thousand doubts. It alone gives effectual comfort in the day of distress. It alone preserves our feet from forbidden paths. Whoever has it has a great advantage, Rom. iii. 2. But let us beware of holding the truth in unrighteousness, Rom. i. 18.

2. To God's service we are bound by his sovereign authority and by his clear and oft-repeated command; but it is right that to these we should add the obligation of solemn and voluntary engagements, v. 106. Henry: "It is good for us to bind ourselves with a solemn oath to be religious. We must swear to the Lord as subjects swear allegiance to their sovereign, promising fealty, appealing to God concerning our sincerity in this promise; and owning ourselves liable to the curse, if we do not perform it."

3. If we are greatly afflicted, let us not forget that this is the way the fathers trod, v. 107. God carried them through; if we trust him he will carry us through. He has given us more light than he gave to them on such dark events. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth, and scourgeth every son whom he receiveth," Heb. xii. 1-11. "There is a need be for the afflictions of the Lord's people. The stones of the spiritual temple cannot be polished or fitted to their place without the strokes of the hammer. The gold cannot be purified without the furnace. The vine must be pruned for greater fruitfulness."

4. In deep affliction, the greatest want is the want of more spirituality—more liveliness in the cause of God, v. 107. Blessed is he who so interprets Providence as thereby to be led to a closer walk with God.

5. The service God demands must not be reluctant, but willing, v. 108. A defect here is fatal to any act of devotion. The offerings in heaven itself are pre-eminently free. God has not given to us reluctantly or sparingly. Let us give him all, the heart, the soul, the mind, the strength and life itself.

6. If we are certain that we have the spirit of true devotion, we may humbly and modestly mention it as a plea for heavenly instruction, v. 108.

7. To all men life is uncertain, and no man knows that there is more than a step betwixt him and death, v. 109. Thousands of plots are framed against our lives, which God does not permit to be executed. None but the Almighty can protect us from snares fatal to life, liberty and honor. Persecution may arise in any age or country. Christianity has never been embraced, except at the risk of deadly persecution.

8. The greater the peril, the more careful ought we to be to keep a conscience void of offence and do our duty at all hazards, v. 109. Cobbin: "The way of duty affords the best ground for our confidence. To rest on other ground is presumption. We must keep God's commandments; we must look to him to hold us up; we must continually respect the statutes of God." The sorer the persecution, the more steadfast should be our perseverance. Compare Acts xx. 23.

9. Let us not fight our enemies with their own weapons. Let not the sheep learn to bark like the wolves. If others dig pits and spread snares for us, let us carry our case to God, and do our duty, and never resort to doubtful expedients. The rack, the fire, the den of lions, the dungeon, chains and the gibbet ought to have in them no such element of dread as even one sin. It is not wicked to suffer. It is not wicked to die. It is wicked to sin.

10. If we find snares spread for us, let us not be surprised. It was so of old, v. 110. If the wicked cannot ensnare us in one way, they will surely try another. Dickson: "It is usual with persecutors to make acts and statutes, or to broach some danger, one or other, which shall either force the godly to go off the right way of obedience to God's word, or to fall into a snare." At such times all we can do is to stand in our lot, be steadfast with God, and commit our case to him that judgeth righteously.

11. The great error of most who profess the true religion is that they do not make enough of it, v. 111. They do not habitually feel that God's favor is enough to compensate for all losses; that his word is a heritage sufficient to all the ends of a happy existence, even if we have nothing else, and that we may be glad in the promises even if providences seem to be against us.

12. Two things characterize genuine piety. 1. It is heartly. It may exhibit itself through the usual forms, but yet it is not formal. 2. It perseveres. It holds on its way. It more and more summons the soul to right endeavors after new obedience.

Horne: "We are not to judge of ourselves by what we sometimes say and do, but by the general disposition and tendency of the heart and its affections," v. 112.

13. At the end there shall be a reward, not the less rich, because it is wholly of grace and not of debt, v. 112. 'The end of life will be the beginning of glory' to all such as truly love and habitually practise God's word.

PSALM CXIX.

SAMECH.

113 I hate vain thoughts: but thy law do I love.

114 Thou art my hiding place and my shield: I hope in thy word.

115 Depart from me, ye evil doers: for I will keep the commandments of my God.

116 Uphold me according unto thy word, that I may live: and let me not be ashamed of my hope.

117 Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe: and I will have respect unto thy statutes continually.

118 Thou hast trodden down all them that err from thy statutes: for their deceit is falsehood.

119 Thou puttest away all the wicked of the earth like dross: therefore I love thy testimonies.

120 My flesh trembleth for fear of thee; and I am afraid of thy judgments.

ALL the verses of this part begin with the fifteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet; but each verse begins with a different word. On the terms law, word, commandments, statutes, testimonies and judgments, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 1, 7, 5, 4, 2, 6, respectively.

113. I hate vain thoughts: but thy law do I love. Hate, in the preterite have hated and hate still. We may interpret the first noun of thoughts. Calvin and Piscator have crooked thoughts; Tremellius and Junius, other thoughts; Edwards, wild imaginations; Jebb, evil imaginations; Street, vain opinions. Or we may understand it of persons. The Chaldee has those that think vain thoughts; Arabic, the breakers of the law; Septuagint, Syriac, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway, the unjust; Luther, the light-minded; Hengstenberg, doubtful men; Hammond, wicked men: Alexander, waverers; Horsley and Clarke, violent, tumultuous men. The word occurs nowhere else in the Scriptures. The sense gathered from either version is true. Both wicked men and wicked thoughts of every grade are odious to the pious. But they have a very different affection for the law. They love it. Love, as in vv. 47, 48, 97.

114. Thou art my hiding place and my shield. Hiding place, in Ps. xviii. 11, secret place; in Ps. xxvii. 5, secret; in Ps. xxxii. 7, as here. Shield, defence, or buckler, see on Ps. iii. 3; vii. 10. The world never understands the secret of the preservation of God's people. The hand that holds them cannot be perceived by our senses, yet is omnipotent. The manner of making God our defence is simple and uniform: I hope in thy word. Hope, as in vv. 43, 49, 74, 81; often rendered wait, implying trustful expectation.

115. Depart from me, ye evil doers. We may not wholly separate ourselves from men who sometimes greatly err, yet habitually do right; nor from men who, if they sin, repent; but these are not evil doers or workers of wickedness in the Bible sense of those terms. A reason for separating from the wicked is the corrupting influence of their companionship. Especially is it a hindrance to holiness. For I will keep the commandments of my God. Keep, as in v. 2. We must either break with the wicked, or with the Almighty.

116. Uphold me according unto thy word, that I may live. Thy word here mentioned may mean either the general principles of righteousness contained in Scripture, or the promises made to all believers in general, or some particular promise made to David himself, but not here recorded. Uphold, sustain or establish. The grace which sustains us in trials is as good as that which shields us from trials. A proper sense of it has a mighty influence. It makes us sure that we shall survive our sorest troubles. And let me not be ashamed of my hope. This clause is best interpreted as parallel to the former. Ashamed, confounded, disappointed by being exposed to contempt. Looking and waiting are implied in the word here rendered hope, which occurs not elsewhere in this Psalm.

117. Hold thou me up, and I shall be safe. Hold up, not uphold in v. 116, but a verb several times rendered comfort, or refresh. The Lord does not sustain his people merely by power, but gives them cordials according to their faintness, and refreshments according to their necessities. Shall be safe, more commonly shall be saved, viz., from impending dangers, bitter enemies and sinful courses. And I will have respect unto thy statutes continually. Have respect, as in Gen. iv. 4, 5; or look, as in Isa. xvii. 7, 8. It means look with favor. If we are enabled thus to regard God's word continually, it is because we are upheld always.

118. Thou hast trodden down all them that err from thy statutes. Such has been God's administration of the government of the world, and such it shall continue to be forever. No figure is better understood than that of treading under foot. It expresses despise. The consequence to all the wicked is a total failure of their plans: For their deceit is falsehood, i. e., a lie to themselves. Calvin: "However well pleased the wicked are with their own cunning, they yet do nothing else but deceive themselves with falsehood." Alexander: "The deception of others is a lie to themselves."

119. Thou puttest away all the wicked of the earth like dross. Even now God discriminates between the righteous and the wicked, and in due time he will cast off the latter as utterly worthless. Dross, always so rendered; that in which there is no value at all. Puttest away, the verb is in the preterite. God has always been acting thus, is doing so still, and will preëminently do so in the last day. Therefore I love thy testimonies. No good man objects to the holiness of Scripture, or to a righteous discrimination between saints and sinners.

120. My flesh trembleth for fear of thee; and I am afraid of thy judgments. The discoveries of the holiness of God and his terrible majesty have often powerfully affected both the souls and bodies of good men, Hab. iii. 16. The first verb is variously rendered, shivers, shudders. Horsley: "A thrilling horror curdles my skin." The verb occurs nowhere else, except in Job iv. 15, where we read: The hair of my flesh stood up. The contemplation of the doom of the wicked has always had an effect upon the benevolent nature of good men; see on v. 53.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. He who hates vain thoughts will not love vain persons, or vain discourses, or vain books, v. 113. Because the wicked are an abomination to God, they are a grief to his people. "With a sincere love of good is always joined a hatred of evil."

2. If evil thoughts arise in our minds, let us make it our prayer and our business to banish them, v. 113. "It is the entertainment of vain thoughts, which affords proof of a heart not right with God."

3. Genuine hatred of evil is against evil in every shape. It abhors the thought of foolishness, as truly as it does the idle word, or the bloody deed. Christ died no less for vain thoughts than for other sins. Dickson: "Every dislike of evil is not sufficient, but perfect hatred is required of us against all sorts and degrees of sin."

4. He who hates vain thoughts and persons does love God's law, and nothing can disprove it, v. 113. It is, in fact, his love of Scripture that makes him turn from them with loathing. Amesius: "Then is our hatred of evil acceptable to God, when it flows from love to his word."

5. The tenor of Scripture, no less than one particular clause, teaches us that as a man thinketh in his heart, so is he, v. 113. How can one be regarded as prepared or preparing for heaven, whose mind is a receptacle for worldly, carnal, proud, spiteful, impure, roving thoughts?

6. Exposed as the righteous are to the shafts of malice, human and diabolical, they yet have sure and ample defence and protection in God. He is their hiding-place and shield, v. 114. Nor can there be found another such refuge or buckler. Elsewhere he is called their strength and shield, their help and shield, their sun and shield, their reward and shield. Against every storm, and foe, and dart, and plot, and combination, God protects his hidden ones.

7. Let all Israel hope, and trust, and wait; all will come right at last, v. 114. Give God his time to work out his plan. We cannot get on without faith and hope. With these we can walk in darkness, and yet be sure of delivery.

8. We must steadfastly repel all approaches of the wicked to tempt us, allure us, seduce us or join in affinity with us, as our loved associates, else they will work our ruin, v. 115. We must act thus, or offend God. There is no alternative. Calvin: "If we contract an intimate acquaintance with worldly and wicked men, it is scarcely possible for us to avoid being speedily corrupted by the contagion of their example." He, who would run well his race, must lay aside every weight. "The amiable desire to please our neighbor is limited to the single end, that it should be for his good to edification."

9. The salvation of the righteous is of the Lord. Their dependence must be upon him. He must both sustain and comfort them, vv. 116, 117. Self-dependence and self-conceit are the bane of many a character. Calvin: "True stability is to be found nowhere else but in the word of God; and no man can steadfastly lean upon it but he who is strengthened by the power of the Holy Spirit." Without divine grace assisting us, we are weak as water. Self-knowledge always makes men self-suspicious.

10. We cannot be too steadfast in eyeing God's word, and keeping our hearts turned to it, v. 117. "The companion of a settled hope is a constant attention to the word of God in its various parts."

11. It seems unaccountable that the doom of sinners in former times does not alarm the sinners of succeeding generations, v. 118. God is angry with the wicked every day. He hates sin as much as when he ordained Tophet of old. He brings to an eternal overthrow every incorrigible enemy. His foes may set their nest among the stars; and it shall be all one to him, as if they had taken their seat upon the dunghill. "Proud persecutors trample upon his people, but, sooner or later, Jehovah will trample upon them."

12. It seems no less wonderful that the deceptions experienced by wicked men in their past pursuit of evil does not warn them respecting the future, v. 118. Why do they not at once confess that all is a lie, vanity and vexation of spirit?

13. In its own nature, as well as in its effects, sin is exceedingly dreadful. It makes the most fine gold dim and changes the silver into dross, v. 119. How doleful is the thought that those who are, by the original constitution of their nature, capable of being vessels of honor, prepared for the Master's use, should by iniquity be so debased as to be fit for no honorable service in the whole universe of God.

14. Come what will, cost what it may, hold on to God and his word, for that is our last hope, v. 119. If we let go there, all is gone.

15. We need not fear that our religious affections, if pure and holy, will rise too high, v. 120. Let our faith and hope attain the measure of full assurance. Let our fear of God mightily move us. Let our love be all sacrificing. Let our jealousy over our own hearts be extreme. Let our consciences maintain the utmost tenderness.

16. In the scheme of salvation whereby God's people are weaned from the world and trained up for glory, even the fear of hell itself has its use, v. 120. Calvin: "We require to be subdued by fear, that we may desire and seek after the favor of God." One way of escaping the damnation of hell is greatly to fear him who can cast both soul and body into hell. Compare Heb. iv. 1, 2. Dickson: "The godly, because of the remainder of sin in them and their natural frailty, are not exempted from the sense of the terror of God, yea, it is needful they be now and then exercised therewith, that so they may be kept in awe, their joy tempered with fear and trembling, their prayers sharpened, and they kept watchful, and thus their obedience furthered." So Henry Martyn records of himself: "In prayer, in the evening I had such near and terrific views of God's judgments upon sinners in hell, that my flesh trembled for fear of them. . . I flew trembling to Jesus Christ as if the flame were taking hold of me! oh! Christ will indeed save me or else I perish."

PSALM CXIX.

AIN.

121 I have done judgment and justice: leave me not to mine oppressors.

122 Be surety for thy servant for good: let not the proud oppress me.

123 Mine eyes fail for thy salvation, and for the word of thy righteousness.

124 Deal with thy servant according unto thy mercy, and teach me thy statutes.

125 I am thy servant; give me understanding, that I may know thy testimonies.

126 It is time for thee, LORD, to work: for they have made void thy law.

127 Therefore I love thy commandments above gold; yea, above fine gold.

128 Therefore I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right; and I hate every false way.

ALL these verses begin with the sixteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet; 121, 124, with the verb rendered have done or deal; 127, 128, with the word rendered therefore; the rest, with different words. On the terms judgment, righteousness, word, statutes, testimonies, law, commandments and precepts, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 6, 10, 7, 4, 2, 1, 5, 3, respectively.

121. I have done judgment and justice. The prophet is probably not so much speaking of his official, as of his personal conduct, his practical life. The verb is in the preterite. Judgment, the singular of the noun often rendered judgments in this Psalm. Righteousness, often connected with judgments, and rendered thy righteous judgments, literally the judgments of thy righteousness. No doubt the standard of right in the prophet's mind was the word of God, and so far the terms judgment and justice may allude to the law; but we may take them here as often elsewhere for right and justice. Compare Ps. lxxxix. 14; xevii. 2; Prov. i. 3. On this foundation—a good conscience in having wronged no one—he rests his plea for protection: Leave me not to mine oppressors. Oppressors, a participle from a verb rendered oppress, defraud, deceive. Truth and fairness never enter into the work of the oppressor.

122. Be surety for thy servant for good. There are various renderings; but the following sustain the common version: Fabritius and Piscator: Answer for thy servant for good; Calvin, Amesius, Tremellius and Junius: Become surety for thy servant for good; Clarke: Be bail for thy servant; Edwards, Jebb, Hengstenberg and Alexander literally agree with the authorized version. The same verb is rendered as here Gen. xliii. 9; xlv. 32; Prov. vi. 1; xi. 15; xx. 16; xxvii. 13 and elsewhere; in Isa. xxxviii. 14, Undertake for me, sometimes, Give pledges. This seems to be the best sense and the true meaning of this clause. Clarke: "What a word is this! Pledge thyself for me, that thou wilt produce me safely at the judgment of the great day! Then sustain, and keep me blameless, till the coming of Christ." Let not the proud oppress me. Proud or presumptuous, as in v. 21. Oppress, future form of the verb whose participle is in the preceding verse. Evidently the prophet speaks of his peril as extreme, and feels that none but God can effectually defend him.

123. Mine eyes fail for thy salvation, and for the word of thy righteousness. Fail or faint, see on vv. 81, 82. The case was very urgent. God's salvation was deliverance sought from him. The word of thy righteousness is the engagement of a just God, who cannot deceive, or be indifferent to the miseries that befall his people.

124. Deal with thy servant according unto thy mercy, and teach me thy statutes. Calvin: "The two clauses of this verse must be read connectedly; for he does not first separately desire God to deal well with him, and next desire him to be his master and teacher." Deal, in v. 121, have done; see on v. 65. The mercy sought is the loving-kindness of the Lord often mentioned in the Psalms. On the latter clause see on verse 12.

125. I am thy servant; give me understanding that I may know thy testimonies. A servant of God was one who sincerely worshipped him, and gladly did and quietly suffered his will. He pleased and honored his Master, not himself. If God was glorified, it seemed to him of small importance whether he himself was honored or reproached. He makes his character of servant the ground of his plea for further instruction in the love, knowledge and practice of the truth. Compare Ps. cxvi. 16.

126. It is time for thee, LORD, to work; for they have made void thy law. Time, i. e., high time. Compare Rom. xiii. 11, meaning full time. Our translators render the verb to work; it is more commonly rendered to do. Calvin: It is time for thee, O Jehovah, to be doing. So others also. It is time to be doing what the circumstances call for. All this is implied in the common version. They, the oppressors, and the proud of vv. 121, 122. Men make void God's law, or make it of none effect when they break it, or when they act as if it were not in existence, or as if it were not law, but mere advice, or when they adopt principles of morals antagonistic to it, or principles of interpretation which subvert it. Compare Matt. xv. 6; Mark vii. 13.

127. Therefore I love thy commandments above gold; yea, above fine gold. See on v. 72; Ps. xix. 10. Love, the verb so often used in this poem to express attachment to God's word. It is in the preterite, I have loved and I still love. See on v. 47. Fine gold, in Ps. xxi. 3, pure gold. See on Ps. xix. 10. The therefore of this verse may refer to all the preceding discourse concerning the Scriptures, or it may refer to the last clause of the preceding verse; for it is true that as long as divine grace abounds in us, the very wickedness of others draws out our love to holiness. Diodati: "The more I see thy commandments violated by the wicked, the more am I confirmed through holy love and zeal against their scandals," Neh. xiii. 15-25; Job xvii. 8, 9; Acts xvii. 16.

128. Therefore I esteem all thy precepts concerning all things to be right; and I hate every false way. The Hebrew is elliptical; but the authorized version gives the sense. Hammond's paraphrase is: "And indeed I have not the least exceptions to any law of thine, but most uniformly and impartially embrace them all, and every one single;" Phillips: "I embrace thy whole revealed word, without any exceptions." Horne: "For the same reason that the children of God, in the worst of times, love his commandments, they love them all; not observing such only as they can observe without giving offence, but regardless of the censures of the world, do their duty in every particular; not hating some evil ways, and at the same time walking in others, but extending and manifesting their aversion to all alike." False way, literally path of falsehood; see on v. 29.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. As long as there is sin, there will be oppression in the world, vv. 121, 122. "It is a great calamity, and greatly to be prayed against, to be left by God under the oppression of wicked men." And yet such things are often witnessed on earth. What an awful place hell must be, where the passions of men are let loose upon each other in every form of cruelty.

2. Are you oppressed? Betake yourself to God. Beware of malevolence. Earnestly ask God to bless your persecutors.

3. A good conscience is a brazen wall, v. 121. It is worth all it ever costs. So the saints have always found it, 2 Cor. i. 12; 1 John iii. 20. It is not half so bad to suffer wrong as it is to do wrong, to be oppressed as to oppress, to be cheated as to cheat, to be slandered as to slander.

4. The righteous shall at the right time be rescued from their persecutors, vv. 121, 122. The prayers of God's people no less than the promises of his word, all run in that direction.

5. Our safety and deliverance could not be in better hands. All the affairs of his people rest with God. He is a wall of fire and salvation, a champion and a surety for them, vv. 121, 122.

6. As the whole of the Old Testament had a shadow of good things to come, and as Jesus Christ is in the New Testament said to be the surety of a better covenant, it is not impossible that the prophet here as elsewhere was preparing the mind of the church for the revelation of that great mystery—Christ's suretyship, v. 122. "O my soul, if a divine surety had not been provided for thee, what must have been thy state, and where must have been thy hopes for eternity?"

7. Although not a few persecutors profess religion, and even pray over their victims, and boast how much they have asked for the divine direction and blessing, yet in all cases they are proud and presumptuous, v. 122. They have not a trait of the true, meek and gentle followers of Christ, although in their folly and madness they boast of doing God's service.

8. Does deliverance from affliction and persecution seem long a coming? It was so to David. No doubt Joseph felt it so in the dungeons of Egypt, and so have thousands of God's people in every age. How shall we behave in such trying circumstances? The Scripture leaves us not without direction, Hab. ii. 3; Heb. x. 37. Let our dependence be upon God, according to the word of his righteousness. "Though our eyes fail, yet God's word does not; and therefore those that build upon it, though now discouraged, shall in due time see his salvation." In the meantime the delay of help should increase the constancy and steadfastness of our faith. Let us guard against a spirit of murmuring. "Complaining is not humility. Prayer without waiting is not faith. The path is plain as noonday. Continue to believe as you can. Wait on the Lord." Robert Glover, the martyr, had great darkness for some days preceding his suffering; but when he came within sight of the stake, his soul was so filled with divine comforts that he exultingly clapped his hands and cried out: "He is come—he is come." His cruel death seemed to give him no pain.

9. Although through divine grace we may have both a good cause and a good conscience in a controversy with man, yet mercy must ever be the plea of sinners before God, v. 124. Strict justice, pointing to our sins, without a mediator, without the blood of atonement, would destroy the best mere man. Morison: "The plea of faith can never be a plea of innocence. Our appeal cannot be to justice but to mercy."

10. We are not cut off from the comfort of knowing, when the evidence proves it, that we are God's servants, vv. 122, 124, 125. Yet this is not matter of boasting, but of humiliation. No man is God's servant either by birth, or by any power, or virtue of his own. Nor could the wealth of the world purchase for him this great honor. It is all of grace.

11. Let us ever be seeking instruction in the divine will and for practical purposes. No severity of trial can justify us in premitting this duty. 'In difficult times we should desire more to be told what we must do than than what we may expect.' 'Those who know most of God's testimonies desire to know more.'

12. We may sometimes know that deliverance to the saints is not far off by the manner in which wickedness is allowed to break forth, v. 126. Horne: "There is a certain measure of iniquity which when communities, or individuals respectively, have filled up, the destroying angel comes forth, and executes his commission. How ought a man to fear, lest the next sin he commits should fill up his measure, and seal his eternal doom." When wickedness is rampant and the earth is full of violence, men must either soon enter the ark or be drowned.

13. Calvin: "When the wicked claim to themselves an unbridled liberty, it behooves us to contemplate with the eyes of faith the judgments of God, in order to our being thereby quickened to the observance of the divine law."

14. We cannot over estimate God's word. It is worth more than all the riches of the earth, v. 127. "The more the wicked despise it, we should esteem it the more." The Bible Society, rightly managed, is a better institution than its best friends have ever esteemed it.

15. The Scripture is perfect. There is no flaw in it. So claims God. So say his people. The glory of it is that in all things it is right, v. 128. If any man wants an unerring rule, let him stick to the Scripture.

16. Genuine love to the word of God always carries with it a just esteem of Scripture and a corresponding hatred of all wickedness.

17. "O my soul, canst thou abide the close test of this part of Scripture? Hast thou as much regard to the precepts as to the privileges of the Gospel? Is no precept evaded, from repugnance to the cross that is entailed to it? Is no secret lust retained? Art thou content to let all go? Is my hatred of sin in my family, in my friend, and in myself as sincere and as strong as when I see it in mine enemies?"

PSALM CXIX.

PE.

129 Thy testimonies are wonderful: therefore doth my soul keep them.

130 The entrance of thy words giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple.

131 I opened my mouth, and panted: for I longed for thy commandments.

132 Look thou upon me, and be merciful unto me, as thou usest to do unto those that love thy name.

133 Order my steps in thy word: and let not any iniquity have dominion over me.

134 Deliver me from the oppression of man: so will I keep thy precepts.

135 Make thy face to shine upon thy servant; and teach me thy statutes.

136 Rivers of waters run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law.

ALL these verses begin with the seventeenth letter of the Hebrew Alphabet; but each verse with a different word. On the terms testimonies, words and word, commandments, precepts, statutes and law, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 2, 7, 5, 3, 4, 1, respectively.

129. Thy testimonies are wonderful: therefore doth my soul keep them. Wonderful, a noun in the plural, wonders, as in Ps. lxxvii. 11, 14; lxxxviii. 10, 12; lxxxix. 5; in Ps. lxxviii. 12, marvellous things. For light, truth, purity, wisdom, righteousness, consolation, doctrine, precept, history, poetry, promise, warning, threatening and saving power, God's word is full of marvels. It abounds in prodigies. It is a paragon of excellence. Therefore does a renewed man not only admire, but love, obey and practise all that God requires, not reluctantly, but with his soul. His life is in obedience. Keep, as in v. 2.

130. The entrance of thy word giveth light; it giveth understanding unto the simple. For entrance, the Chaldee reads impression; Arabic, manifestation; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway, declaration; Fabritius, threshold; Tremellius and Junius, passage; Jebb, going forth; Street and Alexander, opening; Hengstenberg, opening up; Edwards, when thy words are explained. Diodati gives this paraphrase: "Though thy words do abound in mysteries, yet thou declarest and revealest them by thy Spirit to thine elect; who forsaking the sense of the flesh do in all simplicities yeeld unto and believe what is taught them." Even a limited acquaintance with Scripture gives some light. On its threshold, much more in its interior parts, we find wisdom. Giveth understanding, a participle of the verb understand, in v. 27; consider, in v. 95. Simple, see on Ps. xix. 7. Compare Ps. cxvi. 6. Calvin has little ones. Jesus Christ called the same class of persons babes, Matt. xi. 25.

131. I opened my mouth, and panted: for I longed for thy commandments. Panted, in Job xvi. 10, gaped. This may refer to either of three things: 1. Eager hearers open their mouths that they may hear the better, sound entering by the mouth very much aiding us in hearing. 2. The thirsty open the mouth for drink that they may receive every drop. 3. The hungry open the mouth for food, as even the young bird does in its nest. Longed, here only; it expresses earnest desire. The two verbs together denote the greediness with which he received the word.

132. Look thou upon me, and be merciful unto me, as thou usest to do unto those that love thy name. Look, regard, Ps. cii. 17; have respect, Lev. xxvi. 9; 1 Kings viii. 28; turn thee, Ps. xxv. 16; lxix. 16; lxxxvi. 16. Be merciful, be gracious, shew favor, have pity, Ex. xxxiii. 19; Isa. xxvii. 11; Pr. xiv. 21; Pr. xix. 17. As thou usest, an idiomatic phrase, which renders very well a Hebraism. Love, as often in this Psalm. By name we may understand either God himself, or his word; see introduction to this Psalm after No. 10.

133. Order my steps in thy word: and let not any iniquity have dominion over me. Order; direct, v. 5; establish, v. 90; often, prepare. The true believer seeks conformity to the whole law, and abhors sin against any of its precepts. The prayer against the dominion of sin, if offered in faith, shall surely be answered, Rom. vi. 14; see on Ps. xix. 13. Some give another turn to the thought, and make the prophet pray against being placed under the political power of iniquity, that is, of iniquitous men. This would be a lawful prayer, but is a much lower sense than that commonly given. The verb clearly signifies ruling, bearing rule, having the mastery. Clarke: "Let me have no governor but God; let the throne of my heart be filled by him and none other."

134. Deliver me from the oppression of man. Oppression, cognate to oppressors and oppress in vv. 121, 122. Such are the power, malignity and combinations of evil men that none but God can save us from their deceits, frauds and cruelties. "Let me not fall into the hands of man," 2 Sam. xxiv. 13. A reason for so praying is that we may be unrestrained in the service we offer to God: So will I keep thy precepts. Keep, as in vv. 4, 8.

135. Make thy face to shine upon thy servant; and teach me thy statutes. Make to shine; we have the same verb in the same form and connected with face; see on Ps. iv. 6; xxxi. 16; lxxx. 3, 19. The whole verse is a connected prayer for the divine favor, for divine illumination, and for further instruction in the law.

136. Rivers of water run down mine eyes, because they keep not thy law. Compare Lam. iii. 48. There is no authority for altering the text so as to make the prophet weep for not having kept the law himself, although he who truly laments the sins of others will not fail to deplore his own iniquities. The grief of a pious soul for sins is not only or chiefly for the misery thus brought on, but chiefly because sin is exceeding sinful, and greatly dishonors God. The word rivers indicates much more than an occasional tear or a slight uncomfortable sensation. Lot cannot live in Sodom without having his righteous soul vexed from day to day, 2 Pet. ii. 8. The Son of God himself was more grieved by human wickedness than by his own poverty and humble condition. John Rogers' translation: Myne eyes gusshe oute with water, etc.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Wonders will never cease, v. 129. Air, earth, water, the world above, the world beneath, time, eternity, worms, birds, fishes, beasts, men, angels are all full of wonders. The more all things are studied, the more do wonders appear.

2. It is idle, therefore, to find fault with the mysteries of Scripture, or to deny them, v. 129. Inspiration glories in them. He, that rejects the mysteries of love, grace, truth, power, justice and faithfulness of God's word, rejects salvation. It has marvels in itself and marvels in its operation. They are good cause of love, not of offence; of keeping, not of breaking God's precepts.

3. Truly good men will never cease to praise the Scripture. Well does it call forth admiration, v. 129. "It gives admirable discoveries of God and Christ and another world—admirable proofs of divine love and grace. The majesty of the style, the purity of the matter, the harmony of the parts are all wonderful." It warns; it alarms; it instructs; it directs; it convicts; it converts; it sanctifies; it comforts; it gives the victory. Its mysteries are the mysteries of godliness. By words, by ceremonies, by sacraments, by histories, by parables, by similitudes, by prose, by poetry, by promise, by threatening, by precept and by example, it transforms, comforts and saves us. The height, and length, and breadth, and depth of Scripture are as unsearchable as the love of God. No science, no doctrine can compare with it. Tertullian: "I adore the fulness of Scripture;" Henry Martyn: "What do I not owe to the Lord for permitting me to take a part in the translation of his word."

4. Those who have the Scripture have no excuse for their error, or ignorance, v. 130. We may have weak parts and be very simple, but God's word is no less suited to babes than to philosophers. Dickson: "Albeit the word of God be full of high mysteries, yet it may be read with profit by simple people, or any who desire knowledge."

5. Nor need we wait to know much, before we can profit somewhat, or to know all before we can profit vastly. The very entrance of God's word gives light, v. 130. Pool: "The very beginnings and rudiments of God's word, the first discoveries of those sacred mysteries, and much more the depth of them, in which their chief excellency consists, gives understanding;" Calvin: "The light of the truth revealed in God's word is so distinct that the very first sight of it illuminates the mind;" Nicolson: "The entrance of God's word, the first chapter of Genesis;—what light does that pour on the mind of man!" A little secular learning may make a man a fool; but even a little divine knowledge may save one's soul.

6. If we would profit by the word of God, we must exercise and maintain ardent love of truth. This is indispensable, v. 131. He who loves not, and longs not, and thirsts not, and hungers not, and pants not, and cries not, and digs not for the truth will not find the knowledge of God. The new-born babes must desire the sincere milk of the word. He must drink in its precious truths. Augustine: "If thou sayest, I have enough, thou perishest. Always add—always walk—always proceed. Neither stand still, nor go back, nor turn aside."

7. When we plead for mercy, we need ask no more than God habitually gives to those who humbly and sincerely call upon his name, v. 132. Dickson: "It is wisdom for us not to affect singularity of divine dispensations toward us, but to be content to be dealt with as others of God's children before us have been dealt with." God's saving mercies are always great, 1 Cor. ii. 9.

8. If we ever do right, gain sound knowledge, lead a holy life, and walk with God, so as to reach heaven, it must be by divine grace ordering our steps, guiding our feet, controlling our actions, v. 133. This grace must be sought. To expect it without longing for it, and without seeking it is the folly of formalists. Without the influence of the Holy Spirit, we make no progress. As the Scripture is the sole rule of holiness, so the Author of Scripture, applying it to our hearts is the sole Author of sanctification.

9. It is both lawful and wise to pray to be kept out of the power of the wicked, that they may not hinder us in our heavenly course, v. 134. In their power we may lack the opportunity to do many things tending to our spiritual good. Left free, our gratitude for such deliverance should press us to obedience. It was for good cause that Paul besought others to ask that he might be delivered from wicked and unreasonable men. Morison: "However sincere the desire of obedience to God's precepts may be, it is possible that in some evil hour when goaded on to transgression by the unjustifiable conduct of our fellow-men, we may fall from our integrity." Bridges: "The believer sometimes finds peculiar circumstances of trial an unavoidable hindrance in the service of God." Compare Isa. xix. 20.

10. What we all need is more light in our hearts, in our consciences, and on our paths, more grace to strengthen us, more saving knowledge, a richer blessing from the Lord, v. 135. "All lesser troubles vanish when God doth but vouchsafe a look of paternal compassion. O what anguish fills the heart when his people no longer taste the good word of God, no longer enjoy the clear shining of his countenance." Henry: "We must pray as earnestly for grace as for comfort." Clarke: "The witness of God's Spirit was an essential principle in religion from the foundation of the world." Our great error is that we are too easily satisfied.

11. Grief for sin in ourselves or others, is never excessive. Sin is hateful, horrible, sinful, shameful, wicked, ruinous. We cannot mourn too much for sin; that is impossible, v. 136. Compare Deut. ix. 18, 19; Jer. ix. 1; Ezek. ix. 4. One of the darkest signs of any age is when the people weep but little for sin. Many a time weeping and praying is all that is left to the pious, Jer. xiii. 17. Nicolson: "If we grieve not for others, their sin may become ours, Ezek. ix. 8; 1 Cor. v. 2." Henry: "The sins of sinners are the sorrows of saints. We must mourn for that which we cannot mend." Dickson: "True zeal is so far from private revenge of personal injuries received by persecutors, that it can pity their miserable case and mourn for them. Two things in sin chiefly move the godly to mourn for it. One is the dishonor it brings on God. The other is the perdition it brings on the sinner."

PSALM CXIX.

TZADDI.

- 137 Righteous art thou, O LORD, and upright are thy judgments.
 138 Thy testimonies that thou hast commanded are righteous and very faithful.
 139 My zeal hath consumed me, because mine enemies have forgotten thy words.
 140 Thy word is very pure: therefore thy servant loveth it.
 141 I am small and despised: yet do I not forget thy precepts.
 142 Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness, and thy law is the truth.
 143 Trouble and anguish have taken hold on me: yet thy commandments are my delights.
 144 The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting: give me understanding, and I shall live.

ALL these verses begin with the eighteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet; 137, 142, 144, with some form of the word which we render righteous, or righteousness; each of the remainder with a wholly different word. On the terms judgments, testimonies, words and word, precepts, righteousness, law and commandments, see introduction to this Psalm Nos. 6, 2, 7, 3, 10, 1, 5, respectively.

137. Righteous art thou, O LORD, and upright are thy judgments. Because the Lord is just and right, so are his judgments; for they are a transcript of his character. The decisions both of his word and providence are unimpeachable.

138. Thy testimonies that thou hast commanded are righteous and very faithful. Hardly any two scholars render this verse in precisely the same way. Yet in the essential ideas they entirely harmonize; 1. God's word is marked by justice and faithfulness; 2. In his word he has enjoined on us the strictest uprightness and fidelity. Pool: "The sense is, Thou hast strictly and severely, under the highest obligations and penalties, commanded in thy word that men should be just and true in all their actions." We can have no other safe rule of righteousness than God's word.

139. My zeal hath consumed me, because mine enemies have forgotten thy words. Zeal, see on Ps. lxi. 9. Consumed, elsewhere, cut off, destroyed, literally, caused me to vanish. So long as grace triumphs, the pious zeal of God's people rises in proportion to the outbreathing and outrageous conduct of the wicked around them. Mine enemies, the authors of my distress and trouble, my adversaries. On forgetting God's word, see on v. 16.

140. Thy word is very pure. Very, as in v. 138, of which see the various renderings. Pure, margin, tried, refined, a participle from the verb rendered hast tried in Ps. xvii. 3. The same word is applied to silver of a fine quality in Ps. xii. 6; in Ps. xviii. 30, The word of the Lord is tried. There is no mixture of error or mistake in God's word, even as there is no dross or alloy in silver that has been properly tried by fire. God's word has been tested for thousands of years in every possible way, and it has always come out pure. It is holy and leads to holiness. It is worthy of God. Therefore thy servant loveth it. Thy servant, as in vv. 17, 23, 38; one wholly devoted to God. Loveth, as in vv. 47, 48, 97. Holy men love holy things, because they are holy.

141. I am small and despised. Small, in fact, in public esteem, in my own esteem. It means a little one. Compare Isa. lx. 22; Jer. xiv. 3; xlviii. 4. Paul esteemed himself the least of all saints. Despised, contemned; Calvin, held in low estimation, insignificant. But neither his humility, nor the reproach of men alienated him from God. Yet do I not forget thy precepts. See on vv. 16, 61. Alexander: "However proudly or however justly I may be despised, I can still lay claim to one distinction, that I have not, like my despisers, forgotten God's commandments."

142. Thy righteousness is an everlasting righteousness. We have the word righteousness here both in the masculine and feminine form. In the one case it is doubtless equivalent to thy word; in the other it means right. Perfectly carried out by God and man, it works no injustice, no wrong; but conduces to the good of all who love God. This is its nature and its effect for ever, to eternity. It cannot be otherwise: And thy law is the truth. Compare John xvii. 17. It is 'truth without any mixture of error,' mistake, falsehood, or fiction.

143. Trouble and anguish have taken hold on me. Trouble, distress, affliction, particularly such as is caused by enemies. Anguish, elsewhere distress, 1 Sam. xxii. 2. It describes the distress of a people besieged and is then rendered straitness, Deut. xxviii. 53, 55, 57; Jer. xix. 9. Have taken hold on me, have found me, have found me out. Compare Gen. xxxviii. 22; xliv. 16; Job. xi. 7; xvii. 10. In Ps. cxvi. 3, the same verb is rendered gat hold upon me. But these things could not shake his steadfastness: Yet thy commandments are my delights. Delights, as in vv. 24, 77, 92, ample solace in any trials.

144. The righteousness of thy testimonies is everlasting. Sometimes human laws and human wisdom seem all right and appear to work well for a season; but ere long they are found faulty, and must be changed, modified, or repealed. But the principles of God's government revealed in his word are everlasting. The clause might read, Righteousness (are) thy testimonies for ever. Give me understanding, and I shall live. On the first verb, see on vv. 27, 34; on the second, on vv. 17, 77, 116.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The character of God is the foundation of all holy joy, as his nature is the basis of all right theology, vv. 137, 138. If he were not just and faithful, if he were not, what he is in all things, our hopes would surely perish with us. "As God is what he is, so he is what he should be."

2. Amesius: "Although vain men feign to themselves many notions of righteousness, yet there is no true and real righteousness besides that revealed in God's word," v. 137.

3. God's word and works are like himself, vv. 137, 138. He is righteous and faithful; so are they. God acts like himself, not like us. He is not a man that he should either change or lie, be unjust or unkind. The Teacher of all the earth speaks right. The Judge of all the earth does right. Often indeed we know not fully what he says or does; but we may well wait for his own solution of dark matters.

4. Zeal is a vital element in a good character, v. 139. He who has no zeal has no love to God, for genuine zeal is the ardor of love. A lifeless engagedness in God's service is a mark of hypocrisy. It is better to die for Christ than to live unto the world. Whitefield lived only to the age of fifty-six years, yet he preached eighteen thousand times—sermons all on fire, and they set the world on fire! True zeal is for God's glory, not our own. It grieves far more for his dishonor than for our sufferings. It readily forgives wrongs done to ourselves; but it is jealous for the Lord of hosts. It is willing to suffer for the very persecutors by whom it suffers. It is neither fierce nor bitter. It blesses and curses not. It is not for party, nor does it come from vanity but from a sincere love to the word of God, and to the souls of men. Bridges: "The surest evidence of Christian zeal is—when it begins at home—in a narrow scrutiny, and 'vehement revenge' against the sins of our own hearts;" Dickson: "Zeal hath great need of sound knowledge that it miscarry not." When genuine, nothing can repress it. Opposition and irreligion pouring out scorn do but inflame it.

5. Amesius: "A sincere love to the word of God comes from a right view of its purity," v. 140. Scripture is not only pure but purifying. "Ye are clean through the word which I have spoken unto you," John xv. 3. The way of genuine peace is to adopt God's word for our standard and through divine grace to bring our lives to conform to it.

6. It is better to be small and despised, mean and obscure, than to be proud and wicked, flattered or a flatterer, v. 141. Henry: "Men's real excellency cannot always secure them from contempt; nay, it often exposes them to the scorn of some, and always makes them low in their own eyes." It is a noble quality in great minds to be willing to be despised for the good of our race, and the glory of God. Such are precious in the eyes of the Lord. Their humility is not feigned. Brainerd: "I felt a great desire that all God's people should know how mean, and little, and vile I am, that they might see I am nothing, that so they might pray for me aright, and not have the least dependence upon me. I could not bear to think of Christians showing me any respect. I saw myself exceedingly vile and unworthy; so that I was ashamed that any one should bestow any favor upon me, or show me any respect."

7. God's word is unchangeably right in all respects; therefore is of immutable and unending obligation, v. 142. It is at once the rule of duty, the guide to life, and the measure of happiness. It cannot be dispensed with. It has the supremacy over all laws. Both promises and threatenings shall infallibly be fulfilled. No man ever loved his Bible too much.

8. Extreme distress is no novelty, v. 143. Trouble and anguish have wrung many a heart, and will do so as long as there is sin in the world. No distress is like spiritual distress. It is a great mercy when God allows nothing worse than human malice to be let loose against us, and keeps our hearts calm and at peace with him.

9. However sore the trials of good men, yet by God's word they can be guided safely through and effectually cheered, v. 143. Morison: "There are no fears which it cannot allay: no troubles which it cannot assuage, no griefs which it cannot soothe, and no temptations beneath which it cannot succor and relieve." Bradford writes: "My prison is sweeter to me than any parlor, than any pleasure I have had in all my life."

10. God's word needs no correction, v. 144. Its righteousness appears the more it is tried. It never requires amendment. It is good at the first; it is good at the last.

11. What we need for life, and for liveliness in God's work is not more Scripture, but more knowledge of what has been already revealed, v. 144. Nicolson: "All is death without thee. Live in me, that I may live by thee."

PSALM CXIX.

KOPH.

145 I cried with my whole heart; hear me, O LORD: I will keep thy statutes.

146 I cried unto thee; save me, and I shall keep thy testimonies.

147 I prevented the dawning of the morning, and cried: I hoped in thy word.

148 Mine eyes prevent the night watches, that I might meditate in thy word.

149 Hear my voice according unto thy lovingkindness: O LORD, quicken me according to thy judgment.

150 They draw nigh that follow after mischief: they are far from thy law.

151 Thou art near, O LORD; and all thy commandments are truth.

152 Concerning thy testimonies, I have known of old that thou hast founded them for ever.

ALL these verses begin with the nineteenth letter of the Hebrew alphabet; 145, 146, with the same verb; 147, 148, with the same verb; 150, 151, with cognate words; the rest, with different words. On the terms statutes, testimonies, word, law and commandments, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 4, 2, 7, 1, 5, respectively.

145. I cried with my whole heart; hear me, O LORD. I will keep thy statutes. Cried, have cried and cry still; often rendered called as in Ps. cxvi. Whole heart, see on v. 2. Hear, so as to answer. Keep, as in v. 2. We may make the last clause independent, and so understand the prophet as saying that he is resolved to keep the law, come what may; or, as a vow connected with his prayer, engaging him to a zealous course of obedience, if the Lord will but give him the needed grace in answer to prayer. The latter is probably the correct view.

146. I cried unto thee: save me, and I shall keep thy testimonies. Cried, as in v. 145. Save, help, deliver. See on Ps. iii. 7. The precise form of evil, from which he sought deliverance is not stated. A subsequent verse points to the craft and malice of enemies, v. 150. This may be the distress now pressing him. The scope of this verse is probably best learned by explaining it as v. 145. Deliverance is to be an animating motive to obedience.

147. I prevented the dawning of the morning, and cried: I hoped in thy word. John Rogers' translation: Early in the mornynge do I crye unto the. Prevented, see on Ps. xvii. 13; xviii. 5. The meaning is before day dawned, he engaged in earnest prayer. Cried, a stronger word than that in vv. 145, 146. His prayer increased in fervor and intensity as his troubles multiplied, and as his hope in God's word grew stronger. Mere earnestness of desire is not enough, we must sow in hope.

148. Mine eyes prevent the night watches, that I might meditate in thy word. Prevent, as in v. 147, have prevented. On the watches of the ancients, see on Ps. lxiii. 6. The Psalmist doubtless means the second and third watches of the night, as those were commonly given to sleep. Meditate, as in v. 15.

149. Hear my voice, according unto thy lovingkindness: O LORD, quicken me according to thy judgment. His plea is based solely on mercy. The life and liveliness he seeks from God are according to God's word or judgment, see v. 156. But following the rendering given in v. 132, Walford has: Revive me, O Jehovah, according to thy wonted manner; Edwards: Enliven me, as thou art wont.

150. They draw nigh that follow after mischief: they are far from thy law. They are nigh to me, but far from thee. This verse discloses the urgency of the prayer. Mischief, in Lev. xviii. 17 and often, wickedness; in Job xxxi. 11, heinous crime; in Isa. xxxii. 7, (in the plural) wicked desires; in Ezek. xvi. 43 and often, lewdness. Calvin and church of England, malice; Edwards, malicious devices; Street, vice; Fry and Hengstenberg, wickedness; Alexander, crime. It is a general term describing the malice and plotting of enemies.

151. Thou art near, O LORD, and all thy commandments are truth. If enemies are nigh, God is nigh also. And he will surely save, for he has said he would; and all he has said is truth or faithfulness.

152. Concerning thy testimonies, I have known of old that thou hast founded them for ever. Of old, many read from the beginning. Hengstenberg and Alexander, long; Edwards and Walford, long since. Founded, established. Calvin: "This indeed is the chief point of faith, That the word of God is not only distinguished for fidelity and steadfastness for a time, but that it continues unchangeable forever. Were it otherwise, it could not include within it the hope of eternal salvation."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. God, who made us and knows us, sees that we are forgetful, and sends us line upon line, sometimes in new and sometimes in old words and phrases, vv. 145, 146. Blessed be his name for all his patience with our dulness.

2. In supplication we must not only call upon God but continue calling; not only pray but pray without ceasing; not only cry with the voice but with holy vehemence of soul; not only pray with the heart, but with the whole heart, vv. 145-149. "I will not let thee go, except thou bless me." Nor must we indulge despondency, much less despair; but rely on the promises and hope in God's word, and in his mercy. "We are saved by hope." We do not pray enough. "Your soul would not be so empty of comfort, if your mouth were not so empty of prayer." Luther spent three hours a day in prayer.

3. To prayer we must add meditation, v. 148. Think and pray. Pray and muse. Get the fire to burning; then speak.

4. We must watch as well as pray, vv. 147, 148. We must awake early to this work.

5. If we would succeed at a throne of grace, our plea must be, not for justice, but for mercy; not for our deservings, but for God's lovingkindness, v. 149. We need everything, and have nothing to pay. We are weak, and need strength; blind, and need illumination; vile, and need purification; poor, and need riches; guilty, and need pardon; outcasts, and need acceptance; and all through grace.

6. We must pray against the dead state, in which our hearts are by nature and often by habit, v. 149. If we are not quickened and enlivened, we shall loiter by the way and never reach heaven.

7. It is vastly for our encouragement that according to God's decision much is provided and much pledged, v. 149. We need no better promises, but only faith to believe what is spoken.

8. Let us expect in all our Christian course enemies bold, pushing, crowding, cruel, mischievous, malicious, v. 150. God's people have always had such. Let us not deceive ourselves with the vain hope that we can go to the kingdom of heaven in a smoother way than the pious of all past ages. This should not discourage us, but make us take fast hold of the covenant, and cleave to God with purpose of heart. The more the state of the times favors ungodliness, the greater will be the opposition to the pious and to piety.

9. Trying as our circumstances may be, God knows the worst and is at hand to help his people as often as their necessities require, v. 151. This we should steadfastly believe, and never doubt.

10. There is no flaw in Scripture. It is all truth, v. 151.

11. The word of God is and from the beginning has been stable, v. 152. We should expect no less; it is the word of God. Our experience confirms this belief. God's word cannot change because God cannot change. "The mountains shall depart, and the hills be removed; but my kindness shall not depart from thee, neither shall the covenant of my peace be removed, saith the LORD that hath mercy on thee," Isa. liv. 10. Compare Isa. li. 5, 6. God's testimonies are true, eternal, unchangeable, indispensable, irrevocable. The saints rejoice and are glad, for they know by a long experience how sure every word of God is. Henry: "All that ever dealt with God, and trusted in him, will own that they have found him faithful."

PSALM CXIX.

RESH.

153 Consider mine affliction, and deliver me: for I do not forget thy law.

154 Plead my cause, and deliver me: quicken me according to thy word.

- 155 Salvation is far from the wicked: for they seek not thy statutes.
 156 Great are thy tender mercies, O LORD: quicken me according to thy judgments.
 157 Many are my persecutors and mine enemies; yet do I not decline from thy testimonies.
 158 I beheld the transgressors, and was grieved; because they kept not thy word.
 159 Consider how I love thy precepts: quicken me, O LORD, according to thy lovingkindness.
 160 Thy word is true from the beginning: and every one of thy righteous judgments endureth for ever.

ALL these verses begin with the twentieth letter of the Hebrew alphabet; 153, 158, 159, with different forms of the same verb; the rest, with different words. On the terms law, word, statutes, judgments, testimonies and precepts, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 1, 7, 4, 6, 2, 3, respectively.

153. Consider mine affliction, and deliver me: for I do not forget thy law. Consider, behold, look on. Deliver, loose, i. e., extricate, or rescue. Affliction, commonly so rendered in this Psalm; see on v. 50. On not forgetting the law, see on v. 16. The last clause is a plea of sincerity in keeping covenant engagements with Jehovah. Compare vv. 94, 173, 176. The affliction is not particularly stated in this verse; but subsequently we learn that it arose from false accusations and bitter persecutions.

154. Plead my cause, and deliver me. On the first verb see on Psalm xxxv. 1. Deliver, not as in v. 153, but a word meaning to redeem, or to save by avenging. The corresponding participle is rendered redeemer, avenger, revenger, kinsman, near kinsman, next kinsman. Quicken me according to thy word, sufficiently explained at v. 25, though some prefer with instead of according to in this verse, the preposition not being the same in the two verses.

155. Salvation is far from the wicked: for they seek not thy statutes. Salvation, help, deliverance; see on Ps. iii. 2. Wicked, in Psalm i. ungodly. Seek, preterite, have sought, as in vv. 10, 45, 94. Salvation is far from the wicked because they are wicked, because they are far from God, because God is holy and just, and cannot keep friendship with the vile, because they neither wish nor labor to know, or do his will, not desiring the knowledge of his ways, of the methods of his grace, or of his plan of salvation. John Rogers' translation, the Bishops' Bible and the church of England for salvation read health; Calvin, safety.

156. Great are thy tender mercies, O LORD: quicken me according to thy judgments. Great, in v. 157; Ps. iii. 1, 2, many. Tender mercies, see on Ps. xxv. 6, compassions; it denotes the yearning of the heart, and is sometimes rendered bowels, 1 Kings iii. 20. The prophet felt his case to be so sad and trying as to call for infinite tenderness. But however sore were his outward troubles, his concern was chiefly for spiritual prosperity. On the clause, quicken, etc., see on vv. 25, 149.

157. Many are my persecutors and mine enemies; yet do I not decline from thy testimonies. Many, in v. 156, great. Persecutors, a participle from the verb rendered pursue, chase. Enemies, as in v. 139, the authors of my distress. Until men are hunted and bounded by many enemies, who for the time have power, and are withal fierce and to some extent unscrupulous, they can have but a faint conception of the anguish of the prophet when he experienced the evils noted in this verse. Yet they did not move him from his constancy and integrity; see on v. 51.

158. I beheld the transgressors and was grieved; because they kept not thy word. Transgressors, a participle of the verb rendered transgress, Ps. xxv. 3; offend, Ps. lxxiii. 15; dealt unfaithfully, Ps. lxxviii. 57; very often, dealt treacherously, Isa. xxiv. 16; Jer. iii. 20. Calvin has perfidious; Fry, faithless; Alexander, traitors. Was grieved, frequently rendered loathed; Calvin, chid them; Hengstenberg, am vexed; Alexander, am sickened. The general doctrine and sentiment of this verse are the same as those of vv. 53, 136.

159. Consider how I love thy precepts: quicken me, O LORD, according to thy loving-kindness. Consider, as in v. 153. Love, in the preterite, have loved and do still love, as in vv. 47, 48 and often. The Psalmist has often in this Psalm asked to be *quicken*ed, or enlivened, according to the principles and promises of God's word. Here he asks that the same blessing be dealt out to him according to the large measure of the divine mercy. He knew that God's lovingkindness overleaps all limits and all human conceptions, Eph. iii. 20. If he should fail in asking, he desired that God would not fail in giving.

160. Thy word is true from the beginning: and every one of thy righteous judgments endureth for ever. The first clause is variously rendered. Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Calvin: The beginning of thy word is truth; Luther: Thy word is nothing but truth; Piscator agrees with the authorized version; Fabritius and Alexander: The head of thy word is truth; Tremellius and Junius: Thy most excellent word is truth; church of England: Thy word is true from everlasting; Edwards: The beginning of thy word was true; Street: The chief attribute of thy word is truth; Hengstenberg: The sum of thy word is truth. The same word is rendered sum in Ps. cxxxix. 17; often, head, Ps. cxviii. 22. God's word is true in every sense that either of these translations would indicate. The first thing he ever spoke was true, and so was the last. The crowning excellence of Scripture is its truth. Nicolson: "Thy word is true, in its principle, and in all its details, from Adam to Moses; and from Moses to Christ; from Christ to the present time; and from the present time to the end of the world;" Diodati: "All thy word, put together, without exception, is nothing but pure truth." The reason why God's judgments endure for ever is because they are righteous, and righteousness is immutable.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Is any afflicted? let him pray, according to the example here set, v. 153.
2. We must continue to follow the Lord even if we have no reward here, but on the contrary meet with much affliction, v. 153.
3. It is not wrong for us to invite special divine attention to our trials and afflictions; yet it is not necessary to enter into tedious details respecting them, as though the Almighty understood not our case, v. 153.
4. It is a great matter to continue in the path of duty, steadfast and upright, in the day of adversity, v. 153. When the whole outward course of providence is such as to present discouragements to the natural mind, it is proof that the root of the matter is in us, if we swerve not from duty. The firmer our adherence to God, the more confidently may we rely upon his word of promise to be fulfilled in our case.
5. If the Lord be our advocate and plead our cause, we may be sure that deliverance will come, v. 154. When conscience accuses, and Satan assails, and the world reproaches, and providence frowns, what can we do but betake ourselves to him who never forsakes the clients who commit their cause to him?
6. If we can but be made as lively in God's service as his word requires, his grace provides, and his promise engages, we shall neither be dead nor dull, vv. 153, 154, 159.
7. The way of the wicked is as darkness, even now, and is growing darker every day, v. 155. Nor can any mortal tell what hour the fearful consummation may come. The Judge is even now standing before the door, ready to summon them into his awful presence.
8. It shall be for a perpetual joy to all the righteous that the gentlest, the most loving and the tenderest being in the universe is God himself, v. 156. Let not men foolishly build their hopes on human mercies, but solely on the infinite compassions of Jehovah.

9. Neither age, nor eminence in position, nor public services, nor piety, nor anything else is a guaranty against the vilest, mightiest, bitterest and most numerous persecutors, v. 157. Dickson: "As it is no strange thing to see the godliest men exposed most to persecution; so it is no small measure of grace which God bestoweth on them to bear out the truth against all opposition." The power, the number, the malice and the cunning of our enemies cannot harm us, if God be for us, much less can they justify us in swerving from the right. Persecution is indeed a fearful test of our fidelity, but if we studiously avoid the cross, we shall never wear the crown. Calvin: "It is an easy matter to act well when we are among the good; but if wicked men afflict us, if one man openly assault us by force, if another rob us of our property, if a third circumvent us by wiles, and a fourth attack us by calumnies, it is difficult for us to persevere in our integrity, and we rather begin to howl among the wolves."

10. No doubt deceit, treachery, perfidy enter into the very nature of sin. Iniquity is itself a lie to God and man, v. 158.

11. This dreadful nature of sin is a good cause why we should not tolerate it, or be unmoved concerning it; but we should weep and mourn, be sad and grieved both for the sin and the doom of the transgressor, v. 158. Morison: "The dishonor done to God is not the only cause of regret. Sin is the sure path to ruin, and those who keep not God's word, will, ere long, be dealt with as his enemies."

12. Love between God and his people is reciprocal. He shows them his loving-kindness, and they love his precepts, his ordinances, his perfections, his whole nature, v. 159. The more they see of his love, the more they love him.

13. It is right to make a sincere profession or declaration of love to God and his word, v. 159. Calvin: "When the saints speak of their own piety before God, they are not chargeable with intruding their own merits, as the ground of their confidence; but they regard this as a settled principle, that God, who distinguishes his servants from the profane and wicked, will be merciful to them, when they seek him with their whole heart. Besides, an unfeigned love of God's law is an undoubted evidence of adoption, since this love is the work of the Holy Spirit."

14. There is no untruth in Scripture, v. 160. It is never commended too highly; it is never trusted too implicitly. It is all faithfulness. It is light without darkness; it is life and spirit.

15. The Scripture cannot be broken, v. 160. It is unchangeable. It could not be changed for the better, else it would not be perfect now. If altered, it must be for the worse, and so it would become imperfect. 'From the time when God began to speak, he has always been faithful to his promises, and never disappointed the hope of his people.' Nicolson: "All other things wear out, or decay; lose their testimony, and become obsolete. But God will ever bear testimony to his own word, and continue to support its veracity by fulfilling it to all successive generations."

PSALM CXIX.

SCHIN.

161 Princes have persecuted me without a cause: but my heart standeth in awe of thy word.

162 I rejoice at thy word, as one that findeth great spoil.

163 I hate and abhor lying: but thy law do I love.

- 164 Seven times a day do I praise thee, because of thy righteous judgments.
 165 Great peace have they which love thy law: and nothing shall offend them
 166 LORD, I have hoped for thy salvation, and done thy commandments.
 167 My soul hath kept thy testimonies; and I love them exceedingly.
 168 I have kept thy precepts and thy testimonies: for all my ways are before thee.

ALL these verses begin with the twenty-first letter of the alphabet; 161, 162, 166, with the letter as pronounced sin; and all the rest with the same pronounced shin or schin; 167, 168, with the same verb; all the rest with different words. On the terms word, law, judgments, commandments, testimonies and precepts, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 7, 1, 6, 5, 2, 3.

161. Princes have persecuted me without a cause: but my heart standeth in awe of thy word. Princes, as in v. 23, rulers, head men, captains, chiefs. Persecuted, the verb from which we have persecutors, in v. 157. Without a cause, uniformly so rendered in the Psalms; often for nought, for nothing, Gen. xxix. 15; Ex. xxi. 2; Isa. lii. 3; Mal. i. 10. The meaning is, they have persecuted and are doing so still. He does not state what branch of Scripture most awakened his holy fear. Any part of it might well have such an effect. We may well fear God's word as it denounces curses against his enemies, and fear to be like them, lest we also should fall into condemnation. Here we see the use of the most terrific portions of Scripture. Persecutors kindle big fires. Hell is a bigger fire. They threaten the loss of friends, riches, honors and pleasures; but if we break with God, we lose the friends, riches, honors and pleasures at his right hand, Matt. x. 28. Modern criticism not capriciously prefers words instead of word.

162. I rejoice at thy word, as one that findeth great spoil. Rejoice, literally (am) rejoicing, a participle of the verb have rejoiced, in v. 14, cognate to the noun rejoicing, in v. 111. The very word of God, which awakens salutary fear, awakens also a blessed joy. Nor is this joy stinted, but like that of one that findeth great spoil, or much prey. According to common opinion this is the highest kind of joy, being sudden and accompanied by the glory of victory.

163. I hate and abhor lying: but thy law do I love. Hate and abhor, in the preterite; have hated and abhorred, and do so still. Lying, see on v. 29. Love, have loved, and love still; see on vv. 47, 48.

164. Seven times a day do I praise thee, because of thy righteous judgments. Among the Greeks three was the number of perfection; among the Hebrews, seven. As day and night signifies continually, so seven times means very often. On the phrase righteous judgments, literally judgments of righteousness, see on v. 7.

165. Great peace have they which love thy law. Great, as in vv. 156, 162. The peace of believers is great in many respects. It is manifold, being with God, with their neighbors and with their own consciences; being sufficient and mighty, able to keep them calm in all perturbations and in all the awful scenes through which they shall pass. It is the peace of God, which passeth all understanding. Such peace have all the saints. And nothing shall offend them; margin: And they shall have no stumbling block; Edwards: And they meet with nothing that can divert them from it; Street: And there is nothing that maketh them stumble. This gives the sense.

166. LORD, I have hoped for thy salvation, and done thy commandments. All the terms of this verse are those usually so rendered. Hoping includes the idea of waiting. No other text more happily presents the true doctrine concerning grace and works, relying and doing, hoping and obeying, expecting all from God's sovereign mercy, yet performing all known duties from a tender conscience and true gratitude. The form of both verbs describes the habit of life—have hoped and still hope, have done and still do.

167. My soul hath kept thy testimonies; and I love them exceedingly. True spiritual obedience is not merely outward, or of the body, but inward, of the soul; not reluctant or sluggish, but strong and controlling, proceeding from much or exceeding love. The first verb is in the preterite—hath kept and doth still keep. The second is in the future, implying I love now and will love in all coming time.

168. I have kept thy precepts and thy testimonies: for all my ways are before thee. Kept, the same verb as in vv. 4, 8. My ways, my habits of life, of speech and of thought, my secret ways and my public conduct. Before thee, under thy eye and scrutiny as the Judge of all. The Psalmist lived as seeing him who is omniscient. His love and obedience extended to the whole will of God, under whatever name revealed.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is sad indeed when the head men of a nation learn the art of persecution; when those who are set for the defence of the weak and innocent become their tormentors, v. 161. Persecutions are commonly based on an alleged difference of views in politics or religion; but the real cause is envy, covetousness, pride, or lust of power. Man is naturally fond of domination. The worst persecutors are whining hypocrites, full of cant, weak-minded bigots who have but one idea, abandoned women, and unconverted ecclesiastics. Whoever differs from them is wrong, is dangerous. Sometimes such relent, as did Saul, 1 Sam. xxiv. 17; but they soon return to their old work, unless divine grace changes their hearts. Henry: "It has been the common lot of the best men to be persecuted. . . It is sad that the power which magistrates have from God, and should use for him, should ever be employed against him. But, marvel not at the matter, Eccles. v. 8."

2. If we are treated harshly and severely by those in power over us, it is better for us, though worse for them that it should be without, than with cause on our own part, v. 161. "If we suffer as evil-doers, or as busy bodies, we have no cause to triumph in the day of trouble." Cruelty, wholly gratuitous, brings awful guilt on the perpetrator, but can do no real harm to the sufferer.

3. The more terrible and frightful the power and acts of persecutors, the more should we call to mind the majesty and terrors of the Almighty, v. 161. Compare Luke xii. 4, 5. History proves that nothing is a greater temptation to apostasy than the menaces, statutes and proceedings of persecutors in power. Against the fear of man there is no adequate argument but the fear of God.

4. That we may have a just sense of the wrath and terrors of God in the day of sore persecution, let us habitually stand in awe of his word, v. 161. When Ehud said to Eglon, I have a message from God unto thee, he arose out of his seat, Judg. iii. 20. Trifling with Scripture, irreverence in sacred things, is a fearful sign of a depraved character.

5. If we made more of our religion, it would do more for us, v. 162. If we prized Scripture and ordinances more highly, we should be more refreshed by them. Amos: "Joy in the word of God proceeds from love to it and increases that very love."

6. No man's heart was ever turned too vehemently against lying, falsehood, in every shape and form, v. 163. Henry: "Every man hates to have a lie told of him; but we should more hate telling a lie, because by the former we only receive an affront from men, by the latter we give an affront to God."

7. The only effectual cure of the spirit of lying is found in a sincere love to the word of God, v. 163. God's word is truth, is preëminently the truth; and he who loves truth must hate a lie; as he who loves a lie must hate the truth.

8. A noticeable defect in the services of all formalists is that they do not abound in praise, though there is such a loud call to that duty, v. 164. Some of the Rabbis, as well as some moderns given to rubrics in their private devotions, have foolishly supposed that they observed the Scripture rule, when they literally and formally praised God seven times a day. When our joy is unspeakable and full of glory, it will break forth into praise and thanksgiving. "Love to God is the spirit of praise."

9. The Christian religion would be a sad failure, if it did not give solid peace to those who truly embrace it, v. 165. Such are the tempests that howl over the earth; such are the perturbations of the human mind; such is the disquieting nature of all earthly things that if religion wholly failed to give quiet of mind, it would disprove its divinity. It is because the wicked are strangers to the quietness of piety, that there is no peace to them.

10. So just and correct is the temper of the pious, and so true and fair are the dealings of God with his creatures, that nothing can drive the saints from their purpose to cleave to God, v. 165, so that they shall fall into ruin. "No event of providence shall be either an invincible temptation, or an intolerable affliction to them." In the cross of Christ they even glory, Gal. vi. 14.

11. When our hope of heaven is accompanied by the spirit and habit of obedience to all God's will, we may be well assured that it is not deceptive, v. 166. Morison: "The entire religion of a redeemed sinner may be said to consist in the hope of mercy, and in the habitual practice of obedience to the commandments of God." Bridges: "Conscious unworthiness may give a trembling feebleness to the hand of faith, but the feeblest apprehension of one of the least of the promises of the Gospel, assures us of our interest in them all."

12. Love and practice are mutual aids to each other. If we love we will obey, and if we obey, it will strengthen our love, v. 167. But then this love and this obedience must be supreme. They must be stronger than our love of the world, or our regard to man.

13. It is a part of true piety to observe all that God has spoken, and that from a remembrance of his omnipresence and omniscience, v. 168. When the Almighty would teach the father of the faithful the nature of true piety, he said: "I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect," Gen. xvii. 1. Even poor Hagar was sustained by the truth: "Thou God seest me," Gen. xvi. 13. Calvin: "If we live not as under the omniscient inspection of God, the fickle lustfulness of the flesh quickly carries us away hither and thither."

14. There is a beautiful harmony and symmetry in Christian character, vv. 161-168. Fear makes the godly man sober; joy makes him lively; abhorrence of sin makes him cautious and watchful; love makes him serve willingly and give liberally; peace makes him tranquil; hope gives an anchor to his soul; faith in an omniscient God makes him serve not man, but his Maker; praise gives him songs in the night; and obedience makes him work righteousness with all diligence. He knows that the 'salvation of God is to be sought and found in the ways of God's commandments.' O how blessed Christians might be if no neglect of closet-duty, no unfaithfulness to covenant engagements, and no defect of motive marred their service. Many 'spoil the hidden walk of communion with God, by concentrating the mind upon a more public, and, apparently, a more useful walk.'

PSALM CXIX.

TAU.

- 169 Let my cry come near before thee, O LORD: give me understanding according to thy word.
 170 Let my supplication come before thee: deliver me according to thy word.
 171 My lips shall utter praise, when thou hast taught me thy statutes.
 172 My tongue shall speak of thy word: for all thy commandments are righteousness.
 173 Let thine hand help me; for I have chosen thy precepts.
 174 I have longed for thy salvation, O LORD; and thy law is my delight.
 175 Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee; and let thy judgments help me.
 176 I have gone astray like a lost sheep: seek thy servant; for I do not forget thy commandments.

ALL these verses begin with the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet; 173, 175, with the same verb; the rest, each with a different word. On the terms word, statutes, commandments, precepts, law, judgments, see introduction to this Psalm, Nos. 7, 4, 5, 3, 1, 6, respectively.

169. Let my cry come near before thee, O LORD: give me understanding according to thy word. Cry, a word expressive of much earnestness, outcry. Give me understanding, as in vv. 27, 34. In this verse and the next, cry and supplication seem to be personified, as messengers before God's throne. The whole verse teaches that with the righteous, nothing is desired more than heavenly wisdom and divine teaching.

170. Let my supplication come before thee: deliver me according to thy word. Before thee, as in v. 169, literally, before thy face, into thy presence. Deliver, elsewhere pluck, in v. 43, take. According to thy word, see on v. 9. A good man would not be delivered in any way contrary to the word of the Lord.

171. My lips shall utter praise, when thou hast taught me thy statutes. We can no more praise than we can pray, or think aright, unless the Lord becomes our teacher in divine things. The literal rendering of the latter clause of the verse is, Because thou wilt teach me. But the authorized version gives the sense. Edwards has, When thou shalt have taught me. We are wise, when we learn God's statutes, and never till then.

172. My tongue shall speak of thy word: for all thy commandments are righteousness. Shall speak of, a verb rendered hear, Ps. iv. 1, and often; shout and cry, Ex. xxxii. 18; testify, Hos. v. 5; vii. 10, and often. It may here signify that the prophet declares his purpose to commend the Scripture, or that his heart gladly responds to all God's word. A renewed man's heart loves every part of Scripture for it is righteousness itself.

173. Let thine hand help me; for I have chosen thy precepts. Help, a verb of frequent occurrence and always rendered as here or succor. God's hand is strong, is ready, is far-reaching, and is sure to bring deliverance. The latter clause is an assertion that the prophet had cordially entered God's service, having made an intelligent and deliberate election between the principles of God's word and the maxims of the world, and given a decided and cordial preference to the former. I have chosen and I still choose.

174. I have longed for thy salvation, O LORD; and thy law is my delight. Longed, as in v. 40. Calvin: "The construction in the Hebrew denotes steadfastness, or constancy of desire." There is no reason for confining the meaning of salvation to any temporal deliverance, though that may be included. The scope and the context show that the prophet had his mind on a complete spiritual salvation. Delight, in the plural delights, as in vv. 24, 77, 92, 143. God's word is an abundant source of pleasure to his people.

175. Let my soul live, and it shall praise thee; and let thy judgments help me. Live, the verb of existence, the causative form of which is so often in this Psalm rendered quicken. Let my soul live, have health, be lively; then the work of praise will be pleasant, and I will engage in it in a fitting manner. Help, as in v. 173. The judgments are the decisions of God's word as executed in his providence. Alexander: "This verse sums up in conclusion the petitions of the whole Psalm."

176. I have gone astray like a lost sheep: seek thy servant; for I do not forget thy commandments. The figure of the first part of the verse is of frequent occurrence in Scripture. Compare Isa. liii. 6; Jer. l. 6; Matt. x. 6; xv. 24. Lost sheep are always in danger, and often in distress. Sin both imperils and embitters life. As a sheep is a silly and helpless thing, and, when lost, never finds itself, but wanders on, till the shepherd seeks it; so the soul of man must be brought back from its errors and miseries by the Lord himself. Such is the common view taken by expositors. Yet the prominent idea gathered by many is not so much the sinfulness but the peril to which as a wanderer David was exposed.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Nothing is more essential than genuine earnestness in devotion. When prayer is dull, and supplication languid, every approach to God fails, vv. 169, 170. Bridges: "The eloquence of prayer is its earnestness. The power of prayer is that which cometh, not from education, or from the natural desire of the man; but from above." Whenever we fall under the delusion that the number or variety of our services can be a substitute for warmth, we are in a bad way. We must have vehemence and humility, cry and supplicate.

2. The genuine spirit of prayer is not satisfied with praying, but desires answers, vv. 169, 170.

3. Although this part of Scripture does not teach it, yet the doctrine of Christ's mediation is so important, that we, living under the Gospel, ought never to lose sight of it. No prayer offered in any other name than that of Jesus Christ can be acceptable to God, John xiv. 13, 14; xvi. 24.

4. As long as we are in our present low estate, we shall never be done asking for instruction, v. 169. There is nothing we need more than such wisdom as God only can give. Otherwise we will never know, nor love, nor do our duty. Our necessities in this matter compel us to repeat over and over again the same petitions and to cry for help from the Spirit of God. None but he can give saving illumination.

5. Let us very carefully avoid asking deliverance or any mercy except according to Scripture, vv. 169, 170. If the case is such that no promise meets it, it is hopeless.

6. Especially must we seek aid in our devotions. We must pray that our prayers may be right and acceptable before God, v. 170.

7. We are no less dependent on divine teaching to aid us in the work of praise, v. 171. It is not a fine voice, nor skill in its management, nor art in playing upon an instrument that God requires. The spirit and the understanding are the essentials.

8. We should all be witnesses for God, and declare his goodness. How else shall true righteousness be spread abroad in the world, v. 172. No good man is content to go to heaven alone. Yet it is sad to see how few promptly embrace opportunities to speak a word for God. Bridges: "What loss is there to our own souls in these neglected opportunities of blessing the souls of others! For never do we receive richer fruit to ourselves, than in the act or endeavor to communicate to others."

9. It is not possible that there can be any defect in the righteousness of Scripture, or it would long since have been made apparent, v. 172. Surely some good man, with nicely cultivated sensibilities, or some evil man, with critical eye, must have found a flaw in the morality of Scripture, if such had existed.

10. We have need of help from God all the time, v. 173. Without his aid we are indeed powerless for good; and 'the more we trust to his help and guidance in everything, the more we shall be able to do, and the more delightful will his service be to us.'

11. It is indeed a great mercy, and should be esteemed by us a great blessing, when we can truly say that our decided choice leads us to God's word, and to all heavenly things, v. 173. Calvin: "It is not through ignorance or an inconsiderate zeal that the children of God desire above all things heavenly doctrine."

12. The truly pious have intense desires and longings for grace and complete deliverance from sin and its consequences,—even for perfect salvation, v. 174. Their existence even on earth is not happy when they feel that they are not glorifying God and showing forth his praise. We may have true grace without the exultant spirit of triumph. But we cannot have true grace unless we hunger and thirst after righteousness.

13. The righteous have intense pleasure in the word of God. It is not only their delight, but their delights, v. 174. Take all else away and leave them the full, sweet believing enjoyment of Scripture, and they are still truly blessed.

14. Eternal life is begun in this world, v. 175. It is life indeed, and is the fountain of that sweet animation that runs through the services of the Christian's life.

15. As long as we live, we shall need help both from Scripture and from Providence, v. 175. The more we give ourselves to the work of the Lord, the more deeply shall we feel our need.

16. Has God's providence, either with or without any particular sin on our part led us into the wilderness, and are we wandering like lost sheep? But one way of recovery is possible. If the Good Shepherd does not seek us and carry us back on his shoulder, we are clean gone, v. 176. None but he can restore the soul. Augustine: "Lord, I can go astray; I cannot of myself return." And if we would have his salvation, we must look to him alone.

17. Come what will, let us hold on to the truth, think of it, remember it, love it, obey it, v. 176. "Let integrity and uprightness preserve me" is a good prayer. David "had not forgotten God's way, nor lost sight of his own state. The word of the Lord, applied by his Spirit,—1. When he was slumbering, awakened him. 2. When he was dead, *quicken*ed him. 3. When he was in danger, preserved him. 4. When he was wounded, cured him. 5. When he was assailed by his foes, armed and defended him. 6. And by his word he was nourished and supported. It was ever well with the Psalmist, and it is ever well with all the followers of God, when they do not forget God's word."

18. If the peace, delight and other agreeable emotions described in this Psalm belong to the saints in their pilgrimage on earth, what shall not be their blessedness when he that sitteth on the throne shall dwell among them; when they shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more; neither shall the sun light on them, nor any heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall feed them, and shall lead them unto living fountains of waters, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes!

PSALM CXX.

A Song of degrees.

- 1 In my distress I cried unto the LORD, and he heard me.
- 2 Deliver my soul, O LORD, from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue.
- 3 What shall be given unto thee? or what shall be done unto thee, thou false tongue?
- 4 Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper.
- 5 Woe is me, that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar!
- 6 My soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace.
- 7 I am for peace: but when I speak, they are for war.

THIS and Psalms cxxi.-cxxxiv. have each the title, A song of degrees. Song, found often in the titles of Psalms; see on title of Psalm xxx. Degrees, in Amos ix. 6, stories; in 2 Kings ix. 13; Neh. iii. 15; xii. 37; Ezek. xl. 6; xliii. 17, stairs; in Ex. xx. 26; 1 Kings x. 19, 20; 2 Chron. ix. 18, 19; and six times in Ezek. xl. steps. It is the word so often used in 2 Kings xx. and Isa xxxviii. respecting the degrees of the sun-dial of Ahaz. In 1 Chron. xvii. 17, it is applied to a man of high degree. The cognate verb is rendered arise, go up, come up, ascend. It is applied to the ascending of the angels on the ladder which Jacob saw, to the travel of any person or people on a journey, and to the ascent of Moses and Aaron into the mount of God. In rendering the whole phrase, A song of degrees, the authorized version follows the Septuagint, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Piscator and Calvin. The Chaldee, The song which was said upon the ascent of the abyss; Luther and Tholuck, A song from the higher choir; Syriac, The first song of ascension; Doway, A gradual canticle; Diodati, A song of degrees, that is of goings up or movings; Venema, A song of degrees or of ascensions; Street, An ode of the Ascent; Hammond, Edwards, Morison and Alexander, A song of the ascents; Hengstenberg; A song of the pilgrimages; Tremellius and Junius, A most excellent song. The explanations given of the phrase are these: 1. The title is a name designating the tune to be used in singing these songs. This is rather suggested by several than supported by any authority. 2. Others think the title calls for elevation of the voice in singing these songs. This view is suggested by some of the Rabbis; Patrick favors it; and Calvin thinks it probable. 3. Fenwick thinks these odes are 'songs for ascending or aspiring souls,' and that they have an unusual elevation about them. 4. Jarchi, Kimchi, Ben Melech and Lyra favor the opinion that there were fifteen steps to be ascended at the temple, on each of which one of these songs was to be sung. Calvin styles this "a silly conjecture, for which there is no foundation." But see Ezek. xl. 26, 31. 5. Others suppose that there is special reference to a pulpit or place near the altar, where a choir of priests stood and sang, as mentioned in Neh. ix. 4. Luther, Hammond and Tholuck seem to favor this view. 6. The Syriac version, Theodoret, Chrysostom, Athanasius, Euthymius, Diodati, Calmet, Vatablus, Ewald and Morrison suppose that these songs were sung by the Israelites at their different stages returning from Babylonish captivity. Calvin says, that this is "an interpretation altogether forced." 7. Mudge, Hengstenberg and Alexander suppose that they are songs which were sung by the Jews as they went up to the annual feasts at Jerusalem. 8. Yet another opinion, defended by Gesenius, is that the title is given because these Psalms are composed so as to rise by degrees to a climax. But this is true of only a few of them. On examining these opinions the reader will probably be prepared to assent to the statement of Dodd: "It is very uncertain why this title is prefixed to this and the following Psalms." Henry: "It is well that it is not material what the meaning of that title should be, for nothing is offered toward the explication of it, no, not by the Jewish writers themselves, but what is conjectural." Four of these fifteen Psalms were certainly composed by David; one is inscribed to Solomon, if not penned by him; it is certain they were not all written at the same time; Psalms cxxvi. cxxix. are generally admitted to have been written after the captivity; Psalms cxxii. cxxxiv. were clearly designed for public worship, while Psalms cxx. cxxx. are as clearly aids to private devotion; and Psalms cxxvii. cxxviii. are for the use of families. Some seem designed for special seasons, and some for all times. Several are without any special fitness for the temple service. They are all very edifying and comforting to the pious. Clarke: "They are excellent in their kind; written with much elegance; and contain strong and nervous sentiments of the most exalted piety, expressed with a great felicity of language in a few words." They are all short, three of them having but three verses each; the longest having but eighteen verses; they average less than seven verses to a Psalm. In nearly all of them there is little or no attention to that characteristic of most Hebrew poetry—parallelism. Many of them are very terse and pointed.

We know not the author of this Psalm, though Calvin, Patrick and Henry not unreasonably ascribe it to David as the probable author. Others ascribe it to Solomon; others, to Ezra; others, to Haggai; others, to Zechariah; others, to Malachi. None of these opinions are satisfactorily established. Those, who hold that David is the author, suppose that it was written when Doeg and his accomplices by their slanders compelled the sweet singer of Israel to flee his country. Others think it was specially written for the Jews in their captivity. The occasion of the Psalm cannot be certainly known. Scott dates it B. C. 1059; Clarke affixes no date. The only name of the Most High here found is that of Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. In my distress I cried unto the LORD, and he heard me. Distress, trouble, affliction, adversity, tribulation. Cried, very often rendered called, denoting acts of religious worship generally. Compare Gen. iv. 26; Psalm iv. 1, 3. Heard, so as to answer, see on Ps. iii. 4. The distress arose from wicked calumnies. Tholuck: "Undaunted believers are never free from them."

2. Deliver my soul, O LORD, from lying lips, and from a deceitful tongue. Deliver, commonly so rendered, as in Ps. cxix. 170. Lying lips, literally, the lip of falsehood. For deceitful tongue, some read tongue of deceit, and some a tongue, deceit, i. e., the tongue which is deceit itself. The wounds of the tongue are like the piercings of a sword. Innocence is no shield against the slanders invented by the father of lies, and spread abroad by his children. But let the righteous patiently endure such evil reports, only being concerned that they give no cause for them. As a lying tongue produces such incalculable mischief here, almost dissolving the bands of society, inspiration raises the question of a just punishment.

3. What shall be given unto thee? or what shall be done unto thee, thou false tongue? This is an awful question. It arraigns the slanderer at the bar of God, and calls on him to consider what retribution he may reasonably expect from the Judge of all the earth. If anything in human conduct deserves terrible punishment, slander cannot escape the divine vengeance.

4. Sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper. Some put this verse in apposition to the preceding, and make it declare that the false tongue is like the sharp arrows of the mighty, with coals of juniper. This would be no exaggerated description of calumny. Such is the view of Calvin, Walford, Boothroyd, Phillips and Tholuck. The other interpretation makes this verse an answer to the question of the preceding. So our translators evidently thought; also the church of England, Jebb, Edwards, Street, Nicolson, Morison, Fry, Henry, Pool, Scott and Alexander, the last of whom says: "The general idea of severe and painful punishment is here expressed by the obvious and intelligible figures of keen arrows and hot coals." This is to be preferred. The arrows of a mighty man were used in war and shot from powerful cross-bows, inflicting death or exquisite agony. By coals of juniper, some understand juniper proper, which is a wood filled with resinous substance, and when ignited makes an intense heat of live coals. But others understand a species of broom which is highly inflammable, the genista. Several distinguished modern scholars favor this view. The objection to it is that the fire of the broom, though intense, is soon over, whereas the coals of the juniper not only have great heat, but remain alive a considerable time. The Chaldee reads the verse: The strong, sharp arrows are like lightning from above, with coals of juniper [genistarum] kindled in hell beneath.

5. Woe is me, that I sojourn in Mesech, that I dwell in the tents of Kedar! John Rogers' translation: Woe is me that my banishment endureth so long: I dwell in the tabernacles of the sorrowful; Bishops' Bible: Woe is mee that I am constrained to dwell with Mesech: and to have my habitation among the tents of Cedar. Mesech or Meshech was the son of Japheth, Gen. x. 2; Kedar was the son of Ishmael, Gen. xxv. 13. Though of different origin, their descendants seem to have had much the same manners, habits and dispositions, all of them being idolaters, fierce and cruel. The descendants of Mesech are the Tartars and kindred tribes, whose habits and blood have been largely infused into the Turks. By Kedar we are to understand the Arabs, who have always been a deceitful and bloody people. The Psalmist is not to be understood as saying that he was actually sojourning in the country of these people; but that he was surrounded by a set of men as cruel and malignant as the Tartars and Arabs. Such was indeed the fact during his persecutions in the time of Saul. Calvin: "He speaks metaphorically of his own countrymen." By the calumnies of the wicked, lands where the knowledge of the true God prevails are converted into abodes of wretchedness comparable to the homes of the fiercest and most terrible barbarians and savages.

6. My soul hath long dwelt with him that hateth peace.

7. I am for peace: but when I speak, they are for war. For long Alexander reads too long. Hengstenberg thus renders v. 6: "It is wearisome to my soul to dwell by those who hate peace." The use of the phrase my soul shows the depth of his distress. David's enemies were as implacable as the Tartars and Arabs. His kind, forgiving temper was manifested on many occasions, and should have been sufficient to disarm any malignity. His language about himself is strong: I am for peace; literally, I peace, i. e., I am peace itself, I have done all that mortal man can do to stop this relentless persecution; but all in vain. The very time when I am most anxious for quiet, my enemies are for war.

Of course those who regard this Psalm as relating to the captivity are at no loss to find enemies answering the description here given; for the church of God has always been a speckled bird, and the hawks and vultures have been fierce against her.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Good men are often so situated that the only resource left them is prayer, v. 1. To man they look in vain, appeal in vain, in vain call for pity or help. Fightings without and fears within, the lion of the evening roaring, and vile men swelling and cursing, and good men out of power—all this presents a state of case compelling the believer to resort to God alone.

2. Yet prayer is never performed aright so as to be answered till we are taught by the Holy Ghost. Compare Rom. viii. 26. Distress is a natural means of stirring us up to prayer, only when sanctified to us by God's Spirit.

3. Such prayer as is indited by the Holy Ghost shall not be in vain, v. 1. The time and the manner of answering our prayers are in God's hand; but the certainty of relief from unjust odium is infallible. Man may be able to point out no way of escape, but God is never at a loss for means of rescuing his friends.

4. "The purest character is not safe against the slanderer; and those from whom we should hope better things are not always clear from the crime of calumny." The Master himself and all his followers have suffered thus. Blamelessness itself often provokes the wicked tongue, v. 2.

5. Let all men be warned against falling into any of the sins of the tongue. What does the liar or slanderer gain? A temporary advantage sometimes, and that is all. When the account shall be settled at the tribunal above, the loss will be immense, v. 3. Morison: "To do evil to another and thereby to ruin thyself, combines the folly and wickedness of a fiend of darkness." Something shall surely be done unto thee, thou false tongue. The day of recompense will surely come. It may come even in this life. When an old man reviewed the history of some old calumniators and saw how they had suffered, he said: "I tremble in my flesh."

6. Some suppose that retribution in kind is taught in v. 4. More than once in Scripture are slanders compared to arrows and fire, Ps. lvii. 4; lxiv. 3; Prov. xxvi. 18. Let those who indulge in sins of the tongue remember that God's arrows are sharper and God's coals hotter than those with which they think to afflict the people of God. Compare Rev. xxi. 8; xxii. 15.

7. It is sad indeed when we are forced to be much among men of a malicious disposition, vv. 5, 6. Amesius: "To dwell among calumniators is to converse with barbarous and fierce men, and those are barbarous who are alien from all honorable conditions of peace." No good man can love such company. Even some unregenerate men loathe it.

8. Good men love peace, pray for it, seek it, pursue it, will give anything but a good conscience for it, v. 7. Compare Matt. v. 9; Heb. xii. 14. Amesius: "It is a mark of a pious man, as far as in him is, to seek peace." Dr. Ruffner: "I would not give one hour of brotherly love for a whole eternity of contention."

9. Yet let men of a tender conscience and friendly disposition not be distressed, if they find men wicked and unreasonable. The Bible requires no impossible tasks. Its doctrine is: "If it be possible, as much as lieth in you, live peaceably with all men," Rom. xii. 18. There is a class of men, and their number is not small, who love strife and live in fire. We may not render evil for evil. Yea, we must labor to overcome evil with good; but in spite of all we can do Satan will roar, and wicked men will often rage.

10. At such a time, let us labor to behave ourselves, quietly plead for peace, and copy the example of the Psalmist, v. 7. The trial may be very sharp; but if God can bear with the wicked, surely the forbearance of his people ought not to be exhausted. The Almighty can sustain us. The everlasting arms are strong enough and God's eternal mercy rich enough to give us quietness in all perturbations.

11. "As we must foresee the dreadful misery of all impenitent slanderers and liars, in the everlasting fire of hell; let us in meekness warn them of their danger, if peradventure God will give them repentance, to the acknowledging of the truth; and that they may recover themselves out of the snare of the devil, who are taken captive by him at his will."

PSALM CXXI.

A Song of degrees.

- 1 I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help.
- 2 My help cometh from the LORD, which made heaven and earth.
- 3 He will not suffer thy foot to be moved: he that keepeth thee will not slumber.
- 4 Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep.
- 5 The LORD is thy keeper: the LORD is thy shade upon thy right hand.
- 6 The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night.
- 7 The LORD shall preserve thee from all evil: he shall preserve thy soul.
- 8 The LORD shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in from this time forth, and even for evermore.

ON the title see on title of Psalm cxx. It cannot be shown that this ode had any historic occasion, nor is there any certainty concerning the authorship, although many, not without a show of probability, refer it to David. Its design is quite obvious. Luther: "This is a Psalm of consolation, wherein the Psalmist, from his own experience, exhorts the godly to a constancy of faith, and to an expectation of help and defence from God." Alexander: "The whole Psalm is a description of Jehovah, as the guardian and protector of his people." Morison: "The imagery of the Psalm is borrowed from military life, and seems well to represent that state of mind with which a general looks out for succor in the day of conflict." Scott dates it B. C. 1021. Clarke fixes no date, but says it "appears to be a prayer of the Jews in their captivity, who are solicitous for their restoration." The only name of the Most High here found is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills, from whence cometh my help. The chief variation in the rendering of this verse is in the tense of the first verb. That of the authorized version is literal, agreeing with the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, church of England, Calvin, Edwards and Jebb. The Septuagint, Arabic, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway put the verb in the preterite, I have lifted. Fabritius, Fry, Street, Hengstenberg and Alexander prefer the present tense, I lift or raise. See Introduction, § 6. Venema, Piscator, Amesius, Tremellius and Junius and Tholuck make the whole verse a question, Shall I lift up? etc. Hengstenberg and Alexander make the words, Whence cometh my help, interrogative. The word rendered from whence commonly marks a question. Hills, mounts or mountains. Some have thought that the reference is to the mountains of the Holy Land generally; but it seems much more natural to understand the elevations of Jerusalem itself, of which Mount Moriah was the most prominent in the eye of a devout Jew. Understanding by mountains whatever is great or excellent in the earth, Calvin says: "The meaning of the prophet is abundantly obvious, which is, that although all the helps of the world, even the mightiest, should offer themselves to us, yet we ought not to seek safety anywhere but in God."

2. My help cometh from the Lord, which made heaven and earth. Help, in vv. 1, 2, the same found in Ps. xx. 2; uniformly rendered. We met the cognate verb in Ps. cxix. 175. We can form no higher conception of ability to give aid to those who need it than when we rightly consider the creative energy, which made heaven and earth. That power which brought all things out of nothing is competent for any work. Compare Isa. xl. 28.

3. He will not suffer thy foot to be moved. Calvin: He will not suffer thee to stumble; Edwards: He will not suffer thy foot to slip. An inspired prayer of this kind has the force both of a promise and of a prediction. Hengstenberg: "The sliding of the foot is a frequent description of misfortune." We had the same figure in Ps. xvii. 5; xxxviii. 16; xciv. 18. God is able to succor. He has pledged his word to help. He that keepeth thee will not slumber. Slumber, in Ps. lxxvi. 5, the same verb in the preterite is rendered have slept. We shall meet it in the next verse. The clause expresses the unceasing watchfulness and perfect care of God over his people.

4. Behold, he that keepeth Israel shall neither slumber nor sleep. Elijah suggested to the priests of Baal that their God peradventure slept and must be awaked, 1 Kings xviii. 27. Nor did the heathen mythology forbid the idea of at least occasional stupor and forgetfulness in many of the gods whom they worshipped. But Jehovah, the God of the whole earth and the keeper of Israel, the glory of the true church, never slumbers nor sleeps. Alexander: "Most interpreters assume a gradation in the meaning of these two verbs, as if one denoted lighter and the other deep sleep; but they differ on the question which is the stronger of the two expressions." We had the latter verb in Ps. iii. 5; iv. 8; xiii. 3; xlv. 23. Either of these verbs without the negative expresses forgetfulness and want of care.

5. The LORD is thy keeper. Keeper, a participle in vv. 3, 4, rendered he that keepeth; in v. 7, twice and in v. 8, once the verb is rendered preserve, see on Ps. cxix. 4, 8. Jehovah's work is all perfect. His guardian, preserving care is all we need. The LORD is thy shade upon thy right hand. Here a new figure is used assuring us of protection and defence. We have the same in Ps. xvii. 8; xxxvi. 7; lvii. 1; lxiii. 7; xci. 1, where for shade we read shadow; though some think the shade here referred to is that of a tree; others, that of a portable covering. The figure has already been fully explained. To be at the right hand is to be at the fit place to grant protection and defence.

6. The sun shall not smite thee by day, nor the moon by night. Both in the torrid and temperate zones men are familiar with the dreadful effects of a stroke of the sun, producing in many instant death, in others, a long season of suffering, in others, idiocy. The smiting of the moon by night is not of so easy explanation. Some insist that the sole meaning is that cold shall not harm Israel. The moon is said to rule by night, Gen. i. 16. So she is spoken of as controller of all the influences of the night. Compare Gen. xxxi. 40; Jer. xxxvi. 30. But it seems impossible wholly to dismiss the idea of many nations and classes of people that the shining moon sends forth malignant influences, especially in Judea, Egypt and contiguous countries. Even in Scripture we read of lunatics, Matt. iv. 24; xvii. 15. And no word is better understood among us than moonstruck. Without favoring any superstitious notion, it may be said, that so general a belief of the malign influence of the moon in certain cases, especially among people that have the best opportunities of observation, the wandering tribes, fishermen, etc., can hardly be accounted for on the supposition that it is a mere vulgar error. Yet Clarke says: "I believe the Psalmist simply means, they shall not be injured by heat nor cold; by a sun-stroke by day, nor a frost-bite by night." And Hengstenberg says: "Physical secret doctrines are here not in their place, and are nowhere to be found in the Psalms." All that need be asked is that the influence of the moon be as readily recognized as that of the sun.

7. The LORD shall preserve thee from all evil. Here we have an exposition of the former verse. Preserve, see on v. 5, where the participle of this verb is rendered keeper. Evil, both natural or moral evil. It includes both here. He shall preserve thy soul. Both the life and the immortal nature of the true Israel are under divine guardianship.

8. The LORD shall preserve thy going out and thy coming in, from this time forth, and even for evermore. The protection and preservation previously promised are here said to extend to God's people in all their acts and ways, and in all coming duration, even to the endless ages of eternity. On the phrase going out and coming in compare Num. xxvii. 17; Deut. xxviii. 6; 1 Sam. xxix. 6.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is a great thing to be able to give a right direction to our expectations and prayers, v. 1. This is not easily done. Amesius: "In times of straits, we are too much inclined to seek help from those things which cannot aid us." It is a great mercy when God teaches us that there is no help for us in man.

2. Effectual aid comes from God and none else, vv. 1, 2. He is alone all-sufficient. Men and angels, means and instruments, the united powers of earth, and the wisdom of all creatures are as nothing compared with God. We are never safe till, ceasing from man, whose breath is in his nostrils, we look to God alone.

3. Let us carefully study the works of creation, v. 2. They reveal the power and other perfections of God in a manner very important for us to apprehend. Nor is it possible ever to bring the heart so to confide in God as we ought until we have right conceptions of his omnipotence.

4. Let us remember that there is constant danger of our slipping and stumbling in our heavenly course, v. 3. We are very weak in ourselves. It is strange that we are not entirely ruined. But when we remember that God is the hope of his people, the mystery is explained. Almighty arms can hold up the feeblest.

5. The vigilance of Jehovah over his saints is as admirable as it is necessary. Even the sentinel, though he knows the penalty will be death, sometimes falls asleep on his post. But Jehovah never slumbers, vv. 3, 4. His promises are full and unfailing, Gen. xxviii. 15; Deut. xxxii. 10; Isa. xxvii. 3.

6. It ought greatly to humble us to be taught as we are in every part of Scripture that our safety entirely depends upon our having a keeper, v. 5. It is very kind and condescending in the Almighty to undertake this office for us!

7. We may rest assured that all the evils which can possibly assail us shall certainly be controlled by the Lord, if we commit our case to him, vv. 6, 7, 8. No ill-fated star, no scorching sun, nor smiting moon, nor spirit infernal, nor human malice can harm those who are kept under the shadow of the Almighty. Horne: "The good man, during his journey through life, shall be under God's protection at all seasons; as Israel in the wilderness was defended from the burning heat of the sun, by the moist and refreshing shadow of the cloud; and secured against the inclement influences of the nocturnal heavens, by the kindly warmth and splendor diffused from the pillar of fire." Although neither the church nor any member thereof has any promise that affliction and temptation shall never come, yet the word of God makes it certain that no believer shall perish therein.

8. This Psalm suggests the vast difference there is between saints and sinners. The former look up to God for help; the latter look down to earth. The saints shall never so stumble as utterly to fall; but sinners shall fall to rise no more. The Lord preserves his people, but he reserves his enemies. What the former undertake issues well. Nothing done by the wicked shall finally prosper. The shade of the righteous is always at their right hand; but the defence of the wicked is departed from them. Though trouble comes to the righteous, yet there is no curse in it. Though good comes to the wicked, yet there is no real blessing in it.

9. Good men must be very unbelieving to make it necessary for the Almighty so often to assure them of his preserving and protecting care, as he does no less than five times in this Psalm, vv. 3, 4, 5, 7, 8.

10. The eternal salvation of the righteous is certain, vv. 7, 8. God knows how and has a mind to deliver them from snares, plots, guilt, sin, perils at home and perils abroad, from death and hell.

PSALM CXXII.

A Song of degrees of David.

- 1 I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the LORD.
- 2 Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem.
- 3 Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together :
- 4 Whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the LORD, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the LORD.
- 5 For there are set thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David.
- 6 Pray for the peace of Jerusalem : they shall prosper that love thee.
- 7 Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces.
- 8 For my brethren and companions' sakes, I will now say, Peace be within thee.
- 9 Because of the house of the LORD our God I will seek thy good.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. cxx. There is no reason for doubting the Davidic authorship. The internal evidence confirms the assertion of the title. If the Psalm had a historic occasion, it was probably that of the removal of the ark to Jerusalem. Jebb notices a remarkable play upon words in eight or nine instances in the Hebrew of this Psalm. Venema: "The scope of this Psalm is to confirm the people in the hope of a perpetual temple and of the perpetual kingdom of David, and to prepare and excite them to take Jerusalem as the seat of the kingly authority and of religion, to seek to promote its peace and prosperity, and gladly to observe God's worship there." Scott dates it B. C. 1043; Clarke, B. C. about 536. Of course he does not regard David as the author. The names of the Most High found in it are Jehovah LORD, Jah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; introduction to Ps. lxxviii.; and on Ps. iii. 2.

1. I was glad when they said unto me, Let us go into the house of the LORD. Literally, I was glad in those saying to me, To the house of Jehovah we will go. The first verb is in the preterite; the last, in the future. In announcing their pious purpose these worshippers invite others to join with them. Hengstenberg thinks Isaiah (ii. 3) illustrates the latter clause of this verse. Alexander thinks Isaiah founds that verse on the words of David. Calvin thinks that the prophet here expresses his joy at finding the people hearty and united in their purpose to obey the heavenly oracle fixing Jerusalem as the seat of the theocracy and of the national worship. But it is one of the excellences of Scripture that it so well expresses the sentiments of the godly from age to age.

2. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, O Jerusalem; literally, have been standing. The best explanation is that of Tholuck, who thinks the longing mind of the pilgrim overleaps the intermediate space, and he sees himself already within the gates of the holy city. After an Israelite had once been there, the preterite form of the verb would convey this idea, I have been in Jerusalem, and I will, by God's grace, be there again. It will weaken the force of this Psalm, if we forget that Jerusalem was a type of the true church of Christ and also of the heavenly state.

3. Jerusalem is builded as a city that is compact together. Calvin and Jebb: Jerusalem is built as a city, compact in itself together; Hengstenberg: Jerusalem, thou builded, as a city which is bound together. Hammond thinks the verse has its historic exposition in 1 Chron. xi. 7, 8, "And David dwelt in the castle . . . and he built the city round about, even from Millo round about, and Joab repaired the rest of the city." As a type of the church and of heaven this verse has great force and beauty. On the word Jerusalem which occurs thrice in this Psalm see on Ps. li. 18; cii. 21. The word Jerusalem means the possession of peace, or the vision of peace. Its most ancient name was Salem, which means peace. This was the city,

4. Whither the tribes go up, the tribes of the LORD, unto the testimony of Israel, to give thanks unto the name of the LORD. The first word rendered LORD is Jah; the second, Jehovah. The tribes would not thus have been spoken of in a popular song at any time after the beginning of the reign of Rehoboam, when they ceased their united festivals in Jerusalem, enjoined in the law, Ex. xxiii. 17; xxxiv. 23; Deut. xvi. 16. Testimony, the word usually so rendered, as one of the names given to the ark, Ex. xvi. 34; xxv. 16. It is also a name given to the law, Ex. xxxi. 18; xxxii. 15. See on Ps. xix. 7; on title of Ps. lx.; and introduction to Ps. cxix., No. 2. Instead of unto the testimony of Israel, Calvin reads for a testimony to Israel; Edwards, according to an injunction upon Israel; Hengstenberg, the ordinance for Israel; Alexander, (as) a testimony to Israel; Walford, according to the institution of Israel; French and Skinner, according to the testimony given unto Israel. The meaning of the phrase may be either: 1. That they went up at God's requirement; or, 2. That they went up to the city where the testimony of the Lord was. The whole verse declares Jerusalem to be the city of the solemnities of Israel. Because all right worship has in it the giving of thanks, therefore this is spoken of in this verse as the chief object of the three annual festivals.

5. For there are set thrones of judgment, the thrones of the house of David. Thrones, elsewhere seats. The plural form denotes the amplitude of the justice administered. There may be an allusion also to the perpetuity of the kingdom of David. Thus both the priestly and kingly offices of Messiah are in vv. 4, 5, brought to our notice. The temple on Mount Moriah kept alive among the people thoughts respecting the atonement to be made; and the royal authority of David and his successors pointed to the kingdom of Christ.

6. Pray for the peace of Jerusalem: they shall prosper that love thee. Peace, in Ex. xviii. 7, and elsewhere, welfare; in Ps. xxxv. 27, prosperity. In asking for the peace of the Holy City, they sought all that could make it great. The verb rendered shall prosper in the second clause is cognate to the noun rendered peace. So we might read: They shall have peace that love thee. Both the noun and the verb have evident allusion to the word Jerusalem. Some prefer however to read, May those prosper that love thee. There is no objection to this, as an inspired wish is itself a prediction.

7. Peace be within thy walls, and prosperity within thy palaces. So closely are peace and prosperity united, in states and churches, that the two words are used interchangeably; that rendered peace in this verse being masculine, and that, prosperity, feminine; but each word is rendered both ways. The walls of the Holy City quite encompassed it. This would justify the plural form without referring to the statement of Josephus that there were three ranges of walls surrounding the city; but the fact is that the Hebrew is in the singular, wall, bulwark, rampart—a term expressing the defences of the city; while palaces or courts point to the internal improvements of Jerusalem, particularly her public buildings; see on Ps. xlviii. 3, 13. The verse is a prayer that in all respects the Holy City may have the divine blessing.

8. For my brethren and companions' sakes I will now say, Peace be within thee. The whole force of the verse cannot be understood without remembering what has been already stated that Jerusalem was a type of the church both in her militant and triumphant state. It was not mere patriotism or national spirit that stirred up the prophet thus to pray :

9. Because of the house of the LORD our God, I will seek thy good. Before the sanctuary was in Jerusalem, it was to the pious Jew not half so important as Shiloh; but when it became the seat of the national worship, his interest in it was transcendent. By engaging to seek her good, he promised to do all in his power to advance her glory.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Alacrity in the worship of God and promptness in acts of devotion are essential marks of true piety, v. 1. If a converted man, who did not love the worship of God could be found, he would be such a monster as the world has never seen. "It is matter of the highest joy to the pious when they see religion flourishing." Henry: "They that rejoice in God will rejoice in calls and opportunities to wait upon him." Our zeal in the worship of God under the gospel ought to be even more fervent than that of the Jews under the old dispensation, inasmuch as the shadows have fled away, and we have the very image of the things promised.

2. It is not enough that we worship the Lord secretly, or in our families; we should seek the blessings of public worship, v. 1. Henry: "It is the will of God that we should worship him in concert; that many should join together to wait upon him in public ordinances." The liberty of public religious assemblies is of prime importance.

3. Under the gospel any place, where two or three are met together in the name of Christ, is a church, and so we need not take long journeys to the house of God. Luther: "Our Jerusalem is the church, and our temple is Christ. Wheresoever Christ is preached, and the sacraments are duly administered, there we are sure God dwells; and there is our temple, our tabernacle, our cherubim, and our mercy-seat; for there God is present with us by his word."

4. It is a great blessing to enjoy a fit and public place for the joint worship of believers; and when in his mercy God grants it, it should be most thankfully received and earnestly used for his glory and our good. Our feet shall stand within thy gates, v. 2.

5. It matters not how wicked or degraded a place may have been in former times, when it is sanctified to the use and service of God, it becomes honorable. Jerusalem was formerly Jebus—a place where the Jebusites committed their abominations, and where were all the miseries of those who hasten after another God. But now, since it is devoted to God's service, it is a city—compact together, the joy of the whole earth, v. 3.

6. The great end and aim of religious assemblies are not merely the promotion of decency and morality among men, but obedience to the command of God and the due celebration of his worship, of which thanksgiving is an important part, v. 4.

7. It is an unspeakable blessing to a nation or even to the smallest community to have justice regularly administered according to stable laws, v. 5. Where the seat of judgment is not, and every man becomes a law to himself, the evils are sad indeed.

8. It is a matter of great importance that we should be rightly affected towards the kingly office of Christ, prefigured by the throne of the house of David, v. 5. Compare Luke i. 32; Matt. xix. 28. He, who does not take Christ as King, has never taken him as prophet or priest. Zion has no greater beauty than the crown of her monarch.

9. It is a duty binding on all the friends of God to seek the union and concord of society, and especially of the church of Christ, v. 6. As the existence of factions in Jerusalem always manifested a wretched state of society, so is it in the house of God. Many seem to have forgotten that strife, and envying, and wrath, and railings, and doting about questions are always put down among the works of the flesh; and that where strife is, there is confusion and every evil work. Scott: "Union and harmony are the ornament and stability of the church on earth."

10. There is a blessing on all who truly love Zion, v. 6. Horne: "Heaven has decreed, that they who contribute their labors, as well as their prayers, to promote so good and so glorious an end shall enjoy its protection, and its blessing shall be upon the work of their hands." If we would order our prayers aright, let us always begin with pleading that the Lord would be pleased to preserve this sacred community. Dickson: "As none can pray for the welfare of the church heartily, except they love her; so none shall love her and seek her welfare, but shall fare the better for it."

11. Let every one ask, How do I feel towards the church of Christ, vv. 6-9. Do I pray for her peace and prosperity? Do I pronounce blessings upon her? How do I prove my love to the church? Do I prefer Jerusalem above my chief joy? In an important sense the church is the pillar and ground of the truth. What are we doing for Zion? Calvin: "Such as are indifferent about her condition are no less cruel than impious." Morison: "As it was in days of old, so it is now; if the world is to be spared, it is for the sake of the church."

12. If the ancient city of Jerusalem, and yet more the poor marred church of Christ on earth have such beauties in the eyes of heaven-born souls, how great must be the attractions of the heavenly Jerusalem! And "with what alacrity should we think of going to the temple above, and how cheerfully should we bear the cross while we live and welcome the stroke of death, in hopes of that immortal crown of glory?"

PSALM CXXIII.

A Song of degrees.

1 Unto thee lift I up mine eyes, O thou that dwellest in the heavens.

2 Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the LORD our God, until that he have mercy upon us.

3 Have mercy upon us, O LORD, have mercy upon us: for we are exceedingly filled with contempt.

4 Our soul is exceedingly filled with the scorning of those that are at ease, and with the contempt of the proud.

ON the title see on title of Ps. cxx. Both the authorship and occasion of this ode are involved in uncertainty. The Syriac ascribes it to David; Fry says that some Hebrew copies do the same. Patrick conjectures that it was composed by some pious person, when the King of Assyria sent Rabshakeh and others to besiege Jerusalem, pouring out contemptuous and blasphemous words against God and his people. According to this view he thinks that it is probably the prayer prepared by Isaiah at the request of Hezekiah, and offered by that king and that prophet. Compare 2 Kings xix. 4; 2 Chron. xxxii. 20; Isa. xxxvii. 4. Calvin: "It is uncertain at what time, or even by what prophet, this Psalm was composed." Edwards: "It is evident this Psalm was composed in the time of great distress; when the Jews were harassed by some haughty and insolent enemies: but who these enemies were is uncertain." Tholuck calls it, "A prayer of the whole nation in a condition of long-continued humiliation." Scott dates it B. C. 1021; Clarke affixes no date, but thinks it is a complaint of the captives in Babylon. The names of the Almighty found in it are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2.

1. Unto thee lift I up mine eyes, O thou that dwellest in the heavens. In Psalm cxxi. 1, the prophet looks to God as worshipped on the heights of Jerusalem; here, as in the heavens themselves, as his permanent abode, far above the reach and the rage of all his enemies; but able to extend relief to the sufferers in this lower world. Calvin: "These words seem to contain a tacit contrast between the troubled and confused state of this world and God's heavenly kingdom."

2. Behold, as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her mistress; so our eyes wait upon the LORD our God, until that he have mercy upon us. Several constructions are given to this language. One is that the servants and maiden are under chastisement, and are looking to the hand that corrects them. Morison: "As Jewish masters had not only the right to command, but also, in certain given cases to correct, the image here presented to our minds is that of a servant under chastisement, looking to the hand that smites, and at the same time beseeching forgiveness and a return of complacent feeling." Hengstenberg: "The hand of the masters and of the mistress can only mean the punishing hand; and the eyes are directed to it in the attitude of entreaty and supplication that the punishment may soon come to an end, and pity be shown to the miserable." With these agree Dodd and Nicolson. Another view is that the servants and maiden are in distress and are looking to their master or mistress for relief from calamities brought on them by others. This view is supported by Calvin and Cresswell. As servants often received great wrongs they looked to their masters for relief and defence. Another view, giving a good sense, is that the servants and maiden are watching the motions of the hand of the master and mistress as by some gesture they intimate their wishes. God's people adhere steadfastly to his service and resolutely study and do his will, come what may. In his letters on Egypt, Savary says: "The slaves, having their hands crossed on their chest, stand silently at the end of the hall. With their eyes fastened on their Master, they seek to anticipate his every wish." Diodati thinks that these servants look to their superiors either to be defended by them, or to receive some benefit from them. Henry thinks they look 1, to the Master's directing hand: 2, to his supplying hand; 3, to his assisting hand; 4, to his protecting hand; 5, to his correcting hand. Alexander: "Perhaps all these explanations err in being too specific, and the sense of the comparison is simply that they look with deference and trust to the superior power which controls them." It well coincides with the scope of the passage to represent the servants as desirous of learning the will and of securing the aid of superiors.

3. Have mercy upon us, O LORD, have mercy upon us: for we are exceedingly filled with contempt. Have mercy, as in Ps. li. 1. The repetition of the prayer shows its earnestness. Exceedingly, greatly, often; the same as in v. 4. Filled, when used in a good sense satisfied; the same as in v. 4. Contempt, despite, see on Ps. xxxi. 18; cxix. 22.

4. Our soul is exceedingly filled with the scorning of those that are at ease, and with the contempt of the proud. Calvin: Our soul is in itself greatly cloyed with the mockery of men who are rich, and with the contempt of the proud; Edwards: We are loaded to an intolerable degree with the scoffs of the prosperous, and the contempt of the proud. Exceedingly, filled, and contempt, the same as in v. 3. Scorning, always so, scorn, or derision. Those that are at ease are those who have little or no concern about their own state and no interest in the affairs of others. Proud, haughty, arrogant.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. As long as life lasts, it is never amiss to look to God for help and guidance, v. 1. He who permits our distresses to come upon us, can take them away, or sustain us under them, and bring good out of them. The Most High is not limited in wisdom, power, or goodness, but has all perfection. Nor does he scorn our low estate, but greatly pities us. Man may rage like a wild beast against us, but God is as gentle as he is glorious.

2. Let us not forget that we are servants of God, and not our own masters, v. 2. Our business is to please him, not ourselves; to serve him, not ourselves; to do his will, not our own; to rely on his protection, not on an arm of flesh. Tholuck: "While we look to human hands for help, hope and fear alternate." Man is weak, foolish, wicked. God is strong, wise, holy.

3. It is wise in us and obligatory on us to persevere in faith and prayer until the Lord have mercy upon us, v. 2. It is the bane of our lives that we so easily let go our hold on God and on his promises.

4. Among sinners, even penitent sinners, the cry for mercy and the plea of grace are never out of order. As long as life lasts we never make such progress as to get beyond the prayer of the publican. 'Whatever the troubles of the church are, God's mercy is a sovereign remedy.'

5. It is a blessed thing that in our severest trials brought on us by our fellow-creatures, we can appeal from man to God, from the scorning and contempt of mortals to the mercy and grace of the King eternal, immortal and invisible. Were it otherwise, our case would be sad indeed.

6. It might well set us firmly against all the arts of scorning and contempt, when we see the wicked use made of them by unbelieving, unreasonable and impious men, vv. 3, 4. They used such weapons against our Lord himself. Calvin: "When insult is added to wrongs, there is nothing which inflicts a deeper wound upon well constituted minds." Nicolson: "The sick lion in the fable found it extremely galling to be kicked by the foot of an ass." Henry: "Scorning and contempt have been, and are, and are likely to be, the lot of God's people in this world." If called to this kind of suffering, let us more than ever lift up our eyes to him that dwelleth in the heavens. Compare James v. 7-11. It is impossible that we can carry so heavy a burden by mere human strength.

7. Let us be specially watchful against carnal security and arrogance. No tempers are more hostile to the true Christian spirit, and there is a consanguinity between these sins, indeed between all the vices of the heart. Carnal men at ease are sure to be proud, v. 4.

PSALM CXXIV.

A Song of degrees of David.

1 If it had not been the LORD who was on our side, now may Israel say;

2 If it had not been the LORD who was on our side, when men rose up against us:

3 Then they had swallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled against us:

- 4 Then the waters had overwhelmed us, the stream had gone over our soul:
 5 Then the proud waters had gone over our soul.
 6 Blessed be the LORD, who hath not given us as a prey to their teeth.
 7 Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped.
 8 Our help is in the name of the LORD, who made heaven and earth.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. cxx. David is given as author by the title, Calvin, Diodati, Dodd, Henry, Morison and Hengstenberg; though the Septuagint, Syriac, Arabic, Ethiopic and Vulgate omit that part of the inscription; and Clarke expresses doubt whether it ought to be in the text. Although occasions are not wanting in the life of David suited to this particular ode, yet it is not easy, perhaps not possible to determine to what part of his history it specially refers. Scott: "It may, however, be applied to any season of special danger or distress to the church, or to believers, from which they have been beyond expectation rescued." Scott dates it B. C. 1040; Clarke, B. C. about 510. The only name of the Most High found in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. If it had not been the LORD who was on our side, now may Israel say. Calvin: But for Jehovah who was on our side, may Israel now say; Edwards: Had not Jehovah been on our side, Israel may now say. The reader will observe that several words are supplied by our translators. These doubtless give the sense; but are not necessary to our apprehension of the idea. Alexander: "The form of speech is tantamount to saying, What if the Lord had not been for us?—leaving the answer to the imagination of the reader."

2. If it had not been the LORD who was on our side, when men rose up against us. As in English so in Hebrew, the first clause is identical with the first clause of v. 1. When men rose, literally, in the rising of man, indicating the hostility, not merely of some few men or of some particular tribe, but of mankind generally. This corresponds with the history of the church in all ages. If the earth has ever helped the woman, it was not done willingly, until divine grace had sanctified the fallen nature of man; so that if Jehovah had not been the help of his people, they all might say:

3. Then they had swallowed us up quick, when their wrath was kindled against us. Swallowed, the same verb so rendered in Ps. xxi. 9; lxix. 15; cvi. 17; in Ps. lv. 9, destroy; in Prov. xix. 28, devour. Quick, not an adverb, quickly, but an adjective, alive. As greedy monsters both of the land and of the deep sometimes swallow their food before the life is out of it, so would the enemies of the church have destroyed her as in a moment, but for divine interposition. They seemed to have the power, and their violence was sufficiently aroused to make them fierce and cruel. Their wrath was kindled. Then, at that time. A thousandth part of the deadly hostility, which has been manifested against the church of God, would have exterminated any other institution ever upon earth.

4. Then the waters had overwhelmed us, the stream had gone over our soul.

5. Then the proud waters had gone over our soul. The figure expressive of destruction is in these verses different from that of the preceding. Here it is by a deluge rising above all barriers, and as it were with insolence defying all resistance overwhelming us. In both verses, then is the same as in v. 3. As the proud walk with a high head and do not easily yield to any opposition, so the waters are spoken of as proud. There is a gradation in the figures of these verses, the waters, next the stream, the proud waters. The assault had been truly dreadful, imperilling the life and the soul of God's people.

6. Blessed be the LORD, who hath not given us as a prey to their teeth. Blessed, the usual word for a benediction, see on Ps. v. 12. Prey, commonly so rendered; in Ps.

cxi. 5, meat. This verse goes to confirm the interpretation of v. 3, as referring to voracious monsters and not to the manner of destroying Korah and his company.

7. Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: the snare is broken, and we are escaped. Bird, in Ps. cii. 7, sparrow. Anderson: "As the imagery goes on, it becomes the more beautiful. Pleasing and tender ideas are associated with the escape of an innocent bird from the snares which the art and cruelty of man had contrived, to deprive it of life, or rob it of liberty." Calvin: "The amount is, that the people of God, feeble, without counsel, and destitute of aid, had not only to deal with blood-thirsty and furious beasts, but were also ensnared by bird-nets and strata-gems, so that being greatly inferior to their enemies as well in policy as in open force, they were beset by many deaths. From this it may be easily gathered that they were miraculously preserved." When God chooses he can, not only rescue his people at the time, but put it beyond the power of his enemies to do them further injury. The snare is broken.

8. Our help is in the name of the LORD who made heaven and earth. Help, usually so rendered, as in Ps. xx. 2; cxxi. 1, 2. Name of Jehovah, i. e., Jehovah himself. On the latter clause of the verse see on Ps. cxv. 15; cxxi. 2, where we have the same words.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. We cannot too often remember that none but God can save us from sins, or foes, or perils; and that he can certainly do for us all that our case requires, vv. 1, 2. He that has God for his friend and portion lacks nothing whatever.

2. We need not be surprised when men rise up against us in great numbers and with great violence, v. 2. It has often been so before. 'Man is a wolf to man.' "Even those in the church sometimes devour each other, and Christian men suffer their vindictive passions for a while to overcome their principles, an occasion for repentance and regret, and an injury to the cause of religion." Scott: "The church of God, in every age, has been opposed by multitudes of powerful, enraged, cruel enemies."

3. The power of the wicked is sometimes tremendous, and their violence frightful, v. 3. They have things very much their own way and their own way is very malignant. Sin, death and hell, men and devils do sometimes strangely combine, and for a while God seems to let them alone.

4. If the safety of the righteous depended on appearances, or on their inherent energies, or on the weakness or fewness of their adversaries, they would all perish, vv. 4, 5. In God's almightiness is the defence of all saints. His grace is all-sufficient. He can put a bridle in the mouth or a hook in the nose of the fiercest. He that made the Red sea walls, and holds the water of the ocean in the hollow of his hand, can control the progress of ungodly men. Blessed is he who is not afraid of the terrors of the wicked. Horne: "The devout Christian, whom in perilous times, and towards the close of life a gracious Providence has thrown ashore in some sequestered corner, from whence he views those secular tumults with which he hath no further concern, is perhaps arrived at the next degree of happiness to that of just spirits made perfect."

5. The wicked can use against God's people weapons which the latter dare not employ against their adversaries, such as slander, reviling, craft and deceit, v. 6. The world thinks it a fine thing to spread snares for the feet of the righteous; but the weapons of the church's warfare are not carnal. God's cause needs not the help of man's intrigues.

6. That man may well doubt his own piety, who has no heart for a grateful and devout commemoration of deliverances wrought for him by the providence and Spirit of God. If we are saved from ruin in any shape, it is wholly by a power outside of ourselves. "Greater is he that is in us, than he that is in the world." Omnipotence can break any snare. It is a shame to us that we so soon and so easily forget the deliverances wrought for us, yea, and the very perils from which we have been saved. Amesius: "The goodness of God in delivering us should never be given over to oblivion, but always commemorated with praise."

7. How uniform is history. It tells the same story from age to age—the story of man's weakness and vileness, and of God's lovingkindness and tender compassions.

8. The help of all the righteous is in the name of the Lord who made heaven and earth, v. 8. This is not a discouraging but a necessary truth. Every act of the divine care towards us should lead us so to confess. The amazing deliverances wrought by God for his chosen people both before and after their conversion demand loud and perpetual acknowledgments. The truly good man feels that he shall not be done blessing God

While life or thought or being last,
Or immortality endures.

PSALM CXXV.

A Song of degrees.

1 They that trust in the LORD shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever.

2 As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the LORD is round about his people from henceforth even for ever.

3 For the rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous; lest the righteous put forth their hands unto iniquity.

4 Do good, O LORD, unto those that be good, and to them that are upright in their hearts.

5 As for such as turn aside unto their crooked ways, the LORD shall lead them forth with the workers of iniquity: but peace shall be upon Israel.

ON the title see above on title of Psalm cxx. Scott fixes the date of this Psalm as probably B. C. about 710 years; Clarke, B. C. about 445; some others as early as the days of David. It must be admitted that neither of these views can be established. The last was more favored formerly than of late. Clarke thinks this ode may have had its occasion in the opposition of Sanballat and his associates; Scott, in the invasion of Sennacherib; others, in various events in the life of David. But all this is conjecture. Hardly any Psalm less requires an occasion to give full force to its several clauses. The only name of God found in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. They that trust in the LORD shall be as Mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever. Edwards: Those that trust in Jehovah are like mount Zion, which cannot be moved, but continues fixed for ever; Fry: They that trust in the Lord are as a mountain: Zion is not moved, Jerusalem abideth for ever; Hengstenberg: Those who trust in the Lord are as Mount Zion, which moves not, stands for ever; Doway, following some ancient versions: They that trust in the Lord shall be as mount Sion: he shall not be moved for ever that dwelleth in Jerusalem. None of these is better than the authorized version; though each of them gives the leading idea. To trust in the Lord is a favorite method of describing a true Israelite. Re- moved, or moved, as in Ps. x. 6. Abideth, dwelleth, sitteth, tarryeth, hath a fixed abode. What is here said of believers in general is true of each of them. They have stability and shall ever have it because they confide in Jehovah.

2. As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about his people from henceforth even for ever. So effectually was Jerusalem surrounded by mountains, that one prophet speaks of it as a caldron, Ezek. xi. 3. These mountains stood there from age to age. They stand there still. Yet hostile armies have often crossed them; and to this day Jerusalem is trodden down of the Gentiles. But Jehovah is a bulwark and a defence that has never failed his people. What the mountains seemed to be, the Lord is, an impregnable wall to his true people, who are not faithless but believing, sincere not hypocritical. From henceforth even for ever, literally, from now and unto eternity.

3. For the rod of the wicked shall not rest upon the lot of the righteous lest the righteous put forth their hands unto iniquity. Rod, also sceptre, tribe, Ps. xlv. 6; lxxviii. 67, 68. See on Ps. ii. 9; xxiii. 4. Here the word must mean either the rod of chastisement, or anger, whereby the wicked punished God's people, or the sceptre of political power, which as it was wielded by the wicked and in a wicked way produced great affliction, Pr. xxviii. 12; xxix. 2. These two meanings of the word are here coincident. Rest, the rod of the wicked may fall on God's people, but it shall not continue to distress them. It shall be broken, Isa. xiv. 5. Lot, always so rendered. As the Israelites received their portions in the land by lot, so lot and portion came to signify much the same thing. Compare Ps. xvi. 5; Jer. xiii. 25, where we have both words. Righteous, in both cases plural, the just, those who trust in the Lord. To put forth the hand to iniquity is to meddle with it, partake in it, or touch it, Col. ii. 21. There is a point beyond which the spirits of men would fail. The Almighty knows this, frames his providence and administers his grace accordingly, Ps. ciii. 14. Tholuck: "The non-continuance of the rod of the wicked is the consolation of the Psalmist." The rendering of the church of England misleads the reader: For the rod of the ungodly cometh not unto the lot of the righteous. It does come, but it does not stay.

4. Do good, O LORD, unto those that be good, and to them that are upright in their hearts. Like the English so the Hebrew plays upon the word good. The upright are the righteous in v. 3, those who trust in the Lord in v. 1. They are far removed from hypocrisy. Their virtue and piety are seated in their hearts. The wicked are tortuous. But God's people are straight, right, see on Ps. vii. 10.

5. As for such as turn aside unto their crooked ways, the LORD shall lead them forth with the workers of iniquity. Crooked ways, in Judges v. 6, byways. The word occurs nowhere else. It is an adjective, but so clearly requires the word ways to complete the sense, that it is not even put in italics. Those who turn aside to crooked ways are themselves doers of iniquity. To be led forth with such is to be conducted to punishment or execution with them. Chaldee: He shall lead them into hell. The verb is the causative form of the verb to walk, to go; Calvin: "The meaning is, God does not always connive at the wickedness of those who, while boasting of a hollow and counterfeit profession, wander hither and thither according to their own lust or even corrupt the simple, and draw them into the same excess of sinning with themselves." But peace shall be upon Israel, literally, peace upon Israel, i. e., peace be upon Israel. The force of such a phrase is well expressed by the future, as such an inspired petition is itself a sure prediction. The contrast is between the final punishment of the wicked, and the final prosperity of the righteous. When God shall weigh them in the balance of eternal justice, as the former rises, the latter must sink. The everlasting peace of the saints depends upon the total overthrow of the incorrigibly wicked.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. As the effect cannot be greater than the cause, so the Scriptures wisely mention adequate grounds of assurance and confidence to all the saints, vv. 1, 2. Because God is mighty, the weakest of his people are strong; because he is unchangeable, those of his people most resembling a reed shaken with the wind are stable as Mount Zion.

2. But the saints should never forget that their strength is not in themselves, vv. 1, 2. Natural talents and advantages are nothing if God forsake us, Isa. xl. 30, 31.

3. Whatever happens, let us trust in the Lord and never question either his power or faithfulness, v. 1. We are slow of heart unqualifiedly to confide. Luther: "It is much easier to learn than to believe that we who have by us the word of God and receive it, are surrounded with divine aid. If we were surrounded by walls of steel and fire, we should feel secure and defy the devil. But the property of faith is not to be proud of what the eye sees, but to rely on what the word reveals." And we must carefully distinguish between presumptuous confidence and the boldness which springs from faith unfeigned. Henry: "All that deal with God must deal upon trust, and he will give comfort to those only who give credit to him, and make it to appear they do so, by quitting other confidences and venturing to the utmost for God."

4. The protection of the saints cannot fail, because it is from the Lord, v. 2. Morison: "His perfections are ever in active exercise for their good, and while this sleepless energy is exerted on their behalf neither death nor hell can prevail against them;" Clarke: "He is above, beneath, around them; and while they keep within it, their fortress is impregnable, and they can suffer no evil."

5. Yet let us not misinterpret the promises of God. He has not engaged that his people shall not be assaulted, persecuted, tempted or sorely tried. Trouble will come, if not in one shape yet in another. One of the saddest forms is when those in power use it to the injury of the righteous. Such has often been the case, v. 8.

6. But let us never forget that the Lord is the avenger of all such, and that though the wicked may press his people hard for a season, yet they cannot destroy them. God is round about them, vv. 2, 3. Compare Esther vi. 13.

7. Let us not be cast down at conflicts in the spirit. The warfare with corruption in the heart shall not last always. No man ever perished who lived and died fighting against sin. Fight on, Christian hero. The victory shall be thine at last. Satan shall not always oppress thy spirit. By and by the Master will say, Come up higher, and the days of thy mourning shall be ended.

8. Much good does the Lord do to his own people, v. 4. He is good even to his enemies, to the unkind and the unthankful, though they are not in covenant with him. But to his own people he gives pardon, acceptance, adoption, renewal, strength, wisdom, increase of grace, eternal life and blessings which finite creatures shall not even in the ages of eternity be able duly to estimate. Luther: "The end of the poor flock of God, even though the church be proved and tried by a thousand fires and deaths, though it appear a thousand times over to be oppressed, destroyed and extirpated, is—eternal life, eternal consolation, eternal glory!"

9. But the Scriptures carefully discriminate and tell us who shall receive eternal mercies from God. Such are called Israel for their might in prayer. They trust in the Lord. They are stable in their course. They are good. They are upright. They trust not only sometimes but at all times, even in the darkest hour. They have a great dread of sin. Their fear of apostasy is a great means of preservation from it.

10. On the other hand the enemies of God are as clearly marked out. They are the wicked. They wield power for selfish ends. Their ways are crooked. They are workers of iniquity. 'They shift from one pursuit to another, and turn hither and thither to deceive; they wind about a thousand ways, to conceal their base intentions, to accomplish their iniquitous projects or to escape the punishment of their crimes.'

11. The end of such cannot but be dreadful, v. 5. Their judgment now of a long time lingereth not, and their damnation slumbereth not. As infamous crimes among men are upon conviction terribly punished on a set day and in public, so shall the wicked be led forth to execution. Henry: "The doom of those who turn aside to those crooked ways, out of the right way, will be the same with theirs who have all along walked in them; nay, and more grievous, for if any place in hell be hotter than another, that shall be the portion of hypocrites and apostates."

12. It should greatly alarm the wicked to remember that the certainty of the happiness of the saints depends upon the certainty of the overthrow of sinners, v. 5.

13. Come what will, let the righteous joy in God, who has published, "Peace, peace to him that is far off, and to him that is near; and I will heal him," Isa. lvii.

19. Because God is true, and because he is just, and because his people pray for it, peace shall be upon Israel forever.

PSALM CXXVI.

A Song of degrees.

- 1 When the LORD turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream.
- 2 Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing: then said they among the heathen, The LORD hath done great things for them.
- 3 The LORD hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad.
- 4 Turn again our captivity, O LORD, as the streams in the south.
- 5 They that sow in tears shall reap in joy.
- 6 He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him.

ON the title see on title of Psalm cxx. Scott dates this Psalm B. C. 530; Clarke, B. C. about 515. It was most probably written at a late period of Jewish history. If so, the occasion of its composition is found in the decrees and measures for the restoration from Babylon. The Syriac ascribes it to Haggai and Zechariah; others, to Ezra. Luther: "Whether it was written after the captivity, or before it, as a prophecy to comfort the Jews with the hope of deliverance, and that they should not despair, is uncertain." Whatever was its authorship, or the occasion of its composition, it was designed for the edification of the church in all coming time. Hengstenberg: "The sacred Psalmists were deeply impressed with the conviction that they sang for the church of all ages." The only name of God here found is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Psalm i. 2.

1. When the LORD turned again the captivity of Zion, we were like them that dream. Fry puts the verbs of this verse in the present tense. The Chaldee, Syriac and Arabic use the future. But the Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, church of England, Calvin, Fabritius, Venema, Amesius, Piscator, Tremellius and Junius, Edwards, Jebb, Street, Hengstenberg and Alexander, like the authorized version, have the preterite. The meaning of the first clause is, When the Lord brought back the captives. The word here rendered captivity is not the same as in v. 4. This word means return. Hengstenberg and Alexander render it the turning. Whether it be the return or the captivity, it may be taken for those returning, or for the captives. The phrase turn captivity does not necessarily express more than relief from sore distress (Ps. xiv. 7; liii. 6; lxxxv. 1;) though here it evidently refers to release from the captivity of Babylon. Although that event had been predicted and the time for it fixed by prophecy (Jer. xxv. 12; xxix. 10;) yet so deeply had the iron gone into their souls, so insolent and cruel had their oppressors become; and so little were appearances in their favor, that when God broke their bondage and set them free, the Israelites knew not how to credit the announcement; they were incredulous; the news was too good to be believed. Compare Gen. xlv. 26; Luke xxiv. 41; Acts xii. 9, 14.

2. Then was our mouth filled with laughter, and our tongue with singing. Mouth and tongue are parallel; so also are laughter and singing. The clause describes the abundant joy of the released captives. Yet was it not mirth accompanied by vain noise; but rather by tears of penitence and gratitude, Jer. l. 4, 5. They ceased not to marvel that the worshippers of the sun should show them such unsolicited kindness, seeing that they were generally hated and despised of all the Gentiles. Nor could the Chaldeans and others repress their wonder: Then said they among the heathen, The LORD hath done great things for them. When Jehovah so acts as to call forth the admiration of the very heathen, surely his people should not keep silence, but take up the song:

3. The LORD hath done great things for us; whereof we are glad. They were glad. How could it be otherwise? The conquest of Babylon by the Persians had effected a total revolution and with the happiest results to Israel.

4. Turn again our captivity, O LORD, as the streams in the south. Chaldee: Turn, O LORD, our captivity, as the earth is changed when in time of dearth the bursting out of the waters breaks forth; Edwards: Bring back our captive brethren, Jehovah, as the torrents in the south; Street: Jehovah hath restored us from our captivity, as he restoreth the torrents in the dry country; Walford: Bring back all our captives, O Jehovah, like the streams of the south. In explanation three remarks are offered: 1. Whether we read south or dry place will not alter the sense, as the country, in the southern portions of Palestine, as well as in Arabia, is subject to long-continued heat, which dries up the rivers. When the abundant periodical rains come, the streams again swell, the thirsty soil is refreshed, and the land is again covered with green. 2. There were several decrees made by the conquerors of Babylon and their successors respecting the return of the Jews to the holy land. The first of these seems to have released all the captives, and to have awakened a spirit of inquiry, but to have sent comparatively few of the Jews to the holy land. Those, who first returned, seeing their own weakness, and remembering the privations of their brethren, greatly desired their return. So the word captivity is best taken for captives, and the meaning is, Bring back our captive brethren. 3. There is no inconsistency between verses 1 and 4, the former speaking of the release of the captives and of their partial restoration; the latter, of their general and full return, so as to swell the population like the streams in the rainy season.

5. They that sow in tears shall reap in joy. Of no class of figures of speech are the writers of both Testaments more fond than of those drawn from husbandry, and particularly from sowing and reaping. This verse sounds much like a proverb. It suits all times and occupations. It is fulfilled in nature, in social life, in political affairs, and in the experience of God's people, Heb. xii. 11. "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone: but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit," John xii. 24. Alexander: "The figures are natural and common ones for means and end, or for the beginning and issue of any undertaking." The figure may have force from the supposition that grain was scarce and bread hard to get; yet what could the husbandman do but take part or most of what he had and bury it in the ground, not certainly knowing that he would ever get any return, but confiding in the general arrangement of providence that he that sows shall reap?

6. He that goeth forth and weepeth, bearing precious seed, shall doubtless come again with rejoicing, bringing his sheaves with him. Chaldee: Going he shall go with weeping, bearing a draft of seed corn; coming he shall come with singing of hymns when he shall bring back his sheaves; Arabic: They shall go going forth full of weeping, bearing their seeds; but returning they shall come with exultation bearing their fruits. Hallelujah. Variations, not dissimilar to the above, are found in other translations. Precious, found only here and in Job xxviii. 18, where it is rendered price. Our translators and others seem to have thought that the meaning was, the seed is very valuable, first perhaps because of its scarcity, and then because of its productiveness. But not a few suppose that the word rendered precious designates the vessel or sack, in which the seed is carried by the sower. So Abenezra, the margin and Street. But as the word rendered precious is cognate to the verb rendered to draw out or scatter, some prefer to render it a drawing forth of seed, carrying seed, sowing seed. If this Psalm specially refers to the restoration of the Jews, it quite falls in with the historic account given in Ezra vi. 22; Neh. xii. 43.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. God's true servants may be in great affliction, and endure the rigors of captivity, v. 1. Jehovah has not promised that the outward state of Zion shall be always pleasant, and the foot of pride never be put upon her neck.

2. Wonders will never cease. Rapid changes are often occurring and awaking the surprise of men, vv. 1-3. God's thoughts and ways are wholly diverse from ours. We know not the heights and depths of his counsels. Because he is wonderful in working, we cannot but be startled at his doings.

3. "The hand of God should be acknowledged in all our mercies, whoever be the instrument of them," vv. 1-3. If God save us by Cyrus, it is no less his deliverance than if he sent Samson, Jephtha, Ehud or David to our help. It was the Lord that turned the captivity of his people and did great things.

4. The greatest wonders and deliverances that God ever works are in his church, vv. 1-3. He loves her better, he has more glorious purposes respecting her, he has given a greater ransom for her, than can be claimed for all the world beside. "There is a special eminence in the Lord's working for his people." The conversion of the soul from sin to holiness is itself a greater wonder of mercy than God ever works for the unbelieving world. Indeed the whole work of redemption is so stupendous, in its scheme, execution and application, that to eternity God's people will not cease to admire it. How can the poor sinner, saved by grace, snatched as a brand from the eternal burning, ever cease to celebrate the amazing love of God and the wonders he has wrought?

5. If Israel properly rejoiced in deliverance from Babylonish captivity, how much more ought the church to give thanks when from bondage to the world God rescues her and raises her up from a dying to a lively state. A genuine revival of religion is a great blessing.

6. So marvellous are the deliverances sometimes wrought for God's people that even sinners themselves can but notice these great things done by Jehovah, v. 2.

7. Although at the beginning, the saints are ready to doubt the mercies shown them, yet in time skepticism will give way to gratitude; and he, that was struck dumb with wonder, will proclaim the divine glory in showing him such mercy.

'When the people of God find that they are not mocked with illusions, but that all about them is reality and truth; then sorrow and sighing, fear and distrust fly away together,' v. 3.

8. Spiritual mercies, when once received, invariably whet the desire of the righteous for still other bounties of God's grace; and the 'beginnings of mercy are encouragements to us to pray for the completing of it,' v. 4.

9. Nothing is too hard for God. The land may be all parched and the water courses all dried up, but he can soon make the streams overflow their banks, v. 4. The plants of righteousness may all droop and seem ready to die; but he with whom is the residue of the Spirit can revive his work, and reanimate and reassure his people.

10. Let not believers sink into despondency or inefficiency through discouragements, however many and pressing they may be, vv. 5, 6. It is a saying of a man of great spiritual wisdom: "So far as I have observed the course of God's providence with me, such of my labors as have been performed in the greatest straits, and under the greatest difficulties, have had the happiest issue." After the night of weeping comes the morning of joy. There is no more precious fruit gathered from earth than that which springs from seed sown in tears, and pain, and sighing, and persecution. Yet how often do we misinterpret providence and question the divine faithfulness? Luther: "We infants in grace, we poor little children, under our tears and our sighs, understand not the voice, or the mind, or the will of our heavenly Father in these afflictions." It was hard for Israel to believe that God was fulfilling his promise, Isaiah lxvi. 20.

11. If such great things are done to the true Israel of God on earth, what may we not expect in the next world, where glory shall take the place of grace, and victory of conflict? Then preëminently, "the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away," Isa. xxxv. 10.

12. But O how sad will be the state of those who, having never accepted the proffered grace of the Gospel, were content to have all their good things in this life; who, having sowed to the flesh, shall of the flesh reap corruption; who having rejoiced and laughed a few days here go to an eternity, where nothing awaits them but weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth.

PSALM CXXVII.

A Song of degrees for Solomon.

1 Except the LORD build the house, they labour in vain that build it: except the LORD keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain.

2 It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows: for so he giveth his beloved sleep.

3 Lo, children are a heritage of the LORD: and the fruit of the womb is his reward.

4 As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man; so are children of the youth.

5 Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them: they shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gate.

ON a song of degrees see on title of Ps. cxx. We may read for Solomon or of Solomon. The form of the Hebrew is just the same as in Ps. lxxii.; yet in most cases we render the preposition of not for. Some read for Solomon because they think

David wrote this ode and addressed it to his son; and because with Kimchi they think that here, as in Ps. lxxii., Solomon is a type of Messias. The Syriac ascribes it to David concerning Solomon, and concerning Haggai and Zechariah. Henry regards David as the author. Gill inclines to the same opinion. But the Chaldee, Vulgate, Calvin, Venema, Edwards, Pool, Jebb, Dodd, Street, Scott, Hengstenberg, Tholuck, and Alexander confidently speak of Solomon as the author. Calvin: "There is no reason why the Jews should deny that this Psalm was composed by Solomon;" Pool: "There is nothing in this Psalm, which gives us just ground to question whether Solomon was the author of it or no." Solomon wrote a thousand and five songs, 1 Kings iv. 32. This may be one of them. Yet Amesius, Piscator, Tremellius and Junius regard it as written for Solomon; and Mudge says that there seems to be no other reason for regarding Solomon as the author, except that it speaks of building a house. Clarke thinks it was most likely composed for the building of the second Temple, and by some prophet of that time. The general aim of this ode is to repress worldly cares, and to inspire pious trust in God. Venema: "Its scope is to withdraw men from excessive labors and anxious cares, but to inspire piety and trust in Jehovah;" Edwards: "The design of it is to inculcate this most certain and very useful maxim, That the success of all our undertakings entirely depends upon God's blessing;" Hengstenberg: "Everything is dependent upon the blessing of God." Some argue Solomon's authorship from the fact that the whole ode is but an expansion of that saying of his: "The blessing of the Lord, it maketh rich," Pr. x. 22. But the same sentiment abounds in the utterances of true piety. See Ps. xxxvii. 22; cvii. 38; cxiii. 7, 8, and many places. Scott dates this Psalm B. C. 1012; Clarke, B. C. about 445. The only name of God in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. Except the LORD build the house, they labor in vain that build it. To build a house has in Scripture these significations: 1. To erect a material structure for public or private use. Thus the Jews built dwellings for themselves, Deut. xxviii. 30; Jer. xxix. 5. Thus David proposed to build the temple, 2 Sam. vii. 5; and Solomon actually built it, 2 Chron. ii. 1. 2. To build a house is to found and rear a family, Deut. xxv. 9. This family sometimes becomes large, even a tribe; and so we read of the houses of Judah, of Levi. 3. To build a house is to found a state or kingdom, either by being the progenitors of the people composing it, or by political measures, or by strengthening it, Ruth iv. 11. Compare 2 Sam. vii. 12-16; Ps. cxxii. 5. When God blows upon an enterprise, it is sure to fail. The whole world was engaged in building Babel, but it ended in confusion. David was intently bent on building the temple, but God permitted him not to proceed. Saul hoped to see his family established in the throne of Israel; but God's mind was otherwise. God is no less the Father of nations than of men, Gen. xvii. 6; Deut. xxxii. 8; Ps. xxii. 28. He founds tribes and states, and destroys them at his pleasure, Deut. vii. 1; xii. 29. "By me kings reign, and princes decree justice," Pr. viii. 15. Compare Ecc. ix. 11. Build is in the future; labor, in the preterite. The labor here spoken of is that which begets weariness. The cognate noun is rendered trouble, misery, travail. Street's rendering is nearly literal: If Jehovah build not an house, in vain do the builders of it labor on it. The prophet reiterates the leading truth of the Psalm: Except the Lord keep the city, the watchman waketh but in vain. The tenses of the verbs are the same as in the first clause. Watchman is closely cognate to keep. Augustine and Tholuck extend the meaning of this clause to embrace God's ministers, who teach his truth and watch for souls in the city of God. Waketh, a verb expressive of great diligence and vigilance, Pr. viii. 34; Jer. xxxi. 28; Dan. ix. 14. Compare Isa. lii. 8; Ezek. iii. 17. Titus himself was surprised at his own capture of Jerusalem, and ascribed his victory to providence. In vain do faithful pastors labor till God vouchsafe his blessing on the church, 1 Cor. iii. 7. In every undertaking God is not merely our chief but our sole dependence.

2. It is vain for you to rise up early, to sit up late, to eat the bread of sorrows: for so he giveth his beloved sleep. John Rogers' translation: It is but lost labour that ye rise up early, and take no rest, but eate the bredde of carefulnesse; for, like to whom it pleaseth him, he giveth it in slepe; Calvin: It is in vain for you in hastening to rise early, to go late to rest, to eat the bread of sorrows: for thus will he give sleep to his beloved; Street: It is in vain for you early risers to rise from rest, eating the bread of care, when he giveth to his beloved double. Vain, vanity, in v. 1, twice rendered in vain. It is the same word used in the third commandment, a noun masculine. We met it in Ps. xii. 2. The first three verbs cannot be better translated, than in the authorized version, unless we render the last literally, eating. The bread of sorrows is bread procured in labors and griefs. The last clause of the verse is not explained alike by all. These remarks are offered: 1. The rendering of Street double for sleep requires a change in the Hebrew text, resting wholly on conjecture, and so cannot be received. 2. It is not the design of God here to inculcate sloth or a neglect of the lawful arts of industry. This would contradict many clear Scriptures in both Testaments. 3. Instead of so or thus, it is better with Walford to read truly: He truly granteth sleep to his beloved. Scott: Surely, he giveth his beloved sleep. Calvin says the Hebrew particle "is put to express certainty." 4. When God sentenced man to labor for life, he did not enjoin care and toil destructive of necessary repose, and so "the sleep of the labouring man is sweet, whether he eat little or much," Ecc. v. 12. God does not require us to kill ourselves, or fret ourselves to death, but only to use lawful industry, and then with quiet confidence in his providence to lie down and sleep. The divine blessing and not our foresight secures success. God is as merciful in giving us sleep, as he is righteous in requiring labor. And he shows his care for us by causing our crops to grow and our affairs to prosper, even while we sleep. 5. The word rendered beloved is Jedidiah, a name given to Solomon by inspiration because the Lord loved him, 2 Sam. xii. 24, 25, and so it may design to celebrate God's goodness to Solomon, who though he had on hands vast plans and immense public works, found them all prospering, although he fretted not himself about them, but was blessed with necessary and refreshing sleep. 6. What God did to Solomon he does to each of his beloved people, according to their faith and reliance on his providence.

3. Lo, children are a heritage of the LORD: and the fruit of the womb is his reward. The meaning is that the very offspring, for whom men are often so anxious to provide, are themselves the gift of God, an inheritance from the Lord, the reward of his love and kindness to men; and if God give us children, he will make provision for them. Having done the greater, he will do the less. The fruit of the womb is a name given to offspring in the earliest sacred writings, Gen. xxx. 2; Deut. vii. 13. Piety loves devoutly to acknowledge the bounty of God in the gift of children, Gen. xxxiii. 5; xlviii. 9.

4. As arrows are in the hand of a mighty man; so are children of the youth. By children of the youth, some understand young persons; others, more correctly, children born when their father was young, so that as his vigor declines, they may be ready to support and defend him. Mighty man, see on Ps. xix. 5, where it is rendered a strong man; compare Ps. lxxviii. 65. It often refers to great warriors. "Merrick mentions a remarkable Chinese proverb: 'When a son is born into a family, a bow and arrow are hung before the gate.'" Men live their lives over again in their children and grandchildren.

5. Happy is the man that hath his quiver full of them; they shall not be ashamed, but they shall speak with the enemies in the gate. Happy, in Ps. i. 1, blessed; O the blessednesses! A quiver full of arrows is no mean representation of the protection an old man has in a numerous offspring of virtuous children established in an unblemished reputation. In ancient cities courts were held and causes decided at the gates. See on Ps. lxxix. 12. Here by their well earned characters even more than by their numbers they were able to repel rude assaults on themselves and on their venerated father. By uprightness and wisdom and a good conversation they became a tower of strength to protect his feebleness. Alexander: "For a striking contrast to this picture, see Job v. 4." Nicolson supposes that they refers to the parent and not the children.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Because the maintenance of a deep sense of dependence on God is very difficult yet very important, the Scriptures often present the matter in a clear and urgent manner, vv. 1-3. Let all persons, families, churches, cities and states remember that God is Judge of all, that whom he will he exalts and whom he will he puts down. All human plans fail without him. In man is no inherent efficiency. Forsaken by God, the bravest become cowards, the strongest are weak as water, the most careful fail, and the wise are fools. Compare Hab. ii. 13; Mal. i. 4.

2. Those do therefore sadly sin against God who ascribe their success or prosperity to human wit, power, or perseverance, vv. 1-3. Man is a worm. Man is a fool. Man is a sinner.

3. Nor do those less err who claim to rely on God and yet neglect or slight the means he has ordained for our success, vv. 1, 2. The true Christian works as if he believed not, and believes as if he wrought not.

4. Dickson: "The only way of having a quiet mind and good success, is to use the means without anxiety, and to commit the success to God, v. 2." Rising early, sitting up late, rigid economy, extraordinary efforts and great sorrow of heart at failure may wear us away, but can never take the place of God.

5. The violation of the previous principles is quite sufficient to account for a great portion of the unhappiness, personal, family, social, commercial and political of every age and country. Compare Hag. i. 6.

6. Were our gratitude what it ought to be, each season of refreshing rest would be followed by a song of praise, v. 2. The convalescent or the suffering sick sometimes duly notice such a mercy; but how many millions sleep and wake like atheists!

7. States and nations ought humbly to acknowledge the good hand of God upon them. Luther: "All governments and commonwealths rightly constituted are the good and free gifts of God: none of them can be either rightly constituted, at the first, nor preserved afterwards, by any human wisdom or might: but all these things are in the hand of God." Calvin: "When philosophers argue concerning the political affairs of a state they ingeniously gather together whatever seems to them to answer their purpose—they acutely point out the means of erecting a commonwealth, and on the other hand the vices by which a well-regulated state is commonly corrupted; in short, they discourse with consummate skill upon everything that is necessary to be known on this subject, except that they omit the principal point—which is, that men, however much they may excel in wisdom and virtue, and whatever may be the undertaking in which they may engage, can effect nothing, unless in so far as God stretches forth his hand to them, or rather makes use of them as his instruments."

8. We are no less dependent on God for our domestic happiness and success, v. 3. Children themselves will but wring our hearts with anguish, except as God leads them in the paths of peace and virtue. "Children are to us what God makes them, comforts or crosses." How foolish and criminal are those persons, who having not learned to govern themselves, yet complain of Providence for denying them children. And how base are those parents who having received the gift of children, regard them as a burden, and doubt the divine kindness in providing for them. "Wherever God sends mouths he sends meat."

9. It is an unspeakable blessing when God gives us children that he rightly disposes them to such courses of conduct as are suited to make them blessings to us and to the world, v. 4. As they are by nature depraved, nothing short of divine power and grace can so mould their hearts and manners as to make them real blessings. How they are such, even uninspired men have sometimes seen. See what the son of Sirach said in Ecclus. xxx. 3-6.

10. If the right interpretation is commonly given to the phrase children of youth, this Psalm greatly encourages early marriages. It is a growing evil of modern times that marriages are so often deferred till it is highly improbable that in the course of nature the father can live to mould his offspring to habits of honor and virtue.

PSALM CXXVIII.

A Song of degrees.

1 Blessed is every one that feareth the LORD; that walketh in his ways.

2 For thou shalt eat the labour of thine hands: happy shalt thou be, and it shall be well with thee.

3 Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house: thy children like olive plants round about thy table.

4 Behold, that thus shall the man be blessed that feareth the LORD.

5 The LORD shall bless thee out of Zion: and thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem all the days of thy life.

6 Yea, thou shalt see thy children's children, and peace upon Israel.

ON the title see on title of Psalm cxx. Commentators are remarkably silent respecting the authorship of this Psalm. We find no historic occasion for its composition. Scott dates it B. C. 1012; Clarke, B. C. about 445. Some regard it as a sequel to Ps. cxxvii.; and it does to some extent treat of the same matters. Hengstenberg speaks of "the flat and broken discourse of this Psalm and its want of vigor and elevation." But where do we find a description of domestic happiness superior to this in beauty and brevity? Luther styles it "A wedding song for Christians." Henry says that "this is a Psalm for families." Patrick: "Some think that this was a form prescribed to be used at the blessing of their marriages, when they wished the new married couple all manner of happiness, especially a long life in peaceable times." It contains great and universal truths seasonable for all occasions, and having a wide range of comprehension. The only name of God found in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. Blessed is every one that feareth the LORD; that walketh in his ways. Blessed, in Ps. cxxvii. 5, happy, O the blessednesses! On the nature of the true fear of God see on Ps. ii. 11. On the import of the term walking, see on Ps. i. 1. Alexander: "However things may seem now to an eye of sense, it is still a certain truth, that the truly happy man is he who fears Jehovah, not in mere profession, but who testifies his fear of him by walking in his ways or doing his commandments." "The triumph of the wicked is short," is the Scriptural explanation of all appearances of success in sin.

2. For thou shalt eat the labor of thine hands: happy shalt thou be, and it shall be well with thee. In Ps. i. it is said: "Whatsoever he doeth shall prosper;" in this it is said, his labor shall be remunerative. Labor is expressive of real toil. See on Ps. lxxviii. 46; cix. 11. Happy, in v. 1, blessed. It shall be well with thee, literally, good (is) to thee. The promise of temporal prosperity shall be so far fulfilled as may not conflict with the higher interests of the soul. Yet the Lord does not engage to supply the insatiable cupidity of the human heart; but to give his blessing on lawful industry. The second person singular is used in this verse and in those which follow, as if the truth were addressed to each believer in person.

3. Thy wife shall be as a fruitful vine by the sides of thine house: thy children like olive plants round about thy table. The figures of this verse are best explained as indicating not the mode of cultivating the vine and the olive in Judea; but as the vine and the olive yielded the greatest refreshment and were emblems of the greatest gladness; so here they are put for the exquisite delights flowing to a good man through his wife and children. If the fruit of the olive and of the vine failed in Judea, it was commonly a token of the total failure of crops, both of grain and fruit. A good wife makes large contributions to the good cheer of the household. Olive plants are not kept in the house, but the terms mean that a well-ordered family of children has a refreshing beauty like that of thrifty olive plants. They impart the oil of gladness. See on Ps. lii. 8. Round about, the same as in Ps. cxxv. 2. Let those worldlings, who have great outward prosperity, and scorn the spiritual blessings of the Gospel remember that they alone are not blessed with temporal good things, that it is God's blessing on what we have that makes us truly happy, and that God never promised to put his people off with the good things of this life, but has provided for them something better, even a heavenly inheritance.

4. Behold, that thus shall the man be blessed that feareth the LORD. God's care of his people, even of the poorest, humblest and most afflicted, has often been such as to impress the wicked themselves, Esther vi. 13. Thus, better rendered surely. Blessed, not the word in v. 1, but that of benediction. See on Ps. v. 12. That feareth, as in v. 1. The verse teaches that all real happiness comes to us by the authority and power of Jehovah.

5. The LORD shall bless thee out of Zion: and thou shalt see the good of Jerusalem all the days of thy life. The first verb of this verse is in the future, the second in the imperative. Some put them both in the imperative; but the authorized version gives the sense better by using the future in both cases. Zion was the seat of God's visible kingdom over Israel. From it the Jews expected national and personal blessings. There too was the centre of the visible church, as well as of the affections of the truly pious touching earthly ordinances. The good of Jerusalem is the prosperity of the holy city and especially of the true religion, whose rites were celebrated in Jerusalem.

6. Yea, thou shalt see thy children's children, and peace upon Israel. Calvin: "With good reason the prophet recommends solicitude about the public welfare; and he mingles together domestic blessings and the common benefits of the church in such a way as to show us that they are things joined together, and which it is unlawful to put asunder." Compare the general promises of this Psalm respecting temporal blessings with Ps. i. 3; xxxvii. 3; xci. 16.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Though in the esteem of many true piety is without solid advantages, yet God's word and people have decided quite otherwise. This whole Psalm contradicts the slander of such as deny that godliness is profitable. God's people get not their portion here; but they obtain foretastes of heaven in God's blessing on their basket and store, on their souls and on their families. Nor is there an exception to this remark.

2. The fear of God is an element in true piety, vv. 1, 4. It is so essential that God's servants should fear him, that often, as here, this one grace is made to represent the whole of religion.

3. The genuine fear of God is not taught by human authority, nor enforced by human sanctions, but only by the laws and ways of Jehovah, v. 1.

4. The fear of God which has no torment in it, and which is commended in Scripture, evinces itself by a holy life, a walk according to God's requirements, v. 1.

5. In no sense do the humble find their labors in vain in the Lord. As in husbandry so in all works undertaken in the fear of God, they shall have such success as shall show that the blessing of God is on them, v. 2. It is a great mercy that God's people have something to do in life, and a still greater, when like their Saviour each one can say: "I have glorified thee on the earth: I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do," John xvii. 4. There is indeed a curse resting on the toil which God exacts of man; but the fear of God goes far towards converting that curse into a blessing. Countless have been the devices of men to resist the law of labor. The most successful in this daring enterprise have commonly been the most unhappy.

6. Whatever judgment carnal men may pronounce upon a life of piety, those who have grace to glorify God on the earth, both know and testify that it is well with them, v. 2.

7. Strike out of the sum total of human happiness that, which is fairly to be ascribed to the relations of husband and wife, parent and child, brother and sister, and there would be a hideous chasm. Luther: "Marriage is that kind of life, which, as being the creation and institution of God greatly pleases him;" Calvin: "If a man has a wife of amiable manners as the companion of his life, let him set no less value upon this blessing than Solomon did, who affirms that it is God alone who gives a good wife, Prov. xix. 14. In like manner, if a man be a father of a numerous offspring, let him receive that boon with a thankful heart;" Horne: "Marriage was ordained by God to complete the felicity of man in a state of innocency; and the benediction of Heaven will ever descend upon it, when undertaken in the fear of the Lord;" Scott: "Marriage is peculiarly honorable and blessed to him, who enters it in the fear of God and desires to walk with his family according to his will." Let this institution be preserved in its scriptural purity. Otherwise society will be fearfully corrupted, if not dissolved.

8. It cannot be that a true child of God should fail to love the church, v. 5. He was born in Zion. There God first revealed himself to the soul. Thence spring all his best hopes. Nor has he any choice blessing but such as is in some way connected with the company of the faithful.

9. It is a great mercy bestowed upon God's people when they are allowed to see the church prosper, and good come upon Jerusalem, especially such a blessing as is manifestly for her growth and purification, v. 5.

10. While a long life spent in sin will in the end but enhance the misery of those who die in their iniquity; a long life spent in the fear of God and graciously bestowed for holy ends and purposes, agreeably to God's promise is one of the greatest temporal blessings, v. 6.

11. As the arts of war are very destructive of life and property and all that men commonly hold most dear; so peace is in the Scriptures used as the sum of many choice blessings. To Israel such a term had peculiar significance. Thrice in the year that people went up to the Holy City to perform their sacrifices. In all their generations Jehovah allowed not their foes to disturb the peace of the nation at such times.

12. Some interpret the last clause of the Psalm as prophetic. One of the most pleasing things discoverable in some of God's aged servants is their wonderful love of the church increasing as their salvation draws nigh. Sometimes they show an inextinguishable thirst for that kind of knowledge which is derived from looking into unfulfilled predictions. Let them be encouraged modestly to pursue such studies, 2 Pet. i. 19.

PSALM CXXIX.

A Song of degrees.

- 1 Many a time have they afflicted me from my youth, may Israel now say:
- 2 Many a time have they afflicted me from my youth: yet they have not prevailed against me.
- 3 The ploughers ploughed upon my back: they made long their furrows.
- 4 The LORD is righteous: he hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked.
- 5 Let them all be confounded and turned back that hate Zion.
- 6 Let them be as the grass upon the housetops, which withereth afore it groweth up:
- 7 Wherewith the mower filleth not his hand; nor he that bindeth sheaves his bosom.
- 8 Neither do they which go by say, The blessing of the LORD be upon you: we bless you in the name of the LORD.

ON the title see on title of Ps. cxx. As in the last Psalm, so here the authorship is quite uncertain, very few venturing even a conjecture on the subject. The opinion of commentators is divided as to the time of its composition. Scott: "It is not improbably conjectured that this Psalm was composed about the time when Sennacherib invaded Judah; yet this is no more than conjecture." Clarke admits that "the author is uncertain," but seems confident that it "was written after the captivity." We can affix neither date nor author. The only name of God in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2. The general scope of the Psalm is obvious. The first part rehearses the trials of the chosen people, especially in their early history, and their deliverances from those who tormented them. The latter part is a prediction of the dreadful end of God's enemies.

1. Many a time have they afflicted me from my youth, may Israel now say. Many a time, in Hebrew one word; margin, much. In Psalm cxxiii. 3, 4, it is twice rendered exceedingly. Edwards here has greatly; Morison, very sorely. The Doway, Calvin and Hengstenberg, often; Street, frequently; church of England and Alexander and most agree with our version. Afflicted, vexed, distressed, oppressed, shut up, see Num. xxxiii. 55; 1 Sam. xxviii. 15; Num. x. 9; 2 Sam. xx. 3. In some of its forms it is rendered besieged. By the youth of Israel we are to understand the chosen people in their early history, see Isa. xlvii. 12, 15; Jer. ii. 2; xxii. 21; xlviii. 11; Ezek. xvi. 4; xxiii. 3; Hos. ii. 15; xi. 1. Now, Calvin regards this word as emphatic and implying a state of deep distress, or dismay at the time of writing. But Alexander is confident that it is optative, and reads, oh let Israel say. Street has Israel may truly say. However read the verse is a virtual call on the church to remember early trials.

2. Many a time have they afflicted me from my youth: a verbal repetition of what was said in v. 1, indicating the desire of the prophet that all may be duly impressed with the lessons of history. Yet they have not prevailed against me. Prevailed, as in Ps. xiii. 4. This cannot teach that the enemies of Israel never gained a temporary advantage, never succeeded in bringing great distresses on God's people. It can only mean that apparent victories gained did not result, as enemies hoped, in the destruction of the chosen nation. Foes were not able to do what they proposed. Calvin: "They never succeeded in realizing their wishes, God having always disappointed their hopes and baffled their attempts."

3. The ploughers ploughed upon my back; they made long their furrows. Ploughers, ploughed, the plural participle and the preterite of the same verb. There is no better rendering. Street: They have cut furrows on my back: they have made long ridges, like those of ploughed ground. The meaning is that they have had no pity—have stopped at nothing. Some explain by making the prophet allude to the terrible process of scourging, when the flesh was cut and gashed, and subsequently rose into wales. But may not the reference be to the process of ploughing ground, when it is torn up and cut without mercy, sparing nothing? Calvin: "He compares the people of God to a field through which a plough is drawn. He says that the furrows were made long, so that no corner was exempted from being cut up by the ploughshare." Walford: "The persecutors of Israel are compared to ploughmen; because as they cut up, and as it were torture the surface of the earth, so did the adversaries greatly and grievously distress these afflicted people." Pool's paraphrase is: "They have not only thrown me down, and trod me under foot, but have cruelly tormented me, wounded and mangled me, and had no more pity upon me than the ploughman hath upon the earth which he cuts up at his pleasure." Such cruelty and wickedness may be rampant for a while, but cannot last always.

4. The LORD is righteous. The emblem of justice among some of the ancients was a lame but strong man armed with a sword. He came slowly to his work, but he did it thoroughly at last. So divine rectitude long forbears, but it finally renders powerless for evil the greatest persecutors. Compare 2 Thess. i. 6, 7. He hath cut asunder the cords of the wicked. Cords, in Hebrew singular. Wicked, in Ps. i. the same word is several times rendered ungodly. Several explanations are offered. One makes the reference to be to the cord used in scourging. Another makes it refer to the cord used in binding the victim for scourging. A third supposes that the cord here spoken of is that used in ploughing, to attach the oxen to the plough, the gear of the team. The first view is favored by Horne and Hengstenberg; the second, by Scott and Morison; the third, by Luther, Calvin, Gill, Pool, Henry, Tholuck and Alexander. Whatever may be the foundation of the figure, there is no doubt that the general sense of the passage is that God effectually put it out of the power of the persecutors to do his people further harm. There seems to be no other cause for applying this and the preceding verse to Christ than that he above all others received cruel treatment, even to scourging and death, being preëminently the Man of sorrows.

5. Let them all be confounded and turned back that hate Zion. Confounded, in Ps. cxxvii. 5, and often elsewhere ashamed. Turned back, in Ps. xl. 14, driven backward. Both the verbs are in the future, shall be confounded and turned. The verse is not an imprecation but a prophecy both in form and in fact. The wicked shall surely, though reluctantly, cease their cruel practices. Compare Ps. vi. 10; xxxv. 3.

6. Let them be as the grass upon the housetops, which withereth afore it groweth up.

7. Wherewith the mower filleth not his hand; nor he that bindeth sheaves his bosom.

8. Neither do they which go by say, The blessing of the LORD be upon you: we bless you in the name of the LORD. Like the preceding, this also is a prediction. Let them be, literally, They shall be. So the Genevan translation has it. The housetops in Judea were flat, and covered with some kind of cement; and sometimes grass sprung up and for a while looked green and flourishing, but having no depth of earth, and lacking moisture and being exposed to great heat, it soon withered. It never attained maturity. Neither the mower nor the binder ever went there. Alexander: "The word translated bosom is explained by lexicographers to mean, the front fold of the oriental robe, in which things are carried. It might also be translated lap. Hengstenberg's version is his arm." Verse 8 alludes to a custom prevalent in early times, and still in use in parts of Asia: "And behold, Boaz came from Bethlehem, and said unto the reapers, The Lord be with you; and they answered him, The Lord bless thee," Ruth ii. 4. Cobbin: "The meaning here poetically expressed is, Let them be destroyed, as that which is useless, which affords neither the plenty nor the joy of harvest." John Rogers' Translation of v. 6, is: Let them be even as the haye upon the house toppes, whych wythereth afore it be pluckte up.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Let God's people never forget that the saints of all ages have been afflicted, maligned and persecuted, vv. 1, 2. The burning bush, wrapped in flames but not consumed, is a fit emblem of God's church in all ages. A thousand times has it looked to the eye of sense and reason as if the people of God would soon be extirpated. There never has been a time when the wicked loved the righteous.

2. But let not the people of God be afraid with any amazement, nor yield to thoughts of despondency. The church shall not perish, nor shall her enemies gain a final or decisive advantage over her, v. 2. They have the will, but they have not the power. They make the war, but they cannot prevail.

3. The want of success in the war on the church has not been owing to any scrupulous or delicate feeling on the part of her enemies. Persecutors have always been cruel. They have plowed the back of the church and made long their furrows, v. 3. Lying, reviling, slander, blasphemy, whipping, scourging, burning, hanging, crucifying, casting to the wild beasts, and every conceivable form of cruelty has been exhausted from age to age in trying to erase from the earth the last vestige of true piety. The bottomless pit can hardly contain beings more cruel or malignant than some who at sundry times have walked the earth; nor are they without an offspring to this present.

4. It is fatal however to the cause of cruelty and persecution that God's righteousness endureth forever, v. 4. Because his throne is established in equity and plenty of justice, all wicked schemes must prove utter failures.

5. Nor is God deficient in power, but limits and restrains the malice of the wicked when he chooses, and strips them both of the ability and means to do his people further harm, v. 4. Oftentimes this has been so apparent and striking that spectators who were not taught of God at all have greatly wondered.

6. Although to the righteous the career of enemies may seem to be long and their prosperity great, yet shame, confusion and consternation shall come upon all incorrigible sinners, and especially upon impenitent persecutors, v. 5.

7. Even in this world and in the height of their success, the haters of Zion manifest signs of inherent weakness. Like grass on the housetop, they have no sufficient supply of nourishment, v. 6. They have no access to God by prayer, no communion with the Father of their spirits. They know nothing of the comfort of love, of the patience of hope, or of the joy of salvation. One blasting wind may wither them forever. Hammond: "Instead of a prosperous harvest of all their oppressions and injustices, they shall reap nothing but emptiness and beggary."

8. It could not be otherwise. They have no resources in God. Separated from him, man can no more be wise, or strong, or great, than a human arm, severed from its body can flourish. They may indeed flourish like the grass, but like the grass they shall soon wither. Therefore "the prosperous success of the ungodly ought not to agitate the faith of the pious."

9. There is one very dark sign in the case of the wicked—their uselessness. They are of no more value than the grass on the housetop, v. 7. The Scriptures dwell much on this point. The whole of Ezek. xv. is employed in showing the uselessness and consequent ruin of the wicked. Paul states it at length in a fearful comparison in Heb. vi. 7, 8. Amesius: "No solid fruit can be either collected or expected from the way and exertions of the ungodly."

10. Another very dark sign in the case of all the wicked is that they receive no efficacious blessing from God; nor have they the approbation of the angels, nor the complacency of good men. The righteous may indeed pray for their conversion, and their prayers may be answered, as that of Stephen was for Saul of Tarsus. But the whole tenor of the supplications of God's people is for the utter subversion of the schemes of the wicked, and of the kingdom of darkness. Hengstenberg: "However proudly Israel's enemies may shine at present, their end is destruction." No good man blesses the wicked in their wickedness; and in the end, the injured creatures of God will everywhere rise up against them, Job v. 3; Hab. ii. 11. Horne: "At the general harvest of the world, when the righteous shall be carried by angels, with joyful acclamations, into the mansions prepared for them above, the wicked, unregarded by the heavenly reapers, and unblest by all, shall become fuel for a fire that goeth not out."

PSALM CXXX.

A Song of degrees.

- 1 Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O LORD.
- 2 Lord, hear my voice: let thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications.
- 3 If thou, LORD, shouldest mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand?
- 4 But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared.
- 5 I wait for the LORD, my soul doth wait, and in his word do I hope.
- 6 My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning: I say, more than they that watch for the morning.
- 7 Let Israel hope in the LORD: for with the LORD there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption.
- 8 And he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities.

ON the title see on title of Psalm cxx. All, who have made the penitential Psalm to be seven in number, count this as the sixth. Luther, Calvin, Symson, Henry, Bellarmine, Patrick and Edwards regard David as the author. Scott: "David is generally supposed to have been the writer of this Psalm." He dates it B. C. 1059. Others suppose it to be of later date. Clarke: "It was most probably composed during the captivity." Hengstenberg thinks that at least two words in it [those rendered attentive and forgiveness] "point to a late time." The former is not found elsewhere, except in 2 Chron. vi. 40; vii. 15; the latter only in Neh. ix. 17; Dan. ix. 9; though both of them are formed of words well known in the Hebrew. Venema: "It is plainly uncertain who the author is." Those, who regard David as the author are divided in opinion whether it was written on the same occasion as Ps. xxxii. li. respecting the matter of Bathsheba; or on the occasion of the Sauline persecutions.

Jebb thinks it has a close connection with Ps. cxxxi. Pool says it was composed when the prophet "was conflicting with horrors of his conscience for the guilt of his sins, and imploring God's mercy and pardon." Symson says, in it "is contained an earnest and ardent prayer of a troubled heart: first, for mercy to his sinnes; and next, for deliverance therefrom; and last, an exhortation to all men to hope in God, because he will be a continual Redeemer of his people, and can finde meanes to deliver them from all their sinnes and iniquities." The names of God here found are Jehovah LORD, Jah LORD and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. i. 2; introduction to Ps. lxviii.; and on Ps. ii. 4.

1. Out of the depths have I cried unto thee, O LORD. Depths, this word is found in four other places, Ps. lxix. 2, 14; Isa. li. 10; Ezek. xxvii. 34. In Ps. lxix. it is rendered as an adjective in the English text, though the margin gives it as a noun. Cognate terms occur frequently. The depths are clearly those of trouble, distress, affliction. These are outward or inward. The outward consist of providential arrangements respecting our health, honor, property, family, and the state of the church and of the world around us; the inward relate to the state of men's hearts, arising from a clear apprehension of the existence, guilt and virulence of sin, of the want of due love to God, of the hiding of the divine countenance, of spiritual insensibility, of a want of the tokens of God's love to us, of a keen sense of the ill-desert of our own sins, of a discovery of the mischief, to ourselves and others, of our departures from God, of spiritual darkness generally, and of strange disinclination to devotion, accompanied by apprehensions of the divine wrath. There is no kind or degree of sin which may not lead us into the depths. But there are no depths of outward affliction or of mental depression known to the penitent, from which they may not cry unto the Lord. Moses, when so distressed that he uttered not a word, yet in his anguish looked to God and was understood by him that sitteth on the throne, who said, "Wherefore criest thou unto me?" Ex. xiv. 15.

2. Lord, hear my voice: let thine ears be attentive to the voice of my supplications. Hear, the usual word so rendered, in the imperative. In the latter clause the Hebrew is in the future; yet the sense is best given in the English version. Supplications, always so rendered, except in Prov. xviii. 23, where it is intreaties. The word expresses earnestness and a desire for grace and favor, see on Ps. xxviii. 2. It well corresponds in import with the cry of v. 1; but is a stronger term.

3. If thou, LORD, shouldest mark iniquities, O Lord, who shall stand? The first word Lord is Jah; and second, Adonai. Mark, keep, observe, watch, take heed. Phillips: The word "denotes not only to mark, or observe, but to observe diligently, so as to retain a perpetual memory of what is done amiss—a rigid and judicial observation of faults: see Job x. 14; xiv. 16, 17." Anderson: "It is as if the Psalmist had said, If thou were like an earthly judge, to note down every minute circumstance of guilt, who would be able to stand such a trial, or leave thy court unconvicted, or uncondemned?" The verse is a clear declaration of a consciousness of personal ill-desert, and of a conviction that the whole world lieth in wickedness. The word iniquities points to any and every kind of sin against either table of the law. Stand, not the same word used in Ps. i. 5, but one signifying endure or stand fast. See Ps. xxxiii. 9; cii. 26. Who among men could abide the scrutiny of omniscient purity, if the Lord should deal with them in untempered severity? Compare Job iv. 18; ix. 20; Rom. xi. 32. The purest man on earth ought to acknowledge his entire sinfulness and dependence on the mercy of God. It is utterly vain for unbelievers to delude themselves with the persuasion that they are not sinners against God, and under his wrath and curse. In vain does any man persuade himself that he can by doing meet the precept, or by suffering satisfy the penalty of the law of God.

4. But there is forgiveness with thee, that thou mayest be feared. Pardon and forgiveness are convertible terms, each of them meaning remission. Forgiveness necessarily implies ill-desert on the part of the forgiven, and grace on the part of him who forgives. Human merits are excluded from the whole scheme of salvation. Every creature of God, who stands accepted before him, is justified solely by works, as the unsinning angels; or wholly by grace, as believing sinners. Forgiveness is with thee, as thy exclusive prerogative, as flowing from thy grace, and as being the glory of thy government, full, free, abundant. In Dan. ix. 9, the same word is in the plural, forgivenesses. The Lord "abundantly pardons," or multiplies to pardon, as the margin has it, Isa. lv. 7. Then God's forgiveness is exercised in so wise and excellent a way. It is not bestowed upon the thoughtless and reckless. The Lord makes men smart and then heals them, even as Joseph made his brethren see and confess the evil of their doings before he revealed himself to them. So God grants pardon in such a way that he may be feared; not dreaded as a tyrant, nor avoided as cruel, but devoutly revered as a pitiful Father.

5. I wait for the LORD, my soul doth wait, and in his word do I hope. Wait, as in Ps. xxv. 3, 5. Where the verb is followed by its own participle, it is rendered wait patiently, as in Ps. xl. 1. In this verse the verb is in the preterite, expressive of a habit. Hope, in the preterite also. This verb is often rendered wait and trust, see on Ps. xlii. 5. Men are always restless in time of trial till they are either made stolid by affliction, or, in the exercise of true piety, are led to set their hope in God. Hoping and waiting are in their very nature inseparably united. Verses 4, 5 show the connection between faith and hope. David believed that God was gracious and forgiving. Out of that confidence sprang the hope that animated and the patience that quieted him.

6. My soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the morning: I say, more than they that watch for the morning. Alexander: "The comparison suggested is between the impatience of nocturnal watchers for the break of day and that of sufferers for relief, or of convicted sinners for forgiveness." The force of the whole is the same whether by those watching for the morning, we understand the keepers of a city, or the priests and Levites in their courses of service in the temple, according to the ordinance in Ex. xxx. 7. The repetition of the declaration of this verse is by many noticed as very beautiful.

7. Let Israel hope in the LORD: for with the LORD there is mercy, and with him is plenteous redemption. Hope, as in v. 5. The original has the form of exhortation or of desire. In the character of God is found ample basis for all the pious hopes ever indulged. With him is mercy, or lovingkindness, as the word is often rendered. In all the Scriptures we shall not find a sweeter word than redemption. It is a term employed to express the deliverance of men from the misery of captivity, from the hardships of bondage, and from the guilt and wretchedness of a sinful state. All mere men since the fall of Adam have needed redemption. The only Redeemer of God's elect is the Lord Jesus Christ. The ransom paid is not silver or gold or tears or reformatations, but the blood of the Son of God. Plenteous, a verb in the infinitive, literally to multiply or enlarge. The cognate adjective is rendered great, many and plenteous, Ps. lxxxvi. 5, 15; cxix. 156, 157. The greatness of our redemption may be estimated by the glory of its author, by the greatness of the price paid, by the number redeemed, by the depths of sin and misery from which they are rescued, and by the glory that shall follow the completion of the work.

8. And he shall redeem Israel from all his iniquities. Redeem, closely cognate to redemption in v. 7. Israel is the true church. The verse contains the sum of much before spoken. Iniquities, as in v. 3. The deliverance promised is from the guilt and wrath consequent upon transgression. Redemption from guilt is the greatest of all deliverances. The act of pardon is perfect.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Religious experience has its depths as well as its heights, its cries as well as its shouts, v. 1. The Lord sets one thing over against another. All sunshine would burn up the plants. All rain and cloud would drown them out. Symson: "When wee are in prosperitie, our prayers come from our lippes; and therefore the Lord is forced to cast us downe, to the end our prayers may come from our heart, and that our senses may be wakened from the securitie in which they are lying. Albeit the throne of God be most high, yet he delighteth to hear the petitions of hearts that are most low; that are most cast downe by the sight of sinne." God is not angry with us for being in great trouble about our iniquities.

2. We never have so good cause for distress of mind, as when we find sin defiling us and dragging us into deep places, v. 1. Were there no sin in the universe, we should hardly need the word evil to express any of our conceptions. No man ever hated or dreaded sin excessively. Every sigh and groan from earth or hell, every cry, wrung from distress of conscience, is the fruit of sin. Sin has digged every grave, built every prison, even hell itself.

3. There is no spiritual success without prayer. It is the life of a new life, vv. 1, 2. Perhaps God's people might have made all their attainments with less prosperity or less health of body; but not with less humility or less prayer. And what a joy it should diffuse through this world of sorrow that no sorrow, perplexity or guilt can exclude us from a blessed access to the mercy-seat. "There are no depths from which we may not look to the throne of heaven."

4. However men may applaud or flatter us, they cannot save us from the depths of anguish, because they cannot satisfy an enlightened conscience; they cannot reconcile us to our Maker. Every one having spiritual discernment sees that none but God can meet his case, or supply his wants. The whole believing world has always cried, Whom have I in heaven but thee? A right view of sin will lead us to the Lord for help and salvation, vv. 1, 2. None but he, against whom all sin is committed, can either remit its guilt, or destroy its power.

5. Great is the folly of going to the bar of God in the rags of our own righteousness, v. 3. Even here it is of the Lord's mercies that we are not consumed, but how can we stand before him, when he lays judgment to the line and justice to the plummet? Already Mount Sinai causes trembling in every sinful soul, that is not wholly insensible; how then can we face the eternal Judge? The best men on earth acknowledge their utterly ruined estate, if there be no mercy for them. Calvin: "Whoever shall come into the presence of God, whatever may be his eminence for sanctity, he must succumb and stand confounded."

6. There is no piety without genuine humility, and true humility is based in a just sense of personal unworthiness, v. 3. Sinners never approach God in a becoming manner till they have the spirit of the publican. There is enough sin in the case of every man to make his cry bitter and piercing. The Lord will not hear our self-com mendations. He knows how groundless they are.

7. Right views of the holiness and justice of God are necessary to a deep Scriptural experience, v. 3. How can any man pray aright, who believes that God can connive at sin, or that the Almighty is very much such an one as himself? Why should we seek refuge from the coming storm, when we do not believe that any storm is coming? If eternal and immaculate justice is not against us, we have nothing to fear. If Mount Sinai does not thunder against us, we need not flee to Mount Calvary.

8. It is both safe and obligatory on us to proclaim the doctrine of the full and free forgiveness of sins through faith in Christ. There is no risk in so doing. The doctrine promotes piety, v. 4. No being in the universe is so placable, so slow to wrath, so easy to be entreated, so rich in mercy, as the God against whom we have sinned. Tholuck: "God exerts forgiveness for the very purpose of kindling the fear of God in a more vivid and powerful manner." Horne: "True repentance is founded upon the sense of our own wretchedness, and faith in the divine mercy. Without the former, we should never seek for pardon and grace; without the latter, we should despair of finding them." Lampe: "Since the fear of God follows pardon, it cannot proceed from the fear of punishment." Calvin: "Men never serve God aright unless they know he is a gracious and merciful being." Nicolson: "If we know not our own misery, we shall not seek mercy; and if we despair of mercy, we shall never find it." "We never feel Christ to be a reality till we feel him to be a necessity." It is true this doctrine of free grace may be abused; but the right use of it is life from the dead to the humble penitent.

9. So essential to true piety is holy reverence that if God is not feared, he will be neither trusted nor obeyed, v. 4.

10. Unless we believe in the forgiveness of sins, all our religious observances will be in vain, v. 4. Without faith it is impossible to please God. Without it all prayer is mockery, and all religious rites an offence.

11. We greatly mistake our duty when we lightly esteem waiting on God, vv. 5, 6. We must be patient unto the coming of the Lord; and why should we not be? He is merciful and gracious, long-suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth, keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7. Blessed are all they that wait for him.

12. As despair is a great sin, so it is a duty to hope in the Lord, according to the fulness of his word, vv. 5, 7. If he says, "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool," it is no presumption in us to embrace the glad tidings and hope in God's mercy. Symson: "There is nothing will bear us up but hope." The husbandman hath long patience because he has good hope. Let us set our hope in him. Owen: "The Lord Jehovah is the only hope for distressed souls."

13. How glorious is redemption—the redemption purchased by Christ! v. 7. It is so full, so free, so safe for man, so honorable to God. It exactly meets the demands of the law and the necessities of sinners. There is no limit to its sufficiency. It rescues from all sin, all guilt, all punishment. None who ever received it came short of the divine favor. How could it be otherwise? The very Author of redemption bears the name of Jesus, because he saves his people from their sins. Owen: "The ground of all hope and expectation of relief in sinners, is mere grace, mercy and redemption. All other grounds of hope are false and deceiving. Inexhaustible stores of mercy and redemption are needful for the encouragement of sinners to rest and wait on God. With him is plentiful redemption."

14. The final triumph of the true Israel is infallibly certain. The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it, v. 8. Tholuck: "We may expect much and even new redemption at his hands, till it shall be completed at last when the true Israel of God shall be redeemed from all their sins and their melancholy consequences." Owen: "All that wait on God on the account of mercy and grace shall have an undoubted issue of peace, Isa. xxvii. 5."

15. Surely we have the gospel in the Psalms, enough greatly to strengthen the faith of believers at this day. The gospel was preached to Abraham, yea, even to Adam himself, John viii. 56; Gen. iii. 15. There has never been any true religion or genuine piety among sinners except that founded on a knowledge of God in Christ.

16. Owen: "1. They who out of depths have by faith and waiting obtained mercy, or are supported in waiting for a sense of believed mercy and forgiveness, are fitted, and only they are fitted, to preach and declare grace and mercy unto others. 2. A saving participation of grace and forgiveness leaves a deep impression of its fulness and excellency on the soul of a sinner." Therefore true penitents always commend Christ and his salvation. They wish all to come and partake of these infinite bounties.

PSALM CXXXI.

A Song of degrees of David.

1 LORD, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty: neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me.

2 Surely I have behaved and quieted myself, as a child that is weaned of his mother: my soul is even as a weaned child.

3 Let Israel hope in the LORD from henceforth and for ever.

ON A Song of degrees see on title of Psalm cxx. The Hebrew, Syriac, Vulgate, Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Fabritius, Piscator, Patrick, Hammond, Henry, Pool, Gill, Dodd, Morison, Dickson, Jebb, Scott, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander give David as author. Gill: "This Psalm was written by David in his younger days, before he came to the throne, while he was in Saul's court." Edwards and Patrick favor this view. Scott dates it B. C. 1060. Tholuck speaks of it as "this brief but charming Psalm." It is indeed a gem, small but brilliant. Horne: "It is eminently applicable to Messiah, in his state of humiliation on earth." Christ was indeed perfectly meek and humble, and David was his type; but there seems no special fitness in making this Psalm Messianic. The only name of God found in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. LORD, my heart is not haughty, nor mine eyes lofty: neither do I exercise myself in great matters, or in things too high for me. Haughty, lifted up, exalted. Lofty, high, lifted up, exalted. Exercise myself, literally, caused myself to go, or to walk, or travel. These verbs are in the preterite, expressing the habit of his life. Things too high, literally, things wonderful too much. Alexander: "The great and wonderful things meant are God's secret purposes and sovereign means for their accomplishment, in which man is not called to coöperate but to acquiesce." Pool's paraphrase is, "It neither is nor hath been my course to attempt or arrogate anything to myself above my degree or private capacity, or to affect worldly glory or domination." Some ancient versions and the Doway read: Lord, my heart is not exalted: nor are my eyes lofty. Neither have I walked in great matters, nor in wonderful things above me; church of England: Lord, I am not high minded; I have no proud looks. I do not exercise myself in great matters which are too high for me; Calvin: O Jehovah! my heart has not been elated, nor have mine eyes been lifted up, neither have I walked in great matters, or in things shut up from me; Edwards: I have not, Jehovah, an ambitious heart, nor haughty looks; nor am I conversant in great things, or in things too high for me.

2. Surely I have behaved and quieted myself as a child that is weaned of his mother: my soul is even as a weaned child. Behaved, literally, made myself equal to. Quieted, made myself silent or still. The simile of the weaned child supposes the child not in the process of weaning, but effectually weaned. The last clause declares how thoroughly the work was done, in his soul, in the depth of his affections. There seems to be no sufficient reason for rejecting, as Phillips and Hengstenberg do, the idea of a weaned child, and making the word mean simply a little child. The judgment of almost all expositors sustains the English version and the obvious interpretation. Compare Isa. xxviii. 9. The word rendered surely is the sign of strong affirmation, or of swearing.

3. Let Israel hope in the Lord from henceforth and for ever. This is an exhortation uttered with authority, but based on the prophet's own happy experience. David had felt in his own case the happy effects of such pious confidence; see on Ps. cxxx. 7.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. When David was wickedly, falsely and without any offence on his part, accused of evil designs, especially touching public affairs, he set an example which we would do well to follow. Accused before men, he justifies himself before God, protesting his innocence to the Searcher of hearts, and leaving his cause to the Judge of all, v. 1. A very different course would have been obligatory upon him if he had given any cause for the slanders uttered against him. His whole life had shown their utter falsity. What more could he do? Jesus was thus accused, "he answered not a word."

2. There is a very close connection between the heart and the eyes. If the former is lifted up, the latter will commonly be lofty, v. 1. When gestures express a wicked state of the heart, they are as criminal as words or deeds. We cannot too carefully guard against all the motions and effects of pride and haughtiness. They are contrary to God's entire nature. It is better to be an humble beggar than a proud prince, a lowly penitent than a haughty angel. Scott: "The proud man is insolent in his deportment, and despises mean persons, situations, and occupations; he is vain-glorious and ambitious, aspiring after great connections and important employments, engaging in deep schemes and speculations, and courting observation and applause." When Jeshurun waxed fat, he kicked, and when he grew thick and was covered with fatness, he forsook God which made him, and lightly esteemed the Rock of his salvation, Deut. xxxii. 15. When Uzziah was strong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction, 2 Chron. xxvi. 16. Even good Hezekiah was led far astray by pride. Compare Pr. xvi. 18; Luke xiv. 11; Jas. iv. 6; 1 Pet. v. 5.

3. Yet how lovely is lowliness of heart. Blessed are the poor in spirit. If sickness, or poverty, or reproach makes us humble, we ought to hail with gladness the approach of either of these forms of evil. Tholuck: "The conduct of a victorious king, blessed with prosperity and power, who is content with what the Lord has meted out to him, demands a special acknowledgment."

4. It is not sinful to hold a high position in church or state, if God call us thereto. It is entirely safe to follow the leadings of his providence in any direction. David was a prophet and a king, to both of which offices he was anointed of God.

5. But those who hold high stations are as much bound to be humble and modest as any other persons whatever. Nor is pride less dangerous to them than to the poor miserable reptile that crawls up to the throne of power.

6. Let every man also beware of ambition, v. 1. It is sad to see children meddling with sharp swords. Henry: "Those will fall under due shame that affect undue honors." Amesius: "It is the appropriate work of a lofty presumption to affect and attempt those things which are quite above their ability and their calling."

7. Although human ability is wholly inadequate to the task, yet God's grace is all-sufficient to repress pride and ambition in the mighty, the wealthy, the warlike, as well as in the poor, and peaceable citizen. For the exercise of such grace on the part of God, we ought to give continual thanks.

8: It is a great mercy when fools are kept from meddling with matters quite beyond their capacity. A jewel of gold in a swine's snout is a comely sight compared with the sceptre of power in the hand of a poor feeble creature led on by his passions or by the passions of those around him.

9. The aspirations which are bold and daring are often less dangerous to those around us than those which fawn, and cringe, and flatter, and calculate, and plot. Finesse is not wisdom; policy is not statesmanship.

10. When appearances are against a good man in the path of his duty, he may quietly pursue the even tenor of his way, v. 1. When men choose they can easily pervert the best motives, words and actions, and give them the worst possible construction.

11. Self-control and self-discipline are great attainments, and should be sought with untiring diligence and much earnestness. Blessed is he, who is as a weaned child, v. 2.

12. Dickson: "The humble man must be content to be handled and dealt with as the Lord pleaseth, and to submit himself absolutely to God's dispensation." Henry: "When our condition is not to our mind, we must bring our mind to our condition."

13. Hope must be a very important exercise of the mind, both in fact and in God's esteem, or it would not be so often insisted on in Scripture, v. 3. And 'our hope is of the right kind when we cherish humble and sober views of ourselves, and neither wish nor attempt anything without the leading and approbation of God.'

14. When God deals graciously with us, we ought to encourage others to trust in him who has kept his covenant with us, v. 3. Morison: "The experience of the godly in past ages is all in favor of pursuing a course of quiet submission to the divine will; especially in seasons of painful and unjust accusation."

PSALM CXXXII.

A Song of degrees.

- 1 LORD, remember David, and all his afflictions:
- 2 How he sware unto the LORD, and vowed unto the mighty God of Jacob;
- 3 Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up into my bed;
- 4 I will not give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to mine eyelids,
- 5 Until I find out a place for the LORD, a habitation for the mighty God of Jacob.
- 6 Lo, we heard of it at Ephratah: we found it in the fields of the wood.
- 7 We will go into his tabernacles: we will worship at his footstool.
- 8 Arise, O LORD, into thy rest; thou, and the ark of thy strength.
- 9 Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness; and let thy saints shout for joy.
- 10 For thy servant David's sake turn not away the face of thine anointed.
- 11 The LORD hath sworn in truth unto David; he will not turn from it; Of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne.

12 If thy children will keep my covenant and my testimony that I shall teach them, their children shall also sit upon thy throne for evermore.

13 For the LORD hath chosen Zion; he hath desired it for his habitation.

14 This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell; for I have desired it.

15 I will abundantly bless her provision: I will satisfy her poor with bread.

16 I will also clothe her priests with salvation: and her saints shall shout aloud for joy.

17 There will I make the horn of David to bud: I have ordained a lamp for mine anointed.

18 His enemies will I clothe with shame: but upon himself shall his crown flourish.

ON the title see on title of Psalm cxx. Abenezra, Kimchi and Lightfoot regard David as the author of this Psalm. Fabritius says that David is commonly held to be the author. Gill inclines to the same opinion. But Anderson regards "the mention of David's name in the tenth verse in the third person, and the terms there employed, as militating against the Davidic authorship." Yet elsewhere David speaks of himself both in the second and third person, Ps. xix. 11; xx. 1-4. Others confidently ascribe it to Solomon. This seems to be Luther's opinion. Patrick thinks this not improbable, and in his exposition follows it. In this opinion coincide Diodati, Edwards, Dodd, Henry and Scott. Jebb is very decided: "The whole tenor of this Psalm is an exact epitome of the Dedication Prayer of Solomon. . . There can be little question that this Psalm was composed by Solomon." Pool inclines to this opinion. Clarke, Hengstenberg and Alexander give it a later origin. Clarke says "it refers to the building of the second temple, and placing the ark of the covenant in it." But if we may at all credit tradition, the ark never was in the second temple. Hengstenberg says, it "is to be referred to the times of the new colony," in the days of Nehemiah and Ezra. Of those, who make David the author, some suppose that it was written on David's first, some on his second removal of the ark; yet others, on the occasion of his numbering the people, and the consequent curse upon his nation. Those, who regard Solomon as the author, of course fix its composition to the dedication of the temple. Those who give it a later origin suppose it to have been written at the close of the captivity. Scott dates it B. C. 1004; Clark, B. C. about 515. The only name of God found in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. LORD, remember David, and all his afflictions. This translation follows all the ancient versions, and is supported by Calvin, Fabritius, Amesius, Tremellius and Junius, Edwards, Street and others. But Venema, Piscator, Hengstenberg and Alexander read, Remember for David all his afflictions, i. e., Remember, in behalf of David, all his troubles. This does not alter the general import of the passage. For afflictions Street reads care; the Septuagint, meekness; the Syriac, humility; Tholuck, pains. The care or trouble of David related, not chiefly to himself, but to the house of God, as we learn from other parts of the Psalm, and from other Scriptures. Compare 2 Sam. vii. 2, 3. Here God is asked to remember for good and in a gracious way the care his pious servant had long had for the divine honor and glory. In the time of David, the ark had been removed from Shiloh and was at Kirjath-jearim. The ark was not prominent in the days of Saul. Compare 1 Chron. xiii. 3. The first attempt to remove the ark, being accompanied by the death of Uzzah, increased David's concern, 2 Sam. vi. 9. He had a deep and lasting solicitude on the subject.

2. How he sware unto the LORD, and vowed unto the mighty God of Jacob. The historical books of Scripture give no account of any oath taken by David touching this matter; but the term is explained in the second clause of the verse to mean a vow. Religious engagements with the Lord are in their nature as solemn as an oath. Compare Ps. cxix. 106; 1 Chron. xxii. 7-10. The history of David's effort to establish the ark in a fixed and permanent abode may be seen in 2 Sam. vi. 1-20; 1 Chron. xv. 2-29; Acts vii. 46. The word in this verse rendered mighty is found in v. 5; Gen.

xlix. 24; Isa. i. 24; xlix. 26; lx. 16. It is an epithet applied to God. As he manifested the exceeding greatness of his power in the protection of Jacob, and the defence of Israel, and revealed himself to the fathers, he is fitly styled the mighty One, or the mighty God of Jacob. Jacob first gave this title to Jehovah.

3. Surely I will not come into the tabernacle of my house, nor go up into my bed. Surely, as in Ps. cxxxi. 2, the sign of affirmation or oath. The meaning seems to be, I will not contentedly and with satisfaction rest in my house, or seek repose on my bed.

4. I will not give sleep to mine eyes, or slumber to mine eyelids. Sleep and slumber, used interchangeably. See on Ps. cxxi. 3, 4. The English translation does not notice the sign of affirmation or oath (surely), which is repeated in the Hebrew of this verse, and in v. 3. David was profoundly anxious concerning the fulfilment of the promise made by God to the fathers, and recorded in Deut. xii. 5.

5. Until I find out a place for the LORD, an habitation for the mighty God of Jacob. The ark was the symbol of the presence of Jehovah. Its place was his habitation. David being a prophet knew that the time was approaching when God would choose out of all the tribes a place for the ark, a permanent abode for the symbol of the divine presence. Mighty God of Jacob, as in v. 2. Habitation, in v. 7, in the plural tabernacles. Some think this is put by enallage for the singular. Others, that it designates the sanctuary with its enclosures and appendages; others, that it is the plural of excellence.

6. Lo, we heard of it at Ephratah: we found it in the fields of the wood. It, the ark, which was for a season kept at Shiloh, in the tribe of Ephraim, whose territory might properly be called, Ephratah. See 1 Sam. i. 1; 1 Kings xi. 26. This is better than the explanation which supposes that Ephratah here means Bethlehem, though that city did early and long bear that name. Compare Gen. xxxv. 19; xlviii. 7; Mic. v. 2. The fields of the wood is a poetic phrase for Kirjath-jearim, the meaning of which word is, The city of woods or forests. Compare 1 Sam. vii. 1, 2; 2 Sam. vi. 2-19; 1 Chron. xiii. 2-8; 2 Chron. i. 4.

7. We will go into his tabernacles: we will worship at his footstool. Tabernacles, plural, the same as habitations in v. 5. Footstool, as in Ps. xcix. 5; ex. 1. Both the nouns of this verse designate the appointed place for God's worship. Worship, as in Ps. v. 7; the same word in the 2d commandment is rendered bow down. The verse expresses the pious purpose of doing reverence to Jehovah in his own appointed way. There is no objection to making David and his fellow-worshippers, the speakers in this verse, except that vv. 8, 9, were used by Solomon at the dedication of the first temple, 2 Chron. vi. 41, 42. But Solomon may have quoted them from this place. Calvin regards the verse as containing "a common form of mutual exhortation."

8. Arise, O LORD, into thy rest; thou, and the ark of thy strength. Whenever the camp was about to move, Moses used the language found in the first part of this verse. Arise (or rise up) O Jehovah. Here and in 2 Chron. vi. 41, the ark of God's strength is the name given to that symbol of his presence and power. Whoever fought against the ark was sure to be overcome. The rest here was the resting-place of the ark.

9. Let thy priests be clothed with righteousness; and let thy saints shout for joy. The first clause differs from that in 2 Chron. vi. 41, in omitting the name of the Most High Lord God, and in having righteousness instead of salvation. Compare v. 16, where we read salvation. The salvation of sinners is by righteousness imputed to them, and this is received by all of God's true people, and published by all his true ministers. Saints, gracious ones or merciful ones. God is greatly honored by the abounding joys of his people, and they should give due expression to their gladness by shouting, or singing, see on Ps. v. 11. Both the verbs of this verse are in the future. It is clearly a prediction.

10. For thy servant David's sake turn not away the face of thine anointed. For the sake of David, literally because of David, because of his peculiar relations to thee, as the founder of the family, which should fill the throne until Judah should cease to have a Lawgiver; the type of Messiah; the man to whom thou didst make great promises, which are as yet but partially fulfilled. Compare 1 Kings xi. 12, 13; 2 Kings viii. 19. To turn away the face of another is to deny his request, to say him nay, as these terms are explained by our translators in 1 Kings ii. 16, 17, 20. Anointed, Hebrew Messias. Calvin here renders it Christ. Yet there seems to be nothing to justify the application of the term here to the Son of God, except as in him the throne of David was to be perpetual, and David and Solomon were figures of him of whom it was said: "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest; and the Lord God will give unto him the throne of his father David, and he shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end," Luke i. 32, 33. By the anointed some understand David and some Solomon. This is probably correct. Compare 1 Kings iii. 6, 7; viii. 24, 25. Whichsoever may be directly referred to, the people Israel are to be regarded as embraced. See 1 Kings viii. 25, 66. The true interests of David and Israel were identical. So are the honor and triumph of Christ and his people.

11. The LORD hath sworn in truth unto David; he will not turn from it; of the fruit of thy body will I set upon thy throne. Of God's engagement to David here referred to, see 2 Sam. vii. 12; 1 Kings viii. 25; Ps. lxxxix. 35, 49. The purpose of God respecting David and his seed was irreversible. The salvation of the world depended upon the promise of God not failing in that case, as the covenant with David culminated only in the person of the Redeemer, who was the fruit of his body, and who now sits upon the throne of his father David dispensing countless spiritual blessings to all the true Israel. This verse is so explained by Peter, Acts ii. 30.

12. If thy children will keep my covenant and my testimony that I shall teach them, their children also shall sit upon thy throne for evermore. The verse sets forth the same doctrine declared by the Lord in 2 Sam. vii. 14-16. As far as the promise related to David's sinful posterity, its execution was suspended upon their general faithfulness. But as Christ pleased the Father in all things, to him the promise could in no sense fail. Jehovah took vengeance of the sinning Descendants of David; but there was no room for any displeasure against his dear Son. His throne is forever and ever. However it may fare with particular kings or with the people over whom they reign, God will not forsake his true church, nor change the general course of his providence respecting her:

13. For the LORD hath chosen Zion: he hath desired it for his habitation. Habitation, not the word so rendered in v. 5, but simply dwelling, dwelling-place. The temple was built on Mount Moriah; but this was sometimes called Mount Zion, for these were closely connected and might be regarded as one. Compare Ps. lxxv. 1; lxxxiv. 7. Or Zion may be here put for the holy city, the place of Israel's solemnities.

14. This is my rest for ever: here will I dwell; for I have desired it. It seems impossible to find the complete fulfilment of this passage within the walls of the literal Jerusalem. Our Saviour himself taught that under the gospel there should be no peculiar privileges or advantages to those who worshipped in the holy city, John iv. 21. Long before his time, a great prophet had declared that Jerusalem should be trodden down of the Gentiles, Dan. viii. 13. So that we are compelled to seek in the true invisible church of Christ the fulfilment of this verse, of that which precedes it and of several which succeed it. The Mount Zion which God has desired is the church bought with blood. Calvin: "The church is limited to no one place: Now that the glory of the Lord shines through all the earth, his rest is where Christ and his members are," Matt. xviii. 20.

15. I will abundantly bless her provision: I will satisfy her poor with bread. Abundantly bless, literally, Blessing, I will bless. I will surely pronounce a benediction. Provision, not elsewhere found in the Psalms. In Gen. xxvii. 3, 5, 7, 19, 25, 31, 33, rendered venison; in Prov. xii. 27, that which he took in hunting; in Neh. xiii. 15, victuals; in Job xxxviii. 41, food. The cognate feminine is in Ps. lxxviii. 25, rendered meat. Here it is a term descriptive of all the provision God has made for the sustenance of the spiritual strength of his people, and is explained by the parallel clause in the same verse. By reading viduus for victus, for food the Vulgate has widow, a gross mistake noticed by Jerome, yet adopted by the Doway. Zion's poor or needy are the humble, the poor in spirit, who hunger and thirst after righteousness, who find God's words and eat them, and are fed by the ordinances. God's church is the true Bethlehem, the house of bread. In a sense, and to an extent calling for gratitude, the promise of this verse was literally fulfilled in Jerusalem of old; but it is much more gloriously fulfilled in the company of faithful men, who constitute the church of Christ.

16. I will also clothe her priests with salvation: and her saints shall shout aloud for joy. See on v. 9, where the same verb occurs. The righteousness required in Scripture issues in salvation. Here as in many other cases, to clothe means to invest, to cause to abound in. Compare Ps. xxxv. 26; cix. 18; Isa. lxi. 10. We have the same verb in v. 18; and in another form in v. 9.

17. There will I make the horn of David to bud: I have ordained a lamp for mine anointed. Very often we meet with the figure of exalting the horn, Ps. lxxxix. 17. But the budding of a horn is a new figure. Compare Ezek. xxix. 21. The word rendered to bud is elsewhere rendered to grow, to grow up, to spring forth, 2 Sam. xxiii. 5; Isa. xlv. 8; lxi. 11; Jer. xxxiii. 15. The cognate noun is rendered Branch, in Jer. xxiii. 5; xxxiii. 15; Zech. iii. 8; vi. 12. The meaning of the first clause is that the power of the throne of David, though subject to occasional declension, should finally rise to eminence, and be great in the person of Messiah. Kimchi: "The Horn of David is the Messiah." Anointed, as in v. 10. The second clause teaches the same thing by another figure. Compare 1 Kings xi. 36. Ordained, better rendered prepared. Whom God would bless, he enlightens; whom he would curse, he leaves in darkness. So strongly does the latter part of this Psalm seem to refer to Messiah and the gospel church that Chrysostom and Cyrill regard the lamp as referring to John the Baptist. But doubtless it has a much more extended application. Alexander: "The meaning of the whole verse is, that the promises of old made to David and to Zion should be yet fulfilled, however dark and inauspicious present appearances."

18. His enemies will I clothe with shame. See on v. 16, and on the passages there cited. God will wrap up the foes of his Son with shame and cover them with contempt. But upon himself shall his crown flourish. Flourish, flower, or blossom. This is better than to read with some glitter or shine. The crowns bestowed by the ancients upon victors and made of evergreens, soon dried up and fell to pieces. But even the humblest people of God wear crowns that fade not away, 1 Pet. v. 4. Much more is the crown of the Redeemer unfading. Great is his dominion. On his head are many crowns, Rev. xix. 12.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. It is the duty of all, whether in authority or out of it, to do what they can to promote the true worship of Jehovah, v. 1. In this matter David set a worthy example. Some understand from 1 Chron. xvi. 43, that as David did not bless his house, so he refused to occupy it, until the ark had a fixed abode. Let no one plead either public or private engagements as a reason for slighting the claims of God's house. David was often full of anxieties, and encountered terrible oppositions, yet his chief concern was for the right worship of God. Amesius: "The greater our care and concern for promoting the worship and glory of God, the greater is the stability and consolation of our faith."

2. We may be perfectly sure that God will never forget any work of faith or labor of love, performed by us with right motives, v. 1. Our toils in his cause may be wearisome, and our care for the building up of Zion consuming, but God will ever be mindful of it.

3. As Moses asked God to remember Abraham, Isaac and Israel, his servants, Ex. xxxii. 13, and as Solomon (if he wrote this Psalm) here asks God to remember his pious father, God's servant, so may we confidently plead with the Most High for blessings when we are cherishing the same good purposes, and carrying out the same worthy designs as our pious ancestors, v. 1.

4. Much more may we fitly ask God to remember the work and sufferings of our spiritual David, not only as a memorial, but as a meritorious ground of spiritual blessings to us and to those who come after us.

5. It is lawful for us to bind ourselves by the most solemn engagements to be the Lord's, and to serve him in any Scriptural way. Calvin: "To vow unto God that which he himself has declared to be agreeable to him, is a commendable practice." Henry: "When needful work is to be done for God, it is good for us to task ourselves, and tie ourselves to a time, because we are apt to put off." Amesius: "Right religious concern will manifest itself in holy purposes and vows for promoting the worship and glory of God." Dickson: "It is lawful to tie ourselves by an oath to that duty, whereunto we were absolutely tied by law before."

6. In dealing with God it is important for us to remember that he is mighty, vv. 2, 5, yea, he is almighty. The very moment a Christian doubts the omnipotence of God, he has begun to fall into a snare.

7. A true and spiritual concern for the glory of God and the honor of his worship is both controlling and permanent, vv. 3-5. Pious purposes should not be fitful.

8. When God has promised any good to Zion, though it be in a prophecy never so old, it should be our business to study it, and pray and labor for its fulfilment, just as David understood from Deut. xii. 5, that there should be in due time a fixed place for all the tribes to assemble, so he desired to honor God by helping to designate that place, and promote his public united worship, v. 5.

9. Even a rumor of good or evil to the Lord's cause, though relating to things far from them, does yet deeply affect the pious, v. 6.

10. It is a happy circumstance when rulers and people, rich and poor, small and great, cordially unite in maintaining the public worship of God, v. 7. But alas! "there is often a place for prayer, where there is no heart to pray."

11. The godly greatly desire God's presence and the animating tokens thereof in all their attempts to worship him, v. 8. The form without the substance is never satisfactory to the meek of the earth. The common judgment of the godly is that the gracious presence of the Most High amply compensates all their toils and sufferings.

12. God's merciful presence is the life of his true ministers in all ages, vv. 9, 16. Compare Matt. xxviii. 20. The garments of the ancient priesthood were indeed beautiful, but they were worn by many a heartless hypocrite. God's ministers are never clothed with righteousness and salvation till the Lord vouchsafes the tokens of his love. Henry: "Holiness towards God, and goodness towards all men, are habits for ministers, of the necessity of which there is no dispute." Dickson: "The chief badge and cognizance of the Lord's minister is the true doctrine of justification and obedience of faith in a holy conversation."

13. God's gracious presence is the joy of all his true people, vv. 9, 16. When he is come, the shadows flee away.

14. If the very names given by God's prophets to his people are such as saints, gracious ones, merciful ones, surely his professed people ought to see to it that they are not cruel, untender or unholy. Calvin: "The saints of God are called merciful ones, because mercy or beneficence is that grace which assimilates us most to God."

15. Well may we plead God's covenant with our pious parents and beg him not to deny our requests, so long as we walk in the godly ways of our ancestors, v. 10.

16. Even in the days of Solomon the godly could recount a long line of promises and prophecies, every one of which must be fulfilled. Since that time they have been much increased, though not in faithfulness, yet in number and explicitness. In view of them, let the church be glad and shout.

17. There are no keener miseries than those brought upon men, when by their sins they forfeit the covenant blessings enjoyed by their ancestors, v. 12.

18. The doctrine of God's free and sovereign election is no novelty. It was held by the fathers. God's covenant with Zion is based in his choice, and that choice is resolved into his own good pleasure or desire, v. 13. Amesius: "The stability of the promises flows from election."

19. If the people of God have a delightful repose in the bosom of the Lord, so the Lord has his rest in the church. There he dwells, for he has desired it, v. 14. He loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwellings of Jacob.

20. Wonderful indeed, as well as ample, are the arrangements which the Lord has made for supplying all the wants, animal and spiritual, temporal and eternal, of his people, even the humblest of them, v. 15. To the poor the Gospel is preached. Horne: "The city in which the King of heaven deigns to place his throne can want no manner of thing that is good." Food and raiment, strength and courage, things present and things to come, Paul, Apollos and Cephas, life and death, triumph and glory, God and heaven are the inheritance of the saints.

21. Christ is and shall ever be glorious in his works and ways, vv. 17, 18.

22. Just as certainly as Christ prevails, so certainly must the wicked be overthrown, and covered with shame, v. 18. Their hopes shall all be vain, their plots frustrated, and themselves undone, unless they speedily repent that they may live.

23. As David and Solomon were each in his day the visible head of the civil and ecclesiastical government established in Israel, many commentators take occasion from this Psalm to remark on the value of religion and of civil government. Luther: "Where these two things, the word and the laws, are rightly constituted and preserved, then all things go well with a kingdom;" Tholuck: "The church and the civil government are two institutions, on which the prosperity of the state and the people depends." We should therefore follow the example here set of praying for rulers, and rulers should pray for themselves, v. 10. And let all such remember their dependence on the Most High. Henry: "Kings are before God upon their good behaviour, and their commission from him runs quamdiu se bene gesserint—during good behaviour."

PSALM CXXXIII.

A Song of degrees of David.

- 1 Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity!
 2 It is like the precious ointment upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard: that went down to the skirts of his garments;
 3 As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion: for there the LORD commanded the blessing, even life for evermore.

ON A Song of degrees in the title see on title of Ps. cxx. This Psalm is ascribed to David by the Hebrew, Syriac, Vulgate, Calvin, Piscator, Patrick, Edwards, Morison, Henry, Pool, Jebb, Scott, Tholuck and Alexander. Scott dates it B. C. 1040; Clarke, B. C. about 515. Clarke rejects the Davidic authorship. Its historic occasion is variously given. 1. Some refer it to the three great annual festivals celebrated in Jerusalem. 2. Others think it was written upon the termination of the civil war between the house of Saul and the house of David. 3. Others find occasion for it in the termination of Absalom's rebellion, and the happy return of the king. On either of these occasions it might have been fitly sung; but it cannot be shown to have had its origin in either of them. It has long been of excellent use in the church of God. It was doubtless sung by the Israelites returned from the captivity. Patrick observes that it was "fitly used by the first Christians to express their joy for the blessed union of Jews and Gentiles; and may now serve the uses of all Christian societies, whose happiness lies in holy peace and concord." The only name of God found in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. Behold, how good and how pleasant it is for brethren to dwell together in unity! Behold, a fit word to call special attention. The adjectives good and pleasant well express the force of the original, and are those usually employed in rendering the Hebrew. The latter term may be rendered sweet, beautiful, delightful. Brethren, all men are brethren, as they have the like nature and are the offspring of Adam and the creatures of God. All the Jews were brethren, as descended from Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, as bound by the same national covenant, and as having a common civil and ecclesiastical head and national capital. The members of the same family are brethren. All pious men are brethren, being born of God, having one Lord, one faith, one baptism, one hope, one aim, one end, one God and Father. How good and how delightful it is for men as human beings or for citizens of the same country to live in peace and harmony! How hateful and baneful are war and strife and bloodshed among such. See Isa. xiii. 6-18; Jer. iv. 19-31; James iv. 1-11. But the highest unity is that of brethren in Christ, animated with love and pity to one another, with a common, pious zeal for truth and holiness, with joyful hopes all centred in Christ. Among these discord, wrath, bitterness and contention are odious just in proportion as they are under the highest obligations to dwell together in love and unity. For this latter term there is no corresponding noun in the Hebrew; but it fairly gives the sense of the original. The authorized version is literally that of the Doway, which agrees with the Vulgate. For unity Edwards reads the closest unity, as expressing no more than the original imports.

2. It is like the precious ointment, upon the head, that ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard: that went down to the skirts of his garments. Precious, the same word rendered good in v. 1. How good this ointment was may be learned from the original prescription for its composition, Ex. xxx. 23-25, 30. We may be mistaken respecting the precise kind of some of the spices used; but there is no doubt that they were all remarkable for their sweet odors. On some of the uses of ointment see on Ps. xxiii. 5. This refers to Aaron's consecration to office. The effusion was copious. It ran down upon Aaron's beard. Skirts, Kimchi, Jarchi, Edwards and Street have collar; Calvin, skirt; Hengstenberg, border; Alexander, edge; Fry, surface; Hebrew, mouth. The meaning is not that his whole raiment was saturated with ointment, but that the entire hair of his head and face were full of the sweet odors; and that they extended to the upper borders of his priestly robes. Some make the latter clause relate to Aaron's beard, extending down to the edge of his garment; but the length of his beard is of no manner of significance in the matter of which the prophet here treats; it is the precious ointment to which he likens brotherly unity. The use of the same word in Hebrew rendered in the English ran down and went down indicates that the ointment is still spoken of in the last clause. Kamphuzzen well gives the proper use of this figure:

"E'en as the ointment whose sweet odors blended,
From Aaron's head upon his beard descended,
And, falling thence, with rich perfume ran o'er
The holy garb the prophet wore:
So doth the unity that lives with brothers
Share its best blessings and its joy with others."

The prophet now introduces another figure:

3. As the dew of Hermon, and as the dew that descended upon the mountains of Zion: for there the LORD commanded the blessing, even life for evermore. There are two mountains called Hermon; one is the highest ridge of those called Anti-Lebanon in the northern border of the country; the other is on the west side of the Jordan and forms the southern boundary of the plain of Esdraelon. It is not certain which of these was in the eye of the prophet in penning this verse; nor is it important for us to decide. Neither of them was near to Jerusalem. Hence has arisen the difficulty of interpreting these words. However abundant dew may be, it never runs even in Syria from a higher to a lower place as rain does, and the question is asked, how could the dew of Hermon descend on the mountains of Zion? Several explanations are offered. 1. Some read Sion and not Zion, referring to the mountain spoken of in Deut. iv. 48, one of the spurs of Mount Hermon, see on Ps. xxix. 6. But there is as much difficulty in this as in any other explanation, unless we make Sion and Hermon the same mountain and insert the word even in connecting the first and second clauses of the verse. Moreover there is difficulty in making such an explanation pertinent to the object of the prophet as expressed in the last part of the Psalm. 2. Another explanation is that suggested by the English translation, where before the second clause they add the words, and as the dew. This is legitimate and simply conveys the idea that the dew, which falls upon Hermon, falls upon Zion the same night. But this supposes that the force of the figure is to be sought in the fruitfulness and vigorous growth produced by the abundant dew, all delightful plants and shrubs and trees being thereby greatly refreshed. How abundant the dews in Syria are, even to this day, is fully witnessed by travellers. 3. Another explanation is that given by Scott, who says: "This verse may be rendered 'As the dew of Hermon, so is this, which descends upon the mountains of Zion;' and thus mean, that, as the gentle dews, descending on Mount Hermon rendered it fruitful and delightful, so the dew of heavenly love, distilling upon the worshippers on Mount Zion would render them fruitful in good works, happy in themselves, and blessings to all around them." Either this last or the second mode of explanation is to be preferred. Secker thinks that the word rendered there "points to the place where brethren dwell together in unity." The phrase command a blessing occurs in the Pentateuch, Lev. xxv. 21; Deut. xxviii. 8. We have no specific passage in which it is used in application to Mount Zion except this; but the connection of God's blessing, even eternal life, with his true church, where love lives and reigns, is abundantly taught in all the Scriptures. On the highest authority we learn that "love is the fulfilling of the law." Hengstenberg: "Brotherly unity resembles a lovely dew, which descends on the hills of Zion where this unity is so strikingly exemplified." Calvin: "The figure of the dew distilling upon Mount Zion and Hermon denotes, that a holy unity has not only a sweet savor before God, but is productive of good effects, as the dew moistens the earth and supplies it with sap and freshness." Tholuck: "The word blessing is explained by the more pregnant term life." We cannot fairly interpret the Scriptures unless we admit that spiritual and eternal blessings were connected with the worship of the ancient church and with the faith and expectations of her members.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. No man over-estimates the blessings of peace and concord in all the relations of life, vv. 1-3. Nor until he sacrifices truth, honor, righteousness or a good conscience does he ever pay too much for them. David had seen the workings of envy, of private malice, of civil war, of sectional jealousy and international strife, and such is his estimate of unity that he confesses his inability to express it, exclaiming, How good and how pleasant it is. Horne: "Many things are good which are not pleasant; and many pleasant, which are not good. But unity among brethren, whether civil or religious, is productive both of profit and pleasure. Of profit, because therein consisteth the welfare and security of every society; of pleasure, because mutual love is the source of delight, and the happiness of one becomes, in that case, the happiness of all." The evils of discord are frightful and they are legion. Particularly,

2. Families cannot too highly prize the quiet and harmony resulting from all kindly sentiments, words and deeds. The Lord Jesus himself sought the special friendship of a quiet, loving family, John xi. 5. He made his blessing on households to depend on their concord, Matt. x. 12, 13; Luke x. 5, 6. Even where there is not found the vilest form of discord in houses, resulting in fights or broils, there may still be much unhappiness arising from snappishness. When father and mother, parents and children, brothers and sisters are tart and keen, peace flies away. Ill nature is easily engendered and transmitted in a family. Dekker:

Crows are fair with crows;
Custom in sin gives sin a lovely dye;
Blackness in Moors is no deformity.

It is marvellous that Nabal did not make Abigail as much of a churl as himself, 1 Sam. xxv. 14-31. It is sad to see a heifer chained to a bear.

3. The peace of neighborhoods is of the greatest importance. The disturbers of concord among neighbors are not merely murderers, robbers and fighters, but their blood relations—their cousins german—backbiters, busy-bodies, slanderers, knaves, adulterers, fornicators. The doom of such, dying without repentance, will be dreadful, Ps. cxx. 3, 4; 1 Cor. vi. 9, 10; Rev. xxii. 15. One of the greatest curses to a community is low quarrelling.

4. It is a great thing for churches to keep the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. No command of Christ is more weighty or more stringent than this: "Have peace one with another," Mark ix. 50. How can it be accounted for that so many men, otherwise moral and apparently devout, seem to feel at liberty to become fire-brands in the house of God? Amesius: "The communion of saints is not only to be believed, but also to be loved, and by words and deeds commended and promoted."

We are bound diligently to inquire how we may effectually promote love and peace among the brethren. We are no more at liberty to be schismatics than we are to be heretics. Luther: "Where there are dissensions, divisions, and discord, there is the dwelling of Satan." Religion greatly suffers when brethren in the church are alienated and view each other with an evil eye; when heart-burnings take the place of love and forbearance; when animosities supersede the offices of love; and malice holds the sceptre over spiritual affairs! "Live in peace, and the God of peace shall be with you," 2 Cor. xiii. 11; Phil. iv. 9.

5. How blessed is peace in a nation! Its great foes are of two classes. One consists of selfish, cruel, incompetent rulers, who make the government burdensome and vexatious. "As a roaring lion, and a ranging bear; so is a wicked ruler over the poor people," Pr. xxviii. 15. The miseries and turmoils effected by such rulers are incalculable. They often plunge a land into the horrors of poverty, rapine, violence and blood, which sicken the souls of all good men. The other class of persons, who disturb the peace of nations consists of agitators and revolutionists, who hate good laws and rulers, and would rather see all the horrors and harassings of civil war than not be successful in carrying out their fanatical or ambitious schemes.

6. Another class of peace-breakers are those who stir up strife between nations, and involve at least two countries in international war and bloodshed. "War suspends the rules of moral obligation, and what is long suspended is in danger of being totally abrogated." Madison: "Of all the evils to public liberty, war is perhaps the most to be dreaded, because it comprises and develops the genius of every other. War is the parent of armies; from these proceed debt and taxes. And armies, and debts, and taxes are the known instruments for bringing the many under the dominion of the few. . . . No nation can preserve its freedom in the midst of continual warfare."

7. Peace is a great blessing: It is so in itself. All its elements are kindly. All its principles are pure, benevolent. It is excellent in its consequences. It works no ill to a neighbour. It never makes any good man unhappy. It has received the commendation of the wisest and best of all ages. "The more quietly and peaceably we all get on the better." This sentiment is universally accepted by good and reflecting men.

"Tis death to me to be at enmity;
I hate it, and desire all good men's love."

Poets, philosophers, statesmen, divines, prophets and apostles, have often declared in favor of peace and unity. The blessing of God in this Psalm and often elsewhere in the Scriptures is closely connected with the spirit of peace and love. Compare 1 Cor. xiii. 1-13; Phil. ii. 1-17. Henry: "Loving people are blessed people. 1. They are blessed of God, and therefore blessed indeed. 2. They are everlastingly blessed." John: "He that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him." Such have eternal life abiding in them and shall have life evermore.

8. Such being the blessings of unity, let us study and adopt good rules for preserving concord, such as these:

a. Prize highly the inestimable blessings of peace. They are above all praise. Scott: "No encomiums or illustrations can sufficiently display the excellence, pleasantness and manifold benefits of harmony among brethren, in families, in civil society, in nations and especially in the church of Christ. . . . With it human happiness begins on earth, and will be completed in heaven." Buy it at any lawful sacrifice. "A good-natured man without grace maketh a fairer show than grace with an evil temper."

b. Pray earnestly that you may be able to lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. Beg the Lord to keep you from the strife of tongues; at least from taking any part therein. He can give quietness when all the world is in an uproar.

c. Remember that it is only the devil and his children, who hate peace and indulge malice. If you would not be like the wicked one, shun his temptations.

d. Learn to deplore and abhor strife and all its fruits. "Surely the professed followers of the meek and lowly Jesus have long enough experienced the painful and fatal effects of discord and angry controversy; by which Christianity has been disgraced and wounded in the house of its friends!"

e. Study to imitate the Lord Jesus Christ, who was meek and lowly, who did not strive nor cry, nor lift up his voice in the streets, and never opened his blessed lips but in love. Horne: "The spirit of heavenly love was that oil of gladness which Jehovah poured without measure on him who is the high priest and head of his church. Insinuating and healing, comforting and exhilarating, it is diffused from him over his body mystical." If we are truly his, we have all received of his fulness.

f. It would be a great matter if we could lay out our strength on weighty things of doctrine and morals, and not be over zealous concerning small matters.

PSALM CXXXIV.

A Song of degrees.

1 Behold, bless ye the LORD, all ye servants of the LORD, which by night stand in the house of the LORD.

2 Lift up your hands in the sanctuary, and bless the LORD.

3 The LORD that made heaven and earth bless thee out of Zion.

THIS is the last composition in the Psalter styled A Song of degrees. On that phrase see on title of Psalm cxx. Respecting the authorship of this Psalm scholars are remarkably silent. The Syriac ascribes it to David. That conjecture is as probable as any other. Scott dates it B. C. 1017; Clarke, B. C. about 515. It has chief reference to the ministers of God's word, exhorting and commanding them to be vigilant and diligent in the work to which they are called; requiring them to be instant in season and out of season; enjoining them by precept and example to teach, exhort, warn, rebuke and encourage with all long-suffering and doctrine. On the name Jehovah LORD, see on Ps. i. 2.

1. Behold, bless ye the LORD, all ye servants of the LORD, which by night stand in the house of the LORD. Behold, as in Ps. cxxxiii. 1; equivalent to see, come now, give heed. Bless, pronounce a benediction; see on Ps. v. 12. Servants of Jehovah, a term that does sometimes embrace all the creatures of God; sometimes, all Israel; sometimes, God's loving, obedient people; but it is here limited to those who officially serve in the temple. The phrase by night, or in the nights, does not necessarily mean all night, but at night; Calvin has nightly; Edwards, every night. If, as some conjecture, the Psalm is a charge "from the high priest to the priests and Levites, who kept watch in the temple by night, to spend their time profitably, and duly celebrate the praises of God," we can see in it special beauty. Or if we regard it as a call of the whole people of Israel to their priesthood to do their duty and to be intent upon their calling, it loses none of its force. The sacred fire was kept burning on the altar all night, the lamps also burned all night, and songs were sung in the temple by night, 1 Chron. ix. 33. Fry: "We know generally that there was a nightly service in the temple." Anna, a prophetess, "departed not from the temple, but served God with fastings and prayers night and day," Luke ii. 37. Some cite Paul before Agrippa: "Unto which promise, our twelve tribes, instantly serving God day and night, hope to come," Acts xxvi. 7. Kimchi says holy men arose in the night and went to the temple to pray. Compare Ex. xxvii. 21; Lev. viii. 35; 1 Sam. iii. 3; Ps. cxix. 147.

2. Lift up your hands in the sanctuary, and bless the LORD. In the comprehensive sense of the term, prayer includes adoration, confession, thanksgiving, supplication, filling our mouths with pleas and arguments and intercession for others. This part of the public worship of God seems to have been commonly performed with the eyes and hands lifted up toward heaven. See on Ps. v. 7. Compare Ps. xxviii. 2; lxiii. 4; cxli. 2; Lam. ii. 19; iii. 41; Luke xviii. 13. The lifting up of the hands and eyes teaches us that we should lift our minds and hearts to God. When the holy place is thus spoken of, it may refer to him, who dwelt in it.—Or we may read, Lift up your hands with holiness. See 1 Tim. ii. 8. This verse and the first seem to be spoken by the high priest, or by the united people; but in the judgment of many the third verse is the response of the priests and Levites to the speaker of those verses or of a new division of watchers at the temple. Lowth and Tholuck take this latter view.

3. The LORD that made heaven and earth bless thee out of Zion. On the fact that God is universal Creator, see on Ps. cxv. 15; cxxi. 2. There is a peculiar fitness and beauty in speaking of God's almighty power, when we speak of his benediction. Bless, as in v. 1. On the difference between our blessing God and his blessing us, see on Ps. v. 12; ciii. 1. Compare Num. vi. 24-26.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The public worship of God is a great public interest, the right conduct of which is a great public concern, and demands the most serious attention from all employed in its management, v. 1.

2. Because our mercies are ever new, our praises should be continual, v. 1. They should be sung by day and by night, in joy and in sorrow, at home and abroad. In our waking hours God should in some proper way be remembered, and as often as possible praised and blessed. Scott: "If our hearts were filled with the love of God, as his holy law commands, our mouths would be filled with his praises: and though our frail bodies would need rest, yet our souls would never be weary of his pleasant service."

3. A stated ministry for the maintenance of God's worship, of which preaching his word and and public prayer and praise are principal parts, has been an ordinance of God under all dispensations, v. 1. Enoch and Noah among the patriarchs, the priests and prophets in Israel, and the pastors and teachers of the new dispensation are in proof of this assertion. Amesius: "This whole Psalm shows that the public worship of God is to be made much of, and diligently promoted."

4. God's ministers should be diligent in their calling, wholly given to their work, v. 1. They should bring out of their treasure things new and old. This requires study. The things of God are very deep, and the superficial cannot know them. When God's ministers are children in knowledge, they are apt to be men in malice. They at least miserably pervert his truth and injure his cause. And when they are dumb dogs, refusing to bark, they are a curse to the church. Morison: "As the Lord our God is a jealous God, it becomes all who minister before him to take good heed unto themselves, lest they should be guilty of offering to him the sacrifice of fools, and lest they should draw near to him with their lips while their hearts are far off from him."

5. Ministers have work enough, and of the best kind too, to keep them fully employed without turning aside to matters foreign from their sacred office, v. 1. The apostles would not even take charge of the alms to be distributed among the poor saints, but entrusted this work to approved men, chosen for the purpose, lest their appropriate work might be hindered, Acts vi. 4. "Luther: "The highest worship of God is the preaching of the word; because, thereby are praised and celebrated the name and the benefits of Christ." Amesius: "A chief duty of God's ministers is to celebrate his praise."

6. Let us abound in the work of solemnly blessing and praising the Lord, vv. 1, 2. If this is not done, the great ends of his worship can hardly be gained. Compare Heb. xiii. 15; 1 Pet. ii. 9. It is to be deplored that we so languidly and slightly perform this duty.

7. The worship of God as Redeemer does not interfere with his worship as Creator, v. 3. Revealed religion is not contrary to natural religion; but is based upon it, and carries out its great principles.

8. Those, who love to see God's ministers lively and encourage them in their work, shall be blessed of them and of the Lord also, v. 3. Compare 2 Tim. i. 16-18.

9. If men had any just sense of the depth of misery and of the dreadfulness of the curse under which they lie, till they come under the blessing which he has sent forth his servants to pronounce on the penitent and obedient, there would surely be a more earnest endeavor on the part of all to come into fellowship with those, who are commanded to bless and curse not, v. 3.

10. All, who pray for Zion and rejoice in her provisions shall be blessed out of Zion, vv. 1-3. Horne: "Prayer and praise, which by grace are caused to ascend from our hearts to God, will certainly return in the benedictions of heaven upon our souls and bodies, our persons and our families, our church and our country; like the vapors, which exhaled by the warmth of the sun from the earth, mount upwards into the air, but soon fall again in fruitful showers, causing the little hills to rejoice, and the valleys to laugh and sing."

11. God is willing to bless us, for he has sent forth his servants to do that very thing; and he is able to bless us, for he made heaven and earth, v. 3. He lacks neither mercy nor might, neither kindness nor power. He, who made, and owns and rules all things, must have infinite love and resources. "We need desire no more to make us happy, than to be blessed of the Lord."

12. The best blessings ever bestowed on earth are those which come out of Zion, spiritual blessings, bought with blood, pledged in a covenant ordered in all things and sure. And the best blessings in the future life are those secured by our connection with Zion. The church on earth, though her attainments are yet low, is the same as the church in glory. Soon the days of her mourning shall be ended, and she shall then be eternally blessed in the presence of her Lord.

13. Let all devout persons pray for God's ministers, v. 3. They need such aid and desire it, 1 Thess. v. 25; 2 Thess. iii. 1. Henry: "Though the less is blessed of the greater (Heb. vii. 7) yet the greater must be prayed for by the less."

PSALM CXXXV.

- 1 Praise ye the LORD. Praise ye the name of the LORD; praise him, O ye servants of the LORD.
- 2 Ye that stand in the house of the LORD, in the courts of the house of our God,
- 3 Praise the LORD; for the LORD is good: sing praises unto his name; for it is pleasant.
- 4 For the LORD hath chosen Jacob unto himself, and Israel for his peculiar treasure.
- 5 For I know that the LORD is great, and that our Lord is above all gods.
- 6 Whatsoever the LORD pleased, that did he in heaven, and in earth, in the seas, and all deep places.
- 7 He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth; he maketh lightnings for the rain; he bringeth the wind out of his treasures.
- 8 Who smote the firstborn of Egypt, both of man and beast.
- 9 Who sent tokens and wonders into the midst of thee, O Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and upon all his servants.
- 10 Who smote great nations, and slew mighty kings;
- 11 Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og king of Bashan, and all the kingdoms of Canaan:
- 12 And gave their land for a heritage, a heritage unto Israël his people.
- 13 Thy name, O LORD, endureth for ever; and thy memorial, O LORD, throughout all generations.
- 14 For the LORD will judge his people, and he will repent himself concerning his servants.
- 15 The idols of the heathen are silver and gold, the work of men's hands.
- 16 They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not;
- 17 They have ears, but they hear not; neither is there any breath in their mouths.
- 18 They that make them are like unto them: so is every one that trusteth in them.
- 19 Bless the LORD, O house of Israel: bless the LORD, O house of Aaron:
- 20 Bless the LORD, O house of Levi: ye that fear the LORD, bless the LORD.
- 21 Blessed be the LORD out of Zion, which dwelleth at Jerusalem. Praise ye the LORD.

THIS Psalm is without title in the original; but several of the ancient versions take the first two words, Hallelu-Jah for an inscription. See on Ps. cxi. Jebb is confident that "the Psalms of the captivity, and of the restoration, do not terminate with the Songs of degrees." He thinks Psalms cxxxv.-cxxxvii. "are manifestly to be referred to those times." Hengstenberg includes all the Psalms from cxxxv. to cxlvi. in one group, making Psalms cxxxv.-cxxxvii. and cxlvi. to be new, and to enclose between them eight Psalms of David. The reader must give to these conjectures such weight as seems to him just. Neither their adoption nor rejection materially affects the interpretation. The authorship of this Psalm is not settled, nor have we any clue to the occasion of its composition. Scott dates it B. C. 1017; Clarke, B. C. about 515. It is a precious portion of Scripture, which, by just and vehement exhortation and weighty considerations, summons us to the work of offering God supreme homage and worship. Amyrald: "This Psalm has so much in common with the preceding one, that they both alike contain an exhortation to praise the Lord. This, however, differs from the other, in that the former contains a simple exhortation, while here the exhortation is accompanied, and as it were supported by the mention of certain works of God, which are specially deserving of being celebrated; in the other the exhortation is addressed to the Levites alone, in this it chiefly, indeed, belongs to the priests and Levites, yet so as, at the same time, to embrace the whole Israelitish people." The names of the Most High in this Psalm are Jah LORD, Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and Adonai Lord, on which respectively see introduction to Ps. lxxviii., on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; ii. 4.

1. Praise ye the LORD. Praise ye the name of the LORD; praise him, O ye servants of the LORD. All the words and phrases of this verse have been frequently explained. Clarke thinks that perhaps the second clause should read, Praise ye the name Jehovah,

i. e., praise God in his infinite essence of being, holiness, goodness and truth." Even if we should so read it, the sense would not be essentially different from that gathered from the authorized version. The word thrice rendered praise in this verse is the verb forming the compound in the word Hallelujah.

2. Ye that stand in the house of the LORD, in the courts of the house of our God. The two clauses of this verse are closely parallel. Some confine the address in this verse to priests and Levites; but the people were found in the courts of the Lord more or less every day; and the whole nation was there at least by representation during the annual festivals. Verses 19, 20 show that the whole nation in its various orders is summoned to this work. It is safe therefore so to interpret this verse as to make it a universal call to

3. Praise the LORD; for the LORD is good: sing praises unto his name; for it is pleasant. Praise the LORD, as in v. 1. Hallelujah. The reasons assigned in this verse for this work are two: 1. Jehovah is good. Good, God is goodness itself. See on Ps. xxv. 8. God's excellence surpasses all names and conceptions known to angels or men. He is infinitely good. Sing praises, sing Psalms or make music. 2. To praise God is pleasant, the same word so rendered in Ps. cxxxiii. 1. Here it may be applied either to God or to his praise. God himself is the source of all that gives a lawful and permanent pleasure to any of his creatures. We have the same word in Ps. xvi. 11, rendered as a noun: "At thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore." Street has it, For he is gracious. Either way we get a good sense.

4. For the LORD hath chosen Jacob unto himself, and Israel for his peculiar treasure. The free election of the Jewish people by Jehovah is frequently mentioned in Scripture as imposing obligations and enhancing responsibilities, Deut. vii. 6, 7; Ps. xxxiii. 12; cv. 6; Amos iii. 2. The word rendered peculiar treasure is first found in Ex. xix. 5, in the shape of a promise; in Ecc. ii. 8, it points to the choice riches and gems found in the cabinets of kings; in Deut. vii. 6; xiv. 2; xxvi. 18, it is simply rendered special or peculiar: but in Mal. iii. 17, it is rendered jewels.

5. For I know that the LORD is great, and that our Lord is above all gods. All nations have been loud in the praises of their gods, even when powerless to do them any good. But every pious Israelite, and in particular every true prophet of Jehovah, did know that the Lord is great, and above all gods. The Lord is not only greater than the dumb idols of the heathen; but greater than their kings; yea, greater than the angels of heaven; for the term rendered gods embraces all these.

6. Whatsoever the LORD pleased, that did he in heaven, and in earth, in the seas and all deep places. The first clause may be read, Jehovah did every thing which delighted him. There is no will above his will. He never asks leave of angels or men, but performs his own pleasure. The verbs are in the preterite. God always has done what he pleased and is doing so still. He will never surrender his independence or his sovereignty. Alexander: "Heaven, earth and sea are put for the whole frame of nature, as in Ex. xx. 4." Ps. cxv. 3; Isa. xlvi. 10, 11, are parallel.

7. He causeth the vapours to ascend from the ends of the earth; he maketh lightnings for the rain; he bringeth the wind out of his treasures. The whole tendency of irreligion and of false religion is by degrees to bring the minds of men to regard one thing after another as without or beyond the control of the Almighty. Idolaters ascribe the phenomena of rain and lightning and storms to their false gods. The impiety of countries nominally Christian ascribes the same effects to merely natural causes. Both these errors are reprov'd in Jer. xiv. 22. Job xxviii. 24-27; xxxviii. 33-36; Zech. x. 1, are parallel; and Jer. x. 13; li. 16, are almost identical. The fact that in causing vapors to ascend the Lord uses natural causes takes nothing from the glory of his providence, but rather adds to it, as these causes themselves depend on him. Nicolson: "Nothing is more obscure than the generation of the winds." Compare Job iii. 8. He maketh lightnings for the rain, i. e., to go with the rain. Green: Who maketh lightnings to attend the rain. Treasures, in Ps. xxxiii. 7, storehouses; in Job xxxiii. 22 and often, treasures. Inspired poets speak of wind and rain as if they were kept in vast depositories and brought forth at the will of God. They are wholly subject to his will, as are the treasures to kings, who rule nations. Calvin: "Not a drop of rain falls from heaven without a divine commission or dispensation to that effect."

8. Who smote the firstborn of Egypt, both of man and beast, literally, from man to cattle. He had spoken of the lessons learned from the course of nature. He now points to lessons that may be learned from history. See on Ps. lxxviii. 51; cv. 36, where we have the same word. The plague here mentioned was the last and the direst of the ten.

9. Who sent tokens and wonders into the midst of thee, O Egypt, upon Pharaoh, and upon all his servants. On the character and terribleness of the signs and wonders wrought on the Egyptians, see on Ps. lxxviii. 43-50; cv. 27-35. When history begins in wonders of wrath to the guilty and of love to the righteous, it does not break off abruptly. It goes on from age to age, and passes from one country to another. Having delivered Israel from the land of Ham, Jehovah would enfeoff his people in Canaan:

10. Who smote great nations and slew mighty kings. Calvin: "Having once taken the children of Abraham by the hand, he led them on, in the continued exercise of his power, till he put them in possession of the promised land." The tribes to be overcome were great, or many, and their kings mighty, or strong, particularly

11. Sihon king of the Amorites, and Og king of Bashan, and all the kingdoms of Canaan. Sihon and Og are mentioned perhaps for these reasons: 1. They were at the entrance of Canaan and made the first strong opposition to the Israelites. 2. They were at the head of powerful tribes or nations. 3. These kings were of gigantic strength and stature, Deut. iii. 11; Amos ii. 9. These were perhaps fair samples of the other kings and kingdoms encountered and vanquished. An account of the destruction of these kings and their hosts is given in Deut. ii. 30-35; iii. 1-11. The Lord did all this,

12. And gave their land for a heritage, a heritage unto Israel his people. The heritage or inheritance of the Israelites was not derived from the Canaanites, but from the free grant of Jehovah made to their fathers, Gen. xvii. 8; xxviii. 13; xxxv. 12. Compare Ps. xlv. 3; cxi. 6. The tenure by which Israel held the Holy Land was excellent, and was only destroyed by centuries of rebellion against Jehovah.

13. Thy name, O LORD, endureth for ever; and thy memorial, O LORD, throughout all generations; literally, to generation and generation. There is no land where, and there is no time when Jehovah does not evince his existence, his perfections, and his government over the world. The two clauses of the verse are parallel. Patrick's paraphrase is: "O Lord, how astonishing is this thy omnipotent goodness! the fame of which shall never be forgotten."

14. For the LORD will judge his people, and he will repent himself concerning his servants. John Rogers' translation: For the Lorde wyll avenge his people, and be gracyous unto hys servauntes. Doway: For the Lord will judge his people, and will be entreated in favor of his servants. It is best to follow the tense of the Hebrew and render the verbs in the future expressing continued action and not in the preterite. Calvin: "The term judging in the Hebrew expresses whatever belongs to just and legitimate government." See on Ps. vii. 8. The whole verse is taken from Deut. xxxii. 36, where there is an additional explanatory clause: "For the Lord shall judge his people, and repent himself for his servants; when he seeth that their power is gone, and there is none shut up or left." Repent, also rendered be comforted. See on Ps. xc. 13.

15. The idols of the heathen are silver and gold, the work of men's hands.

16. They have mouths, but they speak not; eyes have they, but they see not.

17. They have ears, but they hear not; neither is there any breath in their mouths.

18. They that make them are like unto them: so is every one that trusteth in them. See on Ps. cxv. 4-8, where, with slight and idiomatic variations, we have these several clauses except that which says that there is no breath in the mouths of the idols. This is a simple idea but of great weight in the matter in hand. If the idols cannot even breathe, how can they give any succor to their worshippers? The devotees of idols are as great vanities, considering what they might be if they were hearty worshippers of the true God, as are the images themselves.

19. Bless the LORD, O house of Israel: bless the LORD, O house of Aaron.

20. Bless the LORD, O house of Levi: ye that fear the LORD, bless the LORD. Bless, as in Ps. ciii. 1, 2, 20, 21, 22. The call on the orders of the people is in the same form as in Ps. cxv. 9-11; cxviii. 2-4; except that the house of Levi—the priests—is here added. All classes are embraced.

21. Blessed be the LORD out of Zion, which dwelleth at Jerusalem. Praise ye the LORD. As God blesses his people out of Zion, Ps. cxxxiv. 3; so is he blessed out of the same holy hill. Zion and Jerusalem are parallel, the latter embracing the former. The holy city was the centre of the theocracy. There the true visible church received special tokens of God's gracious presence, and blessed his name. The ode ends as it began, Hallelujah, Praise ye the Lord.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Reason and revelation unite in making praise a great duty, obligatory upon all classes of men, vv. 1-3. In this work we should engage heartily and do all we can to excite others to do the same. It should greatly commend this work to us that it is truly heavenly, that it is very often enjoined, and that thereby God is greatly honored, Ps. l. 14, 23.

2. There is good cause for all our praises of Jehovah, found in the work itself and in his nature and ways and works, v. 3. "We must not only thank him for what he has done for us, but praise him for what he is in himself, and has done for others."

3. And our praises of Jehovah should be such as we offer to none others. He is God alone. To praise others with him is to insult him. Morison: "Jehovah alone is the legitimate object of the praise of his intelligent creatures. In him resides infinite perfection."

4. It is obvious that in the work of praise duty and pleasure are beautifully united, v. 3. Did we praise more, we should be happier and more useful.

5. It is a sad fact and affords proof of a very fearful alienation from God that inspired men call upon us so often to do this work, to which we are criminally indisposed. Surely the holy creatures in heaven require no such perpetual call to this work.

6. Yet with all their imperfections God's people are dear to him; they are his chosen, his peculiar treasure, v. 4. There is hardly a term of endearment, that is not employed to express God's love of his church. He gave his Son to die for her.

7. God's free election of any people to a knowledge of himself is a powerful argument to his praise, and so to holiness, vv. 3, 4. How can it be otherwise with an ingenuous mind? If anything could awaken gratitude and the spirit of obedience it would be such love as God shows in calling men to a saving knowledge of his dear

Son. Amesius: "The infinite perfection of God makes the benefit of election infinite."

8. Any just estimate of the love and grace of God is vastly heightened by the fact that he is infinitely great, and that his condescension is therefore unspeakable, v. 5.

9. Nor is it possible for us to maintain in purity either the doctrines or worship of God if we lose sight of his unsearchable greatness. If men have low conceptions of the glorious nature of God, any semblance of piety they may manifest is deceptive.

10. It is not strange that the infidel in his enmity against God should oppose the doctrine of the entire and universal sovereignty of God; but it is monstrous that those who profess to receive the Scriptures should impugn it, v. 6. Morison: "There are no limits to the power of Jehovah, but such as are prescribed to him by the dictates of his moral nature." Patrick: "His one will alone gives bounds to his power." Dickson: "The Lord's will is the sovereign and absolute cause of all his working, and that whereon all men's faith and reason must rest."

11. It is decisive proof of sad corruption in human nature that the study of natural science should so often be perverted to confirm men in atheistic sentiments and practices, leading them to doubt or ignore the very truths established by a sound and thorough philosophy, v. 7. Compare Job xxxviii. 22-29.

12. In like manner some men are never the wiser for all the wonders recorded of past ages, vv. 8-12.

13. So that we need not fear that the name of the Lord will fade from the earth, v. 13. He will be glorified among all people. He will put down all false gods. Calvin: "The whole world is a theatre for the display of the divine goodness, wisdom, justice and power, but the church is the orchestra, as it were, the most conspicuous part of it." Morison: "While the world stands, and while immortality endures, the wonders in Egypt, in the wilderness and in Canaan, will furnish materials for grateful and exultant praise."

14. For REMARKS on vv. 15-18 see on Ps. cxv. 4-8, 15. Man uninstructed by the Lord is brutish in his knowledge, or he could never be induced to bow down to an idol that cannot breathe, or think, or feel, or walk, or talk, be neither angry nor pleased, sorry nor glad.

15. Blessing the Lord is a great work in which all classes should unite. All men are not called to preach, to write books or hymns of praise; but every man, who would not be miserable for ever, must bless the Lord, vv. 19-21. If Jehovah authoritatively blesses his people, they should optatively bless him.

MANY commentators note the resemblance between this Psalm and the cxxxv. In the Hebrew this has no title; though the Septuagint without sufficient cause puts the title, Alleluiah or Hallelujah. Several fine scholars refer it to the times and authorship of David. Others give it a later origin. Scott dates it B. C. 1017; Clarke, B. C. about 515. Clarke: "The author is unknown." The most distinguishing feature of this Psalm is the occurrence in each of its twenty-six verses of the same clause: For his mercy endureth for ever; rendered by Jebb: For everlasting is his mercy; by Edwards: For his goodness endureth forever; by Fry: For his tenderness is forever. Clarke gives it quite another turn: "For his tender mercy is to the coming age: meaning, probably, that particular display of his compassion, the redemption of the world by the Lord Jesus." Rabbi Obadiah: "It is an exhortation to the children of God in the days of Messiah to praise the Lord;" Luther: "In this repeated expression the Psalmist looks to the promise of Christ to come." "His mercy endureth forever"—this is the key-note of the song. All will admit that a sweeter or more glorious theme could not enter into a sacred lyric. The word rendered mercy is in Ps. xvii. 7; li. 1 and often, rendered lovingkindness; elsewhere kindness, goodness, favor, Gen. xx. 13; Ex. xxxiv. 6; Dan. i. 9. Scott: "By mercy we understand the Lord's disposition to compassionate and relieve those, whom sin has rendered miserable and base; his readiness to forgive and be reconciled to the most provoking of transgressors, and to bestow all blessings upon them; together with all the provision which he has made for the honor of his name, in the redemption of sinners by Jesus Christ." Calvin: "In mentioning each benefit the Psalmist takes particular notice of the mercy of God, to teach us how necessary it is to the proper celebration of his praises that we own everything which we receive from him to be bestowed gratuitously." Endureth is supplied by our translators. There is no better word. Forever, to eternity, everlasting. This whole phrase was used in the public worship of God as early as the days of David, (1 Chron. xvi. 34, 41,) at least a thousand and forty years before Christ. Solomon followed the precept and example of his royal father, 2 Chron. v. 13; vii. 3, 6; xx. 21. Indeed from the time this form of praise was given to Israel it was kept in use, Jer. xxxiii. 11; Ezra iii. 11. See also Ps. cvi. 1; cvii. 1; cxviii. 1-4. Fry: "It was probably a standing hymn of the Jewish church sung on various public occasions." This form of praise is just, expressive, intelligible, comprehensive and very spirited. There are no better words, in which to publish the abounding continued compassion of the Most High. Patrick, Lowth, Horne, Scott, Morison, Tholuck and others regard the structure of this Psalm as responsive, designed to be sung by two choirs, or by a Levite and a choir. But of this we know nothing. Hengstenberg and Alexander discard it. The four names of the Most High found in this Psalm are Jehovah LORD, Elohim God, Adonai [rather the plural Adonim] Lord and El God, on which respectively see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; ii. 4; v. 4. By the Jews this Psalm is styled The Great Thanksgiving; and it is generally agreed to be very beautiful and animating.

1. O give thanks unto the LORD; for he is good: for his mercy endureth for ever. We had the same in Ps. cvi. 1; cvii. 1; cxviii. 1, on which see. It is well paraphrased by Hammond thus: "Let the whole world in a most solemn, humble, devout manner, acknowledge the great bounty and liberality of God, and the continual exercise of his mercy, which is not, nor ever shall be at an end, but is constantly made good to his servants in all the motions of their lives."

2. O give thanks unto the God of gods: for his mercy endureth for ever.

3. O give thanks to the Lord of lords: for his mercy endureth for ever. Two things in these verses chiefly demand attention. 1. Both the words God and Lord are in the plural. This is usually the case with the former, but rarely with the latter. The plural here is evidently intentional, denoting the amplitude of the power and authority of the God of heaven. 2. The phrases God of gods and Lord of lords, some think, point to the same thing, and in a sense they may; but they express it in a manner common to other languages beside the Hebrew. They teach that God is supreme in power and authority above all that exercise either, whether angels, magistrates, false gods, or any lords having dominion in this or any other world. Compare Deut. x. 17; Dan. ii. 47; 1 Tim. vi. 15; Rev. xvii. 14; xix. 16. Calvin: "The Psalmist uses the plurals to intimate, that the fullest perfection of all dominion is to be found in the one God."

4. To him who alone doeth great wonders: for his mercy endureth for ever. The words O give thanks are to be supplied here and where wanting in the rest of this Psalm. The exclusiveness of the divinity of Jehovah is established by this that he alone works great wonders. Wonders, see on Ps. ix. 1. What these wonders are we learn from subsequent verses:

5. To him that by wisdom made the heavens: for his mercy endureth for ever. Creation has been criticised, but always to the ultimate shame of him who ventured to impeach his Maker's wisdom. See on Ps. civ. 24. Wisdom, in Ps. lxxviii. 72 rendered skilfulness; in Ps. cxlvii. 5 and often, understanding.

6. To him that stretched out the earth above the waters: for his mercy endureth for ever. Compare Ps. xxiv. 2. Some infidels have denied that the earth was ever deluged; but according to Scripture and sound science it is only by the power and mercy of God that there is any dry land where man can live. See Gen. i. 9, 10. Calvin: "The earth's expanded surface, and the vacant space uncovered with water, has been justly considered one of the great wonders of God. And it is ascribed to his mercy, because his only reason for displacing the waters from their proper seat was that regard which he had in his infinite goodness for the interests of man." Nor is this reasoning weakened but rather established by all we know of the law of gravitation.

7. To him that made great lights: for his mercy endureth for ever.

8. The sun to rule by day: for his mercy endureth for ever:

9. The moon and stars to rule by night: for his mercy endureth for ever. Lights, the plural of the word rendered light in Gen. i. 3, 4, 5, 18, and often in the Psalms, and cognate to the word rendered lights in Gen. i. 14-16. The sun, moon and stars are enumerated here as in Moses' account of the creation. The word rendered to rule in vv. 8, 9, is in both cases a noun in the plural expressing the fulness of the beneficent and perpetual influence of the heavenly bodies on the earth and its inhabitants ever since the creation. Compare Deut. xxxiii. 14.

10. To him that smote Egypt in their firstborn: for his mercy endureth for ever. From the works of creation, celebrated in vv. 5-9, the Psalmist turns to those of providence and grace, and summons us to give thanks for the wonders displayed in them. In this verse, as often elsewhere, a country is put for its inhabitants. Hence the plural their firstborn. Respecting this last plague sent on Egypt, see on Ps. lxxviii. 51; cv. 36.

11. And brought out Israel from among them: for his mercy endureth for ever:

12. With a strong hand, and with a stretched out arm: for his mercy endureth for ever. The power displayed in the deliverance from Egypt was not excelled even by the mercy thus evinced. The imagery of v. 12 is very ancient, being taken from the Pentateuch. Calvin: "The figure of an outstretched arm is appropriate, implying that God put forth an extraordinary and not a common or slight display of his power in redeeming his people."

13. To him which divided the Red sea into parts: for his mercy endureth for ever:

14. And made Israel to pass through, the midst of it: for his mercy endureth for ever. The word rendered parts being in the plural, some Jewish writers have suggested that there were several passages through the sea. But the historic narrative quite opposes such a fancy. The plural is as fitting to describe a sea divided into two as into twenty parts. The verb and noun expressing division are cognate. On the Red sea, literally sea of Suph, see on Ps. cvi. 7, 9, 22.

15. But overthrew Pharaoh and his host in the Red sea: for his mercy endureth for ever. For overthrew the margin has shaked off, which is literal. The same verb is used in the history, Ex. xiv. 27. In Ps. cix. 23, another form of the same verb is rendered tossed up and down. In Neh. v. 13, it is, I shook my lap. Calvin renders it, Cast Pharaoh and his host headlong into the Red sea.

16. To him which led his people through the wilderness: for his mercy endureth for ever. How God led them is known to those who have studied Jewish history. The journey through the desert has no parallel. It abounds in stupendous wonders and stupendous mercies. Nor did they cease in the wilderness.

17. To him which smote great kings: for his mercy endureth for ever:

18. And slew famous kings: for his mercy endureth for ever:

19. Sihon king of the Amorites: for his mercy endureth for ever:

20. And Og the king of Bashan: for his mercy endureth for ever:

21. And gave their land for a heritage: for his mercy endureth for ever:

22. Even a heritage unto Israel his servant: for his mercy endureth for ever. On this passage see on Ps. cxxxv. 10-12. The variations are slight and not significant.

23. Who remembered us in our low estate: for his mercy endureth for ever. For low estate, Calvin has humiliation; Street, trouble; Edwards, when we have been in a low condition. There is no reason for confining the reference of this verse to Egyptian or to Babylonish captivity. Often was Israel brought low and Jehovah gave his help. For their sins within thirty-two years after the death of Joshua they were delivered into the power of Chushan-rishathaim king of Mesopotamia and served him eight years, Judges iii. 8. Soon after their sins provoked God to deliver them to the power of Eglon king of Moab, and they groaned under his oppressions for eighteen years, Judges iii. 14, till they were delivered by Ehud. Then the Philistines lorded it over them till Shamgar arose and by him God wrought a deliverance, Judges iii. 31. The fourth, fifth and sixth chapters of Judges recite other sad depressions that came on that people. Often were they brought low; but God did not forget them.

24. And hath redeemed us from our enemies: for his mercy endureth for ever. Bishops' Bible: And hath delivered us from our enemies; Genevan Translation and Calvin: And hath rescued us from our oppressors; Hengstenberg: And redeemed us from our adversaries. Elsewhere the verb is rendered break, break off, rend, tear in pieces, Gen. xxvii. 40; Ex. xxxii. 2; Ps. vii. 2; Zech. xi. 16. It here expresses the resistless act of divine power, by which Jehovah had surprisingly and often delivered his people.

25. Who giveth food to all flesh: for his mercy endureth for ever. Here the prophet's views go beyond his nation, and he speaks of God's goodness to all living creatures on earth. For the significance of the phrase all flesh, see Gen. vi. 12, 13, 17, 19; vii. 15, 16, 21; viii. 17. How kindly and tenderly God deals with his creatures is well expressed in Ps. cxlv. 9.

26. O give thanks unto the God of heaven: for his mercy endureth for ever. The phrase God of heaven is not found in the earlier Scriptures. We meet it no where else in the Psalms; but we meet it in 2 Chron. xxxvi. 23; Ezra i. 2; v. 11, 12; vi. 9; vii. 12, 23; Neh. i. 4; ii. 4; Dan. ii. 18, 19, 44; Jonah i. 9. It is twice found in the Apocalypse, Rev. xi. 13; xvi. 11. It is a sublime and appropriate designation of the true God, expressive of his glorious elevation above the passions and perturbations of earth. To him all flesh should give thanks, for all receive his mercy in many forms and ways. His favors come down on generation after generation and to his willing, obedient people shall flow on during eternal ages.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. We cannot do anything more important to the glory of God, or the salvation of men than often to speak and sing of the mercy of God, and to incite our fellow-men to do the same. See every verse of this Psalm. If men come generally to despair or even to doubt of the lovingkindness of the Lord, they will never turn from their wickedness, but will give themselves over to the devil, who delights in bringing sinners to believe that salvation is impossible.

2. While life lasts, we shall not be done praying; but while immortality endures, we shall not be done giving thanks, vv. 1, 2, 3, 26. The cause for this delightful branch of worship continuing for ever, and the heart of the pious always being actuated by love, they will carry on this blessed service in the finest style long after the sun shall cease to rise and set.

3. Christians should not be ashamed of the mysteries and miracles of their religion, v. 4. Sometimes of late years there has been manifested a disposition to recede from the defence of the supernatural in religion. This is a great mistake. Give up all that is miraculous in true religion and there is nothing left of power sufficient to move any heart to worship or adore; and without worship there is no piety. Calvin: "Whatever is worthy of admiration is exclusively made and done by God, to teach us that we cannot transfer the smallest portion of the praise due to him without awful sacrilege."

4. Had man never sinned, he would have found every day of his life fit themes for love and praise in the works of creation; and sinner as he is, there is not a day that reflection or inquiry will not suggest weighty matter for devout meditation in the amazing products of divine skill found in every part of the universe. He, that will not believe in and worship God as Creator cannot love him as Judge of all the earth, or in any other character whatever.

5. Though the old dispensation had but a shadow of good things to come and not the very image of those things, yet we, who live in this Gospel day may draw some of our best explanations of the truth from old times, seeing that now we have the key to their interpretation. For instance, the life and experience of Christians are wonderfully illustrated by the redemption of Israel from Egypt, their journey through the wilderness, and their settlement in Canaan, vv. 10-22.

6. The whole history of the church shows that whosoever stubbornly and incorrigibly sets himself against God and his cause, however powerful he may be, and however for a time he may seem successful, shall inevitably perish. If God be against us, it matters not who is for us, vv. 15, 18-20.

7. If Israel of old justly and often celebrated redemption from Egypt, surely God's people cannot too often or too earnestly celebrate redemption by Jesus Christ. It is a matchless scheme.

8. So marked is the divine goodness to men, even in the dark places of the earth, filling their heart with food and gladness, that all are inexcusable for not loving and serving him, who so richly supplies their wants, v. 25. The goodness of the Lord even to the brutes ought to lead us to confide in him and love him. Calvin: "We have no reason to feel surprised at his sustaining the character of a kind and provident father to his own people, when he condescends to care for the cattle, and the asses of the field, and the crow, and the sparrow." Compare Matt. vi. 26.

9. Let us abound in adoration and thanksgiving, v. 26. In this matter there is no danger of excess, so long as we are humble and hearty. We should probably be more fervent in this work if we abounded more in it.

PSALM CXXXVII.

1 By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion.

2 We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof.

3 For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song; and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion.

4 How shall we sing the LORD's song in a strange land?

5 If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning.

6 If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy.

7 Remember, O LORD, the children of Edom in the day of Jerusalem; who said, Rase it, rase it, even to the foundation thereof.

8 O daughter of Babylon, who art to be destroyed; happy shall he be, that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us.

9 Happy shall he be, that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones.

THE theme of this Psalm is the captivity in Babylon. Expositors are not agreed as to the relation it bears to the time of the captivity. Some think it prophetic and written even as early as the time of David and by him. The Syriac ascribes it to him. Luther seems not satisfied that this view is wrong; though it has little favor with more modern interpreters. Some think this poem was written after the end of the captivity. Tholuck: "It was composed soon after the return from the captivity, when the remembrance of its ignominy was still fresh in the mind of the people." Hengstenberg is of the same mind. Yet others think it was composed during the captivity, probably the latter part of it. So Calvin, Henry, Edwards, Patrick, Nicolson, Horne and others. This is the more probable of the three opinions. The author is unknown, but the conjecture of some that it was written by the weeping prophet, and sent to the captives is not wild. Jeremiah did not go to Babylon. Others ascribe it to some Levite, a captive in Chaldea. There is not in any language a finer specimen of elegiac poetry than we have here. Jebb: "Its exquisite beauty and pathetic character are obvious to all;" Morison: "It is an extremely beautiful and pathetic composition." Scott dates it B. C. 587; Clarke says: "It was evidently composed during or at the close of the captivity." Cyrus took Babylon and gave the first decree for the release of the Jews 538 years before Christ. The only name of the Almighty found in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2.

1. By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat down, yea, we wept, when we remembered Zion. We read in Scripture of four rivers of Babylon, the Euphrates, the Tigris, the Chebar and the Ulai. The first sometimes called the "great river," sometimes simply "the river," Ex. xxiii. 31; Deut. i. 7; Josh. i. 4; Isa. vii. 20; viii. 7; Jer. ii. 18. The last three all emptied themselves into the Euphrates, whose waters were poured into the Persian gulf. The Chebar is mentioned in Ezekiel several times, and the Ulai in Daniel. A part of the Jewish captives were settled as a colony on the Chebar, see Ezek. i. 1; iii. 15. Some think these four rivers are the same mentioned in Gen. ii. 10-14. The word rendered rivers here is not that found in Ps. i. 3 and elsewhere, meaning any running stream, even in a small artificial canal, but this word denotes what moderns understand by rivers. Sometimes it is rendered floods. Compare Job xiv. 11; Ps. xciii. 3. Babylon, or Babel, not the city but the country of that name. We sat down. This may mean, We dwelt, Gen. xiii. 12; Ps. xxiii. 6; Jer. xxiii. 8; or it may refer to the posture assumed by the pensive and sad. Job ii. 8, 13; Isa. iii. 26; Lam. ii. 10. And wept, also rendered mourned, bewailed, made lamentation. There is no Hebrew verb more expressive of deep grief. See Ps. lxxviii. 64; Jer. xxxi. 15. When we remembered Zion. Exiles and captives have great trials. One, who loved Zion and yet was doomed to spend his days in cruel Chaldea, must have had his heart wrung with anguish. It was not merely the gush of patriotism, but the flow of pious feeling aroused by the memory of Zion that overwhelmed the minds of these sufferers.

2. We hanged our harps upon the willows in the midst thereof. Some travellers assert that in modern Chaldea there is a scarcity of willows; but in more than two thousand years great changes may take place in the growth found anywhere. History and science show that the weeping willow is from the region of the Euphrates. So well are learned men satisfied of this that its botanical name is Salix Babylonica. The Latin poet Ovid tells us of willows of the Euphrates. It was the official duty of the Levites to praise the Lord; but others did the same. David, who was of the tribe of Judah, often played upon his harp. The very thought of their former privileges and of their present sad condition with the assurance that their sufferings were the fruit of the divine displeasure against them for their sins greatly indisposed them to music.

3. For there they that carried us away captive required of us a song; and they that wasted us required of us mirth, saying, Sing us one of the songs of Zion. They that carried us away captive, literally, our captors. Required, as in Pr. xxx. 7; in Ps. xxvii. 4, desired; in Judg. viii. 26, requested, and often asked, as in 1 Kings iii. 10, 11. The word does not imply any imperious command, but at the most an earnest or urgent request. A song, literally the words of a song. They that wasted us, more exactly our devastators, our spoilers, our plunderers. Mirth, in the old English sense, gladness, joy, or joyfulness. Many suppose the demand for a song was made in taunt and scorn. This is a prevalent and not improbable view of the actual state of case. But it is suggested rather by the known cruelties of the Chaldeans than by the very words of the verse. Even if the request was made out of inquisitiveness, experience shows that in affliction hardly anything is more tormenting than ill-timed curiosity. The last clause is hardly improved by supplying the word one, Sing us one of the songs of Zion. It is literally Sing to us of or from the song of Zion.

4. How shall we sing the LORD's song in a strange land? Alexander: "The idea is not, that the psalms themselves would be profaned by being sung there, but that the expression of religious joy would be misplaced and incongruous." The same idea is tersely expressed in Pr. xxv. 20. To rob a people of their treasures, drag them from their homes, burn their dwellings and cities, devastate their fields, desecrate their temples, and then call upon them to be joyful is as cruel as it is absurd. The prophet would now animate his people by reviving in their minds strong and vivid reminiscences of the holy land, and arousing in them lively faith in the covenant of God with Israel; and so, he expresses for himself and for his people a solemn engagement.

5. If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. The verbs are in the future, shall forget. Her cunning is supplied. The Chaldee reads, May I forget my right hand; the Syriac and Street, May my right hand forget me. The reference is not to all skill, but to skill in handling the harp, which is the subject of discourse.

6. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy. Street: Let my tongue cleave to my palate, if I do not remember thee, if I do not extol thee, O Jerusalem, above the chief of my joy; Edwards: If I do not remember thee, may my tongue stick to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my greatest joy; Alexander: Let my tongue cleave to my palate if I do not remember thee, if I do not raise Jerusalem above the head of my rejoicing. As the hand was skilled in playing, so was the tongue in singing, and the prophet was willing to lose the power of both rather than the precious memories of the holy city. The design of this and of the preceding verse is to kindle afresh the fires of love for the true religion as established at Jerusalem. The prophet next foretells the doom of the spoilers. He begins with the descendants of Esau, those old and relentless enemies of Israel.

7. Remember, O LORD, the children of Edom in the day of Jerusalem; who said, Rase it, rase it, even to the foundation thereof. This is not an imprecation, but a prediction. See Introduction, § 6. Parallel passages are found in Jer. xlix. 7-10; Lam. iv. 21, 22; Ezek. xxv. 12-14; Obad. 10-19. The day of Jerusalem here means the day of her sore calamities, over which the Edomites exulted, and to the infliction of which they egged on her enemies. This fearful prediction has been fulfilled. For long centuries it has not been known that there was existing on earth any descendant of Esau. They who wished to see the holy city raised, cleared off, made bare, wiped out, received in their own persons and nation the ruin they wished to Israel.

8. O daughter of Babylon, who art to be destroyed; happy shall he be that rewardeth thee as thou hast served us. On the term daughter, as applied to a city or people, see on Ps. ix. 14. Happy, in Ps. i. 1, blessed, literally, O the blessednesses. Two interpretations are chiefly given. Some suppose that the language refers to the public estimation in which the conqueror of Babylon should be held. The objection is that the word rendered happy seldom if ever refers to popular opinion. The other is that the conqueror of Babylon should really be a wonderful person, remarkably preserved and sustained by God in his whole career. This was strikingly fulfilled in Cyrus, whether considered as a man, or as the head of an army. No man can read his history or the prophecies respecting him without seeing that not one in a thousand millions of the human family has been so favored by Providence as he was.

9. Happy shall he be that taketh and dasheth thy little ones against the stones. Happy, as in v. 8, and to be explained in the same way. The destruction of infants in ancient warfare is noticed by many old writers. Homer distinctly states it. And we read of it in 2 Kings viii. 12; Hos. x. 14; xiii. 16; Nah. ii. 1; iii. 10. Indeed the prophet Isaiah, more than 700 years before Christ, foretold this and other terrible things, Isa. xiii. 16-18. In the destruction of Babylon the guilty people horribly murdered one another. Hengstenberg: "The very thing they had done to Israel, they afterwards practised before the eyes of the Psalmist, with inhuman barbarity among themselves, not sparing those who were nearest and dearest to them;" Prideaux: "To make their provisions last the longer, they agreed to cut off all unnecessary mouths amongst them; and therefore drawing together all the women and children, they strangled them all." When Cyrus captured Babylon, he spared the city; but subsequently it was utterly destroyed and desolated by Darius Hystaspes. Compare Jer. li. 26.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Good men are often great sufferers. Their own sins and the sins of their country often bring upon them dire calamities, vv. 1-3.

2. Yea, the church in a whole nation is often subjected to deep distresses, put under the power of the most wicked men, and made to groan with her burdens and howl for her sorrows. She may even lose her civil liberties, be cut off from her public worship, and fail in all her attempts to resist encroachment and oppression, vv. 1-3.

3. Scott: "When we are suffering the effects of our personal or national transgressions; we should recollect, with godly sorrow, our forfeited mercies, and our sins by which we have lost them; that by repentance and prayer we may seek deliverance, and the restoration of our privileges and comforts," v. 1.

4. There must be something exceedingly dreadful in sin, else so sad consequences could not flow from it in time and eternity. This world has always been under the government of the kindest being in the universe. Yet how his wrath has many a time burst forth against sinners in Zion and sinners in the world, vv. 1-3.

5. Dickson: "They who will not esteem the privileges of Zion when they have them, will be forced to acknowledge the worth thereof with sorrow when they want them: we wept, when we remembered Zion," v. 1.

6. No man knows how soon he may be plunged into the deepest affliction and be compelled to hang his harp upon the willows, v. 2. Such a thought ought to repress excess in our joy, moderate our pursuit of all earthly good, and keep us prepared for the worst.

7. Let all men learn to resist and suppress in their own bosoms all malignant scorn, all spirit of taunting the unfortunate and even all idle curiosity towards them, v. 3. Henry: "Even an enemy, in misery, is to be pitied, and not trampled upon. It argues a base and sordid spirit to upbraid those that are in distress, either with their former joys or with their present griefs, or to challenge those to be merry, who, we know, are out of tune for it." Taunting the miserable is fitly the employment of the damned, Isa. xiv. 9-15.

8. When called to mourning, let us not go to dancing. It is both folly and wickedness to harden ourselves in stoicism under our sorrows. "Signs of sorrow are best suited to days of humiliation."

9. What a poor fickle creature is man! how variable his feelings and his purposes! At one time the Jewish captives in Babylon became surly and stubborn. They refused a cheerful submission to God's will, so that Jeremiah wrote them a letter warning them against their sin and exhorting them to do their duty in their present circumstances, Jer. xxix. 4-7. But when they had become settled in that idolatrous land, and had many comforts around them, it required so excellent a spirit as is breathed in this Psalm to prevent them from sitting down at ease far from the holy city. They had found a beautiful country (2 Kings xviii. 32; Isa. xxxvi. 17,) and were in danger of forgetting the true God and his worship.

10. Let us continue to love the church come what will to her or to us, vv. 5, 6. To give up Zion is to give up salvation. If we do not love the church, we are not like her Head and Redeemer. Scott: "No calamity, no strange land, no prevalence of ungodliness, no despised and depressed state of the church should induce us to forget Jerusalem." Luther: "The first concern of all that fear and know God should be the preservation of a place for the ministration of the word, and for the true religion and true worship of God." Calvin: "The Lord's people, while they mourn under personal trials, should be still more deeply affected by public calamities which befall the Church, it being reasonable that the zeal of God's house should have the highest place in our hearts, and rise above all mere private considerations."

11. We may not sing songs, or do anything else in God's worship, at the bidding or for the gratification of carnal men. They may mind their own affairs and we must keep our own consciences, cost what it may. We have better work than to teach and learn the fear of God by the behests of men, vv. 4-6.

12. The haters of the church, as they are guilty of great sin will, without timely repentance, come to a bad end. Let them remember the calamity of Esau. Let them not forget the doom of the golden city, vv. 7-9. To the pious no evil continues always. A captivity may last 70 years, but then comes deliverance. The doom of persecutors and of those who approve their ways is certain and fearful.

13. It matters not how great, or ancient, or prosperous a people may be, if God inspires a man to denounce his wrath against them, their ruin is inevitable. See Isa. xiii. 19. "The state of the church at the worst is better than that of Babylon, or any state of her adversaries." So faith always pronounces. So God always evinces.

14. How horrible is war! vv. 7-9. Let men read and understand and tremble before they plunge into that bloody sea.

15. How glorious will be the final triumph of the church over her great adversary, the mystical Babylon, when the loud cry of the mighty angel shall be heard, "Babylon the great is fallen, is fallen!" See Rev. xviii. 1-24.

PSALM CXXXVIII.

A Psalm of David.

- 1 I will praise thee with my whole heart: before the gods will I sing praise unto thee.
- 2 I will worship toward thy holy temple, and praise thy name for thy lovingkindness and for thy truth: for thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name.
- 3 In the day when I cried thou answeredst me, and strengthenedst me with strength in my soul.
- 4 All the kings of the earth shall praise thee, O LORD, when they hear the words of thy mouth.
- 5 Yea, they shall sing in the ways of the LORD: for great is the glory of the LORD.
- 6 Though the LORD be high, yet hath he respect unto the lowly: but the proud he knoweth afar off.
- 7 Though I walk in the midst of trouble, thou wilt revive me: thou shalt stretch forth thine hand against the wrath of mine enemies, and thy right hand shall save me.
- 8 The LORD will perfect that which concerneth me: thy mercy, O LORD, endureth for ever: forsake not the works of thine own hands.

THE Davidic authorship of this Psalm is declared by the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic and Vulgate, and is generally admitted. Scott dates it B. C. 1045; Clarke, B. C. about 1048. Hengstenberg and Alexander regard Psalms cxxxviii.-cxlv. as a series, perhaps the last songs composed by David, and having special reference to the promise made to him in 2 Sam. vii. Most expositors have failed to discover such distinct reference. Luther styles this "a Psalm of general thanksgiving unto God for all his help against his enemies: and it prays that the kingdom of Christ may come; and it prophesies also that even kings and nations shall hear the gospel." Calvin: "In this Psalm David, in remembrance of the singular help which had always been vouchsafed him by God—the experience he had enjoyed of his faithfulness and goodness, takes occasion to stir himself up to gratitude; and from what he had known of the divine faithfulness, he anticipates a continuance of the same mercy. If dangers must be met, he confidently looks for a happy issue." Many think this ode was written not long after the ten years of David's persecution were terminated by the death of Saul. Tholuck styles it "A song of praise full of exuberant joy." The only name of the Almighty found in this Psalm is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2. One peculiarity of the structure of this song is that no name of God is given for several verses after he is directly addressed, though a few MSS. and the old versions supply Jehovah in the first verse.

1. I will praise thee with my whole heart; before the gods will I sing praise unto thee. Praise, commonly so; in Ps. vi. 5 and often, give thanks; in Ps. xxxii. 5, confess. Sing praise, sing psalms, as in Ps. cv. 2. Before the gods, Elohim; this may mean, 1. Before the true God, in his sight, in his presence: 2. Before the ark, the symbol of the divine presence: 3. Before the angels, who are called elohim: 4. Before kings and rulers, as elohim is used to denote them: 5. Before the false gods worshipped by the heathen. The Chaldee has, before the judges; the Syriac, before kings; Jarchi, before the princes; the Septuagint, Arabic, Vulgate, Ethiopic and Doway, before the angels. There is no grammatical objection to either of these interpretations. And there is no valid objection to adopting them all, q. d., In the presence of the Searcher of hearts, before the ark the symbol of his presence, before magistrates, before the gods worshipped by the Gentiles and before angels, before all dignities earthly and heavenly I will sing psalms to Jehovah.

2. I will worship toward thy holy temple, and praise thy name for thy lovingkindness and for thy truth: for thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name. Some have suggested that David could not have written this Psalm as the temple was not built in his time. But David uses the same language in Psalms confessedly written by him. See Ps. v. 7; xi. 4; xviii. 6. Lovingkindness, as in Ps. li. 1 and often. Truth, or faithfulness, as in Ps. xv. 2; xxxi. 5. It includes every kind of reliable word. For thou hast magnified thy word above all thy name. Arabic: Thou hast magnified thy holy name above all things; Luther: Thou hast made thy name glorious above all through thy word; Calvin: Thou hast magnified thy name above all things by thy word; Hengstenberg: Thou hast made glorious thy word, above all thy name. If the clause refers to the promise in 2 Sam. vii. it is true that it was the chief of what God engaged to David. But it contains a truth of universal scope. Above the works of creation and of providence, above all else whereby he has made himself known, has the Lord exalted his word. It has converting and sanctifying power.

3. In the day when I cried thou answeredst me, and strengthenedst me with strength in my soul. The words of the first clause are those usually so rendered. Strengthenedst with strength; Calvin: Hast abundantly administered strength; Edwards: Invigoratedst with much strength; Street: Strengthenest with courage. The verb might be rendered enlargedst. It is in the future. The noun occurs often and is also rendered power, might. The whole battle of the believer's life calls for intrepidity. The enemy is fierce; the child of God must be heroic. In this warfare natural courage avails nothing. It must come from God, and be imparted to the soul.

4. All the kings of the earth shall praise thee, O LORD, when they hear the words of thy mouth. Praise, as in vv. 1, 2; give thanks, in the future. Hear, preterite have heard. It means more than merely to hear the sound of God's word. It is rendered obey in 1 Sam. xv. 22 and elsewhere. The verse contains a prediction of the wide-spread and hearty embracing of the truth of the Gospel.

5. Yea, they shall sing in the ways of the LORD: for great is the glory of the LORD. The words are all of the usual signification. They contain a prediction of the joyful effects of the spread of the true religion. Compare Ps. xiv. 7; lxviii. 29, 31, 32; cii. 15; Isa. xxxv. 10.

6. Though the Lord be high, yet hath he respect unto the lowly: but the proud he knoweth afar off. Some think the last clause of the preceding verse and the whole of this form the theme of the song sung by kings, who are put for nations. This does not materially affect the sense, as the cause of joy is very naturally its theme also. High, a participle, exalted. Lowly, not elsewhere in the Psalms; in Pr. xvi. 19; xxix. 23; Isa. lvii. 15, humble. Here it designates a class the opposite of the proud in the next clause, which declares that though they remove far from God, he yet knows all about them; or that he forms no familiar and loving acquaintance with them. Both ideas are true; yet the latter is probably chiefly taught here. See on Ps. i. 6. Here the verb is in the future, and declares what shall be the course of God's government forever.

7. Though I walk in the midst of trouble, thou wilt revive me; thou shalt stretch forth thine hand against the wrath of mine enemies, and thy right hand shall save me. Revive me; keep me in being, or preserve me alive. The same verb in another form is often rendered quicken. God's care over his people is such as often surprises both themselves and their enemies. Wonderfully was all this illustrated in the case of David; and God is as faithful to every believer as to the royal Psalmist.

8. The LORD will perfect that which concerneth me: thy mercy, O LORD, endureth for ever: forsake not the works of thine own hands. Perfect, bring to an end, perform, Ps. vii. 9; lvii. 2; i. e., finish, bring to a happy issue. This was done by raising David to the throne in defiance of all the power wielded against him, by giving him a throne in glory, and by raising his seed, even Christ, to a perpetual kingdom over the church. On the second clause see on Ps. cxviii. 1, 2, 3, 4, 29; cxxxvi. 1. Mercy, in v. 2, rendered lovingkindness. The last clause is a petition based on promises often repeated in Scripture, Deut. iv. 31; xxxi. 6, 8; Josh. i. 5. Works, a very comprehensive term applied to anything that God has made, animate or inanimate, rational or irrational, to anything he has done, to any purpose he has formed.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Nothing can release us from the obligation to utter the praises of God for all his benefits; and no good man wishes it were otherwise, v. 1.

2. In all acts of worship, in praise particularly, the heart is called for. Reluctance in this service obviously spoils it all, v. 1. Holy mirth as well befits the grateful, as holy sorrow, the penitent.

3. Whoever would worship God aright must be prepared to resist servile fear, the fear of man, the dread of reproach and the vain show of false worship. He must be afraid of nothing so much as of offending God, v. 1.

4. Public worship is no less a duty than private worship. God openly bestows his favors; our acknowledgments ought to be before heaven and earth, vv. 1, 2.

5. If the best and most intelligent Christians of modern times extol the Scriptures, they do but follow the example of ancient worthies and of God himself, v. 2.

6. Prayer is a mighty power in the world. It has been so from the beginning,

v. 3. Even where the thing asked for is not obtained, the Lord bestows something better. Henry: "Those that trade with heaven by prayer grow rich by quick returns."

7. It matters little how sharp our trials, if our fortitude and courage are proportioned to them, v. 3. Strength in the soul is the best strength in the world.

8. It has always been true and is now true that good days, the best days of the church, are yet to come, v. 4. Dark as things often are, the day-star has arisen and shall yet be followed by meridian splendor.

9. As it is a great dishonor to religion when its professors make long faces and give the impression to others that they have gloomy work in God's service; so it is much to the honor of God when his servants show by their songs of gladness and by their whole manner that they serve a good Master, vv. 4, 5. Such do mightily glorify the God of their salvation.

10. Unspeakable is the condescension of God, v. 6. He takes the poor from the dunghill and sets him among princes. The penitent, who by crime or imprudence has lost the friendship of men, is visited even in his dungeon, and made glad in the Lord. On nothing does God set a higher value than on genuine humility. He, who has that, is never a reprobate.

11. Nor is anything a greater offence to God than pride, v. 6. He has set his face against it. He will not endure it in man or angel.

12. Sometimes the number, greatness or strangeness of the sufferings of God's people make their friends cold and shy; but it is far different with the Lord, v. 7. He is more abundantly and graciously with them than at any other time. Blessed be his name.

13. The Old and New Testaments do well agree in doctrine and promises, respecting the final victory of all believers. He, who begins a work of grace, will finish it, v. 8; compare Phil. i. 6.

14. We cannot have too strong or too abiding a sense of the kindness of God, v. 8. "There can be no doubt that the way to maintain good hope in danger is to fix our eyes upon the divine goodness, on which our deliverance rests."

15. The Almighty is too great and glorious in all his perfections to make a creature or begin a work, and then change his counsel and review his own wisdom, v. 9. Weakness may give up a plan devised by folly; but it is far otherwise with God.

PSALM CXXXIX.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

- 1 O LORD, thou hast searched me, and known me.
- 2 Thou knowest my downsitting and mine uprising; thou understandest my thought afar off.
- 3 Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways.
- 4 For there is not a word in my tongue, but, lo, O LORD, thou knowest it altogether.
- 5 Thou hast beset me behind and before, and laid thine hand upon me.
- 6 Such knowledge is too wonderful for me; it is high, I cannot attain unto it.
- 7 Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence?
- 8 If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there.
- 9 If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea;
- 10 Even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me.
- 11 If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me; even the night shall be light about me.
- 12 Yea, the darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee.

13 For thou hast possessed my reins: thou hast covered me in my mother's womb.

14 I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvellous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well.

15 My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth.

16 Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them.

17 How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! how great is the sum of them!

18 If I should count them, they are more in number than the sand: when I awake, I am still with thee.

19 Surely thou wilt slay the wicked, O God: depart from me therefore, ye bloody men.

20 For they speak against thee wickedly, and thine enemies take thy name in vain.

21 Do not I hate them, O LORD, that hate thee? and am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee?

22 I hate them with perfect hatred: I count them mine enemies.

23 Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts:

24 And see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. The Hebrew and all the ancient versions ascribe this Psalm to David. The title shows that it belongs to a time when the public worship of God was fully organized. Against the Davidic authorship it is urged that there are Chaldaisms in it. But these consist, as Jebb remarks, "in the substitution of one letter for another very like it in shape, and easily to be mistaken by a transcriber, particularly by one who had been used to the Chaldee idiom: but the moral arguments for David's authorship are so strong as to overwhelm any such verbal or rather literal criticism, were even the objections more formidable than they are." There is no necessity for seeking a historic occasion for this Psalm, though many have indulged their ingenuity in that way. Some think it has a particular connection with Ps. cxxxviii. But there is not a part of the Psalter, where it would be out of place. Its doctrines are pure and heavenly, sublime and practical, entering into the very elements of pious sentiment. Amongst Hebrew idyls it holds a very prominent place. Some Jewish writers give it the first place. Lowth puts it next to Psalm civ. and says, "If it be excelled, (as perhaps it is) by the former in the plan, disposition and arrangement of the matter, it is not in the least inferior in the dignity and elegance of its sentiments, images and figures." Mant: "Amongst its other excellencies it is for nothing more admirable than for the exquisite skill with which it descants on the perfections of the Deity." Anderson: "No philosopher of ancient times ever attained to such sublime views of the perfections and moral government of God as the Hebrew prophets. How are we to account for this difference but on the supposition of the divine origin of the religion of the Hebrews? On any other supposition these Psalms are a greater miracle than any of those recorded by Moses." Scott dates it B. C. 1059; Clarke affixes no date but says it has no high antiquity. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD, El God and Eloah God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; v. 4; xviii. 31.

1. O LORD, thou hast searched me, and known me. Searched, in the preterite. In the imperative it occurs again in v. 23. We met it in Ps. xliv. 21. It implies thorough investigation. Known, in the future, but see Introduction, § 6. In other forms it occurs again in vv. 2, 4, 14, 23. It implies exact intelligence, precise understanding. The English version supplies me at the end of v. 1. This leads to no error, and is suggested by its occurrence in the first clause; but it is not necessary. The verses following show what it included:

2. Thou knowest my downsitting and mine uprising; thou understandest my thought afar off. The first clause declares the perfect intelligence God has of every posture, gesture, exercise, pursuit, state and condition of man. The second declares his perfect acquaintance with every emotion, feeling, conception, thought, aim, doubt, perplexity and solicitude of his creatures, however they may be removed from the notice of mortals, however misjudged, or cut off from the usual places of worship. Afar off, an adjective, distant, remote, in time or place, with the preposition, as here, commonly rendered afar off, also long ago. Edwards renders it long before; Street, from a distance; Alexander, from afar. Compare Ps. cxxxviii. 6; Jer. xxiii. 23. We are often far from God, but he is nigh unto us at all times by his essential presence, Acts xvii. 27.

3. Thou compassest my path and my lying down, and art acquainted with all my ways. Compassest, in Ruth iii. 2; Isa. xxx. 24, winnow; in Jer. iv. 11, fan. Mudge, Street, Clarke and Alexander read siftest; Edwards, art privy to; Hengstenberg, markest; Jebb, spiest out; as when one winnows wheat and chaff, he separates them, sees them, and learns the quantity and quality of each, so the Most High knows all about our path and lying down; church of England, Jebb and Fry read path and bed; Edwards, my motions in the day and my lying down at night; Street, path and couch. The two words express one's state and actions by night and by day, in public and in secret. Art acquainted, there is no better rendering. In the imperative we have it in Job xxii. 21, Acquaint now thyself with him. Ways, life, behaviour, state, condition, all that makes the history of a man.

4. For there is not a word in my tongue, but, lo, O LORD, thou knowest it altogether. For, better rendered surely in this place. Edwards thus interprets the whole verse: "For before my words are upon my tongue, behold, Jehovah, thou knowest the whole of them."

5. Thou hast beset me behind and before, and laid thine hand upon me. John Rogers' Translation: Thou hast fashyoned me behynde and before and layed thyne hande upon me; Edwards: Thou closely environest me behind and before, and layest thy hand upon me; Street: Lo, O Jehovah, thou knowest all the past and the future; thou didst form me, and didst place thine hand on me; Phillips: "The meaning of the verse is, Thou hast so pressed upon, or besieged me, both behind and before, that I find there is no escaping from thee;" Hengstenberg: "I am on all sides surrounded and environed by thee, can do nothing, and suffer nothing, without being seen by thee, and being always in thy power."

6. Such knowledge is too wonderful for me: it is high, I cannot attain unto it. More literally, Marvellous (is such) knowledge, too much for me; it is set on high, I shall not be equal to it. The knowledge intended may be either God's amazing and perfect intelligence of all things, or a creature's conception and understanding of the divine omniscience. The latter is commonly supposed to be intended. But some quite prefer the former. Horne: "I cannot admire it enough, for I cannot conceive of it aright."

7. Whither shall I go from thy Spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? The two clauses alike declare the impossibility of eluding the direct and immediate notice of God. This verse teaches either that God is a Spirit or that he has a Spirit. If the former, it implies his amazing and infinite intelligence as well as incomprehensibility; if the latter, it implies the doctrine of the Trinity, in which the Spirit of God is the third person. Why should we hesitate to admit that the personality and divinity of the Holy Ghost is taught in the Old Testament? See on Ps. li. 11.

8. If I ascend up into heaven, thou art there: if I make my bed in hell, behold, thou art there. Both in heaven and in hell is God's essential presence. In heaven they have his gracious presence. In hell they feel his wrathful presence. On the word rendered hell see on Ps. xvi. 10. Henry: "Hell is an uncomfortable place to make a bed in, where there is no rest day or night; yet thousands will make their bed for ever in those flames;" Scott: "Should any one murder himself to terminate his sorrows, and escape the remorse of conscience, or the consequences of his sins, he must certainly be disappointed."

9. If I take the wings of the morning, and dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea;

10. Even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me. The first clause of v. 9 contains as striking and beautiful a figure as is found in any language. Light travels even more swiftly than lightning, and the morning rays fly on the swiftest wings. Mendelssohn: "In a moment the dawn of the morning is spread over the horizon." On this figure is based that of Mal. iv. 2. As the Mediterranean sea lay towards sunset from Judea, sea is probably put here for the west. Thus we preserve a close connection in the sentence. Lead, a verb almost uniformly so rendered, or guide. The doctrine of divine guidance is abundantly taught in Scripture, Gen. xxiv. 48; Ex. xv. 13; Deut. xxxii. 12; Ps. v. 8; xxiii. 3; lxxiii. 24. Hold, take, take hold of, catch, have possession of. To possess is the idea here, and well agrees with the thread of discourse. Dathe thinks God's gracious presence in defence is intended.

11. If I say, Surely the darkness shall cover me; even the night shall be light about me. Darkness protects us from the sight of men; but omniscience regards neither that nor any other covering. It mixes figures and destroys the unity of discourse to understand by darkness calamity, trouble. The Psalmist is celebrating the omnipresence, omniscience and omnipotence of Jehovah, and not his pity to the miserable. For the assertions of this verse, the prophet assigns a reason:

12. Yea, the darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee. The first clause is literally, Darkness will not make dark from thee. Like the sun, God's presence converts midnight into noon. In his light even we mortals see light. Among men much is said of 'covert designs.' But there are absolutely no such things. All purposes are as fully known to God before as after they are carried out. There is no greater infatuation, than that which leads us to act as if God did not see, and remember.

13. For thou hast possessed my reins; thou hast covered me in my mother's womb. Possessed, the same word is used in regard to the Son of God, Pr. viii. 22. It is often rendered bought, purchased, redeemed. It expresses perfect ownership and so implies intimate knowledge of the thing owned. Reins, kidneys, the most secret part of the human body, see on Ps. vii. 9; xvi. 7. The clause declares God's perfect acquaintance with the most secret things pertaining to us. Yea, more, the Lord covered, hedged in, protected, defended us in embryo. The verb is in the future, but clearly the preterite should be used in the translation. See Introduction, § 6. So wonderful knowledge, wisdom, power and goodness as are suggested by any right views of our own origin at once awaken adoring gratitude:

14. I will praise thee; for I am fearfully and wonderfully made: marvellous are thy works; and that my soul knoweth right well. Praise, often, give thanks, as in Ps. cxxxvi. 1, 2, 3. The very thought of his creation stirs his soul, and awakens praise. The least violence or the slightest disorder may take our lives. The fearfulness of our organization results from the infinite skill and perfections of the Creator. Neither man nor angel could devise anything at once so nice and so strong, so curious and so useful. Am wonderfully made, one word, cognate to that rendered marvellous works in Ps. ix. 1. An eminent proficient in anatomy said, that if any man could see his own danger from motion, he would be afraid to leap, or walk, or even breathe. Well does the prophet add, Marvellous are thy works. This clause declares the lively sense the Psalmist had of the wonders of physiology. Patrick: "I was, I know not how, in such a wonderful manner formed, that the thoughts of it strike me with astonishment."

15. My substance was not hid from thee, when I was made in secret, and curiously wrought in the lowest parts of the earth. Substance, not the word so rendered in v. 16, but one in the margin rendered strength or body; church of England and Jebb, bones; Alexander, frame. Curiously wrought; margin, embroidered. The cognate noun is in Ps. xlv. 14 and elsewhere, rendered needlework; in Ezek. xvi. 10 and often, broidered work. Hammond: "The flesh and bones and skin and nerves and arteries are so artificially weaved together, that no embroidery or carpet-work in the world can compare with it." In the lowest parts of the earth, that is, in the womb, which is as completely beyond our notice as are the lowest caverns of earth. Compare Job i. 21. Walford: "The figure is derived from the darkness and obscurity of caverns and other recesses of the earth."

16. Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being imperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them. As all the parts of Solomon's temple were in the original plan, so when God builds the temple of our bodies, he does it by his book, in which all is written beforehand. He works not extemporaneously even in making one human body. Substance yet being imperfect, one word, found nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible, and its cognate verb is found but once (2 Kings ii. 8), where it is rendered wrapped together. The Chaldee renders it my body; Calvin, shapelessness; Street, imperfect limbs; Hengstenberg, me, when I was still unprepared. All my members, all parts of my frame and body. In continuance, in the course of days, or by days. Phillips: "They (my members) have been daily formed, or forming. They were not formed at once, but gradually; each day increasing in strength and size."

17. How precious also are thy thoughts unto me, O God! how great is the sum of them! Church of England: How dear are thy counsels unto me; Street: Of how great value have thy thoughts concerning me been! Fry: How wonderful are thy thoughts concerning me; Hengstenberg: How precious are to me, O God, thy thoughts. Precious, see on Ps. xlix. 8. Sum, in the plural heads, tops, companies, principal; sometimes numerically as in Ex. xxx. 12.

18. If I should count them, they are more in number than the sand: when I awake, I am still with thee. With his mind occupied with these "thoughts" of God, he lay down to sleep at night, and when he awoke, finding that God was still pouring mercies upon him, he resumed the theme of his reflections. Pool: "These are my last thoughts when I lie down, and my first when I rise."

19. Surely thou wilt slay the wicked, O God: depart from me therefore, ye bloody men. Surely, in Num. xiv. 30, doubtless; in 1 Sam. xxi. 5, of a truth; in Jer. xv. 11, verity. As certainly as God gives life to the just, so certainly will he kill the wicked, or ungodly. This God does in a thousand ways. He is at no loss for means or instruments. His withdrawal is death. As the doom of incorrigible sinners is fixed, it is the part of wisdom and of piety to renounce their friendship and their companionship. Bloody men, literally, men of bloods, meaning those who had shed, or who sought to shed blood, as in Ps. xxvi. 9.

20. For they speak against thee wickedly, and thine enemies take thy name in vain. No man can sin against man but that he sins against God by violating his law. He who fears not God, commonly has no regard to man. Men of blood are never fair and candid, but speak wicked devices against God. And who ever saw a bloody man that was not profane?

21. Do not I hate them, O LORD, that hate thee? and am I not grieved with those that rise up against thee? This is not a question calling for information. It is an affirmation with a solemn appeal to the Searcher of hearts, as witness of his sincerity. The hatred here spoken of is displacency, and not malevolence. It is against the ways and characters, not against the persons of the wicked. It was accompanied with deep and ingenuous grief, not so much for any suffering brought on the prophet, as for the dishonor directed against God.

22. I hate them with perfect hatred: I count them mine enemies. Pool: "I am no less grieved with their enmity against thee, than if they directed it against myself."

23. Search me, O God, and know my heart: try me, and know my thoughts:

24. And see if there be any wicked way in me, and lead me in the way everlasting. In the beginning of the Psalm, the prophet had celebrated the omniscience of God, and had taught the doctrine that he was the Searcher of hearts. Here he implores the exercise of that omniscience in his own case, not because he was faultless, but because, being faulty even beyond his own knowledge, he desired the scrutiny of omniscience, that no lust might remain unmortified, no religious error uncorrected, and no duty unknown or undone. Search, as in v. 1. Try, so rendered in Ps. xi. 4, 5; in Ps. xvii. 3 and often, prove; in Ps. xxvi. 2, examine. Know; the same form of the same verb in both cases. It is very comprehensive and implies intimate acquaintance. See on v. 1. Wicked way, margin, way of pain or grief, that is a way that grieves God's Spirit, grieves good men, and must finally grieve me. The way everlasting is the one good old path trodden by pious patriarchs, prophets and saints of all ages, and leading to eternal life.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. There is no better shape, in which to mould our highest views in theology, than that of devotion, a psalm, a prayer, as this poem shows. Henry: "Divine truths look full as well when they are prayed over, as when they are preached over: and much better than when they are disputed over."

2. If, as some think, this Psalm was written, when David's good name was through calumnies under a cloud, it tells all the slandered what to do. Let them go to God in such an hour with the joyous testimony of a good conscience; and he will be to such the God of all comfort.

3. Each of the divine perfections is in its turn for our consolation and edification. Omnipotence protects, mercy forgives, faithfulness preserves, omniscience searches us, vv. 1, 23. It is God's plan and our interest to have our hearts and ways subjected to the scrutiny of omniscience, which is thorough, infallible and infinitely holy in all its examinations.

4. It is a sign of true piety, when we are pleased with all the divine attributes, even the omniscience and justice of God, and implore the examination to which the intuitive and unerring knowledge of the Most High subjects us, vv. 1, 23. The better our spiritual state, the more will we betake ourselves to God, and rest satisfied only as we can approve ourselves to him alone.

5. The knowledge of God is absolutely perfect in kind and degree. There can be no addition made to it, vv. 1-6. Of course we can no more comprehend God's knowledge, than his eternity. We can wonder and adore, and there we must stop.

6. If our dealings are with God as the Searcher of hearts, hypocrisy is both superlative folly and superlative wickedness. It cannot effect any of its objects, and it is a direct insult to God. Before omniscience simulation and dissimulation are alike futile. False pretences have no power to hide anything from God. The hope of the hypocrite shall both justly and terribly perish.

7. How great is human ignorance when brought into comparison with divine knowledge, v. 6. No man knows a millionth part of the propositions which constitute universal truth. Men are blind and cannot see afar off. The greatest are but as children, 1 Cor. xiii. 11, 12. Men have but broken fragments of truth in this life. Luther: "All we are, and all we do, are not our own wisdom or doing." Dickson: "We see most of God, when we view him as incomprehensible, and see ourselves swallowed up in the thoughts of his perfection."

8. The doctrine of the omnipresence and omniscience of God is of excellent use in many ways. By the help of divine grace it warns and encourages us at the same time. Were we not exceedingly prone to sin, it would powerfully control us. A man has been held back from a crime by the presence of his little child. How then should the presence of Jehovah restrain us. It is a small thing to be seen of man's eye, or judged of man's judgment; but to live and act under the scrutiny of God is well suited to make us solemn and cautious. Yet God's Holy Spirit must change and renew the heart, or it will never turn from wickedness. Men cannot be frightened out of their iniquities.

9. The attributes of God are harmonious. One is not in conflict with another. Omniscience and omnipresence are but names given to the distinct attributes of the infinite and undivided excellence of the one living and true God, vv. 1-13. Nor are these or any of God's perfections discordant in their influence on good men. Tholuck: "The thought of the omniscience of God ought in every prayer to purify our souls, while that of his omnipresence ought to sanctify it." Scott: "The belief of God's omnipresence is intimately connected with that of his omniscience, and is of similar efficacy."

10. No madness exceeds that of the poor guilty wretch, who expects to elude the eye or the arm of God, vv. 7-13. Calvin: "We are ashamed to let men know and witness our delinquencies; but we are as indifferent to what God may think of us, as if our sins were covered and veiled from his inspection." Morison: "There is something awfully penetrating in the thought of our being the immediate objects of the divine inspection and scrutiny."

11. As creation at first awakened the song of the heavenly host; so the due consideration of our own creation should deeply affect us, and we should often and adoringly dwell upon it, vv. 14-16. Just reflections on our own origin and preservation would mightily strengthen our faith and prepare us for many trials.

12. As architects and embroiderers have a plan by which they accomplish their designs; so has God also his plan, his counsel, his purpose, his book, according to which he reigns and does all things, even to the formation of a human body in the womb, v. 16. Luther: "The Psalmist here proclaims that incomprehensibleness of the divine wisdom and goodness, whereby, in a wonderful manner, he himself and all men, with all their affairs, all their works and all their thoughts, both the greatest and the least, were predestinated of God from everlasting. This manifold wisdom of God is incomprehensible to flesh and blood."

13. There is no light, in which we can seriously view God's care of us, that his tender love to us and his watchfulness over us are not amazing and precious to a right-minded man.

14. The doom of the incorrigible is certain, fixed and dreadful, v. 19. They are the enemies of God by wicked works; and God is their enemy by righteous indignation, and will fight against them and slay them all.

15. We must either break with sinners, or perish with them, v. 19.

16. Ever since men were sinners, their wickedness has been breaking out in hard speeches against God, v. 20. It will be so to the end, Jude 14, 15.

17. God's people willingly make common cause with him, vv. 21, 22. His law is their law; his will is their will; his friends are their friends; his enemies are their enemies.

18. But in our hatred of sin we should carefully guard against all malice, all private pique, all personal enmity, and abhor the characters of the wicked only as they are abhorrent to God, vv. 21, 22. Morison: "Even our very condemnation of what is evil requires to be tested. Does it spring from love to God? from hatred of sin? from attachment to holiness? from a desire not to countenance evil? or does it spring from ostentation?—from censorious feeling?—from hypocritical pretence? from a desire to please certain of our fellow-creatures?"

18. Whoever would walk in the right way must be led by the Almighty. Otherwise he will surely err and that fatally, going in the way of grief, v. 24.

19. We cannot account for the existence of this poem but on the supposition that it was taught by inspiration. Fleury: "Let the modern wits, after this, look upon the honest shepherds of Palestine, as a company of rude and unpolished clowns; let them, if they can, produce from profane authors thoughts that are more sublime, more delicate, or better turned; not to mention the sound divinity, and solid piety couched under these expressions."

PSALM CXL.

To the chief Musician, A Psalm of David.

1 Deliver me, O LORD, from the evil man: preserve me from the violent man;

2 Which imagine mischiefs in their hearts; continually are they gathered together for war.

3 They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent; adders' poison is under their lips. Selah.

4 Keep me, O LORD, from the hands of the wicked; preserve me from the violent man; who have purposed to overthrow my goings.

5 The proud have hid a snare for me, and cords; they have spread a net by the way side; they have set gins for me. Selah.

6 I said unto the LORD, Thou art my God: hear the voice of my supplications, O LORD.

7 O GOD the Lord, the strength of my salvation, thou hast covered my head in the day of battle.

8 Grant not, O LORD, the desires of the wicked: further not his wicked device; lest they exalt themselves. Selah.

9 As for the head of those that compass me about, let the mischief of their own lips cover them.

10 Let burning coals fall upon them: let them be cast into the fire; into deep pits, that they rise not up again.

11 Let not an evil speaker be established in the earth: evil shall hunt the violent man to overthrow him.

12 I know that the LORD will maintain the cause of the afflicted, and the right of the poor.

13 Surely the righteous shall give thanks unto thy name: the upright shall dwell in thy presence.

ON the title see on titles of Psalms iii. iv. The Hebrew, all the ancient versions and the great mass of modern scholars ascribe this Psalm to David. The internal evidence is clear. There is not like agreement respecting the historic occasion of its composition. The Syriac fixes it to the time when Saul attempted to kill David by hurling the spear at him. Theodoret assigns it to the time when Saul, urged on by Doeg and the Ziphites, was pursuing David. With him many coincide in opinion. All this however is conjecture. It is clear this ode was written after the great promise made to David in 2 Sam. vii.; and that it was written during the Sauline persecution. Scott dates it B. C. 1060; Clarke, B. C. about 1061. The names of God here found are Jehovah LORD, Adonai Lord and El God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; ii. 4; v. 4. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Deliver me, O LORD, from the evil man: preserve me from the violent man. Deliver and preserve both often used in a military sense. The former expresses rescue and the latter defence by power. Yet they are often used indefinitely; see on Ps. vi. 4; xii. 7. There is no significancy in the use of the two different Hebrew words [Adam and Ish] for man in v. 1. In v. 12, we have but one and the same word. See Introduction, § 16. Evil, in v. 2, in the plural, mischiefs. The violent man, literally the man of violences. In Ps. vii. 16, the same word is rendered violent dealing; in Ps. xxvii. 12, cruelty. Both clauses of the verse well describe the character of Saul and of the lying, blood-thirsty creatures, who lent themselves to his nefarious designs,

2. Which imagine mischiefs in their heart; continually are they gathered together for war. The mischiefs, evils, troubles, which they have devised, are for others, not for themselves. Bad men are fruitful in plots against the righteous. Nor are they nice or scrupulous about the measures employed. They are ready for war, plural wars, fightings. One apparent, temporary advantage, which the wicked have over the righteous, is that the former have no conscience about the means they use to effect their purposes. They are ever ready to proceed to extremities.

3. They have sharpened their tongues like a serpent; adders' poison is under their lips. Most of the editions of the English Bible make tongue and adder plural. In Hebrew they are singular. Serpent, a generic term for cunning and venomous reptiles. Adder, here only; it is another word rendered adder elsewhere. A sharp tongue is a figure in many languages. Often the tongue of the serpent is spoken of as the seat of its venom. This is popular, not scientific language. The whole tribe of serpents have sharp tongues. The poison of several kinds found in the east is deadly. The wickedness here described was exhibited by Saul and his associates; but it did not die out with them, Rom. iii. 13. Saul was but a sample of the manner in which human nature acts out its venomous depravity.

4. Keep me, O LORD, from the hands of the wicked; preserve me from the violent man; who have purposed to overthrow my goings. Keep, often found in Ps. cxix., applied to keeping God's word. Preserve, as in v. 1. Wicked, in Ps. i., ungodly. Violent man, as in v. 1. Purposed, thought, conceived, imagined, devised, counted, reckoned. To overthrow goings—an Orientalism—is to subvert plans and to destroy prospects.

5. The proud have hid a snare for me, and cords: they have spread a net by the way side; they have set gins for me. Snare, in the Psalms uniformly rendered. See on Ps. xi. 6; lxix. 22; xci. 3; cxix. 110; cxxiv. 7; in Job xviii. 9, gin. Cords, in Ps. xvi. 6, lines; in Ps. xviii. 4, 5, sorrows; in Ps. cxix. 61, bands. Here the reference is to the snares in which cords were used. Net, uniformly rendered. See on Ps. ix. 15. The artifice of David's foes was exceeded only by their malice. Candor and fair dealing belong not to sin.

6. I said unto the LORD, Thou art my God: hear the voice of my supplications, O LORD. He is pleading the covenant relation with God, as in Ps. iii. 7 and often. On the last clause see on Ps. xxviii. 2, 6.

7. O God the Lord, the strength of my salvation, thou hast covered my head in the day of battle. In rendering Jehovah God, our version followed some old translations. No deliverance can be relied on except as it comes from God. He is the strength, on which we must depend.

8. Grant not, O LORD, the desires of the wicked: further not his wicked device; lest they exalt themselves. Such a prayer is always safe. The wickedness of the desires and plans of the ungodly is utterly repugnant to the holiness of God. His whole nature pledges him to oppose and not to further the schemes of his enemies. Were it otherwise they would be elated even more than they are. Their insolence is often intolerable.

9. As for the head of those that compass me about, let the mischief of their own lips cover them. Cover, in the future, shall cover. The verse contains a clear avowal of the doctrine of retribution in kind, Ps. vii. 15, 16; xviii. 25, 26.

10. Let burning coals fall upon them: let them be cast into the fire; into deep pits, that they rise not up again. The verbs are in the future; see Introduction, § 6. The destruction by coals and fire, has an allusion to the overthrow of the cities of the plain. This mode of speaking is preserved to the close of Scripture. Deep pits; Doway, miseries; Calvin, deeps; Horsley, chasms of the yawning earth; Alexander, deep waters. The word is found nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible. It is a feminine plural. The deluge furnished the figure of floods; the customs of the holy land that of pits; though Luther thinks the imagery is drawn from the destruction of Pharaoh and his host by lightning from heaven and by water. Jerome understands pits of water. The phrase is a threatening of final and perpetual ruin.

11. Let not an evil speaker be established in the earth: evil shall hunt the violent man to overthrow him. Evil speaker, literally the man of tongue, meaning one of lawless speech, who slanders man and reproaches God. Violent man, literally man of violence, as in v. 1, only here violence is in the singular. Both the verbs are in the future and are best so rendered. Hunt, there is no better rendering. Sometimes it is rendered chase. Evil shall hunt them till it finds them out. It shall hotly pursue them till it overtakes them.

12. I know that the LORD will maintain the cause of the afflicted, and the right of the poor. God's perfections and promises, united with David's own experience, assured him that in the end the Lord would show himself favorable to the poor and needy. On afflicted and poor, see on Ps. ix. 12, where the former is rendered humble, and Ps. ix. 18, where the latter is rendered needy.

13. Surely the righteous shall give thanks unto thy name: the upright shall dwell in thy presence. Give thanks or praise. The righteous shall have cause and shall have a heart for this work. Upright, as in Ps. vii. 10, also rendered righteous. Dwell, or sit, i. e., have their abode in thy presence, in this world, and especially in heaven above, where there is fulness of joy. Calvin: "To dwell before God's face is to be cherished and sustained by his fatherly regards."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. This Psalm, like many others, shows that the best men are often brought into great perils by the wicked; so that none but God can deliver or preserve them, v. 1.

2. The wicked continually prove that their hatred is deadly, vv. 2, 3. The evidence is as clear as day. The facts are countless and indisputable.

3. The arts of falsehood, slander and abuse are as old as sin in the world, v. 3. Dickson: "When the wicked have vented deadly lies of the godly, they have in readiness new slanders and capital crimes to charge them with falsely;" Morison: "All persecutors of the church in every age have been thus distinguished—they have first traduced the objects of their hate, and then thirsted for their blood;" Horne: "Slander and calumny always precede and accompany persecution, because malice itself cannot excite people against a good man, as such; to do this, he must first be represented as a bad man. Thus David was hunted as a rebel, Christ was crucified as a blasphemer, and the primitive Christians were tortured as guilty of incest and murder."

4. But let the righteous betake themselves to Jehovah, v. 4. He can keep, preserve and defend one saint against a million of fallen spirits. His power, his wisdom, his pity, his grace are all-sufficient.

5. And let us not be afraid with any amazement. Human and diabolical cunning is no match for infinite wisdom. The wiles of the devil are not to be compared with the counsels of God, v. 5.

6. Therefore cleave to Jehovah, and plead his covenant at all times, v. 6. Cast not away your confidence which hath great recompense of reward. Pray, wait and hope—hope, wait and pray. The Lord hath pleasure in those that hope in his mercy.

7. If we have escaped dangers seen or unseen, it was solely by the providence of God, v. 7. To him be all the glory of our deliverances, even where he employs men as instruments.

8. Good men live by prayer, vv. 1, 4, 6, 8. He who gets to the throne of grace is covered by the cloud of glory, through which no sun can smite by day, nor moon by night.

9. Pride and insolence are elements of iniquity, and crop out on every occasion of even temporary triumph, v. 8. It is to all the righteous a mercy when God lays his almighty hand on the wicked, and depresses their state, or hurls them from place and power, as he did Saul, Belshazzar and many others. Henry: "Proud men, when they prosper, are made prouder, grow more impudent against God, and insolent against his people."

10. Evil speeches and evil deeds will be sure in due time to return on the pate of their authors, vv. 9, 10. The law of retaliation is fixed in the divine government. Horne: "Those tongues which have contributed to set the world on fire, shall be tormented with the hot burning coals of eternal vengeance."

11. Evil speakers and violent men may have their triumph, but it shall be short, and unless God grant timely repentance, it shall be followed by untold plagues and inconceivable torments, v. 11. Dickson: "Backbiters and calumniators shall not only be debarred from heaven, but also God's curse shall follow them on earth, and not suffer them nor their posterity to enjoy quiet prosperity in the world."

12. Evil pursues the sinner through all his windings, and to the lowest hell. The Chaldee: "He shall be hunted by the angel of death, and thrust into hell." Compare Amos v. 19. Calvin: "The more the ungodly look for impunity and escape, they only precipitate themselves more certainly upon destruction."

13. Were the poor and needy left to themselves, all issues would be to them fatal. But God is on their side, and so they always in the end maintain their ground and secure their rights, v. 12. Even if overborne here, the day of judgment will set all right. Things will not then be settled by clamor, tumult or majorities. "God is the patron of innocence; much more of persecuted piety."

14. Dark, and cold, and dismal as the times of the righteous often appear in this life, all will end in thanks, and praise, and glory. Clarke: "The persecuted have ever been dear to God." He is often best pleased with them when the storm against them is most pitiless.

15. As in all his trials David was a type of the suffering Saviour, and as they both were humbled before they were exalted, and suffered before they entered into rest; so shall it be with all the righteous. The cross here, the crown hereafter. Grace now, glory in eternity. Blessed be God for this admirable order.

PSALM CXLI.

A Psalm of David.

- 1 LORD, I cry unto thee: make haste unto me; give ear unto my voice, when I cry unto thee.
 2 Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense; and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice.
 3 Set a watch, O LORD, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips.
 4 Incline not my heart to any evil thing, to practise wicked works with men that work iniquity: and let me not eat of their dainties.
 5 Let the righteous smite me; it shall be a kindness: and let him reprove me; it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head: for yet my prayer also shall be in their calamities.
 6 When their judges are overthrown in stony places, they shall hear my words; for they are sweet.
 7 Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth.
 8 But mine eyes are unto thee, O God the Lord: in thee is my trust; leave not my soul destitute.
 9 Keep me from the snares which they have laid for me, and the gins of the workers of iniquity.
 10 Let the wicked fall into their own nets, whilst that I withal escape.

ON the title see on title of Psalm iii. The remarks made on the authorship of Psalm cxl. are almost without exception applicable to this. Some refer its origin to events recorded in 1 Sam. xxiv.; others, to events recorded in 1 Sam. xxvi. There is no reason to doubt that it was written during those ten dreadful years, when Saul and his bloody crew beset David. Patrick: "Nobody need wonder, that there are so many prayers founded upon the same subject; for that persecution endured long, and they were made upon different occasions, or for different purposes." The scope of this ode is clearly a prayer for grace to restrain his temper and his tongue in a time of wanton injuries received from those, whom he had never wronged. Scott dates it B. C. 1057; Clarke, B. C. about 1061; De Wette considers it one of the oldest. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD and Adonai Lord, on which see on Ps. i. 2; ii. 4. As in Ps. cxl. 7, so also in v. 8 of this Psalm we have Jehovah Adonai rendered GOD the Lord.

1. LORD, I cry unto thee: make haste unto me; give ear unto my voice, when I cry unto thee. Every phrase of this verse has been already considered. See on Ps. xvii. 6; xxii. 19; lxx. 1; lxxi. 12. The whole verse is well rendered.

2. Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense; and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice. Prayer and lifting up of hands are equivalent terms; and so are incense and the evening sacrifice. The verb is in the future, shall be set forth, or established. The carnal ordinances pointed to spiritual services. David and his faithful friends, now deprived of the privileges of the appointed worship in the tabernacle, desire God to hear and answer them in their lowly condition, even as if they had the altar, and the services connected therewith. Sacrifice, not the word commonly denoting a bloody sacrifice though so used in Gen. iv. 3-5; but the evening oblation, or meat-offering. See on Ps. xx. 3. Clarke: "As he could not worship according to the letter of the law, he will worship God according to the spirit." On lifting up hands see on Ps. xxviii. 2.

3. Set a watch, O LORD, before my mouth; keep the door of my lips. Watch, here only, literally a keeping. Door, not found elsewhere, but well rendered. Both clauses ask for the close and ceaseless vigilance of omniscient purity over him, and contain a confession that he could not sufficiently guard himself against the abuse of speech, to which his circumstances tempted him. Edwards: Set a watch at my mouth, Jehovah; a guard at the door of my lips; Street: Place, O Jehovah, a watch upon my mouth, a guard upon the door of my lips.

4. Incline not my heart to any evil thing, to practise wicked works with men that work iniquity: and let me not eat of their dainties. For thing some read word. The original will bear either. It is commonly rendered word, but in Ps. xlv. 1, matter; in Ps. ci. 3, thing; in Ps. cxii. 5, in the plural affairs. For practise wickedness Street has sin presumptuously. The last clause admits of these interpretations: 1. Let me not partake of feasts in honor of false gods; 2. Let me not eat things, however tempting, if they are forbidden in the law; 3. Let me not be a boon companion of wicked men at their feasts; 4. Let me not be tempted by their dainties to walk in their ways. The true sense is probably given in No. 3. Dainties, here only, delicacies, pleasant things.

5. Let the righteous smite me; it shall be a kindness: and let him reprove me, it shall be an excellent oil, which shall not break my head: for yet my prayer also shall be in their calamities. The ancient versions and modern translations give us very little aid in interpreting this passage. A minute consideration of the several terms and phrases brings us to about the same result as we reach by the common version. The term righteous is in the singular. Fry renders it the Just One. Thöluck, Hengstenberg and Alexander by it understand God. Calvin, Diodati, Döderlein, Patrick, Jebb, Rosenmüller, French and Skinner substantially agree with the authorized version. If it is the Lord who smites, then the Psalmist looks upon divine corrections as marks of fatherly love; if a pious man, then his rebukes are the fruits of brotherly kindness. The latter is probably the correct view. If so, it is parallel to Prov. ix. 8 and kindred passages. The last clause may refer to the calamities of the righteous or of the wicked. In the former case, the prophet says he will pray for his faithful reprovers; in the latter, for his bitter enemies. The former perhaps gives the true idea. Scott: "Jealous of himself in so ensnaring a situation, the Psalmist prayed that some pious friend might ever be present to reprove him sharply, if he yielded to temptation. This he would take as a kindness; sensible that it would neither break his head, nor cause him to hang it down in dejection: but, being insinuating and healing, like an excellent oil, it would be very useful to him; and he would requite the benefit by praying for them in their calamities, if he had no other way of expressing his gratitude."

6. When their judges are overthrown in stony places, they shall hear my words; for they are sweet. Many give a different, but none a better rendering. Street makes this verse and the next contain the prayer of which mention is made in v. 5, and so puts the verbs in the optative. There is no ground for the opinion of some that the words here are those of Jehovah, and not of David. Does not this verse contain a prophecy of the overthrow of Saul and his partizans? That awful event was early followed by the people turning to David, and admitting that his words were sweet, pleasant, delightful. They received him as their king and as a prophet also. The reference to the rocks is poetical and borrowed from scenery with which Israelites were familiar. Horne gives quite a different turn to the verse, making it refer to David's tenderness in dismissing Saul from the sides of the rock unhurt. But this, though consonant with history, is hardly to be received.

7. Our bones are scattered at the grave's mouth, as when one cutteth and cleaveth wood upon the earth. Three views of this passage deserve notice, 1. For wood some read earth, and then infer that as the earth is broken and cleft by ploughing in order to a crop, so our bones are scattered at the entrance of the invisible world [Hebrew Sheol] in order to a glorious resurrection. Compare John xii. 24. The Chaldee, Syriac and Septuagint regard the last clause as referring to ploughing the earth. 2. Others think the verbs point to the cutting and splitting of wood as the latter is so used in Ecc. x. 9, and gather this meaning, that men perish like the trees of the forest, and that their bones are scattered and unheeded like sticks of wood. 3. Another and a better meaning is gathered by supposing that David refers to the perils to which he and his associates were exposed. It was at the hazard of life that any man espoused his cause. See 1 Sam. xxii. 9-19. The allusion to this fearful tragedy was both natural and pertinent in this place, and well contrasts the conduct of David praying for his enemies with their blood-thirstiness.

8. But mine eyes are unto thee, O God the Lord: in thee is my trust; leave not my soul destitute. The darker the times, the more did David look to Jehovah, the Ruler. The first clause has a parallel in Ps. xxv. 15; cxxiii. 1, 2. It expresses longing and confiding expectation. The last clause is variously rendered. Calvin, Edwards, Jebb and Fry support our version. The Chaldee, Hengstenberg and Alexander: Pour not out my soul; Syriac and Street: Reject not my soul; margin: Make not my soul bare; Arabic: Destroy not my soul; Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate and Doway: Take not away my soul; Fabritius: Bring not my soul to nothing; Piscator, Venema, Amesius, Tremellius and Junius: Strip not my soul; church of England: O cast not out my soul. The verb is rendered pour, pour out, in Isa. xxxii. 15; liii. 12. It seems therefore to be a plea for life—life brought into danger. This view is rather strengthened by the prayer of the next verse,

9. Keep me from the snares which they have laid for me, and the gins of the workers of iniquity. On snares and gins see on Ps. xi. 6; lxix. 22; cxix. 110; cxxiv. 7; cxi. 5. Literally, keep me from the hands of the snares. Keep, vigilantly and safely preserve. Workers of iniquity, those who are habitually and allowedly wicked.

10. Let the wicked fall into their own nets, whilst that I withal escape. Nets, here only, well rendered. Fall, in the future shall fall; a prediction. See Introduction, § 6. Escape, future shall escape, margin pass over.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. When evil men beset and harass the pious, their resort is a throne of grace, v. 1. The greater their distress, the louder are their cries. All human aid withdrawn, they look to God alone, nor are they disappointed.

2. In the eyes of God's real people prayer is not an end, but a means; nor can they ever rest satisfied with the service, while they have no evidence of acceptance, v. 2. We cannot too carefully remember that prayer is a spiritual sacrifice demanding the heart and soul.

3. Hearty prayer sets men against sin in every shape and form, vv. 3, 4. Morison: "The spirit of prayer is the spirit of holiness; and he, who communes intimately with his God, will come forth from his presence with the desire of walking circumspectly in all his ordinances and commandments."

4. The more the righteous knows of himself, the more earnestly does he desire and seek the grace of God to restrain, guard and sanctify him, v. 3. Experience unites with Scripture in teaching him that no human wisdom or virtue can control that unruly member the tongue, unless God in his mercy takes charge of the mouth, and guides our speech. This is specially true when we are reviled, slandered, persecuted. Calvin: "Nothing is more difficult than for the victims of unjust persecution to bridle their speech, and submit silently and without complaint to injuries." Then, if ever the righteous should cry for grace and strength. Horne: "A Christian, living among unbelievers and sensualists in the world, hath abundant reason to put up the same prayers, and use the same precautions."

5. Nor is the child of God satisfied merely with the control of his tongue; but wishes his temper, his spirit watched and guarded, preserved and sanctified by the Lord, v. 4. His honest and thorough conviction is that of Solomon: "He that is slow to anger is better than the mighty; and he that ruleth his spirit, than he that taketh a city," Pr. xvi. 32. The most secret sin is worse than public reproach.

6. If we are not willing to be reproved by God or man in the kindness of love, we have not the temper of saints, and cannot expect to mend our faults, or prepare for a better world, v. 5. Luther: "I had rather that true and faithful teachers should rebuke and condemn me, and reprove my ways, than that hypocrites should flatter me and applaud me as a saint." Calvin: "It is not agreeable to corrupt nature to be reproved when we sin, but David had brought himself to that degree of docility and self-denial, which led him to consider no reproof distasteful, which he knew to proceed from the spirit of kindness." Compare Pr. vi. 23; xxvii. 6.

7. However long the wicked may seem to have things their own way, and tread down the righteous, they shall finally be overthrown in a terrible manner, v. 6. It was so with Saul, 1 Sam. xxxi. 1-10. It shall be so with all, who do not by timely repentance turn to God, Eccle. viii. 12, 13.

8. What is more fickle or unstable than popular favor? v. 6. The successful and the powerful seldom lack adherents. The men, who were so zealous for Saul, soon found, when he was dead, that David's words were sweet. The masses of men are so unthinking, take so little pains to inform themselves, and are so much governed by prejudice and passion, and especially so blindly follow leaders and majorities, that it is a marvel that any truth or any good man survives.

9. It is nothing unusual for oppressed innocence to be denied a hearing, and for the most brutal treatment to be dealt out to the well-deserving, v. 7. It has always been so. It is so still. It will be so as long as sin is rampant. The malice of the wicked is truly terrible.

10. The more cruel men become, and the more popular violence rages, the more must the pious sufferer look to God—to God alone, v. 8. Clarke: "In all times, in all places, on all occasions, I will cleave unto the Lord, and put my whole confidence in him." True Christian heroism does not proceed from strong nerves, or brute courage, but from a faith, which against hope believes in hope.

11. In certain circumstances and with submission to the will of God, we may pray for the lengthening of our days, v. 8. See REMARKS on Ps. xxxix. 13.

12. The worst snares are not those set to rob us of our estates, our liberties, our good names, or our lives; but those designed to rob us of a good conscience, of the fear and love of God, and of spiritual peace. From the wiles of the devil and the cunning craftiness of wicked men God alone and God only can keep us, v. 8.

13. God can frustrate any devices formed against us, even when for a time they threaten to destroy us; and all the plots of all impenitent plotters shall finally entangle and overwhelm their authors, v. 10. "No law can be more just than that the architects of destruction should perish by their own contrivances." "All that are bound over to God's justice are held by the cords of their own iniquity."

14. Let not the hunted and afflicted child of God be cast down with over much sorrow. Better times are coming.

PSALM CXLII.

Maschil of David; A Prayer when he was in the cave.

1 I cried unto the LORD with my voice; with my voice unto the LORD did I make my supplication.

2 I poured out my complaint before him; I shewed before him my trouble.

3 When my spirit was overwhelmed within me, then thou knewest my path. In the way wherein I walked have they privily laid a snare for me.

4 I looked on my right hand, and beheld, but there was no man that would know me: refuge failed me; no man cared for my soul.

5 I cried unto thee, O LORD: I said, Thou art my refuge and my portion in the land of the living.

6 Attend unto my cry; for I am brought very low: deliver me from my persecutors; for they are stronger than I.

7 Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name: the righteous shall compass me about; for thou shalt deal bountifully with me.

THIS Psalm is styled both a Maschil and a Prayer. On Maschil see on title of Ps. xxxii.; on Prayer, see on title of Ps. xvii. Both the author and his condition are determined by the title. Expositors are not agreed whether it relates to David's hiding in the cave of Adullam, 1 Sam. xxii.; or to his refuge in the cave of En-ge-di, 1 Sam. xxiv.; or whether it merely refers in general to the life he led when the rocks and caves furnished him a home. Calvin, Anderson and others suppose a special reference to En-ge-di; Morison, Horne and others, to Adullam; Hengstenberg and Alexander, to cave-life generally. The Psalm contains thoughts suitable to a time when many regarded David's affairs as desperate. The only name of the Almighty here found is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2. Scott dates it B. C. 1060. Clarke affixes no date, though he thinks it may be old.

1. I cried unto the LORD with my voice; with my voice unto the LORD did I make my supplication. Both verbs are in the future. Cried expresses much earnestness. Made supplication, offered humble and fervent entreaties. Alexander: "It means, according to its etymology, a prayer for grace and mercy." With my voice, the same word in both cases, implying audible and not merely mental prayer. Joining all these words and phrases expresses great liveliness and earnestness in prayer.

2. I poured out my complaint before him; I shewed before him my trouble. Both verbs are in the future, yet are well rendered. See Introduction, § 6. Complaint, once rendered babbling, once talking, once communication, once prayer, once meditation, and nine times complaint. It expresses that which deeply occupies the mind. Trouble, elsewhere rendered distress, anguish, tribulation, adversity, affliction. Tholuck: "Peril so evident and imminent as that in which we find David, is sufficient to check the courage and destroy the faith of many an experienced Christian; to such an extent that he shall be at a loss to ease himself of his grief by prayer. But David enjoys perfect composure of mind, and unbosoms his cares before the Lord."

3. When my spirit was overwhelmed within me, then thou knewest my path. In the way wherein I walked have they privily laid a snare for me. Perhaps no verse in the Psalter is better translated, notwithstanding the purely Hebrew idiom of the original. The sense of the first clause turns on the word knewest. It implies perfect acquaintance with David's course of conduct and of suffering, and approval of his behaviour. To the upright God's omniscience is a great comfort. The second clause declares that arts of cunning and deceit were practised on him, not by him. Snare, as in Ps. cxi.

5; cxli. 9. What the particular device was we know not, but it was deadly. The sadder the case of his servants, the fitter the occasion for God to interpose:

4. I looked on my right hand, and beheld, but there was no man that would know me: refuge failed me; no man cared for my soul. The use of two verbs of the same import, looked and beheld, is not peculiar to this place; see Lam. i. 11, 12. The English version puts these verbs in the preterite, and is supported by the ancient versions, Doway, church of England, Jebb and others. Fry has 'he looked and beheld;' Edwards, 'I look.' But the Hebrew, the margin, Hengstenberg, Alexander, French and Skinner all have the imperative, look and see. This is best. David calls on the Lord to employ his omniscience in looking into his helpless condition. Know, as in v. 3, and used in the same sense. Refuge, as in Ps. lix. 16, literally a place to fly to, or flight itself, not the word rendered refuge in the next verse. Cared, a participle. The clause is literally, There is none caring, so rendered also in Deut. xi. 12. His adherents were so few that he speaks as if he had none.

5. I cried unto thee, O LORD: I said, Thou art my refuge and my portion in the land of the living. Cried, as in v. 1. It expresses great earnestness, as in a herald calling men together. Refuge, as in Ps. xiv. 6; xlv. 1; in Job xxiv. 8, shelter; in Jer. xvii. 17; Joel iii. 16, hope. Portion, commonly so rendered, also inheritance, Ps. xvi. 5; xvii. 14. In the land of the living, i. e., even in this world, where so many make other things their confidence.

6. Attend unto my cry; for I am brought very low: deliver me from my persecutors; for they are stronger than I. Attend, as in Ps. v. 2; xvii. 1, hearken, give heed, mark well. Brought low, as in Ps. lxxix. 8; cxvi. 6. Deliver, as in Ps. vii. 1; xxii. 20, and often. The strength of the enemy makes it necessary for Jehovah to appear, or his servant will be destroyed, and the promise fail.

7. Bring my soul out of prison, that I may praise thy name: the righteous shall compass me about; for thou shalt deal bountifully with me. Cave-life was prison life. There is no need of looking further for an explanation of prison. It is not the word rendered prison in the pentateuch. It signifies a place hemmed in, a place of limits. He says his release would be the signal for thanksgiving. The Psalm closes with an expression of lively hope, that just men will yet gather round him, unite their songs and sympathies with his, and eagerly learn the story of his perils and escapes. Deal bountifully, as in Ps. xiii. 6; cxvi. 7; cxix. 17.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Believer, art thou brought into great straits and perplexities? So was David in the cave. The Lord heard and helped him, and he will succor all who with like faith and courage betake themselves to the throne of grace. Scott: "There can be no situation so distressing, perilous, or disgraceful, in which faith will not derive comfort from God by fervent prayer."

2. There is no possibility of passing safely or comfortably through the world without prayer, vv. 1, 2, 5, 6, 7. What a poor worm was David himself, except as the Lord heard and answered him. His fellowship with God preserved his life from the violence of his enemies. It did more—it held him back from becoming a murderer when his great enemy was completely in his power.

3. The best men in the world may easily be brought into circumstances of overwhelming grief and solicitude, v. 3. This may come to pass in the most unexpected manner. The very deliverance wrought by David for his king and country gave him sore trouble. His monarch and his father-in-law became his most malignant foe.

4. Good men are often made to feel the need of resorting for comfort to the omniscience of God, who knows their path, past, present and future, v. 3. Our safety and solace are in "the unlimited vision of God." Compare Deut. ii. 7; Job xxiii. 10; Ps. xxxi. 7. No enemy can spread a snare for our feet, but it is known to Jehovah. If our wisdom is nonplused and our reason confounded, it is for a joy that Jehovah understands all mysteries, fathoms all depths, knows all hearts, and controls all causes.

5. No man knows what plots are formed against all that is precious to him, v. 3. But the Lord sees every snare and pit-fall. To him therefore should we betake ourselves every day and in all circumstances.

6. "When great straits come, worldly friends and all who may be in danger from helping us, will readily forsake us," v. 4. Who that has tried human friendships under severe yet fair tests has not been made sick at heart by the pusillanimity and selfishness of mortals? The world is full of "swallow-friends," who migrate in cold weather.

7. Reader, are you poor, helpless and friendless? Do not despair, but hope to the end, v. 4. Your case cannot be worse than was often that of the man after God's own heart.

8. God is such a refuge and such a portion, that he, who is in covenant with him needs no other shelter, no other inheritance, v. 5. And "the less comfort we find in the creature we should trust the more in God."

9. Saints of modern times should look at the days of old, and study the history of good men, whose foes and persecutors have been many, fierce, bloody, and often powerful, v. 6.

10. The enemies of God's people have no new arts to practise. They are all found in their Cainish tribe in past ages. Saul tried them all against David. He even gave him his daughter in the hope of ensnaring him. There is no persecutor, who is not a bad man, with a heart worse than his life, v. 6.

11. Hope on. Hope ever. Hope against hope. Every cloud, whose shadow falls on the righteous, has a bright side. In the darkest hour expect better times, v. 7.

12. As David by well-doing finally triumphed, saw his enemies perish, sat on the throne, and was lifted up above all his enemies round about, so shall it be with all the saints of God, even the humblest. Yea, more, as our Lord, of whom David was a type, rose from the dead and is highly exalted, notwithstanding his amazing humiliation and the hellish, though temporary triumph of his foes, so shall it be with all his followers. The final victory of one believer is well suited to give joy to all who know it; but the victory of the Crucified settles a thousand difficulties in minds that are not given over to unbelief.

PSALM CXLIII.

A Psalm of David.

1 Hear my prayer, O LORD, give ear to my supplications: in thy faithfulness answer me, and in thy righteousness.

2 And enter not into judgment with thy servant: for in thy sight shall no man living be justified.

3 For the enemy hath persecuted my soul; he hath smitten my life down to the ground; he hath made me to dwell in darkness, as those that have been long dead.

4 Therefore is my spirit overwhelmed within me; my heart within me is desolate.

5 I remember the days of old; I meditate on all thy works; I muse on the work of thy hands.

6 I stretch forth my hands unto thee: my soul thirsteth after thee, as a thirsty land. Selah.

7 Hear me speedily, O LORD; my spirit faileth: hide not thy face from me, lest I be like unto them that go down into the pit.

8 Cause me to hear thy lovingkindness in the morning; for in thee do I trust: cause me to know the way wherein I should walk; for I lift up my soul unto thee.

9 Deliver me, O LORD, from mine enemies: I flee unto thee to hide me.

10 Teach me to do thy will; for thou art my God: thy Spirit is good; lead me into the land of uprightness.

11 Quicken me, O LORD, for thy name's sake: for thy righteousness' sake bring my soul out of trouble.

12 And of thy mercy cut off mine enemies, and destroy all them that afflict my soul: for I am thy servant.

ON the title see on title of Ps. iii. The Hebrew, the ancient versions and general consent ascribe this ode to David. Hengstenberg: "The Psalm bears evidence throughout of David's spirit and mode of expression." The Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Theodoret, Venema, Patrick, Walford, Morison, Scott and Clarke refer it to the rebellion of Absalom. Scott dates it B. C. 1021; Clarke, B. C. 1023. The only name of God in it is Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. i. 2. This is the last of the penitential Psalms. See on Ps. vi. On Selah see Introduction, § 15.

1. Hear my prayer, O LORD, give ear to my supplications: in thy faithfulness answer me and in thy righteousness. Hear, so as to answer, as in Ps. iv. 1; xvii. 1. Supplications, pleadings for grace and mercy. See on Ps. xxviii. 2. Faithfulness, in fulfilling his promises. Righteousness, in taking sides with David against his unreasonable foes. Having graciously promised, God is now righteously bound to help those, who obey his will and rely on him. Other Scriptures in like manner unite the faithfulness and righteousness of God, Ps. xxxvi. 5; xl. 10. It was not his personal merits, but the righteousness of God that David was pleading. This is evident from the very words used, and from verse

2. And enter not into judgment with thy servant: for in thy sight shall no man living be justified. God's nature is so holy and his judgment so unerring, that in his presence all human righteousnesses are filthy rags, and all mere men unclean things. Men cannot stand before him on the ground of innocence, not because they are men, but because they are sinners. Jehovah will not accept an imperfect righteousness; in so doing he would deny himself, and admit that his holy, just and good law was too strict. The doctrine of the latter clause of the verse is often repeated, Job ix. 2, 3; Rom. iii. 20; Gal. ii. 16; iii. 11. The law is not powerless to save us on account of any imperfection in itself, but it is weak through our fallen nature. So that now no man is saved, who does not confess that he is lost; none pardoned, who does not own his guilt; none justified, who does not acknowledge that he is justly condemned. If God shall ever account any mere man just; it must be in some other way than by his personal deservings. What that way is both Testaments declare. It is sometimes denoted by the term faith. "The just shall live by his faith," Hab. ii. 4; Rom. iii. 22; Gal. ii. 20. Again, it is said to be by grace, Eph. ii. 8, 9. Often it is said to be by Jesus Christ, Acts xiii. 39. All these statements agree. The faith, which is the means of justifying, believes in the person and work of Christ and leans on him alone, and all this is by the sovereign grace of God.

3. For the enemy hath persecuted my soul; he hath smitten my life down to the ground: he hath made me to dwell in darkness, as those that have been long dead. The preterite form of the verbs indicates that the wrongs complained of were still inflicted on him. Edwards, Street, Hengstenberg and Alexander render all the verbs in the present. See on Ps. vii. 5; lxxxviii. 3-6. The phrases together indicate the most distressed circumstances arising from the fearful enmity of man. Such trials sent on one of David's temper could not be stoically borne:

4. Therefore is my spirit overwhelmed within me; my heart within me is desolate. On the first clause see on Ps. lxxvii. 3; cxxiv. 4. The second clause is parallel to the first. Desolate, laid waste, destroyed, astonished; Edwards, in a maze; Street, confounded. It implies consternation. Yet his mind was not stupefied, nor his thoughts inactive:

5. I remember the days of old: I meditate on all thy works; I muse on the works of thy hands; q. d., In all my affliction I have been calling to mind the remarkable dealings of God with me in my early life, and his treatment of men since the world began. I have been looking for some ground of comfort, some mode of relief, but found none. We have here two different words rendered works. The former more commonly expresses deeds done; the latter, works made. Yet often they are evidently used interchangeably.

6. I stretch forth my hands unto thee: my soul thirsteth after thee, as a thirsty land. Stretch, in the preterite, have stretched and do still stretch. The same phrase in Hebrew is found in Ex. ix. 29, 33; Job xi. 13; Ps. xlv. 20; Isa. i. 15, in the sense of praying. It may denote any spreading of the hands. Here it clearly indicates an earnest looking to God. A thirsty land, literally a weary land. Compare Ps. lxxiii. 1. In countries where there are but two rainy seasons in the year such a figure has great force. Thus far the Psalmist has stated his case and made his complaint, but only as preparatory to the pleadings, which follow:

7. Hear me speedily, O LORD; my spirit faileth: hide not thy face from me, lest I be like unto them that go down into the pit. The supplication is for prompt relief, as without it his case was desperate. Already his spirit began to fail, to be wasted, to be consumed, to faint. To hide the face is a phrase of frequent occurrence, Ps. x. 11; xiii. 1; xxii. 24; xxvii. 9; xxx. 7; xlv. 24; lxix. 17; lxxxviii. 14. It denotes a refusal of aid. As his spirit was in danger of failing, so was his health. To go down into the pit is to die and be buried. See on Ps. xxviii. 1; xxx. 3. Compare Ps. lxxxviii. 4.

8. Cause me to hear thy lovingkindness in the morning; for in thee do I trust: cause me to know the way wherein I should walk; for I lift up my soul unto thee. To hear in this verse is equivalent to enjoy or possess. The first petition is in much the same terms and of like import with that in Ps. xc. 14. It is urged by the truth that at God's bidding his servant had trusted in him, and so it is a plea addressed to the divine veracity. The second petition is for divine guidance, that he might know and do what was pleasing in God's sight, and safe for himself. Like the former this argument rests on the divine faithfulness.

9. Deliver me, O LORD, from mine enemies: I flee unto thee to hide me. The words of the first clause have the usual rendering. For deliver Street has protect; but this restricts the meaning. The literal rendering of the second clause would not be idiomatic English. The authorized version gives the exact sense.

10. Teach me to do thy will; for thou art my God: thy Spirit is good; lead me into the land of uprightness. Without divine instruction David was sure that he should neither know nor do the will of God. That he may be thus taught, he pleads his covenant relation—thou art my God. He knew that effectual enlightening was the work of God's Spirit, whom he calls good, because he is essentially so, and because all his work on the heart is good, and produces good. The verb in the latter clause is in the future and the whole may be read, Thy good Spirit shall lead. For land of uprightness the Doway and Calvin have right land; Edwards, even path; Alexander, level ground. It is either a prayer to be kept from perplexity and from tortuous ways; or the expression of a confident hope that he shall be so preserved.

11. Quicken me, O LORD, for thy name's sake: for thy righteousness' sake bring my soul out of trouble. The plea in the two clauses is the same in substance, God's name and righteousness being inseparable. The mercies he seeks, he dares to ask for not from anything in himself, but for what he knows to be the character of God. Quicken, make alive, make lively or keep alive. It occurs often in Ps. cxix. The second clause corresponds to many phrases already considered. Some follow the Hebrew and render the verbs of this verse and the next in the future. This makes the Psalm close in confident hope.

12. And of thy mercy cut off mine enemies, and destroy all them that afflict my soul; for I am thy servant. The plea is again of covenant relation—I am thy servant—my enemies are thy enemies. The verbs are in the future.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. Believers need no greater bulwark to their hope and confidence than can be found in the attributes of God, particularly his faithfulness and righteousness, as illustrated in providence and in the glorious plan of salvation, v. 1.

2. True piety rests not in forms of worship. Real prayer seeks an audience and an answer, vv. 1, 7.

3. Outward afflictions are often blessed to greatly quickening the conscience, and when they so act, they are to be esteemed among God's precious gifts. No sooner is David in straits than he cries, "Enter not into judgment with thy servant," v. 2.

4. True piety is profoundly humble, and deeply sensible of great unworthiness. It dares not rush thoughtlessly into the presence of God, nor challenge his examination, v. 2. Horne: "The thoughts of such a trial are enough to appal the soul of the best man living, to make his flesh tremble, and his bones shake, as if he stood at the foot of Sinai, and beheld Jehovah ready to break forth upon him in the flame of devouring fire."

5. In true piety there is always a just and strong sense of accountability, v. 2. He who believes that he is not bound to obey God or humble himself under his mighty hand, nor to plead for mercy, has not yet learned the first lessons of genuine godliness.

6. On whatever else regenerate men may differ, they all agree that they cannot stand before God on the ground of their own merits, v. 2. Compare Rom. vii. 9. Luther: "I have tormented my body with fasting, watching, prayer, and other exercises, more than all who are now my enemies and persecutors; for I thought in this wise to satisfy the law, and shield my conscience from the rod of the oppressor. Yet it availed me naught; yea, the further I proceeded in this way, the more terrified I grew, so that I had nigh despaired, had not Christ mercifully looked upon me, and enlightened my heart by the light of his Gospel." Several give us this story. I take it from Bultmann's notes to Besser. Michael, an honest farmer, on his death bed called out to his son: "Jack, just reach down the Catechism from yonder shelf, to see how my past life agrees with it. Please, read me the commandments." "Thou shalt have no other gods before me. Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, etc." "O, these two have I always kept; I have neither worshipped idols, like the heathen, nor bowed down to images like the Roman Catholics. Please, proceed to the third." "Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain," etc. "Here I am right also; I never swore an oath except in a court of justice; pray, pass to the next." "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy." "There I am not to blame either; I have always gone to church on a Sunday, and never played at cards, nor made my servants work. Which follows now?" "Honor thy father and mother," etc. "Ay, as to that, Jack, I may well bid you follow my example; for when a boy I showed all honor and respect to my poor parents, God bless them! What is the next?" "Thou shalt not kill." "Thank God, that is not on my conscience, I never slew a man not even in lawful war. Go on." "Thou shalt not commit adultery." "Of that I have kept clear also, and always been faithful to your poor mother. Proceed." "Thou shalt not steal." "I never took aught that did not belong to me. Next?" "Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour." "I never swore falsely against any person. Are there any more?" "Yes, one: Thou shalt not covet." "Stop, Jack! There, I must think a little; yes, I cannot say I have never coveted. Pray look for poor Mamma's Bible on the subject." And here Jack found a reference from Ex. xx. to Matt. v. by which the farmer was soon led to see that he had broken the whole law; and, becoming fully conscious of his exceeding sinfulness, he betook himself to Christ and died a penitent.

7. Those who have never been persecuted may read such compositions as this Psalm with comparative indifference; but where the iron has entered the soul, such language as this of David is full of meaning, vv. 3, 4.

8. Henry: "It is sometimes the lot of the best men to have their spirits for a time almost overwhelmed, and their hearts desolate, and doubtless it is their infirmity. David was not only a great saint, but a great soldier, and yet even he was sometimes ready to faint in the day of adversity." Yet thanks to the Holy One, who to the humble supplies supernatural courage, and thus brings them off conquerors.

9. Afflictions stir up a world of thought; sanctified afflictions, a world of useful thought, v. 5.

10. The language of Scripture in its strongest terms barely does justice to the subject, when it expresses the eager longings of the people of God for deliverance and salvation, v. 6. They have 'groanings which cannot be uttered.'

11. In a sense the people of God live in a continual crisis, vv. 7, 8. Sometimes the urgency is greater than at others; but their warfare is never over till they rest in the bosom of the Redeemer. Now can any one tell what moment will bring still fiercer conflicts.

12. It is a dreadful thing to be in the power of the wicked, nor can our prayers for rescue from such dangers be too humble or too fervent, v. 9. God is sole and sufficient deliverer at such times. Blessed be his name, his ear is ever open to the cry of his people.

13. Whatever betides us, our great concern should be to know and do the will of God, v. 10. "To obey is better than sacrifice."

14. But this cannot be done without the aid of the Holy Spirit, v. 10. He is the author of all saving views, right feelings and holy walking in the church of God.

15. If anything effectual is ever done by the Lord for our relief and salvation, all must come from his grace and mercy, v. 11. In the court of Heaven our names are worthless.

16. The case of the wicked is sad indeed. The very deliverance and salvation of God's people and the mercies shown them require the utter destruction of the incorrigible, v. 12. Dickson: "Mercy to the Lord's oppressed children, and justice against their enemies, go together; and the work of justice on persecutors is a work of mercy to the oppressed."

PSALM CXLIV.

A Psalm of David.

- 1 Blessed be the LORD my strength, which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight:
- 2 My goodness, and my fortress; my high tower, and my deliverer; my shield, and he in whom I trust; who subdueth my people under me.
- 3 LORD, what is man, that thou takest knowledge of him! or the son of man, that thou makest account of him!
- 4 Man is like to vanity: his days are as a shadow that passeth away.
- 5 Bow thy heavens, O LORD, and come down: touch the mountains, and they shall smoke.
- 6 Cast forth lightning, and scatter them: shoot out thine arrows, and destroy them.
- 7 Send thine hand from above; rid me, and deliver me out of great waters, from the hand of strange children;
- 8 Whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood.
- 9 I will sing a new song unto thee, O God: upon a psaltery and an instrument of ten strings will I sing praises unto thee.
- 10 It is he that giveth salvation unto kings: who delivereth David his servant from the hurtful sword.
- 11 Rid me, and deliver me from the hand of strange children, whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood:
- 12 That our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth; that our daughters may be as corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace:
- 13 That our garners may be full, affording all manner of store; that our sheep may bring forth thousands and ten thousands in our streets:
- 14 That our oxen may be strong to labour; that there be no breaking in, nor going out; that there be no complaining in our streets.
- 15 Happy is that people, that is in such a case: yea, happy is that people, whose God is the LORD.

ON the title see on title of Ps. iii. There is a very general agreement in ascribing this composition to David. So the Hebrew, Chaldee, Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint, Ethiopic, Vulgate, Doway, Luther, Calvin, Venema, Amesius, Fabritius, Piscator, Patrick, Pool, Edwards, Morison, Henry, Horne, Clarke, Scott and Hengstenberg. Alexander: "The Davidic origin of this Psalm is as marked as that of any in the Psalter." Tholuck admits that it consists for the most part of Davidic sentences, but thinks that the manner in which the name of David is mentioned in v. 10, shows that the entire authorship does not belong to him. But see on Ps. cxxxii. There is much uncertainty respecting the historic occasion of this ode. The Septuagint and the versions which follow it say it was written against Goliath. The Syriac says it was written on the occasion of David slaying Asaph, the brother of Goliath. Other conjectures are freely offered. Venema and a few others think it may have special reference to David's war with the Ammonites and Syrians. See 2 Sam. x. There are as few difficulties attending this as any other conjecture; but none of them are supported by evidence. Calmet, Clarke and Morison favor the opinion that it was written after the death of Absalom. Scott dates this hymn B. C. 1038; Clarke, B. C. about 1023. The names of the Most High here found are Jehovah LORD and Elohim God, on which see on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2. Many notice a close resemblance between this and Ps. xviii.

1. Blessed be the LORD my strength, which teacheth my hands to war, and my fingers to fight. Blessed, a term of benediction, as in Ps. v. 12; xviii. 46; xxviii. 6. Strength, in the margin and almost everywhere else rock. See on Ps. xviii. 2, 31, 46; xix. 14. On teaching my hands to war, see on Ps. xviii. 34. Teaching the fingers to fight is parallel. War and fight are in the Hebrew nouns; literally teacheth, maketh expert, my hands for war and my fingers for the battle; margin, to the war. To David it was clear that God alone had of the shepherd boy made a victorious king. None else could have given such skill, courage and success against so powerful adversaries. He says the Lord is

2. My goodness, and my fortress; my high tower, and my deliverer; my shield, and he in whom I trust; who subdueth my people under me. See on Ps. xviii. 2, where we have most of these terms. My goodness, commonly rendered mercy, lovingkindness, meaning the fountain or source of mercy. How God subdued the people under David is declared in many places; see 2 Sam. xxii.; Ps. xviii. The word subdued is not to be taken in a bad sense. Calvin: "When a people yields a cordial and willing obedience to the laws, all subordinating themselves to their own place peaceably, this signally proves the divine blessing." And this satisfies all men, except persecuting tyrants and their adherents. To such, peaceable demeanor and strict obedience to the laws are no commendation. You must truckle and cringe, fawn and flatter, express approbation of their follies and misrule, or meet their wrath.

3. LORD, what is man, that thou takest knowledge of him! or the son of man, that thou makest account of him! See on Ps. viii. 4. Compare Job vii. 17; 2 Sam. vii. 18; Heb. ii. 6. The relevancy of introducing this verse at this place consists in creating a contrast between God in vv. 1, 2, and man in vv. 3, 4, thus magnifying the divine condescension. Takest knowledge, literally knowest, as in Ps. i. 6. The verb is in the future and expresses the long continuance of God's kindness. The same is true of the verb rendered makest account of, esteemest, or thinkest.

4. Man is like to vanity: his days are as a shadow that passeth away. On the first clause see on Ps. xxxix. 5, 11; lxii. 9; on the second, Ps. cii. 11. Compare Job iv. 19; xiv. 2. Is like, in the preterite has been like in all generations, and up to this time. Neither intrinsic worth, nor permanence of existence on earth can be the cause of God's tenderness to man, but only the divine kindness.

5. Bow thy heavens, O LORD, and come down: touch the mountains, and they shall smoke. In Ps. xviii. 9, the verbs are in the preterite as describing what had been accomplished. Here they are in the imperative, in the form of petition. For the meaning of the first clause see on Ps. xviii. 9. As the clouds cover the mountains with smoke, so in a fearful manner does Jehovah's coming down in wrath fill with terror the highest positions that men occupy. If mountains be not here taken as figures of earthly potentates, or political powers, then the second clause is a petition that God would appear in a manner as marked as when he rides upon the storm. Compare Ex. xix. 18; Ps. civ. 32; Nah. i. 5, 6.

6. Cast forth lightning, and scatter them: shoot out thine arrows, and destroy them. See on Ps. xviii. 13, 14; compare 2 Sam. xxii. 15. By them Walford understands people in v. 2; but we may refer it to mountains in v. 5, and understand hostile, political organizations.

7. Send thine hand from above; rid me, and deliver me out of great waters, from the hand of strange children. Hand, in the plural hands. His case called for omnipotence. Great waters, more exactly many waters, a phrase denoting great perturbations and troubles, in this place said to be brought about by persons alien from the kingdom established in David. Whatever is the meaning of the phrase, rid me and deliver me from the hand of strange children, it involves something concerning which he was very urgent, for it is repeated in v. 11. Strange, in Ps. xviii. 44, 45, strangers. The cognate adjective in Ps. lxix. 8, is rendered an alien. The whole phrase may be rendered sons of strangers, and denotes those who by birth or by wicked inclination had no inheritance in Jacob. These persons, whatever their pretences, were very unfriendly and dangerous to David:

8. Whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood. On speaking vanity, see on Ps. xii. 2; xli. 6. The right hand of falsehood is a phrase variously interpreted. The most natural construction is, that it denotes perjured persons, as swearing was often accompanied with the lifting up of the right hand; or it may refer to truce-breakers, who struck hands, or joined hands, Prov. xi. 15, 21; xvi. 5; that form of covenanting being often used. In either case, the phrase denotes, "false, treacherous and perfidious persons."

9. I will sing a new song unto thee, O God: upon a psaltery and an instrument of ten strings will I sing praises unto thee. On the phrase new song, see on Ps. xxxiii. 3. It is not certain whether the prophet here speaks of two instruments of music, or of one having ten strings; but see on Ps. xxxiii. 2.

10. It is he that giveth salvation unto kings: who delivereth David his servant from the hurtful sword. See on Ps. xviii. 50; compare 2 Sam. v. 19-25; viii. 6-8; 2 Kings v. 1. Hurtful, commonly rendered evil, meaning the sword of wickedness.

11. Rid me, and deliver me from the hand of strange children, whose mouth speaketh vanity, and their right hand is a right hand of falsehood. The same as in vv. 7, 8. Every repetition in prayer is not vain.

12. That our sons may be as plants grown up in their youth; that our daughters may be as corner stones, polished after the similitude of a palace. Alexander: "The reminiscences or imitations of Ps. xviii. suddenly cease here, and are followed by a series of original, peculiar, and for the most part no doubt antique expressions." The riddance of evil disposed persons was to be a means of an improved state of society. In particular, young men were to be like plants grown up, having health, strength and beauty. See on Ps. cxv. 14, 15; cxxvii. 4, 5; cxxviii. 3. So also a pure state of society should add to the attractiveness of females, especially of young women. There is some difficulty in determining the precise meaning of the latter clause of the verse. Patrick's paraphrase is: "That our daughters may be tall and beautiful, like those polished pillars, which are the ornaments of a royal palace;" Pool: "Strong and beautiful, and adorned with all the ornaments belonging to their sex;" Edwards: Our daughters are exactly and beautifully shaped like corner stones for a palace; Fry: Our daughters like the carved pillars in the structure of a temple. For corner stones Michaelis has columns; Hengstenberg, projectures; Castello, angular pillars. Henry: "By daughters families are united and connected to their mutual strength, as the parts of a building are by a corner stone; and when they are graceful and beautiful both in body and mind, they are then polished after the similitude of a nice and curious structure." The word rendered corner stones occurs but once elsewhere, and is there rendered corners, Zech. ix. 15.

13. That our garners may be full, affording all manner of store: that our sheep may bring forth thousands and ten thousands in our streets. There is considerable difficulty in rendering this verse; but our translation has not been excelled by that of any of our fine scholars. Streets, places beyond the domicil, outside of the family enclosure, highways or fields.

14. That our oxen may be strong to labour; that there be no breaking in, nor going out; that there be no complaining in our streets. Edwards: And our oxen are strong for the yoke; we have no irruptions from our enemies, nor going out into captivity; nor any crying in our streets; Hengstenberg: That our oxen may be loaded, no breaking and no loss, and no cry in our streets. Strong to labor, a participle of the verb rendered carry and bear, Isa. liii. 4, 11. Here it denotes oxen laden with flesh or fat, or fit to bear burdens, 1 Chron. xii. 40. Breaking in, violence, aggression, hostile incursion. Going out, to war or to exile. Complaining, the cry of alarm or of distress. Streets, not the same word as in v. 13, but one meaning streets or broad ways. These blessings, noticed in vv. 12-14, are such as God promised to Israel in case of obedience, Deut. vii. 12, 13; xxviii. 2-6.

15. Happy is that people, that is in such a case: yea, happy is that people, whose God is the LORD. Happy, in Ps. i. 1, blessed. O the blessednesses. In such a case, an idiomatic rendering of a Hebraism not capable of being done into better English. The last clause of the Psalm furnishes an instance where it would have been better to transfer the word Jehovah; whose God is Jehovah, not Baal, not Ashtaroth, not living or dead men, not angels, but the self-existent, independent, eternal, unchangeable Jehovah.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. To those who have fled to the Almighty, he sustains every desirable relation, and fulfils every needful office, supplying them with strength, teaching them to proceed with unwonted skill, pouring out his lovingkindness on them, being to them as a munition of rocks, a high tower, a deliverer and a shield, vv. 1, 2. From those thus favored, gratitude demands benedictions.

2. Let poor and humble youths, to whom the future seems dark, and who yet have noble aspirations to serve God and their generation, not be cast down, but hope in the Lord, vv. 1, 2. He who took David from the crook and taught him the use of the sword and the sling, and lifted up his head above all his enemies round about, is still the patron of poor and pious boys and girls, who make him their refuge and their all. It matters not how unskilful one may now be, and how wholly unprepared for a given work, if God will but take him in hand. Even parents and instructors may sometimes bring great discouragements on their most promising children and pupils. More than one of Walter Scott's teachers complained of the thickness of his skull; a number of his teachers pronounced Barrow a blockhead, while Isaac Newton was declared to be fit for nothing but to drive the team. Jesse so slighted David as not even to call him to the sacrifice, and his brothers declared that they knew the pride and naughtiness of his heart. But God raised him above all these obstacles and oppositions. Set your hope in God, struggling youth. Never cease prayer and effort.

3. Past mercies and deliverances should greatly encourage us, on the recurrence of new difficulties, to betake ourselves to the throne of grace.

4. If God so marvellously wrought by and for David, why should we doubt that he will work for all his people those great spiritual victories, without which they must fail of eternal life?

5. It is most reasonable that the potentates of earth should publicly and constantly acknowledge their indebtedness to the providence of God, who rules in the kingdoms of men. The whole spirit of this Psalm goes on this supposition. Luther: "David here, as a king and a magistrate himself, who had to govern the state and carry on wars, confesses that all prosperous and happy government, all success at home and abroad, all the acts of peace, and all victory in war, are the good gifts of God; and that a man can no more effect these things by human wisdom or strength, or by any ability of his own, than he can hold the millions of minds of nations bound unto himself, and make their multitudes obey him alone: for what could any mortal man do towards preserving whole kingdoms, and cities and provinces in quiet from sedition and commotions amid all the infinite malice of the devil and the world? Every mortal man would fail, like a vanishing shadow, before the thought of such an undertaking." Calvin: "While God preserves all men without exception, his care is peculiarly extended to the maintenance of political order, which is the foundation of the common safety of all."

6. What a poor creature is man, full of infirmity, full of folly, his life a vapor, the whole of his career and existence mere vanity, vv. 3, 4. Without divine grace, he is sorely pressed with care, sorely vexed with trifles, often crushed by the weight of his sorrows, and if he escapes the countless casualties, any one of which may prove fatal, he is a victim to the pains and decrepitude of old age, and goes to an unblest eternity.

7. When God has a purpose to accomplish, or chooses to undertake a cause, nothing can resist him, vv. 5, 6. Before Omnipotence, mountains themselves melt like wax. To Almightiness nothing is difficult. Who can stand against him who hath thunder and lightning at his command, and arrows of destruction to shoot as he pleaseth?

8. It is a great mercy that our Father is in heaven, and so quite beyond the reach of human and diabolical malice. Whenever he chooses he can send his hand from above, and give most effectual relief, v. 7.

9. Persons, families and states are often seriously damaged by associations and alliances with those who are alien from their true and best interests; and especially, those who are unfriendly to the interests of vital religion, and the promotion of vital godliness. Against such influences we cannot be too guarded, vv. 7, 8, 11.

10. Though comparatively few men experience so marked outward deliverances and signal mercies, as did David, yet every one is a debtor beyond his highest conceptions to the free bounty and sparing mercy of God; and, if rightly affected, will find many an occasion in life for singing a new song, v. 9. To all who make the Lord their trust, the spiritual mercies bestowed and the spiritual deliverances wrought will, in the end, appear far more worthy of celebration in songs of rapture than anything found in the temporal history of the shepherd King.

11. On Instrumental Music as suggested by v. 9, see REMARKS on Ps. xxxiii. 2.

12. Human government is a divine ordinance, established for the glory of God, and the good of man. In all ages it has been remarkably upheld by him, v. 10. This is true even among the heathen. "The Lord strengthened Eglon, the king of Moab against Israel," Judg. iii. 12; "by Naaman the Lord had given deliverance to Syria;" all the power of the kings of Babylon was from the Most High; Dan. ii. 37; v. 18-29. When this power is wielded in wisdom and righteousness, it produces most happy results. Scott: "It is a very pleasant sight to behold a nation increasing in population; families brought up in industry, honesty and plenty, and fitted for their several stations in public and domestic life; not cut off by war, or wasted by famine and pestilence, or carried captives and exiles, or compelled by strong necessity to emigrate into foreign regions; and when all manner of abundance is stored in our garners, and clothes our fields and pastures." If for any temporal blessing we ought to be thankful, it is for general public prosperity, especially when united with peace, vv. 12-14. It is an unspeakable mercy when God gives to a people rulers of wisdom and of pacific dispositions, who hate injustice, treachery and bloodshed. "Peace is the mother of all earthly blessings to communities and to the families that compose them."

13. If any would have rich and permanent blessings, let them seek a saving acquaintance with Jehovah, the true God, v. 15.

14. From the promises of temporal blessings made to the righteous in both Testaments, we are in danger of being led into error on one point, viz., That wherever these blessings are withheld, there is an absence of the divine favor, or some diminution of happiness here or hereafter. All this is a mistake. God has richer mercies and stronger consolations than are found in all temporal possessions.

PSALM CXLV.

David's Psalm of praise.

- 1 I will extol thee, my God, O King; and I will bless thy name for ever and ever.
- 2 Every day will I bless thee; and I will praise thy name for ever and ever.
- 3 Great is the LORD, and greatly to be praised; and his greatness is unsearchable.
- 4 One generation shall praise thy works to another, and shall declare thy mighty acts.
- 5 I will speak of the glorious honour of thy majesty, and of thy wondrous works.
- 6 And men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts: and I will declare thy greatness.
- 7 They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, and shall sing of thy righteousness.
- 8 The LORD is gracious, and full of compassion; slow to anger, and of great mercy.
- 9 The LORD is good to all: and his tender mercies are over all his works.
- 10 All thy works shall praise thee, O LORD; and thy saints shall bless thee.
- 11 They shall speak of the glory of thy kingdom, and talk of thy power;
- 12 To make known to the sons of men his mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of his kingdom.
- 13 Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations.
- 14 The LORD upholdeth all that fall, and raiseth up all those that be bowed down.
- 15 The eyes of all wait upon thee; and thou givest them their meat in due season.
- 16 Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing.
- 17 The LORD is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works.
- 18 The LORD is high unto all them that call upon him, to all that call upon him in truth.
- 19 He will fulfil the desire of them that fear him: he also will hear their cry, and will save them.
- 20 The LORD preserveth all them that love him: but all the wicked will he destroy.
- 21 My mouth shall speak the praise of the LORD: and let all flesh bless his holy name for ever and ever.

THERE is no reason to doubt that David wrote this Psalm. It has no known historic occasion. It is the last of the alphabetical Psalms. See Introduction, § 13. In Hebrew are twenty-two letters. We have here but twenty-one verses. Clarke thinks that one verse has been lost by transcribers. He gives the Hebrew from one manuscript, and the Septuagint and Vulgate give the translation of it: The Lord is faithful in all his words; and holy in all his works. This is but a slight change of verse 17. We have before seen that some of the alphabetical Psalms are somewhat irregular. It may be so here. But the probability is that a verse has been dropped by the transcribers. Hengstenberg, who is strangely addicted to dividing the Psalms into strophes, has another way of accounting for the omission. He says: "Along with the alphabetical arrangement the Psalmist observed a division of the whole into three strophes, each of seven verses, and it was necessary, on this account, that one of the twenty-two letters should be left out." This is the only Psalm bearing the title of Praise. Patrick thinks the Psalter takes its name from this hymn. The theme of the Psalm is the glory and excellence of God's nature and government. Scott dates it B. C. 1016; Clarke gives no date. There seems to be no cause for the frequent transition from second to third person, and vice versa, except the license of Hebrew poets. The names of the Almighty here found are Elohim God and Jehovah LORD, on which see on Ps. iii. 2; i. 2. Nicolson: "This hymn is most excellent, both as it regards matter and style." Anderson: "This is certainly one of the most interesting and beautiful of the compositions of the sweet singer of Israel." Morison: "There is an inexpressible majesty and beauty in the thoughts and words contained in this Psalm, which adapt it, in an eminent degree, to the daily exercise of devotion." The most important point in relation to its interpretation respects its Messianic character. See Introduction, § 8. Luther: "This is a very blessed Psalm of thanksgiving for the kingdom and dominion of Christ, which God was about to raise up among the people of Israel: for it was on account of Christ, that this whole people was from the beginning chosen out of all nations; and on account of Christ also that the law was given unto them, and the whole Mosaic worship established." All this may be true, and yet the Psalm not be strictly Messianic. Horne and that school of interpreters give it a distinct and definite allusion to Messiah.

1. I will extol thee, my God, O King; and I will bless thy name for ever and ever. Extol, as in Ps. xxx. 1; often exalt, Ex. xv. 2; Ps. cxviii. 28. Bless, as in Ps. v. 12. My God, a plea of covenant relation. Instead of O King, some read my King. For ever and ever, see on Ps. ix. 5. The whole verse expresses a solemn and deliberate purpose to magnify the Lord.

2. Every day will I bless thee: and I will praise thy name for ever and ever. Bless, as in v. 1. Praise, the cognate of the noun given in the title. For ever and ever, as in v. 1. Compare Ps. lxxviii. 4; lxxi. 14.

3. Great is the LORD, and greatly to be praised: and his greatness is unsearchable. Great and greatness are cognate words. Greatly, much, especially, exceedingly, mightily. Unsearchable, literally, there is not a search. Men cannot begin a search. We have the same word in Job v. 9; ix. 10; xi. 7; Prov. xxv. 3. The doctrine is most weighty, involving the highest truths of theology.

4. One generation shall praise thy works to another, and shall declare thy mighty acts; literally, generation to generation shall praise. Praise, not the same word as in v. 2, but one rendered commend, glory, triumph. Works, as in Ps. cxliii. 5. It occurs again in vv. 9, 10, 17. It is applied to the works of creation, Ps. viii. 3, 6, and often. In Deut. xi. 3, 7, it is rendered acts. The word rendered acts here and in v. 12 is in v. 11 and often rendered power, also might, strength, mastery, Ex. xxxii. 18; Ps. xx. 6; Eccle. ix. 16. Alexander renders it mighty doings.

5. I will speak of the glorious honor of thy majesty, and of thy wondrous works. The original for glorious honor of thy majesty is very strong, being the union of three nouns, each one of which is a forcible word; literally, the majesty of the glory of thy honor. Horsley: The adorable glory of thy majesty. See on Ps. viii. 5; xxi. 5. The common version takes no notice of one word in the second clause, rendered words, things or matters. We may read, And the matters of thy wondrous works. Wondrous works, in Ps. ix. 1, marvellous works.

6. And men shall speak of the might of thy terrible acts: and I will declare thy greatness. Greatness, as in v. 3, is in the plural. In the character and government of God is found everything that constitutes real greatness.

7. They shall abundantly utter the memory of thy great goodness, and shall sing of thy righteousness. Edwards: They will largely commemorate thy great goodness: and sing aloud thy righteousness; Jebb: The memorial of thy abundant goodness they shall utter: and of thy righteousness they shall sing. To vv. 4-7, these Scriptures are parallel: Ex. xii. 26, 27; xiii. 14, 15; Deut. vi. 7; Josh. iv. 21-24; Ps. xliv. 1, 2; lxxi. 18; lxxviii. 3-7; Isa. xxxviii. 19.

8. The LORD is gracious, and full of compassion: slow to anger, and of great mercy. Compare Ex. xxxiv. 6, 7; Num. xiv. 18. See on Ps. lxxxvi. 5, 15; ciii. 8. Slow to anger, literally long of anger, i. e., it is commonly long before God becomes so angry as to cut men down.

9. The LORD is good to all: and his tender mercies are over all his works. On the first clause see a parallel in Nah. i. 7. Tender mercies, the Hebrew is one word, as in Ps. xxv. 6. It expresses the tender pity, the yearning compassion of a parent.

To the whole verse we find these parallels, Job xxv. 3; Matt. v. 45; Acts xiv. 17. God never made a sentient creature, that did not receive appropriate and excellent blessings.

10. All thy works shall praise thee, O LORD; and thy saints shall bless thee. Works, as in v. 4. Praise, commonly rendered give thanks. Saints, merciful ones, those that are godly, as in Ps. iv. 3; xviii. 25. Bless as in Ps. v. 12.

11. They shall speak of the glory of thy kingdom, and talk of thy power;

12. To make known to the sons of men his mighty acts, and the glorious majesty of his kingdom. Mighty acts, glory and majesty, as in vv. 4, 5. The translation is good and the sense obvious. The subject is the most exalted and demands the use of the loftiest terms. Patrick's Paraphrase is: "It is their duty to discourse of the incomparable wisdom and goodness, and care, which thou exercisest in the government of the whole world; especially of us; and to recount the memorable acts of thy invincible power among us; that all mankind, who regard not such things so much as they ought, may be made sensible how mighty the Lord is: and adore the amazing splendor of his illustrious works; and the admirable order he observes in his government of all things."

13. Thy kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and thy dominion endureth throughout all generations. Compare Ps. cxlvi. 10; Dan. ii. 44; iv. 34; 1 Tim. i. 17. The rendering is excellent, though Street varies it: Thy kingdom is an eternal kingdom, and thy dominion over all generations. Jehovah will never give up the world to the reign of devils, or the sovereign sway of finite agents.

14. The LORD upholdeth all that fall, and raiseth up all those that be bowed down. That fall, a participle, the falling, that are ready to fall. It describes those that have in themselves no strength. Raiseth, a participle, is raising. It occurs again in Ps. cxlvi. 8, but nowhere else. God is continually giving strength to those that are bent under the weight of their burdens. He is the helper of the helpless. The next two verses have been much admired by critics.

15. The eyes of all wait upon thee; and thou givest them their meat in due season.

16. Thou openest thine hand and satisfiest the desire of every living thing. Wait, as in Ps. civ. 27; look, hope. Satisfy, fill. Planets and atoms, angels and insects, all ranks and orders of creatures hang dependent on God's sovereign will, and if one link in the chain of that dependence were broken, they would not only be wretched—they would perish. Meat, in the old English sense of food, as in Ps. civ. 21, 27. The great sublimity of v. 16, like that of Gen. i. 3, turns very much on the simplicity of the process, and the completeness with which the work is accomplished. Clarke: "A very large volume might be written upon this," see on Ps. civ. 28.

17. The LORD is righteous in all his ways, and holy in all his works. It is impossible for a moral government to meet the approval of a right-minded man, if it be not founded and conducted in justice and equity. For a deficiency here nothing can compensate. The Lord is therefore kind in giving us so ample assurance and evidence of the perfect rectitude of all his proceedings. The word rendered holy is in the margin merciful or bountiful. It is the word the plural of which is rendered saints in v. 10.

18. The LORD is nigh unto all them that call upon him, to all that call upon him in truth. See on Ps. xxxiv. 18. The Lord is nigh to see their sorrows, hear their cries, avenge their wrongs, relieve their wants, and save their souls. Call, as in Ps. iv. 1, 3; xiv. 4. To call on God in truth is to offer genuine religious worship, particularly in prayer.

19. He will fulfil the desire of them that fear him: he also will hear their cry, and will save them. Fulfil, do, execute, maintain, Ps. cxviii. 6; cxix. 84; cxl. 12. Desire, will, pleasure, good pleasure, Esther i. 8; Ps. li. 18; cxliii. 10. It is safe for God to maintain the cause of the righteous, and grant their prayers, just in so far as they fear him.

20. The LORD preserveth all them that love him: but all the wicked will he destroy. Preserveth, keepeth, watcheth so as to protect. Here it is a participle (is) keeping. He habitually does so. Love, as in Ps. v. 11, and often. Destroy, as he did the Horims and the Amorite, Deut. ii. 22; Amos ii. 9; as Haman sought to destroy the Jews, Esther iii. 6, 13; as God shall destroy the sinners, Isa. xiii. 9. The verb denotes utter ruin and extermination.

21. My mouth shall speak the praise of the LORD: and let all flesh bless his holy name for ever and ever. Praise, as in the title of this Psalm. All flesh, all human beings. Sometimes the phrase includes irrational creatures, Gen. vi. 19. Bless, as in vv. 1, 2, 10. His holy name, literally the name of his holiness. For ever and ever, as in vv. 1, 2. Alexander renders it to eternity and perpetuity.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. The highest praise and the most glowing adoration rendered to Jehovah do not exceed the bounds of truth and sobriety, vv. 1, 2, 21. It is begun on earth, and shall be carried on in heaven. Addison's stanza is hardly a hyperbole:

Thro' all eternity to thee
A joyful song I'll raise;
But O, eternity's too short
To utter all thy praise.

2. Nothing has a more pernicious effect on character than low thoughts of God. We should on many accounts labor to have just and elevated views of his excellent greatness, vv. 3, 6. Tholuck: "Human virtue and greatness have their limits, where spots appear and poverty begins; but the greatness of God is unsearchable and inexpressible." Henry: "The Lord's presence is infinite, his brightness insupportable, his majesty awful, his dominion boundless, and his sovereignty incontestable." Unless we have great thoughts of God, our thoughts of sin will be low, our sense of obligation feeble, and our praises dull.

3. Wicked as every generation of men has been, it is for a joy that in every age some have been found, and to the end of the world some shall be found to stand up for God, and publish his honors, and declare his goodness, v. 4.

4. Each one should feel the obligation to publish the divine honors, and that in suitable terms, well-chosen, thus following the example of the Psalmist, v. 5. Otherwise, "when one generation of pious men depart this life, there will be none to publish the glorious majesty and lovingkindness of the Lord after them."

5. He, who discredits revealed religion because of the miracles and mysteries involved therein, ought in consistency to discard the whole doctrine of creation and of providence, for both of them abound in wondrous works, v. 5.

6. Although God's doings are often terrible, yet it is a great mercy that they are not prevaillingly so, v. 6. Tempests and tornadoes sometimes sweep over the earth, but they are neither daily nor weekly. One deluge spread desolation, but ever since the bow of promise has appeared.

7. Much as the wicked hate the goodness and righteousness of God, he shall yet establish his memorial in all the earth, as well as in his church triumphant, v. 7. The overthrow of Pharaoh, the ruin of Sennacherib and the miserable end of Nero and of kindred spirits, are no secrets in the world.

8. The Scriptures delight to dwell on the loving aspects of the divine character, vv. 8, 9. They have exhausted the powers of language to convey to us some just conception of the subject. The Lord has grace for the guilty, compassion for the miserable, forbearance to the headstrong, and repenteth him of the evil.

9. All God's creatures in this world receive many and marked benefits at his hand, v. 9. Even where forgiveness of sin is not granted, still as long as God spares his enemies, he opens the storehouse of his bounty, and grants them many and great blessings.

10. There is a sense in which all God's works praise and shall forever praise him, though in some cases they do it reluctantly; but it is his saints who bless him and witness for him with all the heart, vv. 10-12. The confessions of God's enemies often show how wretched their cause is; but it is of his people that he says, Ye are my witnesses. Dickson: "The Lord will have his saints to instruct such as are not converted to know his glory, power, and majesty, that they may be brought in, and made subjects of his special kingdom of grace."

11. In the midst of the convulsions, agitations and desolations of earth, it is a glorious truth that the dominion of the Almighty over this and all worlds cannot be destroyed, subverted or even impeded, v. 13. Hengstenberg: "Thy kingdom is a kingdom of all eternities." No age, no dark corner of the earth, no star however remote, no man however puissant, no kingdom however glorious, is beyond the grasp of him who shakes the heavens with a nod.

12. The poor, the feeble, the self-diffident, the bruised, the oppressed, the down-trodden, have an unfailing friend in God, v. 14. Luther: "Christ is the king for the afflicted, the poor, the fallen."

13. The changes of the seasons, bringing alternate and various kinds of fruits and food for man and beast, call for admiration and praise, v. 15.

14. It is infallible proof that man is far gone from righteousness, when we see him the only recipient of the divine kindness, that seems to make no suitable return to the Giver of all good, vv. 15, 16. Dumb brutes seem to fulfil the great ends of their existence; but man, sunk into sottishness, even when he knows God, glorifies him not as God.

15. Let us never doubt the infallible justice of all the divine proceedings, v. 17.

16. While by his essential presence and readiness to bless the penitent, God is not far from any living man, yet he is peculiarly and graciously nigh to such as with godly sincerity engage in his worship, supplicating his blessing, v. 18. Compare Acts xvii. 28. God is never offended with the importunity of suppliants. Horne: "It is our happiness to have a King, who is not, like earthly princes, difficult of access, but one of whom the meanest subject may at any time obtain an audience, and be certain of having his request granted, if it be made in truth."

17. One reason why the righteous are so often successful in their plans and counsels is, that their desire in the main agrees with the will of God, and so in hearing them, God is but doing what is most pleasing to himself, v. 19.

18. It is clear from Scripture that there is no antagonism, but on the contrary a blessed harmony between the graces of the Christian character. Those who fear the Lord, in v. 19, are the same as those who love him in v. 20.

19. The incorrigibly wicked are all doomed, v. 20. Their destruction is as certain as their existence. The mouth of the Lord hath spoken it by the mouth of all his prophets since the world began.

20. It is the duty of some to rule, and of others to obey; of some to teach and of others to learn; of some to abide at home, and of others to go abroad; but it is the duty of all in all ranks and conditions of life to bless God's holy name forever and ever, and to desire others to engage in the same noble work, v. 21.

21. If we would be wise, and so act as not to cover us with confusion, we must put time and eternity together. Our connection with an endless future is as close and as certain as our connection with time, and much more lasting. It was a wise resolution of the elder Edwards: "That I will do whatsoever I think to be most to the glory of God and my own good, profit and pleasure, in the whole of my duration; without any consideration of the time, whether now, or never so many myriads of ages hence." Reader, thou art a candidate for eternity, and to eternity thou wilt go. Art thou prepared? Art thou preparing?

PSALM CXLVI.

- 1 Praise ye the LORD. Praise the LORD, O my soul.
- 2 While I live will I praise the LORD: I will sing praises unto my God while I have any being.
- 3 Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help.
- 4 His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth; in that very day his thoughts perish.
- 5 Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the LORD his God:
- 6 Which made heaven, and earth, the sea, and all that therein is: which keepeth truth forever:
- 7 Which executeth judgment for the oppressed: which giveth food to the hungry. The LORD looseth the prisoners:
- 8 The LORD openeth the eyes of the blind: the LORD raiseth them that are bowed down: the LORD loveth the righteous:
- 9 The LORD preserveth the strangers; he relieveth the fatherless and widow: but the way of the wicked he turneth upside down.
- 10 The LORD shall reign for ever, even thy God, O Zion, unto all generations. Praise ye the LORD.

DAVID probably wrote this Psalm. So Calvin, Fabritius, Patrick, Jebb, Henry, Scott and others have thought. Yet Venema, Tholuck, Hengstenberg and Alexander favor a later origin. The Syriac, Arabic, Septuagint and Vulgate ascribe it to Haggai and Zechariah. If it had any historic occasion, we know not what it was. This and the four remaining Psalms begin and end with the word Hallelujah, Praise ye the LORD. Scott dates it B. C. 1016; Clarke fixes no date, but thinks it was written after the captivity. The names of the Most High found in it are Jah LORD, Jehovah LORD, Elohim God and El God, on which see introductory remarks to Ps. lxxviii., and on Ps. i. 2; iii. 2; v. 4.

1. Praise ye the LORD. Praise the LORD, O my soul. In the first clause we have Jah; in the second Jehovah. The prophet first calls on the true Israel and then on himself to engage in the work of praise, and especially desires that he may do his part with life and animation—with his soul.

2. While I live will I praise the LORD; I will sing praises unto my God while I have any being. Watts:

"I'll praise my Maker with my breath,
And when my voice is lost in death,
Praise shall employ my nobler powers:
My days of praise shall ne'er be past
While life and thought and being last,
And immortality endures."

For being, Morison has continuance, meaning existence beyond the grave. Praise, as twice in v. 1. Sing praises, sing psalms, or play, as in Ps. vii. 17; ix. 11. Compare Ps. civ. 33.

3. Put not your trust in princes, nor in the son of man, in whom there is no help. This verse inclines Clarke to think that the Psalm refers to the change which came over Cyrus, who at first was a warm and decided friend to the Jews, but afterwards was disinclined to aid them. His paraphrase is: "Cyrus may change: but God will not: trust therefore in Him." But in comparison with God all princes are unworthy of confidence. The best of them may die at the very time when we most build upon their aid. The best of them are limited in resources, and often cannot help those to whom they have the strongest attachment. The best of them are fickle and liable to change from friendship to aversion. If this is not caused by constitutional instability, it is often brought about by slander and misrepresentation. By princes we are not to understand merely those on the throne, or nobles, but persons of large heartedness, and of liberal views and feelings, as the word indicates, Ex. xxxv. 5, 22; Isa. xxxii. 5, 8. Neither do we find unfailing virtue and resources in any rank of life—in any son of Adam, as the Hebrew has it. Help, salvation.

4. His breath goeth forth, he returneth to his earth: in that very day his thoughts perish. For breath Ainsworth and Boothroyd have spirit. The first clause simply expresses the idea of death and dissolution. The second states the effect of such death—his thoughts perish. For thoughts the Chaldee has machinations; the Arabic, counsels; Mudge, projects; Street, designs; Horsley, false, deceitful show; Fry, devices. Alexander understands vain notions or ambitious schemes. The word is found nowhere else. Even if the thoughts of a fellow-creature respecting us or our friends are ever so kind and wise, he may be wholly unable to effect anything for us; and so to trust in him is folly, particularly as Jehovah proposes himself as an object of confidence, and never deceives or disappoints the heart that leans on him:

5. Happy is he that hath the God of Jacob for his help, whose hope is in the LORD his God. Happy, O the blessednesses, as in Ps. i. 1. He has all good things for soul and body, for time and eternity. The word rendered God is El, might. There is peculiar fitness in speaking of the God of Jacob as a helper, whether by Jacob we understand the patriarch himself or the nation that bore his name; for in a marvellous manner did the Most High help and deliver both him and them. But if we would have the presence and power of God on our side, we must hope in him, and in no other. He has from the beginning demonstrated his power, wisdom and goodness, for it is he,

6. Which made heaven, and earth, the sea, and all that therein is: which keepeth truth for ever. On the first clause see on Ps. cxv. 15; cxxi. 2. The Lord has the attributes, which qualify him to give succor, and then he has the faithfulness (or truth) which makes him keep covenant and perform all he has engaged. Did he lack either, he would be unworthy of trust. It is also he,

7. Which executeth judgment for the oppressed: which giveth food to the hungry. The LORD looseth the prisoners. Executeth, doeth, worketh, procureth, bringeth forth, maintaineth, as the word is elsewhere rendered. Judgment, right. The common and best rendering is judgment. Oppressed, wronged, defrauded, deceived. How God did this for Jacob, for David and for all Israel their history declares. And how he feeds the hungry the history of the world declares. The last clause of this verse begins a series of statements, which many regard as a prophecy concerning Jesus Christ. Indeed some regard all from the beginning of v. 5 to the close as Messianic. Hammond has a long, learned and very ingenious note to that effect; nor is it easy to answer his reasonings. Of course Horne and that class of interpreters adopt this view. Jarchi on v. 10, distinctly says that it belongs to the days of Messias. Gill: "It is most true, that the Psalm is concerning the Messiah and his kingdom, to whom all the characters and descriptions given agree." Henry and Scott interpret these verses in the same way. Indeed Scott quotes with approbation a paragraph applying the whole Psalm to Christ. See Introduction, § 8. Men may be bound in affliction as well as in iron. Prisoners, a participle often rendered bound, Gen. xxxix. 20; xl. 3, 5; Isa. lxi. 1. It was common among the Hebrews to speak of the afflicted, as prisoners, or bound, Ps. cvii. 10; Luke xiii. 16. If the loosing of the prisoners is to be taken literally, it had its fulfilment in Joseph, in the three faithful young men in Babylon, in Daniel, in Peter, in Paul and Silas, and in all cases where God's providence has interposed for the unjustly accused. If the phrase is to be taken spiritually, as in Isa. xlix. 9; lxi. 1, then it is fulfilled in every case where the benefits of redemption are applied to perishing men.

8. The LORD openeth the eyes of the blind: the LORD raiseth them that are bowed down: the LORD loveth the righteous. Alexander: "All the verbs are of the participial form, opening, raising, loving, i. e., continually doing so." The same remark applies to the loosing, in v. 7, and preserving, in v. 9. How Christ opened the eyes of the blind is taught in the Gospels, Matt. ix. 27-30; John ix. 7-32. In the Hebrew of this clause, there is no word for eyes, but it is implied in the verb, openeth, which is never used in the Scriptures in reference to any other matter, except once where it refers to opening the ears, Isa. xlii. 20. How the Lord opens the eyes of the mind is declared in many Scriptures. The New Testament calls the process of spiritual illumination, a revelation, Matt. xi. 27; Luke x. 22; Gal. i. 16. How the Lord raiseth them that are bowed down is declared in Ps. cxlv. 14; cxlvii. 6. How gloriously Jesus did this work literally, may be seen in Luke xiii. 13. But none are so bowed down as those that are oppressed by the devil, ready to sink under the load of conscious guilt, fearfully depressed with just thoughts of their own vileness, guilt and misery. How the Lord loveth the righteous is declared in Deut. xxxiii. 3; John xiv. 21. God has a love of good will to men, even the rebellious; but he has also a love of complacency to his people. Because he loveth righteousness, therefore he loveth the righteous, Ps. xi. 7.

9. The LORD preserveth the strangers: he relieveth the fatherless and widow: but the way of the wicked he turneth upside down. God's tender care of strangers appears in the pentateuch, Ex. xxii. 21; xxiii. 9; Lev. xix. 33; Deut. x. 18; xvi. 11. Traces of the same divine benevolence are found in all the Scriptures. But all God's people are strangers and pilgrims on the earth, as were their fathers. To them he shows peculiar and amazing favor, and keepeth them in the midst of the greatest perils and trials. How wonderfully God relieves, or lifts up, i. e., shows his friendship to the widow and the fatherless is declared in all his word, Ps. lxxviii. 5; Prov. xv. 25; Jer. xlix. 11; Hos. xiv. 3. The terms rendered widow and fatherless are sometimes used to denote in general the desolate, the helpless, and so we learn God is always ready to give help to those that have no friend or protector. Turneth upside down, elsewhere subvert, overthrow. The most dreadful disasters that have overtaken the wicked in past ages are but feeble tokens of their ruin, the utter disappointment of all their hopes, the perfect defeat of all their plans in the world to come. Compare Ps. cxlvii. 6.

10. The LORD shall reign for ever, even thy God, O Zion, unto all generations. Praise ye the LORD. The first clause is taken from Ex. xv. 18, and contains a truth asserted in different terms in Ps. x. 16; cxlv. 13; and repeated in the last book of Scripture. Jehovah and the God of Zion are the same. God's kingdom over this world has constant reference to his kingdom in the world. Praise ye the LORD, as at the beginning.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. How wonderful is memory! In 1816, when the writer was yet a lad, he heard this Psalm expounded by a stranger whom he never saw before; and to this day he remembers the exposition, and even the tones of the preacher's voice. Fifty years seem to have deepened the impression made by a simple yet serious discourse on this precious Psalm.

2. God is worthy of all praise, and of all honor, and should constantly be declared so to be, vv. 1, 2, 10. There is no act of worship that may not fitly begin and end with his praise. This is true in time. It will be true in eternity. 'In heaven, when one hallelujah closes, another commences.' The highest anthems ever sung on earth or in the skies are fully warranted by the nature of God, by the course of his providence, and by our relations to him as explained in this Psalm.

3. Both by natural and revealed religion, we are called upon to stir ourselves up to the work of praise, v. 1. It is a singular evidence of the depravity and deceitfulness of the human heart, that those deists who speak most of the excellence of natural religion, are never found gathered into assemblies for the devout praise of him who made them; and yet if nature teaches anything concerning our duty to God, it is that we should praise him for his mercies. To this work we should summon our memories, that they may tell us of God's goodness in times past; our imaginations, that they may aid us in forming some conception of the glory to be revealed; and our warm affections, that they may glow with zeal in this noble service. Henry: "That which is the great end of our being ought to be our great employment and delight while we have any being."

4. It is both vain and wicked to rely on man, the best, the wisest and the bravest, v. 3. Man is a fool, a worm, a shadow. "The Egyptians are men, and not God; and their horses flesh, and not spirit," Isa. xxxi. 3. Compare Jer. xvii. 5-8. Luther: "We ought not to trust in any man, not even in kings or princes, nor in the mighty, nor in the rich, as the world do." We have more to fear than to hope for from the best man living, if we put him in the place of God. As to the wicked, the best of them is a brier: the most upright is sharper than a thorn hedge, Mic. vii. 4.

5. What amazing changes come over men at death! Then all their thoughts, plans, projects come to a full end, v. 4. How great is "the madness of princes in setting no bounds to their hopes and desires, and scaling the very heavens in their ambition, like the insane Alexander of Macedon, who, upon hearing that there were other worlds, wept that he had not yet conquered one, although soon after the funeral urn sufficed him." "Neither mean men may trust in great men, nor great men may trust in a multitude of mean men."

6. Vast indeed must be the blessings of the righteous, and great their happiness, if not here, yet hereafter; for oftentimes the inspired writers, like presses gushing out with new wine, speak of it, habitually admitting that the matter is beyond the power of language, v. 5.

7. He who helped Jacob, helps all who pray like Jacob, v. 5.

8. The glorious perfections displayed in creation are ample guarantee of the safety of those who make God their refuge, v. 6.

9. Both natural and revealed religion lead us to rely on the truth, the sincerity, the faithfulness of God, v. 6. Unless we credit the divine sincerity, even miracles would not prove the truth of a doctrine or of a system.

10. Let the pious who are oppressed, wronged, deceived, abused, hope on, v. 7. God is the patron of those who have no helper. He, who gave his Son to deliver his chosen from the oppression of the devil, will not deny them whatever is necessary to rescue them from the power of his minions.

11. If one is poor, let him not steal, nor fret, nor deny the divine kindness, but let him pray and hope in the Lord, who feedeth the hungry, v. 7. He who sent the ravens to feed Elijah, and made the widow's oil to multiply, and hears the young ravens when they cry, will not forget the souls who make him their confidence.

12. If we are prisoners, let us not be thereby cast down with over much sorrow. Whenever the Lord sees it best, he can and will release us, v. 7. Until then, let us leave all in his hands. Not a few of the best writings have been given to the world by men wearing a chain, or immured in prisons. No thanks to their persecutors, nor to the cold inhumanity of their cotemporaries; but all honor to the grace of him who in their deep affliction made their genius to shine and their joy to overflow.

13. We may not any longer expect miracles in healing the blind of their natural defects, such attestations of God's truth being no longer necessary, v. 9. But every saving spiritual illumination is a moral miracle, far more worthy of admiration, if duly considered, than any healing ever granted to defective natural vision.

14. Art thou a child of sorrow, borne down with the weight of thy grief? Cast thy burden on the Lord. Trust in him. He can raise thee out of the depths up to the heights of glory, v. 8.

15. Because of God's good will to the righteous, they are safe, v. 8. His complacency in them unites with his benevolence; and even when he afflicts them, he does it out of love.

16. Art thou a stranger? or is thy child a stranger? or does thy heart yearn over some loved one in a distant land? God can take care of such. He, who was the friend of Joseph in Egypt, will not forsake the seed of the righteous now. Jehovah is a God afar off, as well as a God at hand, v. 9; Jer. xxiii. 23.

17. Has God taken away the husband of thy youth, and written thy children fatherless? Lay fast hold of the promises. They are all-sufficient, v. 9. See on Ps. lxviii. 5.

18. The wicked frequently object to our using startling terms, and alarming thoughts concerning their state; but no sober language can exaggerate the frightful condition of a soul without God in the world. God has a thousand ways of bringing to nought the counsels of the ungodly, and cutting short their career of crime and folly. Commonly in the most unexpected manner he turneth their way upside down, v. 9.

19. The world has always been governed, is now governed, and shall to the end of time be governed by him who makes no mistakes, and has no vicegerents, and no successful rivals. Morison: "Perpetuity is the distinguishing character of the divine government. The throne of Jehovah can never be subverted. His enemies can never gain the ascendancy."

20. How glorious is God! In all his nature, in all his ways, in all the manifestations of himself he alone is worthy to receive the worship of earth or of heaven.

PSALM CXLVII.

1 Praise ye the LORD: for it is good to sing praises unto our God; for it is pleasant; and praise is comely.

2 The LORD doth build up Jerusalem: he gathereth together the outcasts of Israel.

3 He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds.

4 He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names.

5 Great is our Lord, and of great power: his understanding is infinite.

6 The LORD lifteth up the meek: he casteth the wicked down to the ground.

- 7 Sing unto the LORD with thanksgiving; sing praise upon the harp unto our God:
 8 Who covereth the heaven with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth, who maketh grass to grow upon the mountains.
 9 He giveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry.
 10 He delighteth not in the strength of the horse: he taketh not pleasure in the legs of a man.
 11 The LORD taketh pleasure in them that fear him, in those that hope in his mercy.
 12 Praise the LORD, O Jerusalem; praise thy God, O Zion.
 13 For he hath strengthened the bars of thy gates; he hath blessed thy children within thee.
 14 He maketh peace in thy borders, and filleth thee with the finest of the wheat.
 15 He sendeth forth his commandment upon earth: his word runneth very swiftly.
 16 He giveth snow like wool: he scattereth the hoar frost like ashes.
 17 He casteth forth his ice like morsels: who can stand before his cold?
 18. He sendeth out his word, and melteth them: he causeth his wind to blow, and the waters flow.
 19 He sheweth his word unto Jacob, his statutes and his judgments unto Israel.
 20 He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for his judgments, they have not known them.
 Praise ye the LORD.

THE Septuagint and the versions, which follow it, unite Psalms ix. and x. into one, and so, to make the number 150 they divide Psalm cxlvii. into two, making Psalm cxlvi. end at v. 11, and Psalm cxlvii. begin at v. 12. Of course the numbers of all the Psalms between the ninth and this do not in these versions agree with the Hebrew, as the Doway in a note admits. These versions also number the verses of Psalms ix. x. cxlvi. cxlvii. just as if the arrangement in the Hebrew and English version was correct. There is a very general, though not universal agreement that this Psalm is of late date. Scott dates it B. C. 444; Clarke, B. C. about 519. But there is not an agreement respecting the author. Several of the ancient versions ascribe it to Haggai and Zechariah. A few very respectable writers ascribe it to David, making it a prophecy. Gill, Abenezra and several Jewish writers think it foretells the future rebuilding of Jerusalem, and the restoration of the Jews from their captivity, and refer it to the times of the Messiah." Jebb says, it is "a most regularly constructed hymn." Luther calls it "a very blessed Psalm of thanksgiving." Henry calls it an "excellent Psalm of praise." The names of the Most High in this composition are Jah LORD, Elohim God, Adonai Lord and Jehovah LORD, on which respectively see introductory remarks to Ps. lxviii.; on Ps. iii. 2; ii. 4; i. 2.

1. Praise ye the LORD: for it is good to sing praises unto our God: for it is pleasant: and praise is comely. Like the preceding this Psalm begins and ends with Hallelujah. In Ps. lxxiii. 28, we read, It is good for me to draw near to God; in Ps. xcii. 1, It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord. Here, It is good to sing Hallelujahs and Psalms. For this duty three reasons are given. 1. It is good. It must be a good thing to love and serve and praise a good and glorious God. 2. It is pleasant or sweet to do so. It makes glad and refreshes the pious heart. 3. It is comely, or seemly. It is monstrous to have a God and not worship, obey and praise him.

2. The LORD doth build up Jerusalem: he gathereth together the outcasts of Israel. Doth build, in the participle form is building. He is continually doing so. Gathereth, future will gather. Outcasts, uniformly rendered, see Isa. xi. 12; lvi. 8, not synonymous but parallel to dispersed, applied to the same people, Isa. xi. 12; Ezek. xxxvi. 19. Street renders it exiles. This verse may refer to the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the resettlement of Judea in the days of Nehemiah; yet it has a more glorious import, if we apply it to the conversion of men to Christ. That the parallel passage in Isa. xi. 10-16, refers to the days of Messiah cannot be doubted. Compare John xi. 52.

3. He healeth the broken in heart, and bindeth up their wounds. This verse rather confirms the interpretation given to v. 2, as pointing to Gospel times. Compare Isa. lxi. 1-3; Luke iv. 18-21. Broken, see on Ps. li. 17, where we have the same word applied to the heart. Wounds, in Ps. xvi. 4 and elsewhere, sorrows; margin, griefs. There are no wounds like those of the spirit, Prov. xviii. 14. Nor is any healing so much required as in the heart.

4. He telleth the number of the stars; he calleth them all by their names. Compare Gen. xv. 5; Isa. xl. 26. Surely he who is able to do all these things in immensity is able to accomplish his merciful designs towards his people, to whom he has so long and wondrously manifested his special and gracious presence. He who has perfect dominion over universal nature can do whatever he pleases for his people.

5. Great is our Lord, and of great power: his understanding is infinite. Lord, Adonai, ruler. There is none above him, none with him, none like him, in power, or in any of his perfections. To the mind of God no subject is knotty, no truth mysterious. His mind embraces with infinite ease all the propositions which constitute universal truth. Understanding, commonly so rendered; in Ps. lxxviii. 72, skilfulness; in Ps. cxxxvi. 5, wisdom; margin: Of his understanding there is no number. This is literal.

6. The LORD lifteth up the weak: he casteth the wicked down to the ground. Infinite and glorious as is the Lord, yet he is amazing in his condescension, and so he lifts up, (in Ps. cxlvi. 9, relieves), the meek, humble, lowly, or afflicted. See on Ps. ix. 12. But when necessary to the defence of his people and for the advancement of his glory, the Most High will employ the energy of his whole nature to arrest the progress of evil, by casting down, humbling, abasing, laying low the wicked.

7. Sing unto the LORD with thanksgiving; sing praise upon the harp unto our God. The first word rendered sing means to answer, or testify; and the first clause calls on us to make a return corresponding to the mercies received. Sing praise, as in v. 1, sing a psalm, play, make music; see on Ps. ix. 11.

8. Who covereth the heaven with clouds, who prepareth rain for the earth, who maketh grass to grow upon the mountains. All the verbs are in the participial form, is covering, is preparing, is making to grow. God is habitually doing these things, and thus evincing his absolute control over nature in all latitudes. See on Ps. civ. 13, 14.

9. He giveth to the beast his food, and to the young ravens which cry. Compare Ps. civ. 27, 28; cxxxvi. 25; cxlv. 15. It is not a fact in natural history that any species of bird known as the raven is cruel or unnatural to its young, and leaves it to shift for itself. All these young creatures are helpless, and unable to move from the nest for some time after they are hatched. But God provides for them by giving to their parents a tender, natural affection, which is the more remarkable, because they are ravenous, and live very much by prey. Compare Job xxxviii. 41.

10. He delighteth not in the strength of the horse: he taketh not pleasure in the legs of a man. See on Ps. xxxiii. 16-18. Compare Job xxxix. 19-25; Prov. xxi. 31; Hos. i. 7. Henry and Alexander think that by the horse is meant the cavalry, and by the legs of a man the infantry of armies. But it is a universal truth that reliance upon the natural strength of man or beast, as an adequate protection against danger or as a means of delivery from any evil, is by the constant providence of God demonstrated to be folly. God gives strength not to be idolized, but to be used in humble dependence on him.

11. The LORD taketh pleasure in them that fear him, in those that hope in his mercy. Taketh pleasure, as in v. 10. As in Ps. cxlv. 19, 20, fear and love describe the same character, so here do fear and hope.

12. Praise the LORD, O Jerusalem; praise thy God, O Zion. The first word rendered praise is commend, glory in, as in Ps. cxlv. 4; the second is that employed in the word Hallelujah.

13. For he hath strengthened the bars of thy gates; he hath blessed thy children within thee. This verse has the richest and most precious import, if by Jerusalem and Zion, we understand the church, with her strong defences, Ps. xlviii. 13; li. 18.

14. He maketh peace in thy borders, and filleth thee with the finest of the wheat. The first clause is literally, who maketh thy border peace, as in the margin. It was wonderful how God restrained the malignant passions of the heathen at the time of the rebuilding of Jerusalem. It is still more marvellous how in every age he has preserved his church from extermination in the midst of a wicked world that crucified her head and Lord. The finest of the wheat, literally, the fat or fatness of the wheat. In Ps. xvii. 10; lxxiii. 7, the word is rendered fat or fatness. See on Ps. lxxxi. 16. Although wheat and other necessities were by Darius and Artaxerxes provided for the Jews at the rebuilding of their city (Ezra vi. vii.), yet may not this clause be parallel to Ps. lxviii. 10; cxxxii. 14, 15, and so have a principal reference to the Bread that cometh down from heaven?

15. He sendeth forth his commandment upon earth: his word runneth very swiftly. With this verse compare Job xxxvii. 12; Ps. cvii. 20. Clouds, winds, mist, heat and cold swiftly obey God's behests. The material world offers no resistance to its Maker's will.

16. He giveth snow like wool; he scattereth the hoarfrost like ashes. Snow is like wool not only in its whiteness, but in its usefulness in furnishing a fleecy mantle, without which winter grains would otherwise perish by the intense cold. In color and in fineness of grain, the white frost may be said to resemble ashes.

17. He casteth forth his ice like morsels: who can stand before his cold? Morsels, a word often applied to pieces of bread, Gen. xviii. 5; Prov. xxviii. 21. Here it probably refers to hailstones. Street has small pieces; Clarke and Alexander, crumbs; Walford, hailstones. Fry renders the first clause thus: He sendeth forth his frost like binding chains. He refers to Simonis as authority. This indeed would give a very good sense, but the Hebrew will not bear it. The question in the latter clause is the strongest form of denying that any can stand before his cold.

18. He sendeth out his word, and melteth them: he causeth his wind to blow, and the waters flow. Word, as in v. 15. God's will is his word. To all nature he gives orders, which are immediately executed. He holds the wind in his fist. In all northern latitudes, the blowing of the south wind tends to melt the snow and the ice, and then the waters flow as freely as ever. More than this,

19. He sheweth his word unto Jacob; his statutes and his judgments unto Israel. On the terms statutes, judgments and word, see introduction to Ps. cxix., Nos. 4, 6, 7. All these words are different names for God's revealed will. Jacob and Israel, the people descended from Jacob. Sheweth, declareth, telleth, a participle, is shewing.

20. He hath not dealt so with any nation: and as for his judgments, they have not known them. Praise ye the LORD. Neither in ancient nor modern times is found any parallel to the history of the Jews. Judgments, as in v. 19, the decisions of God's word. Praise ye the LORD. Hallelujah.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. There are so many reasons for praising God, and so many calls to that work, that it will prove us guilty of an exceedingly strong and wicked aversion to that spiritual service, if we yield not to so urgent commands, vv. 1, 7, 12, 20. Amesius: "There is nothing better, nothing more pleasant, or more becoming than to praise God." See on Ps. l. 23; Heb. xiii. 15.

2. The reason why the church has not long since come to nought, is that God is her Maker and Builder, v. 2. A very small part of the opposition made to her, and of the treachery of her professed friends, would long since have destroyed any other institution upon earth.

3. It wonderfully illustrates the riches of divine grace that so many who were once afar off are brought nigh by the blood of Jesus, v. 2.

4. The tender mercy of God to the penitent is so great as to be worthy of all the mention made of it in Holy Scripture, vv. 3, 4. We never can sufficiently thank God 'for his refreshing, reviving and comforting, with his consolations, the hearts of the godly, when distressed and weakened by the devil, and burnt up, as it were, by the greatness of their temptations.' His condescension is equal to his majesty.

5. All places in the universe are under the dominion of the Most High, v. 4. He is as familiar with the remotest stars, as a shepherd is with his flock, John x. 3, 14.

6. There must be something exceedingly drivelling in the tendency of the human mind respecting divine things to have made it necessary for inspired writers so often to teach us that God is great, supreme, infinite, v. 5. What a joy to the tempted, the imperilled, the perplexed, that to the Almighty no subject is complex, no proposition doubtful.

7. Let not the meek, the humble and afflicted be dejected, v. 6. The Lord will comfort them. He knows how to raise them from their low estate to honor and usefulness on earth, and to glory and ineffable blessedness in heaven.

8. The wicked may boast and flatter themselves that they are the great and the wise; but their fall is at hand, v. 6. Compare 1 Thess. v. 3.

9. Although Jehovah is the First Cause, yet he has second causes. By the heat of the sun he evaporates water and thus makes the clouds. From the clouds come rain, and from the rain grass, or herbs, and from these, food for the creatures he has made, vv. 8, 9. It is as unphilosophical as it is atheistical to limit our thoughts to second causes and not to look through them to him who gives them all their efficiency.

10. Every man has at hand the materials for just, though inadequate conceptions of the amazing providence of God in supplying the wants of his creatures, in feeding myriads of beasts on the dry land, and birds in the air, fishes and monsters in the deep, and reptiles and insects upon the earth, v. 9. Compare Ps. cxlv. 14, 15.

11. There is such a thing as fitness and adaptedness in means and instruments, and God in his wisdom often selects such and teaches man to do the same; but whenever we trust in these and not in the living God, we are guilty of great folly, v. 10. Dickson: "Before man will want an idol, he will idolize his own strength, or the strength of a horse, and put confidence therein." Compare Job xxxi. 24.

12. The godly fear and animating hope of the humble, springing from a knowledge of the character and care of God, are better than all alliances with the potentates of earth. The Almighty has ever made it a point not to allow any truly pious sentiment directed to him to pass unnoticed or unrewarded, v. 11.

13. There is a sweet concord between all the graces of the Christian character, v. 11. Hope and fear dwell together in the same bosom, filling it with joy unspeakable. Henry: "Our fear must save our hope from swelling into presumption, and our hope must save our fear from sinking into despair."

14. There is not a step in the progress of the church, nor an event in her history, which does not show that all her defence and stability are to be found in the strength and marvellous kindness of Jehovah, v. 13.

15. To persons, churches and states, peace is a blessing from heaven, v. 14. So many are the disturbing and angry causes in the conscience, in society and in nations, that if God does not give quiet, there will be perpetual uproar.

16. It is a proof of the infinite beneficence of the Creator that in supplying the wants of his creatures, he does not merely give them such things as will enable them to drag out a miserable existence, but sends them the finest of the wheat, and a great variety of nutritious food, and suitable apparel, v. 14. Blessed be his name!

17. There is no cause for fear that anything will go wrong in any part of the universe in such a way as to defeat the wise and holy purposes of God, for his control is over all the elements, vv. 16–18. Calvin: “If we would avoid a senseless natural philosophy, we must always start with this principle, that everything in nature depends upon the will of God, and that the whole course of nature is only the prompt carrying into effect of his orders.”

17. No people enjoying the worship, the laws, the word and ordinances of God, can over-estimate the value of such privileges, v. 19. They raise a people to heaven itself. If this be so, how immense must be the responsibility of living in their enjoyment. Let nations thus exalted beware lest they be thrust down to hell. Compare Deut. xxxii. 12–22.

18. Why is it that God grants to some nations the light of his gospel and the blessings of his worship, and leaves others in the darkness of nature to endure the horrors of a sottish superstition? None can give a wiser answer to this awful question than that given by the Redeemer: “Even so, Father, for so it seemed good in thy sight.” We are compelled to resolve many things into the sovereign will of God, who worketh all things after the counsel of his own will, and giveth an account to none of his creatures.

PSALM CXLVIII.

1 Praise ye the LORD. Praise ye the LORD from the heavens; praise him in the heights.

2 Praise ye him, all his angels: praise ye him, all his hosts.

3 Praise ye him, sun and moon: praise him, all ye stars of light.

4 Praise him, ye heavens of heavens, and ye waters that be above the heavens.

5 Let them praise the name of the LORD: for he commanded, and they were created.

6 He hath also stablished them for ever and ever: he hath made a decree which shall not pass.

7 Praise the LORD from the earth, ye dragons, and all deeps:

8 Fire, and hail; snow, and vapour; stormy wind fulfilling his word:

9 Mountains, and all hills; fruitful trees, and all cedars:

10 Beasts, and all cattle; creeping things, and flying fowl:

11 Kings of the earth, and all people; princes, and all judges of the earth:

12 Both young men, and maidens; old men, and children:

13 Let them praise the name of the LORD: for his name alone is excellent; his glory is above the earth and heaven.

14 He also exalteth the horn of his people, the praise of all his saints: even of the children of Israel, a people near unto him. Praise ye the LORD.

WE know not when, nor by whom this ode was written; though Patrick, Morison and others regard David as author. There is no reason for ascribing it to Haggai and Zechariah, as does the Septuagint. Morison: “This is a composition distinguished by all that is lofty in style and imagery;” Jebb: “A most regularly constructed hymn;” Henry: “A most solemn and earnest call to all creatures, according to their capacity, to praise their Creator, and to show forth his eternal power and Godhead.” In Paradise Lost, book v., Milton puts this Psalm into a hymn for our first parents in Eden. Scott dates it B. C. 1016; Clarke, B. C. about 519. The names of the Most High here found are Jah LORD and Jehovah LORD, on which see introduction to Ps. lxxviii., and on Ps. i. 2.

1. Praise ye the LORD. Praise ye the LORD from the heavens: praise him in the heights. Wherever in this Psalm the word praise occurs either as a verb or noun, it is from the same root—that used in the compound, Hallelujah. The heavens and the heights are the same. Praise is uttered in them and comes from them. The Chaldee renders the verse, Praise the Lord, ye holy creatures from the heavens, praise him ye exalted ones; praise him all ye angels who minister before him. But angels are not the only inhabitants of heaven. The spirits of just men made perfect also belong to the celestial choir.

2. Praise ye him, all his angels; praise ye him all his hosts. Hosts, a term applied both to angels and to the heavenly bodies. It here may include both. That the number of angels and of stars is vast, we are fully informed—respecting the first by Scripture; respecting the second by vision and science. Compare Rev. v. 9–14. Patrick: “From the heavens and those unutterable heights, where hosts of immortal spirits, admitted to the sight of their King, enjoy unfading pleasures, the song is to begin. And when the strain is thus set by the celestial part of the choir, it is to be taken up, and echoed back, by the creatures of this lower world, animate and inanimate, which have all their several parts assigned them, in the great work of glorifying their creator.”

3. Praise ye him, sun and moon; praise him, all ye stars of light. See on Ps. viii. 3; xix. 1–6. These things praise God by their very existence. Their voice is loud and constant. No man can tell how much influence the contemplation of the heavens has had over himself. How powerfully they affect pious men is declared not only in the Scriptures, but in many books, especially religious biography.

4. Praise him, ye heavens of heavens, and ye waters that be above the heavens. By heavens of heavens Luther understands all heavenly regions; but it is more probable that the phrase corresponds to third heavens in the New Testament, the abode of saints and angels—Paradise. By the waters which are above the heavens, we understand the clouds which are ordinarily above the lower heavens in which the birds soar.

5. Let them praise the name of the LORD; for he commanded, and they were created. In this verse as also in v. 13 the verb in the Hebrew is in the future, shall praise, i. e., these things praise God now and shall continue to do so; or we may read it as in the English. These wonderful things are created to glorify God, and they shall certainly answer that end. It is only sinful men and apostate angels who of all God's creatures fail to put honor upon their Maker.

6. He hath also stablished them for ever and ever: he hath made a decree which shall not pass. Conservation fitly follows creation. It would not be worthy of a Being of infinite perfections to have finished the heavens, and left the stars to go wandering without a guide, and the motions of the clouds to have been regulated by casualty. The God of heaven is the Lord of nature. Pass, pass away, or fail to be in force, and so it is the decree which shall not fail. But some fine scholars think that the grammar allows us to understand a decree which they shall not pass. Compare Ps. lxxxix. 37; cxix. 90, 91; Jer. xxxi. 35, 36; xxxiii. 25, 26. We know nothing more stable than the order of nature, until we become acquainted with the author of nature.

7. Praise the LORD from the earth, ye dragons, and all deeps. Dragons, as in Ps. lxxiv. 13; xci. 13; in Gen. i. 21, whales; in Lam. iv. 3, sea-monsters. Deeps, depths, or deep places, the name often given to the channels of great waters. It occurs often; Ps. xxxiii. 7; xxxvi. 6; in Ps. cxxxvi. 6, waters. None but a God of infinite perfections would have made such vast receptacles for water, filling them with living creatures. They show his praise continually.

8. Fire, and hail; snow, and vapours; stormy wind fulfilling his word. The fire here is the lightning, which attends the hail. See Ps. xviii. 12. The snow is but frozen vapours falling to the earth. Either as breeze or tempest the wind fulfils God's word, i. e., does his will; for he holds the winds in his fist. All these illustrate the grandeur of the scale, on which Jehovah works, and the control of the Almighty over all causes and agents, however far beyond the power of mortals.

9. Mountains, and all hills; fruitful trees, and all cedars. Fruitful trees (literally tree of fruit) and cedars; the former the most useful, the latter the most majestic. What conceptions of the power of God are suggested by the mountains and cedars, and of his beneficence by the hills and the fruit-trees!

10. Beasts, and all cattle; creeping things, and flying fowl. Beasts, living creatures, from the connection supposed to be those which are wild, in contrast with cattle, a term commonly denoting domestic animals. Creeping things, as in Ps. civ. 25, uniformly rendered except in Gen. ix. 3; Ps. lxix. 34, where it is moving thing, or thing that moveth. It includes lesser land animals even down to insects. Flying fowl, literally bird of wing, all the feathered tribes. All living things from the elephant to the ant, the bear, the boar, the beaver and the beetle, the ostrich, the condor, the eagle, the sparrow and the humming-bird should join the chorus of universal praise. From irrational creatures the prophet passes to the different classes of men:

11. Kings of the earth, and all people; princes, and all judges of the earth:

12. Both young men, and maidens; old men, and children.

The word people is in the plural peoples. Children often rendered servants, young men; in the singular in Ps. cxix. 9, young man. The authorized version doubtless gives the correct idea of the other terms. No human being, however great or small, old or young, bold or retiring, in office or out of office, is exempt.

13. Let them praise the name of the LORD: for his name alone is excellent; his glory is above the earth and heaven. The name of the Lord here is put for the Lord himself. Excellent, high, lofty, exalted. Glory, often rendered majesty. In Ps. viii. 1, his glory is said to be above the heavens; here above the earth and heaven.

14. He also exalleth the horn of his people, the praise of all his saints; even of the children of Israel, a people near unto him. Praise ye the LORD. On exalting the horn, see on Ps. lxxv. 4, 5. He, who thus lifts up his people exalts also their praise, i. e., gives them cause and a heart to praise him anew. The servants of the Most High are his people, or nation. They are also his saints, godly, merciful, or bountiful ones. No saint is a niggard, or impious. Then they are the children of Israel—Israelites indeed, John i. 47; Rom. ii. 28, 29; ix. 6. Then they are a people near and dear unto God, as kinsfolk are to each other. God draws nigh to them in covenant love, and they draw nigh to him with offerings and in various worship, and, so far as they are sincere, they draw nigh with true hearts, pure consciences and lively faith. In the day of their strong confidence and joy let them not forget to say, Praise ye the LORD, Hallelujah.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. This Psalm abundantly answers the question sometimes skeptically asked, Why did God make dragons, various kinds of reptiles and noxious plants? The answer is, He made them to praise him, to show his wondrous skill. Many of them have already been found to be of great service to man; others may yet be found useful. But every one of them shows his eternal power and Godhead.

2. Sin must be a horrible evil, breaking up the harmony of the universe in the worship of the Creator. What a fearful outrage it is for man or angel to introduce discord into the symphony of creation.

3. Although true worship is humble, yet oftentimes the heart is so full of adoring views of the majesty and glory of God as to desire all creation to unite in praising the Most High, vv. 3-12. Scott: "Every effort of the zealous believer to praise the Lord causes his unbounded excellencies to unveil themselves more fully to his enraptured, admiring, thankful heart; and thus he becomes more and more conscious of his inability to praise God in a suitable manner. He therefore rejoices to reflect, that there are innumerable hosts of angels before the throne, in the heights of heaven, who are able to praise him in more exalted strains."

4. One of the glorious and blessed effects of the Gospel is to restore harmony in the creation, bringing angels and men into one family, making Christ the head of them all, v. 2; Ephes. i. 10; iii. 10. All holy creatures worship the same God and Saviour.

5. Sin is a sad perversion of everything it influences. How strange that rational and immortal men should be ashamed to be found praising God, when our elder brethren unite by thousand thousands and ten thousand times ten thousand in ministering before him, and praising him in the highest, vv. 2, 3. Compare Dan. vii. 10.

6. Sublime as is the science of astronomy, and demonstrable as are its leading principles, yet a knowledge of them is not necessary to make it obligatory on us and reasonable for us to adore the Creator of the blazing universe above us, vv. 3, 4. The shepherd boy, the wanderer on the desert, and the sailor on watch have had as just and as adoring views of God inspired by the starry heavens as ever warmed the bosom of a proficient in science.

7. Creation lays a solid and broad foundation of religious obligation, v. 5. Had man not sinned, he would have felt this to be so, and would have delighted to worship God as the Author of his existence. "What worlds of goodness has he created!"

8. And as creation, so also providence binds all to show forth the glory of God, v. 6.

9. On what an immense scale has God planned creation, even this world itself, v. 7. Let any one think of the amazing caverns in the ocean, of the paths in the sea, of the depths never sounded by the mariner, and if he learns no more, he may surely learn this, that the Creator works on a scale of magnificence.

10. The Author of the Bible is the Author of all that is valuable and instructive in true science. Great attention has been given to meteorology, and the agitation of the atmosphere. Yet all the facts in these branches of study are furnished by God, v. 8. The same is true of botany, v. 9, and of zoology and entomology, v. 10.

11. If Jehovah thus controls all the changes which take place in the heavens above us, it is both rational and proper for us to pray for rain in time of drought; for fair weather when incessant rain and moisture are rotting the grain in the field; for wind to swell the sails when we are becalmed at sea, and for the laying of the storm when we are tempest-tossed.

12. A volume might be written to show the goodness of God in giving to this earth an undulating surface, alternate hills and vales, mountains and gorges, v. 9. The chief things of the ancient mountains and the precious things of the lasting hills have long been celebrated, Deut. xxxiii. 15.

13. Among men none are so high, and none so low as not to be fitly summoned to praise Jehovah, vv. 11, 12. Calvin: "As kings and princes are blinded by the dazzling influence of their station, so as to think the world was made for them, and in the pride of their hearts to despise God, the prophet particularly calls them to this duty." By him kings reign and princes decree justice. Dickson: "As civil government is appointed by God, so they, who are advanced to this dignity, are first in the obligation to the duty of setting forth God's praise." Nor can old men be exempted.

“Let age take up the tuneful lay,
Sigh his bless'd name—then soar away,
And ask an angel's lyre.”

Nor are little children dispensed to neglect this duty, Matt. xxi. 15, 16. Nor may servants keep silent. The little captive maid in Syria knew more of the true God and his prophets than did her great master.

14. However depressed the state of his people may be for a while, in due season God will raise them up. Their time is surely coming, when every one of them shall not only be satisfied, but exultant in the honor and glory to which he shall be advanced, v. 14.

15. Nor is this wonderful, for all his people are near unto God, v. 14. Compare Eph. ii. 13. Yes, and dear, to him also, dear as the apple of his eye.

PSALM CXLIX.

1 Praise ye the LORD. Sing unto the LORD a new song, and his praise in the congregation of saints.

2 Let Israel rejoice in him that made him: let the children of Zion be joyful in their King.

3 Let them praise his name in the dance: let them sing praises unto him with the timbrel and harp.

4 For the LORD taketh pleasure in his people: he will beautify the meek with salvation.

5 Let the saints be joyful in glory: let them sing aloud upon their beds.

6 Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a twoedged sword in their hand;

7 To execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people;

8 To bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron;

9 To execute upon them the judgment written: this honor have all his saints. Praise ye the LORD.

SOME make Nehemiah the author of this Psalm; but vv. 7-9 had no adequate fulfilment in his time. It is more probable that it was written by David, as many think. The author of Ps. cxlviii. probably wrote this. But on these points we have no knowledge. Many Jewish expositors and early Christian writers regard this as prophetic. If it is so, it has not yet received its complete fulfilment. It relates entirely to God's kindness to his church, and treats not of his bounties to others. Henry styles it "A hymn of praise to the Redeemer." Scott dates it B. C. 1015; Clarke regards it as a late production. The names of the Almighty found in it are Jah LORD, Jehovah LORD and El God, on which see introduction to Ps. lxviii.; and on Ps. i. 2; v. 4. Neither the Hebrew nor any of the ancient versions assign this Psalm to any given author or time. It begins and ends with Hallelujah.

1. Praise ye the LORD. Sing unto the LORD a new song, and his praise in the congregation of saints. On a new song, see on Ps. xxxiii. 3. Praise, the verb in Hallelujah. Saints, as in Ps. cxlv. 10; cxlviii. 14, elsewhere, godly, merciful, and in the margin, bountiful. It occurs also in vv. 5, 9, in the same sense as here. It is a designation of the people composing the church of God.

2. Let Israel rejoice in him that made him: let the children of Zion be joyful in their King. That made him, a participle, sometimes rendered Maker, in the plural Makers, Prov. xiv. 31; xvii. 5; Isa. liv. 5. Israel and the children of Zion are names given to the same people, elsewhere in this Psalm called saints. King; to the Israelites as a people, God was a King governing them by a Theocracy from the time of Moses till the nation lost its power. But God is King in Zion in all ages. He is the Lord of the true Israelites everywhere. If we give the verse an evangelical sense, as we are authorized to do by Ps. ii., then it is a summons to the truly pious to be glad in the Redeemer, and to make known their joys by suitable songs.

3. Let them praise his name in the dance: let them sing praises unto him with the timbrel and harp. Dance and its cognate feminine uniformly so rendered, except in Cant. vi. 13, as it were the company. Clarke says he knows no place in the Bible where these words mean dance, and that they constantly mean some kind of pipe. This is not supported by authority. Yet our English version has in the margin here, with the pipe. If here it points to a musical instrument, it must mean some kind of pipe, lute, flute or fife. Timbrel; see on Ps. lxxxii. 2; in Gen. xxxi. 27, Tabret. It is the name of the instrument with which Miriam played. It was very ancient, and more resembled the tambourine than any other thing known to moderns. Harp, uniformly rendered, see on Ps. xxxiii. 2. The pious Jews seem always to have sung solemn words when they used the timbrel and harp in their worship. In this verse sing praises means sing Psalms.

4. For the LORD taketh pleasure in his people: he will beautify the meek with salvation. Taketh pleasure, a participle, as in Ps. cxlvii. 11; of the same root with the verb taketh pleasure in Ps. cxlvii. 10. When applied to God it is frequently rendered accept in reference to offerings and worshippers. God has a favor to his people, delights in them, sets his affection on them. Compare 1 Chron. xxix. 3; Job xxxiv. 9; Ps. xlv. 3. Beautify, or glorify, both renderings are common. The King of Zion will honor the meek, humble or afflicted, and he will also make them glorious with salvation complete, entire, everlasting in heaven.

5. Let the saints be joyful in glory; let them sing aloud upon their beds. Be joyful, not the word rendered rejoice, or be joyful in v. 2, but one that expresses exultation, in Ps. xxviii. 7, rendered greatly rejoice. The glory of this clause is the abundant honor which God shall confer upon the saints, especially in their worship. Sing aloud, see on Ps. v. 11, where, and in other places, it is rendered shout for joy. But why should they shout upon their beds? Some say, Because in the days of their affliction, they had wet their couch with tears, and howled upon their beds, Hos. vii. 14; and God would have them now in the same place and posture rejoice. Others say, the phrase means that they should sing by night as well as by day, on their beds as well as in their business. Others say, that lying upon the bed is a posture of rest, and that the Lord would have his people, now no longer filled with alarm, sing upon their beds in joy, and peace, and security. Diodati: "Enjoying a sweet and secure rest." Another interpretation is, God's people shall be joyful and shout with joy even on their beds of sickness and of death. Others suppose that the reference is to feasts, where the guests reclined upon couches, and ate, and sang at their festal banquets, or as they partook of the eucharistical sacrifices. But in Scripture the repose of departed saints is likened to men resting in their beds, Isa. lvii. 2. May not this clause refer to the rest and joy of glorified spirits, who have finished their course on earth?

6. Let the high praises of God be in their mouth, and a twoedged sword in their hand. As the verbs in the verse immediately preceding are in the future, shall be joyful, shall sing aloud, so doubtless the verb to be supplied here should assume the same form, shall be. In their mouth, literally, in their throat. Twoedged sword, literally, sword of edges. This verse, compared with history, (Neh. iv. 17, 18,) looks more like a reference to the times of Nehemiah than anything in the Psalm. But in the time of that wonderful young man, no such events followed as are here predicted. Of this verse, Diodati says it "may be understood of the people's victories over their corporall enemies; and also of the spirituall combats against the world and the princes of it by the power of God's word and Spirit, 2 Cor. x. 4; Heb. iv. 12; Rev. xvi.; xix. 15; and finally of the last victory over all the enemies' power, which the church united to its Head shall obtain at his last coming, Rev. ii. 26." The great objection to applying this verse to the heavenly state is found in the tenor of the remaining three verses:

7. To execute vengeance upon the heathen, and punishments upon the people. The people, plural, are the nations, the Gentiles, the same as the heathen of the first clause. God may make use of good or of bad men to punish guilty persons or communities. But the best interpretation of this and the following verses is that, which finds their fulfilment in the destruction of the systems of heathenism itself by the Gospel preached among the nations. That such an interpretation is not overstrained might be shown by a consideration of such passages as Isaiah xlii. 1-4 explained by Matt. xii. 18-20. In Isaiah lix. 17, which clearly refers to the work of salvation by the Redeemer, it is expressly said that he put on the garments of vengeance for clothing. In Isaiah lxi. 1-3, which we infallibly know has its fulfilment in Christ, (Luke iv. 21) the time of the Gospel is called the day of vengeance of our God. In both these cases the word rendered vengeance is the same as that in our verse. Compare also John ix. 39; xii. 31. How gloriously has the Gospel driven from among men the systems of Gentilism that prevailed in the Roman empire when Christ came! Not an altar smokes to the honor of one of the false gods then worshipped in Asia Minor or in Europe. In all that vast region not an oracle gives forth its responses. The glory of the Gospel is found in its spiritual victories. Unless we adopt this mode of explanation, which is often suggested in Scripture, we shall find it impossible to explain some parts of God's word otherwise than in a manner shocking to piety and contrary to history. Isaiah lxiii. 1-3 is such a passage.

8. To bind their kings with chains, and their nobles with fetters of iron. The imagery is still that borrowed from conquest, there being no language better suited to celebrate the mighty victories of truth and righteousness. This verse is but an expansion of v. 7. Calvin: "As the Psalmist treats here of the perfection of the prosperity of the people, it follows that he refers to the Messiah, that their expectation and desire of him might not cease either in their prosperity or adversity." Alexander: "This verse simply carries out the idea of the one before it, that of the subjugation of the Gentiles by the true religion." The meaning of the verse therefore is that at a time then future—in the latter day—under the Gospel—God would give his truth such power that the potentates of earth should be carried captives in the chains of love, or that his providence would so arrange things that kings and nobles should be as powerless for evil as if they were bound with chains and fetters. For the saints should have power

9. To execute upon them the judgment written: this honor have all his saints. Praise ye the LORD. The judgment written in prophecy. The prophets foretold as vast and glorious conquests by the Gospel, as have ever taken place, or shall ever occur. In this work of subduing the world to knowledge and love, all his saints bear a part. They at least help together by prayer and holy living, and they have a participation in the honor, the glory, resulting from the triumphs of the Redeemer. They enter into his joy. Well may such be called on, and well may they call on others to sing Hallelujah, Praise ye the Lord.

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. There can be no circumstances in which hallelujahs will be ill-timed. We may sing them in view of what God is, in view of what he has done, in view of what he has promised, at all times, in all circumstances, publicly and privately, vv. 1, 9.

2. Public worship in the congregation, and singing as a part of worship have been in use under divine appointment in the ancient church as well as in Gospel times, v.

1. Compare Heb. x. 25; Eph. v. 19; Col. iii. 16; Jas. v. 13.

3. Whatever comfort, usefulness, honor, or pleasant prospects any man or nation may have, it ought never to be forgotten that all these, and all other blessings come by the free favor of God, v. 2. If we are or have anything good, it was God who made us to possess it.

4. Let us learn not to rejoice so much in the gift as in the Giver, in the blessings received as in the Source of all comfort, in the good things enjoyed as in our King himself, v. 2.

5. On instrumental music suggested by v. 3, see REMARKS ON Ps. xxxiii. 2.

6. The dance was in early times one of the modes of expressing religious joy, Ex. xv. 20; 2 Sam. vi. 16. When from any cause men's ideas shall undergo such a revolution as to lead them to do the same thing for the same purpose, it will be time enough to discuss that matter. In our time dancing has no such use, and cannot therefore in anywise be justified by pleading the practice of pious Jews of old.

7. In nothing but his own infinite nature does God take such pleasure as in his people, the meek of the earth, v. 4. He has done more for them and promised more to them, than to and for even angels, who never sinned against him. Of course he has a right to expect the highest service they can render.

8. If we would be gloriously joyful, we must be saints, godly, merciful ones, v. 5.

9. It is fitting that after war should come peace, after turmoil, rest, v. 5. Nicolson: "In heaven they rest from labor, not from praise."

10. As the Lord's people go forth to the work assigned them, and in particular to the conquest of the world to Christ, let them not sing dirges, but God's high praises, v. 6. They have a good King and Master. They have great cause of joy, yea, and great joy. "It is a lasting joy, both day and night; a joy which, when they are most retired, may be most enjoyed; which, being examined in secret, shall be found solid; a joy full of quiet, rest, and peace; a joy which shall continue with them when their bodies are lying in the grave."

11. The subversion of Satan's empire in this world, especially the destruction of the hoary systems of idolatry among the most enlightened nations, may well be regarded with the liveliest interest, vv. 7-9.

12. Let every man stand in his lot, glorify God in the position in which God has placed him, and seek and find his honor in doing and suffering the will of God, whatever it may be, v. 9.

13. Among the blasphemies of Popery has been the application of this Psalm, particularly of vv. 6-9 to the supremacy of the spiritual power of the church over the temporal power of princes. Not a whit less mischievous or anti-christian are the occasional attempts of fanatics, nominal Protestants, to blend these powers, or to gain for the church the ascendancy in civil matters. Christ's kingdom is not of this world. He has not made his people or ministers dividers of inheritances. History shows that the world has never seen worse governments than those of ecclesiastics, who forsook the altar to serve Cæsar, or who served at the altar that they might the better carry on their nefarious schemes against the liberties of mankind.

PSALM CL.

- 1 Praise ye the LORD. Praise God in his sanctuary: praise him in the firmament of his power.
- 2 Praise him for his mighty acts: praise him according to his excellent greatness.
- 3 Praise him with the sound of the trumpet: praise him with the psaltery and harp.
- 4 Praise him with the timbrel and dance: praise him with stringed instruments and organs.
- 5 Praise him upon the loud cymbals: praise him upon the high sounding cymbals.
- 6 Let every thing that hath breath praise the LORD. Praise ye the LORD.

LIKE Ps. i. this is short and striking, and has six verses. It would not be unreasonable to surmise that David wrote it. Some have ascribed it to Ezra. If it had any historic occasion, we know not what it was. Some of the Jews say, it belongs to Messianic times. Scott dates it B. C. 450; Clarke is silent respecting date and authorship. The names of the Most High here found are Jah LORD and El God, on which see introduction to Ps. lxxviii. and on Ps. v. 4. The verb praise occurs thirteen times in our version of this ode. In each case it is a part of Hallelujah, which begins and ends the song.

1. Praise ye the LORD. Praise God in his sanctuary: praise him in the firmament of his power. God, El, strong God. Sanctuary, or holiness; rendered both ways; commonly connected with the place of God's worship. Diodati understands either "his earthly sanctuary, that is to say, his church; or the heavenly one of his glory; in the first sense the speech is directed to his officers; in the second, to his angels. Ps. cxlviii. 2." Firmament, see on Ps. xix. 1. The firmament of his power is the expanse above us, which displays the might of Jehovah or as the old Italian has it glory, the Hebrew strength. Alexander: "The essential meaning of the verse is, Praise him both in earth and heaven." If any prefer to understand the verse as a call upon all creation to praise the Lord for the infinite purity of his nature, and the infinite extent of his power, no doubt those ideas are included.

2. Praise him for his mighty acts: praise him according to his excellent greatness. On the first clause see on Ps. cxlv. 5, 6. With the second compare Deut. iii. 24. Mighty acts, as in Ps. cxlv. 4, denoting either the power exercised, or the results thereof, in the plural. Excellent, in Hebrew a noun, commonly in the Psalter rendered abundance, multitude, or greatness, literally the excellence of his greatness, or rather the greatness of his greatness. See on Ps. cxlv. 3; cxlvii. 5.

3. Praise him with the sound of the trumpet: praise him with the psaltery and harp. The Greek rendering of the word for trumpet is salpiggos; in Latin it may be tuba, buccina, or cornu. There seem to have been two kinds of trumpets in use among the Hebrews, the straight and the crooked; but of the size, or power of these instruments we know nothing. We had the same word rendered trumpet in Ps. xlvii. 5; lxxxi. 3; and cornet in Ps. xcvi. 6. Psaltery, uniformly so rendered in the Psalms, but see on Ps. xxxiii. 2. Harp, so rendered throughout the Scriptures. We had it in Ps. cxlvii. 7; cxlix. 3. See on Ps. xxxiii. 2.

4. Praise him with the timbrel and dance: praise him with stringed instruments and organs. Timbrel, as in Ps. cxlix. 3. See on Ps. lxxxi. 2. In Gen. xxxi. 27, several times in Isaiah, once in Jeremiah and once in Ezekiel it is rendered tabret. The modern tambourine perhaps most resembles the tabret or timbrel of the Jews. On the dance see on Ps. xxx. 11; cxlix. 3. For dance the margin has pipe. Stringed instruments, a general term not determining the form or shape, but only that they had strings. Organs, in the singular, organ; not found elsewhere in the Psalms, and but thrice in other books, Gen. iv. 21; Job xxi. 12; xxx. 31. Gesenius gives it pipe, reed, syrinx. It is through the Septuagint and kindred versions that we get the word organ, meaning a set or combination of pipes.

5. Praise him upon the loud cymbals: praise him upon the high sounding cymbals. Loud cymbals, literally cymbals of hearing, of fame, of report. High sounding cymbals, literally cymbals of shouting or of joyful noise. Cymbals, the same word in both clauses. It does not occur very often, and is variously rendered. It is generally agreed that cymbals were instruments which produced a loud clanging noise. Probably they were metallic plates. The Jews themselves confess that they have lost the knowledge, by which they might reproduce these several instruments.

6. Let every thing that hath breath praise the LORD. Praise ye the LORD. The first verb is in the future, shall praise, and may be regarded as a prediction. Alexander: "There is nothing in the Psalter more majestic or more beautiful than this brief but most significant finale, in which solemnity of tone predominates, without however in the least disturbing the exhilaration which the close of the Psalter seems intended to produce, as if in emblematical allusion to the triumph which awaits the church with all its members, when through much tribulation they shall enter into rest." Hengstenberg: "As the life of the faithful, and the history of the church, so also the Psalter, with all its cries from the depths, runs out in a Hallelujah." Calvin: "As yet the Psalmist has addressed himself in his exhortations to the people who are conversant with the ceremonies under the law; now he turns to men in general, tacitly intimating that a time was coming when the same songs, which were then heard only in Judea, will resound in every quarter of the globe. And in this prediction we have been joined in the same symphony with the Jews, that we may worship God with constant sacrifices of praise, until being gathered into the kingdom of heaven, we sing with elect angels an eternal Hallelujah."

DOCTRINAL AND PRACTICAL REMARKS.

1. This Psalm teaches how blessed is the man who has a heart to join creation in the work of praise. He, who has no mind for such blessed employment, must be indeed a vile wretch. "Praise is the consummation of all religion." Nothing is more reasonable. The holiness of God calls for it. His house is holy. His word is holy. His law is holy. His worship is holy. His nature is originally and infinitely holy; and he has all might and all majesty, and is the First Cause of all wonderful things.

2. The righteous set no bounds to their praise of the Most High. There is no danger that any creature will speak of God in terms too exalted; but rather that in our highest services we will fall below the glory of the theme. God's perfections are infinite; and we should not seek to limit our expressions of gratitude and adoration. Both what God has done, and what he is will fully warrant the most heavenly strains, vv. 1, 2.

3. On instrumental music, see REMARKS on Ps. xxxiii. 2. It may be added that those who discourage the use of all instrumental music in God's worship do not adduce any Scripture prohibiting it under the gospel. On this subject, Morison utters words of wisdom: "Let every one be persuaded in his own mind, and let none, by the rejection or the approval of a thing indifferent, throw a stumbling-block in the way of his weak brother. But let none forget that it is the music of a renewed heart alone which God will accept."

4. Cobbin: "If our worship is more spiritual than that of the Jewish church, our praises ought not to be less frequent. If we are not so clamorous, we ought not to be less fervent. If we do not use the many instruments they employed, we should substitute the beautiful instruments of grateful hearts."

5. As we should never begin a work without prayer to God, so we should never close our labors in any enterprise without thanking him who has sustained us. It is very seemly that God's servants should abound in his praise as they are about to leave the world. Henry: "The nearer good Christians come to their end, the fuller they should be of the praises of God." And 'if we begin by separating from the ungodly, and delighting in the sacred word; (Ps. i.) and proceed by lively faith and fervent prayer, to follow after holiness, resist temptation, and maintain communion with God; we may hope to close with exulting praise, and to end our lives, ardently exhorting all that have breath to praise the Lord,' v. 6.

6. No more benevolent wish can be expressed than that each man may have the devout spirit breathed in the Psalms, and at last unite with the many angels round about the throne, and the beasts, and the elders, in singing, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing; and to say with the much people in heaven, Alleluia! Salvation, and glory, and honor, and power, unto the Lord our God. Amen; Alleluia.

In closing this work, the author wishes to record his estimate of the kindness of not a few of God's people in giving him timely encouragement in his labors; and to add that if he knew any terms in which the highest possible praise could be uttered to the honor of God, the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, he would select them to express his sense of the infinite glory of Him who gave us the Scriptures, and by divine illumination enables us to gain some little insight into their blessed and glorious import.

Praise God from whom all blessings flow;
Praise Him, all creatures here below;
Praise Him above, ye heavenly host;
Praise FATHER, SON, and HOLY GHOST.

ALLELUIA FOR EVER AND EVER. AMEN.

THE END.
